A Preface to Law Enforcement

By BRUCE SMITH

ADVANCES made by American police during the past thirty years are certain to be recorded in the history of our time. The brilliant record of the Federal Bureau of Investigation, the emergence of a dozen or more state police forces of outstanding quality, and the striking reversal of old police patterns in many cities and villages—these are the physical evidence of a radical change in police thought and action that has exercised an influence in many ways.

UNEVEN PROGRESS

It is likely that all police establishments, at the federal, state, and local levels, have participated in some degree in this great upward surge. That some of the largest forces should not have responded as readily as others of moderate size or less, may be attributed in part to the operation of local and special influences. The manner in which partisan control is applied is bound to be a factor. Furthermore, the conditions making for police improvement are by no means equally distributed, and mere size can be a burden unless it also has animation and vitality. As a consequence, the advancing police front at all times offers a rather ragged appearance that is featured by the miscellany of the participants and the differing rates of their progress.

Such failures to maintain perfect order and to achieve full perfection need not concern us greatly. In fact, it may represent one of the superior features of the current movement, since no one type of police force and no single geographical region can enjoy exclusive opportunities or feel secure in a hard-won position. With improvement so widely distributed and experimentation taking so many diverse forms, there is less likely to be a sudden drying up of the sources of inspiration; and the wide dispersion of both leaders and followers goes far towards assuring that today's adventurous efforts by a few will be experienced tomorrow by the many who are destined to move at a slower pace.

That so much should have been accomplished so quickly is the more remarkable since our country has the most decentralized police system in the world, and there is no central authority to set the standards of police service and then exact compliance with them. But precept, example, and a widespread desire to emulate have combined to produce a result so striking that one may doubt whether it could have been achieved in any other way.

When the various aspects of police are viewed in detail, the same marked irregularities of accomplishment are noted on every hand. Methods for selecting, promoting, and disciplining police are still obstructed by the outworn devices produced by civil service commissions during the past half-century and more. But new and more reliable devices are in the making, are now under test, or have already won acceptance among a widening circle of participants.

Especially notable is the response of Young America to our country's new police patterns. The best police forces have captured the imagination of millions of youths who stand at the verge of decision on their careers. If we are alert to this opportunity, we can attract ten thousand of them every year into police uniforms and so produce a steadily rising quality of recruitment that will assure the police future as nothing else can.

SPECIFIC AREAS OF ADVANCE

Training for police has moved so far and so fast that it now stands breathless and somewhat fatigued with it all. A brief rest would do it good, while plans for fresh advances towards a vastly improved police pedagogy can be contrived and perfected. We shall continue to need more and more police training for some time to come—especially in the smaller forces—but the greatest need is for better training and a better grade of police teaching.

In material things the police administrator has little left to strive for. The plain fact is that American police have more physical equipment under their control than the combined police strength of all the rest of the world. While some of the pay scales now in effect are clearly inadequate, the upward trend is so emphatic as to hold promise that even the monetary inflation will not forever thwart police in the enjoyment of a better economic status. For the present, it is pertinent to note that the American policeman leads all others of his craft in his economic status, and that the end of the current upswing can be indefinitely postponed if standards for selection and the performance of duty can continue to rise.

Among the various police functions, traffic accident control has shown the most rapid and productive advances, at least as practiced by the limited number of traffic specialists in police uniforms. The problem now consists in transferring their techniques to the rank and file of the general patrol force, in order that a wider and more consistent enforcement of traffic laws and regulations may be effected.

By contrast, the applied arts of criminal investigation thus far have moved forward in relatively few forces, but new techniques are on the way towards general acceptance, and when supported by laboratory tests in the examination of traces, they will effect a higher ratio of detections to crimes committed.

In dealing with the youthful offender we have greatly erred in seeking to go too far and too fast, without enough thought for our point of origin, our direction, or our goals. We have rashly assumed that juvenile delinquency is a distinctive product of our own time, and so have tended to treat current symptoms rather than causes. We have forgotten that crime and delinquency have always been a major preoccupation of youthful minds in active bodies. Real progress has been made towards a better and more humane treatment of juvenile offenders, but not enough is done to protect the community from even its thoroughly vicious young criminals.

Motor transport and radio broadcasts combine to work wonders in assuring an expeditious response to demands for emergency service of many kinds, but these advances have been made at the expense of circulating patrol, and so the basic work of policing stands still while most other forms of police service advance. With all our experimenting, we have neglected this largest single segment in the defense arc. Until patrol coverage rests upon a far more scientific basis, a substantial portion of police manpower will continue to be dissipated on unproductive tasks.

THREATS TO THE PROFESSION

Yet, all in all, there is much to cheer about, and the future appears even more promising of worth-while advances. If these bright prospects are not realized, it will probably be because police fail to meet the professional challenges that are implicit in militant unionism and various objectionable practices in the interrogation and custody of police prisoners. While in no way interrelated, these two items are threats to a continuing police improvement.

Militant police unionism operates far outside the proper sphere of craft or professional association, and achieves its ends by aggressive methods that reject the professional ideal of service. Abuse of prisoners temporarily entrusted to police custody causes so much public concern that the police record becomes tarnished as fast as it is made. Much is made of the fact that the vast majority of today's police reject the use of force on prisoners who have submitted to arrest and are safely under lock and key; but they prove strangely reluctant to root out objectionable practices by vigorously disciplining the official offender. Police interrogations under circumstances that infringe basic liberties guaranteed by the Constitution also raise disturbing questions as to the extent to which justice under law is accepted as a guide to conduct.

Hence, until more responsible attitudes are assumed by portions of the rank and file, as well as by their police superiors, there can be no police profession in any worth-while connotation of the term.

STATUS OF POLICE ADMINISTRATORS

Meanwhile, the status of most of our chief police administrators continues to be uncertain at best. Where tenure is assured for a police chief by statute or civil service rule, one finds a pronounced tendency for the actual control to shift to a politically responsive official or commission. The exceptions are not numerous. Thus the time is probably still far distant which shall see the generality of police executives securely established in the official hierarchy. Pending such remote developments, their position can be made more comfortable for themselves and more attractive to their successors if they forgo the temptations of political involvement and leave all political issues to the elected representatives of the people.

In some cities and states this is not difficult to accomplish, but there are others where the administration of justice is so much influenced by partisan considerations that extraordinary patience and wisdom are essential to the professional equipment of police administrators. Where they have notably succeeded in avoiding the dangers of political controversy and intervention, they have been greatly aided by policies that rested upon demonstrable facts. Their public relations efforts have not been based upon mere publicity for themselves or their programs, but on the contrary have sought to determine and to understand popular attitudes and to conform their programs to them insofar as is compatible with the obligation of equal enforcement.

Similarly, they have frankly accepted crime and disorder not only as inevitable but often as inexplicable, and have wasted no time or popular good will in pretending that they can prevent all crime or remove the causes of delinquency. Instead they concentrate their efforts upon determining how much crime there is, where and when it occurs, and what forms of police action seem to be most effective in keeping it within reasonable bounds.

Thus fortified by reliable facts, both their law enforcement policies and their public relations acquire a consistency that is appreciated and accepted at city halls and state capitals. Assured tenure will be of slow growth, but can be greatly nurtured by the ability of police heads to analyze and attack their law enforcement problems before they assume threatening proportions.

These are the indexes to the police future, and these appear to be the outlines of further progress. With them in mind, the present issue of THE ANNALS has been turned over to a distinguished group of administrators and specialists who have demonstrated their skills in law enforcement and are in the best possible position to define and discuss the aspirations and ultimate goals of our numerous and varied police systems. Taken together, the score of thoughtful papers here presented provide a blueprint for action that not only can meet today's exigencies but also can raise tomorrow's standards of policing.

Bruce Smith, New York City, is secretary of the Institute of Public Administration. For the past thirty-seven years he has conducted surveys and special studies of police and law enforcement at the federal, state, and local levels. These have been supplemented by occasional similar inquiries in Canada and Great Britain and on the continent of Europe. Most recent of his major publications are the survey reports on the police forces of New York, Boston, and Cincinnati and the state police of Connecticut and Michigan, and the revised and enlarged edition of Police Systems in the United States, originally published in 1941.

The Police Challenge in Our Great Cities

By WILLIAM H. PARKER

IT would be difficult to devise a combination of factors more conducive to crime and disorder than is found in the typical great city of the United States. Rarely does history record so many people of varied beliefs and modes of conduct grouped together in so competitive and complex a social structure. The confusing variety of religious and political creeds, national origins, and diverse cultures is matched only by the extremes of ideals, emotions, and conduct found in the individual. Although proud of their independence, these people live so interdependently that food, shelter, and even their very movement on the streets require delicately balanced co-operation. Although sharing a tradition of individual liberty, their activities are regulated by the greatest and most complicated concentration of laws to be found anywhere.

Charged with maintaining this precarious order by enforcing this confusion of laws is the city police department. Although this would prove a difficult task under ideal conditions, it is aggravated by unusual factors. The police function is rarely considered by the members of the electorate to be a vital element of their life together. Further, its past operation is one of alternating inefficiency, corruption, and brutality. As a result, the individual police officer operates with a remarkable lack of public support, co-operation, or trust. Although this past is a legacy from corrupt political machines erected and supported by the people themselves, the policeman has become a public symbol upon which the wrath for such conditions is vented.

It must also be conceded that the police themselves have failed. Instead of analyzing the causes for lack of support and working toward their eventual removal, police have all too often withdrawn into a shell of "minorityism." There has been a near-fatal inability to recognize police dependence on public opinion, and the result has been great tugging at bootstraps without appreciable elevation.

INCREASED INTEREST MANIFEST

This is the "police problem" that has characterized every major American city in the past and complicates the administration of most police departments today. Yet there are indications that at least some factors are changing. The last few years have seen a great upsurge of attention to this aspect of government and, even more heartening, a growing appreciation of the vital part it plays in the affairs of men. If this rising tide of interest can be sustained, the professional police services our country so critically needs may, within our lifetime, be planned and their foundations laid.

It is inevitable that the police of our great cities will be thrust into leadership in this reformation. The reason is not that size alone attracts superior personnel or confers any monopoly on creative thinking. Rather, it is because the weaknesses of our system are more apparent there. Urban life concentrates and multiplies law enforcement problems. Police inefficiencies which may go nearly unnoticed in the relatively stable pattern of rural life are cast into prominence and grave import by the fast-paced social and economic turmoil of the larger cities. Million-dollar budgets, strangling traffic congestion, and lucrative markets for organized crime make for spectacular police failures. It is here that the public outcry is heard first and loudest, and it is here that sheer necessity puts law enforcement to its crucial test.

THE BASIS FOR IMPROVEMENT

Despite the most aggressive and enlightened leadership, law enforcement cannot rise above the level set by the electorate. A condition precedent to the establishment of efficient, professional law enforcement in a community is a desire and a demand on the part of the residents for that type of service.

In this respect, law enforcement does not differ greatly from private industry. The one factor which predetermines the success of any business is the market. Unless the ultimate recipient of a product or service is convinced that he requires it, the most skillful organization and techniques are wasted.

A second lesson the police administrator can draw from industry is that markets are created. They seldom spring full-blown from the unshaped desires of the people. The vital elements of civilized life, including our most sacred institutions, at one time or another have been laboriously sold to the people. In this respect, it is heartening that unreceptiveness is not one of the faults of Americans. They respond quickly to new ideas, and peculiarly relish being proved wrong. Despite opinion to the contrary, they respond to large ideas as well as to the small and trivial. They buy comic books, but they also make best sellers of works on art, philosophy, and religion. This is of tremendous importance to the police administrator, because the ideas and ideals he must sell are not trivial ones.

The police administrator's first step toward professionalism must be to introduce to the public a fact which is elemental to every society. This fact is, the police function is a basic component of man's government by man which has determined the character and permanence of every social structure since human beings first sought collective security. In the face of the extremes of conduct possible in human affairs, we manage to exist only because we set up and enforce certain limits of conduct. These rules or laws are promulgated, not because men agree on attitudes or conduct, but because they do not agree. Thus law, an artificial standard, is necessary to mark the limits of activity beyond which society is injured. Law, standing alone, is a fiction. It achieves reality only when it is observed. The character of every society lies in its method of establishing observance, and its permanence lies in its success in securing it.

CREATING DEMAND FOR PROFESSIONAL LAW ENFORCEMENT

This is not a call for the police administrator to garb himself in the robes of Socrates. It is not unlikely that if he did, he would suffer the same end. This concept, although it has a philosophical basis, is an immensely practical matter, and it can be sold to practical community leaders. Most of them are well aware of the exorbitant cost of ineffectual law enforcement. They are not entirely unfamiliar with the experience of other communities or of other nations. The creation of a market for professional law enforcement is not so much the sale of a startling new concept as it is the calling to memory of some well-known facts. Immediate tangibles which will be recognized are more effective security of goods, a higher rate of recovery of stolen property, lower insurance premiums, and improved traffic conditions. A few leaders will see the broader implications of the idea, and through them the elemental thinking will be transplanted into other minds.

It should be emphasized and re-emphasized that the administrator is not selling "theory." The raw facts and figures are available. The manner in which they should be presented and the relative speed with which they will be accepted depends upon his ability and the political climate of the community. Some of the methods which have been used are narrative type annual reports, radio and television forums, pamphlets, motion picture and television films, well-trained police speakers, and written contributions to local magazines, industrial house organs, and other publications.

Of even more importance is the relationship of the chief administrator with the business and professional groups of the city. Included is the press, since it is primarily a business enterprise with a stake in community welfare. It should be noted that the administrator's concern is not with the news-gathering level of the press. He is not seeking "good publicity." He is not a press agent. He is a community leader seeking the solution to one of the community's most pressing problems. His business is not with reporters, but with publishers, stockholders, and directors. As he meets with other business groups he will talk with advertisers, radio and television station owners, motion picture producers, and members of chambers of commerce and of transit, banking, insurance, veterans, and other associations. Similar powerful influences of community thinking are school, religious, and interracial groups.

This effort should not be confused with "public relations." At this point the administrator is not concerned with shaping the police organization to meet public demands. Cries for "efficiency," "honesty," and "reduction of crime" cannot be answered effectively until he creates a climate that will support the internal changes essential to those goals.

UNWARRANTED COMMUNITY SERVICES

Although the principles and practices of sound organization found in many texts would seem to fit police departments large and small, their application becomes progressively more difficult with size. As the growing complexity of the great cities creates more and more varied problems, the police organization tends to subdivide and take on new tasks in an effort to cope with them. Almost invariably, the lines of demarcation between primary, support, service, and nonpolice elements of the organization become narrower, and less distinguishable. Surgery is needed. At this point the wisdom of first laying a foundation of public support becomes apparent to the administrator. Every police activity, however ineffectual and costly, has public supporters who, because of selfishness or misunderstanding, will oppose its reduction or elimination. Unless the administrator has enlisted broad support, his attempts to reform the police structure will be defeated by small but vocal pressure groups.

Over the years the large city departments have gathered along their flanks a peculiar assortment of public services. Although many of these are not properly police responsibilities, they tend to assume greater bulk and they drain increasing money, manpower, and energies from the basic task.

Jail operation

The greatest offender in some cities is jail operation. This task consumes as much as 20 per cent of the police budget and 7 per cent of the personnel strength. It takes the time and energies of officers selected, trained, and paid to accomplish vastly more complex tasks. It encumbers police training with studies of institutional problems not remotely connected with law enforcement. It necessitates assignments in conflict with aptitudes, which often give the jail a "Siberia" connotation by which general morale is lowered and other police tasks suffer. It adds a completely unnecessary and unjustifiable element to the chief administrator's nearly impossible span of attention. Worse, the detention of sentenced prisoners by the police is a dangerous violation of the democratic theory of law enforcement. The identification of police with the processes of punishment works to destroy the ideal of a nonjudging, nonpenalizing police.

The answer to the jail problem is not impossibly difficult. The facilities already exist. In many cities a change of management requires only administrative action. Jail personnel with suitable aptitudes should be recruited, given specialized training, and compensated at a level in keeping with the task.

Juvenile welfare

Another public service attached to most large police departments is some form of juvenile welfare activity. Not to be confused with the investigation of juvenile delinquency, it is actually an attempt to treat the multiple causes of adolescent maladjustment. It takes many forms, ranging from a boys' club to complicated advisory, treatment, and referral centers for potential or actual delinquents. Often included are summer camps, gymnasiums, and clubhouses. In some instances the total cost is financed from police budgets, and in others the activity merely utilizes the services of on-duty officers.

While no experienced police officer would dispute the great need for such a community program, some doubt as to its being a proper police function is justified. Many of the criticisms directed at police operation of the city jail are valid here. As long as the police are experiencing difficulty in accomplishing their primary tasks, the siphoning of men, money, and energy into social services not properly chargeable to law enforcement is difficult to rationalize. Ultimately the police must recognize that they are neither authorized nor equipped to deal with economic and social problems inherent in the prevention of crime. If they continue invading this most difficult field, they will ultimately saddle themselves with burdens so great that a single step forward will be impossible.

Other efforts which are draining police vitality are probation and parole activities, assignments of investigators to other city departments, and traffic engineering. The administrator will also find officers who have been selected and trained to enforce the laws of the community performing routine duties as clerks, typists, librarians, laboratory technicians, fingerprint classifiers, and others—positions which could be filled at less expense and with greater efficiency by qualified civilians.

It is safe to say that the manpower problem of the average large department is to a great extent an organizational problem, created over the years by the police themselves. Although many of these extraneous activities are the result of commendable efforts to provide needed community services, from an organizational standpoint they must be classified as deadwood. The plea that they supply good public relations is rebuttable. Failure to meet successfully the harsh requirements of fundamental police tasks cannot so easily be disguised.

MAINTENANCE OF CONTROL

Another problem to be met by administrators of large police organizations is that of maintaining full control, while at the same time reducing the span of executive attention to a workable minimum. Theoretically, it is sufficient to divide into a total of five to seven primary support and line units, headed by deputies serving also as a general staff or council. However, this plan often results in the formation of practically independent organizations which block the vertical flow of communication so vital to control. Consequently, instead of aggressively leading, the chief administrator finds himself cast in an increasingly impotent role in department affairs. The answer to this problem is not the abandoning of the principles of organization, but rather the retention of control of key activities. These are internal discipline, intelligence, public relations, vice control, and planning.

The most efficient method of handling these control functions appears to consist in giving to the field forces the line responsibility to accomplish the tasks, checking and balancing their efforts through administrative divisions with both staff authority and line responsibility. Thus, for example, vice control is directly accomplished by patrol and detective forces, with an administrative vice division co-ordinating their efforts, spot checking their effectiveness and integrity, and reporting to the chief the volume and direction of vice activities throughout the city. These staff services can be combined into a primary departmental unit, commanded by an administrative deputy.

LARGE CITIES PRODUCE SPECIAL ADMINISTRATIVE SITUATIONS

There can be little doubt that the well-established principles of administration should guide the chief of police in all but the most unusual cases. Yet certain problems peculiar to large city police organizations do not respond readily to broad generalizations. The first of these that the department head is likely to meet is the question of an assistant chief. This position is usually created in the hope of reducing the administrative work burden. It is reasoned that an assistant chief can handle routine matters, act as a "buffer," and digest and condense information directed upwards.

There is no greater fallacy in police administration. The true assistants of the chief are his council of deputies. If these commanders are not functioning, little is gained by creating an intermediate position which obscures this fact. At best, an assistant chief accomplishes tasks that are properly the duties of an executive officer or adjutant; at worst, he isolates the chief from the department, takes over policy decisions without which the department head cannot be chief-in-fact, and becomes a sort of "grand vizier" to which all ranks must bow in order to have their requests granted.

The chief cannot share his ultimate responsibilities. If his work burden exceeds human limits, the answer will be found in his own organizational and administrative failures.

Specialization

As a police organization grows, it is inevitable that the question of specialization versus generalization will be raised. At first glance it will appear that the question has been answered by the experts who caution against "over-specialization." However, closer scrutiny will reveal no sure definition of that term.

Theoretically, the size of a department should have little effect on the broad competencies of the individual police officer. He should be able to perform effectively every task he may reasonably be expected to encounter, whether he patrols the entire area of Prairie Junction or a similar area and population in Chicago. This ideal has been reversed, not by the growth of cities, but by the expanding police technology, which has increased at such a phenomenal rate that the ideal of complete competency has become a myth. No single officer can effectively perform in the diverse and highly technical fields which police science has created. A parallel can be found in the profession of medicine. The growth of medical science—not of cities—created its specialists. The fact that Prairie Junction will not support a group of medical specialists does not make this situation an ideal to be followed in Chicago.

Carrying the parallel further, the medical profession has found that the public is best served by creating a balance of field forces (general practitioners) and specialists. This is also the answer to the police administrator's problem. His is not a task of limiting specialization, but of balancing generalists and specialists so that crime and disorder will receive treatment best fitted to reduce it. This is not an organizational problem whereby ratios are abstracted and rigidly followed. Rather, it is a question of administration devoting attention to the soundest control and work-measurement devices available.

Transfers

The diverse organization of the large department also creates rotation problems. How often should personnel be transferred into new assignments? Is the public interest best served by long-term familiarity with one task or district, or by a work perspective born of varied police experience? The problem is best solved by avoiding extremes either way. An excellent key is frequent transfers of young officers, letting them perceive the breadth and intricacies of law enforcement. As they move about and test their abilities against various assignments, there is a natural tendency for them to fit into place.

A word of caution—transfers easily become a crutch which supports and disguises poor leadership. The fact that individuals vegetate and fail to produce after long assignment to one job is not a sign of the efficacy of frequent transfers. Rather, it should be a sign of command and supervisory failures which should be corrected. Although some assignments will always be favored, a police department should have no "corner pockets" or "Siberias." If they exist, the administrator cannot excuse his own failures by cursing the nature of mankind and using the "shake-up" as a cure. It logically follows that transfers should never be used as a disciplinary tool. There is no place in the police organization for a penal colony.

There are a few exceptions to the rule that transfers should not be an arbitrarily regular procedure. Certain police tasks are highly exhausting, conducive to the production of moral callousness, or are purely educational in nature. Vice control assignments are one example. No officer should be exposed too long to this emotionally and morally fatiguing task. Another example: the rotation of first-level supervisors through the planning division and the internal discipline division is an excellent training device calling for frequent short-term assignments.

The intricate nature of the big city police department also creates problems in the selection of supervisors. Of the many systems which have been tried, strict and impartial promotion by civil service methods seems to work best. Although its inequities are obvious, they are not so conducive to corruption and destruction of morale as the practice of letting the chief administrator make his own selections. The advantages of having a leader pick supervisors with "loyal" or "compatible" attitudes may be of some importance in a political organization, but are totally out of place in professional endeavor. The only loyalty professional men owe is to the ideals of their service; loyalty to a person is warranted only in so far as that person reflects those ideals.

A few administrators have great faith in their ability to choose subordinate leaders. In some cases that faith may be warranted. But such rare personal abilities must be balanced against the fact that the tenure of the chief is historically short. When he goes, his selectees and all possibility of long-term progress go with him. Few organizations can afford the frequent and conflicting changes in policy inherent in this system. At worst, the raw material presented to the chief administrator by civil service will seldom be less capable than the selections which personal error and prejudice will produce.

AIDS TO SUCCESSFUL POLICE ADMINISTRATION

A discussion of police techniques peculiar to the larger cities should be prefaced with a word of caution: there are few greater pitfalls in police work today than the practice of adopting technique for its own sake. Due to lack of accurate work-measurement devices, such as commerce has in its profit system, administrators and other officers often go through the motions of new procedures and scientific techniques with little attention to whether or not results are forthcoming. The police administrator's attention must be keyed to results, and a great part of his energy must necessarily be devoted to the creation of improved methods of measuring them.

Planning

The planning activity, intelligently executed, serves as a source both of improved techniques and of work measurement. It is one of the vital administrative controls. It should be entrusted to a staff unit under the supervision of the chief. In this unit can be included related activities which are scattered and ineffectual in many departments. These include statistical studies, crime analysis, writing of manuals and orders, forms control, and procedure surveys.

The division should be manned with experienced officers and supervisors carefully selected with attention to necessary aptitudes. These men should be given considerable freedom to inspect, criticize, improvise, and recommend procedures. In this manner the organization is guaranteed a source of creative thinking without which any enterprise will stagnate. The division should be constantly aware, however, that, like all other activities, the life of the division will be determined by results produced. Moderately frequent transfers will serve to diminish "ivory tower" connotations, revitalize field thinking, and keep attention directed at current line problems.

A typical activity of this division is the planning of traffic and crowd control at large public gatherings. Although the majority of such events have little place in the crowded life of great cities, they are, unfortunately, common occurrences. They disrupt traffic, draw a significant amount of police strength from necessary duties, and inconvenience tens of thousands of citizens. Through studies of the planning division, it is possible for the chief to present the true cost of these spectacles to the city administration and obtain regulation of the most commercial and selfish of these events.

The size of the event must be closely approximated, the flow capacity of surrounding streets measured, and the points of traffic conflict established. Street and private parking facilities must be approximated and controls set up accordingly. Bypass traffic arteries must be established and protected, and transit companies alerted in time to plan use of these paths. In the congested area, first-aid routes and stations must be planned. The volume of crowds at all points must be balanced with patrol forces adequate for control. If the assembly is of such a nature that disorder may be expected, reserve forces must be placed at key points, communications planned, and field booking, photography, and temporary detention facilities arranged. Occasional events will require field kitchens and rest facilities for officers, and a completely equipped command post.

The final task of the planning unit is to inspect the event, measuring the accuracy of the estimates and the effectiveness of techniques used. These studies should form the basis for standby plans which can be put into effect to control the various types of emergencies that can occur in the city.

Intelligence

Like planning, an intelligence division is a police activity necessary in great cities. Organized crime and subversive activity are controllable only if the department head has constant and current information of the activities of such groups. In gaining this information and maintaining necessary surveillance, the "arm's length" technique will ultimately prove more effective than the establishment of "personal" relations between officers and suspects. The latter arrangement will invariably fester into a spot of corruption or prove a source of embarrassment even when capably and honestly conducted.

Adequate intelligence of underworld activities is the administrator's most potent weapon against organized crime. These criminal operations are too cleverly conducted to respond to suppression by any unplanned combination of patrol and investigation. Law enforcement's shockingly low arrest and conviction rate of known syndicate members bears the best evidence that traditional police techniques are not the answer to this problem. Organized crime can be reduced and stamped out by the police only when knowledge of its methods, personalities, and plans produces conviction hazards so great that operation becomes unprofitable.

APPRAISAL OF RESULTS

It is inevitable that in a paper directed by one police officer to others, "shop talk" concerning the technology of law enforcement will consume a major share of the space. For that reason it is necessary to assess the results of hard-won improvements before closing.

For a half-century police administrators in the United States have responded to the cry for better law enforcement by working to improve police techniques. In the past the telephone, the automobile, and the radio have been successively looked to as the answer to the problem of crime and disorder. During the years immediately past, sound principles of organization, supervision, selection, and training have been sought and adopted. Today's police administrators, even more advanced, are resolutely shouldering the enormous task of measuring the effect of social and economic factors on police problems. They are adapting advanced concepts of systems and procedures to law enforcement. Even the most critical observers agree that remarkable technical progress is apparent in this search for the still elusive answer.

The police service has benefited greatly from this improved technology. It is probable that today, without these advances, the expanding police departments of our larger cities, faced with increasing work loads and lengthening lines of supply and communication, would be completely ineffective. Every step has been accomplished painfully and laboriously, and in the face of great difficulty. But the answer has not yet been found.

Despite the technology that has been acquired through no small effort and expense, the police service today fulfills its task with no greater success than it did a quarter- or half-century ago. This is a damaging accusation, but it is susceptible of proof. As inaccurate as our statistics are, they leave little doubt that the crime rate has been on the increase for the past several decades—the identical years in which the American police have shown their greatest technical progress. It is highly doubtful that our present crime rate is any lower than that which accompanied the brawling, lusty period of the nation's formation—years in which organized police protection scarcely existed.

It is true that the criminal today often wears a silk glove, but the hand beneath that sleek fabric exacts no less a toll than when it was exposed and easily recognized. Our years of greatest progress, instead of limiting the volume and scope of crime, have seen it shift from a predominantly individual enterprise against society to a system of huge and powerful cartels that control not only cities, but entire states of this Union. Indeed, our most accurate crime statistics indicate that crime rates rise and fall on the tides of economic, social, and political cycles with embarrassingly little attention to the most determined efforts of our police.

WHERE THE ANSWER LIES

The purpose of this exposition is not to condemn the systematization and perfection of procedures, but to question whether the answer lies in that direction. It is not suggested that continuous effort toward refinement of techniques should cease, but it is suggested that since methodology has not yet produced significant results, the problem may have its deepest roots in causes other than police performance.

Those causes have been suggested here. To blame police failures on the police themselves is to confuse cause with effect. Law enforcement is totally dependent upon the public for its life, its strength, and its effectiveness. It can no more divorce itself from the electorate and seek growth alone than a plant can divorce itself from the soil that bears and feeds it. However critical the need may be for professional law enforcement, it will not come into being until the public itself recognizes that need. If this belief be true, it holds an answer to the police problem.

William H. Parker has been Chief of Police in Los Angeles, California, since 1950, having joined the police force of that city in 1927. He is a member of the California bar. During World War II he developed the Police and Prisons Plan for the Normandy Invasion and created new police systems for Munich and Frankfurt.

Policing the Smaller Cities

By JOHN M. GLEASON

IT may be appropriate to preface this article with a personal point of view respecting the operation of small-city police departments. In that context I accept the term "small" only as applied to population, geographical boundaries, tax rates, and the cost of municipal operation as related to the number of police. It is my firm opinion that the plan of operation for efficient police service should follow the well-established and time-proved methods that can be applied "across the board" irrespective of community size. The attack on crime, accidents and traffic congestion, juvenile delinquency, and other important phases of police operation is the same in cities of two million as in towns of 50,000 population. There is simply a difference in the extent and sometimes the degree of application of fundamentals generally accepted. But this point must be stressed: the smaller the community, the more personal the entire operation becomes.

PROBLEMS OF AREA ARE EASILY MET

Far too many of us who are chief executives in the smaller police departments acquire a defeatist attitude or mildly accept a position of inferiority. We sit back and complain that had we the manpower, the equipment, the facilities, the quarters, and so forth, of our larger counterparts, it would be so much easier to do a better protection job. This is not necessarily true. A great many of the smaller cities in the United States are turning in a very creditable performance and extending a high degree of police protection. They are also more quickly adapting themselves to current needs and changes than either the very large or the very small police departments.

Much of this is made possible by the increasing use of central services that are available to the smaller city, though not a part of its own system or physical plant. We are all contributors to and recipients of information and help from such central agencies as the Federal Bureau of Investigation's identification bureau, crime laboratory, and statistics section, together with state identification bureaus, crime laboratories, motor vehicle departments, and many others. Most of these services are rendered without cost to our cities, whether large or small. Those who are within the periphery of metropolitan areas also have experienced excellent co-operation from the central or nuclear forces in the use of equipment, laboratory, experts, and man-hours on joint cases, along with much necessary and vital aid on local complaints having a metropolitan area angle.

Because of the obvious necessity of centralizing and consolidating some phases of police work, some of our small-city executives feel that complete consolidation of police effort is necessary. I do not agree with this. The joining of independent political entities for economic savings in municipal services is no guarantee of increased police efficiency. It has been demonstrated that a basic pattern of local police systems can remain and be effective and elastic enough to meet current changes if present or expanded central services are used.

As America is "on wheels," so is its police problem. We can no longer be isolationists in our law enforcement.

We can have and must have uniformity at some points, but there is no compulsion to consolidate. Desirable uniformity starts with the selection of recruits; then on to training, discipline, welfare, identification, crime records, organization, and management systems. We are already using a National System of Identification of Criminals and Uniform Crime Reporting, without any noticeable conflict or confusion, and with excellent results. We are all subscribers to local, regional, and nationwide police communication systems of telephone, teletype, radio, document and photo transmission, television, and so forth. These are available to any police department, regardless of its size. Some of these facilities can even be borrowed on occasion.

In the matter of local police communications I believe the smaller cities are leading the way in replacing and abandoning expensive call-box land-line systems for routine reporting, using radio more extensively for this purpose. This is due in part to the more widespread use of motorized patrol in cities of this group. Discretionary use of motor patrolmen on an in-and-out-of-service basis for routine door trying and other basic patrol duties is also becoming more prevalent. It all adds up to a more economical and judicious use of manpower through communications.

In coping with the "criminal on wheels" situation, whether he owns the wheels or they be those of public transportation, we are faced with a real problem. The hit-and-run tactics of a persistent motor vehicle violator, a hold-up man, burglar, or sexual deviate, among others, make it imperative that adjoining communities have definite agreed-upon policies of mutual co-operation for both prevention and apprehension. When this is left to the chance of personal acquaintance, there are many slip-ups when the right men cannot be contacted in a nearby department. Policies and procedures must be laid down and adhered to by mutual agreement.

There is urgent need for more area co-operation in the matter of roving sexual deviates. Area clearinghouses for information on these cases should be established. This can be headed up by state police, or by one of the larger forces of the area, on a cost- and responsibility-sharing basis for all surrounding towns and villages. The expense of maintaining such area files would prove negligible when compared with the results to be obtained.

The smaller communities know their own offenders but have little or no knowledge of others in adjacent communities. Central files area-wise would expedite identification and apprehension. Smaller cities will countenance without loud and public clamor many types of crimes such as larcenies, car stealing, and motor vehicle violations, but the same places insist upon quick and certain police action and results when molestation and other sex offenses are involved. Hence the need for more central services of the clearinghouse type is emphatically indicated.

IMPORTANCE OF THE PERSONAL FACTOR

The individual or personalized approach to law enforcement that is possible in a small city has this advantage: the chief and other ranking officers are likely to be personally known by most people in all walks of life and to be accepted by the community on both a business and a social level. Local residents come to think of their police force—of its honesty and integrity—on the same basis as they accept their other leaders. If these leaders are persons with high personal integrity, intelligence, and soundness, the people in a small city readily interpret all these personal qualifications as being synonymous with the level of operation in the police department. It is a reasonable conclusion, but one that cannot easily be formed in a large city where such personal acquaintance does not flourish.

Similarly, with the intimate knowledge the chief has of the qualifications and shortcomings of the local businessman, householder, city official, persistent lawbreaker, alcoholic, crank, or community leader, he is better able to evaluate, discount, question, or take immediate action as the case may be. He is prone to deal in first names. Along with this personal equation comes a sense of personal responsibility to see that every complaint shall reach a reasonable and fair conclusion.

The administrator in a small city is very close to the men in his command. This has its good and bad points. He can better evaluate the individual because of closer scrutiny and "elbow rubbing," but at the same time must not become a victim of the old and hackneyed but useful adage, "Familiarity breeds contempt." His personal conduct must be exemplary at all times; otherwise he is aiding and abetting a feeling among his subordinates that his policy is, "Do as I say, not as I do." One cannot instill morale or maintain discipline with such tactics.

A close personal relationship between the community at large and the police executive also has certain disadvantages: it would be far easier if there were a more impersonal relationship when it is necessary to take police action and to hew to the line and "let the chips fall where they may," even though the chips fall on the heads of friends and associates. However, this disadvantage can be largely overcome by a consistent public educational program.

In the matter of enforcing the laws relative to gambling and vice, the department of under a hundred men is at a certain disadvantage. These operations are not carried on in the open, and the more efficiently and honestly the local government operates, the more necessary it is for such lawbreakers to work in a surreptitious manner. The local plain-clothes men and detectives are sure to be known to these criminals by name and appearance. Hence there is a growing use of "borrowed" police officers from a neighboring community in the same state or similar co-operative action by state and local police. The use of the sheriff's office in this type of mutual attack on gambling and rackets has also worked out very successfully in many areas.

This matter of loaning trained personnel invites further exploration. It has many possibilities once a mutual plan of compensation, authorization, liability, and pension coverage has been worked out. Many legal shackles must be removed while still staying within the framework of the various state laws and constitutions.

PUBLIC RELATIONS INVITE A NEW APPROACH

Because there are not enough sensational day-to-day stories generated in the average small city, the police administrator has a better chance to furnish interesting, factual educational items to the public through the daily press. The alert police official goes as far as he can in taking the public into his confidence by outlining present and future policies, problems, accomplishments, and trends. These are day-to-day accountings of his stewardship. At the same time, he can lay the groundwork for public acceptance of necessary policies or new action and required budgets.

In relationships with the editors of small-city dailies, the personalized approach can do the most good. Unless a partisan political angle is interjected, one will seldom find an unsympathetic editorial staff. Police work and human interest stories are synonymous. Both, therefore, are good copy. There is much to be gained by both sides in a working relationship between press and police. The ultimate benefit will accrue to the public at large.

For example, our own community, which is suburban to New York City, is covered by one local daily, two dailies of adjacent communities, and one local weekly paper. In order to avoid daily interference with officers on duty, news sources within the police department are restricted. This is not a "gag" rule, but rather an attempt to channel news releases so as to simplify control and coordination. It relieves subordinate officers of any decisions as to what should or should not be released. If an honest, sincere, and constructive course is laid out for news representatives, they will accept it for what it is—an expeditious and worth-while system for news collection.

Our daily bulletin is open to the press and generally carries enough information for a story foundation. Every morning a press conference is held in the chief's office. This is done early enough to meet deadlines. Here the reporters gather the additional facts rapidly, accurately, and in detail. When any stories are "hot," the concerned division commander may release on-the-spot résumés subject to perusal by the chief. No information is withheld unless it concerns juvenile names, names of the victims of sexual attack, names of important witnesses, or any other information necessary to further investigation.

The reporters are allowed to see the reports, but by a gentlemen's agreement with the editors we are fortunate in not getting tangled into any "scoop" situation between editors. All items of general release are given to each reporter. But should one be working on a scoop of his own, we will furnish him with whatever information he needs, providing he is actually working on his own lead. We will not cross him up by letting anyone else in on his story.

Any "no publicity" question is handled directly by the chief's office. These may be cases of internal or national security. The reports in this category are kept at a minimum, and at daily press meetings they are discussed. Generally speaking, the reporter will know the policy of his paper which has been established between the chief and the editor.

On occasion, the editor may call the chief, or vice versa, and the merits of the individual case in the "no publicity" category are discussed. This is another example of mutual understanding and relationship.

CAUTION IN REPORTING DISCIPLINARY ACTION

As has already been mentioned, there is a sequence of police—people—action—news. It therefore follows that all police action is under close scrutiny. In the small city this scrutiny is microscopic. The close personal association with most of the force, plus a pressing daily need for fresh news, leaves no item too small to hand in to these city editors. We as executives must therefore use great discretion and sound judgment in publicizing matters of disciplinary action involving members of our departments. As a semimilitary organization operating under a proper book of rules and regulations, there are few municipal services that function along similar lines. We must always consider our responsibility to our citizens and to our own men. The matter of morale and efficient, honest law enforcement go hand in hand.

These remarks are not to be construed in any way as favoring any suppression of the news on action taken by a disciplinary board or police chief in the matter of any misconduct on the part of any member of his force. But too often bad publicity has been created towards an individual and the department as a whole, when only an infraction of the manual of procedure has occurred, having no connection with personal honesty, sobriety, or morals. We cannot publicly penalize men for honest mistakes or lack of training. There is a very fine line at times between what might be termed infraction of rules and lack of gentlemanly conduct.

We have a responsibility to our men as well as to the public in the indiscriminate releasing of this type of administrative action. Many injustices have been done as a result of this type of "fish bowl" existence in the smaller police department. This also calls for a thorough understanding between the press and police, to the end that there shall be no hiding legitimate news, but a judicious editing for fairness and accuracy.

STRUCTURAL ORGANIZATION MUST NOT BE NEGLECTED

The war years have caused an accelerating growth in hundreds of small cities. With increase in population has come a mushrooming of police problems, and case loads that require rapid growth of police strength. In some instances we have "grewed like Topsy" without the necessary planning and use of organizational structure for logical division of labor and responsibility. This causes some uneven ballooning that is expensive and not conducive to efficient operation. Fortunately the average chief is now looking over his department with a critical eye. He realizes that there are far too many reins in his own hands. He spends so much time watching the horses that he neglects the main job of caring for the passengers. He is accordingly constrained to divide the responsibility and the work load on a division or bureau basis. This can be done without overspecialization.

Some very small cities are having auxiliary functions performed by men having special skill, training, and aptitude for these tasks, while some larger cities have created a fairly new group of semispecialists, examples of which are marine patrolman, radio maintenance patrolman, traffic technician patrolman, and laboratory technician patrolman. They are getting away from the old system of making a man a sergeant simply to increase his salary because of his increased knowledge in the needed specialist field. The belief that no officer should be in a sergeant's rank unless he supervises men in his daily work is rapidly gaining ground in police organization.

It is entirely feasible to break up the various departmental responsibilities in even the smallest department without ending up with all chiefs and no Indians. Organized planning, directing, and controlling, along with a proper chain of command, are being recognized more and more as a "must" in small-city police operation.

We in the small departments cannot support a continuous in-service police training program, and too often find ourselves trying to sell our over-all program to the public without first having sold it to our own personnel. All members of the department must feel that their efforts are necessary, reasonable, and effective. Yet police policies and even departmental orders may be read for the first time by police personnel in the local newspapers. This is poor administration; it builds up resentment in the ranks and lowers morale. All these matters should be thoroughly discussed and explained to staff and men before releasing any part of the plan for outside consideration and approval.

REMOVING UNNECESSARY RESTRICTIONS

Nowhere in our entire system of local government is there a more vigorous local autonomy in operation than in police. The development of minimum standards, the removal of residence restrictions, and the generally broader outlook that have been developed in the programs of such important government functions as education, public works, recreation, and welfare do not as yet feature police work. In the average small city, the idea of replacing the administrative head of the police department by an "outsider" is gaining ground, but canvassing the surrounding areas outside the geographical limitations of the city for police recruits is still unheard of.

If we are to meet the increasing demands for more and better protection, some familiar restrictions must be removed. This may be accomplished by rewriting regulations and amending legislation without loss to the community of any of its essential control in respect to the police.

As the forty-hour week becomes more general in police service, starting in the large metropolitan departments and finally catching hold in the smaller cities, it presents several new problems. In most instances, in order to make this advance in internal working conditions, it becomes necessary to increase the size of the force considerably. The need here is so apparent that I doubt very much if there has been any more compelling cause for personnel increase in the past decade or two.

It has been a comparatively easy task for the small city to recruit enough personnel to maintain an eligible list to provide additional manpower as needed; but it is becoming very evident that if requirements and standards are to be maintained at a high level, the recruitment of any sizable group of new men strictly within narrow local boundaries will be increasingly difficult.

Police administrators who have been faced with this problem realize that there has been a gradual change in the number and the caliber of young men interested in law enforcement as a career. As various advances are made in industry—better working conditions, salaries, insurance, and pensions—the job of policing becomes relatively less attractive. When the reservoir of available manpower, starting with those who are definitely interested in becoming policemen, has been further reduced by written and oral tests, psychiatric screening, thorough character investigation, and physical qualifications, the proportion is generally about one accepted in five who applied. In some areas this proportion would go as low as one in ten.

Add to this the requirement that all applicants be bona fide residents of the city, and it becomes necessary in too many instances for the administrator to lower essential standards. Since we can only improve our force from the bottom up, we should always be thinking in terms of raising personnel standards rather than being forced to lower them. Industry could not function by lowering its standards, and neither should we in law enforcement.

It is my firm belief that residence at the time of application should not be limited to the community, but should be opened to a wide area. This lessens the grip of the political influence and gives a possible recruit a chance to become a policeman "for what he knows, not for whom he knows." Many a fine police career man has come from an out-of-town farm. Let us have better police, regardless of local residence.

With proper recruit training and follow-up in-service training, it is an easy matter for a so-called "stranger," or "outsider," to become an efficient policeman in any community. What he may lose because of his lack of knowledge of local custom, he makes up for in being free of local fear or favor.

Too many have been wont to sit by and claim that we are hemmed in by state laws, local ordinances, regulations, and what not. On this subject, I think that every effort should be expended to break down narrow residence requirements, for it will prove to be time well spent in improving our local departments.

IMPORTANCE OF SUPERVISORS

One of the most important and yet one of the most neglected and least recognized officers in the small city is the patrol sergeant, or street sergeant. All outside supervision of both foot and motor patrol is generally done by this important officer. Where no in-service school is maintained, much of the guidance and on-the-job training is also done by the street sergeant.

Inasmuch as effective supervision is essential as a control device and guide for the administrator, the sergeant must be a person with definite qualities of leadership. He also holds an important position in the shaping of general department morale. In my opinion, one of the greatest weaknesses in the operation of small-city departments is the lack of proper supervision and the lack of appreciation of the importance of this position in the departmental setup.

In the small departments, because of the close personal relationship that exists, it is most difficult for a street sergeant to apply an "across the board" attitude towards the men, particularly in respect to the rules governing conduct and the manual of established procedure.

In the small department the aspirant to a sergeancy has literally grown up with the men under his direction. Therefore, great discretion must be exercised in the selection of such supervisory personnel. They are key men in the operation of an efficient department. Their personal integrity, ability, alertness, and loyalty must be unquestionable.

The chief administrator must, therefore, have wide latitude in the selection of this important officer. If the examinations are not conducted within the department, all necessary and vital qualifications must be brought to the attention of the civil service commission or other agency, in order to get within the framework of such a system of selection. Upon this important selection rests the success or failure of the entire organization, particularly in the smaller city.

RELIEVING THE PRESSURES OF TRAFFIC CONTROL

The rise of vehicular traffic in the smaller cities has in many instances overtaken the rate of the larger ones. This is due in part to the lack of public surface transportation in the average small city, plus the mushrooming growth of suburban areas and the higher ratio of car ownership and car use in such areas. Accordingly more and more police personnel must be assigned on the day tour to school crossing details.

The pressure of parent-teacher associations and the general public insistence upon protecting our children at all costs, have made it necessary and possible for large portions of daytime personnel to be assigned to this police activity, to the extent that general police patrol and available manpower are reduced to the critical stage in many communities. While on this duty the officer is almost always out of the car, away from the radio, or off his motorcycle, and if he is a foot patrolman the crossing is generally removed from the busy part of his post. He is no longer counted on during approximately one-

Police executives are well aware of the importance of safeguarding the lives of school children. But as police protection grows in complexity, and in the face of ever increasing public demand for more and better service, some thought must be given to a revised plan of school crossing protection. Full use should be made of the accepted and standard system of schoolboy patrols. But in addition, a more general cognizance must be taken of the rapid increase of school crossing guards.

These were originally older men in nondescript makeshift uniforms. This early group is rapidly being replaced by women. They are carefully selected, trained, and uniformed. They have proved to be neat, conscientious, effective, and economical in their operation. Due to their part-time half-day work in their own neighborhoods, three of these women can be hired for the price of one patrolman of maximum salary.

The important item to the police administrator is the immediate freeing of active policemen for other important police duties; regular protection, complaint answering, traffic enforcement, parking meter checking, emergency calls, and others. This is not a question of replacing, but one of substituting. The system can be adopted in toto or in modified form tailored to suit the city budget. The plan will undoubtedly grow in use, but should be carefully applied. There will always be unusual conditions that can be handled only by a trained traffic policeman. Hence the use of these guards should not be viewed with reference to the dollar sign alone.

John M. Gleason is Chief of Police at Greenwich, Connecticut. He has been a member of the police force of that city for twenty-four years, and for half of that time has been its administrative head. He has served as president of the International Association of Chiefs of Police and of the Connecticut Chiefs of Police Association, has been a special lecturer at several police and traffic training centers, and is active in traffic safety organizations and various regional police bodies.

Trends in Rural Police Protection

By EDWARD J. HICKEY

DURING the past forty years we have witnessed a phenomenal growth in state police agencies and highway patrol services throughout the United States. Four decades ago, only four states had state police agencies—Texas, Pennsylvania, Massachusetts, and Connecticut. In the latter two states the agencies were limited to certain activities in the detection of crime and in suppressing vice and gambling. Contrasted with this limited number, and an only slightly larger handful of forces in the New England and Middle Atlantic states a quarter of a century ago, we now see every state in the Union supporting state enforcement agencies of one type or another. The rapid expansion of existing state departments and the organization of new forces clearly indicate the trend of these years in the term of physical growth.

A CHANGING PATTERN

At the same time there has been much more than an increase in numerical strength. The entire pattern of state police administration and operation has been undergoing a decided change consistent with the times and the changing pattern of rural living. The suburban movement has brought a large segment of our population into areas policed by state departments. The convenience of modern travel and improved rural schools and other services have beckoned the urban dweller to migrate into the countryside. Another factor modifying the pattern of life in rural areas is the planned dispersal of vital defense industries outside of heavily populated centers. Small communities suddenly find themselves reaping a tax bonanza, but with an accompanying host of problems, not the least of which are acute traffic and crime problems, far beyond the scope and resources of their present police operations.

Public realization of and interest in these problems of traffic and crime control in rural and suburban areas have brought demands for improved police operations and services. Police administrators, inspired by public demand and by higher professional standards set by leaders in their own field, have responded in large measure by striving for, and in most instances achieving, higher standards of performance through improved administration, supervision, personnel selection and management, and training.

Improved performance has, in turn, brought better working conditions, equipment, salaries, and retirement benefits to most departments. More is expected and more is given. We may well look back with nostalgia to the "good old days" and recall the iron men, those outstanding figures in law enforcement who made the unusual and the heroic look commonplace. These personalities stood out against a background of mediocrity, and achieved results despite almost insurmountable obstacles, most of which we do not meet today.

Realization of the vital importance, in our government, of law enforcement of a high caliber has brought about a changed attitude on the part of enlightened public officials. In 1939, at the Forty-sixth Annual Conference of the International Association of Chiefs of

Police held in San Francisco, California, the Honorable Earl Warren, Governor of California, stated:

And in my humble opinion, whether or not democracy is to succeed depends more upon whether or not we have good, honest and efficient local government than any other combination of circumstances or things. And whether or not we are to have good local government depends upon you, depends upon the police departments of this country, because you perform the important functions of local government.

ENLARGED RESOURCES AND IMPROVED SERVICES

No institution stands still; it either progresses or fails to keep pace with changing times. The state police service has not stood still in the dynamic stream of social changes we have witnessed in the past three decades. What is true in Connecticut is true elsewhere. In 1928 the State Police Department in Connecticut, like most of the state forces existing at that time, had a small complement of men housed mostly in rented barracks which were not designed for the use to which they were being put. The men worked extremely long hours, and there was no round-the-clock patrol service such as we now have. Officers were expected to spend many nights at the barracks on stand-by duty in case of emergency. No preventive patrol service was attempted on an organized basis during the night hours. If a complaint was received, an officer was called from his bed and often had to drive many miles to reach the complainant. Barracks were run on an individual basis, with very little policy control from a top administrative level.

Public relations were hardly considered, and the public knew little of the operation of the state police except as their enforcement action reached the public press. Communications with state police on the highway were of the most uncertain type. Training was adequate to meet the demands of the times, and officers entering the department in 1921 attended a training school. But needed equipment other than automobiles and motorcycles was not often available.

Supervision and control of the state police officer is one of the real problems of state-wide policing, and brings many problems to the administrator. State officers do not operate under the watchful eye of a patrol sergeant or a lieutenant as in the city service, where beats and other patrol areas are more or less restricted. There is no system of call boxes in rural areas to check and communicate with the personnel in the field. Early efforts to use a time-clock system at various points on patrols proved impractical and were quickly abandoned. The solution was found to lie in a close and careful check on the reports of operation submitted by each officer, covering his activities, rather than on attempts to supervise him directly.

Today the time and location of the officer's patrol contacts, his report of services rendered to the public, is supplemented by the use of the radiotelephone. These radio calls report checks of sensitive points in patrol areas and periodic checks by radio during the night hours, coupled with spot checks by patrol supervisors, serving to provide a degree of field supervision not previously possible.

Direct supervision by captains over all major crimes, traffic problems, and unusual emergencies in their respective districts brings top administrative control into the field and serves to unify policies and operations. A system of rotation of field captains further aids this unity of procedures and operations in all areas of the state to achieve the administrative aim of unity of action and state-wide co-ordination.

These changes have resulted in an increase in supervisory personnel which is absolutely necessary because of the very nature and wide extent of individual operations in the state police service. It is at this point that many state administrators have the greatest control problem, and it is the point at which many administrative failures occur. The increase in command personnel opens new avenues of advancement and inspires greater activity on the part of the men eligible for such advancement. Efficient operation to render proper public service requires 24-hour coverage in the field, and since 1939 this has been established in many state police departments.

Sufficient personnel increases to meet this extended service were not immediately available, and manpower had to be utilized to its best advantage. Every good administrator is constantly striving to increase the efficiency of his personnel, and the question is not how many men he has at his service, but rather how good is the available manpower.

In many departments a sound program of public relations has been instituted during the period under review, which has helped to obtain the needed public understanding and legislative support. A police department must first do a good job of policing with the resources at hand, and then must tell the public it serves of the nature and the quality of that job. We must show the citizens what they are getting for their money invested for police service, and convince them that the police have nothing to sell but their services, many of which prove unpopular with a considerable segment of the public. This changing concept of public relations has proved to be one of the most important changes in administrative procedure.

During this same period, great advances have been made in communications. Many state departments have installed teletypewriter systems and improvements in radiotelephone communications. The latter has proved to be a boon to the state police service. The thin web of control over the officer in the field has been strengthened, and the officer on patrol is now as near to his immediate supervisor as to the radio set in his patrol car, thus greatly increasing the efficiency of the service.

DECLINING OPPOSITION OF ORGANIZED LABOR

In the early days of state police, the sponsors of such police services met head on with the opposition of organized labor. In many states organized labor was deeply concerned about the attempt to establish and increase state police services, fearing that such organizations would be used in strikes. Several eastern industrial states were confronted with this opposition, and in some instances special legislation controlled the use of state police in labor strikes.

State highway patrols established in the past three decades have not been confronted with this problem, as their police powers are often limited strictly to the state highways. Many states have passed legislation restricting the use of state police in labor matters, placing the responsibility on the governor of the state by requiring his approval for use of the police at strike scenes. Other states require, especially in municipalities having local organized police forces, a written request and the approval of the chief of police and the executive officer of the municipality in order to call upon the state police for assistance in preserving the peace.

While this opposition by organized labor has been on the decline in the past decade, experienced state police administrators are fully aware of the pressure exerted in many places when state police are sought to maintain law and order at strike scenes. Administrators are also aware of the many changes in state and national laws relative to the use of police powers at such places. The use of too few or too many policemen at a strike scene often determines the attitude of those engaged in labor's opposition to increasing state police personnel.

In Connecticut, a successful policy was established by Governor Raymond E. Baldwin, now Associate Justice of the Connecticut Supreme Court. In 1946 he declared:

We pursued a policy that I submit all state police departments ought to pursue. In the past it has always been customary for the police to use the facilities of the factory at which a strike was in progress, making their headquarters there, and being fed there. Thus, they might have the appearance of being supporters of the employer when, as a matter of fact, they should be impartial keepers of the peace between the disputant factions. The State Police Commissioner wisely provided all of the facilities needed by the state police, food, and otherwise, outside the gate of the plant.¹

DECLINE OF THE CONSTABLE AND SHERIFF

The office of constable is the oldest in police history. It comes down from medieval law. At one time the constable was in general the leader of the royal armies and had cognizance in all matters in war and arms, exercising both civil and military jurisdiction. He was a high functionary under the French and English kings, the dignity and importance of whose office were second only to those of the monarch.

In American law, the constable is an officer of a municipal corporation, elected by the people, whose duties are similar to those of the sheriff. Though

The sheriff likewise comes down through the ages, and is the principal peace officer in every county, being chosen by popular election in nearly all states. His chief duties are in aid of criminal courts and civil courts, and he has original jurisdiction in all criminal matters. Before the era of state police departments in this country, the sheriff was the high enforcement official of criminal laws in each county, while the constable had equal power in the town for which he was elected. The formal authority of both offices still stands, though their participation in law enforcement is steadily declining.

In the development of this country through the years, centers of population have banded together to form cities, which needed more protection than the sheriff of the county or the local constable could provide. City police departments have been given the same powers relating to criminal matters as sheriffs and constables. Citizens look to the police department for the investigation and detection of crime, rather than to the elected official.

Through experience, education, and public relations, the people in rural areas look to the state police for the enforcement of the criminal law.

The development of the motor vehicle era has also brought the need for more police officers, and the enforcement of law has in most places been left to a larger force of men, with wider jurisdiction, than those designated to county and town officials.

In Connecticut prior to 1939, the local constable received compensation for his efforts through a fee system. This amounted to a statutory regulation compensating him for each arrest that he made, whether the person arrested was convicted or not. If convicted, the accused paid the costs of the court, in which were computed the constable's fee, and those of the justice of the peace and the prosecuting grand juror. When this law was changed, the constable was still elected to office, but after his election he was appointed by the first selectman of the town to be the special constable and to receive compensation from the town. This amount of compensation was so small that most elected constables did not care for this appointment.

The local constable likewise serves civil process, for which his compensation is regulated by statute. The trend in the past twenty-five years in civil matters is for the writs to be served through the office of the high sheriff. He in turn doles out these services to his deputies, as he has jurisdiction in more than one town.

So from a position of highest importance in medieval times, through the evolution of living standards, the constable is now relegated to a position of little service to the community.

The sheriffs have fared better with the general public, in that they are salaried county officials, elected in most places for a two- or four-year term. In the East, through popular demand, the sheriff has gradually relinquished his powers in criminal matters to local organized police departments. However, in some sections the governing bodies of counties still retain the sheriffs, who have organized patrol systems and deputies residing in the many towns within their precincts. These sheriffs are from the old school, and through politics have been able to succeed themselves in office through many years. In the Middle West and the Far West, the sheriff retains much of his popularity of frontier days.

Yet the shifting population of this country, the growth of urban areas, the relocation of various industries throughout the country, all tend to burden the adaptability of the sheriff and the constable to current public needs.

MOUNTED VERSUS MOTOR PATROLS

Mounted units have gradually disappeared from state police forces as services and responsibilities have changed. In many instances they have been casualties of the machine age.

Pennsylvania is among the states which retain a mounted unit, although at present its strength has been reduced to a minimum. This mounted unit has proved its value in that state and is considered good insurance for the maintenance of law and order in riots and for crowd control in large gatherings of people.

State and metropolitan police departments which now maintain mounted units do so in the opinion that a mounted policeman is worth several dismounted men in maintaining order at outdoor gatherings and demonstrations, where exceptionally large or unruly crowds are assembled. Of course, the mounted troopers are used in co-operation with dismounted patrolmen in these operations.

At large outdoor gatherings, as in traffic work, the chief advantages of the mounted police are height and mobility. They are in a position to spot a difficulty at once, make their way to it rapidly, and take the situation quickly in hand. Their work is then supplemented by the foot patrolman. Mounted officers command a respect from a crowd. They have a psychological effect on crowds, since the average person is more or less afraid of being trampled on by the horses' feet.

In addition to these listed purposes, mounted troopers have value in mountainous or open areas in searches for criminals or lost persons, since they are able to reach trails and spots which are not accessible to motor vehicles. Also, their use in ceremonial occasions or parades is impressive.

Other than for the specific uses mentioned, the modern methods and practices of state police departments have been geared to cope with crime and traffic in rural areas and high-speed parkways, and the use of horses is minor or nonexistent.

Routine state police criminal and highway patrol work necessitates the use of high-powered cars provided with radio receivers and transmitters, red flashing lights, sirens, first-aid kits, emergency equipment of various types, and, in some instances, specialized facilities such as identification kits and photographic apparatus. This equipment has the effect of turning the patrol car into a one- or two-man mobile substation capable of ranging far afield from its base station. This patrol car may be used as a field station to carry prisoners, or even may be pressed into service to transport injured persons to the hospital. In this age, the motor patrol has proved its value in all-round police work, whereas mounted troopers are limited to specialized services in a local area.

Even the "iron horse"—the motorcycle—has been retired from active service by many progressive state police forces during the past decade. The motorcycles which formerly were used for patrol service on the highways have been withdrawn from active patrol service in many instances and are now used strictly on assignments such as parades, ceremonies, crowd control, and liaison work. Motorcycles used in such efforts are ordinarily radio-equipped for control purposes. Use of motorcycles at present, however, is ordinarily dependent on clear and dry weather.

The all-purpose jeep, with its four-wheel drive, is fast replacing both the horse and the motorcycle. This vehicle, properly equipped with radio, siren, red flashing light, and trailer hitch, is indeed an all-purpose instrument. Some of the jobs for which it has been utilized in state police work are perimeter crowd control, parade crowd control, searches for lost persons or criminals in terrain unsuitable for patrol cars, and towing rescue boats and emergency equipment to trouble scenes.

Modern inventions, it is apparent, have numbered the days of the state police horse, even though some of the old color and glory of the early troopers must also disappear as a consequence.

CIVIL SERVICE CONTROLS EXPAND

Unlike most other types of public employment, admission to the state police force is not predicated on special qualifications, vocational experience, professional training, or even general education in most instances. Recruits are sought among young men and women of good character and sound physical constitution, who appear to be able to learn what the police force has to teach them, and who it is hoped will prove adaptable to the conditions of police service.

Two decades ago, the majority of state police departments selected their recruits with an eye not only on their qualifications but also on their political affiliations and activity. In a few forces, high standards of selection and promotion were maintained without sharing these essential powers with civil service administrations. Today, the picture has changed; civil service and its occupational counterpart, the merit system, govern recruit selection and promotions in the majority of state police forces.

According to a survey of state enforcement units undertaken in 1950 by the International Association of Chiefs of Police,² 25 states had state police units which were invested with general powers in criminal and traffic cases. Of these 25 state police units, 13 operated under their own merit system, 5 were under civil service, and only 7 had neither. Further inquiry revealed that 13 state police organizations based promotions on the results of examinations, while the rest did not.

For any group of police administrators to satisfy the demands of the selection process with full justice to the individuals concerned and with due regard to the overriding interests of the state and its citizens proves exceedingly difficult. Such difficulties are minor, however, when compared with those confronting personnel agencies which seek to deal with questions of police management. In some states the state personnel department regularly turns to the police heads for aid in conducting written and oral examinations and in establishing the standards for service ratings, while in many others this close co-operation still is lacking.

Where personnel departments set up examination procedures independent of the police administrator, neither the police head nor the ranking officers of the force can directly apply any of their own wisdom, police sense, or experience to the primary selection of recruits. An improvement on this system would permit close collaboration between the police commissioner and the personnel department on the scope and contents of written examinations and would authorize the commissioner and state police ranking officers to conduct oral examinations of aspirants for appointment and promotion and to accord ratings on such interviews.

The merit system rule under which the appointing authority is given a choice among the three top names on the eligible list works well enough when only one appointment is involved, but often state police appointments must be made in large numbers when a group is being selected for training or when a policy change makes a large number of promotions necessary. With the system of selecting one applicant from three names and ten applicants from twelve names, the state police head actually enjoys less freedom of selection than do other department heads. It would prove desirable if the two-extraneous rule were relaxed for state police appointments, by providing not less than twice as many certifications as there are places to be filled.

Even with various faults, the civil service or merit system fulfills the needs of the police service much more satisfactorily than the system of appointment on a wholly political basis.

TRAINING OF RECRUITS

Every state police department and the vast majority of state and highway patrols today train recruit patrolmen prior to their assignment to duty. There is little difference of opinion among administrators today regarding the need for training of recruit police officers prior to their undertaking active duty in the field. This training is recognized as a necessity without which no recruit can render his best service to the public for whom he labors.

It is plainly understood that some form of training will take place in any police department even if no classroom instruction and practice are made available to the recruit. The costly process of trial-and-error training has given way to formal recruit instruction.

An awakened public demand for more efficient police service has been the motivating force for improvement in training methods in many cases, but in the majority of our more advanced police departments, improvements have come as a result of a desire on the part of the administration of these departments to render better the public service they are sworn to provide.

While there is general agreement among police administrators as to the necessity for recruit training, great difference of opinion arises as to what kind of training and how much of that training should be undertaken. The length of the training period varies from department to department, and the subject matter and methods of presentation also differ. There is no set standard. Each department must be governed by the available material, time, and funds, and must do its best within the means provided.

POLICE CO-OPERATION

Police co-operation shows a tendency to expand, but the future of this co-operation must rest upon the mutual good faith of the agencies concerned. At the beginning of the present century, many of the devices which now aid co-operation, such as radio, teletype, and telephone, were unknown in many police departments and were not seriously considered in others. If they were not unknown at the time, the legality of these means of communication in police work might well have been questioned.

Rapid developments in communication and transportation have necessitated changes in modern methods of police operation. Today, crime is no longer always a local matter. Yet it should be handled as such, as long as it remains local. It is when crime crosses town, city, or state borders that the processes of departmental co-operation must come into play. Experience has demonstrated that the present system of law enforcement—national, state, and local—is the best system.

State police departments actively participate in state efforts to assist in the enactment of better crime control legislation, as well as in similar activity on the national scene. Through membership in such organizations as state police associations and the International Association of Chiefs of Police, they have helped to raise professional standards, tighten national security, promote good public relations, widen police education and training, increase the efficiency of police communications, and obtain indirect police benefits.

Interstate enactments continue to assist the state police forces to control crime. The Interstate Probation and Parole Compact, in which participation is broadening; the Uniform Extradition Act, which has more than three-fourths of the states as signatories; the Out-of-State Witnesses Act, participated in by forty-three states; and the Fresh Pursuit Act, having more than three-fourths of the states as signatories—these are examples of close co-operation. Such compacts should be supported and enlarged in the future.

Uniform state laws, bringing the citizens of the various states closer together, will enable officials to work in closer harmony and result generally in a higher quality of law enforcement.

AGENDA FOR THE FUTURE

Availability of special equipment in the future will have an effect on tomorrow's methods of operation. Such devices as the Electromatic Speed Meter (Radar), drunk meter or alcohol meter, and motion pictures have been used by state police throughout the nation with various degrees of success to gain evidence for use in the prosecution of traffic violations. However, these devices will not be universally acceptable until court decisions or statutes give legal substance to them.

Another point that will have to be determined in the future is the working schedules for state police patrolmen. The national shift to the 40-hour week in public employment brings out the fact that of 25 state police departments, at least 16 have workdays of 10 hours or more. Working hours must be determined on a state basis and considered in relation to salary, days off, retirement benefits, and other emoluments such as uniform allowances. It is inconceivable that one pattern of hours and wages can be set that will be satisfactory to each state police department.

As we view the state police attack on the problems of crime and traffic, we feel that we are fortunate in living in a nation where action results from public demand. That is one of the blessings of America—and one of the safeguards of our way of life. An aroused and informed citizenry can bring about changes which are needed to assist police in minimizing the constant threat to public safety and good order. State police administrators must be alert to identify and accept these changes.

Edward J. Hickey was Commissioner of Connecticut State Police and state fire marshal from July 1, 1939 until his death in September 1953. He was engaged in law enforcement for almost forty years. At various times he served with the Pinkerton Agency, the United States Department of Justice, and the Office of Naval Intelligence, and for seventeen years he was Hartford County detective with the prosecutor Hugh M. Alcorn. At various times he was president or chairman of numerous national or regional state groups of enforcement officers, and during World War II he was acting head of Connecticut's War Council.

Special Purpose Police Forces

By EARLE W. GARRETT

MOST of our special police bodies derive their enforcement authority from governments that exercise regulatory controls under the American constitutional distribution of the "police power." This is true whether the direct instrument of grant is an administration regulation, a municipal ordinance, a city charter, a state statute, a state constitution, a federal statute, or the federal Constitution. In many of the units exercising these powers the personnel wear no uniforms and therefore may not be thought of as enforcement officers. However, as the following paragraphs show, some of these nonuniformed officials necessarily exercise extensive and even summary enforcement powers in discharging their duties.

In every type of government—municipal, county, state, interstate, and federal—we find special police bodies that have been created by legislation as ad hoc authorities to accomplish ends that might not otherwise prove feasible. The enforcement features of some of these units are blurred by the administrative techniques and intents of which they are a part. Furthermore, the extent and intensity of the enforcement effort has diminished or increased in some units in relation to other special or general police units at the same or different levels of government.

Special bodies have been created to serve initially the particular function which they are now discharging, but, as often as not, the enforcement activity has developed in response to the changed requirements of its administrative parent. When a broad public interest is served by the special agency, contacts may occur and informal working agreements may be made with general police forces at the federal, state, county, or municipal level. Such arrangements are generally of mutual benefit to the agencies involved, and in the interest of law enforcement.

SPECIAL FORCES AT THE MUNICIPAL LEVEL

A rapid and extensive urban growth gives rise to particular problems that create hazards to life, health, and property. The regular municipal police with their general police powers are required to cope with the hazards created by human agents. Other dangers arise from nonhuman sources, however, and may require separate handling measures. Fire and disease are examples.

City firemen, upon arriving at the fire ground, do whatever is necessary to get the flames under control or confine them to the premises. The entire structure and its contents may be destroyed in the process. This is a peremptory exercise of the police power of which the victims may sometimes prove critical but usually refrain from public complaint.

In the event of a sweeping fire or holocaust, fire forces may dynamite buildings in the path of the fire to prevent its spread to other areas. These fire-fighting measures, to be effective, must be promptly applied. No time is available to obtain a judicial warrant, and, of course, none is required. While this does not preclude civil suits for unnecessary damage, the general custom of insurance protection ameliorates the effects of most of such cases.

Most large cities have a fire prevention unit in the fire department, headed by a fire marshal, with a staff of inspectors. Periodic inspections are made of places of public assembly, such as theaters, motion picture houses, schools, churches, hospitals, nursing homes, orphanages, and homes for the aged, and necessary changes are ordered and enforced. The common rooms of multiple-family dwellings are generally inspected also. Suspicious fires are investigated independent of the local police force.

Exercise of the police power in fire prevention is most uneven. It is usually possible to effect removal of oily waste or rubbish which might cause a fire, but compliance with an order to install a fire stop or fire wall, an outside fire escape, panic-proof hardware, outward-opening doors, additional exits, or fire doors is frequently obtained only through the courts. The resistance and occasional obstructive tactics generated in such cases may arise from the inability of the landlord to pass on the costs of the firesafety improvements to the tenants.

Public health protection

Questions of broad sociological interest also are involved in the exercise of police authority in the field of public health. Prompt action is required to abate unsanitary conditions which may be hazardous to the general health; hence summary and even arbitrary powers are sustained by the courts under the nuisance doctrine.

Cities sometimes provide smoke control inspectors, as in Washington, Pittsburgh, St. Louis, Cincinnati, and New York, where unconsumed soft coal belched into the air from numberless chimneys and stacks may endanger the health of the people and smudge the buildings.

Public health officials in most cities inspect restaurants under city license to assure standards of cleanliness and require food handlers to comply with the provisions of city permits which are aimed at eliminating carriers of communicable diseases (of the type of "Typhoid Mary"). Sanitation police in New York are expected, among other duties, to see that garbage cans have proper covers and that garbage is not mingled with ashes in open receptacles.

Protection of buildings and public places

In most large cities there is a branch of the municipal government, usually under the direction of a building inspector, which enforces the zoning laws and regulations, approves construction plans for new buildings and alterations of existing ones, issues permits, and makes inspections. Plumbing, heating, and electrical inspectors, examined and licensed by the city for control purposes, are generally included on the staff. To make these controls work satisfactorily, there must be close liaison with other municipal inspection units—such as that of fire prevention in the fire department—whose personnel have opportunity to observe and discover violations hazardous to health, safety, or morals.

It is easy, of course, in return for a fee, to fail to observe and report a variety of violations, where the inspector works alone, as he usually does, and where it would be difficult to prove the existence of the violation at the time of the inspector's reported visit. An obstruction to a fire escape, a nonoperative fire door, and prohibited electrical wiring devices are cases in point. The fee for overlooking such violations is "what the traffic will bear"; that is, how much it is worth to the violator to be permitted to continue the offense. Unreasonable applications of the law and regulations can be used to extort bribes from parties who would never initiate such arrangements.

No permanent solution for this form of bribery has been discovered. The bribegiver and the bribetaker may be equally guilty, but the circumstances of the conspiracy are generally such that witnesses are lacking and evidence is insufficient and unreported.

Some cities have park police, popularly known as "sparrow cops," whose duties are to preserve order, prevent littering of the park and vandalism, and prevent offenses against public morals. Chicago has a consolidated park district with some eight hundred police who operate apart from the city police force. Though its men have general police powers which they occasionally exercise in on-view cases, their duties are mostly traffic control on the two hundred miles of park boulevards, some of which interlace hundreds of Chicago streets. Municipal zoological gardens sometimes have special forces to maintain order, prevent unrestricted feeding of animals or birds, and suppress vandalism.

New York has a large transportation police force which confines itself to the control of spitting (basically to prevent spread of tuberculosis), smoking, public morals offenses, handbag snatching, mugging, and other offenses in the city-owned subways and elevated railways. Some cities have conferred special police powers on their school crossing guards, although most municipalities have succeeded in making this service work satisfactorily without granting such employees any law enforcement authority whatever.

Of the four levels of government, urban centers exhibit the greatest variety of special purpose police forces, although many of these activities are not generally recognized for what they are.

COUNTY SPECIAL POLICE FORCES

As legislative creatures of the state, and regarded as mere political subdivisions and quasi corporations to serve the purposes of the state, the counties in general have not developed special purpose police bodies in number and variety in any way comparable to those of the cities. This, of course, follows from the rural setting and the limited number of governmental services performed by most counties.

Yet the more urbanized counties do have various special police bodies. Special park police have been established for the protection of county park areas.

Control of civil aviation, sometimes a county government activity, is an exercise of the police power to control a noise nuisance and prevent such acts as "buzzing" and stunting over populated areas in a manner endangering life and property. Certain Maryland counties in the vicinity of Washington, D. C., engage in the exclusive control and sale of packaged alcoholic beverages, mainly as a policing measure. In order to control the sale of liquor to some elements of the population, certain counties of a few southern states operate county package stores as the only lawful outlets for alcoholic beverages, sales by the drink for consumption on the premises being forbidden.

STATE SPECIAL POLICE

Inherent police powers rest with the sovereign states. Cities and counties exercise such powers only when permitted to do so by the state of which they are a part. Even the federal government may apply only such enforcement measures as were directly or indirectly conveyed to it by the states through the medium of the United States Constitution.

Several states have highway patrols, with limited police powers, which confine their activities to highway traffic control and enforcement of the motor vehicle laws. These forces are often denied general law enforcement authority and broader jurisdiction, because of the fear of organized labor that a general state police force might be used in strikebreaking. Historically, this apprehension goes back to the early days of the Pennsylvania State Constabulary; and while labor's anxiety has long since been allayed, the pattern is firmly fixed in some of our southern and western commonwealths. The number of state police forces with full powers is steadily growing. In Delaware, in addition to a conservation commission, such as is common to many states, there is an oyster warden independently created for the Broadkill River and another for the Mispillion River. Texas has a game, fish, and oyster commission which, through its staff, enforces all laws relating to game birds, songbirds, fur-bearing animals, fish and marine life, and stream pollution.

Texas also has a livestock sanitary commission with limited police powers, responsible for tick eradication, extermination of predatory animals, and control of communicable diseases of livestock through inspections. Necessary control measures sometimes include seizure and destruction of infected barn cattle. Arizona has a sheep sanitary commission to enforce a program designed to prevent and eradicate sheep and goat diseases. Also, in Arizona, there is a livestock sanitary board which, in addition to disease prevention responsibilities, is required to "prevent theft of livestock."

Arizona has an office of the supervisor of inspection which is charged with the duty of enforcing the Fruit and Vegetable Standardization Act controlling the grading of fruit and vegetables shipped from the state. In the discharge of this duty, the inspectors receive the co-operation of the State Commission of Agriculture and Horticulture, the State Highway Patrol, the United States Department of Agriculture inspectors, the agriculture extension service of the University of Arizona, and the county agricultural agents.

Most states have parks and monuments which are protected from fire and vandalism by wardens or state employees with some degree of police power.

STATE LIQUOR CONTROL AUTHORITIES

Following repeal of prohibition in 1933, the states faced the problem of what to do about liquor control. The "evil" days of the saloon, prior to 1920, were remembered, as were the burlesque excesses of fourteen years of prohibition. Because the use of alcoholic beverages has broad social implications which characterize it as alone in its class, subject to strict regulation, several variations of control were worked out, according to the needs of the states concerned.

Four general control types are recognizable. Each bears some relation to the amount and distribution of dry sentiment in the state, the presence of large urban populations in the state or suburban areas serving large cities of neighboring states, and the population composition.

The achievements of these various types of control laws leave much to be desired. Prohibition has proved far from satisfactory in the states which retained it after 1933 in the face of the failure of the great national experiment. Liquor is available in such jurisdictions, but the price is high, and the brand is often untrustworthy and the quality correspondingly low.

In public monopoly states, unregistered stills, untaxed liquor, bootleggers, and speak-easies are policed by special state forces. The individual purchase permit has not dried up the chronic alcoholic (that interdicted unfortunate) or kept liquor away from minors. Nor have scandals among monopoly state liquor boards added to their prestige and public usefulness.

The dry areas where liquor is lawfully available only for medicinal purposes seem to have a host of ailing people. Curiously enough, during early post-repeal days, Kentucky—the granddaddy of bourbon—permitted sale of whisky only for medicinal reasons, broadly interpreted.

Some of the license states, in their zeal to regulate, have become involved in a self-spun web of administrative law. Through the medium of state rules and regulations having the force and effect of law, they seek to stabilize retail liquor prices, eliminate the effects of competition, and prevent the social evils of price-cutting by putting a floor under prices. A similar result has been sought in the wholesale liquor trade by an attempt to regulate credit.

These attempts to put a rein on economic law and the fertility of human contrivance have generally stood the test of judicial review because the courts do not wish to interfere with the administrative problems of liquor control. But one rule has led, logically but unrealistically, to another until their weight and scope have limited their enforceability. Regulation of the countless possible forms of advertising has passed the point of absurdity. Control of the manner in which inducements may be presented becomes burdensome, costly, and futile.

Unscrupulous tradespeople, shrewdly cognizant of the possibilities offered by such overregulation, have joined together to press for ever more rules "for the good of the trade" which they know the decent members would obey, leaving to them a trade advantage in undetected violations. The burden on the state enforcement unit has been broadened and intensified by these layers of administrative law which are, as often as not, irritants rather than aids to the broad problem of social control.

Enforcement difficulties accordingly have increased. The financial burden of securing adequate evidence has curbed enforcement effectiveness because of inadequate "buy" funds. The understandable harmony of an astute retailer and a well-known, appreciative customer makes it difficult to acquire evidence.

Meanwhile, the dealer who tries to operate within the law but makes an inadvertent mistake, becomes the target of his sharp-eyed competitor. Then arises the cry for the "more equal enforcement" which the state unit has lost its capacity to give. So the query may now be raised whether the effort to benefit society is being applied at the proper point.

AN INTERSTATE POLICE FORCE

The states of New York and New Jersey found it expedient in 1921 to create the Port of New York Authority, an ad hoc body to co-ordinate and unify the administration of the New York port district. Its authority has since been extended and it now owns and operates motor vehicle tunnels, toll bridges, commercial airfields, freight transshipment facilities, and other revenue-producing establishments.

All of these tunnels, bridges, airports, and other facilities are policed by a single interstate force that is recruited and directed independent of the police forces of the states or cities involved.

FEDERAL SPECIAL PURPOSE POLICE

The federal government has at least fourscore agencies that exercise some measure of special police power. Many of these unit activities are expressions of administrative necessity where the agency dealing at close range with the problem feels itself better able to do its own policing. Much of this enforcement effort has grown out of changed or expanded responsibilities of the agencies over a period of years.

The best-known of the federal enforcement agencies are in the Departments of Justice, Treasury, and Post Office.

The only federal body with general enforcement powers is the Federal Bureau of Investigation in the Department of Justice. Its activities are household knowledge throughout the land. While its jurisdiction within the federal sphere is not restricted by law, it deals most frequently with those crimes which are not the special responsibility of other federal police bodies.

The border patrol of the Immigration and Naturalization Service of the Justice Department is charged with the investigation and suppression of the smuggling of aliens and such crimes.

The Post Office Department maintains a corps of inspectors who investigate mail losses and postal law violations in general. Among the time-consuming duties of the inspectors are numerous noncriminal inquiries and administrative activities.

The greatest number of special enforcement bodies is found in the Department of the Treasury. In the Bureau of Internal Revenue is the enforcement arm of the Alcohol Tax Unit, responsible for the investigation and suppression of violations of the laws taxing alcoholic beverages. Also in the Bureau of Internal Revenue is the Intelligence Unit, accountable for the enforcement of the internal revenue laws, which include the income tax laws. The United States Coast Guard is responsible for enforcing laws and regulations for safety at sea.

The Bureau of Narcotics directs its efforts toward the control of violations of the narcotic drug laws. In the Bureau of Customs there is a division which concerns itself with smuggling and unlawful exportation. A customs border patrol is also maintained on the Canadian and Mexican borders.

Finally, among the Treasury units the Secret Service is charged with the control of counterfeiting, the protection of the President and his family, and the President-elect, and with an indefinite jurisdiction over crimes involving numerous federal agencies.

A variety of other agencies exercising some sort of limited police power may be found in the Departments of Interior, Agriculture, and Commerce; in the Veterans Administration; and in the Federal Trade Commission, the Securities and Exchange Commission, the Federal Communications Commission, the United States Maritime Commission, the Interstate Commerce Commission, the United States Civil Service Commission, and other independent commissions.

INTERPLAY OF OLD AND NEW POLICE FORCES

Special purpose police forces sometimes arise in response to a need which the existing agencies cannot or will not satisfy. These newer units, when created under urgent administrative requirements, are generally utilitarian at the outset. As time passes and functional emphasis changes, their fitness may become less apparent.

When new agencies of special enforcement are created because existing agencies are not called upon to assume new tasks, the latter are not thereupon eliminated, but generally remain a charge upon the taxpayers. And when a general police force assumes these duties of specialized enforcement, the results are not always satisfactory. The hard fact is that we are still a long way from reconciling our urge to regulate with the demonstrated limitations of enforcement.

Special purpose police forces at the municipal, county, state, and federal levels often suffer from inadequate training, an imperfect knowledge of the value of evidence, limited personal identification, scanty criminal records data, and poor communications facilities. Some special forces at all levels of government, with sufficient personnel and adequate finances, have taken the initiative in providing training, installing records, and arranging for the availability of communications and identification facilities. Out of the will to do, a way has been found.

It has been said of the numerous federal special and auxiliary police agencies that "each thinks of itself first." There have been proposals to cure this selfish, costly, independent attitude by a redistribution of police functions among the federal departments without eliminating the existing units; by turning over all of the police activities to the Federal Bureau of Investigation; or by co-ordinating the existing police agencies through an interdepartmental committee or a single co-ordinator drawing authority directly from the Executive Office of the President. Of the three proposals, the single co-ordinator could, in time, bring about some consolidations of units and functions to reduce the number of jurisdictional disputes and administrative conflicts. The situation is one of tradition-soaked complexity. Too much should not be expected too fast.

Efforts have been made at the state level to co-ordinate enforcement agencies that exercise general and special police powers. In connection with its recent constitutional reorganization, New Jersey brought its state police, motor vehicle inspectors, alcoholic beverage control and alcoholic beverage tax departments, and a number of state inspection agencies together under the state's attorney general. No change was made in the enforcement powers of the participating agencies, but all personnel of all agencies are charged with the duty of observing and reporting to the attorney general all violations discovered by them, even if not within their own special sphere of activity. Broad dissatisfaction is reported with this arrangement, which was expected to be a first step toward complete integration of all state enforcement units. The admixture of regulatory functions with enforcement activities is one source of trouble.

It appears wasteful and unnecessary to maintain motor vehicle inspectors and state police on the same highways, as is done in Arizona, Massachusetts, and New Jersey. A boulevard police force, operating on a mere twenty miles of county highway, cannot be justified when a separate county police force covers the state and county roads, as in Hudson County, New Jersey. Chicago's park district police, serving under a commission appointed by the mayor, distinct from the city police but patrolling boulevards which grid the city streets, is clearly unwarranted. Situations such as these can be cured by consolidation whenever the will to improve takes control.

The promise of administrative betterment

In time, the science of administration may so improve, and the selection and training of personnel so advance, that the special police activities of the several inspection services of large municipalities may be performed in conjunction with the general police activities. This new approach to an old problem may even provide collateral benefits for all participants. Several small municipalities in this country are now operating combined fire and police departments with the same personnel. When such diverse doctrines are brought into a common focus, hope soars for numerous other changes.

The future of special purpose police forces is far from clear. Tradition balks fundamental changes. Vested bureaucratic interests are generally powerful enough to block efforts to alter the existing arrangements. The county may be an appropriate political unit for consolidating agencies in selected instances. In other cases, resort may be had to ad hoc authorities, already used to accomplish special purposes.

The police power is not an absolute thing, nor a fixed quantity. Its nature is more a reflection of the economic, political, and social conditions of a people, and is an ever changing phenomenon. Law enforcement must therefore be flexible enough to develop in harmony with the requirements of a dynamic social order.

Earle W. Garrett, New York City, has directed or participated in more than a score of police surveys of cities, large and small, for the Institute of Public Administration, New York, and Griffenhagen and Associates, Chicago. He was for some years chief deputy and acting commissioner of the New Jersey State Department of Alcoholic Beverage Control. He is co-author of the Report on Police submitted by the National (Wickersham) Commission on Law Observance and Enforcement.

The Basis of Sound Law Enforcement

By JOHN EDGAR HOOVER

IS a national police force necessary or advisable? Is there need for further centralization of law enforcement in a state or federal agency?

My answer to both of these questions is an unequivocal "No!" Nor should we, I maintain, take any steps which could feasibly lead to the ultimate consolidation of police power.

Throughout the course of history, freedom has been a universal goal of man. Like a golden thread in a woven pattern, the struggle for freedom is clearly visible in every age. The battle against tyranny has been, and is today, a constant one. Again and again, civilizations have fought their way upward against terrifying odds to achieve some form of individual freedom, only to see it engulfed again in the darkness born of ignorance, inaction, and lack of vigilance.

Freedom was the compass by which the Mayflower set its course. It was the magnet which drew thousands to the insecurity of a savage wilderness. It was the prize for which the freedom seekers and their children fought a bitter war.

When the dream had been fulfilled—when as a unified people they had achieved the goal of individual liberty—our forefathers sought to find the governmental structure necessary for its everlasting retention. Out of their endeavors and their indomitable faith a dynamic concept of government emerged. In beautiful and inspiring simplicity of language they penned the Constitution, the living pattern for translating that concept into vigorous reality.

For approximately one hundred and sixty-five years the plan of government conceived by our forefathers has operated with unsurpassed success. It has preserved the freedom of the individual. It has enabled the United States to develop and advance beyond the broadest dreams of the Founding Fathers. Change has been a constant factor in that progressive advance.

As the population of the United States multiplied and modern systems of transportation and communication developed, a more prominent role was assigned the federal government in the development of the nation. With the passage of many new federal statutes, a more complex federal government gradually emerged—a central government which could exercise great power, but within the framework of the Constitution. The success of this great experiment in government remains the marvel and the envy of the world.

POLICE SYSTEM FOLLOWS PATTERN OF NATIONAL DEVELOPMENT

Our decentralized police system in America is a direct and necessary product of our historical development as a nation. The two are indissolubly intertwined. Both are born of the same mother—skepticism of concentrated power. Both are fathered by the concept of self-rule.

What of law enforcement in the past history of our nation? The pattern of our police forces follows closely the development of our whole governmental pattern. Tyranny was too recent a reality for Americans to desire any form of centralized police power. When circumstances dictated the necessity, therefore, systems of law enforcement developed as the need for them arose. As a result of this growth, widely diverse systems of law enforcement emerged in the United States.

Just as the concept of home rule placed responsibility for the governing processes squarely on the individual in the community, the responsibility for the enforcement of the law rested on exactly the same shoulders.

Today the great and vital news with regard to law enforcement has been the significant steps forward from that early beginning—a series of progressive advances extending from administrative echelons to the rank and file—which have already transformed the over-all picture of law enforcement throughout the United States.

Decentralized law enforcement in this nation is fulfilling its promise. It is living up to the great trust which was implicit in the simple, liberty-giving concept of the Founding Fathers. Law enforcement in our Republic has come of age. I say this in the face of intensified criticism of local law enforcement and in the face of recurring "reform" proposals, the inevitable result of which would be the centralization of police powers in a state or federal agency—and the ultimate destruction of the tremendous gains which decentralized law enforcement has made. I emphasize this because the facts are known to few and because knowledge of the facts may preclude taking the first tragic step toward centralization of police powers.

As it stands today, law enforcement on the federal level is the direct result of our decentralized form of government. Its duties are concerned, in whole or in part, with the suppression of crimes defined by federal statute. It is limited. As the laws are presently constituted, no federal law enforcement agency can infringe upon the field reserved to the other branches of law enforcement. None is subservient to the other. Any legislative change which would render local law enforcement subservient to state jurisdiction, or local and state law enforcement subservient to federal jurisdiction, would, in my opinion, be disastrous.

DANGERS OF CENTRALIZED POLICE POWER

I am unalterably opposed to a national police force. I have consistently opposed any plan leading to a consolidation of police power, regardless of the source from which it originated. I shall continue to do so, for the following reasons, which, in the same words, I have set forth on many earlier occasions:

1. Centralization of police power represents a distinct danger to democratic self-government.

2. Proposals to centralize law enforcement tend to assume that either the state or federal government can and should do for each community what the people of that city or county will not do for themselves.

3. The authority of every peace officer in every community would be reduced, if not eventually broken, in favor of a dominating figure or group on the distant state or national level. It is conceivable that such an official or group might be given the power by law to influence or dictate the selection of officers, the circumstances of their employment, and the decisions they make in arresting and prosecuting those who violate the law.

Threat to democracy

The first point, I believe, is the most compelling argument against any move toward centralization of police power. No one should be misled by representations that the power in question would be limited and would be sparingly used. While those who advance such a proposal may be acting from the best of motives, we must remember that power once granted to a sovereign authority is seldom relinquished. It is more often used to the hilt and extended in scope, and if it falls into corrupt hands, it can become a deadly menace. The judgment of history is on the side of those who limit police power and who never allow the bulwarks of those limits to be breached.

Public support essential

The premise which is implicit in the second point is utterly fallacious. It assumes that "the government" holds the magic key of accomplishment, regardless of the will and responsibility of the people. This is fantastically naïve. If the majority of the communities in a state are unable to enforce a law, either directly as a result of widespread disobedience or indirectly from public apathy, by what reasoning are we to assume that a "higher" authority will be more successful? Federal experience during the prohibition era is strong evidence bearing on this point. The basic power of law enforcement resides in the citizens of the nation; without their co-operation no agency of government—local, state, or federal—can be effective.

Danger of corruption

With regard to point number three, the excuse advanced to justify supervisory authority over local law enforcement has been the alleged necessity to correct deficiencies in local law enforcement. It is contended that inasmuch as the local officer may fall victim to certain pressures and temptations, the higher arm of government must have the power to take over and do the job right. This novel argument assumes that there are two breeds of men, and that those in higher authority are not subject to the subtle influence of money and corrupt politics. While this may be true in any given case, experience gives little basis for expecting a constant succession of such conscientious public servants. Should the power of law enforcement fall into the hands of a corrupt official, it would be quite as simple to reduce as to increase the effectiveness of the local peace officer by subjecting his work to corruption from above in addition to that exerted below.

The demand for better law enforcement can never be met by reducing the local peace officer to a subordinate position. Freeing local agencies from the shackles of public apathy and corrupt political control will help to guarantee better law enforcement. Improvement can be made only when local representatives are given an opportunity to exercise the authority which they already have. The great majority of our officers lack neither the ability nor the desire to enforce the law properly. They are, for the most part, honest, efficient, and able men. The fault does not lie with them. They need only to be free to do their work properly. Citizen action at polling places and in public opinion forums can loose the fetters which shackle so many law enforcement agencies and nullify the efforts of their members.

This is the proper course of action; subordinating the law enforcement officer to some higher authority whose decisions are just as likely to be a reflection of public morals, good or bad, as those of the local officer is a substitute measure which, in the long run, is far too likely to have a vastly different effect from that which promoters of such a plan intended.

It is infinitely wiser to use the statutes presently available to us than to clamp a new control over every community in order to fashion a trap for improper law enforcement in a few communities. Defenders of currently circulated proposals along these lines may argue that the authority proposed is to be used only in a limited and occasional situation where local law enforcement has broken down. This argument is not reassuring. A promise that the power requested will not be abused is a puny barrier. It is far wiser to make the need for such a promise unnecessary.

A due regard for the rights and advantages of democratic self-government in every community dictates that our present methods should not be abandoned, either in whole or in part, unless our peace officers are so ineffective that a surrender of their authority to a high agency of government has become an absolute necessity. If this condition cannot be shown to exist, any plan pointing to the eventual centralization of police powers in either a state or federal agency is no more than a dangerous expedient adopted to serve a narrow or temporary purpose.

Any heavy centralization of a widely dispersed police system such as ours is utterly impractical. This fact is apparent when one considers law enforcement in a small or large community being controlled by authorities located at a distance from the scene, who are thus necessarily insensitive to the pulse of the community. Central supervision at either the federal or state level can only result in impairing the vitality of local enforcement.

CO-OPERATION AMONG LOCAL AGENCIES

The need for police co-ordination is, of course, an imperative one. Contrary to the belief of many people, this problem is being met in a way which is both highly satisfactory and in keeping with our democratic traditions.

Any proposal for a shift of police powers on the basis that local officers lack the ability to enforce the law under today's conditions is inconsistent with the facts. Allegations that law enforcement has broken down at all levels simply are not true. There has been a tremendous change in law enforcement in the first half of the twentieth century—a change which in recent years amounts almost to a revolution—but the change has been for the better.

It was in the period of the late twenties and during the thirties that law enforcement as a profession became a generally accepted goal of law enforcement. Officer training on a major scale became accepted practice. Suspicion and jealousy between agencies gave way to mutual trust and interdependence. Each advance developed invaluable by-products of co-operation and unity, until today law enforcement in general has reached the goal of professionalization. Decency, fairness, and sound police work are the rule rather than the exception. Voluntary co-operation develops pride in performance. Efficiency and precision result.

The great majority of law enforcement offices are presently so efficiently equipped and operated that any officer can get immediate assistance merely by turning to his typewriter, telephone, or radio transmitter. These same methods can just as easily be applied to the exchange of necessary information. Any officer who obtains a report on criminal activity relating to another area as well as his own can transmit such data to the proper authorities and request what he needs in return.

FBI SERVICES

Assistance which cannot be obtained by interchange between local agencies is made available through the co-operative services of the Federal Bureau of Investigation. These services are tailored to fill a need in the standards and effectiveness of law enforcement and to implement the ability of the local peace officer to serve his community. The extent to which these services have been and are being used is an indication of the values devolving from a voluntary relationship.

A review of recent data relative to FBI co-operative services indicates the successes already achieved through voluntary means in meeting an inherently difficult and complex situation.

Identification Division

The FBI Identification Division provides a national repository of identification data based on fingerprint records. It is a co-operative service which is utilized by practically all law enforcement in the United States. This division searches the fingerprints submitted by contributing agencies. It sends criminal arrest records both to the requesting agency and to any others shown as being interested in the subject. Arrangements are made to notify local officers if the same person is arrested later in another area. In one year, recently, 10,533 fugitives were identified by the FBI through fingerprints. In the same period, 1,383,425 criminal fingerprints (including suspects) were received. Of the 1,844 fingerprints of unknown dead received, 1,334 were identified. Latent fingerprint examinations totaling 4,149 were requested and made. While it is primarily operated for the use of American agencies, the FBI Identification Division also participates in the exchange of fingerprints with foreign countries as an aid to local law enforcement. Information on criminals is sent to foreign countries and obtained from them for individual agencies at no cost to the agency.

Laboratory

The services of the FBI Laboratory are available without charge to all regularly established police departments. The laboratory conducts scientific examinations of evidence sent in by local officers in criminal cases. A written report is returned, and the examining technician is available for court testimony when needed. In a recent one-year period, the FBI Laboratory conducted 16,925 examinations of evidence for state and local law enforcement agencies. These examinations in the field of chemistry and physics include, among many others, fraudulent checks, firearms, paper, toolmarks, hairs and fibers, shoe prints, and tire treads.

Training facilities

Training is the essential factor in preparing for any profession, and it has played a major role in the development of law enforcement. The FBI National Academy was established in July 1935 for the purpose of training local, county, and state law enforcement officers as executives, administrators, and instructors. National Academy trainees are selected by the heads of the respective police departments. They come to Washington, D. C., where they receive intensive training for twelve weeks. Emphasis is placed on such subjects as police organization and administration, police records, and teaching methods. Scientific crime investigation methods, fingerprinting, firearms, traffic, defensive tactics, and legal subjects such as constitutional law and the Bill of Rights also are given special attention. Great emphasis is placed on professional and ethical standards. Brutality, third degree, duress, and entrapment are vigorously condemned. The proper principles of conduct for those engaged in law enforcement work are energetically promoted.

During the eighteen-year period from July 1935 through July 1953, 2,666 law enforcement officers were graduated by the FBI National Academy. It is interesting to note that at the present time more than one-fourth of all the graduates of the FBI National Academy are the executive heads of the law enforcement agencies by which they are employed. This fact alone is a definite indication that law enforcement is determined to establish its claim to the status of a profession beyond any doubt.

The FBI National Academy fulfills a specific purpose. In order to bring the professional training afforded Academy graduates to the rank and file of law enforcement, police training schools in the field have been instituted. When requests are received, the FBI assists state police agencies, sheriffs' offices, and local police departments with their training needs by conducting special schools on a departmental level. The schools may be the basic type designed to meet the needs of new and relatively inexperienced police officers, or "in-service" or advanced "in-service" for the more experienced men and those who have completed previous specialized schools. During a one-year period recently, the FBI participated in 2,350 such schools, and others are constantly being scheduled.

Conferences

Another factor serving to co-ordinate all the branches of law enforcement on a voluntary basis is the Annual Law Enforcement Conferences sponsored by the FBI. The personnel of the FBI field offices meet with representatives of local, county, state, and other federal law enforcement agencies to discuss mutual problems related to law enforcement in the various local areas. During a recent one-year period, 131 such conferences were held. These conferences and schools are of immeasurable benefit in bringing about a better understanding of the work of the various agencies and in ensuring closer co-operation among different branches of the profession on the local level.

The present magnificent co-ordination among the various branches of law enforcement was not born of the war emergency, at which time it was so brilliantly exhibited. It is, rather, the fulfillment of what is to be expected of free, decentralized law enforcement in a free land. The law enforcement profession during the past generation has achieved unity out of the desire to promote law and order. Mutual helpfulness and efficient teamwork have become an integral part of the training and conduct of today's officer.

Help with fugitives

While the FBI is requesting and receiving daily assistance from local law enforcement in conducting raids and apprehensions, as well as in the many other problems incident to our mutual work, it strives to co-operate in return through its central services. Under the Fugitive Felon Act, moreover, the FBI is able directly to assist local law enforcement in locating and apprehending certain fugitives. The FBI conducts investigations to locate and apprehend persons who have fled the jurisdiction of local officers to avoid prosecution or confinement after conviction for any of eight major crimes and attempts, as well as investigations of persons who flee to avoid giving testimony in criminal proceedings involving an offense carrying penitentiary imprisonment as punishment. In a recent one-year period FBI investigations led to the apprehension and return of 501 such fugitives. In addition, when the FBI has evidence that a crime has been planned or has been committed in another jurisdiction, the facts in our possession are promptly made available to the local officers charged with responsibility in the case.

Uniform Crime Reports

The Uniform Crime Reports are another co-operative service of the FBI, and fulfill a valuable administrative purpose. These bulletins are compiled by the FBI from data presently supplied by 5,788 local law enforcement agencies. The bulletins enable police executives to follow the national crime picture and compare it with that of their own communities.

RESPONSIBILITY RESTS ON CITIZENS

A close examination of the facts indicates that the tools for effective law enforcement lie within the grasp of every city and county which chooses to use them. Those communities which do not utilize the weapons at hand, but attempt to shift the responsibility for crime in their area to other shoulders, are not seeking a solution; they are merely indulging in a maneuver which can have no good results.

A so-called parent organization cannot guarantee progress or improve law enforcement. On the contrary, the result of central supervision of law enforcement cannot be other than ultimate stagnation and retrogression.

The great need of the law enforcement profession is not "higher" authority. It is greater responsibility at the citizen level. The community which maintains a law enforcement agency free from political pressure with its attendant graft and corruption, and which assures its department sufficient funds, equipment, and personnel, and adequate training facilities, is helping law enforcement advance steadily toward the heights of professionalism.

The flaws in law enforcement are rapidly being eliminated. To let a few uncorrected faults serve as an excuse to destroy the whole magnificent edifice of democratic law enforcement based on individual responsibility would be to confess that this nation has utterly lost its sense of proportion. Local responsibility, recognized by our forefathers, remains the key to sound law enforcement.

Changing Patrol Methods

By STANLEY R. SCHROTEL

OVER four decades ago Leonhard Felix Fuld stated in his comprehensive work on police administration that the most important official duty of the police officer on patrol was the duty of knowledge. Fuld then proceeded to define "duty of knowledge" as an obligation imposed upon the officer to know the occupation and the character of all persons found in his jurisdiction, and to make himself acquainted with everything that takes place therein. Although couched in rather general language, this duty of knowledge could well serve as a statement of purpose when related to the modern enforcement unit responsible for the task of uniformed patrol.

Actually, the reasons for maintaining a uniformed patrol have varied little, if at all, since the inception of the police idea. While modern authorities may insist on a declaration of purpose more refined than Fuld chose to consider, there is no basic conflict.

In contrast with the abiding objectives of the patrol force are the changing and developing techniques and mechanics employed to achieve those objectives. Such techniques and mechanics should and must be as dynamic as the society they serve.

DISADVANTAGES OF FOOT PATROL

Until comparatively recent times the patrol function in American cities was performed almost wholly by men on foot. In some of the larger cities a limited number of patrolmen were assigned to duty as mounted police, but these never succeeded in supplanting the foot patrol. Later the bicycle was adopted for patrol work in some large municipalities, but it never enjoyed the popularity of the horse. It was not until the automobile and the motorcycle became available for general police use that serious questions were raised as to the efficacy of foot patrol.¹ Some of these questions have never been satisfactorily resolved.

The delay in answering these questions springs from a failure to recognize two facts: (1) a uniformed patrolman is a field soldier possessed of certain skills acquired by training; and (2) by reason of these skills and training, he is prepared for action of an anticipatory or emergency nature. The quality and personal efficiency of the individual patrolman neither rises above nor falls below the standard of performance his organization demands or condones. Nor will these factors be influenced by the manner in which he is transported about the area which he serves. A craftsman is no less a craftsman for want of appropriate tools; nor do the palette and brush make the artist.

An attempt, therefore, to defend a deficiency in patrol operations on the basis of an inadequate number of foot patrolmen is begging the question. The time has arrived to adjust thinking and planning in patrol strategy in terms of the number of men that the available budget dollar will sustain. To calculate in areas of speculation is an open invitation to disappointment.

In a society as mobile as our own, it is expecting almost too much of a foot patrol force when we give them the responsibility of repressing crime and apprehending offenders in constantly expanding geographic areas. This responsibility becomes patently absurd when we expect them to apprehend traffic violators and the more serious offenders who use motor cars to effect their escape.

Conceding merit to the contention that patrol on foot provides an opportunity for intimacy of association conducive to a better relationship between the clientele to be served and the police officer, two salient considerations cannot be ignored: (1) the mere fact that patrol is being conducted on foot is no assurance that the desired relationship will be forthcoming; and (2) foot patrol imposes definite limitations on the effectiveness of a police officer, both in extent of area served and in quality of the service.

It should be apparent that opportunities to develop contacts and carry on intelligence beneficial to over-all police operations are more available to the foot patrolman than to others. Whether or not such opportunities are profitably channeled depends to a preponderant degree on the inclination of the officer. Moreover, even though a foot patrolman may be disposed to use for his organization all the benefits emanating from his close beat contacts, his activities are necessarily restricted to a very small area. Even while on conscientious patrol of this limited area, the foot officer is not readily accessible for immediate dispatch. Such accessibility is of major importance in modern police work, where immediate emergency service is a fundamental.

Unsatisfactory communications

In order to meet this deficiency of foot patrol service, attempts have been made to provide headquarters control of foot men in the field. Such attempts have taken the form of a variety of call box systems, serving as a telephone communication facility between the foot officer and a control center.

Unfortunately, conventional installations of call box equipment restrict its utility to calls initiated in the field. This is a regrettable limitation, in that requests for service addressed to headquarters cannot be satisfied until a routine call is received from the foot patrolman. Dependency of this nature prevents the immediate response to public demand for police service at the time it is needed.

In a society accustomed to rapid communication, such delay is beyond public understanding, and will not be tolerated in a progressive community. A police agency cannot overemphasize the value of immediate response to service demands. Expeditious and efficient service is an agency's basic asset and duty. To bargain for something less is to court criticism and risk withdrawal of public support.

It is not the public alone that is adversely influenced by a patrol system which lacks instant communication. The very nature of such a system prevents full administrative supervision. Effective supervision can safely be regarded as the most important factor affecting personnel management. Without such supervision, subordinates will not perform their best work. Under the foot patrol system, the patrol sergeant can exercise direct supervision over his men only at chance meetings or at previously determined rendezvous. Chance meetings are too infrequent to be of value, and predetermined contacts prevent scrutiny of performance under normal conditions. Thus the sergeant, however well intentioned, rarely has an opportunity to determine whether or not his charges are acquitting themselves in harmony with approved procedure and policy.

Some cities have attempted to overcome the defects inherent in a one-way communication system. The objective has been achieved to a greater or less degree by the installation of expensive and sensitive recall devices. These devices generally implement the call box or field telephone system by means of a light so mounted on the telephone box stanchion as to be visible for a considerable distance when lighted at night. Control of the recall light is established either directly or remotely in headquarters. The operating principle involves the lighting of the lights either in series or at specific locations where contact with the foot man is desired. It is presumed that the foot man, on observing the illuminated recall light, will hasten to the nearest telephone to determine the nature of the call.

The visible recall technique is fragile to this extent: it does not lend itself to practical daylight operation; and it presupposes that a police officer, who is imbued with all the frailties of mankind, will respond with dispatch to an inanimate signal which beckons him to industrious attention to duty.

Recent developments in communication offer some promise of aid in the control difficulties implicit in foot patrol operations. Vest-pocket-sized transmitters and receivers of phenomenal range have already found commercial markets. Enterprises featuring paging service for ambulatory subscribers are springing up with surprising rapidity in many of the large cities. An innovation which provides a method of communication between a dispatcher at a fixed location and a pedestrian whose whereabouts is undetermined holds unusual promise for a more effective utilization of the foot patrol force.

Physical limitations

Another and frequently ignored disadvantage of foot patrol springs from sheer physical limitation. Fatigue is more rapidly induced by foot patrol than by motor patrol. An accelerated state of fatigue has its concomitant deceleration of efficiency. A foot patrolman's response to a call for assistance is often less effective than that of an officer whose response requires less energy. On arrival at the scene of emergency the foot man may be out of breath and ill prepared for arduous effort.

Exposure of the foot officer to all phases of the weather poses another disadvantage. Such exposure tends to impair his health and may result in time loss from duty because of illness. All of these disadvantages are reflected unfavorably in increased service costs.

To police a city of even moderate size by means of foot patrol exclusively would require a personnel complement so large that the cost of maintenance would far exceed the value of the protection afforded. If police administration is to enjoy the reputation that stems from the application of sound principles of management, areas of diminishing returns must be recognized and avoided.

MOTORIZED FORCE, RADIO EQUIPPED

The defects and limitations identified with foot patrol serve as persuasive reasons to favor motorized patrol. Among the innovations of the Vollmer system of police administration, and one of the major contributions of the present century to crime control, was the complete motorization of the force. Vollmer held that the patrolman on foot was obsolete, and showed how motorization amplified enormously the striking power of the force through increased mobility, maneuverability, and speed of movement. The implications of this development in terms of combat strength or striking power are important.²

² V. A. Leonard, Police Organization and Management (Brooklyn, N. Y.: Foundation Press, 1951), p. 260.

The task of the modern police administrator is to expand and utilize fully this new development. First of all, he finds that the efficiency of motorized patrol is greatly enhanced by two-way radio communication. Personnel operating patrol vehicles so equipped are constantly available to headquarters, and when the occasion demands, they themselves can employ this facility to summon additional men or equipment.

Of course, the potential of motorized patrol, even though radio equipped, is no better in some respects than foot service, if radio contact cannot be made instantaneously. Experience reveals that persons assigned to radio cars sometimes have a tendency to make themselves and their equipment inaccessible. This is not a tendency peculiar to law enforcement personnel, but a trait that expresses itself in every vocation in which supervision is not continuous and direct. Since this frailty in police operation causes an unwarranted depletion of the patrol force, even though of a temporary nature, corrective measures should be adopted.

One method designed to obviate this abuse has been employed with some success. It consists of a requirement that radio car officers request permission of the dispatcher to take their equipment out of service, stating the reason for the request and the location of the car at the time. Supervisors at headquarters and in the field monitoring the transmission can evaluate its merit, and if necessary report to the announced location for verification. The result of such a procedure should be obvious, inasmuch as its salutary effect ensures an adequate striking power for constant field service.

Conveyance of hospital cases and prisoners

Radio-equipped motor cars have also brought about revolutionary developments in the transportation both of hospital cases and of prisoners. In the pre-radio era, motor equipment and personnel assigned to transport service were relegated to fixed posts either at police headquarters or at district station houses located throughout the city. The personnel and equipment operated entirely on a stand-by basis, since they were held in readiness for dispatch to the scene of an accident or an arrest.

Units of this type were frequently referred to as patrol wagons, but they did not patrol. The time required for such a unit to reach a given location proved to be a matter of considerable moment. If the conveyance was needed at a point somewhat remote from its quarters, priceless time was consumed in traversing the distance. If the dispatch concerned an injured person requiring hospitalization, public resentment was generated against the police agency because of the late response.

Where the dispatch was for the transportation of prisoners, public reaction may have been equally unfavorable; for no matter how tactfully the arrest had been made, if the prisoner was compelled to remain in public view under the dominant control of a conspicuously attired police officer, little encouragement was required to develop a sympathy for the prisoner and a critical attitude toward the police. Progressive administrators have moved rapidly to avoid like vulnerable areas of criticism.

A practical solution of this problem has been found in the adoption of a paneled body conveyance designed to accommodate both victims and prisoners. The vehicle is so light in weight and of such maneuverability as to lend itself to constant patrol operation. Thus men have been provided for patrol who heretofore idled their time in the cloistered recesses of a police building, waiting for a call.

Equipped with two-way radio, such a conveyance is readily and quickly available for emergency service. Inasmuch as vehicles of this type patrol a predetermined area, the dispatcher need only inquire as to the location of the mobile units in order to ascertain which one is in a geographical position to provide the most expeditious response. Recipients and observers of such prompt service become staunch supporters of the police. Thus the time and talents of personnel manning the equipment are utilized for the all-important task of patrol.

Despite the necessary evils of a combined ambulance-prisoner transfer facility, its use is superior in many respects to the common patrol wagon with its untrained personnel.

Many police departments throughout the United States perform emergency ambulance duties. In most instances these are combined with the pickup and transfer of prisoners, with consequent neglect of common decencies. No patrol wagon crew can pick up arrested felons, helpless drunkards, persons suffering from contagious and infectious diseases, and the victims of gun, knife, poison, collision, sun stroke, and apoplexy, and still be expected to observe acceptable standards in handling each of them.

Where police operate an ambulance service that is independent of patrol wagon pickups, costs rise to unreasonable heights, and the irregularity of demands for service proves burdensome to overriding considerations of law enforcement.³

DANGERS OF SPECIALIZATION

Care must be exercised in placing in operation combined transport and patrol units as previously described. Because of the character of the service rendered, persons assigned to the units must of necessity have thorough training in first aid. While it is generally agreed that knowledge of first aid should be one of the basic skills of a police officer, those who have frequent opportunity to display such skill show a trend toward a kind of creeping paralysis, usually referred to as specialization, which is common to every enforcement agency. If not arrested, it eventually stifles the effective performance of the regular patrol force.

Specialization has disadvantages that deserve attention; otherwise, the disadvantages may outweigh the advantages. Specialization creates difficult problems of integration and co-ordination; it divides the department into separate forces that sometimes operate independently of each other. Sometimes the independence is so great that they function antagonistically and at cross purposes. The department is then no longer motivated by a common purpose; frictions arise; there is strong and hostile competition for staff, facilities, and equipment. Specialization also sometimes leads to neglect of police duties; specialists are prone to ignore work that is the primary responsibility of some other unit, and citizens are sometimes shunted from one specialist to another in search of service.⁴

BENEFITS OF SPECIALIZATION

The disadvantages of specialization should in no wise obscure the significance of an enforcement philosophy which, although extremely popular two decades ago, is currently viewed with some reserve. In the early thirties emphasis was placed on the need for specialization in defined areas within the pale of police operation. One area so identified had to do with the traffic problem; another, with the repression of juvenile delinquency.

Then, as now, both areas challenged the ingenuity of enforcement agencies. This challenge was met with considerable success by the establishment of highly specialized squads or units whose responsibility was limited to their particular assignment. The attendant development of skills in these limited fields resulted in immediate improvement to a greater or less degree, depending upon the intensity of specialization.

IMPORTANCE OF PATROL DIVISION

Gratified by the response to the application of principles of specialization, many police administrators attempted to resolve other acute enforcement situations by like techniques. Although personnel for such assignments must of necessity be recruited from the bulk of the enforcement body—the patrol force—no serious thought was given to the ultimate consequences of depleting this vital part of the enforcement unit. A well-known commentator has pointed up the issue in these words:

Since the work of the patrol force includes all police functions, the more effective the patrol division, the less need there is for the other, more specialized operating divisions and units. Although it is impossible for the patrol force to be one hundred per cent effective in the discharge of all police functions, the other operating line divisions are necessary only to the extent that the patrol division falls short of this ideal. It is axiomatic, therefore, that any attempt to improve or strengthen other divisions at the expense of the patrol division serves to pyramid the case load not only for the unit that has prospered through personnel transfers but for all other divisions and units in the department.⁵

Thus it is apparent that effort directed at sustaining the strength and effectiveness of the patrol division is both desirable and sound. Although the mobilization of the patrol division can be translated in terms of such an effort, the desired objective is thwarted by assigning two men to a car in those instances where one could provide an equivalent service.

BRITISH EXPERIENCE

The British, traditionally sound in police philosophy, have also demonstrated an enviable audacity in their approach to the need for more productive patrol methods. A full generation ago, Chief Constable Frederick J. Crawley of Newcastle upon Tyne was pioneering a highly decentralized system for distributing and supervising patrols, even while Lieutenant Colonel Alfred Law, chief constable of the Hertfordshire Constabulary, was seeking central control in patrol coverage through prearranged patrol routes and detailed patrol schedules.⁶ The Hertfordshire plan did not make much headway, perhaps because it involved so much preparatory staff work and also limited the initiative of patrol personnel. But the Crawley plan has literally swept the British Isles during the past twenty years, thus demonstrating a commendable willingness to meet new problems with new methods.

Now comes a further departure in the form of "team policing" as employed in Aberdeen and in the borough of Salford, each with a population around 180,000. Designed to bring about a better integration of the use of all communications and motor equipment, and more varied duties for uniformed constables, these communities have produced a greater element of surprise in patrol coverage, a more adequate response in emergencies, and an increasing interest in patrol among the rank and file.

⁶ F. J. Crawley, "Decentralization and the Police Box System," The Police Journal (London), Vol. I (1928), pp. 118-27; Alfred Law, "Police Patrol Systems: Practice in an English County," The Police Journal, Vol. II (1929), pp. 280-93.

In Aberdeen

Aberdeen has abolished fixed beats worked by single constables, and substituted much larger patrol areas worked by a team of constables under a sergeant. Each team has been given a police car, which the sergeant uses to move his men from one part of the patrol area to another. Constables are encouraged to follow up any incidents themselves, without calling on specialist help except in cases of real difficulty. The main features of the system are its mobility and the fact that constables act as a team rather than as individuals. The results in Aberdeen have been good. A substantial saving in manpower has been effected, and the number of arrests has been increased.

The Salford plan

Salford retains the idea of a team of constables operating from a police car, but provides a greater flexibility than the Aberdeen plan affords. The city is divided into police districts, but the patrol areas in each district are kept flexible. Rough boundaries are laid down for beats during each of the three tours of duty, to assure that there are enough on duty when and where they are most likely to be needed. Boundaries of beats are changed three times a day to accommodate to changing needs, but the officer in charge of each district also exercises wide powers to change the beats whenever circumstances make it necessary. A beat bordering the docks, for example, may be made much smaller during a dock strike, with its abnormal possibilities of trouble, than would be necessary during normal working conditions.

According to the Salford plan, a police team consists of nine constables with a sergeant in charge. A police car fitted with radio serves each team. No special driver is carried. Before each team starts its tour of duty, which lasts for eight hours, the district commander and the sergeant review the work that is likely to arise. They consider the recent incidence and location of crimes and street accidents, complaints from the public of general nuisances, any property requiring special protection, and similar matters. The sergeant then draws up a list of "operations" for each man. Two or three may be detailed for point duty, others will be given particular streets to patrol, and the chances are that one man will be kept with the sergeant and the driver in the car, which also will be used for patrol duties. The whole team is told what to look for and what sort of incidents are likely to occur. The car serves the dual purpose of a mobile police station and a quick means of moving the constables about from one area to another.

As in the traditional beat system, the constable remains individually responsible for a definite area or duty. The chief difference from more familiar systems is that the beat is changed immediately to fit any situation.

Particularly notable is the fact that the interest and keenness of the patrolmen are greatly increased. The monotony of patrolling the same area week after week, waiting for something to turn up, is broken, and the constable accordingly gains more experience in a shorter time than is possible under orthodox systems. Improvement in morale has been a salient feature.

On the basis of limited experience thus far, the proportion of indictable offenses cleared by arrest has risen by one-third. Patrols make nearly twice as many arrests as they did before the system was introduced, and the number of incidents reported has increased by nearly 50 per cent. With such a record of achievement, team policing appears destined for wider adoption in and practice has, of course, not been said, here, in Britain, or elsewhere. Probably it has not even been dreamed. We can only aim our sights, and try to the best of our ability most fully to utilize the ideas, the men, and the material which we now have. If we do this, we cannot completely miss our goal.

Progress in Criminal Investigation

By PAUL L. KIRK

THE most important trend in crime investigation today is unquestionably that toward more and better training for investigators. If this were the only progress being made, it would still portend a brighter future. In addition, like the other applied sciences, crime investigation is slowly but surely adopting many of the advances of fundamental science and technology which can serve it. As with other applied sciences, overenthusiasm, inadequate understanding of the problems, and the normal failures of human judgment have led to extravagances in some instances and to overcautious conservatism in others. The advances have been many and significant, but at times they have outrun the growth of fundamental philosophy and balanced understanding. These must develop before a new technique, instrument, or approach can be fitted solidly into its proper niche and be viewed in its correct perspective.

TRAINING

That crime investigation is more than normally susceptible to failure of perspective and judgment follows from the fact that its acceptance as a true profession is not yet universal, and its practitioners are by virtue of necessity largely self-trained, half-trained, or untrained. There is as yet no generally accepted type of standard training as is found in the other professions. Where efforts have been made to develop adequate standard training, it is given and administered by persons who themselves are not its product. Thus, educators in this field are still struggling to fashion curricula that are sound, logical, and inclusive, and at the same time adapted to the practical needs of law enforcement agencies. The struggle of the latter with inadequate financing, public indifference, political complications, obsolete regulations, unsuitable applicants, and related difficulties tends to handicap the effective co-operation that is desired by both educational and law enforcement administrators.

That the situation is nevertheless hopeful is proved by the enthusiastic efforts of both groups to achieve a solid basis of co-operation. Medicine, and more recently the law, had to struggle through similar difficulties in standardizing their training programs and developing acknowledged and respected professions. Their great measure of success and the smaller but significant degree of success in professionalizing crime investigation point to continued progress in this direction. Time is needed, accompanied by the continued efforts of the large group that is truly interested in developing in this area the professional standards of training, ethics, and effective practice that are needed.

Numerous colleges and universities offer police training at various levels, and the number of them is increasing. The graduates of such curricula, after obtaining sufficient practical experience in police work, may be expected to raise significantly the standards of police operation. The proportion of police officers who can take advantage of advanced training will remain small for many years to come, and the large remaining group should have the opportunity to receive high-quality in-service training. Local police schools are meeting this need in some places, and the state and federal agencies are partially effective in larger areas; but it is here that a tremendous unfilled need exists. The operation of such schools requires financing and local co-operation to a degree that is not obtainable in many regions. Increased public support of this effort is greatly to be desired.

The laboratory investigator requires extended training at the college level. In-service training can never be sufficient. And colleges cannot be effective in giving the necessary training if the time is restricted to less than a full four-year course. A longer curriculum is preferable. Intelligent and eager police officers have achieved significant results in very limited specialties by self-training, but to encourage this trend is to retard the more significant progress toward making criminalistics a truly scientific and professional subject. Criminalistic training and police training are quite different, even though they occupy common ground in some respects. The necessary knowledge of the basic sciences cannot be imparted rapidly by means of short courses or a little spare-time study.

IDENTIFICATION AS A SCIENCE

The science of criminalistics is largely the science of identification. Every method of identification—chemical, physical, biological, microscopical—is a potential tool. Items of evidence must be identified as to nature and as to source. The fiber must be found to be in turn a hair, a human hair, a head hair, and a hair of John Smith, if the facts can be made to yield their maximum information. The material must be identified as glass, and as glass from a specific broken window. Progress in this field has been marked and sometimes almost spectacular because of the constant availability of new techniques, instruments, and compilations of data that flow from the laboratories of the physical scientists.

Applications of the methods and data of the physical sciences have been discouragingly slow at times because of the small amount of research in the field of criminalistics as such. Educational institutions in which research in this field is a recognized function are few and inadequately staffed. The crime laboratories are overburdened with casework and often are poorly staffed and equipped for research. It is probable that no other applied science today has so little research output, in toto and possibly per capita, as criminalistics.

The picture is made even more dismal by the residual tendency of practicing investigators to consider their profession as a trade rather than a science, and to hide their specialized knowledge under the bushel of "trade secrets" rather than to disseminate it in the spirit of research science. One is always tantalized by the speculation as to how much is actually known, and how impressive an array of criminalistic skill could be compiled if all investigators were to pool their knowledge in a single repository such as is typical of any good scientific library. An even more unfortunate situation is the encouragement by certain investigative organizations to pool information within the organization but keep it secret from all but the elect. The suspicion that such semisecret information may not be worth revealing can at times be confirmed.

INSTRUMENTS VERSUS SKILLS

Instrumentation has been the most conspicuous focus of attention by laboratory investigators, and to a large degree general police investigators as well. Every convention of law enforcement organizations is likely to see featured a tremendous variety of special instruments which will include a ridiculously complex array of fingerprinting equipment with perhaps ten kinds of powder, about two or three of which will be actually used, and a bewildering list of tools, the function of which is largely concerned with the profit of the manufacturer. Here also are pocket wire recorders, infrared scopes, easily concealed cameras, and much other paraphernalia of the private detective who is far more interested in obtaining evidence for divorces than in solving crimes.

While all of these devices have legitimate and valuable uses, the overemphasis on such investigative aids tends to obscure the more fundamental requirements placed on the investigator—thoroughness, common sense, care and thought in approaching the problem, and a definite and deliberate plan of action designed to achieve the desired result. In short, the tendency to substitute gadgets for skilled personnel is the most serious mistake that can possibly be made.

In the laboratory

Though the conditions are different, a similar tendency exists in the crime laboratory. There, the instrument is essential to operation. Optical devices extend the range of the eye to perceive minute details that allow identification. Physical devices provide information for which no special senses exist in the human body. Chemical tests reveal the fundamental nature of materials. All of these require instruments and equipment.

No other instrument or combination of instruments has made so intense and lasting an impression on criminal investigation practices as has the microscope. Without the lenses of a variety of common and special microscopes, most of the identification work of the crime laboratory would never be accomplished. The spectrograph, the spectrophotometer, and the X-ray diffraction camera have supplied additional vital information regarding the identity of materials that could not be readily duplicated otherwise. Ultraviolet and infrared radiations with the necessary accompanying instruments are essential. The camera makes visible to all the results obtained by most of the other instruments.

To a great extent the laboratory investigator must be an instrumental specialist. On the other hand, undue stress on instruments in some laboratories has inevitably led to a complete failure to appreciate that no instrument is ever any better than the man who operates it. Unskilled and ineffective personnel equipped with every conceivable instrument cannot solve crimes. Skillful, effective personnel with a bare minimum of instruments will still solve a high proportion of crimes submitted to them.

The average crime laboratory has not an adequate budget to acquire the instruments that it could employ profitably, but an even more serious deficiency is that it often does not have investigators with sufficient ability to utilize even the most commonplace instruments to the best advantage. This error is doubly compounded in the occasional laboratory that has more money than it can spend legitimately. In such a laboratory a discussion developed as to whether two electron microscopes or only one should be purchased, even though no person present knew how to operate such an instrument. Moreover, no one has yet suggested a single significant application for one in identification work. While this situation is understandably rare, it is not absent in the field, particularly in laboratories supported by federal funds.

An instrument need not be complicated, rare, or expensive, to be effective. Biochemists made enormous investments in ultracentrifuges, elaborate extraction apparatus, complex diffusion and molecular distillation equipment, and other expensive apparatus to fractionate complex biological mixtures. Today, a simple column of adsorbent or a sheet of filter paper and some common solvents are producing fractionations so much more spectacular that the biochemist has become largely a chromatographer. By adding a five-cent sheet of filter paper to a simple electrolytic apparatus, zone electrophoresis was accomplished with the saving of about five thousand dollars' worth of equipment previously held necessary to obtain the same information.

This is a valuable lesson on the importance of simplicity and ingenuity, as well as a strong indication of the necessity for being alert to new and valuable developments. With few exceptions, laboratory investigators have completely disregarded both chromatography and zone electrophoresis as crime investigation techniques, and have substituted expensive instruments for ingenuity and simplicity. Their most important instrument is still an ingenious and functional brain.

PERSONAL IDENTIFICATION STILL INVITES RESEARCH

It is obvious that the final aim of all identification methods is to identify a person. While indirect identification is the most likely to be possible, it would be more satisfactory to utilize direct identification of the person if it could be done. Eyewitness testimony is so erratic and undependable, as is well known by all experienced investigators, that the fingerprint has long been the indispensable technique of direct personal identification. Criminals also know this, and are commonly able to prevent identification by avoiding contacts that would leave latent prints.

Criminalistic research has indeed been so sterile in finding better methods of identification by direct means that the initiative appears already to be slipping from those most interested. Fundamental scientists, not even concerned with personal identification, are already reporting that blood is individual. Others are reporting the individuality of semen, and hair is far on the way toward being proved to be individual. How many times the expert testifies to the presence of O-type blood on a suspect's clothing and then has to admit that nearly half the population has O blood! The day is soon due when he can say that the suspect has on his clothes the blood of the victim and nobody else, or that the victim carried semen or a hair from the suspect and from nobody else.

The techniques are largely available, the fundamentals of the field are already well known in some quarters, but the laboratory investigators are still sitting on the side lines. The writer has a strong feeling that this is due at least in part to the gradual crowding of enthusiastic, scientifically trained amateurs from the field as the large, highly organized laboratories take over the practice of the profession and diminish the contacts with the wider scientific circles. Except when a large organization is directly organized for research, research will be stifled. There, the paycheck and the time clock tend to replace the thrill of accomplishment and the constructive imagination of the worker.

Fingerprint technique, though highly standardized and universally practiced, made its most significant advance through the early work of amateurs—Sir Edward Henry and some others. Little by little, the technically trained amateur with a real understanding of the specialized fields of biology, chemistry, and physics is being crowded from the crime investigation field without having his research ability replaced by that of the practicing laboratory investigator. Though the movement toward professional standardization itself constitutes progress, it would be tragic if the very seeds of continuing progress in the larger field were lost in the process.

It is time that the large and well-equipped laboratories, and even the small ones, give serious attention to this situation. They must remember that the more intelligent criminals are ever on the alert for better methods of thwarting the law. In the war on crime, the agents of the law must maintain the lead in development or be forced to ultimate failure. Financially, the criminal has the lead by a large margin. He also leads in numbers. The only advantage enjoyed by the agents of the law, aside from perfunctory support by the large majority of the public, is access to superior technical facilities. The most potent of these is research—a fact which must be realized and acted upon if progress is to be sustained at a sufficient rate to continue effective law enforcement.

CRIME LABORATORIES

Because of misunderstanding of the proper and necessary functions of crime laboratories, their proper integration into the law enforcement program is often not accomplished. The inevitable result is that the laboratory does not deliver the service of which it is capable, and dissatisfaction arises with its existence, when it should apply only to its operation. Sometimes miracles are expected from the laboratory by the overenthusiastic, but more often the laboratory is neglected or bypassed by the police or the administrators who do not understand it and may be suspicious of it.

Poor functioning of such a laboratory is sometimes explained as being due to poor facilities. Far more often the real cause of the situation is inadequate personnel, or poor co-ordination of effort with the police investigators. The latter may not be adequately informed as to what the laboratory can do to help them, and they usually have a very limited appreciation of the nature and value of physical objects as evidence. Uncollected evidence cannot be made to assist in solving crimes. In a very large majority of cases, most of the valuable physical evidence is never collected, and the little that is recovered may often be inadequate to establish proof. When this occurs it is often listed as a laboratory failure, when in fact the laboratory never had a chance.

More serious, though less common, than the failure to obtain all the physical evidence is the inclination to destroy it. This is encountered on the part of police officers who do not realize its value, and has been known to occur in the laboratory itself on the part of technicians who lacked the necessary ability and/or inclination to deal intelligently with it. A very bloody garment is not a pleasant object to examine, and it is far easier to destroy it than to preserve and test it; but any laboratory in which this could occur requires immediate overhauling.

The local laboratory

The cost of the laboratory and the physical and organizational difficulties of establishing local laboratories have been major deterrents to their installation in many places, especially in medium and small cities. It is tragic when misunderstanding of the true nature of the difficulty is not appreciated and leads to delay in an obviously valuable acquisition. A small but efficient laboratory can be equipped for less than ten thousand dollars, even at today's inflated costs. It can operate on a total annual budget, including salary for a skilled laboratory investigator, of five to ten thousand dollars and provide excellent service in 90 per cent or more of the cases requiring laboratory study. When it is realized that the police force, by increasing its efficiency, can actually save the salaries of additional officers otherwise necessary to carry a heavy investigative load, the total outlay may be written off entirely in the saving effected.

Even more significant is the saving in terms of court trials. A remarkably large proportion of guilty suspects, when confronted with a laboratory report that demonstrates their guilt, will plead guilty and save the cost of a contested trial. Even standing alone, this saving is probably more than enough to defray the cost of a small laboratory.

Aside from the less tangible but no less real fact that the proportion of convictions nearly always rises sharply when laboratory testimony is employed, there is ample argument for many laboratory installations in police departments today. The significant question now is whether the police department can afford to be without the laboratory, rather than whether it can afford a laboratory.

There has been a marked tendency in recent years toward the establishment of central laboratories by states and various agencies of the federal government. Success in meeting many of the needs of law enforcement agencies is indicated by the considerable expansion of these laboratories when they have operated over a period of time. Along with this movement there has also developed a tendency to depend on them for all laboratory work, and at the same time a feeling on the part of administrators of such laboratories that they should monopolize the laboratory work of the area served. While their services have markedly improved law enforcement as compared with the conditions prevailing in their absence, it can be demonstrated readily that these laboratories do not furnish a complete or ideal answer to the laboratory problem.

Proper functioning of any laboratory requires close co-ordination and exchange of information between the police investigator and the laboratory investigator. This starts with the collection of the evidence itself, which usually cannot be evaluated without full and complete understanding of the problems by both parties. It continues throughout the investigation. As each new fact emerges from the laboratory, it must be evaluated co-operatively to determine whether it is a significant finding regarding the crime or merely an extraneous fact which is totally unrelated. The laboratory may waste much valuable time studying materials that have no value as evidence, and the investigators in the field may overlook the most important evidence because they do not realize its potential value when examined in the laboratory. Further, they immediately apply the information obtained by the laboratory if they can receive it promptly.

Such close integration of effort is usually impossible when the central laboratory is involved. Only the police scientist is on the spot at the right time and in constant touch with the field investigation.

The small police laboratory, on the other hand, can rarely be provided with all the facilities that are associated with the central laboratory. Therefore, some types of examination cannot be made locally. Also, it is likely that the police scientist is more restricted in experience and training than his counterpart in the larger laboratory. The central laboratory can serve best as a co-operating agency that carries out those examinations which the police scientist realizes are desirable but which he cannot make. He, in turn, is in an excellent position to serve as liaison man with the central laboratory on the one hand and the police investigator on the other. He can assure that evidence is not overlooked or disregarded, that the preliminary examinations perhaps involving much sterile exploratory work are carried out locally and in close co-ordination with the police, and that all necessary examinations he himself cannot make will be properly done with a minimum of wasted time by the central laboratory personnel.

An additional and extremely important function attaches to the central laboratory, namely, the training and orientation work that must be performed in making local law enforcement officials conversant with the significance and handling of physical evidence. Uniformity of practice and of instruction cannot be achieved by working on the local level alone, even though the efforts of local laboratory personnel in indoctrinating local officials is invaluable. Co-ordinated programs of training for sheriffs and others are in operation in various states and are yielding most significant and valuable results. These programs require direction in part by the state or federal laboratory officials, who need not infringe on the local efforts being made in the same direction. The two aspects of crime laboratory work are thus complementary when properly organized and directed. It is a mark of poor administration if they ever become truly competitive.

INTERVIEWING AND PHYSICAL EVIDENCE

The most extensive use of technical advances in the fundamental sciences has been made in the field of physical evidence examination. Investigation of persons rather than things is still handicapped by the same basic difficulties that complicate the precise application of economic or political laws and generalizations. A new instrument may be readily understood because it is conceived, designed, and built by people, and will be operated by people. Interviewing witnesses, on the other hand, involves understanding of the human mind and of human behavior. No mysteries of science are so profound as these. The skillful examiner who can interview a person and usually uncover the truth of an event is certainly operating more in the realm of the artist than in that of the objective scientist.

Uncovering the facts of a crime by means other than direct interview and examination of physical evidence in the strict sense requires an active and practical imagination and the ability to substitute the mental processes of the culprit for one's own. This type of mind, so valuable in the investigator, may be inherent, but is more often acquired by experience when the person has an aptitude for investigative work. Recognition of such a person, and provision of ample opportunity for him to acquire experience under stimulating guidance, are a prime necessity if good investigators are to be developed. Along with this must go sound common sense and training in the two most important phases of investigation—interviews and physical evidence.

In the field of the interview, the great progress in psychology and psychiatry, supplemented by the development of objective tests to expose deception, has led to material advances in this old and difficult art. As with the more objective field of criminalistics, these advances have attracted both overenthusiasts and scoffers. Here also, the middle road of cautious enthusiasm, careful testing, and conservative application is the real goal. It is unfortunate that the objective tests for deception have been so widely misunderstood and misinterpreted, for they are the only known substitutes for a very profound knowledge of and ability in probing the human mind.

Lie-detecting devices

The so-called "lie detector," or polygraph, is an excellent illustration of the confusion in popular thinking, which spreads into many police departments as well. It is not generally recognized that the polygraph is merely a device to detect emotional reactions of any type, but not to detect falsehood except as it stimulates an emotional reaction. Thus, it is the examiner and the question he asks that are important, and not the machine, which is merely designed to give a signal when a question stirs up an emotion. As in the laboratory, the machine is completely secondary, the operator being the important element. When this simple idea is finally grasped by investigators, courts, and the public, it will be safe to allow lie-detector evidence in court. Until then, training of operators and general education—not a change in legal attitude—should be the main objective.

Even more widely misunderstood is the so-called "truth serum," which is not a serum and has no relation to truth. The device of inhibiting the higher mental centers with a drug so that the normal inhibitions of the subject are suppressed is not new. Alcohol frequently does the same thing, though less efficiently. What emerges is not necessarily truth, and may be pure gibberish; but it may also impart to the skilled operator information not otherwise obtainable. Here again, the emphasis must be entirely on the operator, not the device. This points as before to training, practice, experience, and more training of investigators in this, as in the other specialties of investigation.

NONTECHNICAL POLICE PERSONNEL

By any criterion, the police investigator is the most important person in the complex chain of crime investigation. The psychiatrist, the police scientist, and the lawyer supplement his efforts, but the case normally is solved or not solved depending on the ability, persistence, and skill of the investigator. In order to increase the probability of his ultimate success, he should have access to the best laboratory possible, and the training necessary to utilize it fully. He should have the services of skilled operators of detection-of-deception methods, and the training necessary to profit from them. His selection should be by persons who have a thorough understanding of the job requirements and a profound appreciation of the inherent qualities necessary for good investigators. The examiner may be a good psychiatrist, or a thoroughly competent police executive, but it should not be just a personnel board or civil service commission with a list of confusing and ambiguous questions gleaned from an obsolete textbook.

Above all, the investigator should be given the opportunity and the incentive to receive all the training possible and the best grade of training available. Low standards of training that too often prevail should be improved, and new training instituted. In this direction only will lie progress, progress that is now being seen in certain quarters where training is relatively good, and which stands in sharp contrast to that in other regions where training facilities are inadequate and where police are not encouraged to obtain even that which is available.

Not only will this lead to better police performance, but it will so increase police prestige that many of the other problems such as public indifference and poor financing will be markedly reduced. Professional standards and good performance can always demand and get their own terms. This will be evident in the police field, as in other fields, when the quality of police work is good enough to command respect and consideration.

The Specialized Traffic Division

By FRANKLIN M. KREML

SPECIALIZATION in traffic law enforcement has come upon the scene for much the same reasons as have influenced other kinds of specialized activity. A high degree of professional specialization is one of the characteristics of our time. In no area is it more obvious than in the operations of government, which are expanding and becoming complicated, intricate, and expensive at a faster rate than ever before in history. Every department of every government is becoming more compartmentalized and more specialized in its functions, for the problems which government in all its departments is being called upon to manage are becoming more varied and demanding at an unprecedented rate.

It is by now an overworked truism that society as we know it is highly industrial, highly mechanized, and highly mobile. An important basis of its mobility, of course, is the motor vehicle.

In view of the enormous influences of the motor vehicle upon our culture and its daily conduct, it is not surprising that it—and its uses by men—has brought some new and disturbing public problems. These problems are no less complicated and no less varied than are the problems of industry, health, and commerce. In fact, problems in all these areas are closely interrelated and interdependent.

In industry, health, and commerce—among others—administrative and operational structures have been specialized to meet new problems and requirements as they arise. In enforcement of the traffic laws, which is part of the supervision of traffic movement, which in turn is part of the governmental management of community affairs, specialization is an essential requirement for meeting and dealing with the current problem. This specialization must be reflected in personnel selection, in training, in organization, and in management.

We know a great deal about the traffic problem and the demands it places upon the official agencies of government. If we do not yet know, however, that it is a problem involving extensive special knowledge and skill, techniques and procedures—both administrative and operational—we do not know the problem well enough to deal with it adequately.

This paper will discuss the nature of the problems related to motor vehicle traffic and enforcement of the laws related thereto; will indicate that this "old" problem, the traffic problem, has in fact become a new problem, in quality and dimensions, demanding new, highly specialized knowledge and skill in all those dealing with it. The new requirements can best be met in most urban areas through specialization—in the case of enforcement, traffic supervision through a specialized traffic division of the police department.

EARLY HISTORY

City police departments gave attention to traffic in the late nineteenth century with the assignment of bicycle-mounted police to apprehend speeding cyclists. Even prior to this, police had been engaged in traffic supervision, principally at intersections. In the main, such duty was delegated, along with other duties, to patrolmen from the uniformed force.

When the advent of the motor car created new problems in street and highway traffic, the police motorcycle replaced the police bicycle, and traffic forces were expanded to include foot patrolmen regularly assigned to direct traffic at intersections and effect some control of parking. Horse-mounted police were frequently used for parking control duty. Early motorcycle squads concentrated principally on enforcement of speed laws.

The problem of traffic was approached as another job of law enforcement—with quantity of enforcement increasing as public indignation over accidents and congestion arose, and decreasing as the public objected to enforcement. The objections sometimes reached rebellious proportions as motorists resented unreasonable, unplanned, and often severe enforcement measures which seemed to bear little relation to the safety or the economic needs of the community.

The police handled accidents as routine extensions of aid to and transportation of the injured. Accident reports, if any, were sketchy and inaccurate, and largely useless. Except in rare instances, little use was made of these reports except as records of the incidents themselves. In the main, accidents were handled and reports made by the regular patrol forces.

Prosecution of traffic law violations committed in connection with accidents were few, and generally confined to serious cases (measured by the severity of the accident). Cases were usually given such scant investigative attention and so little preparation that few were sustained in court. Even the more carefully prepared cases usually failed when the plaintiff withdrew his complaint or conveniently forgot essential testimony following payment of civil damages. The police operated, generally, under a misapprehension of the law of arrest, concluding that they could not, under any circumstances, file a complaint for a misdemeanor they had not witnessed.

As traffic conditions worsened, following World War I, police administrators and other public officials sought other approaches. Public education for traffic safety emerged, with its promise—perhaps overly enlarged in some minds—of resolving the problem at its roots. Some police agencies seized upon it as a happy solution to the problem. Other police officials, notably in Detroit and New York, turned to traffic engineering, employing engineers or assigning police officers to newly created traffic engineering bureaus of the police department.

But as accidents and congestion continued to grow, as did public demand for improvement of conditions (almost always directed at the police), some wise administrators saw the need for sounder procedures in investigation, recording, analysis, and assignment of force to permit concentration of specialized enforcement effort. Combined with a slow but certain recognition that public education and traffic engineering were no substitute for adequate traffic law enforcement, favorable enforcement results began to accrue in enough areas to begin the development of a trend.

TRANSITION

By the late twenties and in increasing numbers in the early thirties, where specialized police traffic divisions (or bureaus or departments) had been established, accidents were investigated by trained, selected police, traveling in specially equipped vehicles. Enforcement action against violators involved in accidents became the rule rather than the exception. Reasonably reliable information as to times, places, and proximate causes of accidents was recorded and filed in usable form. Analysis of the accumulated data made possible an effective assignment of traffic personnel by time and place. Some traffic divisions consisted only of administrative staffs responsible for traffic planning, and in their staff capacity supplied traffic data to the uniformed force; but most of the newly created specialized bureaus were centralized line operations.

In 1936 the Traffic Division of the International Association of Chiefs of Police was established. The division was staffed to assist police departments in organizing programs of accident investigation, recording, analysis, and concentration of force—now called selective enforcement. The activities of this organization gave considerable impetus to the improvement of police traffic functions through the establishment or reorganization of specialized police traffic bureaus and co-ordination of police traffic functions with engineering and education.

Resistance to such improvement from within the police service stemmed mainly from reluctance to assign the necessary manpower, provide equipment, and effect organizational and administrative changes with all of the attendant problems, ranging from administrative co-ordination to specialized training. This resistance continues, though to a less degree, despite increasing numbers of fatalities and injuries, business-throttling congestion, soaring insurance rates, and rising public demand—albeit unsound—for the establishment of separate traffic law enforcement agencies.¹

FAVORABLE RESULTS

Cities administering traffic law enforcement through a specialized traffic division have generally enjoyed favorable experiences in terms of safety. This has been brought about without any demonstrable loss in the control of vice and crime. In fact, the officers specially assigned to traffic frequently were and are outstanding in nontraffic criminal apprehension. On the other hand, some cities without specialized traffic divisions have also obtained good results, usually due to outstanding police administrators and exceptionally well trained forces.²

The rise to a rate of 15.9 deaths per hundred million vehicle miles of travel in 1935, and the killing of almost 40,000 people in traffic accidents in the United States in 1941, emphasized the need for positive, concentrated action. Through the forties and to this date, the specialized traffic division has been increasingly adopted as a weapon against this rising problem. Most cities with specialized traffic divisions have continued to reduce their rates and gross losses, and have, in the main, contributed importantly to the reduction in the national death rate to 7.3 deaths per hundred million vehicle miles in 1952.

REDUCTIONS IN DEATH RATE IN CITIES HAVING SPECIALIZED TRAFFIC DIVISIONS

City	Year of Adoption	Death Rate per 10,000 Registered Motor Vehicles
		Year of Adoption	1952
Los Angeles	1941	8.9	4.1
Detroit	1937	6.9	3.1
Atlanta	1938	7.3	4.5

A STAGGERING TASK

The motor vehicle today presents to government one of its most critical and continually expanding problems. While we have become so dependent upon it economically, we have not yet learned how to control the 64 million drivers of 53 million vehicles. This is evidenced by an increasing number of accidents, producing an increasing number of deaths, and an annual economic loss amounting to billions of dollars. Added to this, the vehicle upon which we are so dependent is causing congestion so stifling as to force decentralization of business, with a resultant depreciation of high-value land areas. This, of course, has an adverse effect upon urban tax structures.

The problem does not result entirely from urbanization, since, while congestion is not generally a problem in rural areas, the motor vehicle produces twice as many deaths in rural areas as in urban areas.

To deal with this problem effectively now, city and state governments must provide adequate law enforcement machinery as quickly and as economically as possible.

SPECIALIZATION NEEDED

Few American cities today can successfully deal with the traffic law enforcement problem without the establishment of a full-fledged specialized traffic division, including accident investigation, the recording and analysis of data (desirably in co-ordination with beyond average for cities in their population group and in their area. However, such studies have been made by the director of research and development of the Traffic Institute, Northwestern University. They clearly establish the fact that in most cities with specialized traffic divisions, there have been reductions beyond those of other cities in their respective groups.

a central records system), centralized traffic enforcement patrols, motorized parking and movement supervision, and intersection control functions. Attacking so great a problem through nonspecialized means has generally proved inadequate.

Fundamental to the entire program of traffic safety through specialization is accident investigation, through which causes of traffic accidents are determined, responsibility fixed, and sufficient information gathered to protect the interests of those involved. Traffic law enforcement must base its operation on accident facts, since accident prevention is one of its prime objectives.

For the accident prevention program to be wholly effective, accidents must be investigated in sufficient quantity to provide a broad, stabilized base, and investigated well enough to provide reliable information.

ACCIDENT INVESTIGATORS

Experiments have indicated that substantially more time is usually required for investigations made by the average patrol force than is required by specialized investigators. Further, quality of investigation—and consequently, reliability of data—is usually poor when specially trained personnel are not used, and when supervision is not sufficiently well informed or interested. The real blow to public safety occurs when, after chastisement in court because of lack of investigative thoroughness or inadequate case preparation, the patrol force officer finds no basis for enforcement action in subsequent investigations.

Accident investigators must be trained sufficiently well to enable them to determine proximate causes of accidents and to determine in most cases whether a violation was committed in connection therewith. A measure of the effectiveness of investigation, particularly in those cities showing the best reduction in traffic accidents and congestion, is that evidence to support chargeable violations in court is discovered in 55 out of every 100 cases investigated.

Whenever available evidence and procedural codes permit (and they generally do), the police officer should make the complaint. This will help ensure a trial of the case on its merits, and prevent withdrawal of charges by citizen complainants upon payment of civil damages, or summary dismissals by uninformed judges or prosecutors on the preposterous ground that such cases are purely civil in nature. Withdrawal by the complainant belittles the criminal process and does nothing toward solving the traffic problem. Refusal to pursue such prosecutions on the ground that they are civil cases results in a misplacement of emphasis in the traffic law enforcement program (that is, on the nonaccident violation) and thus reduces the effectiveness of the program.

RECORDS AND ANALYSIS

Next in importance to complete and thorough accident investigation is the recording and statistical compilation of the data returned by the accident investigation officer. Any effective traffic safety program must be based on facts obtained by accident investigators. Traffic engineers must know, factually, what physical inadequacies exist, safety educators must know errors of omission and commission, and traffic law enforcement administrators must know the violations predominant in accidents if they are to use their forces intelligently.

Enforcement officials must determine the percentages of accidents occurring during each hour of the day, and, insofar as possible, assign their total enforcement effort proportionately. Enforcement personnel must be directed to concentrate primary effort on those violations predominant in accidents—at those locations where accidents are occurring. A good accident record system should provide the administrator with sufficient information for such an enforcement selectivity and to check its validity.

CO-ORDINATION A BASIC REQUIREMENT

Establishment of such a specialized traffic division (or detective division, for that matter) must not result in the development of separate operational forces within the department. This can be avoided through clearly enunciated policy and directives,⁴ implemented by supervision and training. There is too often a tendency toward separation of functions—even a disinclination to co-operate. This can and must be overcome.

The tendency toward separation has been abetted in some departments having specialized traffic divisions by the creation of traffic ranks, sometimes under civil service. This deprives the administrator of flexibility of assignment and gives impetus to the tendency toward separation of responsibility and function, increasing the problems of co-ordination. The civil service traffic sergeant, for example, is not strongly inclined to require his men to be alert to nontraffic violations, incidents, or crimes.

Important progress toward better traffic action by the general patrol force has often resulted from the assignment of superior and commanding officers from traffic to supervisory and command positions in patrol. Detroit, for example, has substantially improved the quantity and quality of traffic law enforcement in its precincts since a number of sergeants, lieutenants, and inspectors—precinct commanders—were assigned to general patrol duty from the traffic bureau.

Whether a department has a highly specialized traffic division, or traffic is handled largely by the general patrol force, close and centralized co-ordination of operations is essential to efficiency. This requirement is most pressing now, when most departments are understaffed and the police problem in all its aspects requires the utmost efficiency in the expenditure of time and effort.

There must also be extensive co-ordination of effort between the police and other agencies—official and unofficial—functioning for traffic safety. Such collaboration can do much to make the enforcement effort more effective.

TRAFFIC ENGINEERING

This is particularly true with respect to the traffic engineer. Many departments have adopted the unfortunate attitude—even policy—of isolation from this official whose work relates importantly and intimately to their own traffic responsibilities. While usually somewhat less virulent in those departments which have specialized traffic divisions, this condition may be described as general. In fact, some police departments cannot—or will not—be reconciled to the performance of this function by another department, insisting that the function is theirs, or should be performed under their immediate direction and control.

Traffic engineering belongs in the engineering and public works department of the city government. But the engineering function requires the sympathetic and wholehearted support of the enforcement arm, which can, in turn, through close planning and operational co-ordination on such matters as the design and construction of streets, parking areas, and lighting systems, achieve a considerable lightening of its own responsibilities.

This is not to say that the police should not have engineering assistance in their own administrative and operational planning for enforcement purposes, insofar as needed. But, like legal assistance, it should be extended inter-departmentally—fully co-ordinated for the most efficient employment of the service, with the greatest public good at the lowest cost.

Engineering, traffic or other, is not an essential or even desirable element of the specialized police traffic bureau.

SAFETY EDUCATION

Similar problems of co-ordination prevail in other areas of intragovernmental relationships. Thus, in the matter of safety education, many of our departments have been reluctant to yield leadership in the safety education of children to the schools. In principle, the same arguments which apply to the police-engineer relationship apply here. The police should assist school authorities, co-operating as needed; but the job of safety education, whether in safe walking practices in the elementary schools or driver training in the secondary schools, belongs to the professional teacher.

The school safety patrol should be administered by the school authorities, too. Where the police seek to direct the activity, the usual result is conflict with the school authorities and a poorer result, both from the standpoint of supervision of pupil pedestrians and from that of the citizenship development of the school safety patrolmen.

However, the function of general supervision of traffic and particularly the control of crossings adjacent to schools must remain a police function, whether performed by regular police or civilian guards. Some spasmodic attempts have been made to have responsibility for this function transferred to school authorities. This is usually unworkable administratively. Moreover, most school boards are without legal authority to establish and administer such activities.

PUBLIC INFORMATION

In the area of public safety education (public information) the police have a real interest, for upon public understanding, co-operation, and voluntary compliance depends, in important degree, the success of their enforcement work. The police should offer co-operation and assistance to the safety council, traffic commission, mayor's committee, or other agency supported by the public either through taxes or private subscriptions to carry forward such work. Police co-operation, particularly in supplying basic information on the problem, is necessary to its success.

While the police have sometimes carried the initial responsibility for such programs in the absence of other organizational work in safety education, it is not a primary police responsibility, and should be transferred as quickly and completely as possible. Police participation should be limited to such activities as are legitimately and essentially a part of their own general public relations program, plus such co-operation as is necessary, within reasonable limits, to ensure the success of the public safety education program.

INCREASING DEMANDS

The most critical problem of all is that of manpower. In the face of increasing demands upon police forces to provide adequate supervision of traffic, both for the prevention of accidents and the expedition of movement, including the control of parking, the daily available strength of many of our departments declines steadily. The installation each year of additional thousands of parking meters, useless without police supervision, poses a problem of manpower and its distribution. More intersections require police supervision each year; more enforcement of traffic laws is needed in more areas of our cities as traffic volumes increase almost explosively and spill over into streets and areas which formerly required little traffic supervision. Special services such as the service of warrants, the processing of citations, and court appearances all eat into manpower.

The immediate future promises nothing but great increases in traffic and parallel needs for specialized police supervision. A recent California Highway Department study forecasts a 100 per cent increase in registered motor vehicles in the state in the next twenty years. The estimate is probably low, barring another world war or a major depression. Recognizing the special factors applying to California—migration particularly—indications force us to conclude that the number and use of motor vehicles will continue to increase sharply through the next decade or two. The need for police supervision and enforcement will certainly increase.

MEETING THE DEMANDS

Experience with established and well-directed specialized traffic activities indicates that they are the most productive, most economical means of combating this growing problem, though it is recognized that many specialized traffic divisions are only producing a part of the result one might expect in light of the size of the division, its equipment, and its cost.

In these instances better management is needed, and this requires better-trained administrators. The chief of police in many such cases dares not decentralize and decentralize this responsibility to his precinct commanders, because even a higher administrative skill is demanded to administer a dispersed multipurpose operation. Generally, at the district level of command, managerial resources are much lower. The police have learned the hard way that organizational form is no answer to the need for effective management—that it does not usually solve administrative problems.

Most United States cities, particularly those above 100,000 population, today can best and most quickly meet their traffic enforcement problems through the establishment of a specialized traffic division centrally directed. Only thus can enough trained men, adequately equipped, effectively supervised, with sufficient interest and morale, be welded together as an effective means to provide the badly needed, and in many cases sadly lacking, degree of traffic supervision, and the amount of high-quality enforcement needed.

Some cities, possessed of outstanding police leadership and a high state of police training, morale, and competence, are successfully meeting the problem without specialization. They are, for the most part, smaller cities. The future should bring more and better personnel—both administrative and rank and file. Some of our larger cities may then begin to despecialize without loss of efficiency in this important area of police service.

While bringing the problem under control through such a specialized division, intensive training and indoctrination of the general patrol force should be undertaken, so that it may effectively provide an increasing proportion of traffic enforcement, with corresponding reduction in the motorized traffic enforcement patrol.⁵

⁵ See studies of Worcester, Mass., Police Department, 1952, by Public Administration Service and Traffic Division, International Association of Chiefs of Police.

How rapidly this can be done, and to what ultimate degree, depends upon the quality of the force and its command, the sufficiency of its training, and the coincidence of the demands for other police service and traffic service as to time and place.

Ultimately, particularly in the small and medium-sized cities, even the highly technical function of accident investigation may be performed well by general investigators of the patrol force.⁶ In most jurisdictions, however, this is too much to expect in the foreseeable future.

RURAL SPECIALIZATION

It has not been possible for state police agencies to specialize in the same organizational pattern as have city police departments, because of the fundamental problem of area coverage.

There has been, however, a marked increase in the number of state departments giving specialized staff attention to traffic through headquarters traffic personnel. Further, some departments have established staff specialization in the field at post or district levels—principally because of the growth of the problem and the difficulty of providing sufficiently close staff supervision from general headquarters.

In several states, state police traffic law enforcement activity has not adequately met the public need, and other agencies such as the motor vehicle department have taken on some police traffic law enforcement functions. This reflects the dilemma of those state police administrators who are unable to get adequate enforcement activity with state police personnel and yet, because of the necessity of decentralized operation, are not able to meet the problem through specialization.

by the establishment of an agency separate and distinct from the Pennsylvania State Police—the Pennsylvania Motor Patrol. This was, of course, undesirable specialization, vesting enforcement responsibilities in two separate uniformed police departments of the same state government. The shortcomings of this bifurcated arrangement have long since been recognized, and the entire state enforcement operation is back in the hands of the Pennsylvania State Police.

Many states have sought to solve the problem by creation of state highway patrols. These organizations are frequently limited by law to enforcement of the traffic code on state highways, leaving enforcement of the criminal code mainly in the hands of county enforcement officers.

As desirable as this may be from the standpoint of dealing with the traffic problem, it is generally uneconomical, unwieldy, and inefficient. Most desirable is one rural law enforcement agency (state-wide) with sufficient means to give attention to all aspects of public safety, including traffic.

For example, Texas, through the establishment of a department of public safety, retains most of the advantages of specialization without completely dividing the responsibility for criminal law enforcement and traffic law enforcement between the counties and the state. Thus, the Texas Rangers, a division of the department of public safety, deals with criminal investigation, while the highway patrol deals principally with traffic. The highway patrol, of course, is a specialized traffic unit. Through the department director, a degree of co-ordination is effected that permits full employment of the highway patrol in nontraffic matters, insofar as public necessity requires.

This arrangement provides sufficient specialization to get the traffic job done, and yet sufficient co-ordination to ensure flexibility in the use of the entire field strength of the department to meet the other responsibilities of the department. It seems probable that this pattern is a desirable one, toward which the several states will move increasingly in the future.

Neither the specialized highway patrol giving little or no attention to crime, nor the state police department of the old pattern giving little or no attention to traffic, is desirable from the public's standpoint. Specialization of the urban type is presently impractical except in port areas adjacent to principal cities. The department of public safety pattern seems most suitable, organizationally, administratively, and economically.

EVOLUTION—A POSSIBILITY

In summary, police forces in the United States today are faced with a gigantic traffic supervision problem which, as has been indicated, can be effectively controlled through efficient use of manpower and equipment. The best organizational facility for the accomplishment of this mission is highly trained, specialized forces. Except in a few instances, the general patrol forces are incapable of the function because of lack of training, administrative skill, and competent, interested, supervision. Every effort should be made at once to attack the problem of reducing traffic accidents and congestion through the specialized traffic division, while, at the same time, the general patrol forces and the general administrative personnel are trained to assume an increasing share of this responsibility.

Thus, as administrative and supervisory skills are perfected and training programs of a high order are developed, the following evolution lies in the future:

1. The traffic problem is attacked and brought under control by completely specialized, centralized traffic divisions.

2. The centralized traffic division headquarters undertakes staff responsibility for traffic operations of the uniformed force.

3. Gradually, in larger cities particularly, possibly through traffic precincts, there commences a decentralization of the specialized traffic activity.

4. Simultaneously with the increased responsibility of the patrol force for traffic activity, the traffic force is reduced progressively in the following order: (a) outlying crossing duty is absorbed by general patrol; (b) general patrol assumes a larger share of traffic law enforcement responsibility, including parking enforcement; (c) investigation of less serious accidents is begun by general patrol; (d) general patrol assumes responsibility for the entire traffic law enforcement patrol activity, including parking enforcement; (e) downtown crossing duty is consolidated with general patrol or eliminated through use of engineering devices; (f) general patrol assumes responsibility for investigation of all accidents.

5. During the course of this evolution the command of the traffic division, to an increasing degree, becomes staff to the chief of police, recommending policy and program for issuance by the chief and implementation by general patrol.

Much of this development would be concurrent or overlapping, and the rate of such evolution depends, it is emphasized, upon the administrative competence of the department and the state of training, morale, and discipline of the rank and file and their supervisors. Attempts to force this result by organizational fiat must fail, with disservice to the police, their prestige, and, most important, the public they serve.

The evolution from one process to another must be based on need and tempered by ability. We must face up to the basic requirement—the need to reduce traffic accidents sharply and relieve congestion. This need cannot be met without adequate traffic law enforcement, which is present today in only a minority of our cities and states. Failure to meet this demand will result in traffic chaos, even more shocking loss of life, and a drain upon our economic and industrial strength which even the United States cannot absorb without material reduction in social gains, reduction in living standards, and lessened strength to defend the nation if need be.

Franklin M. Kreml, Evanston, Illinois, has been director of the Traffic Institute of Northwestern University and of the Traffic Division of the International Association of Chiefs of Police since those two organizations were established in 1936. He worked his way through the ranks of the Evanston Police Department to lieutenant commanding traffic, and director of the city's accident prevention bureau. He organized that bureau, the first of its kind in the country. He is author or collaborator of Public Safety (1937), Accident Investigation Manual (1940), Evidence Handbook for Police (1943), Traffic Engineering and the Police (1946), and Judge and Prosecutor in Traffic Court (1951).

Widening the Traffic Enforcement Front

By WILBUR S. SMITH

AS recently as 1920, few police officers were concerned with traffic duties. But development of automotive transportation, great as it was, was destined to attain still higher levels. It is common knowledge that the manufacture, sale, and use of automobiles in this country have occurred at rates that are without parallel in transportation history. Even during the last seven years, registration and travel have increased more than 50 per cent. Since the leveling-off point does not appear to be in sight, automotive traffic has become a major problem in every city and state. People and vehicles make traffic, and both population and vehicle ownership curves are growing at a rapid rate.

THE EXPANDING TRAFFIC CONTROL PROBLEM

The police, as well as practically every other agency of the government, are required to make traffic control a principal part of their work. In just slightly more than a quarter-century, the police have had to expand a relatively minor traffic effort into a major responsibility and activity. Many law enforcement units are today almost solely concerned with traffic. Perhaps as a consequence, accident rates have declined sharply. In 1925 about nineteen deaths occurred for each hundred million vehicle miles of travel. Today, the rate is about seven fatalities per hundred million vehicle miles. Since 1941, when more persons were killed in traffic than in any other year, there has been an annual decrease in the number of traffic deaths, even though highway travel has increased tremendously.

Pressures due to traffic congestion continue to grow. In some large cities, the streets are so clogged that speeds are little better than in the days of the horse-drawn vehicle. Though improvements have been effected, it has not been possible to expedite traffic movement greatly, if at all. Many changes and improvements only serve to accommodate increasing numbers of people and vehicles. New and superior facilities are no sooner created than they become saturated.

When complete physical facilities to handle traffic cannot be afforded, maximum efficiency must be developed from existing facilities. This necessarily implies more stringent control and regulation, and a greater enforcement strength. With every change in the general traffic picture, there must be changes in enforcement activities and plans. All the resources and talents of the police will be needed to cope with the ever growing traffic problem. Police must be capable of great comprehension and flexibility in dealing with traffic problems. They must know much about many things. In most areas they have come close to achieving all that they can through simple day-to-day enforcement efforts, yet these efforts cannot be diminished in the slightest. Our patterns of enforcement need to be re-examined in the light of the new conditions.

When the problem of traffic control became a sizable one, police executives were faced with decisions on how best to enforce existing regulations, how to suggest and plan for new regulations, and how to allocate responsibility for police activity in the traffic law enforcement field. Several methods of organization to discharge these responsibilities were possible. One was to absorb the added traffic duties into the other duties of the police department, using the existing organization. Another was to establish a separate traffic division and place in it responsibility for performance of all traffic duties. A third method, which was briefly adopted in a few states, consisted in turning traffic enforcement over to an agency that was separate and apart from the regular state police setup.

It seems too clear to require discussion here, that traffic duties are a logical and even necessary part of the duly established law enforcement bodies, and that they should not be assigned to a separate agency. Overlapping duties and efforts, inadequacies, and ineffectiveness necessarily develop under separation.

As the automotive transportation problem grew, police naturally began to specialize to cope with it. This pattern has been a common one in handling the organizational structure for other branches of police work, as well as in most areas of public administration. When a new and pressing problem arises, special skills and procedures are developed. Many police departments, therefore, have established specialized divisions and have given them full or partial responsibility for traffic law enforcement. In most cities, particularly in large cities, specialization in traffic is desirable at the staff level. However, in some cases specialization has been carried too far with the result that maximum effectiveness has been lost.

MORE ENFORCEMENT BY BASIC PATROLS

Since traffic has become a major problem of most law enforcement agencies, and is too large to be effectively handled solely as a specialty, it follows that much of the effort of the total force should be directed to traffic work. Traffic law enforcement requires the attention and interest of the entire uniformed force. To achieve this, a logical and simple transition is required. The objective is to develop additional effort on traffic matters without losing the values of staff specialization and without infringing upon other enforcement requirements.

Traffic duties of an operational type, such as point direction and control of traffic, enforcement of traffic regulations, routine accident investigations, and other line activities, should become the concern and responsibility of the entire uniformed force. Better and more general enforcement is provided by this arrangement, and all officers develop a greater sense of responsibility to enforce traffic laws as well as other laws in performance of their assignments. Traffic enforcement problems are usually worse during daylight and early evening hours, when criminal activity is usually at a minimum, so a favorable time separation develops. The plan assumes, of course, that the "average" police officer will receive basic training in traffic matters.

The values of special training and experience are retained in traffic by having a headquarters traffic unit which exercises functional supervision over all traffic activities of the police department. The size of this unit will vary with the size of the city, but in any case it should develop standards, methods, and plans for handling traffic problems, to be administered through established lines of authority.

The principal objective in making traffic line activities the responsibility of all enforcement personnel is to increase the total traffic enforcement effort. Budget and manpower limitations make it impossible for most cities to achieve the optimum enforcement effort in traffic under any other plan. In this way, more efficient use is made of all the department's manpower and equipment, and better enforcement coverage is obtained, than through a separate traffic division. Maximum utilization of the entire force is achieved, with potentials for work in traffic often greatly increased.

Police administrators have also found several other ways of quickly and economically reducing manpower shortages. The values of some of these in broadening traffic activities are becoming widely recognized.

SCHOOL CROSSING GUARDS

There is a heavy demand on the police for personnel to direct traffic at key street locations near schools. The periodic nature of this demand makes it difficult to meet with the regular forces. Morning school openings normally occur during peak traffic hours, so policemen are needed on general traffic duty at the same time that they are needed at schools. The schools are widely scattered geographically, so problems of transportation and travel-time losses develop. Yet the requests and needs for providing maximum protection for children cannot be ignored.

To meet this problem, many cities have assigned school crossing duties to the patrol division rather than to the traffic division. Even with this method, the requirements are difficult to meet without neglecting other police functions.

To relieve the uniformed force from providing protection at school crossings, special school crossing guards may be employed. Such guards are frequently women. Usually they are employed on a part-time basis. In some cities, retired police officers, or elderly persons who are still physically fit, are employed as school guards to work only a few hours in the morning and again in the afternoon. It is customary to give the guards general enforcement powers, but they are not armed, nor are they expected to do more than perform the usual school-child protection duties.

POLICEWOMEN AND CIVILIANS FOR SPECIAL TRAFFIC DUTIES

Favorable reports also are being received on the use of policewomen for the enforcement of nonmoving violations. In some cities, such action is taken to enforce curb parking regulations in the core area of the city—usually the area controlled by parking meters. This procedure proves quite effective in developing better compliance with parking regulations. Because of the limited and short-time nature of the work, women are procured at lower rates of pay than apply to regular police officers.

Increasing problems of traffic congestion also have brought forth the employment of women for other special peak-hour traffic duties. In some instances they are stationed along streets where "all rolling" regulations (no stopping, standing, or parking) are necessary to develop sufficient capacity to meet peak traffic requirements. They are very effective in reducing curb parking and loading violations which would greatly retard traffic flow and reduce street capacity.

Women also are employed by the police department to supervise critical loading and unloading points. In other cases they serve to bring about compliance with pedestrian regulations, particularly where pedestrian actions handicap traffic flow and develop hazards.

In some instances police have been given technical positions which have little connection with day-to-day law enforcement responsibilities. Experience shows that a sizable percentage of the manpower strength can be tied up in connection with the installation, maintenance, and operation of parking meters. In some cases men who have been trained and are qualified to do general police duty are found giving their full time to traffic signals, to signs and markings, or to other practices with which the police are concerned. By having these positions created apart from the regular enforcement strength, it is possible to staff them without using regular police officers.

It seems apparent that one very effective means of relieving traffic enforcement is to use policewomen and specially employed guards for special tasks which do not require the efforts and training of regular police officers.

AIDS IN TRAFFIC ENFORCEMENT

Police also are seeking opportunities to increase their traffic enforcement effort through the use of recently developed devices and scientific aids. The speed meter and the drunkometer are getting widespread acceptance and usage. Popular attitudes which have entered into the concept of "fair play" in traffic are changing. It seems obvious that scientific aids and equipment should be just as available in the enforcement of traffic laws as in the enforcement of criminal laws.

Electronic scales capable of weighing vehicles in motion, central control indicators for parking meters, and other such devices can have a profound influence on police manpower requirements to accomplish a given level of enforcement.

Fortunately for the police, the early obstacles are disappearing, so increasing use can be made of such devices.

For many years traffic signals have been timed in most cities for progressive speeds along a given traffic artery. The principal purpose was to achieve minimum delay and maximum speed. Now this principle is being applied in some instances on high-speed roads solely for speed control purposes. It has not yet been proved that such an approach to speed control is realistic or effective. On the other hand, it is obvious that a successful method of controlling speeds through signals or other devices would greatly relieve the manpower requirements of police. Nor should considerations of economy be overlooked. If necessary, substantial investments in equipment can be capitalized with the savings in police salaries. When methods are found for aiding in traffic law enforcement, they also make available manpower and equipment for the performance of duties that are not now undertaken.

Improved traffic control devices, and new applications in the use of the devices, promise to provide important additional relief for police. Sometimes a very simple thing such as retiming a traffic signal will release one or more officers for several hours each day for other traffic or police work.

All parts of our country are familiar with the tendency to enact regulations which are viewed as unreasonable by the motoring public. Modernization of traffic laws, keeping them in step with changing conditions and attitudes, could be one of the greatest aids to police in broadening their traffic activities. It also would enable them to command greater respect and co-operation from the public, not only in traffic but in all police efforts.

CO-ORDINATING POLICE AND OTHER TRAFFIC ACTIVITIES

The modern traffic task involves governmental agencies other than the police. Activities of these agencies must be co-ordinated with those of the police if objectives are to be reached. Traffic engineers and police must work in the closest harmony in order that a satisfactory traffic program can be developed. Mutual satisfaction in their collaboration can come about through sympathetic understanding on the part of chief executives of each department. Such understanding can be maintained only by close working relations carried on day after day through duly designated liaison agents. Each department must learn what the other can do for it in achieving city-wide traffic actions.

Other public activities with which the police should maintain close working relations include street construction and maintenance, sanitation, state highway work, public utilities, and special areas in which there are major traffic considerations.

New businesses that attract large numbers of motor vehicles are placing increased demands on the police. A new retail store, an automatic auto laundry, a shopping center, a drive-in theater, a curb-service restaurant, and many other types of private activities are causing problems of traffic congestion and hazard requiring the assignment of police officers during large parts of the average day.

In some cities these special problems are handled by private police officers, or by regular officers on their hours of off-duty from the city. In this way the expense is borne exclusively by the groups that are directly benefited, and avoidable inroads are not made into the manpower and equipment of the public police agency.

Police can be given important relief if city planning and construction officials will anticipate the problems that are likely to develop and will insist on designs and locations that will minimize or altogether obviate these problems before they come into being.

THE ADMINISTRATIVE BASIS

The administrator must constantly measure and evaluate the quality of movement and accidents. Measures and procedures for greater effectiveness in police work can then be devised. Since all needs probably will never be met, the administrator must carefully evaluate each in terms of the others, and give proper priority assignments. An objective study of needs is the best way to develop the support needed to continue and expand police activities in traffic. Assignment of manpower and equipment on the basis of factual data is a safe administrative approach.

Supervising the Juvenile Delinquent

By JANE E. RINCK

ANY specialized police approach to the juvenile problem is necessarily limited to the small minority of American forces enjoying a numerical strength that is sufficient to staff and support the operation. Such devices prove far beyond the resources of the vast majority of police establishments, which must deal with all offenders through their general, unspecialized personnel. That in itself implies no inferiority as to either methods or results, since experience shows that results obtained through mere inauguration of a so-called specialized unit can fall far short of those secured through more general means.

In practically all major cities and in some small communities, police have established special bureaus for the purpose of dealing with the problem of juvenile delinquency. These special bureaus are relatively new; most have been established within the last twenty years. The activities of the juvenile bureaus differ widely from city to city. Activities include sponsorship and administration of recreation programs, organization of neighborhood councils, patrol of areas that harbor juvenile offenders, guarding school crossings, extensive casework advice and counseling, referral to other social agencies, community education through public speaking programs, use of volunteer counselors, "gang workers" to tame street gangs, and search for missing persons.

No one bureau does all of these things. In fact, considerable disagreement may be found as to the activities that are most valuable and those that should not be performed at all. Some bureaus, for example, never patrol; others rely mainly on patrol. Some carry on extensive recreation programs; others make no attempt to conduct such programs.

In addition to these special bureaus, which generally emphasize a sociological approach to prevent delinquency, some large police departments have youth squads attached to detective bureaus. The squads deal with young offenders in a manner more in line with usual police methods. They tend to deal with young criminals, whereas juvenile bureaus tend to deal with children who have not advanced so far on the road to crime. Differences in the methods employed by the two units can be a source of trouble, and the allocation of cases correspondingly hard to make.

CONFUSING FEATURES

The very words "juvenile delinquent" cause confusion. They now serve as a large receptacle into which all kinds of young human problems are tossed at random; problems of case-hardened junior criminals, of high-spirited offenders who will never do it again and who never do, and of small children who persist in running away. In addition, a special category has been devised called the "predelinquent," for children who will probably turn delinquent unless somebody does something. What the "something" is may also be debatable. Furthermore, since no one wants to tack an unfavorable label on a child, much double talk has been indulged in to avoid the use of precise definitions to describe a child's misdeeds or problems.

To compound the difficulty, various agencies and private individuals struggle with this problem. The result is that the identical misbehavior which would be subject to official action and official recording in one part of a city may be settled by private individuals or families in another part of the city, with no records to assist and guide later investigations. Even in the same neighborhood, differences arise according to the person or agency that happens to be concerned about the child. Private agencies or public departments of welfare may carry some cases which are indistinguishable from those carried by probation officers. Some school principals are exceedingly defensive concerning the reputations of their schools, and so settle or attempt to settle major difficulties in their own offices. Juvenile courts add to the hazy picture by handling some cases on an unofficial basis. Hence it is very difficult to count heads or to measure the success or failure of a given type of program in curbing or preventing delinquency.

Police have the task of holding a course though buffeted by confused seas and shifting winds. It need scarcely be emphasized that cities vary, that counties and towns may have quite different problems. Fortunately, not all of the problems arise in one place. Yet, despite many differences, some general truths for the operation of police programs for supervising juvenile delinquents seem to be emerging.

THE ROLE OF THE POLICE

Police should enforce the law. If police do not do it, no one else will. If the police department turns into just one more social agency, the community and its children have lost a valuable asset. No one wants police to be rough with children or ignorant of what little has been learned about delinquency. On the contrary, police should know more about delinquency than any other organization in the community.

When police concentrate on doing a good job of law enforcement for children as well as adults, they help to set a standard of acceptable conduct that becomes both vivid and helpful to children. This means stopping children who are violating laws, taking them home when it is apparent that they are getting into trouble. Day and night, endlessly, police need to explain the law and the trouble that comes through its violation. Children need this kind of curbstone schooling.

A program for law enforcement for children includes three main duties: (1) thorough patrol, (2) intelligent use of social and other agencies to aid individual children, and (3) police leadership in community planning for delinquency control.

PATROL AS A FOUNDATION FOR A JUVENILE PROGRAM

In those cities with specialized juvenile bureaus, the staff often is comparatively small; therefore patrol has to be somewhat selective. Special attention is usually given to such trouble spots as bus terminals, railway stations, all-night movies, parks, and hotels. When patrol duty is performed during school hours, it is likely to duplicate work of attendance officers; therefore it is a less rewarding use of time. Delinquent acts increase when school lets out, and finally taper off at dawn. Saturdays and Sundays also bring extra opportunities for trouble. A nine-to-five schedule, five days a week, does not meet problems when they are still urgent. As with other police patrol, the juvenile patrol must be round the clock, with emphasis on the leisure and night hours.

Some bureaus attempt to get along without performing any patrol duty, and depend upon referrals from other branches of the force. This cannot provide adequate coverage, since other branches are usually tied up with traffic control or investigations of adult offenses. No matter how willing the regular patrol force may be to interest itself in children, members cannot take time to visit licensed premises, cannot leave their beats, and are not always free to escort children home.

Juvenile officers are not usually assigned to particular patrol sectors. Each one tries to cover the whole city or a very large section of it. Often an officer will cover a different section each night. No juvenile officer has a territory of his own for which he is definitely responsible. Hence he has no opportunity to become fully acquainted with people who can give him leads about where trouble may lie. No amount of spot maps or statistics can substitute for the knowledge of a district that comes only with long association. Other branches of police service rely heavily on this kind of localized knowledge. Juvenile bureaus should be so organized that they can assign a particular officer to a particular area.

As a valuable by-product, localized patrol can help to keep the juvenile bureau staff in close working association with the rest of the force. A staff that sits it out in a warm downtown office is readily forgotten, and if not forgotten, may earn some disfavor. Patrol work keeps the bureau personnel in touch with the regular stream of police work, and with the youth squads in particular. Patrol work can break up easily developed unprofessional habits of dealing only with nice children.

REFERRALS TO OTHER AGENCIES

A major police function of most juvenile work is to refer children who have been picked up on patrol to the agency or organization best able to help the child. This should entail a brief study by the officer of the child's situation and a reasonably rapid decision as to what should be done. The emphasis of most bureaus is placed not on arrest and prosecution, but rather on the adjustment of a child's problems so that he may become a happy and useful member of society. Not all cases are referred. The majority seem to be simple matters handled in a single interview. Experience indicates that most cases involve only one offense, or at most two offenses of minor significance. But when real trouble is brewing, other social agencies are called in. Most juvenile bureaus use the social service exchange in order to learn what other agencies may be acquainted with the child or his family.

On the surface, this seems like a simple matter; but it is not. In establishing a referral service, the police department is immediately and inextricably involved in all the problems which confront social workers, in all the difficulties arising from gaps in welfare services, the shortcomings of juvenile courts, and the tribulations of social agencies.

Of all these problems, the one which is most baffling is the refusal of some private social agencies to accept cases referred by police unless the child or his parent physically appears at the agency and verbally and specifically asks for advice and counseling service. Many private agencies do not go out into the field, but rather write letters assigning time for an office interview. Rarely can children meet such conditions, particularly delinquent children. Private social agencies justify their policies by citing limitations of funds and staff. They do not want to be so burdened with following up people who have not asked for help that they have to refuse help to those who ask for it. However, they secure their funds through heartwarming appeals which do not jibe with such laissez faire policies. Some modification of policies should be possible more nearly to meet the broad responsibilities of a community agency.

Public welfare departments, no less than private social agencies, have established working methods that do not always help a child who has gotten into trouble. Public welfare agencies have been preoccupied with the granting of public assistance and the intricacies of investigation of need. Public child welfare agencies have tended to concentrate time on children who need placement outside their own homes. Children who happen to need such service may receive a great deal of careful consideration, understanding, and thorough medical care. The unfortunate child who is delinquent but who remains at home receives little if any attention from the public agency. Whether or not a child receives help from a public child welfare agency is therefore largely accidental and without any rational basis.

The textbook idea of a juvenile court as a place where a child receives the attention of experts is sometimes a reality, but often only partially true. At its worst, the court has become a placement agency for state institutions and is called upon only when such placement is needed. The quality of the institutions thereafter determines the value of the court. If the juvenile courts were all that they should be, many problems might be more easily solved. At present, some police go to considerable lengths to bypass the juvenile courts. A high-quality probation service could lift much of the burden now carried by police.

Schools

A plan for true collaboration between the schools and the police is essential. A child's world centers around the school, and when the child fails in school or quits too early with no developed skills to assist in the transition, police and the social agencies can never quite patch up gaps that appear. Police can sometimes find out about a child's trouble even before the school authorities, for some children apparently get along well in school but are in serious trouble outside of school hours. Minor adjustments of school program and extra attention by the teacher may help.

Some schools have rather elaborate guidance services, with staffs of psychiatrists, psychologists, and trained visiting teachers. Some guidance services will accept referrals only through classroom teachers, and so are not readily available to police. That policy does not take into account the total needs of the child, and may exclude the very children most in need of expert help. Thus, rigid intake policies go a long way toward destroying co-operation among the various government services. Even though guidance services are short of staff in some communities, selection of cases should be governed by the needs of the child rather than the source of the referral.

The regular staff of a school system can be a great source of help. Many school principals are alert to the problems of their neighborhoods and are well able to give intelligent and useful guidance to their students. Some teachers are leaders of the community and have an unmatched interest in the well-being of their pupils. Police can easily find these people and enlist their support.

Complicating factors

The relative strength or weakness of community agencies is only one aspect of the problem of referral. Police must also contend with other problems. Of no small import is the prejudice against police officers among social workers. The concepts of law and order, restraint and punishment, do not fit neatly into the psychological theories which form the basis of casework treatment.

Unfortunately, in this matter it has become necessary to state and restate the obvious; that ours is a government of law; that laws were passed with serious intent; that laws must be administered and applied with equality. We do not have one set of laws for clients of social agencies and another for the rest of our citizens. The two professions of police and social work alike are bound to comply with the provisions of law. Neither has any choice. This being the case, the two professions might just as well resolve their differences and each strive to appreciate the other's unique contributions to social living. Social workers do not want to be robbed or murdered; police do not want to clap little children into jail.

A further problem in referral is this: sometimes no one knows what to do. All the caseworkers, police officers, psychiatrists, teachers, and others cannot help. Everyone does his best and we still lose. By a frank acknowledgment of the fact that we still have not found all the solutions, we can keep the way open for further explorations. The professional insistence that it knows all the answers can obstruct us all in getting results.

POLICE SHOULD NOT BE PROBATION OFFICERS

Where police have found that large gaps in services for children greatly hampered their efforts to prevent delinquency, they have developed programs of continuous supervision, a case-work treatment service comparable to that of social agencies or probation departments. Programs of this kind include weekly or biweekly visits by police officers to children's homes, many conferences with parents, study of children's background to learn the sources of trouble, employment placement, and use of medical and psychiatric services.

In spite of laudable motives, continuous supervision of this kind constitutes a misuse of police authority. Though most officers are not uniformed when doing this work, police authority is present whatever the informality or disguise. Police enter homes and extract a measure of co-operation when social agencies cannot. Parents of delinquent or near-delinquent children are likely to consider themselves in no position to protest: the alternative may be institutional placement for their children. Some may not realize that they have a right to ask the officer to leave, so their ignorance is exploited.

Continuous supervision of parents by police would be intolerable. It is no less so for children. The police department may call it "social treatment in an authoritarian setting," but it is nothing more or less than probation without adjudication. It is a violation of our system of justice.

It is not recommended here that children needing supervision should be abandoned by government services. Far from it. Police also need a few days to investigate and determine whether or not a child needs referral, and if so, where he should be referred. However, the public funds now used to pay for police "probation" work should be re-allocated into regular probationary channels. In regular probationary work, authority is exerted openly, the police are not set up as judges, and children are not denied their right to treatment with a scrupulous regard for their substantial rights.

POLICE CAN LEAD SOME PARTS OF COMMUNITY PLANNING

Of all the governmental or private organizations in a community, the police department is the one that should know the most about juvenile delinquency and the effectiveness with which the problem is being handled. A well-informed police administrator can know exactly where his trouble spots lie, at what hours, with what age groups of children. He can know which social agencies are able to work in this field, and which ones cannot. He can know very readily and exactly what facilities are lacking to meet precise needs. Furthermore, he can make some very accurate predictions of the fate of many unfortunate children known to his department.

All too often this information does not get out into the daylight where it can be of some use. People doing community planning underestimate the perceptiveness of the police department. For its part, the police department does not publicize its information so that it can be understood by those who are less well informed. Information that is pulled together in some form can help to direct the efforts of the well-intentioned and ever present committees on juvenile delinquency. Information can shape a specific program and cut down aimless generalizations about the horrors of modern youth. Police can, with little trouble, show a need for service for children aged 10 to 14 years at the corner of X Street and Y Avenue at 7:00 P.M.

The police could use the same information to pull together many different governmental services to help clean up particularly troublesome areas. A glance at a spot map of residences of delinquent children will reveal that there are clusters of spots in particular neighborhoods. Within an entire area that is well seeded with delinquency, some streets will be much worse than others, with troubles piling up in well-defined centers. A regular drive on these clusters by all agencies of government—public welfare, sanitation, housing, health, school attendance officers, and others—might serve to clean them up. Such areas need more than run-of-the-mill service. They need direct and coordinated action.

Concentrated attention is also needed for the small minority of children known to be growing up into full-fledged criminals. Police, as well as anyone else, can distinguish between the casual, happy-go-lucky lawbreakers and the children who are in serious difficulty. The latter are now filed away alphabetically with casual offenders. Their records grow longer and longer. One after another the social workers take a turn, and finally give up and close the case. The police never really close their case. All the people who have struggled to help the particular child never or only rarely get together to compare notes, to lay out a plan, to review what they have done, or to analyze why they have failed. With the present lack of coordination, communities are doomed to repeat mistakes. If the city has no effective council of social agencies to call case consultations, this task could fall to the police. Regardless of the auspices, it should be done.

PROVIDING RECREATION IS NOT A TASK FOR POLICE

In their earnest desire to halt juvenile delinquency, many police departments have initiated recreation programs for children. Such programs are intended to do double duty by creating public good will towards police. Police do not want to be considered tough thief catchers, and the recreation program probably gives them some affirmative publicity from time to time. But as they actually work out, police recreation programs are obsessed by many delusions. A police force that does its job efficiently, courteously, and with high professional standards will receive freely all the public good will that it thus earns. It will have no need to prove that "police are human" by conducting police softball tournaments or soapbox derbies, or by teaching boxing. If the department is not doing a good job of promoting public safety, the public will not be fooled by games with children. If it is doing a good job, it does not need the publicity.

Other departments of government should be able to conduct recreation programs better than police. Recreation is a full-time, lifetime profession with many men and women. Its techniques have no relation to the kinds of skills taught in police academies. Public recreation programs can be full of color and variety, can appeal to all ages, can make use of city-owned facilities. The know-how of an experienced, qualified recreation leader can bring into being city-wide programs almost by magic, certainly with professional ease. Such people can avoid many of the problems that arise in controlling large programs.

The inadequacy of some public and private recreation programs is cited by police as a reason for police sponsorship. Even though true, the problem is not properly solved by setting up a new, duplicating, and perhaps competing program in the police department. Recreation will always be an auxiliary function, outside the main purpose of the police task. Recreation policies are inevitably guided by higher police officers who, also inevitably, are amateurs in organized recreation.

In some communities, police collect or sponsor the collection of funds to support the recreation program. When police collect and handle such funds, public misunderstanding is certain to arise. Police are able to collect money from private sources when other privately sponsored recreation fails. The plain fact is that many people will not refuse a policeman. Even though no one intends extortion, the objective manifestations are identical. The worthiness of the cause is no excuse. Police should not collect money for any purpose, from anyone, under any circumstances.

Those who work with children who already are well along the road to delinquency and adult crime express considerable doubt as to the effectiveness of recreational programs in helping these children. Such children will not participate; or if they do, they break the place up. Many private agencies definitely do not welcome hefty and destructive adolescents. Cure through referral to a recreation center is not automatic. The child must be fitted into a suitable group and must be accepted by the group. The recreation leader has to make a special effort to help. When delinquency arises from serious personality disorders, it may be quite unreasonable to expect a child to fit in at all.

In any event, a recreation program that is founded on the negative idea of preventing trouble is founded on a distorted conception. Most children are not delinquent and never will be, even in the worst of our slum areas. The majority of children are reasonably well behaved, have a healthy interest in sports, and enjoy lawful fun. If the community provides well for these children, plenty of room will be left to handle the small minority of delinquents. It is not a part of the police job to provide recreation for all.

The positive interest of police in working with groups of children should, however, be preserved and cultivated. On an off-duty basis, away from official sponsorship, much good can be done. As in police probation work, abandonment of needed recreation programs is not suggested, but rather a transfer to other auspices.

THE JUVENILE BUREAU IS NO BETTER THAN ITS PERSONNEL

The effectiveness of the juvenile program is determined in large measure by methods of personnel selection, training, and supervision. It is not practical to pin a new title on a man or woman and expect a qualified performance that fits the title. Nor can the police administrator rely solely on fixed educational qualifications or the results of intelligence tests to make his selection for him. Some units have tried both, and the results are not good.

Usually a basic qualification for a male juvenile officer is membership on the force. Two or three years of experience are often required. He must have proved himself a reliable officer who can be called for other duty in an emergency.

Since women cannot be recruited from within the force, other qualifications are needed. The day of the hard-boiled police matron has passed, and nothing should be allowed to recall it. Matrons are still needed, but should not be confused with women police officers. College education and some work experience are usable minimum requirements. Since women also do detective work, their adaptability for this service must be considered. Stringent physical requirements are necessary to ensure that a woman can stand the wear and tear of patrol duty. Basic training along with men recruits is essential.

Juvenile officers, both men and women, must have a genuine liking for children. This qualification is so obvious that sometimes it is overlooked. It is a quality that can be observed readily, and its absence is a categorical imperative for removal to other duty. Other personal qualifications of tact, judgment, and mental balance are required for all police work, and in equal measure in juvenile bureau work.

Training and supervision

Juvenile officers need training beyond regular police work. Some departments have developed their own training courses, some depend wholly on supervisory conferences to train, and some have sponsored the pursuit of advanced degrees at schools of social work. Training should help to develop skillful interviewers and bring some understanding of children and the reasons why they get into trouble. Training can give the officer something to work with, tools that are more useful than monotonous warnings to be "good."

Training has to include precise information regarding the social agencies in the community and the state. In small communities this is not a great chore, but in larger cities the list of available agencies may be very long. These agencies are the tools of the trade, and the juvenile officer must know not only the avowed policies of the agencies, but also their actual working policies. The better the officer knows the agency staff, the more likely he is to receive good service.

Furthermore, the officer can develop unofficial contacts that can be useful for individual children. Some church workers can be of great help. Most areas have leading citizens who in effect act as guardians for certain children in the neighborhood. These people can be discovered if sought; it may be the postman, the keeper of a drug-store, the editor of the neighborhood newspaper, or a housewife with an exceptionally warm and understanding heart.

Despite good training, personnel will not be effective without supervision. In new units, sergeants, lieutenants, and captains who may be able supervisors of regular police services can find themselves somewhat baffled by the problem of supervising a unit with functions that are not clearly defined. As a result, the atmosphere of a soft berth can develop, disguised however as a noble purpose, and trimmed with academic degrees.

The supervisor has to know what he wants. If it is patrol work, are his people patrolling, shopping, in the movies, or at home? Where do they go? Where does he want them to go? If it is referrals, are they referring all the cases to one or two agencies? Do most of the referrals bounce back? Are decisions made, or do cases dangle? Does the staff follow his policy, or is each man and woman his own mentor? Are the records in order? What is the staff doing with children and with children's problems?

Promotion

The juvenile bureau will not be a good place to work unless some provision is made for promotion, either within the bureau or to other departments of the force. A large bureau may provide satisfactory promotion within the four corners of juvenile work. In such instances some preference should be given to those who have experience and special training in the bureau and its work. If this is not done, the fieldworkers will always know more than the supervisors—an unwholesome situation. Small bureaus of two or three persons cannot provide such opportunities, and so promotions must be made to other branches of the force. If the bureau demands extra training and stiff standards of performance, additional salary opportunities should be part of a promotion system.

The time has long since passed for expressions of pride in our methods of tackling the problem of delinquency. Adult crime furnishes tragic proof of the fact that what is being done is by no means the answer. Police are newcomers in the field of juvenile delinquency. They have started out in every direction at once. But they have a fresh zeal that should be welcomed; and they do not give up easily.

Toward a Better Merit System

By O. W. WILSON

SOUND personnel management operates on the merit principle that to the best-qualified goes the job—not to the victor belong the spoils. The purpose of this paper is to examine the objectives of sound police-personnel administration, to catalogue policies that will assure their achievement, to review procedures that will effectively implement the policies, and to consider how their implementation may be assured. The last point is the most important, because policy statements are nothing more than the expression of pious hopes until they are placed in effect. Responsibility for their implementation, therefore, must be placed on some person or agency that can be held accountable for the results.

The success of any organization is so strongly influenced by the wisdom of its personnel policies and the effectiveness of their administration that this categorical statement may be emphatically made: Personnel administration is the most fundamental and important task of the head of any organization. Whenever this administrative theorem is ignored, the objective of the organization is jeopardized.

The influence of personnel administration on organization success varies in proportion to the number, the complexity, and the rarity of the virtues and qualities that are requisite to the superior performance of the tasks involved. It varies also in proportion to the need for inspiration, direction, and control of the members of the organization. For example, a ditchdigger with a strong back and a willingness to work may dig a good ditch even though he is mentally, morally, and emotionally deficient and temperamentally unsuited to work with people. Also, he does not need great inspiration, direction, and control to perform this relatively simple task. On the other hand, work that entails dealing with people under trying circumstances, sometimes with emotionally disturbed persons in legally complicated situations, requires qualities of a much higher order, as well as a more inspired direction, detailed supervision, and effective control of the workers.

POLICE SERVICE DEPENDS ON PERSONNEL MANAGEMENT

In police work the wisdom of personnel policies and the effectiveness of their implementation exert a greater influence on the quality of service and success in achieving the objective than in any other field of endeavor. The importance of personnel management in police service results from the fact that the qualities and virtues essential to successful performance of police tasks are more numerous and less frequently found combined in one individual than the essential characteristics of successful practitioners in other fields. The following paragraphs make this fact apparent.

The nature of police service imposes unusual demands on the individual policeman; he must consequently excel in intellectual, emotional, ethical, and physical qualities if he is to be successful.

Police officers deal with extremely complicated situations and often with unusually intelligent malefactors. To do so requires resourcefulness, alertness, decisiveness, knowledge, and sound judgment; these are all attributes of intelligence. To assure success, all policemen must have above-average intelligence.

Police are frequently confronted with emotion-charged situations that may evoke strong responses from them. Important to success in dealing with such situations is a stability impervious to work-related or other emotional stresses and unhampered by prejudice or undesirable attitudes. Emotional stability in the officer also assures dependability and success in getting along with people under trying circumstances. His emotional qualities likewise influence his enthusiasm, will-to-do, and interest in his work.

The nature of police service affords unusual opportunities and temptations to graft, to indulge in other forms of dishonesty, immorality, and excesses, and to wreak vengeance on persons who have offended. Successful police service is predicated on the integrity, morality, and fairness of its members.

Policemen must also excel in physical qualities. Body fitness is essential to withstand the rigors of police service and to avoid early disability retirement and loss of time due to illness—both of them heavy drains on the public exchequer. Appearance is important in winning compliance with requests and orders intended to control individuals and crowds. Speed, agility, co-ordination, and strength are important assets in overtaking a fleeing culprit and in overcoming resistance. Voice, bearing, courage, and energy are all obviously important characteristics that assist in dealing with human situations.

The total personality of the policeman, composed of the above-mentioned characteristics, is also important. It will reflect his attitudes, prejudices, and feelings; it will influence his ability to get along with others, to accept responsibility and blame, to give credit, and to be sympathetic to the unfortunate

The qualities essential to effective performance by subordinates are even more important characteristics for police leaders. Superiority in these traits assures the ability of officers in supervisory and command positions to win the confidence, inspire the loyalty, and maintain the enthusiastic interest of their men. It also enables these officers to delegate authority and to support their subordinates. The essence of leadership is the ability to obtain the highest quality of service that each member has the capacity to render. Under good leadership the harmonious and effective effort of all members is directed in maximum degree toward the accomplishment of the police purpose. The achievement of the police objective, therefore, clearly depends on superior qualities of leadership.

Most authorities agree that the American police have not demonstrated their full potential in crime prevention and that their services are not entirely satisfactory. Since police success is influenced so strongly by personnel management, it seems logical to blame police failures, at least partially, on improper personnel policies and on weaknesses in the implementation of good policies.

OBJECTIVE OF PERSONNEL ADMINISTRATION

The objective of personnel management in any organization is to assure maximum benefits through superior service. The goal in the administration of police personnel, then, is to assist in the accomplishment of the basic police purpose. To achieve this end, competent personnel must be recruited and prepared to perform essential tasks; they must be inspired, directed, controlled, and disciplined; and their welfare must be assured.

While the welfare of personnel is an important and integral part of its management, this aspect of administration must not be considered more important than the fundamental objective of providing superior police service. A philosophy of personnel administration that subordinates the basic objective of superior service to any other consideration is unsound and must be uprooted.

POLICIES IN PERSONNEL MANAGEMENT

In order to achieve this personnel-administration objective of superior service, personnel policies need to be clearly stated and consistently adhered to. Unfortunately, some personnel agencies concede the wisdom of the policies but fail to implement them, either because they do not know how or because they are influenced not to do so. The following policy statements are pertinent:

1. The best-qualified man—the one who excels in the previously mentioned qualities—must invariably be selected for appointment. He must be chosen without regard to residence or other extraneous consideration, and youth must be given preference. The fact that candidates have no vested right in a police job must be recognized in order to forestall deviation from this policy.

2. The best-qualified man must invariably be selected for promotion. He is the one who excels in present and potential qualities of leadership.

3. The promotion of talented leaders must be accelerated. Leadership qualities should not be wasted and stultified by years of repression in subordinate service. Seniority must be given no greater consideration in promotion than bears on the ability to lead.

4. Recruit, continuation, and special training must be provided, as well as instruction for superior officers in techniques related to their supervisory and command tasks.

5. Compliance with departmental regulations and procedures must be exacted continuously and consistently from subordinates by their superiors. There must be no interference with routine disciplinary requirements.

6. The service provided by each member must be continuously evaluated by suitable criteria of performance.

7. Incompetent, indifferent, dishonest, immoral, and otherwise unqualified members must be removed from the service. Recruit training must be recognized as an instrument of appraisal to discover the unqualified appointee. Thorough appraisal must be continued during the entire probationary period; the unqualified must be dismissed before its expiration.

8. Any doubt as to qualifications for appointment, promotion, or continuation in service must be resolved in favor of the department, not in favor of the individual.

9. A disciplinary board composed of members of the department should be created to review the facts in serious offenses where the suspension, demotion, or dismissal of a member may be considered, to make further investigation when necessary, and to recommend suitable action to the chief. A disciplinary board relieves the chief of some of the onus of disciplinary action, and it also diminishes the likelihood of capricious or hasty action.

10. A grievance committee should also be created to afford a wholesome vent for the pent-up feelings of the more timid and a suitable channel for the spleen of the chronic malcontent, and to bolster sagging morale by considering complaints of members, initiating action against unsatisfactory conditions, and discovering and dealing with morale-destroying influences. Action by the committee should be taken only through the chief.

11. The welfare of the officers must be considered in terms of adequate pay and pensions and suitable weekly, annual, sick, and other leaves of absence.

PERSONNEL-POLICY IMPLEMENTATION PROCEDURES

A detailed description of procedures to implement personnel policies will not be undertaken. Instead, the discussion will be restricted, for the most part, to the manner in which common failures may be avoided and to devices that will assist in the accomplishment of the purpose of the policy.

In the past, attention has been given almost exclusively to body fitness in judging the competence of a candidate to perform police duties. The importance of physical qualities is recognized, and high standards must be rigidly imposed. This additional fact, however, must also be recognized: In police service, intellectual, emotional, and ethical qualities are more important than physical ones.

Intellectual qualities

The intelligence of a candidate can be measured with reasonable accuracy by validated general intelligence tests. Some progressive departments have used them for more than twenty years. The superior service thus provided has clearly demonstrated the wisdom of including such devices for screening out less competent candidates.

Some jurisdictions have enacted laws that specify that police candidates may be examined only on "practical" subjects in order to prevent the use of intelligence tests. Other jurisdictions have laws that state that the candidate must be able to read and write, and some civil service agencies have interpreted them to mean that no higher educational requirement can be imposed.

Such laws and their restrictive interpretations have resulted from the influence of friends and relatives and the pressure of persons who would be barred from police service by the use of intelligence tests. Some police and fire associations have actively campaigned against the use of such tests for the same reasons, and also because some of their members resent the fact that they themselves might have been rejected had such tests been applied.

Laws and regulations that have the effect of preventing the accurate measurement of the intelligence of a candidate for police service must be repealed. Chiefs of police must insist that the intelligence of all candidates shall be measured by validated intelligence tests or their equivalent. When an examination is used that is considered the equivalent of an intelligence test, the chief must require that its equivalence be demonstrated. The appointment of any with below-average intelligence must invariably be avoided; a higher level of performance is assured when appointment is restricted to those having an intelligence quotient of more than 112, as measured by a validated standard group general intelligence test.

In addition to the measurement of native intelligence, the intellectual attainments of the candidate should be appraised to assure a wide fund of knowledge and ability in written and verbal expression; these are especially important assets in police service. The extent of formal education is considered a simple and reasonably accurate measure of intellectual attainment. Since the majority of young people are now legally required to complete their high school education, if the better-than-average rule is to be applied, a minimum standard of some college education must be established.

Since pre-employment training is not widespread, candidates should not be tested as to their knowledge of law, police techniques and procedures, or street locations in the community.

Emotional qualities

The appraisal of the emotional qualities of candidates requires the services of a qualified psychiatrist. An adequate examination by him may reveal emotional conditions that should bar the candidate from police service. Failure to include psychiatric tests in the selection procedure raises the possibility of appointing those who are psychopathic, neurotic, paranoid, sadistic, or otherwise emotionally or temperamentally unsuited for police service. Such persons are serious liabilities; to give them guns and authority is to court disaster. Their emotional deficiencies may be manifested in the future by behavior that may range in seriousness from a mild inability to get along with others to sadistic brutality, rape, murder, and other forms of serious misconduct. Only by psychiatric examination can there be assurance that emotionally unqualified persons are excluded from police service.

Ethical and other personal qualities

Ethical qualities are evidenced by past behavior. A thorough investigation must be made of the character and the childhood and adult history of each candidate. The investigation should be conducted by the police themselves; no other agency is so well qualified to do this work. Relatives, friends, neighbors, associates, former employers and teachers, fellow workers, and fellow students should be interviewed to obtain pertinent information. The candidate's fingerprints should be submitted to the Federal Bureau of Investigation and to state bureaus of identification in each state and to the police of each community in which he has lived.

In addition to seeking information that may enable an evaluation of ethical qualities, the investigation should seek facts that may assist in an appraisal of the personality and social adaptability of the candidate. Diligent search should be made for information relating to conduct that may indicate emotional instability, attitudes or prejudices that might interfere with successful police performance, or other undesirable emotional reactions.

Judicious appraisal must be made of the information thus obtained. The policy of resolving doubts in favor of the department should be adhered to.

The complete appraisal of the candidate requires that he be examined as to appearance, alertness, and ability to express himself verbally, his social adaptability to his interview situation, and his reason for wishing to enter the service. This evaluation must be made in a face-to-face situation, and can best be accomplished by an oral examining board. The board, however, should be restricted to an appraisal of personal qualities that cannot be evaluated in a better way; it should not undertake to appraise intellectual, emotional, ethical, and physical characteristics that may be judged more accurately by other tests. It may, however, supplement the personality and social-adaptability appraisal that is based on facts discovered by the character investigation.

Promotion

The principal weakness in selections for promotion consists of basing them almost entirely on tests of knowledge, to the neglect of more fundamental qualities of leadership. Written tests of knowledge are favored by personnel technicians and frequently by the police themselves, because these tests are objective and simple to administer and score. Their use minimizes charges of favoritism and lessens the opportunity to promote dishonestly a less informed person. The appraisal of more fundamental qualities of leadership, on the other hand, is difficult; the evaluation is subjective, and the personalities of both the appraiser and the subordinate are likely to influence the judgment. Such evaluations are subject to charges of favoritism, and provide opportunity for unjustified advancement of undeserving persons.

The selection of persons for promotion on the basis of their knowledge to the exclusion of more fundamental qualities of leadership is evidence of lack of courage in personnel administration. In spite of difficulties and risks, selections for promotion must be based on a fair appraisal of leadership qualities; talented leaders will otherwise not be advanced to key positions.

A basic objective in personnel management should be the rapid advancement of persons possessing leadership talent into positions of ever increasing responsibility. Seniority by itself should be given no consideration; if experience has developed leadership ability, promotion should be based on it—not on the number of years of service.

Discipline

The police force must be well disciplined. This means only that its members must be required to conform to department regulations and procedures. This is a task of leadership. The ability of superior officers to win compliance from their subordinates is increased through training in supervisory techniques; the ability of the subordinate to comply is likewise affected by his own training.

Winning compliance may involve disciplinary measures in some instances. Supervisory officers should have authority, with the consent of their immediate superior, to impose punishment in the form of less desirable assignment within the command. Delinquencies that may justify more drastic disciplinary action should be referred through approved channels to a disciplinary board which should review the facts and recommend action to the chief.

Dismissal

The removal of incompetents from police service is as important as the recruitment of the best man; while improved selection techniques lessen the likelihood of unwise appointments, the only conclusive test of a man's fitness is trial on the job. The most perfect selection procedure is subject to human error; men may be selected who will later demonstrate their incompetence while at work.

Implementation of a sound removal policy is more difficult than assuring the appointment of the best-qualified, because the appointee has now a vested interest in his job; he has assumed obligations in the purchase of uniform and equipment; he has resigned his previous position and is relying on police work to support himself and his family. Consideration must be given to the effect of his removal on his personality and on his future usefulness as a citizen. Under these circumstances, his removal cannot be undertaken lightly; to remove him capriciously would be a moral wrong.

To this moral obligation there must be added other forces that array themselves against his removal. Persons in both public and private employment promote the development of protective devices to strengthen their own security. Dismissal of anyone is considered by them to be evidence of a weakness that jeopardizes their own tenure. Their case is strengthened by the memory of the political spoils system that made impossible the development of a professional career in public service. Some citizens are of the belief that it is better to protect the incompetent in his job than to grant an authority to dismiss that may permit a return of the spoils system. And from the point of view of a weak administrator, dismissal is an unpleasant task that is accompanied by so much protest and recrimination as to make it scarcely worth while.

Dismissal of the incompetent requires three steps: first, the discovery of the suspected incompetent; second, analysis of facts that will enable a wise decision as to his competency; and third, the act of removal. Justice to the individual as well as to the service demands that his incompetency be discovered and acted on as soon as possible; his financial obligations based on his appointment are thus cut short; he is away from more suitable employment for a shorter time; the shock to his personality is not so pronounced; and finally, police prestige is less jeopardized. These reasons urge the discovery of the incompetent during recruit training, or certainly no later than the end of his probationary period; complications that arise in later dismissals add weight to this point.

The unfitness of the policeman is quite apparent when he commits aggressive acts of brutality, steals, rapes, gets drunk in public places, or is guilty of other acts that come to public and official attention. Not so easily discovered, however, is the man who through indifference and laziness fails to perform an effective service, although by doing nothing at all he avoids being guilty of an aggressive breach of discipline. His detection rests on supervisory techniques and on a rating system and measures of accomplishment that will fairly compare the quality of his service with that of his fellow officers.

Criteria of performance should be established to identify the most and least competent. The former may be considered for promotion and special assignment; the latter for closer supervision and special instruction, and, should these measures fail to effect an improvement, for eventual dismissal.

To raise the quality of service to its highest potential requires the invariable dismissal of incompetent policemen, an action that requires moral courage not found in all administrators. This does not mean that members should be dismissed hastily, without just cause. On the contrary, it means that sound judgments must be made that are based on an expert appraisal of qualities essential to police service and of the ability of the officer to meet these requirements. Otherwise these decisions are likely to be unsound.

And finally, the dismissal must be effected. No influence must be permitted to prevent the removal of the incompetent policeman. Unfortunately, it is in this step that police administrators are most frequently thwarted. The previously mentioned influences have created such formidable machinery to protect the job security of the individual policeman, and the forces in his favor are so powerful, as to render many police chiefs well-nigh powerless to effect their purpose. Under these circumstances, who is to be held responsible for the quality of police service?

AUTHORITY FOR PERSONNEL MANAGEMENT

The management of personnel was once accepted as an essential part of administration. The police head, sometimes with the approval of the chief executive of the city, exercised exclusive control over the members of his organization. Authority to manage police personnel has remained the prerogative of management in some jurisdictions, while in others it has been vested in an independent civil service agency.

However, the concept that management of personnel rests exclusively in one or the other is not completely true. Under civil service the police may be given some right to train, assign, instruct, supervise, rate, reprimand, and initiate disciplinary action against their members. This is accomplished with the acquiescence of the members; the police chief has no real authority in his own right to require compliance. The police are usually permitted to choose from the top three on the eligible list for appointment and promotion, although in some jurisdictions they are restricted to the top man. Aside from these concessions, authority to make decisions relating to the management of personnel rests with civil service.

Before the development of modern principles of personnel and police administration, the authority of police chiefs was sometimes abused by the dismissal of members of a force at each change of political administration. The spoils system prevented the development of professional careers and superior service. Although civil service was created to prevent such unjustifiable dismissals, it had, from its inception, the authority to implement other personnel policies through the use of modern procedures and techniques.

Those interested in the improvement of police service are confronted with the question: In whom may authority to manage police personnel be placed with the greatest assurance that there will also be accountability for the effective application of wise policies and procedures? The answer involves the choice of leaving police personnel management as an integral task of administration or vesting it in civil service.

In considering the answer to this vital question, it must be recognized that the task of applying policies and procedures has two phases: first, fact gathering and comparative appraisals, and second, final decisions based on the facts.

The services of skilled and honest technicians are needed for the first; they must be able and willing to use validated techniques and procedures to accomplish their purpose. Once these facts are assembled and evaluated, wise decisions relating to them require expert police judgment. Norms must be established: what qualities are essential in police work? Decisions must be made in many doubtful cases: is the conduct or characteristic evidence of unfitness for either appointment or continuation in service? Sound judgment and wise action are also dependent on the ability to resist personal sympathy and external influences that urge compassion and favorable consideration in violation of sound policy.

In studying the question of where to place authority to manage police personnel, consideration will be restricted to the decision-making tasks, since they are obviously the more important. While many decisions must be made in the management of personnel, those relating to appointment, promotion, discipline, and dismissal are the principal ones at issue.

Proponents of civil service seem to reason that mere candidacy for a job gives the applicant a vested interest in it; that once appointed, his job security should be rigorously safeguarded; that the employing agency is likely to commit acts injurious to its members; and that public interest in superior service is more certainly met by vesting control over appointment, promotion, discipline, and dismissal in an independent agency than by leaving this power in the hands of the employing agency.

Poor results under civil service

The quality of service provided by civil service agencies varies from good to bad. Poor service may be the result of restrictions imposed by law; of unsound policies formulated by uninformed, ignorant, or misinformed board members; or of failure to use modern techniques. The following attendant evils unduly hamper the police chief in achieving his objective.

The best-qualified man is not invariably made available for appointment or promotion. This results in part from a failure of the civil service agency to adopt suitable standards, and in part from a failure to appraise or to permit the appraisal of less easily measured intangible personal qualities such as character and personality. In their eagerness to prevent favoritism they rule out the appraisal of all qualities that are not susceptible of exact measurement. For example, the character requirement is sometimes restricted to absence of felony conviction; less serious conduct which may, nevertheless, indicate unsuitability for service is then ignored. In consequence of these failures, eligible lists are sometimes headed by men who are completely unsuited for police service or lacking in essential leadership qualities. And the police chief usually has no choice but to make appointments and promotions that he knows are unwise.

Punishment and dismissal under civil service are not undertaken in many instances where such action is desirable. This results from the unwillingness of the police chief to undertake the long-drawn-out and red-taped procedure that frequently is more nearly a trial of him than of his delinquent subordinate. When punishment is meted out, its measure is influenced by the personal background and feelings of the board members, and consequently in nearly all instances it is too lenient. Their lack of intimate knowledge of police work renders them unqualified to establish sound behavior standards for policemen. For example, it is not uncommon for civil service boards to deal more leniently with a policeman who has stolen than would the criminal court. Evil, of course, results from his return to police service, which frequently happens. Civil service machinery usually serves to protect the unqualified policeman rather than to assure his removal.

Authority entails responsibility

Finally, civil service robs the police chief of his most vital tool—the management of his personnel. In this way there is violation of an important administrative principle: every delegation of authority must be accompanied by a commensurate placing of responsibility. Civil service boards have tremendous authority, but they are not held accountable for the use they make of it.

The public ordinarily think that the chief is responsible for the quality of police service they receive. Since the quality is so completely dependent on personnel management, the chief cannot be held responsible for shortcomings in police service unless he exercises control over his personnel. Principal responsibility for shortcomings in police service rests on civil service in communities that have placed the police under its control. The civil service board, however, would be quick to deny such responsibility.

Value and role of civil service

These remarks must not lead to the conclusion that the contributions of civil service have all been negative. Civil service has been valuable insofar as it has assured the application of superior personnel policies and procedures in backward police forces that would not otherwise have adopted them, and insofar as it has prevented the operation of the spoils system in departments that otherwise would have dismissed members capriciously.

But not all departments have needed civil service to attain these same ends. For example, the Federal Bureau of Investigation and the Detroit Police Department operate without civil service, as do other leading police forces. These forces have demonstrated by the superiority of their service that they are competent to manage their own personnel. Their personnel policies and procedures are considered in some respects and on general balance to be superior to the best under civil service.

The management of his personnel must be vested in the chief of police so that he may be empowered to improve the quality of police service and be held responsible for police failures and shortcomings. The competent professional police chief may be safely entrusted with this essential authority; he understands the relationship between superior service and wise personnel management.

In order to forestall abuse by an incompetent chief, civil service should serve as an auditing agency to assure that superior policies and procedures are adopted and that disciplinary power is not used capriciously. Its authority, however, should be restricted to informing the public and the chief's superior of any failure to apply sound and progressive personnel policies and procedures, and of any unwise disciplinary acts. Civil service should also be given the responsibility to demand that the appointing authority remove a chief of police who clearly thus demonstrates his incompetence.

O. W. Wilson, Berkeley, California, is dean of the School of Criminology, University of California. He has been chief of police in two cities, has conducted a number of police surveys, was a colonel in the corps of military police during World War II, and is author of three books on police administration.

Operation of a Police Merit System

By ROBERT A. LOTHIAN

IN many American cities, large and small, the recruitment and discipline of police is conducted by local or state civil service commissions. Placing responsibility for such important personnel activities apart from the police force directly concerned creates serious problems not only for internal relationships within the department but also in the quality of the police service rendered to the community. The inconsistency in having a law enforcement agency that is responsible for protecting the lives and property of persons within a specific area but is not responsible for the selection and complete control of its personnel has become so apparent that police leaders are demanding that steps be taken to give them administrative control over police personnel policies.

That police departments are capable of performing their own personnel functions has been demonstrated repeatedly. The manner in which such a merit system functions is illustrated by the procedures adopted by the Detroit Police Department. Until the present system was set up, its personnel practices had fluctuated greatly from year to year. But beginning with 1939 a marked improvement occurred, which since has been enlarged from time to time.

In the spring of 1941 a new charter amendment was submitted to and approved by the voters of Detroit. The procedures for recruiting and promotion established during the two years immediately preceding were continued and fortified. The major difference is that complete control for the personnel activities—recruiting, promotion, and retirement—is now vested in the police commissioner. An appeal board, composed of the deputy commissioner of police, the president of the civil service commission, and the corporation counsel of the city, does not establish policies or procedures but does have "the right of review" over the requirements and results of any and all examinations for patrolman or policewoman on sufficient cause shown; also for promotions to and including the rank of lieutenant or its present equivalent; and "the right of review" over all retirements of police officers where it shall appear that the retirement is not made in good faith or for the good of the service. As a result of this right of review, the police commissioner must follow recognized personnel procedures which conform with the merit principle.

MINIMUM ENTRANCE REQUIREMENTS

Age limits

The age limits for entrance at the present time are 21 to 27 years inclusive. There is general agreement that the minimum age level should be 21 years provided that thorough investigation is made to determine that a recruit at this comparatively young age possesses sufficient maturity to perform the difficult duties of a police officer, and further, that he is well trained and later assigned with a well-qualified and mature fellow officer for a considerable period of time under strict supervision. By thoroughly investigating an applicant's work record, school record, home environment, and reputation in the community, valuable data can be gathered with which to judge his maturity.

If the minimum age level is placed above 21 years, too long a time elapses between the average applicant's completion of high school and the time when he becomes eligible for appointment. Police work requires men of mature years in order to assure discretion, sound judgment, and settled habits, but it appears that these can be better acquired and directed under discipline in the police service than before entering the service. Young men are much more flexible than older ones, have not yet established habits of doing things their own way, and may be molded by proper training and supervision into excellent police officers.

A low minimum age level is also an important factor in reducing turnover. Young men who have not already established themselves in a trade or occupation are less likely than others to leave the department during periods of economic prosperity. They can also be expected to fulfill their maximum work span, and during their later work years still be able to perform rigorous duties while on the job.

Establishment of a maximum age level has been the subject of much controversy. It is believed that a maximum of 27 years is desirable because, first, if an applicant has not established a life work by the time he has reached that age it is often an indication that he will never become well established in any line of work. Second, at this higher age level most candidates will have developed definite ideas of their own, and as a result will be difficult to train and discipline. Third, the relation of maximum induction age to the retirement age is important from the standpoint of the ability of the officer to perform regular duties in the later years of his career, and also to relieve the pension system.

High school education

The educational requirement is graduation from an accredited high school or a Veteran's Diploma secured after having passed the General Education Development Test.¹ Education approximating the level of a high school graduate is an absolute necessity for the satisfactory performance of police work both in the lower and in the advanced ranks. Written examinations, which Detroit applicants are required to pass before police induction, are designed to test intelligence rather than knowledge. It is therefore necessary to establish some standard of acceptable educational attainment even though there is an absence of uniformity between different high schools and between different geographical areas.

Police officers need much of the knowledge acquired through a high school education to perform adequately the wide variety of duties. Interviews with complainants in the enforcement of traffic laws and city ordinances require a good command of the English language and clear and coherent expression. Increased reliance on information recorded in reports obviously requires ability to write in a logical, clear, and concise manner. The social attitude and outlook toward the community developed in high school courses in government, sociology, economics, civics, and history also are essential qualifications for a police officer.

With the educational opportunity available at this time, it is reasonable to assume that the average person has had a chance to attain a high school education. Except in rare cases, the very fact that a police applicant has not completed high school is an indication of his lack of initiative, ability, or personal judgment.

Residence

Nearly all civil service commissions restrict applicants to residents of the city. Some agencies point out that this is an advantage because such applicants have a knowledge of the geography of the area; also, they are familiar with the people and will be easy to investigate. Others believe that the hometown boys are entitled to the job.

None of these contentions appear valid in light of the policy of selecting officers on a state-wide and even a nation-wide basis. Knowledge of the city in terms of the location of important buildings, transportation lines, industrial concerns, and other locations is readily acquired in the Police Academy. A personal acquaintance with people in the area is often a disadvantage because it increases the difficulty of enforcing the law in a strictly impartial and objective manner. As for the difficulty encountered in the character investigation, excellent co-operation can be secured through outstate sheriffs' departments and the state police to form the basis for a sound investigation.

For these reasons the Detroit police merit system extends eligibility to residents of the state of Michigan for one year prior to the date of examination.

Height and weight requirements

Minimum height is five feet, eight inches; minimum weight is 148 pounds. There is some disagreement as to exactly what the minimum height should be, but it is generally agreed that under no circumstances should it be less than 5'8" and preferably it should be higher. Regardless of how much change there has been in the nature of police duties in recent years, emergency situations still arise where a good big man is much more effective than a good little man. A taller man presents a better appearance in uniform and can be much more easily seen in a crowd or when directing traffic. Weight should correspond with height in accordance with the scales established by most large insurance companies. However, the police medical division should be given discretion in accepting applicants who vary from such standards because of body build and bone structure.

RECRUITING CAMPAIGNS

In recruiting efforts a complete examination announcement is developed, including the examination date and location, vacancies, subjects and weights, passing percentage, duties, and complete entrance qualifications. This form of announcement is necessary to meet statutory requirements, and it provides the department with a publicized specification of the type of applicant who is acceptable. It is somewhat comparable to a specification which would be used by the city in accepting bids from commercial concerns for paint, paper, or automobiles.

This specification is published in the official paper of the city and posted on the bulletin boards at the city hall and the police department. Some civil service agencies restrict their advertising to this type of announcement, although it is not a good method of attracting qualified applicants.

Methods which have been used with success to encourage qualified young men to apply are as follows:

1. Local newspaper advertisements.—Advertisements in the classified section of local newspapers have been used extensively with success, particularly during periods of unemployment. Greater success has been attained when these advertisements have been inserted on Sunday and Wednesday than on other days of the week.

2. Local newspaper stories.—Feature stories of local police activities, usually accompanied by a series of pictures, prove to be a successful method of developing interest in the police department. Short articles describe the various steps in the training of police recruits; problems which confront an officer during a typical working day; and various police activities showing the opportunity for specialists in the department, such as traffic, scientific laboratory, medical division, and photography.

3. Radio and television programs.—Local merchants and industrial concerns will normally co-operate in sponsoring announcements of the need for police personnel. Interviews with police officers have proved successful. Slide films showing various activities of police work have been used on television at the time of a station break.

4. Bulletin board notices.—Attractive notices may be placed on bulletin boards in local schools, libraries, and other public buildings. The usual examination announcement is not suitable for this type of advertising. It should be revised and only the most pertinent information included.

Other methods used with some degree of success include articles and feature stories in the smaller local community papers and in other cities throughout the state; billboard advertisements sponsored through the co-operation of local industries and business concerns; announcements over public address systems at large public gatherings; and the encouragement of members of the department to interest their friends and relatives who meet the qualifications.

To determine the effectiveness of the various methods of advertising, it is advisable at frequent intervals to have each applicant, at the time of filing his application, check the source of information which resulted in his interest in becoming a police officer.

PRELIMINARY APPLICATIONS

at any time. Written examinations are conducted every two weeks, so that there is not a long waiting period, and further, so that each group examined is small enough to be processed in a comparatively short time.

Preliminary applications are accepted daily on a form that is short and easily completed. It contains information relative to traits which are observable. This provides the basis for rejection at the initial interview. The application form usually adopted by both private and public employment is cumbersome and involved, requiring answers to numerous questions many of which are of little value at this point in the selection process. A detailed application is a necessary step and should be completed at a point in the procedure where it is definite that the information submitted will be used in arriving at a judgment of the applicant's qualifications for the position.

After determining that an applicant is basically qualified, the usual procedure in most civil service agencies is merely to inform him to make certain that he reports at the time and location for the written examination. Those who ask further questions are sometimes referred to the uninformative specification description of the job classification. This is contrary to good personnel practice. Applicants are entitled at this time to be informed as to the type of examinations which they will be required to pass, the successive steps in the selection process, the amount of time for completion, and a detailed description of the duties and working conditions. A pamphlet should be made available to them at this point covering all these factors.

WRITTEN EXAMINATIONS

dates who will be likely to succeed in police work is that as yet no reliable criterion has been found to measure success on the job. It is not very difficult to cite the desirable traits which a good officer should possess, but it is difficult to measure such traits. This arises principally from the fact that success in police work results from many intangible factors, some of which are the exercise of good judgment; clear decision in extreme emergencies; the influence of physical presence and personal effectiveness in preventing crime; initiative; and courtesy.

Few types of police work are readily susceptible to any type of quantitative measurement. A recent study shows that there is little correlation between success on induction examinations and the number of meritorious awards or demerits. Likewise there appears to be little relationship between turnover and results on induction examinations.

In default of a more scientific reason, the induction examination is chosen for the purpose of determining whether candidates who have a high school education possess sufficient mental capacity and alertness to absorb the material which is disseminated in police training classes and later to carry out the required duties.

The written examinations now used consist of a battery of tests which include a recognized standard intelligence test and at least four other sections developed by the Detroit Police Department. One of eight alternative intelligence tests is used, along with at least four sections chosen from the following subjects:

1. Reading Ability
2. Observation—Crime Scene
3. Memory for Names and Faces
4. Report Writing
5. Memory for Oral Selection
6. Memory for Reading Selection
7. Understanding Written Directions

8. Understanding Oral Directions
9. Arithmetical Reasoning
10. Spelling
11. Vocabulary

By using one of the intelligence tests along with any four of the above eleven supplementary sections, an applicant who takes the examination on different occasions is always confronted by a different battery. It has been found that persons interested in securing employment in the public service will make every effort to prepare themselves for the written examination. They study intelligence tests that are available in most public libraries, they confer with other applicants who have taken the examination, and in some instances they enroll in correspondence courses to assist them in passing.

All examinations consist of short-answer questions that are adaptable for scoring on International Business Machine answer sheets. Complete anonymity is maintained throughout the scoring process, as each paper is identified by number only. Each section is weighted individually and statistical methods used so that the distribution of the scores does not affect the assigned weights. A passing mark is established on each examination on the basis of an intelligence quotient of 100 on the standardized intelligence test, and acceptable scores, based on past experience, on the other sections of the battery.

PHYSICAL AGILITY TEST

Police work demands men who possess not only intelligence and good health but also physical agility and coordination. In some agencies it is assumed that if applicants meet specific height and weight requirements and pass a medical examination, they are physically qualified to perform the duties of a police officer. This is an erroneous assumption. Because police work does require physical agility and co-ordination, it should be measured on some phase of the recruiting process on a qualifying and not a competitive basis.

The present standards in the Detroit Police Department are rope climb 6 feet, 6 pull-ups, 12 push-ups, and a broad jump of 6'6". These standards were developed after experimenting with a wide variety of physical tests used in various jurisdictions. They included lifting dumbbells, rope climb, pole vault, standing broad jump, 50-yard dash, push-ups, chinning, scaling a barrier, baseball throw, and carrying weights. It was found that there was a high correlation among all the various tests, and after a process of elimination the events were reduced to the six now in use. Neither gymnasium shoes nor athletic suits are required for applicants to participate in any of these events.

No attempt has been made to score the results on this test in any other way than on a strict pass-or-fail basis. Prior to the time the physical agility test was used, every class seemed to include at least three or four candidates who lacked sufficient co-ordination and strength to perform the work given in the gymnasium. These candidates required special attention absorbing valuable time of the instructors. In some instances there was a undesirable effect on the incompetent individual, in that he was made a scapegoat not only in the gymnasium but in the classroom also. Considerable improvement has been noted since the adoption of this test.

MEDICAL EXAMINATION

A thorough medical examination is conducted by the regular physicians assigned to the police medical division, for candidates who have passed the written and physical agility tests. Some cities conduct a medical examination before the written test. This is entirely the wrong sequence, because the paper-and-pencil test is by far the most simple and economical filter to eliminate unqualified candidates.

Responsibility for the medical examination should be that of the doctors of the police medical division. This places the responsibility for selecting physically qualified candidates in the hands of the same doctors who are responsible for the physical welfare of all members of the department. Greater care is therefore exercised in the initial examination.

The experience gained by regular police doctors in observing physical ailments which result in light duty assignments or retirement has proved invaluable in determining candidates who are definite physical risks. The medical phase of the selection process is designed to obtain recruits who possess physical qualifications necessary to withstand the rigors of police routine over a period of at least twenty-five years. Police work places a severe strain on an individual. Changing shifts, irregular sleeping habits, and absence of physical exercise have a tendency to break down men much more rapidly than other types of employment.

To make certain that all recruits are examined under the same uniform standards, a complete specification of physical requirements should be developed.

Too much cannot be said for the necessity for maintaining rigid medical induction standards. In 1948 a study was completed by Dr. Wilfred C. Wood covering the experience of the Detroit Police Medical Division in examining recruits over the previous seventeen-year period. A comparison was made between the period 1920-30 when officers were selected in a haphazard manner and the period 1930-48 when rigid physical standards were maintained. This study showed:

1. During the period 1920-30, 42 per cent of the officers appointed either quit or were dismissed, and 5.6 per cent died. During the period 1930-48, only 13 per cent quit or were dismissed, and 1 per cent died.

2. Of the group selected in 1920-30, 479 officers were retired on a disability pension, whereas in the 1930-48 period, only 19 were retired because of disability. Of these 19, 12 were retired for service-connected injuries over which the Medical Division had no control, leaving only 7 retired on non-service-connected disability.

3. The average number of days per man lost because of sick leave each year is only 4.3.

CHARACTER INVESTIGATION

An important phase of the selection process consists of a thorough investigation, by trained personnel, of the character, the work and academic record, the home environment, and the personal habits of applicants. The objective is to forecast the future success of each applicant by evaluating his conduct in the past.

Some departments and agencies conduct these investigations in a casual and ineffective manner. Some conduct the major portion by telephone, and others assign the task to the precinct commander nearest the applicant's home for investigation by ranking officers who very often are not competent to perform the duty.

This function should be entrusted only to fully qualified and trained investigators who possess such desirable traits as aggressiveness, initiative, intelligence, and pleasing appearance. The mere selection of investigating officers who are well qualified is not sufficient to ensure good investigations. They must be thoroughly trained in the techniques of investigation.

In order that the facts obtained through the investigation may be recorded in an orderly manner, printed forms are provided to cover the findings concerning residence, education, work record, personal conduct, social status, financial standing, references, and military service.

In the investigation of residence, it is advisable to check all the places the applicant has lived for at least the past ten years. If the applicant is renting, a check is made with his landlord to determine how much rent he pays, whether he pays his rent regularly, and the condition in which he keeps the property. If he is buying, a check is made as to the general condition of the home, the amount of his monthly payments, and whether he meets those payments regularly. Particular attention is directed toward observing the cleanliness and manner in which the home is maintained. The presence or absence of a congenial atmosphere, the furnishings, the applicant's attitude toward his wife, children, or parents, all are important factors.

In investigating the applicant's scholastic record, a personal call is made to the grade school, the high school, and the college, if necessary. The principal, the counselor, and in some instances individual teachers are contacted. The record of scholastic credits and dates of completion of specific grades are necessary but not so important as information concerning his conduct, citizenship, attitudes, and punctuality. Information should be gathered as to the degree of his participation in extracurricular activities, his ability to get along with other students, and his qualities of leadership.

Every place where the applicant has worked should be described in chronological order, including type of employment, salary, nature of duties, and recommendations. If there is any reason to believe that the records of the employer are inadequate, the immediate supervisor should be contacted if possible. If there is any question as to the applicant's birth date or education, these can be cross checked by closely examining the records at each place of employment.

Personal conduct and home life

The section covering personal conduct is included so that the investigator does not omit facts which are merely routine. These include a check of the applicant's criminal record and traffic record, verification of birth certification, marriage license, registration for selective service, and clubs or organizations of which he is a member.

The section covering social status is designed to determine whether or not the candidate has a well-adjusted home life. The duties and working conditions of a police officer are explained to the wife or parents to learn their attitude toward the applicant's becoming a member of the department. Insight into the applicant's character and personal habits can be gained by observing conditions in the home. Information is also secured about the applicant's mother, father, brothers, and sisters. It is of value to know where they live; where they work, if employed; their police record; and history of any unusual diseases or serious illnesses.

It is imperative definitely to establish that a police officer is able to maintain a reasonably high standard of living on the salary he receives from the department. He must be able to withstand constant pressure from persons or groups who profit by operating outside the law. The manner in which an applicant has managed his financial affairs in the past is an indication of what he might be expected to do in the future on a police officer's salary. It is because of these factors that the applicant's financial status must be completely analyzed.

Each applicant is asked to furnish the names of six persons as character references. These reference forms should be delivered personally by the investigator and an attempt made to explain the importance of the request. More significance should be attached to confidential reports by references not given by the applicant, including businessmen near the applicant's home, fellow workers, neighbors, and landlords.

MEASURING RESULTS

The question may well be asked, Does the present system of recruiting and promotion of personnel for and within the department result in the selection of better-qualified officers? By utilizing every effort to attract qualified applicants—the preliminary sifting to eliminate the obviously unfit, the filtering of the remainder through written and medical examinations, physical agility test, character investigation, and oral interview—it would appear that better police officers would be selected.

To arrive at a definite conclusion, criteria for measuring success on the job have to be developed. Unfortunately this has proved to be a very difficult and discouraging task. Criteria which have been studied for possible use in correlation with induction and promotional examinations are as follows:

1. Number of merits or demerits.—It would appear that the officer who had accumulated a large number of merits for performing outstanding police work and had received no demerits for the infraction of departmental rules and regulations would be a superior type officer. This is not always the case. The ability to accumulate merits is often due to the opportunity made available for an officer to perform police work. Throughout the years there has not been a uniform policy for the issuance of merits or demerits. The reluctance on the part of superior officers toward accepting requests for meritorious awards also fluctuates.

2. Work record.—This criterion is not adaptable to police work because the opportunity for creating a quantitative record on arrest, ordinance complaints, court cases, and other phases is not equally available to every officer. Oftentimes the efficiency is more correctly measured by the absence of what might appear to be an outstanding record.

3. Tenure.—The fact that an officer remains with the department for a long period of time would seem to imply that he was capable. The reluctance of disciplinary boards to discharge men except for major offenses, the failure to enforce disciplinary action for incompetency, the desire of officers to serve twenty-five years to collect their pension, and the absence of methods to measure efficiency, all contribute to discounting longevity of service as a criterion of efficiency.

4. Service ratings.—Service ratings have not as yet been developed to a point where they can be used as a measure of efficiency.

Indications of success

The following may be cited purely from a subjective viewpoint as being indicative of the success of the Police Merit System.

(a) Appeal board activities.—Even though every recruit who is rejected for appointment and every officer who is unsuccessful in securing a position on an eligible register for promotion knows that he may take his case to the appeal board, only five cases have been heard by this board since 1941. In 1945 there was one appeal on a service rating for promotion and another on the results of an oral interview, and in both instances the appeal was denied. In 1947 there was one on a written examination and one on service rating. The latter was upheld. In 1949 one applicant appealed on the ground that he was discriminated against in the minimum qualifications established for a promotional examination. This also was denied. There never has been an appeal of any phase of the recruiting process. The convening of the appeal board on so few occasions would indicate that police commissioners and other personnel who are charged with administering this system have followed accepted merit principles.

(b) Newspaper support.—There has been practically no newspaper criticism of the methods used in selecting and promoting police officers. Instead, the newspapers have given complete co-operation in assisting the recruiting program and in defending the methods of promotion.

(c) Co-operation of members of the community.—The success of the traffic enforcement program and the Crime Prevention Bureau has been due to a large extent to the co-operation received from business and industry in this community. The caliber of the officers heading these programs has had a great deal to do with their success. The phenomenal success of the Police Field Day, which is conducted to provide funds for insurance, also is indicative that the department has excellent public support. In 1941 the people were asked to vote on a more liberal pension system for police. It was approved by a two-thirds majority.

(d) Absence of political influence.—Politicians have learned that because of the rigid charter requirements and the methods followed in administering the system, the police department is not the place to exert any political influence. Not only do politicians refrain from making requests, but also recruits and candidates for promotion have learned that it is to their disadvantage rather than advantage to seek outside political influence.

(e) Support by departmental organizations.—There are two organizations within the department, one the patrolmen's association and the other the sergeants' and lieutenants' organization. Neither of these organizations is affiliated with any union. On occasions when the merit system has been criticized, both of these organizations have come to its support.

(f) Interest of other police officials.—The department has frequent visitors from other police agencies both in this and foreign countries. All have shown a marked interest in the personnel practices followed. For example, the Detroit service rating system now being used in one of the largest cities in Japan is a result of a study made by representatives from that country.

Robert A. Lothian, Detroit, Michigan, is personnel examiner for the Detroit Police Department. He has been in charge of the recruiting and promotion of police officers in Detroit since 1941. He formerly served as a high school teacher in government and history at Port Huron and Yale high schools in Michigan.

The Police Cadet

By ROBERT S. SEARES

THE police service has long been at a disadvantage in competing for the services of able and ambitious young men at the time they first become available for regular career employment. For many, this is at 18 or 19 years of age, while the police minimum is about 21. As a result, many excellent police prospects are lost because they go into business or industry and become so well adjusted there that they are not inclined to start over again at the bottom of the police ladder. Too often those who do come seeking the permanency and the security of police service at a much later date are the misfits and rejects who find it difficult to adjust to any employment situation. The elimination of this type of person, both before and after appointment, is a costly and often painful process.

The police cadet plan, now well established in England, has attracted the attention of American police administrators as a possible solution. The plan has been introduced in at least one large city, Milwaukee, and is under serious consideration in several others, including Detroit and New York.

HOW THE PLAN WORKS

The plan is simple and is susceptible of many variations. In essence it provides for a new classification known as "cadet," or "aide," which is below the rank of patrolman. This position is open to young men who, except for age, appear to meet the basic requirements for appointment to the force. Cadets do not have police authority. They are assigned to duties normally performed by non-sworn employees. Assignments are rotated in order that the cadets may learn through experience and in order that their performance in various work situations may be evaluated. Through in-service training, both on duty and off duty, they are prepared for their ultimate police responsibilities. Finally, upon completion of the prescribed period of time in cadet status and upon reaching the police minimum entrance age, they are considered for appointment to police rank.

The plan does not guarantee that every cadet will become a policeman. Only those cadets who give indication of probable success in police status are retained. Neither does the plan contemplate that all future police appointments shall be made from the cadet ranks. It is doubtful that any plan can or should attempt to supply enough candidates to supplant general recruiting. Any such narrow approach would exclude good prospects who in their mid-twenties decide to seek admittance to the police service, and would discourage many high school graduates from continuing on to college in preparation for a police career. But police cadets can provide a new and valuable source for improved police recruiting that seeks its candidates wherever they may be found.

ENGLISH EXPERIENCE

The police cadet idea appears to have originated quietly in England about 1935. It appeared first in Lincolnshire and has since extended to many other departments, including the Metropolitan Police of London. The most ambitious undertaking, however, is that of Liverpool, where approximately forty cadets are continuously in training. The West Riding (Yorkshire) force has enrolled female cadets who are in training for appointment as policewomen.

Under the British educational system, a natural breaking point occurs at about 16 years of age. Also, all youths must enter military service at the age of 18½. In England, therefore, police cadets usually are recruited at 16 to 17 years of age and serve until the time comes for entry into military service. Upon completion of their obligations under the National Service Act, they are considered for appointment to the regular force.

In Liverpool the training of cadets is divided into three parts.¹ Part I, "The Initial Training Course," consists of four weeks of full-time classroom work. The aims of the course are to fit the cadets as far as possible, for the actual work they will be required to perform, to give the cadets a thorough appreciation of the Police Service, and to encourage at all times a high standard of conduct in all possible respects so that the characters of the cadets may be properly developed towards ideals of good citizenship and good policing.

Part II, "Subsequent Training at the School," and Part III, "Duties in Divisions and Departments," take place simultaneously. Cadets continue to take additional classroom work two days each week, but the remainder of the week is spent in the performance of actual duties in the various divisions and departments of the force. Cadets are rotated every few weeks so that by the end of twelve months each will have had experience in almost every branch. If at the end of one year a cadet is still below military age, he may be permitted to start around the cycle again until called into the military service.

The extent to which the cadet plan has been accepted in England and the official attitude towards it are reflected in the following excerpt from the 1951 report of the Inspectors of Constabulary:

The number of cadets employed in the county, city and borough forces in 1950 was 1,021 and by the end of the inspection year this number had increased to 1,201. Since the end of September, 1950, this system has been introduced into 11 more forces but there are still eight county and 27 borough forces which do not offer employment to suitable youths in this capacity. In these forces which have made a success of this scheme, we have noted how much has been done in the past year to institute sound programmes of training and to vary the duties on which these lads are employed. While these youthful aspirants to a police career do much useful work in the different branches of the force and thus relieve police officers of a variety of routine tasks, their interests are encouraged and fostered by these methods and they are given a first rate grounding in the principles and high ideals of policing. As a long-term aid to recruiting, this scheme has a very distinct value as has been proved by those forces who were pioneers in its inception.²

NEED FOR THE PLAN

The need in the United States for the police to seek out and make a place for promising young men before they are snapped up by business and industry was expressed by Bruce Smith in the 1941 Baltimore Police Survey. His suggestion that Baltimore consider some kind of pre-service or cadet training appears to be the first proposal of the cadet idea in this country. In support of the idea he said:

If the young men the department can and should recruit do not become eligible for appointment until they become 23 or 25 years, they will find other jobs after completing their educations and succeed so well that neither the police service nor any other radical change in employment will divert them. The only chance the police department will enjoy really to have a fair choice among the more promising members of the rising generation, will consist in reaching them before they are securely settled into other work.³

Eleven years later Mr. Smith included the police cadet plan as a major recommendation in the New York Police Survey. In this report he says:

Youths of quite extraordinary qualities leave promising careers of many kinds to join the police force. But not enough of them are impelled by such urgent preferences. If more men of high intelligence and sanguine temperament really are to fill the blue ranks they must be sought at the high school age; employed for some time at police tasks not requiring law enforcement authority; schooled, guided, coached, transferred, and rigorously screened by special supervisors until the best of them can finally be offered as preferred candidates for appointment as probationary patrolmen.⁴

PLANS OF SOME CITIES

The Milwaukee Police Department, under the direction of Chief John W. Polcyn, introduced in 1952 "The Police Aide Program." Twelve outstanding young men were recruited from local high schools and appointed as police aides on July 1, 1952. They attended the Vocational High School for instruction in typing and shorthand four hours per day at city expense and spent four hours per day in the various districts, offices, and bureaus of the department. In this way they became familiar with the functions and administration of all branches and units of the organization.

On May 1, 1953 they were assigned to full-time, permanent duties in clerical capacities where they will remain until they are 21 years of age. If their services have been satisfactory up to that time, they will be appointed as patrolmen.

Chief Polcyn has expressed great satisfaction with the success of the plan so far, and it is his belief that it can be used advantageously by police departments of all sizes, particularly by the larger departments. In a letter to the author, he writes:

It is my firm belief that we in Milwaukee are on the right track. This program indoctrinates young men with law enforcement philosophy at an early age and as a result they should develop into efficient police officers and eventually some will reach the top as efficient police administrators.

Kansas City is definitely interested and has undertaken the preliminary steps towards the introduction of a program similar to that adopted in Milwaukee. An outline of the proposed program has been circularized to all high schools, and the response has been most encouraging, according to Chief of Police Bernard C. Brannon. Starting in the fall of 1953, Chief Brannon expects a considerable enrollment in courses designed to prepare students for selection. In Kansas City, as in Milwaukee, the title used is "aide" rather than cadet.

Commissioner Donald S. Leonard of the Detroit Police Department reports that the plan is being considered there. He writes that one of the methods used by his department to develop interest in police work is to participate in the career days sponsored by the high schools of the area. He says:

In this experience we have been encouraged by the interest shown by high school seniors. There evidently are many young men who would like to enter the field of law enforcement who are greatly disappointed when they learn that the opportunity is not available to them for at least three years beyond the normal age of graduation. It seems entirely logical that we should open the door to them for a three year cadet apprenticeship and training program. Their assignments could be of a semi-routine nature, such as operating central and precinct switchboards, guarding school crossings, various types of clerical work, and driving certain police vehicles. This would enable police officials to observe and control their activities during these formative years and select those for permanent appointment who show aptitude for police work.⁵

The Pasadena Police Department, under the direction of Chief Clarence H. Morris, has under consideration a modification of the cadet plan which is advanced as a practical device for raising the educational standards of the force. In California the junior college is firmly established and provides an easy way for youths to continue their education through the fourteenth year of formal schooling. Under the Pasadena plan the co-operation of school authorities would be solicited for the purpose of encouraging promising high school graduates to go on to the junior college, where they would take a police preparatory course. This would include a thorough grounding in American history and institutions, psychology, sociology, semantics, public speaking, typing and office procedure, and certain special police courses such as history of the police service, police law, and police organization and administration. Cadets would be selected from youths who completed this course. They would serve two years in cadet status before becoming eligible for appointment to the regular force. Under this plan, it is argued, police recruits would have four years of preparation for the job, through two years of academic work and two years of on-the-job training.

DOES MILITARY SERVICE HINDER?

Besides the cities already mentioned, several others have shown an interest in the idea. Not all reactions have been favorable. In the opinion of some experienced police chiefs, there are practical objections to be overcome. The most frequently advanced objection is the inescapable fact that most youths who would be acceptable as cadets are the ones most likely to be called into military service. In England and Scotland the probability of military service has been accepted and incorporated into the plan. Youths train as cadets, then go into military service, and are considered for police appointment only after this obligation has been discharged. This is viewed as an advantage rather than a disadvantage. The 1950 Report of His Majesty's Inspectors of Constabulary has this to say on the subject:

It is true that not all the cadets return to the police force on completion of their National Military Service, but of those who do experience shows that they are often above the average type of police recruit. Their training as police cadets, if concurrent with employment on appropriate duties, is undertaken at a comparatively early age, which is consistent with a youth in training, and the scheme has the advantage of offering a career straight from school. Looked at broadly, the training is good for any vocation, and if a few gain promotion during National Service and decide to stay in H. M. Forces, the police should not regard this as wastage, but rather as a quid pro quo for the services which the Armed Forces render in providing many good candidates for the police.⁶

The obstacles presented by the military service aspect, therefore, do not appear to be insurmountable. The goal is not solely to get young men into police service at an early age, but rather to attract them when they come out of school and are weighing various means of making a livelihood. There is no harm in interruption of cadetship, provided the latter attracts desirable youths to police service, gives them the opportunity to acquire some knowledge of the work, and impels them to seek appointment to the force when their military tour is ended.

PREPARATION FOR POLICE DUTIES

It has been argued also that to bring young men into the police department without giving them police authority would be unwise—that since their indoctrination would not be that of policemen, they might acquire various slants on police work which would impair their future usefulness. This contention does not appear to be valid. Many present policemen began their careers as civilian clerks in police commands. They were “cadets” in a sense, without benefit of a formal cadet program. It is doubtful that they were harmed by the experience. To assume that they were would be to assert that a year or two as a gasoline station attendant, as a construction worker, or as a bus driver will better fit a man to accept and absorb the responsibilities of police work than the equivalent time within the police structure performing closely supervised work that is directly related to his future duties.

THE ENTRANCE AGE

Under the cadet plan many men would enter the police service at an earlier age than at present. Even allowing time out for military service, the recruit who came to the force from the cadet ranks would be about 21 to 23 years of age. It has been argued that few men at this age are mature enough to handle the job. This may be true in some cases. If altogether true, it would indicate that the entrance minimum for police should be raised. We have learned, however, that mere chronological age is no guarantee of maturity. If adequate psychological screening of candidates is undertaken, the immaturity of all ages can be eliminated.

The earlier entrance age has definite advantages that should be mentioned. It extends the physically active years of the men employed and opens the way to more flexible pension arrangements which are less costly to both the policeman and the public. Even more important is the prospect for revising the whole pay structure to make police work more attractive as a true career service. If cadets were started at a moderate pay scale which carried a step-up when full police status was achieved, and then advanced by two- or three-year steps over a considerable period of time, the police service would be able to offer an important incentive to the great majority of men who for various reasons never get beyond the rank of policeman.

THE PAY INCENTIVE

The absence of incentives for men in this category is a serious problem of police administration. When we recruit men in their middle or late twenties who are heads of families, we must provide a salary that at least covers their family obligations. When step increases are provided, the time required to attain the maximum is rarely in excess of three years. As a result, many men, after reaching the maximum pay for the rank of policeman and after failing to finish high enough in competitive examinations to be considered for promotion, find themselves facing a long pay plateau leading to retirement. Some quit the service while young enough to make a change. Of the remainder, it must be admitted that a considerable number lose interest and thereafter do only what is necessary to “get by.”

Because police departments cannot yet hire in sufficient numbers men who have been educated for the job, it must be admitted that most recruits are raw material which must be laboriously turned into police officers. Opinions differ as to how much time is required for this process, but even with accelerated training programs, it is not accomplished in a few weeks. Most experienced police officers will agree that the time must be measured in years. If this is true, then it would seem more logical to pay the apprentice an apprentice's pay and to recognize the greater worth of the master by paying him master's pay. This means lower starting pay and higher maximum pay.

Robert S. Seares, Pasadena, California, is Assistant Chief of Police in Pasadena and lecturer in police administration at the University of Southern California, Los Angeles. He is past president of the California Chapter of the Federal Bureau of Investigation National Academy Associates, and past president of the California Division of the International Association for Identification.

The police cadet plan, with its emphasis on youth, opens the way for the establishment of a pay plan that provides continuing incentives to those who cannot or do not care to climb the administrative ladder. But even if these considerations are disregarded, the plan stands as a device for tapping a source of manpower that is presently out of reach. If viewed not as a substitute for, but rather as supplementing, present methods of recruiting, it appears to be sound. It is simply another approach to the familiar objective, which is to select and hire the best available men for police service.

Police Training

By RAYMOND E. CLIFT *

A FEW years ago I read a remarkable book. The title of it was Up from Slavery, the author, Booker T. Washington. He was an emancipated slave and his work dealt with the efforts of the Negroes to educate themselves following their emancipation in 1863.

I was fascinated by this book. Its account of "improvement" among the Negroes was interesting, but Booker Washington's own ideas of "self-improvement" were even more so. He described how his colleagues plunged into the study of literature, of the arts and sciences, in an effort quickly to gain the culture of their former masters. While they were studying, however, filth, degradation, and economic want existed all around them. Booker Washington's approach was different. He believed in doing the little things first, such as fixing up his home, getting a job, and properly clothing his children. Refinements could come later.

I think of the book in the preparation of this article because the situation it describes is analagous to police development. We have suddenly come of age too—and we are going places. Thousands of us regard our work as a profession and we are out to raise ourselves by "our own bootstraps." How else can we explain the mushrooming of police schools in this country? Education means something. Few top administrators feel they can hold up their heads unless they have a diploma of some sort to show their police-training background. All of this is relatively new.

As a veteran policeman, I am not sorry to see this development. If training raises our status in the public eye, I am all for it. As a realist in police training, however, I sometimes feel we are making a mistake in some of our procedures. Like Booker Washington's friends, we are growing in stature but we are going up too fast and in the process missing many of the fundamentals in genuine police improvement.

Consider our service as a pyramid and you will see what I mean. Our training for the most part is geared to the top level, and our pyramid is getting higher and higher. The base remains practically the same. To put it another way, police work today seems to be leaning in the direction of putting more and more smart men at the top while the little fellow on the "doing level" is sometimes neglected. It is a case of all chiefs and no Indians. I think it is high time to arrest this development and to re-examine and appraise our entire training structure.

PRE-SERVICE TRAINING FOR POLICEMEN

One of the evidences of a wrong start in the police field is in the matter of pre-service training for policemen. There is a lot of this going on in our country, both correspondence courses and actual classroom work. All of it has some small value, but it seems to be largely of the "cram" flavor and is designed almost solely to get the student on the force, that is, to squeeze him through the civil service barrier. The training is superficial. For that reason it is objectionable, just as the various law-review courses are objectionable to the American Bar Association.

The various college courses of instruction for young men and women hoping to enter the police field are not very different from courses mentioned above. These studies are designed to give the young man a head start in his career in law enforcement. I receive many letters from these students. They want to know what job opportunities await them on graduation from college. Many of them evidently feel they have only to present a diploma to receive a police job and then, in no time at all, they can rise right to the top. Obviously, many of them are going to be disappointed.

Courses of training differ throughout the country. I am thinking here of the police administration or police science courses designed particularly to fit young people for high police administrative posts. These courses are about as valuable in my estimation as the widely advertised correspondence courses in detective work. Also, the job opportunities are about the same. How could it be otherwise when the entrance qualifications are so low? I visited one of these schools and observed the class. In a group of twenty there was scarcely one who possessed the physical qualifications for a policeman. When appearance, stature, and general deportment are so important in today's policeman, why should any school waste the time of one not physically qualified for the job?

The type of pre-service training known as "cadet training" is quite different from the above. Here we have a procedure that seems to be pointing in the right direction. Milwaukee was the first American city to institute this kind of training, and others have adopted a modified version of it. In Los Angeles a youth who wishes to enter the police service but who is not yet old enough is advised to take certain courses of study. These are available at the University of Southern California and are especially arranged to equip him for police work.

The essence of "cadet training" is apprenticeship. Qualified young people planning to enter the police service are contacted early in their high school days and instructed on all matters connected with the service. Possibilities are explained to them—pay, promotion, pension, and so forth—and thereafter they aim as much of their training as possible in the police direction. When they graduate from high school, they are taken into the police department on such jobs as clerks or typists. Later, they move on to patrolman when their age allows it. Thus a promising young man who wants to be a policeman finds out all he wishes to know about the job while working as an apprentice, and graduates to patrolman through regular civil service channels after his twenty-first birthday.

It is probably a little early to evaluate the cadet training plan but it seems to be reasonably good pre-service training and the kind the public will buy. It enables the chief to hand-pick his men. For the youngster himself, coming pretrained as he is, it offers promise of a successful career in police work. I like the plan for this reason, even though in that very fact lies a danger. If a man enters a growing department, with plenty of opportunity for promotion, he is likely to be a happy and satisfied employee. But what happens if a man enters a department where numerical growth has stopped? There can be too many "brainy" men in such a department. Competent men demand continual job opportunities to keep them interested and satisfied. If the opportunities do not exist, some of them will be frustrated and become knockers and cynics in their work.

A development like this must always be considered as a possibility in police training. If we close our eyes to it we do so at our peril. In police work there have to be a great number of men who are willing to remain on the bottom rung of the ladder and do the everyday work of patrolmen. If our recruitment and training programs ignore this requirement, we are building on an insecure foundation.

RECRUIT AND IN-SERVICE TRAINING

Recruit and in-service training programs lend themselves to wide criticism in many departments but for reasons that are quite different from the above. Here we are not plagued with problems of selection, but with problems of penetrating the complicated maze of police subjects. We have the job of training men in every facet of police work and of doing it in a limited time. Courses vary in length from a few weeks to a few months but, in any case, are regrettably short. Recruit schools are especially guilty of inefficiency in "pouring it on" the young officers. If this were the kind of instruction that did not rub off, we might praise it highly. But it does rub off. Consequently, while the curriculum and method of training in many recruit schools expose the student to a vast amount of knowledge, it also often serves utterly to confuse him. He gains his real learning from a few weeks of experience and observation in the field under the able tutelage of a fellow officer.

This is not to say that all present-day recruit training is inferior. On the contrary, some recruit schools I have visited have very good training programs and teaching techniques. Some of the best I have seen, however, were in England and Germany. At the London Police College in 1952, I was most impressed by the care and thoroughness of the British in their training of young constables. The number of subjects in their curriculum was held to a minimum; also the number of students in each class was kept small. With only fifteen or twenty men to instruct, individual attention kept the performance of each class at an even level.

The situation at the Kiel Police School, in Schleswig-Holstein, Germany, was much the same as in London. The German classes were somewhat larger, but here, too, the number of subjects was held to a minimum with considerable attention given to each student. As in London, the Germans made great use of visual aids in their training schools. This contrasts sharply with American schools which seem to rely so much upon unrelieved lectures in the training process.

In-service training in many police departments is much like that of recruit training. The big fault here is the total absence of such training in many agencies or, in others, the failure to fit the training to the needs of the department. When central training is conducted, the variety of subjects is often more than the mind can absorb. Sometimes the courses are merely a rehash of things learned earlier. Moreover, they are not "dressed up" as they need to be for experienced men. These fellows have been in the field and know all the answers—so they believe. If an instructor is to hold their attention at all, he has to have a new and refreshing approach to his subject.

Recruit and in-service training programs can stand considerable refurbishing from time to time. Such revised programs are necessary as a department grows. As methods and procedures change over the years, the personnel must constantly be told about them. If the instruction is carefully prepared and is disseminated from the central training unit, supplementary instruction at the roll-call and performance level is made much easier.

ADVANCED IN-SERVICE TRAINING

Probably the most encouraging thing in the whole field of police training today is the continued operation and growth of advanced in-service training schools. The Federal Bureau of Investigation National Academy and the Northwestern University Traffic Institute are perhaps the best known of these schools. The Southern Police Institute is also attracting attention, not to mention the various schools in the East and the far West. Each of these institutes does a tremendous job in breaking the ice in police training matters and in developing qualified police teachers. The weight of their work will undoubtedly be felt more as improved police training programs come into existence.

The one grave weakness of these advanced schools is that they do not always select the best-qualified person in a department to be trained. Office pets creep into the program. This may be a fault of the police system itself and not of the schools but, wherever the blame lies, there is no question that many police officers spend time in police institutes who should never be there. These men may return to their departments as experts in one field or another, but the truth of it is that not more than 50 per cent of them do anything about disseminating their knowledge.

Of course, even though a man does not return to a training capacity, the money his department has invested in his training is not wholly wasted. He himself has learned to do the job better and, though he does not pass this information along, his department is still better off. It is only when a man goes away to school at the expense of his department, learns about his chosen calling, returns to his department, but shortly afterwards resigns to go into a different profession, that his chief can properly complain.

Such things do occur now and then, but they are exceptional rather than routine. By and large the advanced in-service training schools are doing a fine job and promise nothing but good for the future.

CLASSROOM VERSUS ON-THE-JOB TRAINING

We come now to what I believe is the crux of the whole training question, namely, where are we going to train our policemen? It is a common misconception, I believe, to assume that all training takes place in the classroom. Many chiefs will say they do no training in their departments, as they lack the necessary facilities. Yet as they themselves will acknowledge after a little thought, they carry on training all the time although it is largely of the on-the-job type.

As I shall show later, on-the-job instruction is really the best kind. However, I do know that some types of training are effectively given in the classroom. Matters of policy or matters of general knowledge can best be disseminated to a group of people. It is more economical that way. Moreover, there is no necessity to be ornate in this type of instruction. The greatest Teacher who ever lived did not have ornate surroundings or a lot of fancy gadgets in getting His message across; nevertheless He did a pretty fair job of it. It is the same way in police work. We do not require a lot of paraphernalia in getting across our fundamental messages in police work.

I must admit that certain procedures in teaching are much better than others. Likewise, the schools that are able to employ the various training devices and teaching aids do a better job than those without such aids. It is said that a man learns best by doing, next best by seeing someone else do it, and least well by hearing a person tell how to do it.

Police work, of course, does not lend itself to demonstrations all the time, save in firearms work, arrest procedures, and so forth. When it does, a man ought to go through the training—step by step. If he cannot do this himself he ought at least to see someone else do it.

Central training units, equipped to teach as I have indicated, can do a very creditable job in training. When such provisions are not made and the training effort is allowed to deteriorate to the straight lecture method, there is no question that the training effort suffers.

The fact that many police schools have relied on the lecture method of teaching is one of the reasons the whole field of police training ought to be reappraised today. It has not been responsive to our greatest training need.

ON-THE-JOB TRAINING

The police training that in my judgment is most effective is on-the-job training. This is essentially a matter of supervision, but I think it represents one of the grave weaknesses in our service today. Sergeants, lieutenants, and captains who have not seen in their job the dual responsibility of discharging their administrative tasks and at the same time developing their subordinates have missed a golden opportunity for the greatest kind of training.

No man operates at top efficiency. Even when he is carefully supervised, the average man will not function much above 75 per cent of his capacity, just because it is natural for all of us to be a bit lazy. This fact adds emphasis to the work of the supervisor. When he, knowing that the subordinate is not doing his best, puts his stamp of approval on a job, he carelessly establishes a standard of performance below that of which the subordinate is capable.

Let us take an example. Suppose a patrolman has been sent to investigate a breaking and entering. He comes in with a report, but the report is defective in several particulars and the supervisor does not take the time to instruct the patrolman properly in how to make out the report. Moreover, he doesn't require the patrolman himself to revise the report, but does it for him. Here again, the supervisor puts his approval on an inferior grade of work. In addition to letting a training opportunity slip by him, he has actually rendered a disservice to the patrolman by doing his work for him. On-the-job instruction can come in here and do the work better than it could be done in the classroom.

On-the-job training is the secret of really good police development, and it is a job that falls largely on the shoulders of the immediate supervisor. The supervisor has to know enough about human nature and, in particular, about the man he supervises, to be able to judge how he can be developed into a good trained employee. Then he has to inspire him to develop in that direction. The gist of that is "leadership" but there ought not be any dearth of that in police circles today. The kind of schools we have been talking about in the preceding paragraphs have developed our police leaders, and it is now their job to use their knowledge in the direct improvement of their subordinates.

If a patrolman, through able supervision by a sergeant or lieutenant, can see the importance of what he is learning, he can more easily be induced to exert himself in the learning process. Things make sense to him then. A warrant becomes not just a piece of paper but a legal writ of considerable importance upon which the whole structure of justice might, at a given moment, depend. People grow and develop in this kind of atmosphere, and it is the job of the supervisor to see that these stimuli and inducements exist.

There are times, however, when a supervisor ought not to rock the boat. By this I mean that some men simply are not capable of great development, regardless of the training technique employed, and in such cases the supervisor should not try to achieve the impossible. A traffic man, for example, might be a whiz of an officer in directing pedestrians and motorists in a congested area, and yet be a total loss in detective headquarters. The same thing can be said of a man not especially handy in the use of his gun. One should not give up altogether with such a person, since firearms training is necessary; yet, on the other hand, it is a waste of time and money to go on trying to make a pistol expert out of him. The detection of ways in which a man can develop into a better employee is the function of the supervisor. It is an important knack in training and it is also good supervision.

CONCLUSION

From what I have said, it can be seen that I place great reliance on police training. There is much of it going on in police circles today and I believe in it. In none of the training I have discussed can I see any grave weaknesses—save that I am afraid not all of it is responsive to our needs. Pre-

Captain Raymond E. Clift is superintendent of the Police Academy in Cincinnati, Ohio, and secretary of the Hamilton County Police Association. As a member of the bar in Ohio, he has been active in many training schools in his home community, teaching chiefly legal subjects. In 1952 he visited England, Germany, and France to study police organizations in those countries. He has written several pamphlets on the subject of police training.

service, recruit, in-service, advanced in-service training—all these types are, I believe, just a little afield of our need today. They are making smart policemen out of a few of us. In that sense we are growing in stature, but I wonder if we are not neglecting a number of little tasks in the process.

Recall again our simile of the pyramid. It seems to me we are building our pyramid of training higher and higher, with more and more smart men at the top, while the thing we really need to do is to widen our base. It is the obscure man on the beat who determines the acceptance or rejection of the police service, not the man at the top. Therefore, it seems to me, in police training today we must exert ourselves to the limit in developing our subordinates. This, in the final analysis, is the supervisor's job on the lowest level of execution. It means on-the-job training—careful supervision and leadership. Actually, if we in the police service today could develop really good supervisors, we could dispense entirely with other kinds of training. For in the last analysis it is the supervisor who determines the level of performance. If he sets the standard high enough and so leads his men that they perform at their best, the training problem is solved.

The Policeman's Hire

By BRUCE SMITH, JR.

SUBSTANTIAL progress is being made towards a professional police service. A growing recognition by states, counties, and municipalities that capable men should be adequately paid is aiding the trend. Liberal pension programs, progressive pay plans, a shorter work week, fair promotion, and equal opportunities—all these help to attract men who are well adapted to the special requirements of police duty. Unfortunately legislatures and city councils have increased police salaries more readily than they have raised recruitment standards. In consequence, the taxpayer has seldom received the full benefit of costly salary increases and has thus become apathetic toward efforts to raise the level still further.

Reluctance of appropriating bodies to formulate a coherent pay plan also has restricted the public benefits of increased salaries. "Across the board" pay raises prove to be politically more attractive than the more discriminating scaled increase plan. Hence while progress toward a professional police service is being made, it is not unerring, nor does it show any large regard for cost and return.

THE SALARY BARGAIN

An almost constant increase in police salaries has been brought about by four factors: (1) the rise in living costs, (2) the need for attracting recruits of superior quality, (3) a desire to retain experienced policemen, and (4) a recognition by politicians of the city employee vote.

Although police departments show wide variations in pay, nearly all are able to recruit men in sufficient numbers to replace losses caused by retirement or resignation. The lower-salaried departments appear in general to attract poorly educated recruits or middle-aged men who have thus far been unsuccessful in a trade or business. Applicants for appointment to the better-paid departments include both run-of-the-mill aspirants and a few of the better-educated, younger, and more promising men. Stiff recruiting standards may separate out the unpromising applicants in the better-paid departments, just as slack standards may pass them in.

The salary level that a city or state should establish is a matter of public policy. If our people desire police of superior quality a decent salary scale must be maintained. If a community or state has not the resources to support an expensive police establishment, either a lower salary scale must be adopted or operating economies must be effected so that the higher level may be achieved. In either event, if a benefit is to be derived from a high salary level for police, strict standards for recruitment and retention must be applied.

SALARY LEVELS

Salary differences as between cities are always wide. Thus it is no uncommon thing to find some large cities with maximum scales that are two-thirds higher than those prevailing in other important centers. Even the median of maximum salaries for patrolmen in the large cities runs one-third higher than in smaller places. Similar contrasts mark the averages for different parts of the country.¹ Our nation is too varied to permit easy generalization concerning local government policies. Hence it is clear that no single level can be considered adequate under all conditions. However, observation of police recruitment efforts suggests that desirable recruits can be attracted by a pay rate for senior patrolmen that meets the prevailing local rate for junior accountants and senior clerks. If a still higher level of recruit is sought, governments must expect to pay accordingly.

In times of business distress, low salary scales have attracted young men with degrees in law and in the arts and sciences. Accordingly communities and states which cannot afford a high salary level may still be able to recruit capable policemen during periods of economic depression. The retention of men so recruited later becomes a problem which may be solved through a variety of personnel practices.

SALARIES AND INFLATION

Salary studies demonstrate the relatively conservative movement of government salary scales as compared to the cost of living.² Police officers are quite cognizant of this fact, as they are also familiar with the advantages to them of a return to deflationary conditions. Police belief that the purchasing power of their pay-check dollars will soon increase has served somewhat as a steadying influence upon police turnover and police retirement. In any case, police salaries should not be too closely geared to an upward spiral in living costs, unless police are prepared to accept later adjustments when the inevitable reaction sets in. Reasonable though this position is, it can be fraught with grave difficulties if governments restrain police from joining police unions, and then neglect their most pressing requirements in times of soaring prices. For if the salary bargain is to be fairly reached, it must be approached with a full recognition by both sides of the various equities that are involved.

FLAT RATES VERSUS PAY RANGES

Two general patterns of compensation apply to the police grades.

Traditionally a flat pay rate often prevails for patrolman, another flat rate for sergeant, a third for lieutenant, and so into the higher ranks. The flat rate system is attractive to new entrants, who are offered as much pay immediately as is allowed an experienced man. This facilitates recruiting. Departments which use the flat rate system of pay may carry a competitive advantage in securing more mature recruits if these are wanted. Flat rate pay is often higher than the minimum rate of ranged pay scales, though lower than the maximum. On the whole, the flat pay rate scheme has not been satisfactory when applied to police patrolmen.

In a more discriminating plan the patrolman may be paid a fairly low rate upon entrance to the force, possibly for the first six months or first year of membership. The pay rate thereafter may be increased annually or biennially for a period varying from two to twenty years. A few departments require a patrolman to pass a written civil service examination for promotion to the various classes of patrolman before eligibility is established for the higher pay bracket. Still other departments provide an increment such as 5 per cent every three or five years, which may be automatic or granted upon recommendation of the chief administrative officer.

Each of these possible pay range plans is intended to serve as a reward for experience and increased police service value. In addition, pay plans with a salary range serve as an inducement for experienced policemen to remain in service, since they are better able to meet family obligations that tend to increase with mere lapse of time.

The need for pay ranges for ranks above patrolman lessens with each rise in rank. Some city and state police forces provide salary ranges through all ranks to and including that of chief or commissioner. While a patrolman with five years of police experience may be expected to be a more expert policeman than the recruit, the rank of police chief has no such correlation between years of service and competence in the job. In departments with the ranks of patrolman, sergeant, lieutenant, captain, and assistant chief and chief, probably only the first three ranks require pay ranges. Large forces have found it convenient to leave the pay of captains flexible, the rate for an individual captain being dependent upon the type of duties he performs. Assistant chiefs and chiefs (or commissioners) should be paid at a flat rate, as their rank is coincident with a position.

THE DESIRABILITY OF A WIDE PAY RANGE

No uniformity exists among police departments as to the breadth of a pay range. In major cities that have established a modern pay range plan for patrolman, a common range is about 20 or 30 per cent on the minimum pay. Since comparatively few police can expect to rise above the rank of patrolman, the pay range for patrolman should be wide—even a spread between minimum and maximum of 60 to 70 per cent may be reasonable if the entrance wage is low. A sergeant's expectation of becoming a lieutenant is comparatively good, and the pay level is comparatively high; thus a pay range of 25 to 30 per cent is sufficient. For similar reasons the range in pay for the rank of lieutenant may be quite narrow—10 to 15 per cent.

The basis for any sound pay plan is the equitable assignment of ranks to positions. Unless each position in the department is allocated to the proper rank in accordance with the position's demands and responsibilities, a pay differential is meaningless or even harmful.

It is a general rule in industry that the supervisor should be paid at least 15 per cent more than the highest that is paid to any person supervised by him. The rule is simple to apply to a series of flat pay rates, but more difficult to apply to a plan that provides a series of pay ranges based upon years of service.

In virtually all major cities with pay ranges, the maximum pay for patrolman is lower than the minimum pay for sergeants, the maximum pay for sergeants is lower than the minimum pay for lieutenants, and the maximum pay for lieutenants lower than the minimum pay for captains. Police officers favor this common pay scheme in which the young supervisor is paid more than even a senior subordinate. Policemen contend that the hierarchy of command will be confused if a senior patrolman is paid more than his young or less experienced sergeant, or if senior sergeants are paid more than a young or less experienced lieutenant.

Though police tradition is against overlapping the pay range of the several ranks, progressive police administrators recognize its value to the service. If the broad pay ranges now so generally recognized as being advantageous to the police are adopted, and the traditional lack of pay range overlap is also adhered to, the maximum pay of a lieutenant must be at least twice that of the minimum pay for patrolman. Pay rates for captains, assistant chiefs, and chiefs then must be so much higher that they prove unacceptable to city councils and state legislatures. An artificial restriction of entrance salaries is the inevitable result. Broad pay ranges without any overlapping are difficult to achieve and should not be sought in most American jurisdictions.

The military services have freely accepted the practice of overlapping pay ranges. The young Army captain with only a few years' experience is paid appreciably less than his subordinate lieutenant with twenty years of service. Yet overlapping pay ranges have not confused the hierarchy of command in the military. They have not been subversive of discipline. But overlapping pay ranges have made it possible for the military to increase each individual's pay appreciably as the years pass without a promotion. The police service also will benefit by the adoption of generously wide pay ranges, overlapping them as necessary.

THE POLICE WORK WEEK

Recent years have brought a shorter work week to most of the country's policemen. Our larger cities prove more ready to accept the 40- or 44-hour week than are the smaller cities. The median work week for cities under 100,000 population is still the traditional 48 hours, while in cities over 500,000 population the median is 44 hours.

Undoubtedly the work week reduction has been made to meet the working conditions prevalent in other professions. Yet many thoughtful police officers doubt the value of the 40-hour week to themselves. Accountants, teachers, or technicians may be able to perform as much work in a short week as in a longer one. A shortened work week may be applied to them without serious cost or inconvenience to their employers. The same is true of a few headquarters assignments that are filled by policemen. But in every police force are patrol or operating posts, filled by policemen, which cannot be left uncovered at any time. These are the 365-days-a-year posts, the backbone of the crime suppression effort. A reduction in the hours of work requires a proportionate increase in the number of policemen assigned to everyday posts, if the police effort is to be maintained. To thoughtful policemen, the addition of extra men to the force means a lessened chance of substantial pay raises in the years ahead.

Although less than one-fourth of our cities have as yet adopted the 40-hour week for police and almost one-tenth still have duty schedules calling for more than 48 hours, the trend to shorter hours is unmistakable. Yet there are crosscurrents that cannot be ignored. In some cities patrols are required to report to their stations before going on duty, or after coming off post, or both. This lengthening of the actual hours of duty for patrols is largely or wholly offset by the much more common practice of permitting police to take their meals while on or near their posts. Some allowance must be made for such shortening of the police day when comparisons with other governmental agencies, or with commerce and industry, are attempted.

In virtually all municipal departments the standard workday is now eight hours, including a half hour or more for meals. While men assigned to intersection traffic control may have their workday set at seven hours, the scheme is by no means common.

OVERTIME DUTY AND PAY

Policemen assigned to patrol or investigative duty must expect to spend some overtime in court. A patrolman who has arrested a drunk at midnight must, in many jurisdictions, attend court on the following day. A long court docket may force an officer to return to duty with but a few hours of sleep, and no time for his family. Since court appearances are the most frequent cause of overtime duty, various cities have searched for methods of adjusting conditions that are viewed as inequitable.

Some places have considered making a direct payment to officers for court time, either on the basis of one hour of overtime pay for two hours in court or on a flat rate basis. While the directness and simplicity of court time payments appeal to some, other police officers recognize the likelihood of a bad reaction by the public. American cities have not paid policemen for making an arrest for the past hundred years, and no official move now should weaken that tradition.

A more workable plan, and one in use in large and small cities alike, is the granting of leave time on the basis of one hour of leave for two hours in court. Other cities have a fixed schedule of time allowances to fit the average time spent in each type of court. Because its benefits are indirect, leave time for overtime in court has produced no unfavorable public reaction.

Public disturbances, riots, strikes, or major crimes occasionally require police officers to work many hours of overtime. Such extra service is generally looked upon by police as a part of their professional obligation. To balance it, most departments either formally or informally allow some compensatory time off whenever such added duties are especially extended.

Another type of overtime duty arises from the effort to make up for a recurrent shortage of personnel. Every force experiences peak demands for additional manpower. The heavy flow of traffic at 5:00 P.M., coverage of school crossings, ball games, special events, Friday or Saturday night patrol duty, all require additional manpower. It is unduly costly to build up a force numerically to meet such peak loads, for it then will be overmanned much of the time. Short, sharp peaks cannot be easily fitted into fixed duty schedules.

Planned, compensated, and voluntary overtime duty is a possible answer. Under such a plan a patrolman may be permitted to volunteer for an overtime roster. As the demand arises, names are drawn from the roster in rotation. Designees must accept the assignment or arrange for a substitute. Thus the department is assured that sufficient men will be available when needed. Compensation for volunteer overtime may be at the rate of straight time or time and a half. Experience has been that policemen welcome the opportunity to work overtime, even at straight time rates, thereby indicating the advantages in this device for a flexible distribution of manpower when and where the need is greatest.

HOLIDAYS AND VACATIONS

Many national or regional holidays create unusual police problems due to the release of citizens from their routine occupations. The police effort therefore cannot be relaxed to permit policemen to celebrate the holiday along with their neighbors. Compensating time off may be provided in one of two ways—either on a day-for-day basis or as an additional vacation allowance. Under the latter arrangement, if other governmental employees receive two weeks of vacation annually, policemen may be allowed three weeks or more. Either arrangement is considered fair by policemen, though most would naturally prefer to have the holidays whenever that proves feasible.

In other respects police usually receive the same number of days of vacation as other employees of their government.

Most frequently a policeman's vacation is two calendar weeks. December being a most active month for property crimes and highway accidents, it is common practice to spread vacations over the remaining eleven months—January through November. A few departments attempt to limit the vacation period to the summer months—June through September. While police prefer the summer vacation plan, it has one distinct disadvantage. Two-week vacations spread over 48 weeks sap the strength of a force by only 4 per cent at any one time, but the same vacation allowance, when compressed within 16 weeks, reduces the manpower available during the vacation period by 13 per cent. Unless a police jurisdiction is unusually inactive during the summer months, police vacations should be spread over most of the calendar year.

POLICE UNIFORMS

A police uniform normally consists of a cap, winter blouse, winter overcoat, trousers, and summer and winter shirts. The initial cost of such a uniform is several hundred dollars and its annual maintenance and replacement cost about a hundred dollars. Pistols, handcuffs, night stick, and other special equipment may be purchased but once, without a recurrent renewal cost. A few cities furnish all uniforms and equipment. Most supply special equipment only; a few supply only the badge and cap piece. Some designate a part of the policeman's pay as "a uniform allowance" and seek to dispose of the question in that way. Considering the high cost of police salaries to a city, the expenditure of city funds to assure the proper uniforming and equipping of policemen appears justified. This is particularly true of the initial outfit which represents a heavy financial burden to the recruit.

It is almost universal practice to require policemen assigned to plain-clothes duty to supply their own clothing. However, a few places supply detectives with a new suit, overcoat, and shirts periodically at public expense. This is intended to be the equivalent of uniforms provided to other branches.

JOB SECURITY

Shortly after the end of World War II, a major southern city experienced a change in political party control. Since no job security law was in effect many policemen were demoted and discharged on a summary basis. The effects upon the rank and file will be felt for many years. Such overturns are no longer so common as they once were, but they do still occur and their effect is always destructive.

To prevent the police from becoming a political football nearly all states and municipalities have enacted laws assuring tenure of office. Such arrangements are usually supervised by a civil service commission. By and large the civil service laws have been effective in assuring policemen job security. In fact, most cities and states make it extremely difficult to demote or discharge a policeman for any cause. Thus the civil service laws for assuring job security have operated to undermine police discipline.

As compared with other employments the police enjoy a high degree of job security. During periods of economic depression the police profession is especially attractive—the pay is regular, there are no general layoffs, and administrative action to discharge the individual officer is unlikely. The issue is no longer one of job security. The big problem is to reconcile this with an effective discipline.

PENSIONS AND RETIREMENT

sions. The pensions are usually paid to officers disabled in the line of duty, or those disabled from any cause after a number of years of service, or those who have reached a given age or completed a prescribed number of years of service. The amount and conditions of benefits vary considerably between police departments, and even between men in the same department. A common benefit is half pay for superannuation retirement, two-thirds or three-fourths pay for line of duty disability retirement.

In sound pension plans periodic contributions are made to a pension fund, the amount of the payment being determined by qualified actuaries. Frequently both the police and the employing government contribute an established fraction of base pay to the fund, which in extreme cases may be 10 or 15 per cent for each. In addition the pension fund may benefit from various license or court fees. Actuarially sound pension funds provide a strong inducement for police to remain in the service.

A far less desirable pension fund is of the nonactuarial variety. In this type the police officer may contribute to a fund at a low fixed rate, while the city or state contracts to pay the difference between benefits and fund income. Non-actuarial funds may promise more liberal benefits than do actuarially sound programs, but it is a glib and almost meaningless promise, unfair to the police officer who serves the public long and well. Financial difficulties have forced some nonactuarial funds to reduce their benefit payments, and grave uncertainties becloud the future of many others.

Within recent years the federal old-age and survivors insurance program and various industrial pension plans have somewhat lessened the relative attractiveness of some police funds. Changes in the federal act permit state and municipal governments to participate in the federal plan, though local governmental plans must then be abandoned. In jurisdictions which do not have an actuarially sound pension fund, acceptance of the federal program is probably desirable, if locally augmented by disability, surviving dependents, and pre-retirement benefits as need arises. In jurisdictions which do have sound pension funds the federal plan offers generally smaller benefits with no substantial increase in the certainty of payment.

A third possible pension arrangement is the use of an actuarial private pension fund which is operated without government aid, in conjunction with the federal program. Under such an arrangement a pension plan supported by police and citizen contributions can provide disability and superannuation benefits until the officer becomes eligible for benefits under the federal program. Since the liability of the private fund is thereby limited, costs need not be excessive.

NO SUBSTITUTE FOR A GOOD COP

Higher personnel standards for police recruits, an effective discipline, and attractive compensation for all—these hold the key to large areas of police improvement. While the rate of pay necessary to attract and hold competent policemen varies with the locality and with time, it is obvious that governments must strive to offer to police a compensation that will be roughly comparable with that of other professional or semiprofessional men. Well-adjusted pay scales make possible an attractive pay schedule, often at no greater annual cost. The fringe benefits enjoyed may include a shorter work week, provision of uniforms, job security, and pensions. Advances by industrial workers over the past ten years in pay rates and fringe benefits have greatly reduced the relative attractiveness of police service. If legislatures and city councils can redress some of the competitive balance between the police force and other forms of employment, modern police personnel techniques can lead to levels of police service hitherto unattained.

Bruce Smith, Jr., is a public safety and personnel consultant who has conducted numerous administrative surveys of local and state governments in many parts of this country. He entered the U. S. Army in 1941, serving there as commander of infantry and military police companies, and as chief of counter intelligence in the office of the Chief of Ordnance. His military assignments also included the conduct and direction of industrial security and protection surveys for the Ordnance Department.

Crime Reporting as a Police Management Tool

By A. E. LEONARD

THE early years of the police profession in America were dark and forbidding. Not only has this relatively new craft experienced the usual growing pains brought about by a rapidly expanding population, but in addition social and economic changes during the past century have complicated the police task with discouraging regularity. Effects upon the problems of law enforcement often were not detected in time to produce remedial action. Only within our own generation has the police administrator had anything in the nature of a yardstick with which to measure local crime problems and the effectiveness of his efforts.

Prior to the establishment of uniform crime reporting each police administrator in his own way could determine how much crime faced his department locally and whether it was on the rise or decline. He could calculate a crime rate—valueless as it often was—the percentage of offenses solved by his force, the employee strength per unit of population, and the like; but he had no knowledge as to whether his crime rates were high or low, whether the batting average of his department met any acceptable standards, whether his police strength was above or below average—in short, whether his administrative procedures were sound or faulty. He existed in statistical isolation.

Uniform crime reporting should hold a very practical interest for all of us who are privileged to pay taxes in this country. Local law enforcement is big business, second only to education in the operational expenditures of municipal funds.¹ Hence the comparative size and nature of the crime problem facing us should have a bearing upon the amounts we are inclined to expend to combat it. While of special interest to police, crime is nonetheless also a primary concern of legislators and sociologists and a burden upon the entire community. The crime picture of a community may not be an attractive one, but its details should not be obscured on that account. The crime record is everybody's business and everybody should know the score.

ORIGINS OF UNIFORM CRIME REPORTING

Systematic crime reporting in the United States has been a reality only since 1930, although for some fifty to sixty years prior to that time there had been occasional and largely ineffective agitation to that end. From time to time criminologists, statisticians, and the police alike would direct attention to the dearth of any crime statistics worthy of the name, and there the matter would rest until the next wave of futile criticism rose and passed on.

Significantly, it was the local law enforcement agencies themselves through their International Association of Chiefs of Police that took the first definite steps which ultimately brought about the uniform crime reporting program as we know it today. In 1927, Police Commissioner William P. Rutledge of Detroit proposed that the Association designate a Committee on Uniform Crime Records. As a result, twelve police executives were designated with Commissioner Rutledge as chairman. Distinguished counsel to this committee was drawn from agencies of federal and state governments, universities, and the like, under the farsighted leadership of Dr. Lent D. Upson of the Detroit Bureau of Governmental Research, who served as chairman of the advisory group.

When the Laura Spelman Rockefeller Memorial made its unsolicited offer to finance a thorough study of the problem, it was possible for the Committee on Uniform Crime Records to engage a highly competent technical staff under the direction of Bruce Smith of the Institute of Public Administration, who brought to the task unusual qualifications. His long and enviable record in the field of police surveys, combined with the professional and practical experience of the other members of his staff, Donald C. Stone, L. S. Timmerman, and Audrey Davies, resulted in the development of a general program for the collection of police statistics.

In setting up the program in the beginning, all offenses were classified under twenty-six separate headings according to their general common-law definitions, and these classes were assembled in two broad groups. Part I consisted of seven classifications of serious crimes of the type which were found to be those generally brought to the attention of the police as they occurred. Part I includes criminal homicide, rape, robbery, aggravated assault, burglary, larceny, and auto theft. All other major crimes, together with the less serious violations, are grouped under nineteen classes, in Part II.

Recognizing the diversity of definitions for the various offenses among the several states, possessions, and territories, all the local statutes were examined and a uniform classification of offenses established. These definitions under the uniform classification follow in a general way the definitions found in the state statutes although necessarily differing slightly from most of them in some respects. Painstaking and exhaustive research at this point was essential if comparability was to be achieved in the crime statistics collected from the various states.

In addition to extensive research in this country, a firsthand examination was conducted of the systems of criminal statistics maintained in Great Britain, France, Belgium, and Germany, and the technical staff thereafter brought forth a manual entitled Uniform Crime Reporting, which was adopted by the International Association of Chiefs of Police and published by the Committee on Uniform Crime Records in November 1929. The manual stands today as a worthy monument to the vision and perseverance of such men as Commissioner William P. Rutledge and to the very capable and thorough work of Bruce Smith and his competent staff.

Monthly crime reports initiated

The collection of the monthly crime reports was started with the January 1930 returns by the Committee on Uniform Crime Records. In September of the same year the program was turned over to the Federal Bureau of Investigation in accordance with the original plans outlined in the manual Uniform Crime Reporting. The manual was distributed to local law enforcement agencies from which reports were requested, and it has always served as the basic reference work in the field, although it has since been condensed somewhat and published in handbook form by the FBI. The handbook, Uniform Crime Reporting, is furnished to all contributing police agencies.

The response to the program was excellent from the beginning. Some four hundred departments sent in reports in January 1930, and the reporting area has grown steadily. In 1952, 5,788 local police agencies participated in the program. Table 1 indicates the percentage of the population represented by returns sent to the FBI by local law enforcement agencies.

SUPERVISORY ROLES OF THE FBI AND THE IACP

From the foregoing it will be seen that the coverage is substantial, particularly so for a statistical program that is wholly voluntary as regards the contributors. In large measure the coverage is as great as it is by reason of unique circumstances. To the local authorities, the various crime returns are not merely additional statistical reports requested by the federal government. The report forms as well as the basic explanation as to the manner of their execution were designed not by some new arm of government but by a committee of police executives selected from and by the International Association of Chiefs of Police.

It also must be remembered that the FBI as the central repository of the uniform crime reports is itself a law enforcement agency with which municipal and county police, sheriffs, and state law enforcement agencies regularly collaborate. Not only are FBI agents throughout the nation in frequent personal contact with the local police in connection with investigative matters of mutual interest but in addition the FBI in Washington provides a variety of services to local law enforcement agencies in matters other than police statistics. They include such matters as the operation of a central repository of fingerprint records, services of the FBI Laboratory, publication of the Law Enforcement Bulletin, and operation of the FBI National Academy where officers from all over the country are trained as instructors and administrators. Agents of the FBI with specialized training are available on request to assist in local police training schools regardless of the size of the department.

Thus, when a local police agency receives a crime reporting form or a letter concerning the submission of reports from John Edgar Hoover, director of the FBI in Washington, this communication is recognized as coming from an organization sharing many interests and activities with the local agency. All this places the FBI in a unique position as a government agency operating a statistical service as a by-product of its regular functions. We have here a wholly co-operative venture, yet because of an almost within-the-family relationship the co-operation shown in participation and in response to suggestions about the preparation of reports is a continuing source of satisfaction to those concerned.

FBI's system of checks on crime reports

The monthly and annual uniform crime reports as received at the FBI in Washington are subjected to a variety of checks for dependability. Apparent discrepancies result in correspondence with local police departments. As an indication of the extent of these inquiries during one recent year, 1,654 annual returns from city forces were used in preparing the summary tabulations for publication and 441 of them were made the subject of correspondence with the contributors. The monthly reports, being in much less detail, are challenged less frequently, but the response to this correspondence by way of adjustments or clarification of entries is always encouraging to those of us who are engaged in this co-operative program.

On occasion, after correspondence with the contributor there remain on the returns uncorrected or unexplained entries which indicate that a misunderstanding of established procedures and standards still exists. In these cases a personal visit to the department may be the only solution, and hundreds of such visits have been made, in most instances by representatives of the FBI but on a number of recent occasions by representatives of the Committee on Uniform Crime Records of the International Association of Chiefs of Police. In any event, all members of that committee are kept fully informed when for any reason the reporting by a local department continues to fall short of established standards. In some instances the Committee on Uniform Crime Records has recommended to the FBI that the figures for a certain city should be omitted from tabulations showing offenses arranged by communities. This practice has proved invigorating and has resulted in a higher degree of uniformity in the crime statistics reported and published than might have been possible otherwise.

SCOPE OF THE CRIME REPORTS

The uniform crime reporting program provided for the collection of information of two basic types: (1) offenses known to the police for the Part I division only and (2) persons arrested for all classes of offenses.

The term "offenses known to the police," adopted from foreign practice, includes all crimes known to have been committed. The manner in which they are discovered, the age of the offender if the offender is known, the value of property stolen, and whether restitution was made do not affect the scoring of an offense under uniform crime reporting. If a building is unlawfully entered for the purpose of committing a felony or any theft, one offense of burglary is scored regardless of whether one man or six boys were responsible. Thus, the offense committed stands alone as the unit for scoring under "offenses known to the police" as well as in tallies of the number of those crimes "cleared by arrest."

The other basic statistical unit, persons arrested, is based on the number of individuals taken into custody or answering a summons, citation, or other police notice, regardless of the number of charges that may be placed against them.

Crime statistics are collected and tabulated separately for urban and rural areas of the country, as defined by the Bureau of Census. For the 1950 decennial census the Census Bureau adopted a new definition, which does not always correspond with the jurisdictional boundaries of the reporting police agencies. As a result, the reports from some agencies would combine both rural and urban crime figures, if the 1950 census distinction were used. For that reason and in the interest of continuity over the years, while utilizing the 1950 population count, the uniform crime reporting distinction between urban and rural areas continues to follow generally the 1940 census definition, which includes as urban communities incorporated places of 2,500 or more inhabitants and some areas classed as urban under special rules relating to population, size, and density. Other areas are treated as rural.

At this stage in the program the reporting for the rural areas has not reached so high a degree of uniformity and completeness as that of the urban reports. In connection with the tabulations for known offenses it is recognized that in some instances the rural reports may be limited to cases in which arrests were made. Any incompleteness thus resulting would be most pronounced for crimes against property, where arrests are less likely to occur than for the more serious crimes against the person.

WIDE RANGE OF CRIME RATES

Because of the heterogeneous nature of American cities, it is only natural to find substantial variations in the crime rates among individual communities. For an indication of the range, reference may be made to the differences in the crime rates for 1952 among cities with more than 100,000 inhabitants, as shown in Table 2.

As a general rule, the larger cities show the highest crime rates per unit of population. In robbery, for example, the rate during 1952 for cities of over 250,000 inhabitants was seven times the rate in cities with population under 10,000.

Substantial differences are observed, for reasons indicated above, in the crime rates in different sections of the country. Table 3 indicates the range in state crime rates for 1952. The irregular distribution of crime among the several states is normal, since the frequencies of crime as well as of other social phenomena, such as births, deaths, diseases, marriages, and divorces, are affected by such a large variety of factors.

POPULAR VIEW OF CRIME RATES

In the earlier days of uniform crime reporting, some police forces were reluctant to compile and publish reports on the volume of crime, partly because many people tended to treat crime as a charge against the police rather than as a social misfortune for which the entire community was responsible. Fortunately this reaction is gradually disappearing.

It cannot be denied that the size, training, and general efficiency of the police department do have some effect on the local crime picture. On the other hand, there are other factors affecting the amount of crime which merit careful consideration. These include such matters as the composition of the population of the city as regards age, sex, and race, as well as the size and characteristics of the population of any adjacent metropolitan area; the economic status of the population; the climate of the area; the general nature of the community, that is, residential, agricultural, industrial, or resort; the educational, recreational, and religious facilities of the community; and the attitudes of public prosecutors, the courts, and the public in general towards the problems of law enforcement.

A comparison of the raw figures or even the crime rates of one community with another may not be particularly significant. The important thing is the extent to which the local crime rates exceed or fall short of the average for cities of the same population group, geographic division, or state. Such a comparison sheds light on the relative size of the problem at hand.

We recognize that to some extent certain types of crimes are considered preventable. Because of the presence of police patrols, and through police public relations programs and the like, would-be offenders in some instances are deterred in their efforts to violate the law, just as comparable programs of the fire department tend to reduce fires. But an outbreak of fires rarely prompts a series of charges of inefficiency against the fire department, an influenza epidemic is not recorded as a breakdown in efficiency in the health department, nor is the blame for an unusually heavy trash accumulation placed on the shoulders of the sanitary branch of government, unless these public services (1) fail to recognize candidly the size and nature of the problem or (2) fail to attack the problem by prompt and effective action. So should it be with our police forces.

APPLICATION OF PUBLISHED DATA

While the size of the crime problem should have a bearing on the size of the police department, there certainly are better measures of the efficiency of the force. Foremost among them would be the proportion of offenses cleared by arrest, for which the authors of the uniform crime reporting program carefully provided. The phrase generally means that one or more of the offenders involved in the commission of an offense have been arrested and made available for prosecution. (There are a few exceptions to this general provision such as the suicide of the offender or the case where a person known to have been responsible for a local offense is taken into custody in another jurisdiction.)

Accordingly, the police executive finds it possible to use this device as a measure of efficiency of individual segments of his force. Also, the reports received by the FBI from his department and others provide average figures on the percentage of offenses cleared by arrest which can be used as valuable comparisons for investigative efforts of his department. The averages are available for cities grouped by size and also by location.

Other average figures of practical interest to police executives, presented from time to time in Uniform Crime Reports, include percentages of the various types of stolen property recovered, time and place of commission of offenses, and value of property stolen, in the several offense classes.

The total offenses reported by a single group of cities over a period of two or more years are always shown in Uniform Crime Reports to indicate the trend from year to year in the various types of offenses. Police executives find these national trends helpful for comparison with trends experienced locally.

The crime trend tabulations are not intended to serve as an index to the fluctuation in the criminal tendency of the citizenry in the area represented, since shifts in population as to size and composition or other changing factors in the reporting communities are not considered. The figures simply show the offense totals for each of the periods covered as reported by a specific group of cities without regard to underlying causes.

FURTHER DEVELOPMENT OF THE SYSTEM

Under the original plans of the Committee on Uniform Crime Records it was anticipated that reports pertaining to the age, sex, and race of persons dealt with by the police would be collected. During the early years of the program, however, the introduction of new reports was held to a minimum for obvious reasons and in lieu of such reports the FBI gleaned what information of this type was available from fingerprint arrest records received in Washington. This source was always recognized as largely incomplete, since it was necessarily limited to cases in which persons taken into custody were fingerprinted and their fingerprints forwarded to Washington. Practice as to fingerprinting arrested persons, particularly in the lower age groups, is far from consistent. However, for two decades considerable information about the personal characteristics of individuals arrested was provided by this source.

After several years of experimenting with different types of arrest reports, one was finally adopted and placed in use for the calendar year 1952. For that year reports of 232 cities of over 25,000 inhabitants were utilized in preparing the summary data. The response to the form has been highly encouraging and it is anticipated that its use will increase rapidly.

Another matter covered in some detail as a part of the uniform crime reporting program is the subject of police employee strength. Once each year there are collected from all municipal police departments report forms showing the number of employees on the rolls as of a given date, separated into civilians and police officers and, incidentally, converting all part-time employees into terms of equivalent full-time personnel. With this device it has been possible to publish annually average figures showing the number of police employees per 1,000 inhabitants in cities grouped according to size and location.

There is considerable variation in the relative number of police employees, as indicated in the following data showing the range in the number of police employees per 1,000 inhabitants as of April 30, 1952 in the 266 reporting cities with population from 25,000 to 50,000: lowest, 0.55; first quartile, 1.10; median, 1.35; third quartile, 1.67; highest, 3.65.

In addition to the numerous factors affecting the extent of crime, a reasonable police employee figure for a community cannot be approached without due consideration of the working hours of the department, the extent of the use of auxiliary services (for example, school crossing guards and private merchant police), the highway traffic problem, and other related matters.

As a by-product of the data on police strength, the report also provides for the collection of information on police fatalities. Data are published annually showing the number of police killed and the rate per 5,000,000 inhabitants in cities grouped by size and location.

Uniform Crime Reports is compiled and distributed by the FBI in two issues annually. Generally, the semiannual issue, covering the first six months of the year, is distributed in the fall, and the annual issue comes out in the spring following the year covered. The publication is sent to all police agencies participating in the program, as well as to any other individuals or organizations who have expressed an interest in receiving it.

THE FUTURE OF UNIFORM CRIME REPORTING

Further development of the uniform crime reporting program, in the next few years at least, will be directed largely to extending the reporting area for data pertaining to the age, sex, and race of persons arrested to include the smaller cities and the rural areas. Beyond that, future development will depend upon the expressed desires of police executives across the country, and the pulse of that group is not difficult to feel because of the circumstances under which the program is conducted by the FBI, as outlined above.

In the meantime, efforts will be continued to promote the highest possible degree of uniformity in the reporting by local agencies. Relaxation in this phase might well prove disastrous to the significance of the published data and, therefore, each monthly and annual report will continue to be subjected to close scrutiny. This critical evaluation of each report by the FBI, together with the active support and interest of the Committee on Uniform Crime Records of the International Association of Chiefs of Police, must continue over the years if uniform crime reporting is to flourish as a co-operative venture and go on growing in usefulness as a police management tool.

A. E. Leonard, Washington, D. C., an accountant by profession, has been chief of the statistical section of the Federal Bureau of Investigation since 1945, having been connected with the FBI in various capacities for twenty years. He has conducted and supervised crime records surveys in numerous cities, large and small. In 1951-52 he conducted an extensive review of crime reporting in New York City for the Institute of Public Administration. His final report, Crime Records in Police Management, New York City, provided the basis for a reform of New York's crime reporting.

Police Public Relations

By G. DOUGLAS GOURLEY

DURING the past hundred years American police have made great strides along the road toward professionalization. As in other fields, however, the greatest advances have been those which deal with scientific techniques and equipment. The social problems in policing have not received their fair share of attention. Outstanding among these problems is the need for development and maintenance of a satisfactory relationship between the police and the public—commonly called police public relations.

IMPORTANCE OF PUBLIC SUPPORT

Under our Anglo-Saxon form of policing, in high contrast with totalitarian forms, the police and the public are in a sense identical. Our citizens cannot discard their responsibility to police themselves merely by retaining professional police to perform the daily tasks for which citizens have neither the time, the capacity, nor the inclination. Hence the importance of public support in the enforcement of law and order cannot be overemphasized. Police represent only a small fraction of the public they serve, and can never adequately discharge their obligations to protect life and property unless they are reinforced by the good will and co-operation of the public.

It is highly important that the citizen and the policeman understand and appreciate each other's problems and viewpoints. The citizen has definite obligations in this matter. He must realize that his security and welfare are, to a large measure, dependent upon the maintenance of an orderly society, which in turn is dependent upon the efficiency and prestige of the police.

The policeman, on his part, must always remember that law enforcement is not an end in itself, but is rather a means to an end. That end is the maintenance of an orderly society that enjoys the support of law-abiding citizens.

No matter how well a police department is organized or how efficient and honest is its administration, it is judged by individual citizens, and consequently by the nature of its public contacts. Good public relations involve far more than saying—they involve doing. It is the policeman out on his beat, the police officer in a radio car or on a motorcycle, and the desk officer or jailer in the station who make friends or enemies for the department. Though there are other influences involved, the police themselves are the most important factor in determining public attitudes.

The building of proper relations and attitudes between the police and the public will result in a high degree of popular acceptance, and other media affecting public relations, such as press, radio, motion pictures, and fiction writers, will both reflect and strengthen this underlying influence. The policies of these media are determined by what the public wants, and consequently by beliefs and attitudes of the public itself.

Despite the difficulties involved, every effort must be made to create as many favorable contacts as possible between the police and the public, because the cumulative effect created by these thousands of man-to-man contacts determines the degree of public acceptance or the state of police public relations.¹

¹ For a discussion of the public relations role of the individual police officer, see Richard L. Holcomb, The Police and the Public,

UNFAVORABLE ATTITUDES TOWARD POLICE

In building good public relations, many handicaps must be overcome. Not only do we have a product to sell (law enforcement) which often meets with strong sales resistance, but some of our predecessors have been responsible for unfavorable attitudes which make our job more difficult today.²

Among these are the widely held beliefs that policemen are uneducated and of low mentality; that they are selected for physical strength and courage alone; that they are of doubtful honesty and integrity; that they are engaged in a continuous offensive against society; that they are often rude and domineering; that they get angry easily, and assume a "smart-alecky" attitude even more easily; that they resort to the illegal "third degree"; and that the only way to be safe from this tyranny is to have either wealth or "pull."

Not all of these indictments can be fairly charged to any one police department; but, unfortunately, at various times and places each has been successfully proved. Also, despite the fact that many police organizations have made rapid strides and are on the verge of professionalization, current standards in others leave much to be desired.

PUBLIC RELATIONS HAZARDS

In the early days of police departments, the "good" citizens of the community felt a sincere alliance with the police against thieves and outlaws who preyed upon them. Today, in an urban community, citizens too often have no such feeling of alliance. Police work is no longer concerned primarily with a small outlaw group. Modern police departments have become large, complex organizations whose many new duties require intimate day-to-day contacts with all citizens. The greatest number of police contacts today is not with the criminal element of society, but rather with the "good" citizens of a community. It has been estimated that at least 90 per cent of all police business is not of a strictly criminal nature.

Extensive use of the automobile has made necessary an increasing number of restrictions upon the driving public, and the old division of the community into lawbreakers and law observers has thus been destroyed.

As long as policemen confined their activities to repression, detection, and investigation of offenses which were common-law crimes, they won a great measure of popular support. However, as the police have become overburdened with duties outside the sphere of what people usually consider criminal law enforcement, public support has weakened. These additional duties are often of a minor regulatory nature, rarely produce impressive social benefits, and often prove irritating to people who believe they have a right to do as they please.

Defiance of law and authority is not entirely an individual phenomenon. It is practiced by groups as well. The individual whose activities the policeman may be required to restrict is often a symbol of a racial, social, religious, or economic group. To become involved with such an individual is to invite the resentment of the entire group; and it is extremely easy to become involved, for most members of minority groups are sensitive and defensive.

It is almost a necessary consequence that any efforts of the police to control actions of citizens meet with resistance

The American citizen is in some respects a rugged individualist, and strongly resists any efforts to control his personal freedom. This American individualism, and revolt against authority, is traditional.

No other form of public service is more likely to cause ill feeling among the public it serves than is the agency whose duty it is to enforce laws and restrict the citizen's activities and control his conduct. Actually, it is the governmental agency which restricts the activities of its citizens; but as far as the individual is concerned, the government is an abstraction. He regards its symbol—the policeman—as the cause of his troubles; and his resentment is reserved for the officer, and no one else.

RESULTS OF GOOD AND BAD PUBLIC RELATIONS

There are many distinct advantages to be gained from maintaining a spirit of free co-operation with the public. When such co-operation exists, police morale is improved; this in turn leads to increased police effort and improved police service. Difficult programs, which would otherwise be impossible to undertake, then become possible. A general increase in police efficiency results in still greater appreciation of police, creating a desire on the part of citizens to observe laws, comply with regulations, and assist the police in the performance of their functions.

Without the public's assistance, arrests become difficult, and convictions almost impossible. Without it, the police are held up to ridicule, criticism, and censure at every move. Under such circumstances, the public overlooks no opportunity to make the task of the policeman more difficult and his working conditions more disagreeable. Legislatures are nothing more or less than segments of the public, and reflect its attitudes and beliefs. In the courtroom the most carefully prepared cases may fail because the testimony of policemen is ignored or greatly discounted by jurymen, who are, after all, only small parts of the public at large, and who naturally and even properly reflect current attitudes and prejudices.³

NEED FOR MUTUAL INFORMATION

If, then, police public relations or contacts are made under such difficult circumstances, and are so extremely important to the successful operation of a police department, it seems only logical that procedures should be devised to measure the status of public relations at any particular time, and to determine which police techniques, actions, and attitudes are approved—and which are not.

We must not think of the public as one vast body labeled "The Average American." Every police agency must deal with many publics of divergent interests and attitudes. The same citizen may be a member of several publics. "Public" is a name for any group that has at least one thing in common, whether it be education, occupation, income, sex, age, ethnic characteristics, or something else.⁴

The very first thing that should be done in any public relations program is to determine what these many publics think of us and our services. Only after this has been done will we be in a position to evaluate their attitudes and, in turn, our own policies, procedures, and services. Only after this evaluation, and any corrective action which may be indicated, can we be in a position to report to our publics and correct popular misconceptions.

Unfortunately this first important step in police public relations has too often been ignored. Public relations has too often been thought of as a one-way street by which the department tells citizens those things it feels they should know. Public relations should be a mutual affair, which will enable law enforcement officers and administrators to keep informed as to what their publics want and to determine what publics are in need of what information, so that these publics can be adequately informed.

There is an urgent need for the application of this principle of selectivity to police public relations so that available time, energy, and money will be most effectively applied in informing citizens who most need informing regarding police activities about which the greatest lack of information exists, and in instructing policemen regarding modes of conduct which bring about the greatest acceptance of their activities.

METHODS OF DETERMINING PUBLIC ATTITUDES

Attitudes, beliefs, and desires can be determined in many ways, some of which are rather informal.

Determining attitudes in a small city or town may be a fairly simple task, for police officials may be personally acquainted with most of the residents. In larger places the problem is not so simple; but even here, in their day-to-day personal contacts, policemen can learn much of the feeling toward their department and its policies. Advisory bodies made up of representatives of important interest groups provide a good sounding board for public opinion. A very valuable device is to keep track of complaints, commendations, and requests for information.

Probably the most reliable method of appraising attitudes is the public opinion poll. The conduct of such polls or surveys naturally requires special skills.

THE LOS ANGELES SURVEY OF PUBLIC ATTITUDES

An intensive study of citizens' attitudes toward the police was recently concluded in Los Angeles.⁵ A scientifically selected sample of 3,100 citizens was used. The questionnaire contained three principal sections: the first listed personal or biographical data; the second set forth 22 multiple-choice questions; and the third solicited free-answer or voluntary statements as to favorable and unfavorable contacts which the respondents had had with Los Angeles policemen.

A list of personal data, or background information, such as sex, nationality, age, and occupation, was included for two reasons: (1) to permit comparative studies among the various classes and groups indicated, and (2) to select a representative sample or "universe" based on a quota system; that is, to select groups of people in the same age, sex, nationality, and economic classifications, and in the same proportion as they appear in the community.

A method of coding the free answers was devised, and results of the written responses, together with biographical information and answers to the multiple-choice questions for each respondent, were placed on punched cards. Tabulations of the punched cards brought to light many facts which should prove of interest and value not only to police administrators and students of police administration, but also to persons concerned with public administration and public relations in general.

⁵ This survey, which points out the nature, the intensity, and to some extent the causes of public attitudes toward the police, together with instructions for conducting similar surveys, is reported in G. D. Gourley, Public Relations and the Police, 160 pp., Springfield, Ill.: Charles C Thomas, 1953.

Attitudes of citizens in general

Generally, the citizens of Los Angeles felt that they had a very good police department. The ratings of the respondents were highest for those traits or modes of conduct which could be physically seen or easily judged; that is, appearance, physical condition, and education; and lower for the more intangible traits like honesty, professional interest, basis of selection, and influence of politics. The "Do Not Know" responses were generally lowest for those traits rated highest, and highest for the traits rated lowest. This is significant, for it indicates that the more people actually know about their policemen, the better they like them.

About one-fourth of all respondents admitted that they did not know how to rate policemen as regards the more intangible factors. It was amazing, for instance, to discover that in a city like Los Angeles, where the civil service system is thoroughly entrenched and scrupulously administered, 27 per cent of the citizens did not know whether policemen were selected on the basis of merit or not.

When people were given an opportunity to tell in their own words about personal contacts they had had with policemen, they reported as many favorable as unfavorable experiences.

As might have been expected, the greatest number of recorded experiences dealt with traffic situations. Again, however, half of these were favorable.

It is of further interest to note that although 40 per cent of all unfavorable responses referred to traffic, 47 per cent of all favorable responses also referred to traffic. Fifty per cent of the unfavorable traffic comments, and 30 per cent of the favorable, concerned traffic citations. On the other hand, 22 per cent of the favorable, and only 12 per cent of the adverse, statements had to do with the direction of traffic.

These and other figures from the survey indicate that people form their opinions about us, whether we try to shape those opinions or not. Also, that our public relations, whether good or bad, are a direct result of the number and the nature of our contacts with the public.

It is interesting and significant to observe that the only police activity which brought out more favorable than unfavorable comments was traffic. Here is evidence that by proper selection, training, and supervision, a function that is inherently full of public relations hazards can be made acceptable to the public.

Concerning officers' attitudes, again about half of the comments were favorable. Of the favorable comments, 60 per cent were about officers' courtesy. Most other favorable statements were about officers' co-operation, their sympathetic and concerned attitudes, and their helpfulness. Most adverse comments were about officers' discourtesy, prejudice, overbearing or superior attitudes, lack of co-operation or indifference, and their sarcastic or belligerent attitudes.

Actions of officers which people most liked were competency, helpfulness, promptness, and assistance of various kinds.

Attitudes by age groups

Concerning age, the older people (55 or over) were definitely the most favorably inclined.

The severest critics were between 18 and 44 years of age. For many traits, the boys and girls (17 and under) were the most favorably inclined of all. This was particularly true for the traits of honesty, training, and basis of selection.

Of the juveniles, 35 per cent felt that the police were liked by boys and girls;

40 per cent believed boys and girls were indifferent toward the police; and 18 per cent were convinced that the police were feared by boys and girls. On the other hand, 65 per cent of these same juveniles believed that the police were usually watchful to prevent juvenile delinquency, and only 4 per cent felt that the police were indifferent concerning juvenile delinquency.

As for the relative strength of their convictions, the young adults (18 to 24 years of age) were the most positive in their beliefs, and those over 55 admitted most often that they did not know how to rate their police.

Attitudes by sex, ethnic origin, and education

Generally speaking, men expressed more favorable attitudes than did women. Of the 22 traits listed, the only two rated higher by women than by men were appearance and physical condition. The outstanding feature of a tabulation by sex was the indication of a great lack of knowledge by women concerning their police. For most traits, twice as many women as men admitted that they did not know how to rate policemen.

That Negroes take a dimmer view of their police department than do other ethnic groups is clearly indicated by this survey. The Mexicans are more favorably inclined, but still not so favorably as are the white respondents. Of the various nationality groups, the Mexicans appear most certain and the white respondents least certain as to how policemen should be rated.

Although educational group differences were not great, there was a definite tendency for people with the least schooling to look most favorably, and for the college graduates to look least favorably, upon the police. For 20 of the 22 traits, college graduates rated their police in the top bracket less often than did persons with less of formal schooling. The exceptions were appearance and physical condition.

Attitudes by occupation

Undoubtedly one of the most significant factors affecting attitudes towards the police, as revealed by this survey, is occupation. Contrary to many popular beliefs, unskilled laborers are most favorably inclined, followed closely by skilled laborers.

An interesting and enlightening picture was obtained by dividing the skilled laborers into two groups—transportation workers, and all others. The transportation group included streetcar operators, bus drivers, truck drivers, and taxicab operators. This group rated consistently higher than did all others. These findings are very significant because transportation workers are in daily contact with the police, and are in a much better position than others to observe their conduct. It serves further to emphasize that the more contacts people have with the police, the better they like them and appreciate their problems.

Among the lowest votes of confidence were those by professional groups. However they showed a wide range of opinion. Executives rated police highest, and entertainers lowest. Attorneys rated police highest in only one trait (influence of politics) and lowest in six. Of interest is the fact that doctors and dentists rated police lower than all others for physical condition.

Although housewives rated their policemen lower than did others for only 7 of the 22 traits, they admitted far more often than others that they did not know how to rate Los Angeles policemen. The percentage of housewives who did not know how to rate their policemen averaged for all traits more than 50 per cent higher than the percentage of all others who did not know how to rate them.

As unsatisfactory as the housewives' ratings are, they are not nearly as unfavorable as the ratings of female school teachers. For instance, only 13 per cent of the teachers (as compared with 38 per cent of the housewives) believe that their police are habitually courteous in dealing with the public.

This lack of information by housewives and the relatively low ratings by female school teachers seem to indicate the need for a public relations program directed towards the women. They to a great extent influence the attitudes of our children, who then in turn will be the citizens of tomorrow.

OUTSTANDING LESSONS FROM THIS SURVEY

Among the outstanding lessons to be learned from this survey are the following:

1. There is an appalling lack of information on the part of the public concerning the caliber of their police and concerning the conditions under which they operate.

2. Women, especially, are lacking in information about their police.

3. Current relations between the police and minority groups leave much to be desired.

a) Recruit and in-service training in race relations should be improved and intensified.

b) Actual performance of police in dealing with members of minority groups must be critically scrutinized, and improved if improvement is indicated.

c) The police should publicly cooperate whenever possible in movements to advance understanding and harmony between persons of all races and creeds.

4. Public attitudes (both good and bad) toward the police are primarily the result of personal contacts between individual citizens and individual policemen.

5. In order to obtain the greatest possible approval for the police, the following things must be discouraged by effective selection, training, and supervision:

a) Attitudes of discourtesy, prejudice, superiority, and indifference.

b) Actions of unjustified arrests or citations, rough treatment, and inconsistency of traffic law enforcement.

6. The following things must be encouraged:

a) Attitudes of courtesy, co-operation, sympathy, helpfulness, and tolerance.

b) Actions of honesty, competency, promptness, and assistance of all kinds.

7. The things of which the public most need convincing are that their policemen

a) Have a high professional interest in their work.

b) Are selected for personal merit and ability.

c) Operate under excellent discipline.

d) Apprehend criminals indiscriminately, without regard for pressure brought by influential persons.

e) Operate independent of newspaper publicity.

f) Usually apprehend criminals in difficult cases.

g) Respect the constitutional rights of suspected criminals.

h) Are usually fair in dealing with minority groups.

i) Are careful not to arrest innocent persons.

j) Are directed by competent supervisors and top administrators.

SUMMARY AND CONCLUSIONS

Under our form of government a cooperative relationship between the police and the public is essential. Both citizens and police have responsibilities in this matter, but the police must take the initiative in building good public relations.

Although other factors also are involved, the police themselves are the most important in determining public attitudes. Because of this, every effort must be made to create as many favorable contacts as possible between individual policemen and citizens.

Favorable contacts will require planning and training, for they will often be difficult to arrange, not only because of the police past but also because of the potential friction inherent in the duties we are called upon to perform. We are also handicapped because we do not have sufficient factual information concerning the attitudes and desires of our many publics.

Citizens' attitudes can be determined in many formal and informal ways. Regardless of what methods are used, however, if a finger is to be kept on the pulse of public opinion, it must be done persistently. The ultimate criterion of the success of any democratic police agency is its acceptance by the citizens it serves. One of our most important public relations tasks is to identify our various publics and to secure their reactions. Only after this has been done can we undertake a candid analysis of our operations and correct weaknesses that are brought to light. Only after this evaluation and corrective action will we be in a position to report sincerely and intelligently to our publics.

We must always remember that public relations is a two-way proposition by which the police and the people for whom they work can freely communicate with each other. Only through such a mutual exchange can our police service be maintained on a truly democratic basis.

Police, the Law, and the Individual

By AUDREY M. DAVIES

THE rights surrounding a person suspected or accused of crime have their origins in some of the most gruesome pages of history. It is a far cry from the ruthless proceedings of the Court of Star Chamber of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries to the substantial safeguards available to an accused today. In the reaction against the cruelties inflicted during regimes when an accused person had practically no rights, the pendulum has swung to a point where many people, both experts and laymen, seriously question whether the law—if sedulously followed—does not now operate, not merely to protect those charged with the commission of major crime, but actually to aid their escape from conviction.

This problem, which exists at all stages of the administration of criminal justice, is particularly acute at the police level. Responsibility for the investigation and apprehension of criminal offenders rests primarily upon the police. In their resistance to the legal strait jackets sometimes imposed so as to defeat their best efforts, they have beyond any doubt frequently resorted to practices and devices outside the law which have brought down upon them the anathemas of the general public. An irritating factor has been the unprofessional attitudes of a segment of the criminal bar, particularly in the larger cities. The activities of these lawyer-fixers have led police to retaliatory measures which they cannot successfully defend.

ILLEGAL POLICE PRACTICES

The more flagrant police practices which cut squarely across the rights and privileges guaranteed to the individual by the basic law of this land—by the constitutions, federal and state, the courts, and statutory enactments—are the use of "third-degree" methods to extort confessions from arrested persons, the use of excessive brutality in making arrests, and the use of wire-tapping devices in securing evidence of illegal acts. These practices have extremely serious implications. They invade the historic rights and freedoms of every American: the right to avoid self-incrimination, the right to trial by due process of law, defense against unlawful searches and seizures, and such correlative rights as freedom from assault, from false imprisonment, and from protracted detention, the right to bail, and the right to counsel. To the extent that they are indulged in they turn the police—the sworn defenders of the law—into prime lawbreakers. Their continued use by some law enforcement officers accounts in large part for the low esteem in which police in this country are quite generally held.

It is proposed to examine the nature of these practices and their status under the law, with a view to considering what steps, if any, can be taken toward their replacement by legally and morally acceptable procedures which would both restore public confidence in the police and increase police efficiency.

THE THIRD DEGREE

"The third degree" is an elastic term which connotes the use of force or threats amounting to intimidation by police or prosecuting officials in extorting confessions from those arrested for crime. In its worst form it is nothing more nor less than old-time torture in modern dress. In addition to outright physical brutality or threats of force, it is interpreted to include such practices as protracted detention of prisoners, who are often held incommunicado without recourse to counsel, relatives, or friends; prolonged questioning of suspects by relays of interrogators, sometimes under glaring lights or other physical discomforts, and often under conditions of extreme weariness or hunger induced by deprivation of sleep or food and water; confinement in overcrowded or unsanitary or vermin-ridden cells, or cells kept excessively hot or excessively cold; various forms of mental torture; and numerous other devices calculated to coerce the accused into making the admissions his tormentors are determined to extract.

The defects of such methods of law enforcement are so apparent that it is amazing they have persisted so long. They are frequently depraving to the perpetrators and inconceivably harmful to the victims. They violate an array of legal principles and prohibitions fundamental to the liberty and security of the individual. They breed contempt for law and engender public resentment and hostility toward the police. They fail to achieve their only conceivably justifiable end—the speedy conviction of the guilty—because the confessions so induced sometimes prove false, or are inadmissible in evidence because of their compulsory element, or arouse sympathy for the defendant, so that the guilty go free. Moreover, their use actually impairs police efficiency since it encourages resort to lazy and ignorant means rather than the development of scientific techniques of interrogation and investigation by the police.

Reaction against the third degree

A decided reaction against the use of these self-defeating methods appears to have set in. The President's Committee on Civil Rights in 1947, in speaking of third-degree methods and police brutality, found that they are not universal and that "many law enforcement agencies have gone far in recent years toward stamping out these evils."¹ Lieutenant Kidd of the Berkeley (California) Police Department characterizes the use of the third degree as "not only vicious, but useless" and states: "It is an encouraging trend that this practice is becoming more and more shunned by the great majority of our police departments."² Similarly Captain Harold Mulbar, of the Michigan State Police, offsets his somewhat startling assertion that "in some parts of our country today the 'third degree' is still the most popular form of lie detection," with the reassuring comment:

Of course we know that the vast majority of police officials almost everywhere are today enlightened and decent men who would not think of condoning such barbarian practices. They realize the futility of all such methods and will have nothing to do with such unwarranted and unethical brutality. Responsible for this change has been the higher educational standards regularly offered to police officers and certainly the much better training systems everywhere available.³

Possibly the most portentous indication of reaction is the greatly expanded role of the federal government in recent years in combating police lawlessness. This role has a twofold approach: (1) the enunciation of new standards of police practice by the Supreme Court of the United States; and (2) the prosecution of local officials who are charged with police brutality directly by the federal government under the federal civil rights acts.

JUDICIALLY IMPOSED REQUIREMENTS

The "civilized standards" rule

The United States Supreme Court in a number of cases involving the use of third-degree practices by state law-enforcement officers to compel a confession by the defendant has consistently ruled that convictions based on coerced confessions constitute a denial of due process under the Fourteenth Amendment.⁴ Doubtless this reviewing power of the Court in state cases involving coerced confessions has a deterrent effect on the use of improper police practices.

In 1943, in McNabb v. United States,⁵ the Supreme Court imposed a far stricter rule in the case of federal law-enforcement officers when it held that mere failure to arraign the defendants promptly—as required by statute—invalidated any confessions obtained during the illegal detention. The decision was based, not on any constitutional issue, but solely on the supervisory power of the Supreme Court over the administration of justice in the federal courts, which, the opinion stated, implied the duty of imposing "civilized standards of procedure and evidence." Despite the deluge of criticism that greeted this decision, and its supposed modification in United States v. Mitchell,⁶ the strict rule of the McNabb case was reaffirmed in Upshaw v. United States.⁷

The "inherently coercive" rule

The rule of the McNabb decision is limited to federal law-enforcement officers; it does not extend to state systems of criminal law enforcement, over which the United States Supreme Court has no supervisory powers. But in *Ashcraft v. Tennessee*⁸ the United States Supreme Court propounded a doctrine applicable to state cases which in effect imposed a new standard for police practice upon state law-enforcement officers by judicial legislation. It held the questioning of arrested persons for thirty-six hours without food or rest to be "inherently coercive," regardless of its effect in inducing the confession, and a violation of the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. This arbitrary presumption of coercion amounts to an extension of federal judicial control over state law-enforcement officers comparable to that effected over federal officials through the McNabb rule.

Obviously the United States Supreme Court has traveled a long way in its efforts to eradicate improper police practices associated with the third degree.

CIVIL RIGHTS AND POLICE BRUTALITY

Physical abuse of prisoners, of those belonging to minority racial or religious groups, or of any member of the general public—particularly the use of unnecessary force or brutality when making arrests—is a common subject of complaint. There is no record of the extent of these abuses, as they are frequently concealed from the public by the department concerned. Only recently a newspaper campaign forced into the open a consistent policy of the New York City Police Department to bypass the Federal Bureau of Investigation when police brutality cases were investigated as required under federal civil rights statutes. A federal grand jury inquiry immediately resulted; Congress appointed a House Judiciary subcommittee to investigate the situation and its report is being awaited with considerable interest; the City Council also appointed a committee to inquire into police brutality cases; and the police department set up machinery for the investigation of citizens' complaints of brutality. Disciplinary action was also instigated immediately by the department against policemen charged with assaults on citizens in civil actions for damages. The conditions revealed in New York City may not be characteristic of a great many other places, but they raise ugly questions when thrown into such high relief.

While recourse against these wrongs may be had through such means as civil actions against the wrongdoers, their punishment under state criminal statutes, and police discipline, the difficulties in applying these remedies in most cases make them largely ineffectual; hence the significance of the revitalization, since 1939, of federal civil rights legislation long on the statute books but virtually ignored. These civil rights acts were part of a series enacted during the decade following the Civil War to implement the Thirteenth, Fourteenth, and Fifteenth Amendments.

The Civil Rights Section of the Department of Justice

In 1939 a Civil Rights Section was installed in the Department of Justice by Attorney General Frank Murphy, for the avowed purpose of pursuing "a program of vigilant action" in prosecuting infringement of civil rights. This movement inaugurated a new governmental policy which has armed the federal government with a potent new weapon, in at least the more extreme cases of brutality by state officials where the state itself takes no effective punitive steps. It was under the operation of this program that the New York City incident described in the preceding paragraph arose.⁹

The work of the Civil Rights Section of the United States Department of Justice is still somewhat new and experimental. It labors under inadequacies of organization and procedures; it has to combat local prejudices, since much of its work concerns Negroes in the South; it arouses antagonisms as interfering with states' rights, as indicated by the angry outbursts of some governors at the 1953 Governors' Conference, which were misdirected at the FBI; and it encounters enormous difficulties in bringing specific cases within the vague wording of the civil rights statutes, about which even the Supreme Court justices are in heated disagreement. All these are complicating factors which cause it to push forward slowly and with the utmost care. Possibly for this reason it confines prosecutions largely to cases where the facts show serious infringement by a public officer of an important civil right. In spite of the many handicaps, it has made substantial progress, both through the prosecutions it has undertaken and through its deterrent influence on police abuse of prisoners and on resort to mob violence.

J. Edgar Hoover, director of the Federal Bureau of Investigation, in a letter to the New York Times of August 26, 1953 protesting the attack on the FBI by the governors of Pennsylvania, Virginia, and New York at the Governors' Conference, pointed out that its investigations in civil rights cases were carried out at the order of the Department of Justice in the performance of its duty to enforce the law of the land. Commenting on the results achieved, he remarked:

The record, I think, is clear and convincing. More progress has been accomplished in developing a consciousness, understanding and respect for civil rights since 1940 than in any other period in our national history.

In the last thirteen years, for example, a total of thirty-six lynchings have occurred. This, of course, does not reflect credit either upon the community where the acts occurred or upon the United States. In the thirteen years preceding 1940, however, a total of 157 lynchings occurred. Thus in this one field alone there is no question that phenomenal improvement has taken place. Public education has contributed much to this improvement, as has public opinion, which in the final analysis determines the degree of respect which any community has for law and order.

The fact that the FBI investigates lynchings no doubt causes many would-be lynchers to stop and consider the consequence before engaging in mob violence. In such cases, or in others of the type which the Governors had in mind, it makes little difference whether the victim is the most lecherous type of a criminal. He still is entitled to be treated as a human being. No one has the right in common decency or under our constitutional republic of taking unto himself the responsibility of inflicting punishment.

The potentialities for development of the federal civil rights program are vast. Through it the Department of Justice may eventually assert by direct positive action—should state inaction so necessitate—the restraining influence that the Supreme Court is indirectly effectuating by its repudiation of third-degree methods in confession cases.

WIRE-TAPPING PRACTICES

Another field of police lawlessness to which attention should be drawn because of its wide prevalence and the wholly unethical features involved is that of the secret interception of telephone conversations by law-enforcement officials to obtain evidence of criminal acts, in direct violation of state and federal statutes.

It might well seem that the practices in question entail such invasion of individual privacy as to amount to an unreasonable search and seizure within the prohibition of the Fourth Amendment and that the use of evidence so obtained in a criminal proceeding would violate the self-incrimination principle of the Fifth Amendment. But the United States Supreme Court in a five-to-four decision in *Olmstead v. United States*¹⁰ declared otherwise—with Brandeis vigorously dissenting and Holmes characterizing wire tapping as "dirty business." Many people agree with Justice Holmes. Wire tapping was finally barred by federal statute in 1934 by the enactment of Section 605 of the Federal Communications Act, which in *Nardone v. United States*¹¹ was expressly held applicable to federal officials. Evidence obtained indirectly from leads provided by wire tapping was likewise outlawed in the subsequent case of Nardone v. United States.¹²

The Department of Justice has alternately banned and condoned the use of wire tapping by the FBI. Present policy confines its use to such urgent cases as espionage or sabotage, or where grave risks to internal security are involved or human lives are in jeopardy, and express approval of the Attorney General is required in each instance.

There is no doubt that the dangers to the national security in the war and postwar periods have placed a heavy burden of responsibility on the federal police. Nevertheless, wire-tapping practices in direct violation of law involve grave ethical—if not constitutional—issues. In recognition of this situation, repeated proposals have been made for the enactment of federal legislation which will legalize wire tapping by federal officials in limited situations and subject to appropriate safeguards. The growing and sometimes crucial importance of investigations involving the national defense or internal security has stimulated the use of wire tapping. Since not all of these investigations are clearly of a criminal character, practical considerations of national security may require adjustments of any general rule on the subject to fit the peculiar circumstances of the nation at this critical juncture in the world's history.

The chaotic and dangerous conditions existing at the federal level have their counterpart in the states, except that wire tapping by local police is largely in the domain of gambling and vice. Statutes of some type or other forbid wire tapping in practically every state. Yet a recent authoritative study reached the melancholy conclusion that "despite the statutes and judicial decisions which purport to regulate wire tapping, today this practice flourishes as a wide-open operation at the federal, state, municipal and private levels."¹³

Measures adopted by New York State under a constitutional amendment of 1938, designed to bring wire tapping by law enforcement officials in that state under adequate legal controls, have so far proved ineffectual. Abuses under the statute, which permits wire tapping by the police under court order, have led to specific proposals by the New York State Bar Association for tightening up the procedure so as to eliminate the indiscriminate use of wire tapping.¹⁴

ENGLISH PRACTICE

Probably the one single element which is responsible above all others for the unparalleled co-operation prevailing today between the police and the public in England is the complete integrity of the police under the law. They enjoy popular confidence and esteem because the people know they will not overstep the safeguards to individual liberty provided under the law and rigorously protected by the courts. These safeguards have their basis in the same great common-law doctrines recognized also by all American courts—the rule against self-incrimination and its counterpart, the rule against the admission of compulsory confessions in evidence.

The Judges' Rules

To simplify the practical application of these doctrines, certain working rules for the guidance of the police of England and Wales in the questioning of suspected or arrested persons have been formulated, known as the Judges' Rules. The first four were drawn up at the request of the Home Secretary in 1912, and the remaining five in 1918, at which time they were first brought prominently to the notice of the police. While intended merely as administrative directions, they have come to have the force of law and are a very important part of the instructions issued to every constable. The text of these rules appears in full in the Report of the Royal Commission on Police Powers and Procedure of March 16, 1929, which will be referred to subsequently.¹⁵

The Judges' Rules relate mainly to police cautioning of suspects and persons in custody. They permit a police officer, when endeavoring to discover the author of a crime, to question anyone, whether suspected or not, from whom he thinks he may obtain useful information. But upon deciding to charge a person with a crime, he should first caution such person. The usual form of the police caution today is: "You are not obliged to say anything, but anything you say may be given in evidence."¹⁶ Formerly, the phrase "in evidence against you" was employed, but the last two words are now omitted.

The Rules also provide that the usual caution should be given when persons in custody are questioned, or if the prisoner wishes to volunteer any statement, or when a person in custody wishes to reply to a statement taken separately from a person charged with the same offense. When a person is formally charged with a crime, the wording of the caution is as follows: "Do you wish to say anything in answer to the charge? You are not obliged to say anything unless you wish to do so, but whatever you say will be taken down in writing and may be given in evidence." Any suggestion that his answer can only be used in evidence against him should be avoided, as it might prevent an innocent person from making a statement which might help to clear him. If there is not time to give the caution before the prisoner makes a statement, that will not render the statement inadmissible in evidence but he should be cautioned as soon as possible.

pp. 58-60, and in the article by T. E. St. Johnston, "The Legal Limitation of the Interrogation of Suspects and Prisoners in England and Wales," Journal of Criminal Law and Criminology, Vol. 39, No. 1 (May-June 1948), p. 94.

¹⁶ Moriarty's Police Law, supra note 15, p. 59.

Regarding the questioning of persons in custody, the Rules specifically prohibit the cross-examining or questioning of a prisoner making a voluntary statement, except such questioning as may be necessary to remove an ambiguity in something he has actually said—for example, whether an hour mentioned was in the morning or evening. They are also interpreted as prohibiting questions to a person on the crime for which he is in custody.¹⁷ Any statement made in accordance with the Rules should, whenever possible, be taken down in writing and signed by the maker after it has been read to him and he has been invited to make any corrections.

The caution referred to in the Judges' Rules was originally administered by the examining magistrate, whose duties formerly were similar to those of a police officer investigating crime today. It had become a police practice by the beginning of the nineteenth century. Its purpose is to insure that the prisoner's statement is voluntary and to establish to the satisfaction of the court that the prisoner knew he was under no obligation to make a statement or to incriminate himself.

The Royal Commission on Police Powers and Procedure

A Royal Commission on Police Powers and Procedure was appointed in 1928 to consider the general powers and duties of police in England and Wales in the investigation of crimes and offenses, and specifically to inquire into the practice followed in interrogating or taking statements from persons interviewed in the course of the investigation of crime. The Commission was requested to report on whether such powers and duties were properly exercised "with due regard to the rights and liberties of the subject, the interests of justice, and the observance of the Judges' Rules both in the letter and the spirit."

The report of the Royal Commission, after an intensive survey of police practices, gave the police practically a clean bill of health. It covered a wide range of problems and offered many valuable suggestions concerning the taking of voluntary statements and other police practices and procedures. It found no credible evidence of the existence of third-degree methods, and stated, "We do not believe that the practice either exists or would be tolerated by the Force itself."¹⁸

The report found concerning the Judges' Rules that the "spirit" of the Rules was faithfully observed by the police, although certain ambiguities in the language of the Rules had caused some divergencies in practice. The report strongly recommended that all persons in custody, immediately on arrival at the police station, be allowed facilities to consult with their legal advisers, and also with their friends except where the interests of justice might forbid, and that each person be specifically informed of his rights in these respects.

The entire document—while by no means uncritical at many points—is a testimonial to the high standards of conduct and performance achieved under English police practice.

PROPOSALS FOR HIGHER POLICE STANDARDS

The one best remedy for the specific abuses considered in this article is their outlawing by the police themselves through the adoption of higher standards of police practice. Not only is this entirely feasible; it has already been done in two conspicuous examples. The English police changed in relatively short order from a state of utter inefficiency and corruption to a model system through the establishment of professional standards of practical operation early in the nineteenth century. Our own FBI under its present direction has attained such world-wide eminence through the adoption of superior standards of investigation and procedure that it is hard to believe that only a little over thirty years ago it was considered "one of the worst law enforcement organizations in the country" and "almost a national disgrace."¹⁹

The following proposals are offered as effectual steps toward eliminating the use of the third degree, other police brutality, and wire-tapping abuses. Most of them are already the law or the practice, and all have the endorsement of leading police authorities or official bodies.

1. No law enforcement official should use force, threat, or other inducement of any kind to obtain a confession or other evidence of crime.

2. In all cases of arrest, the arresting officer shall take the person arrested before the committing magistrate without unnecessary delay. What might constitute unnecessary delay must be determined on the basis of the facts and circumstances of each particular case. But it should definitely not be interpreted to include prolonged detention to determine guilt or innocence. This determination is the function of the court, not of the police, whose duty consists solely in the collection of sufficient evidence to support a charge against the accused.

3. Upon the arrest of a suspected person, and upon the taking of a voluntary statement from a person in custody, he should be cautioned that he is not obliged to say anything but if he does it may be used in evidence.

4. Persons taken into custody should be afforded the opportunity to consult legal counsel, and also relatives or friends if the interests of justice will not thereby be endangered.

5. Every complaint by a private person against a police officer should be investigated promptly. In minor cases the complainant should be informed of the outcome and the disciplinary action taken, if any; in cases involving attendance of the complainant at an inquiry, the hearings should be public; and a public accounting should be made at regular intervals of all charges and dispositions involving police officers.

6. Wire tapping by law enforcement officials to obtain evidence in criminal and subversive cases should be discontinued, except where authorized by court order or warrant, to be issued only in cases where there is reasonable ground to believe that evidence of crime or subversive activities may be thus obtained. Such an order must specify the line and the person involved, a time limit, and who may have access to the record or to whom the information may be disclosed. An accounting as to use of the order must be made to the court within a specified time and disposition of the record be provided for by the court. Violators of this procedure should be penalized.

Police Unions and the Public Safety

By DON L. KOOKEN and LOREN D. AYRES

UNIONIZATION for the police service has presented troublesome questions of policy for many years. A majority of police administrators are of the opinion that any attempt to apply modern concepts of unionism to the administration of public police service would disclose formidable disadvantages to police employees and to public safety as well. Despite the opinions of police leaders on the question, whenever and wherever severe public criticism of police service occurs, union organizers are quick to seize upon the occasion as an opportunity to arouse among police employees an interest in unionization. As a matter of fact low morale from any cause renders a police department vulnerable to the sales arguments of union organizers.

IMPLICATIONS

Although the past quarter century of police progress has recorded many great achievements, police service has failed to cope with crime. Effective enforcement of criminal law has been a basic responsibility of police service since the birth of the nation but, despite substantial additions of personnel at all levels of police service, statistics show continuing percentage increases in criminal offenses. Some of the blame may be placed upon political intervention, low salaries, overlapping jurisdiction, or corruption of officials, but these factors are not the basic causes of the breakdown. They are symptomatic of more fundamental factors, such as disorganization, lack of cohesion, or inadequate realistic leadership. A situation of this character has a profound effect on the public as well as on police personnel. The public becomes more and more critical of police service and the thousands of loyal and capable police officers throughout the nation find themselves confused and greatly apprehensive of the future.

In other areas of public service there has been a marked trend toward employee unions, but the majority of police administrators are of the opinion that unionism in its present form cannot solve their problem. Before the question can be resolved, a careful examination must be made of unionism—what it offers and whether its objectionable features could be alleviated.

CRAFT UNIONS

Unions are organizations of craftsmen and tradesmen who are primarily engaged in the production of tangible products. The basic function of the union obviously is to deal with the problems arising between management and workmen. In these relationships the union represents the employee collectively in dealing with management; and though the published objectives of the union may include some altruistic aims, in reality they are more deeply concerned with matters of financial betterment.

The success of a union in discharging its obligation to its members is in direct ratio to the number of members involved. The negotiating power of a union depends upon the relative size of the organization; for that reason unions must rely to a great extent upon the power represented nationally rather than locally. Experience has demonstrated clearly that labor unions rely upon threats of force or even violence to obtain their objectives.

The professed aims of craft unions include the assurance of "majority rule," words which imply the autonomy of the local union. In practice, however, we find many instances where national labor leaders in the craft exercise dictatorial power over the locals throughout the nation. There are also recorded instances where organized criminal bands have seized control of local unions and have blocked all attempts of the members to remove them.

The craft unions point to the alluring benefits of collective bargaining in matters pertaining to wage and working conditions, the closed shop, and the checkoff system. The courts have declared, however, that municipalities, counties, and states are without power to enter into collective bargaining agreements with their employees. Statutes, civil service rules and regulations, and departmental regulations define the procedure under which police officers are selected and appointed and thus deny to police employees the benefits of the closed shop so greatly emphasized by craft unions. The courts have declared that in public employment there can be no discrimination of citizen against citizen, union member against nonunion member, where all other eligibility requirements are met. Finally the checkoff system, which provides for withholding union dues from the salaries due to employees, cannot be legally applied to police service, since state and local governments cannot legally be used as collection agencies for private debts.

Over the years a most effective weapon of the union has been the right to strike and although this right may be of importance to a local union when faced with an impasse in local negotiations, it would prove untenable when applied to the public service.

THE PROFESSIONAL IDEAL

In contrast with the selfish interest of craft unions, professional organizations are composed of persons who are engaged in rendering a public service, a service that demands specialized performance and one that is unlimited by compensatory or financial evaluation. The objectives of professional service may seem less tangible than the aims of unionism, and professional ideals transcend all individual financial and social benefits.

The present complexity of law enforcement and public safety has increased the importance of police service to the extent that its present level is comparable to that of public health and public welfare. Both of these public services have enjoyed professional status for some time. For many years police leaders have been using the word profession in speaking of their activities, but as yet they have not given proper consideration to the responsibilities that the word implies.

If police service expects to take its place along with the honored professions of law, medicine, and education, it must accept the appurtenant responsibilities. Police service as it is now conducted does not meet all the requirements of a true profession and, though great progress has been made in a few departments, much remains to be done in the adjustment of police organizations to modern professional concepts. There are no obstacles to attainment of professional status so great that they cannot be surmounted if the police are willing.

The professional concept

Certain essentials are recognized in all professions. These essentials were clearly presented in a report of a committee of the International Association of Chiefs of Police; they are in substance as follows:

1. A profession requires an organized body of knowledge held as a common possession and extended by the united efforts of those engaged in the calling.

2. Facilities must be provided for professional training in these knowledges and procedures.

3. Standards or qualifications must be established and recognized by the members for admission to and identification with the profession.

4. There must be a professional organization of a substantial number of members qualified to practice the profession who will exercise an influence on the maintenance of professional standards and disciplines and who will promote programs of study and research to strengthen and improve present procedures.

5. There must be a code of ethics prescribing standards of conduct in the relationships of the members of the profession with the public and with each other and insisting on the obligation to render professional service for reasons beyond exclusively economic considerations.¹

The professional concept was very aptly presented by Philip Allen, assistant secretary of the Home Office in England, when he said:

The efficiency of the English police service depends at the bottom on the maintenance of happy relationships between police and the public. Sixty thousand unarmed policemen have the responsibility of maintaining the King's peace amongst forty million citizens and they can only do this if they preserve the regard and esteem of the community.

Through sheer devotion to the public interest, without other advantages, the police of Great Britain have come closer to the full acceptance of professional ideals than have those of any other country.

PROFESSIONAL ETHICS AND CRAFT UNIONS

The public demands of its servants more exemplary conduct than it expects of private citizens. It is an inescapable fact that a public official has no private life; as soon as he enters public service and as long as he remains therein, his conduct, whether on or off duty, will be subjected to the unrelenting scrutiny and critical analysis of the public he serves. The agents of law enforcement by reason of their specific responsibilities are bound to an even more exacting code than that applied to other public servants. Delinquencies in conduct that pass unchallenged when committed by other public officials, and acts that are accepted as commonplace in judging the propriety of the private citizen's conduct, are adjudged reprehensible when committed by policemen.

Police have done little as a group to set standards of official conduct for their members. They have relied in the main upon departmental rules and regulations to set the pattern for their public relationships. In most police organizations, however, such rules and regulations relate principally to specific techniques and procedures, and therefore they cannot have much influence in shaping the general official conduct of policemen in their relations with the public. Some law enforcement agencies place great reliance on the solemnity of the oath of office or departmental pledge to impel men to exemplary conduct but these oaths and pledges are usually at the other extreme from departmental regulations, being too brief and general to be of any great value as guides.

Inasmuch as craft unions are built upon the basic concepts of collective bargaining, the closed shop, and the right to strike, their objectives are concerned with the interests of a majority of the membership with emphasis upon shorter hours, higher pay, and better working conditions, and they evince little concern over how their demands will affect the employer. When their basic concept is that the interests of the union override and are often contrary to the interests of the employer, their position becomes incongruous and untenable.

The union's consideration of employee capabilities usually ends with the prescribed apprenticeship, and from then on promotion is based principally upon seniority. This practice, with the theory behind it, runs contrary to the common principles of all merit systems, including civil service.

An example of the potential incompatibility of unionism and the professional ideal is found in the pledge required of members of the American Federation of State, County and Municipal Employees:

I pledge my honor to observe faithfully the constitution and laws of this local of the American Federation of State, County and Municipal Employees and the rules and regulations for the government thereof; not to make public any of the proceedings of this local; to perform faithfully all the duties assigned to me; to support the products and services of organized labor by making purchases of such products and services; to so conduct myself at all times as not to bring reproach upon my local; and at all times to bear true and faithful allegiance to the American Federation of State, County and Municipal Employees and to the labor movement in general.

Can a public police officer accept the above pledge and still be true to his oath of office?

REPRESENTATION

Although there are a large number of public police officers in the United States, they are not represented by any organization that would be comparable to the professional associations of law, medicine, and education. This lack of an official representative body has resulted in the formation of many police associations and benefit societies, the majority of which are restricted to single departments or to specific services within a single department, even though they may have ambitions toward national or even international expansion. A few have developed rapidly; for example, the Fraternal Order of Police now has lodges located in twenty states of the Union and the order is still growing. Some of these associations are of long standing and include all levels of police personnel in their membership. They have recorded satisfactory accomplishments in many areas and a few have developed sufficient strength to constitute effective lobbying groups.

Departmental benefit and fraternal associations provide social activities for policemen and their families that have been strong incentives toward better morale. In the main these benefit associations have not aspired to national or international growth. In some areas the organization of police groups, leagues, and associations has been undertaken by professional organizers whose objectives are primarily mercenary. In these attempts some solicitation of funds from outside usually develops and often results in damaging compromise. In most cases these activities are short-lived but in their brief period of existence they may become very damaging to public support.

Some police administrators bitterly oppose the formation of any outside association of police officers, on the ground that as public servants policemen cannot subject themselves to control by any outside agency. A few police administrators have taken exception to a practice followed by a number of police associations of issuing associate membership and courtesy cards to citizens who are in no way connected with police services. One administrator, who fears the compromising implications in such associate memberships, has enacted departmental regulations which forbid any member of the department to accept membership in an association that solicits associate memberships among persons not connected with law enforcement.

Even though some of these police associations have national and international possibilities, in no instance has there been any real progress toward welding the rank and file of police into a truly professional organization. Although the International Association of Chiefs of Police, as presently organized, does not represent the rank and file of police service, it claims that one of its principal purposes is to emphasize the professional character of policing to the public in order to secure full public support of law enforcement. To carry out this obligation, a committee on professionalization was formed. Yet after fifteen or more years of existence, the IACP has failed to record any decisive action toward its avowed purpose. Therefore it would seem that the greatest deterrent to professionalization, at this time, is the police themselves. There is no question that the American Bar Association has been eager to help the police service to attain professional standing and that it has made constructive efforts in this direction. In the last year the American Bar Association's Committee on Organized Crime prepared a model statute by which it sought to improve police service and initiate a step toward professionalization, but its efforts in this instance were very coolly received by the IACP.

A strong selling argument of craft unions in their attempt to penetrate the field of public service has been their claim that by group action ends may be gained that cannot possibly be secured by individual means; they particularly stress the fact that unionization means strength. This promise is particularly alluring to policemen, who naturally desire benefits—social, financial, and other—and who feel that most of the rank and file have no voice or part in shaping their own destiny.

THE RIGHT TO STRIKE

The most effective weapon used by unions in pressing their demands is the threat of strike, and although wide publicity has been given to their political strength it now appears that this alleged power was greatly overrated. The larger craft unions do considerable lobbying at both national and state levels, yet they are not much more effective than are the present police organizations and associations.

There is little direct legislation or judicial opinion relating to the right of police officers to organize into unions and to resort to the use of the strike as a means of securing compliance with their demands. In the absence of legal interpretation it is necessary to examine some trend implied in informal opinions and a few court decisions on questions that were closely related. In these instances the comments and opinions, which are reflective of public opinion and desire, are based upon four concepts.

1. The people, as the employer, must have unilateral control of policy in the management of public police service.²
2. No person acting for the employer can bind the employer in a contractual relationship.³
3. Police service is concerned with emergencies and therefore intentional work stoppages would constitute misfeasances.

4. Employment as a police officer does not constitute a right, but on the contrary is a privilege, subject to such control groups as boards of safety and civil service commissions, who may set the conditions of employment.⁴

Government exists for the protection of life and property and to safeguard the liberty of its citizens. In order to insure the full protection of all citizens sovereignty must be maintained. Any defect in police service is a weakness of the governmental unit. As agents of government policemen can have no other allegiance than to their government, particularly in the exercise of the authority granted them by law.

Despite the limitations which are placed upon our police, their authority and power is great. As long as control remains in the hands of government and government remains in the hands of the people, we need have no fear of this chartered power and authority.

Various opinions

The peculiar status of our police forces has been recognized by our courts whenever issues involving the loyalties and obligations of police have come up. In Coane v. Geary the court quoted as follows:

A police force is peculiar, sui generis, you may say, in its formation and its relation to the city government. It is practically an organized force resembling in many respects a military force, organized under the laws of the United States and equally as important as to the functions it is required to perform. . . . It is a department which requires that the members of it shall surrender their individual opinion and power to act, and submit to that of a controlling head just as much as the common soldier must surrender his own opinion and power of action to that of his commanding officer. And there is the same necessity of discipline—of regulation existing in the police department that exists in regard to the military department.⁵

The American Federation of Labor as early as 1897 was opposed to police unions on the ground that "it is not within the province of the trade union movement to especially organize policemen."⁶ Later the American Federation of Labor reversed its earlier holding.

Calvin Coolidge, as governor of Massachusetts, said in justifying the dismissal of Boston police after their strike of 1919:

A strike of policemen of a great city, leaving that city at the mercy of an army of thugs, is a crime against civilization. In my judgment, the obligation of a policeman is as sacred and direct as the obligation of a soldier. He is a public servant, not a private employee, and the whole honor of the community is in his hands. He has no right to prefer any private advantages to public safety.⁷

President Franklin D. Roosevelt, in a letter to the president of the National Federation of Federal Employees in 1937, said:

All government employees should realize that the process of collective bargaining, as usually understood, cannot be transplanted into the public service. It has its distinct and insurmountable limitations when applied to public personnel management. The very nature and purposes of government make it impossible for administrative officials to represent fully or to bind the employer in mutual discussions with government employee organizations. The employer is the whole people, who speak by means of laws enacted by their representatives in Congress. Accordingly, administrative officials and employees alike are governed and guided, and in many instances restricted, by laws which establish policies, procedures, or rules in personal matters.

Particularly, I want to emphasize my conviction that militant tactics have no place in the functions of any organization of Government employees. Upon employees in the Federal service rests the obligation to serve the whole people, whose interests and welfare require orderliness and continuity in the conduct of government activities. This obligation is paramount. Since their own services have to do with the functioning of the government, a strike of public employees manifests nothing less than an intent on their part to prevent or obstruct the operations of government until their demands are satisfied. Such action, looking toward the paralysis of government by those who have sworn to support it, is unthinkable and intolerable.⁸

Law enforcement machinery is an instrument of the people, and the effectiveness of its application depends upon the preparation, training, and integrity of the policemen upon whose shoulders the burden of application falls. There is no short cut to a solution; there is no new technique or procedure that can be advanced as a panacea. The crime problem is slowly but steadily growing despite increases in police strength, exposures of crime combines, investigations by legislative committees and by civilian crime commissions, and eloquent promises of political aspirants. At every session of our legislatures, state and national, myriads of new laws are passed, some describing new criminal offenses, many amending the old, a great majority introduced in the fatuous belief that crime may be reduced by putting teeth into the law.

As the records stand, unions have in no way demonstrated their ability to aid in meeting the past needs of law enforcement, and an examination into their methods and procedures fails to give any encouragement that they can be depended upon in future developments. August Vollmer states that it is now evident that an entirely new method of combating crime must be devised, one based upon facts and scientific research, and that every law enforcement officer should be professionally trained for the office he occupies.⁹

The professionalization of police service now rests in the hands of the policemen themselves, but it is doubtful whether there is sufficient interest among them at this time to effect the transition. Recently a growing public dissatisfaction in police service has been evident, and this public interest and concern may do much to expedite a true professionalization of police service.

INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS AND WORLD GOVERNMENT

BROWN, WILLIAM ADAMS, JR., and REDVERS OPIE. American Foreign Assistance. Pp. xii, 615. Washington, D. C.: Brookings Institution, 1953. $6.00.

Over $90 billion of foreign assistance was made available by the United States during the twelve years, 1941-52. This support, as an instrument of American foreign policy, has raised many complex and controversial issues, which Drs. Brown and Opie analyze in carefully competent and meticulous detail. They trace the various programs, from lend-lease through mutual security, examine the policy issues that arose, and appraise the results achieved, in this first authoritative survey of the assistance record as a whole.

The study is divided into six parts. The first deals with aid during World War II; the second with early postwar assistance policy; the third with European recovery, principally the Marshall Plan and the Economic Cooperation Administration (ECA); the fourth mainly with aid programs for Asia and the underdeveloped countries. Part Five is devoted to military assistance and mutual security, while the final part provides an evaluation of policies and operations over the whole twelve-year period.

That our foreign aid programs were effective first in helping to defeat wartime fascist dictatorships, and later in containing what was likely, in the absence of postwar help, to have been a far greater expansion of the Communist dictatorship than actually occurred, is made abundantly clear. That Greece, Italy, Yugoslavia, France, and others might have been engulfed by the octopus tentacles of Soviet Communist imperialism, had it not been for the Truman doctrine, the Marshall Plan, ECA, and the Mutual Security Agency (MSA), is an inescapable conclusion of this excellent study. The authors declare: "Whatever degree of confidence may be felt that the existing crisis in international relations may be overcome without another world war is in large measure attributable to the counterpoise to the forces of aggression provided by American power," and, "In looking at the record of foreign assistance during the past 12 years, the conclusion is inescapable that impressive results have been achieved in overcoming the economic and military weaknesses of the immediate postwar years. By maintaining foreign assistance during the cold war, the United States has in addition exposed increasingly the meretricious character of the Communist ideological appeal and kept people from going over into the Communist camp."

Whatever impact this survey may have on the formulation of future policy will be all to the good in view of its wise and reasoned conclusions. The authors, for example, warn against the end of economic assistance, declaring, "Least of all should economic strength be put in a secondary place, because it is the foundation of military strength." And they realistically note that an almost indefinite continuation of foreign aid may be a necessity of American policy. It is to be regretted that policy developments of the new administration in this area could not have been subjected to the authoritative and informed scrutiny of the authors. It would not be very difficult, however, to guess how they view the probable end of all economic aid, the evisceration of Point Four, and the unfortunate prospect of less trade and less aid.

MACK, ROBERT T., JR. Raising the World's Standard of Living; The Coordination and Effectiveness of Point Four, United Nations Technical Assistance, and Related Programs. Pp. xviii, 285. New York: Citadel Press, 1953. $4.00.

This work presents a detailed documentation of the efforts over the first half of this century of the more developed nations to aid in the socioeconomic development of the less advanced countries. Viewed only as such a documentation, it is of importance both to the observer and the practitioner in the current national and international efforts to aid the underdeveloped areas. This history of activity before the last war provides perspective often lost sight of in discussions of this problem.

However, this is more than a mere historical treatment of the problem. With the historical base, the author demonstrates the growing need for co-ordination of the activities of the various agencies, national and international, offering assistance. It is here, perhaps, that the author presumes too great an understanding of the problem on the part of the casual reader. There is no clear-cut analysis of the dangers inherent in the lack of, and thus the imperative need for, co-ordination in this field. This is unfortunate because the need is apparent to the practitioners but perhaps is not so evident to that very casual reader whose assistance is necessary if effective corrective measures are to be insisted upon and taken.

The author then proceeds with an exhaustive study of the procedural steps taken by the United Nations to provide co-ordination for the expanded program of Technical Assistance being undertaken by it and the specialized agencies; of the similar steps taken by illustrative regional organizations; and of the steps taken by the United States as an aid-giving nation. There is here a fine portrayal of the conflict of interest inherent in attempts at any level to achieve co-ordination of the activities of groups of agencies with specialized interests whose representatives want the blessings of co-ordination but dislike sacrificing their own control of their individual programs. The description of the UN and regional actions is also a good portrayal of the conflicting interests of the participating governments.

The study is rounded out by a description of an aid-recipient country. This does disclose the conflicts in an aid-recipient country which interfere with the carrying out of balanced development programs but since it is limited to one country would seem to be of limited value as an illustration.

It is unfortunate that the study was ended in June of 1950 because by that time the programs of Technical and Economic Assistance in question had not been in operation long enough to allow the author to analyze the effectiveness of the co-ordination procedures in action.

THOMAS, ANN VAN WYNEN. Communism Versus International Law: Today's Clash of Ideals. Pp. xiv, 145. Dallas, Tex.: Southern Methodist University Press, 1953. $3.75.

The author holds degrees of A.B., LL.B., and LL.M., from Rochester, Texas, and Southern Methodist Universities respectively. As State Department Foreign Service Officer she was assigned to the Union of South Africa to study social welfare problems and "had ample opportunity to observe the workings of international law."

From an impressive background of recent literature the author surveys the development of international law among the ancient Chinese, Hindus, Greeks, and Romans, tracing it through the Middle Ages, the Renaissance, and the Reformation, and through the periods of Enlightenment, Positivism, and present-day Scepticism. Of the post-Reformation era, Grotius, Pufendorf, Vattel, and followers are duly cited as Protestant writers with the religio-ethical approach. Following the vogue among latter-day authors, Mrs. Thomas passes by Victoria, Ayala, and Suarez, of the Counter-Reformation, though Grotius concedes that the works of the first two "may be of service to others." Suarez, whom Grotius does not mention, anticipated the latter in the significant differentiation between jus gentium and jus inter gentes, law of nations and law among nations (international law). The writings of Victoria, Ayala, Suarez, Grotius, and followers are available in English in Classics of International Law published by the Carnegie Institution for International Peace.

The author's fundamental approach is revealed in the chapter- and subheadings, here condensed and simplified: Ethical nature of international law in relation to natural law, Christianity, and democracy, with derivative concepts of tolerance, equity, good faith, and indestructible rights of the individual. Concepts of international law toward a core of common reaction and sense of justice. Marxian ideological impact on international law in relation to morality, individual, and war, in the setting of semantic fraud. Revitalization of the ethical basis and efficacy of mid-twentieth century international law in the frame of Western concepts and democratic co-operation.

In summary, the basis of law and order is the golden rule for individual, family, community, and nation, as the foundation for the security of civilization. Militant Shintoism, Fascism, and Nazism were checked in World War II. Expanding in its ruthless materialism, Communism threatens to succeed where the other isms failed. Only by mutual practice of the golden rule may the free world hope to stem the new aggressor in his cold war designs.

This crusading little book commends attention from lay and professional organizations alive to the problem of enforcement of international law as posed by the inconclusive results of the United Nations' punitive Korean venture.

CLINE, HOWARD F. The United States and Mexico. Pp. xvi, 452. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1953. $6.00.

This original, penetrating analysis will awaken interest and commendation not only among students of Mexico and of Mexican-United States relations but among students of international affairs generally. Employing the techniques of anthropology, Dr. Cline has produced a study which is at once substantial and sensitive, solid and perceptive. Not before have we had such a book on Mexico. Now that it has come it will afford much stimulation and delight.

Mexico and the United States are neighboring countries. Thus they have been for an appreciable time. Thus they promise to be for some time to come. Over the years, their relations have presented all the variety which one would have considered most tempting to the taste of historians and analysts of international fare. It is curious that they have been relatively so neglected by scholars on both sides of the border.

The works of such scholars as Samuel Flagg Bemis, J. Fred Rippey, J. M. Callahan, and Frank Tannenbaum have provided introductions to the subject of United States-Mexican relations. The studies of F. S. Dunn, S. A. McCardle, R. D. Gregg and W. C. Gordon have been on specialized aspects of these relations. All of these have been notable and useful but we have been greatly in need of more. This need the full and perceptive study of Dr. Cline goes far toward meeting. As the first comprehensive study of our neighbor to the south and our relations with it, his book achieves an enviable familiarity with the wide range of factors—psychological as well as economic, political, and military—which have strangely compounded these relationships. It possesses, as I have said, all the perceptiveness of an anthropological approach.

At the same time, I know Dr. Cline will be the first to welcome a discussion of certain of his views. This cannot be extensive in so concise a space as this. But I can give a few samples of the questions which he raises. Dr. Cline states it as a "fundamental consideration" that Mexico "will remain very Mexican" (p. 2). However, Mexico grows less and less "Mexican" with each passing year, and its uneasiness over this development is one of the most perceptible factors in its political and commercial relations with the United States. I find it also difficult to agree that "the late-nineteenth-century Mexican system against which the Revolution was launched had been largely constructed and run by Porfirio Díaz and his supporters" (p. 5). "Run," yes; but I believe a fairly creditable case could be made that the Revolution was and continues to be against a system in many significant features indigenous, some of which were reinforced by Cortés. The Díaz regime seems to have been a later veneer of an old system. Nor do I believe Mexican history justifies the statement that "Mexicans since 1910 have been valiantly and stubbornly starting nearly everything from scratch" (p. 5).

There will be readers who will question, also, such statements as that which credits Mexico with exercising "consistent leadership in hemispheric affairs" (p. 9). Dr. Cline's belief that contacts between the two countries are now "largely routine" may have been responsible for a treatment of the afosa story (pp. 394-5) in routine fashion whereas the latter was as revealing as any development of recent years of the imaginative tact and ingenuity that are contributed to the relationships of these two countries of different histories and mentalities. Such passages as these make the book something less than perfect, but it stands as an original, penetrating, well-rounded analysis for which all those who seek understanding of and among the human family can be indeed most grateful.

HUGHES, H. STUART. The United States and Italy. Pp. xiii, 256. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1953. $4.00.

This short book (overpriced in view of its brevity) is published in the "American Foreign Policy Library," now edited by Professor Donald C. McKay. The first three chapters give a bird's eye view of Italy, its land, people, and history. Chapters 3-6 briefly describe the Fascist regime both before and during World War II. Chapters 7-9 deal with the Christian Democrats, their political policies as well as their failure to handle the underlying economic and population pressures of Italy in an effective and imaginative manner. The tenth, and last, chapter of the book covers "Italy and the Atlantic Community," including an all-too-brief discussion of Italo-American relations. Despite the title, the book is therefore more in the nature of a general introduction into Italy's past and present rather than an analysis of the United States and Italy, as the title promises.

Professor Stuart is very well qualified to write on Italy, as he understands both the pressing economic and institutional problems of the country as well as its psychological imponderables. It is therefore doubly regrettable that the book does not quite come off. In the first place, the volume is so short that the material rarely opens up new vistas of fact or interpretation. Secondly, in the opinion of this reviewer too much of the scarce space is allocated to background and history, and too little to contemporary problems. Italy is vulnerable to both Communist penetration and neo-Fascist revival, and its loss to the free world would be of immense importance. The author would therefore have performed a greater service by concentrating on the crucial issues of the present and the prospects of the near future rather than by going over well covered ground of the pre-Fascist and Fascist periods. Professor Hughes shows penetrating judgment and perspective in appraising the postwar regime under the leadership of de Gasperi and other Christian Democrats. He sharply criticizes the Christian Democrats for their failures, in particular, in the economic and social realm, but he is realistic enough to see that, given the circumstances of the Italian situation, the alternatives of Communism or Fascism would hardly have been preferable from the Italian or general Western viewpoint.

HUREWITZ, J. C. Middle East Dilemmas: The Background of United States Policy. Pp. xiv, 273. New York: Harper & Brothers, 1953. $3.75.

Written early in 1953, this volume is a concise summary of the foreign affairs of Turkey, Iran, Egypt, Palestine-Israel, Syria, Lebanon, Iraq, Jordan, and Saudi Arabia. With the emphasis on the contemporary scene, Dr. Hurewitz has demonstrated the rapid growth of American concern and involvement within the area during the last decade. He classifies, perhaps unjustly, most of the present unresolved situations in the region, and principally those of Suez, Iranian oil, and the partition of Palestine as the dilemmas for the United States in the Middle East.

The impasse of the British with regard to Egypt and the Canal and the Sudan and to Iran and the oil company is still with us, but present indications lead one to surmise that acceptable compromises and solutions may not be too far removed. Thus, some of the dilemmas may be more apparent than real. As for the Arab-Israeli struggle, Dr. Hurewitz has marshaled facts and figures to support his contention of a dilemma there for the United States. The manner in which some of these facts have been presented leaves in a number of places something to be desired, with the result that the total picture is not entirely objective. Anyway, the dilemma on this point is not in the Middle East so much as it is on this side of the Atlantic!

The most important sections of the book are those which tell the story of the evolving affairs of the individual states of the Middle East with the outside world in the nineteenth and twentieth centuries. The rivalries of Great Britain, Russia, France, and Germany are shown in fine perspective within the framework of the Ottoman Empire and the growing nationalisms of the local populations. Dr. Hurewitz rightly emphasizes the problems facing the United States in this area and stresses the difficulties of strengthening the political, economic, and military forces of the countries as part of the policy of containment of Soviet Russia at a time when the force of Britain, America's ally, is being sorely tried by Iran's nationalization of oil resources and by the demands of the renaissance Arabs.

For the moment this is the true dilemma, and Dr. Hurewitz's two concluding chapters indicate how the United States is trying to remove this dilemma—one by economic and technical assistance, and the other through a more skillful diplomacy in explaining American aims and in clearly demonstrating the meaning of American democracy.

KIMCHE, JON. Seven Fallen Pillars: The Middle East 1945-1952. Pp. xxvi, 439. New York: Frederick A. Praeger, 1953. $4.50.

At the end of 1951, the author of this book reminds us, Americans picked the Persian Premier Mossadegh as "the Man of the Year," and the British selected him as their choice for "the Joke of the Year." The Middle East, in the words of Jon Kimche, is becoming an American, rather than a British, headache. As British influence is declining, American is taking its place. And the author's great question is: Can American capitalism embark in this area on a progressive social policy which alone, he believes, can bring political stability? Can it find willing allies among the local peoples in that policy's pursuit?

They can do so only if they are willing to heed the lessons of the past and learn from made-in-Britain mistakes. "To trace how, often with the highest motives, the British went wrong, is the main purpose of this book."

The British made common cause, the author tells us, with the pashas and effendis of the region. That was and still is the ruling minority, feudalistically self-centered, unaware of the existence of the great twentieth century "revolt of the masses." They preach patriotism but seldom practice it, except when xenophobia pays rich dividends.

It is the paradox of paradoxes that the British cultivated effendi affiliations for presumably democratic reasons. The Middle East became their bailiwick after World War I, where Pax Britannica had one of its main pivots. That peace could be maintained, in their view, by co-operating with the regional masters. Theirs was not the mission to foment social revolutions. Democracy demanded that the wishes of the "natives" should be heeded. These natives were the effendis and through them Britain ruled.

The falsity of this policy was revealed in the spring of 1948, the author tells us, when a handful of Jews defeated the Arab world. "The Arab officers were too fat," another observer had said, "the soldiers were too lean." The effendi rule was then exposed to the challenge to which the response was missing. This revealed the danger facing the Western World. The Arab Middle East is filled with independent countries only on the map. In reality, no country is independent that displays such weakness. The pivotal point of one of the great strategic areas has turned out to be a power vacuum. On the very edges of this void the Soviets are in ambush. This is the kind of situation furnishing the explosive ingredients of which world tragedies are made.

The "Seven Pillared Worthy House" of T. E. Lawrence, which was to house the free people of the Middle East, is in ruins. However, the author does not despair if America can learn from Britain's error and makes an attempt to work with the representatives of the people and not merely with those of material interests. The two forgotten people, Arab and Jew, may yet build up the Worthy House.

AMERICAN GOVERNMENT AND HISTORY

BURKE, ROBERT E. Olson's New Deal for California. Pp. xi, 279. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1953. $4.00.

If, as President of the United States, Franklin Roosevelt had the advantage of all the breaks, they were all against Culbert Olson as Governor of California. As Burke points out, California embraced the New Deal too late; Olson was a victim of bad luck—his own ill health, the death of his wife, the almost complete absence of press support; his strange lack of tact and statesmanlike leadership created enemies who blocked his reform program.

The book is based upon Mr. Burke's doctoral dissertation—which comes as no surprise to the reader. He has employed something like 100,000 words to develop his thesis, which is more than ample copy; his bibliography covers almost a dozen pages, including between 35 and 40 unpublished theses and dissertations; footnote citations, collected at the end of the book, run to a staggering total of between 800 and 900. The inclusion of innumerable details, many of them of slight significance, and the introduction of numerous quite inconspicuous persons may unfortunately be characteristic of doctoral dissertations, but they certainly do not make for smooth reading and do tend to impair the perspective of the whole. • There is evidence of prodigious industry and meticulousity; but the busy reader is likely to complain that the product savors of the boy Einstein referred to as "trying to split wood with his razor." Because of this, certain matters of major import, as the evacuation of the Japanese from California during the Second World War, under orders of General John L. DeWitt, are not given sufficient relative importance.

The author succeeds in presenting a dispassionate treatise, though the style of the book would be considerably enhanced if it had a little of the sparkle of Upton Sinclair as he proclaimed his E P I C program preceding the Olson administration.

Governor Olson came to power in the depth of the great depression (the election was held November 8, 1938)—the first Democratic governor following a long succession of Republican administrations. He had his moments of triumph and glory, as when in 1940 he headed the delegation to the Democratic National Convention. But bitter disappointment was his when he failed to hold his own party in line, or even to hold it together. He was never quite able to discover the correct formula for really successful administration. And then, during much of his administration, there was the constant threat of recall hanging over his head. There was precious little clear sailing throughout his entire term. Here was "a governor whose New Deal never came to pass," despite his high professions and lofty ideals.

The publisher of Burke's book has done an expert job of printing, as one would expect, though a very small number of errors and a few pages with blurred printing (pp. 86, 98, 114) have slipped in. But two or three questions come to the reviewer's mind. Was it desirable to emphasize further the already solemn subject matter by binding the book in lugubrious dead black? And just how do the innovations of using completely lower case letters for chapter headings and the placing of page headlines at the bottom—in caps—comport with the otherwise somber appearance of the volume and the seriousness of its contents?

Dr. Burke's book will probably not attract a very large number of popular readers; but it constitutes a detailed account of one of the most interesting chapters in California's recent political history. The serious student will be grateful for his scrupulously painstaking record.

Craven, Avery O. The Growth of Southern Nationalism, 1848-1861. Vol. VI of "A History of the South" edited by Wendell Holmes Stephenson and E. Merton Coulter. Pp. xv, 433. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1953. $6.50.

To obtain the integrated picture of the development of Southern nationalism, one should read in rapid succession Professor Sydnor's The Development of Southern Sectionalism, 1819-48 and Professor Craven's The Growth of Southern Nationalism, 1848-1861. For, as Craven points out, the period covered by his volume is a continuation and an acceleration of the trends and forces already active. The sectional issues of the entire period from 1800 to 1860 were concerned chiefly with the acquisition and organization of territories and states. The Louisiana Purchase, the admission of the state of Louisiana, the admission of Missouri, and the annexation of Texas were the larger issues prior to 1845; the Mexican War with its territorial acquisitions, the Kansas-Nebraska controversy, the Dred Scott decision, and the campaign of 1860 were the basic sectional territorial issues after 1845.

The sectional balance of power, the expansion or restriction of slavery as a political and moral issue, were the very essence of all these sectional controversies over territories. The winning side in the organization of a territory or state stood to gain two senators and one or more representatives.

In the earlier years, the issue of slavery had been primarily political. But as time passed, spokesmen of the North, swayed by the abolitionist zealots, more and more cast slavery in the role of an all-pervasive sin. Slavery came to be the dark symbol of all things Southern. For the North, to keep slavery out of the territories, and thus put an end to its expansion and to the power of the South in the national government, was a great moral duty. At the same time, however, it was understood that such weakening of the political power of the agricultural South would bring untold benefits to the economic interests of the rapidly industrializing Northern sections—often at Southern expense.

With the annexation of Texas, the territorial limits of slavery seem to have been reached. After that the territorial issue was a battle over abstractions: The North insisted on the moral right to exclude slavery from those arid and barren regions from which nature had already excluded it; and at the same time Southern leaders were demanding their "constitutional rights" to carry slavery into these same territories where it could not go, and to have it protected.

Running through Mr. Craven's volume is the theme that, in the minds of the Northern people on the one hand, and of the Southern people on the other, the sectional quarrel was between moral right and constitutional rights. But it should always be remembered that the American people from the days of the Revolution had regarded constitutional rights—life, liberty, property, freedom of speech, and so on—as God-given natural rights, certainly moral rights: Right and rights were identical in the minds of most Americans.

The great contribution that Mr. Craven makes in this generally readable and useful account of the period is his thorough study of popular Southern reaction to the sectional issues as revealed in the public press. It is the picture of a conservative people, not greatly swayed by the bitter debates in and out of Congress, slowly and regretfully reaching the conclusion that separation from the North was necessary for the survival of the South.

PRATT, FLETCHER. Stanton: Lincoln's Secretary of War. Pp. xiii, 520. New York: W. W. Norton & Company, 1953. $5.95.

This book will bring pleasure to those who have wanted a new, virile, and appreciative book-length account of Edwin Stanton. Probably no one has ever minded having Stanton's faults pointed out; but many have been annoyed at the malevolent calumny that has been heaped upon him. They have wished to have it reaffirmed in ringing sentences that Stanton was truly a great Secretary of War—exact, efficient, incorruptible himself and dreaded by those who were corruptible—who did not engage in devious practices to thwart his Chief or frustrate generals.

The book moves swiftly. But Mr. Pratt was not so eager to see Stanton cleaning up the bad legacy of Simon Cameron that he slighted his youth and education in Ohio, his rapid rise to the top of the legal profession, his family life, and his previous service to the country. Stanton cleared government titles to lands in California worth about $150 million, showing alleged conveyances from Mexico to be fraudulent; no dollar tag can be put on his stiffening influence in the Buchanan administration after he became Attorney General in December 1860.

With preliminaries well disposed of, one can imagine Mr. Pratt taking satisfaction in having Stanton post, in the War Office on January 20, 1862, an order saving one day a week for Congressmen, one for the public, and reserving the other four to "active operations in the field." Effectively he comments, "He was the man of war in the place of war." The 270 pages that follow are essentially an account of the Civil War as seen from the Secretary's office, with emphasis on capacities—frequently incapacities—of generals, Stanton's relations with Lincoln, and his own acts. Occasionally there may be a minor error (Confederate forces did not go through Cumberland Gap in August 1862, for it was then in Federal hands), but the over-all account and evaluations are, according to this reviewer's judgment, discriminating and sound.

Less than 40 pages are devoted to the period from Lincoln's death to that of Stanton, a few days after he was appointed to the Supreme Court. (Mr. Pratt has him die on December 23, 1869, instead of December 24.) But the essentials of the Reconstruction controversy are there, unencumbered, clearly analyzed, and readably set forth. Just as Mr. Pratt sees military events and personages from a good background, so he grasps political questions realistically. He does not gloss over attacks on Stanton. He gives, in fact, an appendix that deals with the controversies.

Some may criticize because Mr. Pratt did not delve extensively into new sources and come up with fresh facts. No new facts, however, will change the minds of those who accept what McClellan and Welles said about Stanton; and without discounting the importance of further research, one can urge that what was first needed was a reappraisal such as Mr. Pratt has given.

RODICK, BURLEIGH CUSHING. American Constitutional Custom: A Forgotten Factor in the Founding. Pp. xx, 244. New York: Philosophical Library, 1953. $4.75.

The theme of this volume is that the United States has a political and constitutional heritage derived from English customs and at the same time from constitutional customs which were the product of the American political climate. In support of this conclusion Mr. Rodick mobilizes documentary and secondary materials from English history and American colonial and national history from 1620 to 1829 in seven chapters, 140 pages of text, 66 pages of notes, and 26 pages of bibliography. With the author's emphasis on the historical continuity of English political principles, institutions, and practices in American constitutional development few will take exception. However, by this time it is no novelty to read that the Constitution was not an original invention of the framers, but rather the product of generations and even centuries of English history and colonial experience.

Of a different nature is the manner in which the author links specific phases of American constitutional growth with certain so-called counterparts in English history and his extremely loose use of the term custom to which Mr. Rodick attributes a versatility it hardly possesses. Custom is used synonymously with traditions, habits, institutions, practices, and principles. Thus we find designated as customs such things as English feudalism (p. 13), struggles for power (p. 19), identification of one's intent with the general welfare (p. 20), poor administration and lax law enforcement (p. 26), the conflict between seaboard and frontier (p. 31), checks and balances (p. 28), smuggling (p. 37), and the oppression of the weak by the strong (p. 66), not to mention other examples of a similar nature.

Narrowly specific counterparts and parallels are found in the English Puritan Revolution and the American Revolution to demonstrate the continuity of custom broadly defined. Analogies between the defections of Edmund Waller and Charles Lee, the failures of the Uxbridge and Staten Island Conferences (p. 49), the difficulties of Cromwell and Washington with Parliament and Congress (p. 49), John Milton and Thomas Paine (p. 55), and Stuart Restoration and the Constitution of 1789 (p. 67) are interesting, but have little bearing on the continuity of political traditions or institutions, however well they may describe a revolutionary process.

The author is on more solid and more familiar ground when he emphasizes the influence upon American constitutionalism of such matters as natural rights, Dr. Bonham's Case, the separation of powers, representative and judicial institutions, colonial charters, and the common law. Even here, however, he tends toward overemphasis when he finds a possible link between the Electors of the Holy Roman Empire and Presidential electors or when he magnifies the influence of Royal disallowance of laws upon the American scheme of judicial review.

By failing to confine his use of custom to a more scientific definition and by introducing interesting, but nonetheless irrelevant items, the author has impaired the effectiveness of his general theme. At the same time, however, he has compiled much valuable material in a short volume and has rendered a service in reminding us once again that American institutions, doctrines, and practices are neither so new and original nor so different as the mystical patriots would endeavor to make us believe. Because of the importance of the footnotes to the text of this book the irritating tendency of publishers to place footnotes at the end of books makes for an especial inconvenience in this instance.

DUFFY, JOHN. Epidemics in Colonial America. Pp. xi, 274. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1953. $4.50.

Those who revel in the good old times should read this book! As epidemic followed epidemic, people lived in dread; people mourned the loss of the last one, and dreaded the next one. The task of assembling the data concerning infectious diseases in Colonial America was not an easy one. There was very little formal medical literature concerning the matter, and this was very inaccurate. Statistics were almost unknown. So, from letters or diaries, newspapers, in fact anywhere that a record was made, Mr. Duffy has gleaned information which makes up this book.

The most dramatic and spectacular diseases were smallpox and yellow fever. They struck hard, and both had a high fatality. Yet it is surprising to find that the almost daily toll of diphtheria and dysentery probably exceeded the sum total of all deaths from yellow fever and smallpox. Respiratory diseases are placed next. It is interesting to know what a great ally infectious disease was to the Colonists—this because of the great susceptibility of the Indians, and their utter lack of any notion of quarantine! Many more Indians died from European diseases than from European weapons. The impression is gained from reading the book that these diseases assumed the greater importance not only in America but also in Europe during Colonial times. At any rate, we have better records of them. The recounting of one epidemic after another of smallpox becomes almost tedious because of the similarity. The tremendous variations in mortality also are notable. A great diminution of smallpox through inoculation is well brought out by the story. Yellow fever played less of a role because its ravages were principally confined to New York, Philadelphia, and Charleston, South Carolina. Though the case mortality was extremely high, the total deaths were not great.

Diphtheria, called putrid sore throat, was regarded as a new disease. The case fatality among children was tremendous. Throughout the whole book the utter helplessness of the medical profession stands out. They do not appear to have been even the best informed persons, as some of the clergy wrote excellent descriptions. Measles, whooping cough, and mumps are seldom mentioned, had a low case mortality, and we know of their existence only through an occasional letter.

The book is a valuable compilation of data concerning epidemics. Much of the evidence is inferential since there was great confusion concerning the identity of many of the diseases. However, it is a book to be well regarded and ought to hold a permanent place in medical history.

BENEDICT, MURRAY R. Farm Policies of the United States, 1790-1950: A Study of Their Origins and Development. Pp. xv, 548. New York: Twentieth Century Fund, 1953. $5.00.

In the first place, this is a much larger book than the number of pages indicates, being printed in double columns running to 47 lines each. The first six chapters, covering 110 years in as many pages, are essentially just such chapters as might be found in a good general economic history textbook. Much of the material could be found in a general American history textbook. In fact, connecting links throughout the work are taken from one general American history and one American economic history textbook—good ones, but nevertheless elementary treatises. A brief treatment of the first century is justifiable on the basis that the full development of farm policy did not come until after 1900. The remainder of the book covers the first half of the present century in a wealth of detail, more factual than interpretative. It is a good book for ready reference but should be used by the reader only as a starting point for further investigation.

The author persistently ignores certain fundamental monographic works as though some preceptor was always at his elbow to warn against controversial matters. Certain other less reliable sources are sometimes used instead. For example, a statement on page 73 relating to the amount of land given by the federal government to railroads is taken from an article written by a railroad lobbyist and is flatly contradicted by the best, unbiased official studies that the present author does not even mention. Again, on page 112, he makes no attempt to defend the safety-valve theory against its attackers, but merely accepts it as though it had never been questioned. These approaches are typical of the book,

DANIELS, WALTER M. (Ed.). Presidential Election Reforms. Pp. 200. New York: H. W. Wilson Company, 1953. $1.75.

An excellent collection of secondary materials, this volume is brought out for the 1953-54 high school debates. It covers practically all phases of presidential elections, from the preconvention candidacies to the operation of the electoral college. One can scarcely think of a more fundamental area of our politics, for it encompasses the whole party system and the institutional organizations designed to create the executive and legislative agencies.

The editor has followed two criteria in the selection of materials—simplicity of language and brilliance of style. As a result, the great bulk of the materials come from professional journalists. This is both a strength and a weakness. On the credit side, these analysts are in constant contact with political operations. They write from the scene of "the Washington mess," from the press galleries of national conventions, from the presidential specials. But they know it, and understand it, largely from the personality angle. And, as a result, their analyses emphasize political figures and minimize institutional aspects which, after all, are far more important to the United States. The end result is that, as a collection, this is far inferior to the excellent textbooks which we have on the party system.

There are incisive articles by Dean McHenry, Harold Gosnell, Henry Steele Commager, James MacGregor Burns, Hugh Bone, and the late Carl Becker. These generally seek to evaluate the practices in terms of the Democratic schematization. But there are also articles by James A. Farley and Edward J. Flynn which are little more than exercises in self-appraisal. A great team makes a great coach. Franklin Delano Roosevelt could have been elected in any of his races with a national chairman who did nothing more than "pass out the chewing-gum." Reading them, one might easily come to the conclusion that voters are docile creatures who can be herded by the stern shepherd into almost any political corral. The election of 1952 should successfully inter those antediluvian ideas about political allegiance. The editor might have overcome this weakness by including materials from Samuel Lubell and John Fischer.

Finally, the least satisfactory section is that dealing with the reform of the electoral college. Most of the materials included are written from a narrow partisan viewpoint. Messrs. Lodge and Gossett were thinking of the party system fifty years hence and not in the next election. For the most part, the commentaries on the Lodge-Gossett and Coudert proposals reveal very little interest in, or even understanding, of the higher philosophic demands of democracy.

PINKOWSKI, EDWARD. Washington's Officers Slept Here: Historic Homes of Valley Forge and Its Neighborhood. Pp. 278. Philadelphia: Sunshine Press, 1953. $5.00.

Valley Forge is one of our most hallowed places and symbols. The courage and consecration evidenced by Washington and his men during the winter of 1777-1778 will be remembered as long as Americans cherish liberty. Thus any book which deals with Valley Forge will find a receptive audience.

Edward Pinkowski, former newspaper columnist and book reviewer, has spent many years absorbing the atmosphere of the region and doing the research for this volume. His book is divided into 34 chapters, most of them dealing with a single house in which one or more of Washington's officers had headquarters during the winter. The typical chapter is made up of four parts: an account of the use of the house as a military headquarters, a brief account of the military career of the officer or officers quartered there, the history of the building of the house and its early owners, and an account of the present owners and of what they have done to improve, beautify, or otherwise change the building and grounds. It thus becomes a combination of military history, local history, folklore, and contemporary guide book.

The two opening chapters deal with Washington's headquarters and the camp's bakehouse. Some of the following chapters are concerned with the headquarters of such Revolutionary generals as Baron von Steuben, James M. Varnum, Jedediah Huntington, Johann deKalb, John Sullivan, Enoch Poor, Casimir Pulaski, Anthony Wayne, Henry Knox, William Alexander (Lord Stirling), Marquis de Lafayette, Charles Lee, and Nathanael Greene.

There are 36 illustrations (largely photographs of the various houses described), a bibliography, and an index which is of only limited usefulness. There is no documentation. The end papers consist of an interesting map of the Valley Forge region, locating all of the houses discussed in the text. The book contains frequent generalizations which are unfounded, ridiculous, or both, such, for example, as the following: "Don't you think Benedict Arnold would be one of our national heroes today—if it hadn't been for his meeting with Robert Shewell on June 4, 1778, in the Coates house?" (p. 237), or the uncritical acceptance of the traditional account of the Conway Cabal (pp. 50, 51, 103-104). The style is clumsy with awkward, disjointed sentences and poorly organized paragraphs. The book is also characterized by some of the most careless typesetting and proof-reading that this reviewer has ever seen. Yet from the very nature of the material there is much here that will interest many people.

ECONOMICS AND INDUSTRY

HARROD, R. F. Economic Essays. Pp. xiii, 301. New York: Harcourt, Brace and Company, 1953. $4.50.

This welcome volume comprises a select collection of essays by one of the foremost British economists of the past three decades. Many of the articles first appeared in leading English and American economic journals; these are supplemented, and the general framework of the volume rounded out, by others written for this specific occasion.

The collection is presented under four general headings, of which the second is the most extensive: (1) Man-Power, (2) Competition, (3) Employment, and (4) General.

The first block comprises two essays on "The Population Problem" (1944) and on "Equal Pay for Men and Women" (1945).

The second block contains several articles concerning the economic theory of the firm and industry, articles that are familiar landmarks to any serious student of the theory of imperfect or monopolistic competition as it unfolded in the late 1920's and 1930's. Reprinted here are the "Notes on Supply" (1930), "The Law of Decreasing Costs" (1926), "A Further Note on Decreasing Costs" (1932), "The Equilibrium of Duopoly" (1934), "Doctrines of Imperfect Competition" (1934), "The Theory of Imperfect Competition" (new), "Theory of Profit" (new), and "Profiteering: an Ethical Study" (1939).

The third section includes four essays in the general field of macro-economic analysis: "The Expansion of Credit in an Advancing Community" (1934), "Keynes and Traditional Theory" (1937), "An Essay in Dynamic Theory," and "Supplement on Dynamic Theory," the latter rounding out the previous discussion.

The last section contains one paper, "Professor F. A. Von Hayek on Individualism" (1945).

One cannot but be impressed, in reading (or rereading) these essays, with the sense of current relevance that they convey. Nor can he fail to note with appreciation the conciseness, clarity, and directness of expository writing which are distinguishing hallmarks of Harrod's work. Would that more of us could follow his example.

This collection is one that should be a welcome addition to the library of any serious student of economic theory and public affairs, and a virtual must on the reading list of the potential doctoral candidate in economics. Much of it can be perused with profit by any intelligent layman who is interested in the texture and content of contemporary economic thinking on questions of basic theory and policy.

UPGREN, ARTHUR, and STAHL EDMUNDS. Economics for You and Me. Edited by Robert W. Smith. Pp. viii, 246. New York: The Macmillan Company, 1953. $4.00.

One might easily misjudge this popularization by its style, samples of which follow: Chapter titles: "1. Sliding Downhill on Codfish Heads" and "4. Your Money Went Thataway, Partner"; text: "Suppose Coonskin Edmunds is out on the frontier. He reckons he could use $500 to plant himself a big field of 'tobaccy.' Then he'll have something to chaw on when he's fighting Indians." Perhaps, as Lincoln supposedly wrote for an author who sought a recommendation of his book, "For those who like this sort of thing, this will be just the sort of thing they like." Despite the style, the book contains much interesting information and effective exposition on the general subject of "national-income-approach economics."

The Foreword states the intention to make economics "easy to read and easy to understand." But easy reading does not equal easy understanding where the elements of economics are concerned. The considerable success the authors enjoy in their attempt to reconcile the two comes much less from style than from the omission of material too elementary and important to leave an adequate introduction to economics. The emphasis is heavy on "monetary" economics, such as total money demand, total employment, gross national product, business cycles, central banking, and central government fiscal policy. It is light on the rationing of given products, on the allocation of productive services, on imputation and the pricing of productive services, and on the personal distribution of income, all of which are fundamental and persistent economic problems.

Some parts of the exposition are unclear to this reviewer. (1) The adherence to gross as contrasted with net national product. When we are dealing with the contribution of capital accumulation to progress, figures on the volume of machines, buildings, and so forth "turned out" are not much help, since there is no addition to capital till we more than replace what we use up in the process of production. (2) When it is said that "demand" changes far more than "supply," what is meant by "demand" and "supply"? The statement is not explained on the assumption either that both are physical concepts or that both are value concepts. If "demand" means total money demand and "supply" means a physical interpretation of GNP (gross national product), how do we get a "law of supply and demand" without prices on the supply side? (3) The impression that "big business" and "monopoly" are interchangeable terms lends itself to the highly questionable conclusion that the antitrust policy has been a failure. (4) Although the authors are not gullible about "government," why not call a spade a spade by pointing out the downright dishonesty involved in such governmental activities as borrowing, encouragement of monopoly, and control of money interest rates? Integrity, too, is a vital and persistent problem of "political economy."

WOYTINSKY, W. S., and ASSOCIATES. Employment and Wages in the United States. Pp. xxxii, 777. New York: Twentieth Century Fund, 1953. $7.50.

This study is the most comprehensive single volume on wages and employment in the United States. It was prepared by the Twentieth Century Fund to provide a source book of data useful to those engaged in collective bargaining.

At the outset Mr. Woytinsky presents a statement on the underlying framework of the study—that the American economy is still expanding. An examination of trends in national income, wages, and productivity follows this exposition. While no extrapolations of recent trends into the future are made, the expectations of long-run growth of the economy with increased productivity and a rise in real wages are clearly indicated. The next part of the study deals with the institutional setting of collective bargaining and wage determination. The role of government is examined first, followed by a survey of labor organizations and collective bargaining practices. The size and composition of the labor force and the factors that control the supply of and demand for labor are discussed in the next section of the volume. The fourth, and final part of the study, deals with wage rates and earnings.

A total of 360 tables are presented in the text and appendix. These data are based on original Fund surveys and numerous government and other sources, some of which are not readily available.

As is usual in the case of major Twentieth Century Fund studies, the present volume is accompanied by a report of a special committee whose function it was "to formulate a program of action in the public interest to deal with the problems disclosed by the research." While the members of the committee were selected because of their individual eminence, the composition of the committee is tripartite in nature, consisting of a former chairman of the War Labor Board, a labor journalist, three college professors, three union research directors, and two presidents of large industrial corporations.

Despite the wealth of information in the volume, and the obvious desire of the committee members to achieve a meeting of minds, the area of agreement is disappointingly small. "The report," one of the members states, "has no single point of view (or any clear point of view) in its approach to the problem of wage determination." Apparently one point on which all the members agreed was that more study is necessary as to how wages are set. But even in the pious agreement on the desire for more light, there is considerable divergence as to where light is most necessary. The research director whose union membership is concentrated in a low wage-paying industry would like more information on the evil effects of substandard wages on the economy. Another member of the committee, searching for broader horizons, would investigate profit sharing as a form of employee compensation. A third participant throws doubt on the practical effects of research, at least in some areas, upon collective bargaining processes.

But the failure of the distinguished committee to reach unanimity on wide policy implications flowing out of the abundance and excellence of the material presented in the survey should not detract from its potential usefulness. It merely emphasizes again the difficulty that a tripartite body has in arriving at general policy recommendations in the absence of immediate pressures. In the daily higgling and bargaining of the market place well-organized data are useful and necessary. Undoubtedly parties that face practical situations and have a stake in labor management relations will find the survey helpful. Mr. Woytinsky and his associates, under the sponsorship of the Twentieth Century Fund, have presented a major contribution to the literature of wages and collective bargaining.

ULRIKSSON, VIDKUNN. The Telegraphers: Their Craft and Their Unions. Pp. v, 218. Washington, D. C.: Public Affairs Press, 1953. $3.75.

It is not often that a scholarly volume on a particular union, or on unionism in an industry, is produced by someone who has lived and worked in the industry. Vidkunn Ulriksson has had the unusual experience of spending some two dozen years as a railroad and commercial telegrapher, of being active in the industry's leading union, and of finally achieving the post of Associate Director of the University of Wisconsin School for Workers and Assistant Professor of Economics in the Extension Division. Despite his obvious and acknowledged union sympathies, however, the author has not hesitated to be critical of union tactics and policies.

The volume itself is not as broad in scope as the title would indicate, for it is confined to commercial telegraphy and eschews the important field of the railroad telegraphers. After an introductory chapter on the development of the industry, the author sets forth in detail the attempts of various unions to organize the industry. In effect, this is a story mainly of Western Union because of the dominance of this company. The account is carried forward in a combination of topical and chronological treatment. This is a most difficult form of presentation to handle—sometimes producing odd effects as the chronology is interrupted for a one-paragraph "aside." The history prior to the National Labor Relations Act is an unrelieved account of defeat, attributed by the author to the telegraph operators' white collar illusions, union weakness and incompetence, and the resolute and undeviating opposition of Western Union. After the National Labor Relations Act (NLRA) and the legal defeat of the company union, the entry of the American Federation of Labor's Commercial Telegraphers Union and its victory over the left-wing rival American Communications Association (ACA) was almost foreordained.

The dominance of the CTU, however, did not produce immediately a responsive and unified organization. For one thing, some of the units which ran under the AFL banner for NLRB election purposes were not even in the CTU proper and did not come in until some time later. Secondly, bargaining and dealing with Western Union was in itself so surrounded by hoary traditions and antiquated company organization that a feeling of frustration was inevitable. The union had not only to put the company's labor relations on a modern basis, it had also to wait on the company's reformation of its own organization. A "business history study" of Western Union might well produce a classic document of organizational decay to be laid at the door of near-monopoly.

From the documentation in the volume it is apparent that there is no abundance of source material on unionism in this industry. This probably accounts for the inclusion of some detail, the intrinsic value of which is small, such as the text of an early union's oath. In the same vein is the somewhat uncritical acceptance of testimony at congressional hearings. One can also wish for some information on the nonoperators—the other workers in the industry get barely a nod. It is apparent that the CTU has some organizational and structural problems of its own, but of this there is little. And how about the mechanism of collective bargaining? Here too we draw a blank.

The volume as a whole is a good beginning. Some of the gaps have been indicated above. But there is still much to be explored in the story of a small and impotent union coming suddenly into its own, confronted with the problems of unifying an inexperienced membership, of solving structural difficulties, and of bargaining over a sprawling countrywide domain which, to boot, has a future which is none too bright at this reading.

VITELES, MORRIS S. Motivation and Morale in Industry. Pp. xvi, 510. New York: W. W. Norton & Company, 1953. $8.50.

This book is the result of research on the basic motives in work by a distinguished psychologist who believes that the three great continuing needs in industry are: to increase production; to promote employee satisfaction and adjustment at work; and to curtail industrial strife. It includes experimental studies and attitude surveys made in America and England. The author's own attitude is objective but with faith in the ultimate mutuality of interest between management and labor.

The plan of the book is orderly except for considerable overlapping. There are five parts, each one taking from 60 to 100 pages. Part 1, "Mobilizing the Will to Work," plunges directly into wage-incentives and the setting of tasks for them. All kinds of views are given, in fact our only regret is that the author quotes other authors so continually that it is sometimes difficult to find where he makes his own conclusions. There are over 1,400 references made in the whole book to other authors. Part 2, "The Background of Motivational Theory," continues on the attitudes regarding incentives and then goes into social psychology and group dynamics. Together these two parts supply the reader with about everything known regarding employee motives and attitudes. Part 3, "Experimental Studies," treats such problems as job preference, size of work-group, teamwork, and employee participation in decision-making, all pointed to what supervision might do to improve morale and productivity. Part 4, "Employee-Attitude Surveys," shows an employer how to assess morale and how to get along with unions. The role of supervision comes up again. Part 5, "Guideposts for Management," attempts to apply correctives and provides excellent thought provocation for top management.

It is in this fifth part that the author expresses best his own conclusions, and he does not mince matters either. For instance he disagrees with those who interpret the Western Electric Company experiments to mean that "money, as an incentive for productivity, is no longer the paramount incentive." As Dr. Viteles puts it, "in the opinion of this author, a viewpoint emphasizing the importance of the financial incentive is to be preferred to . . . facile generalization concerning the menace of an economic orientation and the belittling of the role of the financial incentive in reports on the Hawthorne studies."

As a scholarly collection of the findings of many psychologists the book is remarkable. Certainly enlightened employers, teachers, and graduate students may learn some timely lessons regarding the relationships between attitude and action.

OSBORN, DAVID S. Geographical Features of the Automation of Industry. Pp. xiii, 108. Chicago: University of Chicago, Department of Geography, 1953. $3.00.

Automation is essentially the substitution of manufactured instruments for people "as a source of decisions required for guiding machines." In this volume Dr. Osborn examines the effects of automation in a number of establishments upon their requirements for production workers and space per unit of product. He then speculates on the changes reduced requirements would have upon the location of industry both within metropolitan areas and throughout the nation.

Although the number of plants studied were few, the data presented by the author clearly indicate that the automation of industrial processes will save labor and space.

What is much less clear are the effects the introduction of labor and space-saving devices have on the location of economic activity. The cases cited in the text do not bear out the author's generalization that automation will become an important factor in the location of industry. In almost all of the plants described, the labor and space requirements were irrelevant to the selection of the site. Analysis of the effects of past widespread labor-saving innovations on the location of industry might better serve the author's objectives.

The theory that the location of industry is influenced most markedly by transportation costs for raw materials and finished goods seems undisturbed by Dr. Osborn's examples. It is questionable that land and labor force are often of "controlling importance." More attention might have been given to the possibilities of lowering fuel and raw material requirements by the substitution of continuous monitoring of equipment by control instruments for intermittent checking by employees. The costs of fuels and raw materials have frequently been determining factors in the geographical distribution of industries.

Dr. Osborn considers the influence of instrument service availability on the location of future automation, but notes that "customer density" may determine in large part the location of instrument service-sales offices.

The author's assumption that industries locate in downtown business districts rather than in suburbs because of the need for labor is unconvincing. Even if it were admitted, the effect of automation on urban location is uncertain, as he notes that reduced space needs may operate in a different direction than reduced manpower requirements. This reader was confused by some of the conclusions. In close proximity are printed (pp. 98-99): "Automation brings human occupancy a step closer to an ideal of possible decentralization," and "With labor force reduced and less space required, increased centralization becomes a possibility." The author is certain there might be a change.

The subject and future of automation are exciting, and the case studies are well presented. It is probably too early to base forecasts of the effect of automation on data of the few existing installations. Projections into the future without better data call for a more penetrating study of the nature of the revolutionary potentialities of automation systems than Dr. Osborn has presented.

GEARTY, PATRICK W. The Economic Thought of Monsignor John A. Ryan. Pp. viii, 341. Washington, D. C.: Catholic University of America Press, 1953. $4.00.

John A. Ryan believed that economics is primarily a positive science but that it is also largely a normative science; further, that its main usefulness is to promote the common good and social justice. Within this framework, he dedicated his life to the eminently practical task of providing his fellowmen with a multitude of carefully thought out moral judgments conditioned by economic facts. He rejected the "orthodox" economics of his time as inadequate and embraced the economic "heresy" of John A. Hobson for analyzing the equilibrium of the economy as a whole. In his ethics, he rejected time-worn theoretical illustrations in favor of practical applications to the everyday problems facing the worker, the industrialist, the politician, the internationalist.

A measure of the wisdom and foresight of the man is found in the Bishop's Program of Social Reconstruction of 1919. Written by Ryan, it gave official status to what he had advocated as early as 1909. Among its recommendations were: a 16-year-old age minimum on child labor; a legal minimum wage; legal protection for the right of workers to organize; provision for settling labor disputes; a federal employment service; social insurance against unemployment, illness, invalidity, and old age; slum clearance and municipal housing projects; regulation of monopoly; and the "heavy taxation" of incomes, excess profits, and inheritances. As the roaring twenties were succeeded by the depressed thirties, and many of these proposals became the law of the land, one can readily see why

Ryan, when he was accused of merely following after everything Roosevelt and the New Deal did, could say: "It's not so. Before the New Deal was, I am."

Current history was his driving force as he faced up to the economic facts and moral implications of the sit-down strike, the secondary boycott, the closed shop, unions' limitations of output and apprentices, co-operatives, racial discrimination, international economic relations, industrial democracy, and the occupational group system or Industry Council Plan. And so he continued with his careful economic analyses and ethical interpretations until almost the day of his death. His last article appeared in July 1945; he died the following September 16.

Patrick W. Gearty has done an invaluable service in portraying the inspiring life and works of this dynamic thinker. His painstaking documentation reveals careful combing not only of published works but also of unpublished manuscripts, lecture notes, marginal notations, and other evidence that the prolific Ryan left in his wake. Besides this major contribution, Gearty has also produced a valuable handbook of social teaching. And, he has provided scholars with many guideposts to fruitful inquiry as well as warning signs over pitfalls where Ryan erred.

In his review for The Annals (January 1907) of Ryan's first serious work—A Living Wage—David Y. Thomas found it "refreshing" to read a book that proposed to accomplish social reform "with a real human being at the starting point and the end." If Thomas could read Gearty's book today, he would be still more refreshed at the discovery that many "real human beings" the country over have benefited from the translation of Ryan's proposals into action.

TAX INSTITUTE. Excess Profits Taxation (A symposium). Pp. viii, 183. Princeton, N. J., 1953. $5.00.

Increased revenues for United States defense were called for by the outbreak of hostilities in Korea in 1950. The Tax Institute conducted a symposium in Philadelphia on Excess Profits Taxation, December 8 and 9. There were twenty participants, among them Professors A. G. Buehler, Louis Shere, D. T. Smith, Clarence Heer, and E. G. Keith; also Messrs. Beardsley Ruml, Ralph Flanders (U. S. Senator), Leon Henderson, and others representing the tax views of lawyers, accountants, business managers, and taxpayers.

The discussions of this symposium include most of the main points usually urged against excess profits taxation: for example, the difficulties of determining equitable tax credits, bases, and rates; the difficulties of preventing tax considerations from causing too much distortion of business management; and the difficulties of administration. These main topics were discussed under numerous subheads.

Messrs. Ruml and Henderson, especially, emphasized rather dramatically how high marginal excess profits taxes differentiate between "cheap dollars" and "expensive dollars."

"The creation by law of cheap dollars has resulted and will result again, in carelessness, waste and extravagance. The cheap dollar is demoralizing and breeds waste at every level of management. . . . If a competitor is not in excess profits, if it is weak in earnings, or young, or with inadequate capital—in other words, if it has only expensive dollars in its arsenal, it is at a double disadvantage as against its entrenched rival with tax-created cheap dollars at its disposal"—Ruml.

Little was said in the symposium favorable to excess profits taxes; more or less was said to the effect that it would be better to raise extra revenue needed by increasing the rates of the regular corporation income tax, instead of by a new excess profits tax.

A number of speakers held that many citizens favored an excess profits tax because they thought it put more of the cost of war upon those who benefited from war but failed to understand its relation to business incentives and other effects mentioned above.

Congress, however, later adopted a more or less complicated excess profits tax to run until June 30, 1953.

Unfortunately, the papers of the symposium were not published until May 11, 1953, when Congress was debating the extension of the excess profits tax due to expire soon. The tax was later extended until Dec. 31, 1953, and the Eisenhower administration's intention to hold to that date has since been announced by the press, despite the fact that it now appears unlikely that the budget will be balanced next year unless sales taxes or other substitute taxes are adopted.

At this moment, Mr. Eisenhower's party does not appear to be unified on tax policy, however, and, if the business or the foreign situation should change radically and quickly, anything might happen.

BLUM, WALTER J. and HARRY KALVEN, JR. The Uneasy Case for Progressive Taxation. Pp. viii, 107. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1953. $2.50.

Surveying what they describe as "The Uneasy Case for Progressive Taxation," the authors canvass the literature of the subject and find there mainly an unconvincing analysis of marginal utility and sacrifice. This analysis starts with the assumption that the importance of the marginal dollar of income falls off as more is acquired and does so consistently for different taxpayers. But to say the least no one knows how fast the utility curve drops and there is a conflict of counsel as to what pattern of sacrifice satisfies equity. No sacrifice theory or any other support for progression gives us a precise standard for measuring its degree. Supporting progression on a frank preference for equality does not escape these difficulties. Sounder ground for the institution is found in its implications for equality of opportunity—especially as regards children.

Turning to the legal record, the authors find even less support for progression. The Supreme Court simply swallowed the idea whole when popular opinion was ripe for the innovation.

In terms of effects, consideration is given to the argument that progressive taxation is needed to absorb redundant savings. This approach has lost following since the Depression, and at any event has to be balanced against the adverse effects of progression on incentives. Progressive taxation introduces major difficulties of timing and definition in income taxation—witness the troublesome problem of splitting. The authors consider and reject the idea that a conservative allowance for subsistence leads logically to general support for progression.

Progressive-tax theory has been due for an overhauling, and the authors do a highly competent job in exposing the vulnerable spots in its utility and sacrifice supports. Progressive taxation like most other social phenomena must rest for its ultimate justification on its social, political, and economic consequences. The authors' analysis in this latter area is (perhaps necessarily) far short of exhaustive, and the reviewer takes exception to many of its conclusions. He also doubts the validity of the view that exemption of a minimum is thoroughly consistent with a negative view of further progression.

But the work is distinguished by penetrating analysis, comprehensive coverage of sources, and excellent documentation. It should do for this generation what Seligman's work did for the last. And on the score of rigorous and circumspect analysis this new contribution rates high honors in the field.

FRUMKIN, GREGORY. Population Changes in Europe Since 1939. Pp. 191. New York: Augustus M. Kelley, 1951. No price.

Censuses taken in most European countries after the end of the war reveal insufficiently the changes which the population underwent in the course of war and postwar years. Two years after the end of the war the population of Europe outside the Soviet Union was already slightly larger than on the eve of war. This was, however, the result of various conflicting factors, such as: continuing (although somewhat reduced) excess of birth over "normal" deaths; military and civilian war losses; population transfers; and a reversal of the birth trend which, contrary to projections and predictions, showed an unexpected increase of fertility.

So it was an important contribution to the understanding of Europe's demographic situation when Mr. Frumkin (former editor of the League of Nations Statistical Year Book, now a member of the United Nations Secretariat) undertook the arduous task of analyzing the various components of population changes which took place since 1939 in Europe outside the Soviet Union (a note on the USSR given "for reference purposes" contains only the estimates of several authors). His work resulted in "balance sheets" of 24 European countries, presenting the population changes which took place in the war years (1939-45) and in the postwar years (1946-47). A balance sheet starts with the population at the beginning of the period; adjustments are then made for territorial changes. The numbers of births and "normal" deaths are given. There follows (of course, only for the war years) a detailed analysis of war losses under the main headings of (1) military and (2) civilian losses, separately listing (3) deaths due to racial persecution. With the same care are analyzed the various population shifts of transferees, refugees, displaced persons, and others. Each balance sheet results in a population figure calculated for the end of the period, which is confronted with information derived from census or other enumeration. Data for single countries are also combined into a population balance sheet for total Europe (outside USSR), which shows, for example, 5.8 million military losses, 4.9 million civilians (excluding Jews) who perished from bombardments, land fighting, executions, or having been deported, and 4.4 million Jews killed by the Germans.

Everybody who has handled such statistics knows the amount of work involved in the computation of Mr. Frumkin's balance sheets. His data were taken primarily from official national sources and only additionally were information and estimates of authoritative experts used. However, no figure was accepted at its face value; all data—whatever their source—were scrutinized, crosschecked, and adjusted. The result is not only a mass of critically analyzed information (which by itself would be achievement), it is a demographic picture of Europe in the period of the Second World War.

BEAUVOIR, SIMONE DE. The Second Sex. Translated and edited by H. M. Parshley. Pp. xxx, 732, xiv. New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 1953. $10.00.

Mme. de Beauvoir's thesis is that women are forced into a degrading position in society in comparison to men by virtue of their physiological natures and that this position has been enforced by the deliberate and hostile contrivance of men. To prove this she has assembled a formidable array of historical data about women along with insights derived from various disciplines such as biology, psychoanalysis, dialectic materialism, mythology, and fiction. All of this is presented in existentialist terms: women are "the other," not the "existent" in contrast to men who are the "absolute." This results in women's inability to experience "transcendence" and their permanent relegation to a state of "immanence." Transcendence is the supreme state to which human beings may aspire; the loftiest expression of free individual power—equated to the penis.

Mme. de Beauvoir presents her theme with force and eloquence, often with poetic beauty. She is, however, not averse to twisting, tormenting, and omitting wherever her data are at variance with her doctrine. The psychoanalytic point of view is given some attention, but the light and shadow is so delicately arranged as to distort most of the telling aspects of the insight psychoanalysis has brought to the understanding of women. This book reads like a combination of invective and lamentation. All the elements of women's lives are presented with a mixture of horror and rage, even love itself. She opens her chapter, "The Mother," with a long, rather naïve and extremely biased disquisition on the iniquity of making abortion illegal.

She repeatedly alludes to the biological situation of women as "draw-backs," citing as her evidence for this the function of menstruation. Mme. de Beauvoir cannot discover any possible satisfactions in femininity. She cites abnormalities and disturbances of feminine function and underscores her argument that pregnancy is a burden upon women, constitutes their degradation and prevents their successful function as "transcendents." Mme. de Beauvoir is particularly disturbed and angry at the dependency she finds in the position of women vis-à-vis men and society as a whole. Some of her most positive statements are made in connection with lesbianism. She says "The system is considered normal or 'natural' which, abandoning her (woman) as prey to some male, restores her sovereignty by putting a child in her arms: but this supposed 'normality' is enjoined by a more or less clearly comprehended social interest."

When we come to the solutions or "justification" which are offered here, we find very little except the exhortation of women to seek their freedom. This independence presumably will lead to the exquisite even-tuality which will make it possible for women to live in a state of "equality with men." In the meantime, "love represents in its most touching form the curse that lies heavily upon woman confined in the feminine universe, woman mutilated, insufficient unto herself." It hardly seems necessary to elaborate upon such a statement with its extraordinary lack of insight. In spite of its erudition, this book does not provide an objective evaluation of the position and problems of women in today's social organization. It is rather an intensely personal document: one woman's outcry against her nature, the exposure of her unregenerate rebellion against her femininity.

COLEMAN, MILES L. Renewing Our Cities. Pp. x, 181. New York: Twentieth Century Fund, 1953. $2.50.

Here is a book that is really written for "the general reader." It is based on the most careful fact finding. It is brief and clear and inexpensive. What it presents can hardly fail to challenge any one who is concerned about our cities. The interests of tenants and landlords, of industrialists and strap-hangers, of tax-payers and city officials are all considered.

Perhaps we do not need to be reminded that our cities are constantly changing. Neither is it any surprise to be told that the typical pattern is one of a badly congested center, surrounded by a zone of declining utility, outside of which is a ring of more or less flourishing suburbs. But we often fail to realize that growth implies renewal as well as expansion; that failure to replace worn-out parts interrupts the cycle of growth and threatens the city's future. Evidence of break-down in the life cycle appears when there are many cases of structures no longer in demand, in their localities, for the uses for which they were designed; or they have deteriorated; and conversion or restoration would cost more than prospective use would justify. Renewal means the rebuilding of an area to bring it to its maximum financial and social utility for the whole city.

Renewal or redevelopment is more than slum clearance. The latter is a matter of housekeeping, individual and municipal. It means cleaning up, protecting against accident, fire, and disease, and restoring minimum standards of decency for the occupants of an old area. Renewal may involve slum clearance, but also the replacement or adaptation of buildings and facilities that are not so far gone and that are not residential. It may require correction of real estate values, reassignment of land uses, elimination of smoke and noise, new facilities for transportation, education, recreation, and public health.

Mr. Coleman believes that people can make their cities what they want. But he points out there is usually no agreement about goals, inadequate machinery for reaching agreement, and hence lack of devices for carrying out plans that have never been made or accepted.

STETLER, HENRY G. Minority Group Integration by Labor and Management. Pp. viii, 67. Hartford: Connecticut Commission on Civil Rights, 1953. No price.

The original purposes of this study, made in 1951, were (1) to ascertain the extent of discrimination by employers and labor unions against members of the chief minority groups in the state, and (2) to determine what educational measures are best suited to the elimination of undemocratic employment practices. The published study deals chiefly with discrimination against Negroes, with some attention to the Jewish, and still less to the Italian population, which is the largest nationality minority in Connecticut. The five metropolitan regions in the state were the areas of investigation because they include 89 per cent of the Negroes, 83 per cent of the Jewish, and 85 per cent of the Italian inhabitants. Concerns and labor unions employing or having a membership of more than 1,000 persons were selected for study. Ninety per cent of the state's larger employers and 77 unions were within the scope of the investigation; 69 per cent of the employers and 60 per cent of the unions were covered by interviewing personnel directors and union officials. The employment of Negroes by the State government was studied to secure data on the extent that professional and supervisory positions were held by them. In addition, 1,600 persons, Negro, Jewish, and white non-Jewish of approximately equal economic status were interviewed in Bridgeport, Hartford, New Haven, and Stamford, which with Waterbury comprise the five metropolitan regions.

The data yielded the following general conclusions:

1. There is wide variation in employment of Negroes: 10 per cent employ none, while 90 per cent range from employing Negroes only in unskilled work to full integration in all levels, including white collar jobs.

2. Comparing placement of Negroes in professional and supervisory work in government and private employment, the data suggests underemployment of Negroes in the latter.

3. The low clerical employment rate of Negro workers is impressive.

4. Negroes belong to industrial unions, to unskilled American Federation of Labor unions, but in very small numbers to craft unions.

5. The data reveal a considerable gap between education of Negroes and the white-non-Jewish group. The reports ends asking if Negroes may be "advised" against securing education because their job opportunities are so limited. There is much more than deliberate advice to discourage them!

For its future educational program the Commission might well investigate two assertions in this study, namely, that white women oppose integration more than men, and that unions are restricted in potential membership by the employment patterns of management.

CRESSEY, DONALD R. Other People's Money: A Study in the Social Psychology of Embezzlement. Pp. 191. Glencoe, Ill.: Free Press, 1953. $3.00.

Dr. Cressey's study of the social psychology of violation of financial trust and the general theory which he proposes to explain it should be of considerable interest to criminologists and to social scientists generally. The investigation is based primarily on materials secured by interviewing inmates in three prisons—namely, those at Chino, California, Terre Haute, Indiana, and Joliet, Illinois. Aside from the admirably systematic manner in which the author proceeds to construct and support his theory, the case materials which are inserted when they are relevant to his argument make interesting reading in themselves.

The theory that is finally proposed, after having undergone several revisions in the course of the study, is that "Trusted persons become trust violators when they conceive of themselves as having a financial problem which is non shareable, are aware that this problem can be secretly resolved by violation of the position of financial trust, and are able to apply to their own conduct in that situation verbalizations (rationalizations) which enable them to adjust their conceptions of themselves as trusted persons with their conceptions of themselves as users of the entrusted funds or property" (p. 30). This is formulated as a tentative proposition subject to future revision in the light of negative evidence. The author's methodological assumptions which lead him to this formulation may be briefly summarized: theories must be stated in universal form; a single negative case disproves such a theory; definitions and hypothesis must be continuously adapted to contradictory evidence as it appears.

Among the interesting features of Dr. Cressey's findings may be mentioned the fact that married embezzlers invariably fail to confide in their wives concerning the financial problem which prompts the embezzlement even when that problem is merely one like maintaining a certain standard of living. Another significant aspect of the author's treatment is the way in which he views rationalizations as an integral part of the causal process. The offender, he maintains, must find some sort of rationalization which is at least temporarily acceptable before he can reconcile himself to using "other people's money."

Certain questions may be raised concerning the conclusion stated. For example, the author suggests but does not elaborate on the idea that sharing a problem may be a matter of degree and that the effects of sharing may depend in part upon with whom it is shared. One case is cited in which an embezzler apparently did share his problem with his brother before violating the law (pp. 45-6, Case No. 303). In the case of absconders it is pointed out that the culprit in this case usually recognizes the criminality of his act from the beginning but simply says, "To hell with it!" One may argue that this represents impulsive behavior and failure to find an acceptable rationalization.

The systematic and original way in which Dr. Cressey has treated his subject make this work a significant contribution and one that should serve as a challenge to future research.

BOSSARD, JAMES H. S. Parent and Child. Pp. 308. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1953. $5.00.

This study by Bossard, one of our most prolific writers on the family, is his thirty-first book. It conforms with most of his recent publications in stressing the commonplace but often neglected aspects of family behavior: the relationship of the immediate family to the kinship group, the contrasting effects of the small family system and the large family system, the influence of household space on family interaction, and the effect on children of such factors as childhood visiting, over-age parents, the remarriage of parents, interclass marriage, and parents' occupations. This is a highly diversified list of topics. All are interesting, although probably not of equal significance. The influence of childhood visiting on the personality of the child would offhand seem to be of much less consequence in most instances than the occupations of parents. Nor are all of the topics treated by Bossard equally amenable to scientific research. He has some discussion of the role of deceased family members in child development, but it would probably be quite difficult to isolate the influences of this factor.

The method used in this book is the case study, consisting of a segment of a life history centering around a particular question or aspect of experience. This might be called the focused case study, and is supplemented here and there by focused interviews. The number of cases utilized varies by topic, being 17 in the study of over-age parents, 25 in the analysis of the large family system, and 81 in the study of parents' occupations and child development. The materials are supplied by college students in the Northeastern United States.

Case studies are more useful for originating hypotheses and suggesting causal relationships than they are for establishing generalizations or determining degrees of relationship between social phenomena. Hence Bossard refers to his studies as pilot studies which afford suggestions for further study and are not definitive. In some instances it might even be more accurate to refer to these chapters as suggestions on the basis of which pilot studies might be made. For instance, in the chapter on "The Family Background of the Child" 40 types of household are listed, as revealed in the case studies. There is no claim that the list is all-inclusive. There is no frequency distribution, therefore no indication of the relative significance of the various types.

Bossard writes in a clear and easy style, which also bears the marks of maturity. There is a useful brief summary at the close of each chapter. This book should appeal to the sophisticated general reader who is interested in child development.

SIRJAMAKI, JOHN. The American Family in the Twentieth Century. Pp. x, 227. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1953. $4.25.

The purpose of this book is to interpret the findings of the social sciences on the American family for general rather than specialized readers. Only limited technical material is presented to support the conclusions from the different studies.

The first quarter of the book gives a history of the European background of the American family and its historical development in the United States. The following chapters, for the most part, deal with the family cycle: courting and dating experiences, husband-wife relationships, children, parent-child relationships with variations in the different social classes, the dissolving of families by divorce, and remarriage of divorced persons. The final chapter is a summary description of the American family today and an appraisal of its future.

The references (pp. 203-18) indicate that most of the important studies of the family were covered—the historical, legal, structural, and anthropological studies, as well as studies of the family in the depression, mate selection, and marital adjustment.

The general reader will secure a fairly accurate picture of what social science knows about the American family.

ALEXANDER, FRANZ, and HELEN ROSS (Eds.). Twenty Years of Psychoanalysis. Pp. 309. New York: W. W. Norton & Company, 1953. $3.75.

This volume which was published to celebrate the twentieth anniversary of the Chicago Institute of Psychoanalysis goes far beyond the character of a commemorative book. It presents rather a survey of the development of psychoanalysis during the past two decades. The contributors to the volume are members of the staff of the Chicago Institute, and most of them are representative psychiatrists and psychoanalysts. I do not know any other country in America or in any other country in which such excellent work of training and research is done. The flowering state of the Chicago Institute owes most of its prominence to the devotion and enthusiasm of Dr. Franz Alexander who understood the importance of educating his co-workers. Research is, of course, the primary objective of the Institute, but beside and beyond individual and collective research excellent teamwork is directed to the teaching and training of psychoanalysts and psychiatrists.

The reviews of the contributors deal mostly with the influence of the basic concepts of psychoanalysis on medicine and medical teaching in general, on psychiatry in particular, and on the social sciences. The two major aspects of the volume are the presentation of pictures of the advancement of psychoanalysis first as a science and second as a profession. The individual papers, although different in their character and scope, fulfill together the task of showing the history of psychoanalysis in this country during the last twenty years. The discussions following each contribution do not conceal the differences of viewpoints which are represented among the members of the staff, nor do they try to smooth over the difficulties and uncertainties of the problems, but they all move on an elevated level. The members of the staff are united in the wish to share their experiences and to broaden their knowledge.

The book is introduced by a review in which Dr. Alexander shows the transition of psychoanalysis from the era of the pioneers to that of the colonials and the re-orientation necessitated by the fact that the new science came of age. The new phase brought with it not only added responsibilities, but also new problems, especially the task of checking the validity of each approach. The very change proves that psychoanalysis is not a static body of knowledge, but a discipline in development. This science in the making has unforeseen vicissitudes as well as the potentiality of a decisive role in the re-evaluation of many values of our civilization. The wide scope and the elevated point of view give Dr. Alexander's contribution a prominent place among the papers here collected.

Dr. Alan Gregg discusses the place of psychoanalysis in medicine; Dr. Martin Grotjahn writes on new trends in psychoanalytic training; Dr. Lawrence Kubie treats psychoanalysis as a basic science; Dr. Arthur Mirsky shows its connections with the biological sciences; and Dr. Talcott Parsons examines the relations between psychoanalysis and sociology. The interesting, and in its implications stimulating, second part of the book deals with the many problems of training and research as they appeared in the discussions of the staff of the Chicago Institute. We welcome the important volume which will interest all who are attracted by the psychoanalytic ramifications and their connections with the social sciences.

RÓHEIM, GÉZA. The Gates of the Dream. Pp. x, 554. New York: International Universities Press, 1953. $10.00.

The late Géza Róheim was one of the first to apply insight derived from psychoanalytic theory to the data of anthropology. This last ambitious work is an attempt to make anthropology contribute to psychoanalysis, and to the validating of a particular psychoanalytic theory proposed by the author.

The first 154 pages are used in clarifying what Róheim means by his theory of the basic dream and how he differs from other psychoanalysts. The remainder of the book is essentially a new presentation, in the light of this theory, of material already published in the author's earlier extensive writings on anthropology. It deals particularly with the mythology of animism, shamanism, and the nightmare, and attempts to elucidate these by interpreting the symbolism of dreams. The author draws freely on his own Australian field studies and also reviews others' accounts of American Indian mythology and European folklore. These are all examined for evidence to support the theory. Unfortunately, the tendency throughout this book is to revert to the trend of the earlier studies and interpret the anthropology according to the theory—with symbol-translocation playing the principal part.

The hypothesis offered by Róheim assumes that the dream is primarily a reaction to the fact we are asleep, and that it originates in anxiety; that there is a basic dream valid for mankind in general which represents this reaction. This basic dream is seen in the moment of falling asleep, in the typical hypnagogic sensation of falling or sinking. "One feels as if one were sinking into oneself." This hypnagogic fantasy becomes a dream if not interrupted (by repression or by waking)—a dream, that is, in which other layers are added from waking life.

The source of the anxiety is described according to a conception derived from Ferenczi: The sleeper turns into himself and falls back into the womb, his own body being the material substratum of the dream womb. Sleep is interpreted (from the point of view of the unconscious) as being in utero (Freud). Róheim sees this regression, this withdrawal from the environment as causing anxiety; and this anxiety about regression (uterine regression = death) as causing the dream as an attempt to regain contact with the environment. "As the world is destroyed" with this withdrawal into the dreamer's own body (and maternal womb), there is at the same time an attempt to counteract the anxiety, ward off the regression by the building up of a new environment—on a libidinal basis. Thus, citing typical dreams which are commonly accepted as symbolizing coitus, he asks: "Does it mean anything that the phallus is represented by the whole body of the dreamer?" (for example, going into a room or passageway). This is the view of the body as phallus which leads to the emphasis on erotic tension wishes to counteract anxiety in relinquishing the object world. The author is easily able to cite dreams with a regressive tendency but in which the dream may also represent coitus. Throughout the book there is frequent citation of dreams as proof of the theory. These, of course, are selected samples with no advertence to the usefulness of controls in a scientific study.

Freud repeatedly stressed that symbols must be used only with careful discrimination and as a supplement to the basic technique of obtaining the dreamer's associations to the dream elements. Otherwise one falls into an arbitrariness of interpretation such as the author illustrates. Thus, when he takes up a dream reported by Fodor, he rejects the latter's interpretation as "blocked by preconceived theory" in favor of an interpretation supporting his own theory.

OSTHEIMER, RICHARD H. Student Charges and Financing Higher Education. Pp. xx, 217. New York: Columbia University Press, 1953. $3.50.

Late in 1947 the President's Commission on Higher Education produced its six-volume report entitled Higher Education in American Democracy which among other things proposed that tuition should be free in public colleges and universities through the sophomore year and that it be reduced in the years beyond. The Commission barely touched upon the question of the tuition charges of private institutions but gingerly implied that they should be lowered rather than raised. This volume makes no reference to the President's Commission, but it explores the economic soundness of its proposals concerning tuition charges.

The book constitutes one of the series of eleven which reports the studies undertaken by the Commission on Financing Higher Education established in 1949 with funds provided by the Rockefeller Foundation ($400,000) and the Carnegie Corporation ($50,000). The author, a member of the staff of the Commission, has brought to the topic assigned him the tools of a statistically trained economist. Readers need much the same tools to follow his analysis. The volume, in short, has been written for economists and educational statisticians rather than for work-a-day administrators who, it seems, must read as they run from committee meeting to committee meeting.

In his opening paragraph the author lists the three questions to be studied, and in the last chapter he summarizes his answers:

(1) Would "higher charges . . . in fact yield larger revenues"? Answer: Yes: "higher charges would increase total revenues and thus permit sorely needed salary raises and a general improvement of educational excellence."

(2) ". . . what would be the effect on society's goal of equality of educational opportunity?" Answer: it would be "adversely affected" but not nearly so much as some seem to believe because the degree of present inequalities "has been considerably exaggerated by [unsound] inferences from the income distributions of all families" and because "to maintain tuitions at their present levels, or even to lower them, is but to scratch the surface in the attempt to effect equality of opportunity."

(3) What would be "the possible effect on the quality of higher education" of increased tuition fees? Answer: ". . . the alternative may be inadequate financial support and hence the inability of higher education to achieve its high purposes."

In sum, Mr. Ostheimer—and hence the Commission on Financing Higher Education—repudiates the recommendations of the President's Commission on the topic of tuition charges and concludes that the economy can sustain higher charges without serious damage to the ideal of equality of educational opportunity. Further, it cautiously suggests that the quality of educational opportunity provided by colleges and universities cannot wisely be sacrificed by overweighting the emphasis upon its equality.

KEARNEY, NOLAN C. Elementary School Objectives. Pp. 189. New York: Russell Sage Foundation, 1953. $3.00.

This small volume is a report prepared for The Mid-Century Committee on Outcomes in Elementary Education by Dr. Kearney while on leave of absence from his position as Assistant Superintendent for Curriculum and Research, Public Schools of St. Paul, Minnesota.

The primary concern of this study and the report was the identification of objectives or desired outcomes in elementary education upon which there would be considerable agreement by a selected group of consultants, critics, and other leaders in elementary education in the United States. The names and positions of those leaders are given at the beginning of the report. In addition there is an excellent chapter on implementation and implications of the selection of these goals for educational practice, research, and measurement.

For each of these goals there are questions posed by the report which indicate the types of outcomes and therefore have important implications for educational materials, methods, and measurement.

In Part Two of the report a chapter is devoted to each of these goals and to each of the types of outcomes that must result if these goals are to be obtained—for example, knowledge and understanding, skill and competence, attitude and interest, action pattern, and determining conditions. Furthermore, in the discussion of each of these types of outcomes there are sections devoted to the primary grades in the school, the intermediate grades and the upper grades.

While the committee emphasizes the development of skills in writing, reading, and arithmetic, factual knowledge in science, the various social studies, and other fields, it sets forth the views that clearly these are not enough and that children must be active in finding out the answers to many questions in these areas and that understanding must be emphasized as much as or more than factual knowledge. In discussing the importance of adapting educational materials and experiences to each individual child the report makes much of the fact of the wide variation now existing in children of various grades. For example, in the typical fourth grade reading ability varies as much as six years and among the typical sixth graders as much as eight years. The committee concluded that therefore it is impractical to set the same learning goals, at least in specific requirements, for all pupils. The specific aspects of the goals must be set in terms of each pupil in himself, his capacity, his ability, his previous background, and indeed his interests.

Among other important things recommended by the committee is increased attention to social and emotional development, ethical behavior, standards, and values, social relations, and aesthetic development; in other words they believe in assisting in the development of the well-rounded personality.

Another important aspect of the report is the Committee's insistence on democratic procedure and democratic understanding in the classroom involving respect for the rights of each individual. It also contains commendable recommendations with respect to recognition of the value of all people regardless of race, religion, or national origin and recognition of what is involved in interhuman relations, the American way of life, and fundamental concepts of honesty and fairplay, of brotherhood, and of concern for one's family and community resources.

PHILOSOPHY AND RELIGION

SARTON, GEORGE. A Guide to the History of Science. Pp. xviii, 316. Waltham, Mass.: Chronica Botanica, 1952. $7.50.

In the twentieth century no scholar better recalls by his own performance that type of monumental achievement in historical-bibliographical learning which earned world renown for such masters of books and ideas as a Scaliger, Bayle, Boeckh, or Steinschneider, than Professor Sarton. His learning is, moreover, unequivocally sustained by the moral conviction that science is irreplaceable by any other less rational tradition in the slow, heroic labor required to liberate humanity from evitable suffering, ignorance, and superstition. Under his guidance one commemorates the marvel—and it is no less—that mere humanity has been able to discern some impartial truths by the renunciation of willful, provincial, and hasty thinking.

We may state at once our judgment that the work here noticed is a characteristic product of Sarton's critical and bibliographical prowess; it is an absolutely indispensable reference book for every serious library, scientist, humanist. As if the choice bibliography pertaining to the history of nearly half a hundred sciences and three thoughtful introductory lectures were not sufficient accurate and generous information, Dr. Sarton, with the assistance of Dr. C. F. Mayer adds wonderfully rich additional indications concerning pertinent journals, museums, congresses and proceedings of learned societies, editions of sources, and the like.

Some of the bibliographies inevitably show, we believe, serious errors of choice. How was it possible to list Lord Russell as a historian of philosophy and exclude Windelband? Why choose Joad in the philosophy of science and omit Cassirer? Granet's studies in the style of Chinese science and thought cannot be passed over; H. Balss's source book on ancient astronomy is richer than Heath's familiar anthology. The series, "Orbis Academicus," a very impressive recent venture in German scholarship which presents the history of a discipline together with basic source documents in one volume was or could not be noticed. Linguistics and economics are completely overlooked in Sarton's bibliographies; sociology is imperfectly reported upon. Langer's recasting of Ploetz is apparently preferred to Delorme's culturally sensitive Chronologie des Civilisations. The references under science and society seem to avert one's gaze from the strong, suggestive studies of Mannheim, Ogburn, and Scheler. One of the best quarterlies summarizing scientific progress, the English Science Progress, is not mentioned.

Insufficient acknowledgment is made to the great earlier classics in the history of science, as if it were necessary to maintain a recently established professional point of view; for example, there is no reference to the charming and wise scientific biographies written by Fontenelle. The general reader could scarcely realize from the guide that creative men of science in looking back over the past are very far indeed from being dilettantes in history; if space permitted, one might cite the achievements of a Bernard, a Freud, a de Broglie, or a Larmor, or a Hankel to prove that a great deal of the very best history of science occurs only in such retrospective glances. Although Sarton deeply appreciates statistical science and even its moral significance, he does not, for example, list the excellent papers in which R. A. Fisher explains the content and setting of his masterly innovations.

As a philosopher of science Dr. Sarton deals more often than not in attractive generalities, but without presenting an articulated conception of scientific inquiry or progress. One therefore finds expressions of rather quaint views in his lectures such as a strong fear of "extrapolation," "a priori" thinking, and the like which indicate that philosophy of science is not his main concern and which go a long way toward explaining the not very penetrating remarks which he hazards concerning Kant, Hegel, and Shewell. We think it is instructive to observe, for instance, that to have forbidden "extrapolation" would have made it impossible for Copernicus to be a hero in the history of science!

Several cultural historical generalizations seem to us to be unwarranted. It is hardly the case that the influence of "scientific thinking" on the causation of the French revolution is not widely appreciated; Hegel knew all about it, as does every conservative French novelist. That science was carried "on the wings of religion" in Moslem culture (or in any culture) is a myth long ago seen through, we are convinced, by Renan. A somewhat testy emphasis on contemporary "barbarians" and "barbarous" technology is occasionally noticeable, which is not to be expected from a historian who is acquainted with the dreadful record of moral deficiencies in other ages, even those alleged to be ages of order and faith.

On the whole, however, no single writer could at present have done so very well.

Professor Sarton is truly in our time one of the prodigious, indispensable servants of the human mind.

FRETZ, JOSEPH WINFIELD. Pilgrims in Paraguay: The Story of Mennonite Colonization in South America. Pp. xvi, 247. Scottsdale, Pa.: Herald Press, 1953. $2.75.

This is an absorbingly interesting account of Mennonite colonization efforts in South America since 1920, which by 1950 had built up there a total Mennonite population of 16,000. Three-fourths of these are concentrated in landlocked but hospitable Paraguay, where they form several closed communities and have their largest town, Filadelfia (pop. 546 in 1950). The rest, more loosely organized, are unevenly distributed among Brazil (2500), Uruguay (1200), Argentina (500), and Colombia (90).

The author properly describes his book as not a history but a sociological report. Nevertheless, these pilgrimages and their fruits recall and recapitulate so much of the history of the past four centuries that this aspect of the story cannot fail to fascinate any historically minded reader.

They were obviously a product of conditions peculiar to the twentieth century; for example, the first and most numerous groups of pilgrims were refugees from Canada and Russia, and in both cases the forces that uprooted them were set in motion by World War I. Yet in certain respects this modern phenomenon has strong, though imperfect, analogies in earlier centuries, such as those with the Pilgrim Fathers of 1620, the Mormon migration of the 1840's, and the Jesuit missions established in the colonial period in this same Paraguay.

The everyday life of the major communities, those in Paraguay, also bears the imprint of many centuries, but that of the eighteenth seems strongest. Socially, this is largely a matter of choice, for these colonists are conservative; but economically it is one of necessity arising out of their isolated location and the lack of markets. Thus, in explaining why tractors could not be used even when they were provided free of charge, the author states that "the cost of operating them was . . . out of all proportion to the farmers' earning power"; they found it more economical to revert to the use of horses, oxen, and man power. Politically, however, they have developed democratic practices that strongly modify the theocratic character of their governments; and co-operatives, a nineteenth-century product, are a vital feature of their economic life.

Every aspect of life in these colonies, including their relations with the native South American peoples surrounding them, is discussed clearly and interestingly, and the text is supported by abundant statistical tables, maps, and documentation. Both the author and the institutions which aided him—the Mennonite Central Committee and the Social Science Research Council—are to be congratulated on the results of this study.

CULVER, DWIGHT W. Negro Segregation in the Methodist Church. Pp. xii, 218. New Haven: Yale University Press, 1953. $3.00.

Since there are more Negro Methodists than there are Negroes in all the other "white" denominations in the United States combined, a study of the attitude of American Methodism toward segregation is an important contribution to the literature of the American race problem. Materials for this study were secured through the widespread use of questionnaires circulated among white and colored superintendents, clergymen, and laymen.

In 1844 the Methodist Church split on the question of whether a Methodist bishop might own slaves, and Methodism was divided into a Methodist Episcopal Church and a Methodist Episcopal Church, South. During the negotiations for reunion (1924-36) there were three shades of opinion on the question of segregation: (1) a Southern group did not want the Negroes to remain within the reunited denomination and spoke of the "opportunity" for development which a separate religious organization would furnish them; (2) a Northern group was anxious for reunion but unwilling to sacrifice the privileges of the Negro minority; and (3) some Negro leaders, believing that their opportunities for fellowship with whites would be limited, favored a separate jurisdiction within the reunited church. A separate jurisdictional conference, it was said, was not discrimination but an effort to provide the minority group with enlarged opportunity. The consequence was the "Central Jurisdiction," an all-Negro administrative unit, created in 1939. It has not been satisfactory since a segregated church tends to deny that God is the father of all races and that therefore all men are brothers. Catholics and other unsegregated religious organizations have made extensive inroads on Negro Methodism.

This is not the end of the story. Discrimination in employment in the Methodist Publishing House, in service at the cafeteria of the Methodist Building at Washington, D. C., and in restaurants and hotels where the General Conference and other church meetings are held is noted. The Methodist Church maintains many colleges, medical schools, theological seminaries, homes, and hospitals. Those which are located at the South are segregated as required by law. Most of the non-Southern educational institutions practice a large degree of integration. Some of the non-Southern "homes" will not admit Negroes, and some of the hospitals will do so only in segregated wards; some will not admit them at all. "Employment opportunities are theoretically open to Negroes in all but six Methodist hospitals, but less than half now have Negroes employed" (p. 139). Professional opportunities for Negro doctors, nurses, and interns are still more limited.

The book is a mine of valuable information on contemporary mores, and it is interestingly written. A careful perusal will be worthwhile in the opinion of this reviewer.

ROEMER, LAWRENCE. Brownson on Democracy and the Trend Toward Social- ism. Pp. xvi, 173. New York: Philosophical Library, 1953. $3.75.

At the age of 41 Orestes Brownson (1803-76), a self-educated polemicist who prided himself on his powers of "logical" analysis, joined the Roman Catholic Church. His conversion brought to an end a series of misadventures with various Protestant denominations in which as a preacher he had sought unsuccessfully for an infallible source of moral authority. Satisfied at last, he spent the rest of his life writing for Catholic journals and adumbrating such propositions as "no one can be a good American citizen unless he is a Catholic."

This singular notion and others no less curious are laid admiringly before the reader in the book under review. Its author Mr. Roemer, an uncritical latter-day disciple of Brownson's, attempts to distill the essence of the latter's political speculations from the hundreds of essays and book reviews he wrote during his Catholic period rather than from his American Republican which has chiefly interested previous critics and biographers.

According to Mr. Roemer, Brownson's "failure to arouse the interest of individuals, particularly Catholics, in the [United States] constitution and its relation to the moral law was rather distressing to him." However distressing, his failure is scarcely surprising on the evidence unconsciously brought forward by Mr. Roemer. The fact is that Brownson's views on the Constitution, federalism, democracy, socialism, and a dozen other topics were so remote from reality that they would have been more plausible if alleged to apply to another planet.

A few examples will suffice. Brownson defends the United States Constitution on two grounds: first and less exceptionably, that its division of powers between the central government and the states protects the society from the tyranny of centralized popular rule; and second, that its "unity and diversity" resembles more closely than any other system the Holy Trinity, which is the "principle and prototype of all society." Hence the Catholic Church is in harmony with the American system, whereas "all false religions being one-sided, sophistical, uncatholic, are opposed by the principles of the state, which tend, by their silent but effective workings, to eliminate them."

He violently opposes democracy, which in keeping with his dogmatic temper he chooses to equate with absolute majority rule. Democracy, he declares, "generates a habit of appealing on nearly all occasions, from truth and justice, wisdom and virtue, to the force of numbers, and virtually sinks the man in the brute." Relying on "logic" and imperious assertion rather than on evidence, he condemns the democratic emphasis on political equality because it leads "inevitably" to a demand for social equality, which in turn begets "socialism," the worst of all evils because it culminates in atheism and annihilates religion.

Mr. Roemer never boggles at any of this. On the contrary he goes Brownson one better, for in his last chapter we find him applying Brownsonian principles to contemporary problems with the following results: opposition to the United Nations, objection to the federal income tax, and criticism of the "neutrality" of the public schools in religious matters. On this last point, he would close up the public schools and "distribute public funds equally on the basis of enrollment to any organization willing to undertake the task of educating children without depriving them of religious instruction. . . . As a matter of fact there would be only three kinds of institutions—Jewish, Protestant and Catholic."

Is it uncharitable to predict that Mr. Roemer will find the response to his own views "distressing"?

PFEFFER, LEO. Church, State, and Freedom. Pp. xvi, 675. Boston: Beacon Press, 1953. $10.00.

In his American Commonwealth James Bryce cites our separation of church and state as being one of our most distinguished and successful achievements. It has delivered us from the strife that plagued Europe for fifteen hundred years. It has been our custom and convention to concur in this judgment. Thus a great American jurist says that "the greatest achievement ever made in the cause of human progress is the total and final separation of church and state."

This book is one of an increasing number of such works dealing primarily with the present situation. It accepts the fact that "America has not solved the controversy." The interest and importance of this volume lie in the person of its author. Dr. Pfeffer is a constitutional lawyer who has appeared before our courts in cases where the issue has been tried—in particular the Supreme Court of the United States. His work is heavily documented, and fortunately we may trust him to have cited the relevant and most important sources. To this extent the book may be accepted as probably more definite than any of its many predecessors.

It is important to remember that the phrase "separation of church and state" is no part of the Constitution or the Bill of Rights. It is at best a later description of the situation presumably intended by these originals. The stubborn and still unresolved problems which persist arise from the fact that, though some institutional issues may be solved in this way, it is impossible to divorce religion and citizenship.

The first two-thirds of the book cover familiar ground: the European and colonial background and the present areas of conflict, mainly in the field of tax-supported educational institutions. The Everson and McCollum cases are reviewed with meticulous care. It is interesting to see how ambiguous and equivocal our constitutions and laws must be when faced with concrete dilemmas. Thus, the judgment of the Supreme Court in the Everson case was a five to four decision.

The last part of the book on the general problem of religious freedom is in some ways the most interesting in that it explores types of problems not anticipated by our constitutions and laws. What about the snake worshiper who allows himself, in the course of his devotions, to be bitten by a rattler? What about the Jehovah's Witness who withholds blood transfusions from his dying child on the ground that this would be a prohibited form of drinking the blood? The author has a genuine concern for religious liberty, and thus, for the eccentricities of the individual conscience, but he feels bound to defend the public welfare against the lunatic fringe which lies in the far side of a theoretically defensible religious fanaticism.

DONIGER, SIMON (Ed.). Sex and Religion Today. Pp. xii, 238. New York: Association Press, 1953. $3.00.

Sex and Religion Today is a compilation of articles written by experts in their specialized fields concerning religious attitude toward sex today.

All of the contributors to this work, edited by Simon Doniger, consider sex not in the physical only, but also in an understanding of love. The studies of Kinsey and others have presented sex only on the lowest possible plane, the instinct of man, the animal.

There are three basic chapters in this book: "Sex—Sin or Salvation?" by Seward Hiltner, "Christianity and Sex" by Roland H. Bainton, and "The Meaning of Sex" by Gotthard Booth. The other chapters add very little to the principles set forth in these three chapters but, in a sense, restate the same truths.

"Sex—Sin or Salvation?" presents sex as salvation, in that man, distinct from other animals, is not merely a rutting animal, but can engage in sexual activities throughout the year. This caused man to provide a domicile where babies could be born and cared for and to create conditions suitable to life. He also suggests that a sane healthy approach to sex leads to the salvation of the personality. Of course, it would be interesting to define his use of salvation. If he means it in the theological sense, as the salvation offered in the Gospel, I would disagree, but in the terms of the physical, I can accept it. He also points out the sin-element in sex which is important.

"Christianity and Sex" presents the various views held by religious leaders down through the years. The wide range of ideas of Jerome, Luther, Church leaders, and the Catholic Church are presented, making an interesting study. No matter how far apart these personalities may have been on the question of sex behavior, the leaders of all ages agree that the Christian's attitude toward sex should not be considered apart from love, marriage, and family.

"The Meaning of Sex" presents the biology of sex and explains the urge toward sex to the nature of the sex cells which divide before copulation into two separate cells or chromosomes. The very nature of sex in its incompleteness is the drive which demands physical sexual union.

Sex is given an entirely too important role in life, yet due to the importance assigned it today, we need a careful, wholesome study of it. This book is a contribution toward the healthy understanding of sex.

KARUNAKARAN, K. P. India in World Affairs, August 1947-January 1950: A Review of India's Foreign Relations from Independence Day to Republic Day. Pp. xi, 407. Calcutta: Oxford University Press, 1952. Rs. 15.

India has assumed a role of importance in international affairs out of all proportion to her ability to fulfill commitments in the furtherance of these views. The opinions of Prime Minister and Foreign Minister Jawaharlal Nehru may not be the "voice of Asia," as some would assert. But few will deny the impact that Nehru has made in assuring Asia a place of honor and respect in international councils. The pressing needs of the economically less favored sectors of the world sustain the Indian insistence that the poor, diseased, and underprivileged not be by-passed because of an engrossment over the Communist issue. Without significant military power and in a situation of severe internal economic stress, India has taken a stand that ties her future to the ultimate solution of the multiple interrelated social and economic problems that are international in scope. Thus India, while struggling with domestic concerns, looks outward for the creation of an international environment favorable for general peace, prosperity, and joint attacks upon common problems. It is this theme of the close relations between Indian domestic and external relations that K. P. Karunakaran has surveyed.

The Indian Council of World Affairs has initiated a program of research and publication that will make available the details of India's interest and participation in foreign affairs. This first volume in the general series attempts the difficult task of summarizing the background of Indian foreign policy and giving an assessment of the working out of that policy to the time of the coming into force of the Constitution of the Republic of India in January of 1950. On the whole, the results of the author are impressive. Sections on India's relations with Pakistan and India's participation in the United Nations are outstanding statements of a particular point of view. On the other hand, the many pages devoted to political developments in other Asian countries are not of the same quality and thus tend to detract from the concentration of the main thesis.

It is surprising that the author did not give more attention to the dominance of Prime Minister Nehru in the building of India's foreign policy. The political education of Nehru runs a close parallel first with the foreign policy resolves of the Indian National Congress and later with the policy of the Government of India (ruled by the Congress Party). Nehru's preoccupation with nationalism, anti-colonialism, the subtleties of economic domination, the status of Asia and the ills of fascism do not in this process find a similar recognition of the totalitarian, expanding nature of organized communism. A study of Congress resolutions on foreign policy is revealing in this respect. India's policy of "independence" in world affairs has involved a logical de-emphasis of Indian democratic national aspirations and ideological values both of which have their international implications. This aspect of Indian foreign policy is not explored fully by the author.

Only a few errors have been noticed. The full index and bibliography are helpful additions to a book that is a credit to it author and to its sponsor, the Indian Council of World Affairs.

ROOSEVELT, ELEANOR. India and the Awakening East. Pp. xvi, 237. New York: Harper & Brothers, 1953. $3.00.

In the charming and lucid style of My Day, Mrs. Roosevelt has written a diary of her travels in India and Pakistan, Nepal, Indonesia, the Philippines, Israel, Lebanon, Syria, and Jordan. She is at her best when describing her experiences with the students of Allahabad University. Their questions indicated the natural student interest in world politics and a keen desire to be informed about conditions in the United States. A contrast is drawn between the effectiveness of Communist propaganda which merely promises the people of India the "Freedom to Eat," something easily comprehended, and the relative ineffectiveness of the Western goal of prosperity, and the need to progress as far and as rapidly as possible. To the vast majority of the underprivileged population, these ideas sound fantastic and are far removed from anything within their experience and knowledge, and the spiritual motivations of the Occident are not understood.

The penetrating criticism is made that the Indian belief in the virtue of renunciation is not an incentive to hard work for material gain. Consequently, since only hard work will bring a betterment in Indian living conditions, Mrs. Roosevelt believes that a spiritual incentive, as a substitute for renunciation, will have to be found to spark the conviction that the modern struggle for a highly technologically developed state is worthwhile. Equally strange to her as a Westerner, believing in the separation of church and state, is the fact that in Pakistan religion plays such a controlling part both in the citizen's daily life and in the affairs of Government. Because geographically and economically Pakistan and India are a natural unit, the conclusion is reached that the subcontinent is paying a terrible price for partition, which has resulted in spending for defense huge sums badly needed for health, housing, education, and other programs that would better the living standards of the people.

With reference to the Near East, Mrs. Roosevelt's principal comment is that the spirit and resolve exhibited in Israel cannot possibly be without result and sooner or later must make this experiment a success. In regard to the Arab refugee problem, her observation is that one is surprised that the Arabs would have left places that were fairly safe unless from panic and hysteria spread through authoritative channels, particularly since 170,000 Moslems are still living peacefully and unharmed in Israel. Arab responsibility for the present situation, she declares, must be shared by the British who furnished the refugees with transportation, and by no stretch of the imagination can there be envisaged the return to Israel of 800,000 destitute refugees now in Arab lands.

While entertaining, and of definite interest to those not acquainted with the countries described, the book does not attempt to offer anything new to students of these areas.

MARTIN, KINGSLEY. Harold Laski (1893-1950): A Biographical Memoir. Pp. x, 278. New York: The Viking Press, 1953. $4.00. (Previously published in London by Victor Gollancz.)

In this brief, admiring biography, Kingsley Martin gives the kind of highly personal account of Laski which one might expect from a strong and devoted friend. It is very readable, and to one who knew and liked Laski it is quite sympathetic. It is likely to prove irritating to readers who did not know or like Laski. Whether discussing "the crisis in democracy," fascism, communism, the Jewish question, or American democracy, Martin is decidedly sympathetic to Laski's ideas, quoting critics in order to refute them. How one would love to argue these issues with him!

It is difficult to read this eulogy without checking it against the Holmes-Laski correspondence published earlier this year. The portrait which emerged from this correspondence shocked many. I have time and again participated as counsel for the defense in pointed arguments over the Laski of the correspondence. Kingsley Martin offers an urbane apology for Laski's love of boasting about his acquaintances and his faiblesse for telling tall stories. It was, after all, a minor flaw. More serious (in a scholar) would seem the tendency to be less than accurate about what he had read, including the quoting of scholarly writings from memory. But it, too, can be defended by the boundless enthusiasm which was one of Laski's portrait assets.

But the crucial problem in the biography, styled a "memoir," of a scholar and writer of learned books, is the evaluation of his works. I feel sure that Laski would want to be remembered for them. It is therefore disappointing to find Martin often offering only uncritical and indiscriminating praise. Surely works like the Grammar of Politics deserved something more incisive than the kind of comment which might be found in a brief review by a man who had only skimmed through the book. I feel certain that a man of Kingsley Martin's penetration could have done better than characterize the Pluralist position in terms which would make Hegel a pluralist. In the same vein might be questioned Martin's hesitation to put into perspective Laski's conversion to Marxism, and Laski's consequent failure to assess the Soviet Union's position with candor. It may be a matter of opinion whether Laski's book on The American Presidency was one of his best achievements, but surely its intense partisanship need not be described as "objective in approach," immediately to be followed by the contradictory remark that the work was calculated "to give support to a great liberal president." It is an open secret that Laski was not only no admirer of the American system but a bitter and doctrinaire critic, as the Laski-Price debate showed later. More discriminating is Kingsley Martin's elaborate discussion of Laski's The American Democracy which culminates in a moving indictment of the present academic hysteria. A critique would involve all of Marxism's complex inconclusiveness in matters of political theory, and Martin may be pardoned for not entering upon it.

It was a happy inspiration to conclude the volume with a small piece of Laski's which shows him as the warm-hearted, valuable human being he was, who possessed a superb gift of expression. The piece is a gem, and confirms me in the suspicion that Laski will live as a writer of prose in the manner of Burke—a man he disliked and whom he resembled in so many ways. This piece alone is worth the price of the book. And in spite of its shortcomings, the Kingsley Martin portrait has the one quality most important in a biography—Harold Laski comes to life in his pages—and our gratitude to him for that achievement is a great and lasting one.

SIMPSON, COLIN. Adam in Ochre: Inside Aboriginal Australia. Pp. 221. New York: Frederick A. Praeger, 1953. $5.00.

This is a splendidly produced book. The colored and black and white plates, the delightful line drawings, and the clear type make it a thing of joy to possess and handle. The book arose out of the author's visit to the Darwin region of the Northern Territory of Australia to report and make recordings for the Australian Broadcasting Commission. He visited the camp of the American-Australian scientific expedition at Oenpelli, about one hundred miles by air east of Darwin, and also the Government Settlements on Melville Island, fifty miles north of Darwin, and those at Delissaville across the harbor from that town.

Mr. Simpson, an experienced reporter and observer, describes clearly what he saw and transcribes what he was told, so that the book has the virtue of first-hand observation. In addition, he has incorporated the results of general and anthropological reading so that he gives us more than a travel book. He regards himself as something of a middleman in making available to the ordinary readers results of anthropological research which they would not otherwise see.

Adam in Ochre, however, is not and does not claim to be a systematic work on the three tribes visited by the author. It consists rather of series of sketches on the three districts and the people, black and white, in them. The first part is about the scientific expedition, its members, and some aboriginal and other incidents which Mr. Simpson witnessed. For Melville Island and Delissaville we are given brief descriptions of the conditions on the Government Settlements and of some native customs and ceremonies.

In addition, Mr. Simpson includes a 50-page novel, "Kakadu Naked," based on Baldwin Spencer's account of the Kakadu tribe which formerly lived in the Oenpelli district, and also on the theme of the contact of black and white, of white man and black woman in particular. In this story, the author makes good use of his all too short visit to Oenpelli.

Finally, Mr. Simpson adds a chapter, "White Delusion," in which he predicts that in a few years the Aborigines will start to increase in numbers. The somewhat haphazard material provided in the chapter is not convincing, but I think he is correct. The Aborigines in the center and north of Australia have had time to readjust themselves, while improved health, education, and social services and better employment conditions are helping them in this process.

All interested in the condition and progress of peoples of primitive culture in contact with ourselves will appreciate this layman's book on the subject.

SLUSSER, ROBERT (Ed.). Soviet Economic Policy in Postwar Germany. Pp. xx, 184. New York: Research Program on the USSR, 1953. $2.25.

In our present need for thorough knowledge of the Soviet system, we can obtain valuable aid from the many talented Soviet citizens who have fled to the West. Some of them were officials with direct operating experience in the myriad institutions of a totalitarian state. Their accounts, if sometimes tinged with understandable bitterness, are nevertheless far more informative than the scanty, doubtful, or purely formal materials released by agencies of the system itself.

The present symposium contains eight essays by seven such officials, dealing with Soviet theory and practice in Eastern Germany from 1945 to 1950. It is an early fruit of the venture in scholarly replanting known as the Research Program on the USSR, a subsidiary of the East European Fund, Incorporated. Former Soviet scholars and administrators, now in this country, who wish to enter professional life in the United States, are given a chance to demonstrate their ability. At the same time, first-hand observations on Soviet reality are recorded and made available for Western analysts. Clearly both sides gain substantially, and the East European Fund is to be congratulated on its program. The editor, Robert Slusser, has produced a uniform English text and added a revealing introduction; the result is a lucid monograph for which we can all be grateful.

The study covers four aspects of Soviet policy in Germany: the early stripping of the German economy; the administrative organization of Soviet controls; issues and practices in dealing with German agriculture; and, finally, a detailed account of uranium mining in Saxony under Soviet auspices. It includes also a good bibliography, a chronology of events, a map of eastern Germany, and a comprehensive index. Offered at $2.25 with a paper cover, it seems an excellent buy for all who are curious about Russian activities in post-war Germany.

In particular, political scientists concerned with the anatomy of dictatorship and with bureaucratic rivalries behind a unified façade will find here much revealing material. Portions of the study constitute a detailed manual of public administration at this time and place. Economists and historians will appreciate the discussion of alternative Soviet economic policies for draining off tribute from Germany. Clearly an appreciation of the factors at work and the consequences involved is fundamental to any evaluation of present or future prospects in Soviet-German relations.

For this reviewer, the most interesting findings suggested by the study relate to planning, Sovietization, and collectivization. A really astounding competition among Soviet industrial organizations for German plant and equipment, combined with grossly stupid dismantling practices, indicates that the Soviet myth of a "planned" economy is still far from actuality. Secondly, economic exploitation of the German economy, which took precedence over the Soviet objective of gaining German allegiance to the Soviet system, may have permanently impaired the prospects for attaining this goal. Finally, it is clear that Soviet methods in agriculture had little technological or political appeal for the East German peasant, which provides one more confirmation of the thesis that Soviet collective farming is in fact a primitive, rather than advanced, agricultural system.

BERGSON, ABRAM (Ed.). Soviet Economic Growth: Conditions and Perspectives. Pp. viii, 376. Evanston, Ill.: Row, Peterson and Company, 1953. $6.00.

The free world is heavily in debt to the simple frontiersman's spirit and the large bank balances of American research, especially the RAND Corporation. What Soviet studies require is not brilliant and novel interpretations but quantification. Defectors must be interviewed and technical journals combed, production indexes and public opinion surveys compiled. These tasks have called forth a thoroughly expert and objective body of men who are as great a credit to American learning as the China experts of the State Department. May they never suffer a similar fate; for here again there is no substitute in Western Europe.

We have here solid and original research, based usually upon a thorough knowledge of modern economic theory, into the statistics of most aspects of Soviet economic growth: population, natural resources, transport, industry, agriculture, foreign trade, investment, national income. Omitted are forced labor and the standard of living. These omissions are particularly serious as they make the successes of the Soviet economy seem even greater than they are. This is, then, a source-book, only readable by specialists. The statistics are compiled rather than used; though at least the indispensable minimum of comparisons with Western performance is provided. This task sets the most exacting standards of accuracy and conscientiousness. Your reviewer is only competent to pass upon Mr. Eason's population figures: they certainly achieve these standards. My confidence in the rest of the work is raised by the inclusion of critical comments after each paper by other experts. These are on the whole very favorable to the papers presented.

From the most cursory study of these materials—and especially from Mr. Kaplan's paper which is in more senses than one the pièce de résistance—there emerges a comparison with the West that is extremely alarming. Briefly, no "capitalist" country has achieved for long the rate of economic growth, whether absolutely or per capita, which has persisted in the Soviet Union since 1929; and most fall very far short of it all the time. Our only serious consolations are: (1) various factors which must reduce but not by any means abolish this superiority; (2) the long start possessed by the developed Western nations; and (3) the fact that the general Soviet superiority masks an undoubted inferiority in agriculture, the most basic activity of all.

The two papers on international trade are notably the weakest. They add little to the knowledge derived from Soviet publications and inexcusably fail to collate the admirable work of the United Nations and its Economic Commission for Europe in this field. Also at this point at least some reference to finance was required—a subject that has otherwise rightly been avoided.

Current Soviet Policies: The Documentary Record of the 19th Communist Party Congress and the Reorganization after Stalin's Death. From the translations of The Current Digest of the Soviet Press. Edited with an introduction by Leo Gruliov. Pp. vi, 268. New York: Frederick A. Praeger, 1953. $6.00.

This book is a compilation of translations from the Current Digest of the Soviet Press prepared under the direction of the distinguished Joint Committee on Slavic Studies. Leo Gruliov has written a valuable introduction and prepared an excellent index and glossary. These documents include Stalin's economic problems of socialism in the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, the important discussions preceding the Congress and the reports from the congresses in the Republics and in Moscow Province, the directives of the Fifth Five Year Plan, and the pronouncements, speeches, and directives relating to Stalin's death and the subsequent reorganization of the inner cabinet and governmental and party administrations.

The Congress opened October 5, 1952, in the Great Hall of the Kremlin Palace. Three days before, it was announced that Georgy Malenkov would deliver the report of the Central Committee. Stalin, however, published in Bolshevik, No. 18, letters which he had written on socio-economic theory, the prerequisites for communism, and the inevitability of wars among the capitalist states. In them he told the comrades that it would be a long time before they would have communism in the U.S.S.R., a statement which may now be regarded as his political testament.

Malenkov's major report of the Central Committee of the All-Union Communist Party to the Congress covered the international situation, and the internal problems of the Soviet Union and the party. He harangued the comrades at length on "the further weakening of the world capitalist system," the rise of two world markets, the advent of American imperialism, the United States attack on the Korean Peoples' Democratic Republic, and the coming triumph of the socialist economic system over capitalism. The comrades were warned against "the external appearances of free world unity which glitter on the surface." "There is every reason to believe," concluded Malenkov in his advocacy of Soviet preparedness, "that a third world war would cause the collapse of the world capitalistic system."

Malenkov was not equal to the task of speaking for five hours on such momentous subjects without revealing considerable shallowness of thought, or at best misinformation, as well as a vulgarization of the techniques of international propaganda, incompatible with his future role as chief of state. On the other hand, his presentation of the internal economic and political situations was masterful, realistic, and praiseworthy. At this congress the memory of the opposition to Stalin had faded, three-fifths of the delegates had joined the Party since 1930, and "the normalizing of party life" after the purges had profoundly affected the delegates of almost seven million Party members.

Unfortunately, this book does not emphasize the completely arbitrary but historic changes in Party administration after Stalin's death, which nullified decisions of the 19th Congress and established trends toward a greater concentration of power in the inner cabinet and party presidium, as well as in the economic and cultural administrations. Even more marked were the emergency measures "to insure the uninterrupted and correct leadership of the whole life of the country" in order to prevent "any kind of disarray and panic" during the irrepressible struggle for power which followed the proclamation of a new personal dictatorship.

SETON-WATSON, HUGH. From Lenin to Malenkov: The History of World Communism. Pp. xv, 377. New York: Frederick A. Praeger, 1953. $6.00.

Professor Seton-Watson describes and analyzes Communism throughout the world except in the United States. His book is packed with useful information and a fresh point of view. His best chapters deal with the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics. He is weaker on China and on southern Europe.

Although most of his book is strictly objective and written from a detached point of view, his final chapter includes some valuable personal admonitions: "Western intellectuals must stop being ashamed of their own civilization, and become aware of the difference in quality between it and totalitarianism . . . in the last resort the classes and political groups within western society—excepting . . . the Stalinist fifth column—belong to each other. . . . If western men and women insist that they hate each other more than they hate Stalinism, they have it in their power to hand themselves over, bound hand and foot, to the Stalinists." He also takes to task the "small but influential intelligentsia" in Britain "that clings to the slogan pas d'ennemis à gauche." Describing its essential feature as a "guilt complex," Seton-Watson points out that this group refuses to resist Communist aggression so long as a slum exists in the British Empire. Comparing them with another earlier British group which argued that since Versailles was an imperfect settlement Britain had no right to oppose Hitler, the author stresses their curious double standard which at no time expresses concern for inmates of Soviet slave labor camps and victims of Soviet aggression.

Seton-Watson rightly states that "every democratic statesman who wishes his country to remain free from Soviet imperialism must regard the United States as his friend. 'Third force' manoeuvring and 'neutrality' invite disaster." Proceeding to declare that "The aim of western policy must be the liberation of the peoples of the Soviet empire," he nevertheless offers nothing better than this: "The only policy that will save the free world is to be patient and strong, to search for every opportunity and to keep an open mind." Just what this pious statement will do for the impatient east German workers and for the peasants of eastern Europe, China, and north Korea is not clear.

This book effectively demolishes lingering sentiment which made such claims as that the nationalities of the U.S.S.R. have been well treated, that there was some justification for the purge trials, and that the kulaks existed as a class. The author also exposes as a sham the long-held thesis that Western imperialists invaded Russia after World War I. Seton-Watson does an admirable debunking job which will dismay the followers of Bernard Pares and Frederick Schuman. He draws an apt parallel between Hindenburg in 1932 and Benes in 1948, and shows how "old China hands" were fooled by the "agrarian democrats" in China.

On the other hand one finds the amazing question "Whether or not the Soviet leaders engineered the Korean war. . . ." One wonders who Seton-Watson thinks did start that war? The author seems to have relied solely on the American White Paper on China for the modern China section, and ignored such sources as Dallin (on China and U.S.S.R.), MacNeill (on Greece), and De Madariaga on Spain. For example, to state that the Popular Front won a "plurality" in the 1936 Spanish elections is to fly in face of the facts. The author also slights the role of the Agrarians and Christian Democrats in east European resistance, while falsely making it appear that the Socialists carried the brunt of the fight.

EBON, MARTIN. Malenkov: Stalin's Successor. Introduction by Harry Schwartz. Pp. xv, 284. New York: McGraw-Hill Book Company, 1953. $3.75.

Recent events have added a postscript to this book and pointed up the "wide and bitter struggles for power which took place in Moscow between the Nineteenth Party Congress and the announcement of Stalin's death." Writing in the general fog of uncertainty that hung over that event, the author was groping after the vital factors in the picture which were then obscure but have gradually begun to stand out with greater clarity.

Mr. Ebon makes no claim to dogmatic certainty or to any degree of finality in his estimate of Malenkov's life or character. He has naturally had to rely largely on the work of other writers and on Soviet documents, especially on those which feature the utterances of the Soviet Prime Minister. The speeches of Malenkov printed in the appendix impress one with their voluble repetition of Soviet jargon, their turgid rhetoric, their inconsistencies and contradictions, which would indicate that Malenkov is less at home in the fields of Communist theory and Soviet policy than in that of intrigue and the desperate game of "Russian roulette" in which the stakes are either supreme power or political extinction.

Working within the limits imposed by scarcity of material, and basing his estimate of Malenkov on such facts in his career as are well known, Mr. Ebon has drawn a picture of a calculating, cruel, unscrupulous, crafty, yet bold player in this game of Communist politics. Having joined the Party only in 1920, Malenkov accepted without question the great decisions reached prior to then and shows no likelihood of departing from them. With his indifference to, and even contempt for, theory, what he has contributed has been in the field of their application to existing conditions. As in all Communist practice deviations are no more than temporary expedients.

The book gives signs of having been written in some haste to take advantage of the demand created by Stalin's death, and errors have been allowed to creep in. Two of these are fairly serious. On page 139 it is stated that "Joseph Stalin in all his seventy-three years never ventured further away from Soviet borders than Teheran." If this is intended to imply that he had never before left Russia, this is wrong since Stalin is known to have traveled abroad at least twice, in 1906 to Stockholm and in 1912 to Krakow. If on the other hand the author has not forgotten these previous journeys, he has at least underestimated these distances from the Russian frontier. The statement on page 149, "the Czechoslovak coup d'etat [February, 1948] prompted the Marshall plan" is hardly in accord with the facts since the Marshall plan had already taken shape in the autumn of 1947.

CARR, EDWARD HALLETT. The Bolshevik Revolution, 1917-1923. Pp. ix, 614. New York: The Macmillan Company, 1953. $6.00.

This is the third and final volume in a series covering the history of the Bolshevik Revolution from 1917 to 1923. The first dealt with internal politics, the second with economic questions and the third with "Soviet Russia and the World," covering Europe, Asia, Germany, and the Far East.

This series is undoubtedly the best and most objective history of the Russian Revolution which has been written by a Western historian.

Professor Carr writes in retrospect and can thus make trenchant criticisms in the light of events which have long since passed. It would be interesting to read a history of the Western World written with the same objectivity by, let us say, a Czech professor of history. Then perhaps we would be better able to compare the actions of the Soviet bloc with those of the Western bloc.

The author has done the best he could with the sources at his disposal, but truth is always difficult to establish. For example, Sun Yat-sen in China offered the Communists individual membership in the Kuomintang. What was the position of the Central Committee of the Chinese Communist Party on this offer? The President of the Central Committee declared that the proposal was vigorously opposed by all the leading members of the committee and was finally forced through by invoking the authority of the Comintern. Maring, on the other hand, who made the proposal to the Party, said he had "no specific instructions from the Comintern."

We see in this history that the Communists had a zeal for their cause somewhat similar to that which Christian missionaries have had when they proposed "the evangelization of the world in this generation." The Communists wanted a communistic world in this generation!

This book gives a carefully documented picture of the difficulties faced by the Communist leaders in trying to promote their cause throughout the world while at the same time safeguarding the newly formed government of the Soviet Union. Here we see how overoptimistic Lenin was about revolution in Europe, Germany, and the Far East.

A special supplement of the book deals with "The Marxist Attitude to War." It is clear that while Communists are ostensibly opposed to war they believe in taking advantage of an international war created by "a crisis in the capitalistic system" to bring about revolutions everywhere.

The witch hunters in America today, who are trying to intimidate all sections of American society, should take to heart the statement that Communism is inconsequential in the United States. The exact words of Professor Carr are, "But neither the legal nor the illegal party exercised any influence in American political life; nor do they appear to have received any serious attention in Moscow, so that the role of the American party in the international communist movement remained unimportant as well as anomalous."

The author believes that the Soviet Union was interested in establishing and encouraging national states free from colonial domination, and this was in no small part the reason for Soviet success, whereas the Western powers favored weak rulers, colonialism, and landlordism.

American policy makers would do well to note that the split between North and South Korea had its seeds back in 1919 when two Korean National Movements were started, one trying to get the backing of the United States and the other of the Soviet Union. As long ago as 1926 some 160,000 Koreans had fled to the Soviet Union for refuge from oppression.

These three volumes will be invaluable to all students of the Russian Revolution. It is greatly to be hoped that Professor Carr will continue his historical treatment of Soviet Russia, bringing it down to 1953. Then we will be in a better position to get a picture of current events in their true perspective.

MANNING, CLARENCE A. Ukraine Under the Soviets. Pp. 223. New York: Bookman Associates, 1953. $3.50.

This brief general survey of Soviet rule in Ukraine has emerged from a series of specialized studies which were prepared by a number of prominent Ukrainian scholars who are now in the West. Many of these scholars had established reputations in the Soviet Union prior to World War II. A fundamental thesis of this study is that the pattern of rule which has been imposed upon the satellite states was tested and developed in Ukraine and in the other non-Russian Soviet republics.

The brief but informative chapters deal first with the revolutionary period and the relatively relaxed early phase of Soviet rule in the 1920's when Ukraine was nominally independent. Other chapters are devoted to the Ukrainization period which, in many cases, meant derussification and which prompted much debate. The scholarly revival and the Ukrainian cultural renaissance are given special treatment as are the various literary schools and the very colorful and tragic figure of the writer Mykola Khvylovy who dared to challenge Stalin's centralism. The collectivization and famine in Ukraine are given attention and the unfortunate reticence of most of the non-Soviet world is justifiably criticized. A most interesting aspect of the volume is the attention which is given to the fate of the original Ukrainian Communists and fellow-travelers who paid with their lives during the Stalinist gleichschaltung which subordinated all Ukrainian cultural life to the Muscovite model. Several chapters are devoted to the war-time period and to the large-scale defections of Ukrainians as well as to the stupid policies of the Nazis. The study concludes with chapters on Soviet cultural and religious policies since the war.

Several serious typographical errors detract from the volume; for example, the name of the writer Andry Zalyvchy is misspelled on page 67 and in the index. It is unfortunate that the study lacks documentation although it should be borne in mind that most of the scholars responsible for the research on which it is based themselves experienced the events discussed by Professor Manning. It would have been desirable to include more detail on such matters as the Vinnytsya Massacre of 1937, the break in the OUN in 1940-1941, and Stepan Bandera and his relations with the German occupation authorities.

While the definitive and fully documented study of Communist rule in Ukraine has yet to be written, Professor Manning's volume is important because it provides valuable data on an area in which neglect can be very dangerous.

Sovietization of Culture in Poland, The. A Collective Work. Pp. xv, 207. Paris: Mid-European Research and Planning Centre, 1953. No price.

In a doctoral dissertation issued not long ago under the aegis of the Slavic department of one of our American universities we find reference made more than once to what the author calls "peasant writing." The implication is that there are two kinds of writing: (1) peasant and (2) other.

To us who have been schooled to see writing as simply (1) good and (2) bad, the new categories come as a shock. Apparently, however, we are going to have to get used to them, and to others even more shocking in other fields, if the sovietization of the world continues at its present rate of advance. Already whole nations have experienced the new dispensation, none, be it said, with greater violence to its past habits and practices than the one which is the subject of the present study—Poland.

The Sovietization of Culture in Poland is in the way of an adaptation of studies which appeared earlier in a special "krajowy" (homeland) number of the Polish review Kultura (Paris, December 1952). Earlier this year I received a copy of this from one of the authors, Marja Danilewicz, Librarian of the Polish University Library in London. As I read it, my one thought was that it should be made available to a wider public than the strictly Polish. For here was a case study, clear and scholarly and brief, of what may with truth be called The Great Phenomenon of our time. I am glad this has now been done.

This phenomenon is the remaking of national cultures in images totally foreign to the native pattern and tradition. It is going on in Europe, in Asia, everywhere the Kremlin has been able to win a position of control. The very concept of such a remaking process is indeed the Great Idea of our era.

Many of the national groups in the Soviet orbit, especially in Central Asia, have cultures of their own that are but vague and half-coalesced. Poland, however, has a clearly defined and very old culture, firmly rooted in the western tradition. Her experience as an object of Soviet remaking offers, therefore, peculiarly instructive reading for ourselves.

Reduced to its essence, the object of the remaking process is complete despiritualization. To accomplish this end in Poland, where idealism has been a national trait and a proud boast, the Soviets have had to make over the whole Polish past. Historians and other writers, "engineers of the soul," as Stalin called them, have been recruited to do this, their own spiritual citadels having first been taken by the weapons of gold and fame. New heroes have been created, and old heroes, even the most beloved, like the Romantic poets, have been fitted with new faces and transformed into "class warriors." The wider access to the written word, by way of pamphlets and dramas and books, which seemed to be one of the good things about post-1945 life in Poland, thus becomes for the people but a means of betrayal into the hands of cynical and opportunistic hirelings.

The present study explores the Soviet tactic in every field of the national life. The picture it offers is frightening, the more so for its sobriety and lack of color. It bears out the pessimistic view to be found in other reports of what is happening behind the Curtain such as the recently published Captive Mind, and gives the West little ground for hope.

SIMMONS, ERNEST J. (Ed.). Through the Glass of Soviet Literature: Views of Russian Society. Pp. ix, 301. New York: Columbia University Press, 1953. $4.50.

This is a series of five interesting and valuable studies on some significant aspects of Soviet society, as reflected in its literature. The book deals with the position of women in Soviet society (Louise E. Luke), the position of Jews (Bernard J. Choseed), the role of the children's theater and drama in Soviet education and propaganda (Gene Sosin), and the impact of postwar Bolshevik ideology on literary scholarship (Robert M. Hankin). The book also includes the case studies of a nonconformist, satirist Zoshchenko, and an introduction by E. J. Simmons.

This work gives evidence that literature can be used as a source material in studying Russia and other Communist societies of Bolshevik type. There are, however, limitations to the use of such materials. It seems that the best way the literature of such a totalitarian society can be used as source material is for the study of ideological aspects of Communism, since such a literature tends to portray faithfully the ideology of the ruling faction. It gives a good idea of changes in this ideology, often dramatized when the same work of an author is republished during various phases of the development of Communist society. In such a case, the statements or images in earlier editions which conflict with current ideological thought are deleted and often supplemented by new statements and images which correspond to the new trends. In other words, Soviet literature shows how the Party line changes in respect to various aspects of Soviet policies.

It would be difficult to find in such a literature materials which would faithfully portray the extent of opposition and dissatisfaction, or all the negative reactions to the official Party line. We know, for instance, by reading Soviet literature what has been the official image of Soviet woman in various periods of development of Soviet society. But we would hardly get a good idea of the reaction of the women to their position in the Soviet society in various periods and phases of its development. We know, on the basis of such a literature, what is the image of a Party member with a high degree of Partiinost and ideinost (Party spirit and indoctrination), but it would be very difficult to get any idea about how many Party members deviate from this model and in which direction, though we do find material which indicates the degree of deviation which leads to expulsion and liquidation.

Sometimes the literature of a totalitarian society might be significant by what it omits, not only by what it tells, and, if combined with other studies and other source materials, it can certainly give a very useful contribution to our understanding of the dynamics of communism of Bolshevik type. The material found in such literature might be very helpful in the development of tentative hypotheses which can then be checked by additional studies and other sources. For instance, the following hypothesis is suggested by the material presented in this book: contrary to the general opinion according to which consolidation of Bolshevik power was to bring relaxation in total controls and a trend toward democratization, the strengthening of the Soviet system which followed the victorious war brought about more regimentation, not less, and increasing totalitarian controls. As a result, art and education are now more directed than before the war.

It is hoped that such valuable studies will be continued, and that the new volumes will bring additional material concerning other significant aspects of Soviet society.

WESTERN CONTINENTAL EUROPE

BRINTON, CRANE. The Temper of Western Europe. Pp. ix, 118. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1953. $2.50.

Probably the best recent eulogy of what is left of the grandeur and glory of the Western European civilization, this small volume emphasizes that Western Europe is today, as a whole, richer than ever before in spite of the last war; that there has been a substantial rebuilding of the various countries, an over-all increase in industrial production, national income, and per capita food supplies in calories, and a rise in the birth rate. It notes an abundance of vigor, a willingness of Western Europe to face the facts of the postwar world, and a general desire to build, a step at a time, a European Union; it concludes that Western Europe has power to solve its problems.

Brinton writes in his well-known easy-flowing style and will appeal to those who believe that optimism is the way of salvaging the debris of European backgrounds; they will also enjoy the digs he gives to such "pessimists" as Lewis Mumford, Arthur Koestler, Arnold Toynbee, Oswald Spengler—and particularly to William Shirer (as if he deserved so much attention!). Those more realistically inclined will take Brinton's enthusiasm, and even the facts he quotes, with a grain of salt. Although Brinton likes to use the sociological jargon (referring several times to the "sociology of knowledge"), he does not go far enough sociologically in his interpretation of facts. He talks about Europe being "richer," for instance; if he were to apply the theories of the Veblen school, he would have to point out also that Europe is, in the eyes of the Europeans, actually poorer, since the standards displayed by the United States are those of Hollywood with its Cadillacs and yachts. And if Europe is doing so well, why so much pressure to allow more and more immigrants and refugees into this country, under one guise or another? The United Nations is a pretty good institution, propounds Brinton; but how about the voices of the critics pointing out that it is also a powerful propaganda weapon of the Soviet bloc which, in addition, shelters all kinds of "fifth columnists"?

The weakest link in Brinton's argument is his tendency to ignore the geopolitical relationship of Western Europe to the worldwide situation. The picture he presents is somewhat out of focus since it does not refer to those who show that Europe has been skidding, not only politically, but also culturally. The rise of Soviet Russia and that of Communist China are factors which could have been properly related to Europe's problems, as could such incidental factors as the steady migration of many cultural values from Western Europe to America. And, if Brinton wants to claim that "the peoples of Western Europe have displayed since the war a very great ability to come back," what about the injections given to that ability by such devices as the United Nations Relief and Rehabilitation Administration, the Marshall plan, and others?

Brinton is good, but too eloquent; and his eloquence must be carefully checked against "other" facts. To use Brinton's own words, his main contribution has been "merely skirting the philosophy of history" (p. 99).

HAZARD, PAUL. The European Mind: The Critical Years (1680-1715). Translated by J. Lewis May. Pp. xx, 454. New Haven: Yale University Press, 1953. $5.50.

Paul Hazard wrote with the sparkle and assurance of a French intellectual, a Member of the Academy. His subject was that period in-between, the epoch that got lost. He thought that scholars had concentrated too much on the period of fruition in the eighteenth century, or on the period of beginnings in the Renaissance. Here is the story of the age between youth and maturity; in this "critical period," 1680-1715, the character of the future was being shaped. By 1680 the ideas of 1760-1789 were already current; men were trying to substitute for "a civilization founded on Duty . . . a civilization founded on the idea of rights" (p. xviii).

The opening chapter announces the challenging idea that Europe was being reoriented and revitalized by a world beyond, a world recently revealed to European consciousness. New conceptions were required because of "discoveries that have destroyed many of the data on which ancient philosophy reposed" (p. 8). Knowledge of the Happy Savage and the Wise Egyptian roused curiosity and whetted appetites. Comparisons of customs and philosophies led to discussion and doubt and confusion. When a traveller returned to Europe from overseas and announced an idea, even though he had it in his baggage when he went, the "sea-change" had made it a more imposing thing" (p. 10).

The bulk of the book analyzes intellectual activity within Europe. The reader will find sharply etched digests of the thought of critics such as Pierre Bayle, Arnauld, and Richard Simon, of constructive philosophers such as John Locke, of defenders of the faith like Bossuet, and of the great reconciler Leibniz. Personalities as well as arguments come vividly to life, and one senses the full drama of conflict. It is a study of ideas and men in the vibrant intensity of rethinking the bases of their society. Mathematics and science, religion and politics, and the idea of Happiness on Earth are discussed with freshness and insight. The meagerness of poetry is regretted, and the fad for opera is belittled: "Opera!—What an insult to human intelligence! Please the eye, please the ear, and revolt the reason" (p. 380).

The work covers a surprisingly large scope, though some things, such as economic thought, are neglected. It is description rather than criticism. The interaction of European minds is well treated, but the promise of the first chapter is not fulfilled. The non-European world may indeed have set Europe in gestating turmoil, but as the text sweeps on it all but forgets this wider setting, and the conclusion cannot clinch the thesis. The translation from the French edition of 1935 is delightfully readable.

BUTTINGER, JOSEPH. In the Twilight of Socialism: A History of the Revolutionary Socialists of Austria. Pp. xi, 577. New York: Frederick A. Praeger, 1953. $6.00.

In February 1934, Chancellor Dollfuss undertook to liquidate the Social Democrats, and within a few days this exceedingly well-disciplined, wealthy, and powerful party was completely disorganized. All the seized assets were labeled for the "reconstruction of the state," but the soul and spirit of thousands of party members remained beyond the reach of the Austrian dictator.

For the Socialists the pressing need was to establish some sort of underground organization in order to channel aid to the victims of the new regime, and also to show the rank and file that the party had not perished and was preparing for a future day. A small group of former Socialist editors constituted themselves an advisory committee and named five men to act as a central committee. To get the authority of this committee recognized was a difficult matter, for within a few weeks countless underground organizations had sprung up, and there was always the competition of the Communists, who were busily attempting to enlist the Socialists under their banner. Otto Bauer, the head of the party, had fled to Czechoslovakia and established a Foreign Bureau there. He and his group controlled the vital foreign funds of the party, and they also soon began to turn out the Arbeiterzeitung and the flood of pamphlets which were the life-blood of the Socialist party. Bauer, who realized that the leadership of the underground could not be exercised by exiles, threw his prestige into the balance in favor of the Central Committee.

There was much criticism of the passive policy of the party in the past, and much of it was directed at the Jewish intellectuals who had held prominent positions within it. The times called for action, and to show the new character of the party the underground leaders decided to adopt the name of Revolutionary Socialists. This was not to the liking of Bauer, who felt it was a disavowal of the great tradition and services of the Social Democratic Party. A wave of arrests in January 1935, and the necessity of bringing men from the provinces into the directing group, brought about a reconstitution of the Central Committee, and these new men henceforth controlled the party, albeit with Bauer's approval. Gustav Richter now came to leadership. After Schuschnigg's agreement with Hitler in 1936, these new leaders considered the eventual victory of Hitler to be certain. They were labeled pessimists by the Old Guard leaders, who, true to socialist theory, believed that inevitably the Socialists would triumph.

One of the best sections of the book describes the rapid emergence of Austrian Nazis in the weeks between Schuschnigg's visit to Berchtesgaden in 1938 and Hitler's triumphant entry into Vienna. While the Austrian police had constantly harassed the underground, they were as nothing to the Gestapo who inherited complete files on most of the important Socialist leaders. Some of these escaped, thanks to many forged Czech passports made available by Czech Socialists.

The book is not easy reading. It is filled with excessive detail and is not well organized. The author constantly gets ahead of himself, using a sort of flash-back technique, and it is difficult to keep chronology straight. Yet he graphically portrays the difficulty of establishing an underground organization and how little can actually be accomplished by it. The dilemma remains that the movement has to be made known to the masses, while being kept secret from the police. The book also gives considerable information on the underground labor movement which was related to but separate from the party organization. The account rings true, although no sources are listed. It is clear that much of the book is autobiographical, and internal evidence indicates that the author, Joseph Buttinger, is the Gustav Richter who headed the underground organization from 1935 on.

FRISCHAUER, WILLI. Himmler: The Evil Genius of the Third Reich. Pp. 270. Boston: Beacon Press, 1953. $3.75.

It is remarkable that the political police, one of the key institutions of totalitarian states, has received relatively little attention from political scientists and sociologists—perhaps because it does not quite fit into the traditional conceptual pattern of the state. The experience of Nazi Germany and Soviet Russia shows that terror, extermination camps, and slave labor are not an incidental aspect of modern totalitarianism, but constitute its very core. For the purpose of such terror and brutality is not so much to destroy real or alleged enemies of the totalitarian regime, but to provide for the whole population a permanent demonstration of total domination, which utterly annihilates the human personality in its moral, legal, and political roots.

Mr. Frischauer's biography of Heinrich Himmler will be read with considerable interest by all students of Nazi Germany in particular and of modern totalitarianism in general. The author's forte lies in the skill, color, and verve with which he portrays his subject rather than in penetrating analysis. Thus, Mr. Frischauer rightly points out in the beginning that Himmler was born and brought up in the "calm and cultured atmosphere" (p. 16) of the home of a respected secondary school teacher in Bavaria, yet he fails to explain satisfactorily how a product of his environment could later turn into the most sadistic monster of modern times, perhaps of all time. As one of the early Nazis, Himmler's career in the Nazi Party was rapid from the start, and the success of distorted personalities like himself should have indicated to the Germans as well as to foreign nations what the Nazi movement was up to.

Yet the brutalities committed by the Nazis at home in the years 1933–1939 were relatively small compared with what was to come during World War II, when Germany had most of continental Europe under her control. It is remarkable how quickly the Germans are forgetting that they slaughtered over six million Jews during World War II, not to speak of millions of Russians, Poles, Czechs, Frenchmen, Norwegians, and others. Chapters XIII and XIV of Himmler deal with the organized mass murder of the Germans during World War II, while chapter XV analyzes "Thanatology—the Science of Killing" (pp. 175–187). Being devotees of science, the Germans developed murder as a complete science, and these three chapters alone make the work a valuable record.

Though not interested primarily in systematic analysis, Mr. Frischauer has spared no effort to obtain his material, not only having recourse to the printed documents and source materials, but also obtaining firsthand information from Himmler's widow, his brother, and members of his entourage who were lucky enough to survive their boss. A number of illustrations enrich the value of the book.

GOERLITZ, WALTER. History of the German General Staff, 1657–1945. Translated by Brian Battershaw. Preface by Walter Millis. Pp. xviii, xvi, 508. New York: Frederick A. Praeger, 1953. $7.50.

It is unfortunate that this volume, which has substantial merit, should bear the title, History of the German General Staff. In fact it is concerned more with military personalities and high policies than with institutions. The German General Staff and General Staff Corps embraced the group of officers carefully selected for their ability and estimated suitability for staff positions. The preparatory training, the War Academy course, and the probationary period, normally composed a five-year program. Those who survived the repeated screenings were posted to the General Staff Corps, which was commanded by the Chief of the General Staff. The successful candidates were assigned to staff positions with the field units and to the General Staff of the Army High Command. Products of a uniform system of training and moulded in a great tradition, these officers were the elite of the German Army. They manned not only the General Staff of the High Command, but they were the principal advisers and staff officers to the field commanders. The historical origins and evolution of this unique military institution are worthy of detailed treatment.

However, less than a third of Goerlitz's work is devoted to the history of the General Staff down to 1914. Here the story is told in brief biographical sketches—Scharnhorst, Gneisenau, Moltke, Waldersee, Schlieffen, and the younger Moltke. The remaining two-thirds of the volume deals with the period since 1918. Here the scope is further broadened and the theme of the General Staff becomes incidental to the narrative of the political role of the Reichswehr and Army High Command during the Weimar and Nazi periods. The opposition role of the Army leaders under Hitler, culminating in the revolt of July 20, is emphasized, perhaps overemphasized. This was not a General Staff plot, but the number of General Staff officers involved was considerable, and the subsequent executions and dismissals took a heavy toll. The last Chief of the General Staff was a General of Infantry, Hans Krebs, whose principal qualification for the post once held by Scharnhorst, Moltke, and Schlieffen was his unshakeable belief in the military genius of Hitler.

The tone of Goerlitz's study is moderate and objective, anti-Nazi and pro-army. The translation is adequate although the book has suffered some from abridgment. Unfortunately the bibliography and organization charts were omitted from the English edition.

LATTRE DE TASSIGNY, JEAN DE. The History of the French First Army. Translated by Malcolm Barnes. Pp. 532. London: George Allen & Unwin (distributed in the U. S. by The Macmillan Company), 1953. $9.50.

This is the story of the landing of the French First Army, the bulk of French forces, in Provence in the summer of 1944, the liberation of Marseilles and Toulon, the pursuit of the Germans up the Rhône and their eventual capitulation in the Austrian Alps. But it is much more than a recitation of battles and an analysis of strategy and tactics; for it is also the warmly human autobiography of a man, admittedly one of the greatest of French marshals, as well as the story of the rendezvous of the true French spirit with France.

It can be said of few books, as it can of this, that it is at one and the same time a textbook for students of military science and a fascinating story for the general reader. For the person who has himself traveled in southern France or who knows the Valley of the Rhône and Alsace, the book is almost a must. This reviewer, himself no military technician, soon found that the task of reading what appeared to be a military history was transformed into a pleasant duty.

The reader soon learns that the history of this army and its battles is also the story of the common soldier and his leaders, of the fusion of the Free French with the Resistance, and of the restoration of France to a leading position in the free world. One is also made aware that Allied generals had many differences of opinion as to the best policy or strategy to follow, and that personal rivalries and the ever-present desire for prestige and power often influence military decisions. The position of the French was throughout not an easy one, as shown in North Africa when they were forced to adopt the "industrial" plan used by the American Army, or, much later, at the surrender celebration in Berlin when all the toastmakers seemed to forget the part played by France.

When one is through, it is clear why this book is both a treatise on military strategy and a fascinating story. The author himself combined military expertness with dynamic and dramatic leadership qualities. The reader will agree that his recent death was a tragedy for troubled France.

PICKLES, DOROTHY. French Politics: The First Years of the Fourth Republic. Pp. xii, 302. New York: Royal Institute of International Affairs, 1953. $5.00.

For France, constitutional reform is an old story. Many persons have been wondering what progress toward stable parliamentary government the French have been making since liberation. The purpose of the present volume is to help with the answer to this question.

Miss Pickles is a competent observer of French politics. Her writing is analytical, scholarly of statement, and satisfying to the serious reader. It is not easy reading because the author takes for granted a considerable knowledge of French political life.

The first section of the book is a review of the decline of the resistance movement, the evolution of the Socialist-Communist unity, the drafting of the new (1946) constitution, and the study of economic problems that culminated in the Monnet Plan. To have read such a book as Gordon Wright's The Reshaping of French Democracy is to have a basis for reading Miss Pickles's condensed introduction.

Then follows the story of the Gaullist Right in bitter contest with the disruptive Communist Left and of the attempt of the democratic center groups to carry on as a Third Force. The author shows the dilemmas of the Socialists with their anticlerical commitment on the one hand and their desire to work with the Catholic MRP (Mouvement Républicain Populaire) on the other; of the MRP which was torn between the desire for Socialist help and for Catholic trade union support simultaneously; and of the Radicals who were anticlerical enough to be allies of the Marxists but anticommunistic enough to be economic liberals. Little wonder the Third Force failed! As for inflation, on what grounds could it be controlled? The Monnet, the Mayer, and the Reynaud Plans all failed to stabilize the economy. Parties joined for mutual security but were divided on basic economic and social issues. Electoral reform was attempted, but the second parliament began its term in 1951 with worse problems than the first parliament had faced five years earlier. The very quantity of legislative work was in itself an unsolved problem.

The account of France in her external relationships is a little more encouraging. The change from the empire to the French Union was in line with gradual recognition of dependent peoples elsewhere. The constitutional statements giving equal rights to all citizens of the Union in Europe, Africa, and overseas are brave, but somewhat empty.

As to France in Europe, Miss Pickles thinks that while there is much interest in the Schuman Plan for a coal and steel community and in the Pleven Plan for a European army, the main French desire is to build European strength in order to withstand involvement in the Atlantic Community. And while European unity will bring strength to France, her main help will have to come from within herself—a matter difficult to outline in advance so long as prewar leadership combines with old political and legislative methods to make politics under the Fourth Republic look strangely like those of the Third. A little more revolution in the direction of efficiency irrespective of general principles seems to be the author's recipe for French parliamentary life.

FEI, HSIAO-TUNG. China's Gentry: Essays in Rural-Urban Relations. Revised and edited by Margaret Park Redfield, with six life-histories of Chinese gentry families collected by Yung-Teh Chow, and an introduction by Robert Redfield. Pp. v, 288. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1953. $5.75.

Hsiao-Tung Fei is one of the less well appreciated losses of the Communist victory in China. Fei stood out as one of the best trained and most brilliant social scientists produced by co-operation between China and the West. His studies had many faults, but they stood out well above the ruck of literature on Chinese social conditions. They frequently lacked system and precision, but without exception they focused on problems that are strategic for understanding Chinese social structure and strategic for the development of general social analysis. One did not count on Fei as a direct contributor to general theory, but the work that was to be expected from him and that he had already produced would furnish valuable materials for the comparative analyses on which the more general developments would have to rest.

Since the Communist victory he has presumably been brain-washed, for there issued, reputedly from him, a statement of all his previous errors. The statement read like all such statements betraying the robot-like qualities of those who extract such statements and not a hint of what the mind of the previous Fei was like. In any case, for the time at least, modern social science has little to expect from Fei whose serious critical scientific writing has been summarily cut off in its most productive years.

Margaret Redfield has salvaged Fei's last output before that tragedy. He had at that time launched a general study of the Chinese gentry and in connection with that (since the gentry characteristically were town dwellers) a study of one of the most neglected areas in modern Sinology, the relation between towns and villages in China. At the time he had not gotten very far with this work. He had gotten far enough to produce a series of articles intended for lay Chinese consumption.

Under ordinary circumstances it would have been a mistake to translate and publish these as the work of a social scientist, for they are anecdotal, impressionistic, and unsystematic rather than careful, precise, and analytical. But as both of the Redfields point out, a special case can be made for their translation and publication. Fei was much interested in the progress and development of his country. He hoped to contribute to this by his findings as well as to find out more. He regarded a deeper understanding of the role of the gentry and the relations between towns and villages as crucial for this development.

Perhaps, as the Redfields point out, the greatest lesson we have to learn from this volume is the manner in which Fei thought these questions would have to be presented to a literate Chinese audience if they were to make any impression. We see in each of these essays, for example, a tracing of an authentic pedigree for the idea presented through the Chinese classical texts. Fei was not and is not a specialist in the use of these texts. The notes added to this volume show the Redfields' awareness of this problem. Many specialists on the texts would undoubtedly quarrel with Fei's uses and interpretations of some of this material, but that is really beside the point. The point here is that Fei felt, rightly or wrongly, that only by means of the respectable Chinese method of statement by fable and by historical anecdote rather than by straightforward analysis could the attention and respect of his audience be caught.

On the subjects of the essays themselves, the social scientist will have to look for the bits of insight and analysis tucked here and there amidst the illustrative material with the "proper pedigree." There is quite a bit of it, and it foreshadowed a book of some importance that we are not now likely to see. Further aid in these respects may come from the use of the life history material presented at the end. Here the non-specialist should proceed with special care. The life histories are selected presumably for their typification of strategic roles. It is not always easy in such cases to separate the idiosyncratic from the general. Like literary sources they are to be used with caution, but used with caution they are valuable.

The book is well worth reading, but it is sad reading, for in it we can see what is lost.

LAMBTON, ANN K. S. Landlord and Peasant in Persia. Pp. xxxi, 459. New York: Oxford University Press, 1953. $9.00.

One of the fundamental maladjustments and problems of contemporary Iran is that of land tenure and ownership. It directly affects politics, economics, and general social life. Land reform is currently much discussed, but little has been accomplished aside from the present Shah's efforts to distribute the rural holdings inherited from his father among his peasant tenants. His Majesty frankly admits that his program is aimed at pressure upon other large landlords to follow his example, and for this reason it is resented and resisted by many.

As the Royal Commission appointed to implement this program has discovered, reform of the pattern of land ownership and cultivation in Iran is not as simple as it may at first appear. Peculiar circumstances of physical and social environment condition any sound and fruitful approach to this problem. It is as a contribution to this fundamental problem that Miss Lambton's book—one of the best on Iran to appear in English in many years—is significant.

The study is not exhaustive nor completely comprehensive, either in description or analysis. For example, the author contents herself with description of only those parts of the country with which she is personally familiar; these, however, are considerable and varied. Moreover, she can scarcely be expected to treat the economics of the subject because of the paucity of material, especially statistics; it is enough, for the present, to have these widely observed facts discussed in their social and political context. Although only meant as an introduction to the subject, this study is so soundly conceived and executed that future scholars and practitioners—Persian and Western—will stand in her debt, and do well to emulate her scholarship and care.

Part I of the study (over 40 per cent of the whole) is devoted to the history of the subject, beginning with the Arab conquest of Iran in the seventh century. Until the arrival of the Mongols and their break with tradition, most of the facts are inferred from sources dealing with the state revenue system. Subsequent Safavid absolutism gave way to eighteenth century chaos, only to be followed by Qajar "decay, maladministration, oppression, and insecurity." The latter part of the period showed "a growing discontent and demand for reform," issuing in the Constitutional movement and later the Reza Shah social and legal reforms.

Part II is devoted to the description and discussion of such subjects as the Civil Code, irrigation, religious endowments, crown lands, large and small proprietors, tribal practices, the share-cropper, agricultural methods, and standards of living. Several relevant appendixes, a glossary of Persian terms, an excellent bibliography, and a reasonably adequate index add to the value of the book, which is a mine of well-organized information and which is bound to be an indispensable reference work for any student of, or participant in, modern Persian affairs.

REISCHAUER, EDWIN O., et al. Japan and America Today. Pp. ix, 166. Stanford: Stanford University Press, 1953. $3.00.

Between January 17 and 20, 1953, a Japanese-American Conference was held by the Institute of Pacific Relations in Honolulu. This was much more than a routine conference because it was the first time since the end of the war that nonofficial Japanese and Americans were able to confront each other in direct and frank discussion of problems at issue in the relations of the two countries. It was felt, and quite correctly, by the sponsors of the meeting that a nonofficial gathering would lay problems on the line much more frankly than would be possible in an official atmosphere, with its complex etiquette of face, presentation, and protocol.

The principal weakness of the conference, as far as its authority and representativeness are concerned, was the absence of an outstanding leftist figure. This does not mean that the leftist position was not fairly presented, and even ably argued—for it was—but rather that one is left with a more optimistic feeling of agreement over what Dr. Reischauer, in his brilliant opening article, has identified as “common objectives” than is perhaps warranted by the present atmosphere of intellectual circles in Japan. While all Japanese intellectuals will perhaps agree on such objectives as “national security,” “world peace,” “orderly international relations,” and an “independent Japan,” it is much less likely that they will agree that the United States should “continue its cooperation with Japan and other nations of the free world” and “achieve a position of strength which will enable free nations to resist effectively direct and indirect aggression” (p. 136, “Basic Aims of the Two Countries”). Even if these words were perchance acceptable to most Japanese intellectuals, the intended meaning would be open to the same ambiguities as words like “democracy” in pro-Soviet circles.

But if there is somewhat more doubt about the extent of agreement in basic objectives than the participants would like to acknowledge, they are all agreed in identifying the main problems of postwar Japan and the main problems at issue between Japan and the United States: the presence of American bases and troops in Japan, the China market, American economic aid, overpopulation, shortage of raw materials. The conference materials presented in this volume illuminate many aspects of these problems and in this way serve to narrow somewhat the gap between the American and the Japanese point of view.

And yet if one compares the article by Shogo Yamaguchi, the only extended Japanese paper incorporated in the volume, with observations by the Americans, it is evident that there is a considerable difference in emphasis and perception of the present situation. While the State Department summary of Japanese-American relations speaks of Japan as having a “high rate of capital formation” (p. 71), Yamaguchi speaks of her “low domestic capital accumulation” (p. 115). Again, while

Cohen, in criticizing the “overestimation” of the importance of the China trade to Japan, says that “Even in 1935 Japan obtained only 10.8 percent of its imports from what is now Red China, which absorbed only 10.7 percent of Japanese exports” (p. 128), Yamaguchi’s tables for the same year yield figures of 23 and 14 per cent respectively (pp. 109–110).

As in any symposium, there is a good deal of unevenness in the materials. Reischauer’s coolheaded analysis of potential sources of conflict between Japan and America—an essay which reveals the historian at his best—should be read by all serious people, not only by specialists. Cohen’s analysis of Japan’s economic position is a straightforward exposition of the technical aspects of the problem, without reference to the political and psychological issues that seem inextricably associated with it in Japan. But this is more than made up for by the principal Japanese contribution, which is polemical and tendentious and illustrates in its own body the extensive penetration of Marxism in the thinking even of nonleftist Japanese intellectuals, a subject which is touched on briefly in the summary of the discussion (p. 138). It is unfortunate that the translation fails to do full justice to Yamaguchi’s argument, although it does succeed in conveying the tone and temper of much of current Japanese thinking. Perhaps the most interesting section of the book is the “Summary of the Discussion,” in which the sense of the conference is conveyed without specific attribution of views and statements to individual participants.

SCALAPINO, ROBERT A. Democracy and the Party Movement in Prewar Japan: The Failure of the First Attempt. Pp. xii, 471. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1953. $6.50.

With the end of the Second World War a new generation of scholars brought fresh interests and approaches to the field of Far Eastern studies. Professor Scalapino of the University of California at Berkeley is one of them, and his new book offers impressive testimony to the high achievements of which the best among them are capable.

The book focuses primarily upon the reasons for which Japan failed during the years since the Restoration of 1868 to develop a “democratic, liberal and responsible” system of government. In so doing it also casts a great deal of light upon the more positive problem of why it was that “oligarchic, illiberal and semi-totalitarian” political institutions have prevailed without really serious or sustained challenge. Mr. Scalapino’s searching scrutiny of these questions leads him from an excellent analysis of the impact of Tokugawa culture and institutions on the political attitudes and practices of modern Japan to an equally keen exposition of the brief and dismal record of left-wing parties and the concomitant rise to power of the military oligarchy in the two decades immediately preceding Pearl Harbor.

Between these terminal points he devotes considerable space to a most perceptive history of the organization, finance, development, and practice of the major parties; an examination of their social, economic, and intellectual affiliations, their programs and tactics; and finally a stimulating exposition of the very important consequences for the parties of the unusual patterns of development which have characterized Japanese capitalism. His findings are based almost exclusively on the best and most recent research by Japanese scholars and are impressively documented.

The work’s quality resides as much, however, in matters of approach, style, and methodology as in those of substance. The author seldom loses sight of the larger significance of his subject. Fundamentally he is concerned with the problems presented by attempts to establish democratic institutions in “late-developing” nations. The Japanese pattern contains much of consequence to an understanding of contemporary developments in similar cultures throughout Asia and the world. The book is topical and problem-oriented throughout. Mr. Scalapino’s gift for illuminating political institutions and developments in terms of their wide array of social, economic, and intellectual antecedents cannot help commanding admiration. The work should be read with pleasure and great profit by those of all disciplines interested in the problems of contemporary Asia.

GALBRAITH, W. O. Colombia: A General Survey. Pp. vii, 140. New York: Royal Institute of International Affairs, 1953. $2.50.

Written primarily for foreigners rather than for Latin Americans, this publication is an exceedingly useful handbook on Colombia. The author has drawn heavily on the Currie Report issued by the International Bank in 1950.

Colombia’s population of 11,259,739 represents an increase of 186 per cent since 1900, birth and death rates being about the same as Mexico’s and double those of the United States. Although urbanization has gone on at an increasing rate, three-fourths of the population is still employed in agriculture, pastoral and forestal industries, hunting, and fishing. The unmixed aborigines have virtually disappeared, constituting today only 1.6 per cent of the total population. Estimates of the other racial groups are: Mestizos, 46 per cent; Negroes, 4.4 per cent; Mulattoes, 22 per cent; and Whites, 26 per cent. Colombia has no color bar, and while miscegenation is producing a tri-ethnic type, this process has been retarded because of geographical barriers.

Attention is given to taxation, government expenditures, the public debt, banking, and the various types of transportation; special consideration is given to farming. The principal cash crop, coffee, and other crops are grown on small farms. Farmers are handicapped by inadequate credit, transportation difficulties, lack of storage and packing facilities, lack of information about markets and prices, and uneconomical exploitation of resources. The quality of the agricultural worker himself is not high, owing to the shortage of educational facilities, prevailing living conditions, and low health standards. Attempts have been made by the government since 1940 to encourage agriculture, but the Colombian peasant, unlike the small farmer in some Latin American countries, tends to abandon the land whenever he has a chance to shift to an urban activity. Industrialization, almost nonexistent in Colombia prior to 1930, has increased rapidly since that time.

The growth and modernization of the educational system were retarded by policies followed from 1888 to 1936; consequently the country's whole educational program needs overhauling and new life. Social legislation, enacted on a large scale since 1934, may prove too complicated for Colombia to support.

The political history of Colombia during the past century and a half has been a struggle between Conservatives, who have favored centralism and clericalism, and Liberals, supporters of decentralization and anticlericalism. The Liberal group has been weakened in recent years by a split between leftists and moderates.

Galbraith concludes: "The political future is difficult to foretell. The last few years have seen the bankruptcy of Liberalism in Colombia, and a return to a system of Government which more closely conforms to that of so many Latin American countries today, where legislation alone has signally failed to bring about the exercise of democratic principles. The vast majority of the voters are either illiterate or totally uneducated, and the social system itself is unstable; the masses are subjected to emotional, impractical, and self-interested propaganda, and now that they have tasted blood, it is going to be a hard task for any Government to correct and control the political errors and exaggerations of the last thirty years." Nevertheless, this author optimistically believes that "the task will be faced and that the many other problems . . . will be solved" in the next 50 years or so.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

Dear Sir:

In the July 1953 issue of THE ANNALS, there appears an error which causes me concern. Reviewing Arthur Koestler's new book, "Arrow in the Blue . . .," just below the middle of the first column on page 217, Mr. Eliasberg says, "Why did . . . career diplomats such as Alger Hiss, Guy Burgess, and Donald MacLean, fall for this type of propaganda?" Alger Hiss was not a career diplomat. He was an official of the Department of State, never a member of the career Foreign Service. To date, no American career Foreign Service Officer has been found guilty of disloyalty by any impartial body.

In these days of smear-by-association, and when there is so much uninformed criticism of the Department of State and its personnel, it is particularly disturbing to find such confusion of terms in so serious and scholarly a journal.

Dear Sir:

In my review in the July issue of THE ANNALS, of Arthur Koestler's Arrow in the Blue, An Autobiography, I had no intention of casting any slur on the Foreign Service. This said, there is, on the other hand, no doubt that Alger Hiss was used by the State Department for highly important assignments.

My review is, as far as the name of Hiss goes, a literal quotation from page 263 of Koestler's book: "The astonishing conversions of cool-headed State Department careerists like Alger Hiss. . . ." I saw no reason, at the time of writing my review, to check on Koestler's source, and I want to stress again that, in my opinion, the important psycho-dynamic factor has been brought out masterfully by Koestler.

The emphasis in my review and in Koestler's book was on a general understanding of the psychology of bright young men, who, in the early thirties, were falling for totalitarian propaganda.

W. ELIASBERG

New York City

Dear Sir:

Professor Brady's review of The Foreign Policy of the British Labour Government, 1945-1951 (ANNALS, July 1953) presents a serious misinterpretation of the book. This inexplicable misunderstanding provides the basis for a general condemnation of the author's reactionary soul (an irrelevant and untrue criticism) and for specific criticisms which are either wrong or singularly questionable.

The reviewer sees the book, not, as I designed it, as an essay on contemporary history, but as a pro-Churchillian tract with a surly dirge for imperial positions lost and jubilee for those kept under the lion's paw. This distortion is supported by a quotation taken out of the context of page 2 of my book. The quotation merely noted the flexibility and moderation of earlier British foreign policy and suggests nothing at all about my present views on Britain and the Empire.

The burden of Professor Brady's attack is reserved for one of my conclusions, that the question of a Socialist foreign policy arose only to become absurd. This conclusion emerges from pages of argument, supported by considerable documentation. The author's silence about this nicely suggests that I am an intemperate antisocialist.

Where the author criticizes something I actually wrote, he is either misleading or, at best, questionable. For example, he argues that abandoning the nationalization of German heavy industry, which he calls "a concession to the Churchill point of view," ruined the American decartelization program. But this is disingenuous. After late 1946 the United States called the tune in Germany and the American decartelization program was ruined by another American policy. Where I observe that the great wrong of British imperialism was not economic exploitation but the creation of an irresponsible temper among the victims of imperialism, Professor Brady says that I misread the facts of the separatist movements of the last 200 years. Surely, this is comparing the incomparable. The American colonists had a substantial share of self-government. I do not see the practical basis for a comparison of their movement with the struggle of the agrarian and tribal society of the Kikuyu. Did Professor Brady never listen to the irresponsible talk of Congress Indians about the Muslims, or Jews or Arabs about each other, in the days before an independent India and Israel? A reading of the Egyptian press, though wearing, would also be broadening. How would he answer John Morley's Glasgow speech (November 6, 1896), "You cannot create in Irishmen the sense of political responsibility unless you give them what is the correlative of responsibility—power"?

Finally, the reviewer complains about the book's undercurrent of innuendo against every policy "which even smacks of liberalism, let alone 'Socialism.'" This charge surprises me most. Professor Brady apparently resents the unwillingness of a historian to become the public relations man for the world's nationalist and liberation movements. At any rate, he should particularize, and, I hope, scrupulously.

How Bureaucracies Develop and Function

By ARNOLD BRECHT

IS it necessary to define bureaucracy? Everybody seems to know what the term implies. "Bureaucracy is a state of affairs where too much power is in the hands of appointed employees." This is twice ambiguous, however, because power has several meanings, and what type or amount of it is "too much"? Closer analysis will spare us a great deal of confusion.

Power may designate the constitutional or legal right to give or to enforce orders, as when the Constitution says, "The Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes." For this sort of power I shall use the symbol P hereafter. Or power may mean the actual power to get things done or to prevent their being done. This will be designated by the symbol II, the Greek equivalent of P.

"P-powers" and "II-powers" may coincide, or overlap, or be entirely separate. The Supreme Soviet of the USSR has the P-power to pass laws, but not the II-power to determine what laws will be passed; that power lies entirely with the party leadership. The same situation existed with Hitler's one-party Reichstag in Germany. The United States Congress had the P-power, together with the legislatures of three-fourths of the states, to forbid the manufacture and sale of alcoholic beverages, but not the II-power to carry the prohibition through. The people in a democracy have the P-power to elect their representatives, but bosses may have the II-power to "deliver the vote." Likewise, party juntas, pressure groups, or the press may, or may not, have the II-power to make Congress use its P-powers in some specific manner.

DEFINITIONS OF BUREAUCRACY

Applying these distinctions, we find that appointed employees may wield either P-powers or II-powers, or both, and that their powers may extend either to the entire sphere of public business or only to sections of it. It follows that we must distinguish at least four possible definitions, or types, of bureaucracy, namely:

B-1, where appointed employees hold all the P-powers of government;

B-2, where they hold some P-powers, though not all;

B-3, where they wield II-powers over the entire sphere of government;

B-4, where they do so only over some sections of governmental activities.

In each of these four social patterns we may speak of "government by officials," and therefore of a bureaucracy, irrespective of the good or bad use made by the officials of their powers. We may, however, use the term bureaucracy also in a more limited sense, namely:

B-5 to B-8, only in such cases of the types B-1 to B-4 where the powers are exercised "improperly."

Yet what is an "improper" use? Are officials acting improperly (a) only when in excess of legal powers; or (b) also when, though staying within these powers, they act in conflict with the general welfare; or (c) even when their action is both legitimate and objectively sound, if it antagonizes the momentary desires of the people, or of some people, or of the people's representatives? Different answers are possible in different situations.

In view of the elusive vagueness of the criterion "improper" it is advisable to start out from the definitions B-1 to B-4. They are not only clearer; they are also realistic and in line with related concepts. For wherever human beings have power, they may abuse it. A dictatorship or an aristocracy remains one even when its powers are used benevolently in the interest of the people. Likewise, we can logically say, a government by appointed officials remains a bureaucracy even when it operates benevolently.

Actually, wherever we live in the modern world, whether under the most totalitarian kind of despotism or in the most liberal of democracies, we are being governed to a considerable, though varied, extent by appointed officials—officials who exercise both P- and Π-powers over us. Everywhere, then, we live under a bureaucracy of some kind. This we must realize at the outset.

P-BUREAUCRACIES

Bureaucracies of the B-1 type are obsolete today, it is true, at least in the public sphere. They were rare phenomena even in the past (see below). If one considers the cardinals of the Roman Catholic Church as appointed officials—since they are not elected by the people but appointed by the Pontiff—then it might be said that the hierarchy of the Catholic Church still today approximates the B-1 type of a bureaucracy, because the college of the appointed cardinals has the official P-power within the church not only to make governmental decisions but also to select the Pope, who in turn selects them. This rather extraneous example we may disregard here.

The B-2 type of bureaucracy, on the other hand, is found everywhere, because everywhere, at least in all major countries, appointed officials are granted extensive P-powers. Sometimes they are authorized to use their powers independently, as in law courts, or in administrative courts, or in quasi-independent boards and commissions. A voluminous body of law, frequently (though rather incorrectly) called "administrative law,"¹ originates in the P-powers of appointed employees. Sometimes their lawmaking P-powers extend even to regular legislation, as they did for example in the Federal Council (Reichsrat) of the German Empire and of the Weimar Republic, where as a rule appointed civil servants represented the constituent states and, while bound by instructions, were permitted to act according to their own judgment in the absence of instructions.

But we need not refer to such particular cases only. Any delegation, by the legislature or by the chief executive, of P-powers to department heads, and through them or directly to their deputies, division chiefs, bureau chiefs, or field services, provides appointed employees with P-powers which are often of considerable importance. On the basis of P-powers delegated to them directors of internal revenue and their employees make decisions on tax returns, policemen interfere with disorderly conduct, consular officers grant or deny immigration visas—and so in almost every branch of public administration. While the employees are not independent in the use of these powers, but subject to instructions and to corrections after appeal, there is generally a wide margin of power left to their individual judgment and discretion. Appeals affect only a small minority of decisions and rarely question the fact that the subordinate official had the P-power to make the primary decision.

As it is considered one of the first virtues of a good administrator that he makes wide use of delegation of P-powers in order that he himself may be able to concentrate on the most important problems, well-administered countries offer at least as good illustrations of bureaucracies of the B-2 type as do countries with political leaders who jealously try to keep all decisions in their own hands.

II-BUREAUCRACIES

Just as in the case of P-powers, there is nothing necessarily wrong with the wielding of Π-powers by appointed employees. It is, to a considerable degree, their very function to exercise such powers. Employees are hired for the purpose of influencing both the making and the execution of laws by their expert knowledge and practical experience, won in or out of office. Their knowledge, their good judgment, prudence, and poise, are intentionally placed at the service of the government. When in the exercise of their official functions they try to make knowledge prevail over ignorance, the expert over the amateur, prudence over indiscretion, poise over imbalance, they are basically within their legitimate rights and may use them so as to deserve praise rather than blame. If the appointed employees failed to exercise such influence, a great deal of every country's legislation and an even bigger slice of its administration would only be the worse for it.

And yet, Π-powers contribute to the improper bureaucratic character of governments no less than do P-powers. More than a hundred years ago a critic of the British colonial administration wrote a classical description of how this happens. He charged that what the colonies far away received with awe as the decisions of the mother country on their complaints actually were decisions made by an anonymous official, satirically called Mr. Mothercountry. Although this story is well known to students of government because of Lowell's reference to it in his Government of England, I may be permitted to point out some details because they are still valid today as a competent analysis of thousands of similar situations. Mr. Mothercountry, so Charles Butler wrote in 1840, is familiar with every detail of his business and handles with unfaltering hands the piles of papers at which his superiors quail. He knows the policy which previous actions render necessary, but he never appears to dictate. A new Secretary . . . intends to be independent, but something turns up that obliges him to consult Mr. Mothercountry. He is pleased with the ready and unobtrusive advice which takes a great deal of trouble off his hands. If things go well, his confidence in Mr. Mothercountry rises. If badly, that official alone can get him out of the colonial or parliamentary scrape; and the more independent he is the more scrapes he falls into.²

Every word in this description is significant and to the point. It is a legitimate right, even a duty, of the employee that is exercised when he uses his Π-power as adviser; it is exercised unobtrusively and without the will to dictate; it may be exercised well in most cases. And still, we have here a situation where the Π-power of an official has grown to such proportions that the stage of bureaucracy as an objectionable form of government is reached.

Naturally, Π-powers are not always used legitimately and in good faith for the general welfare. They are at times abused for selfish purposes, as when the officials of Russia's Peter the Great, or of Prussia's Frederick the Great, blocked the execution of laws that were in conflict with the interests of the class from which they hailed, or when modern civil servants have tried to influence the contents of civil service acts, the regulation of salaries, and the like in their own favor.³ Yet these are exceptions rather than the rule. The situation most typical for modern democracies is one where the officials act in good faith and within the powers that they legitimately hold.

HISTORICAL EXTREMES

The most familiar illustrations of strong bureaucracies are ancient Egypt, the later stages of the Roman Empire, and China. It was characteristic of all three that, at least outside of the respective capitals, the P-powers of appointed officials came to approximate B-1 proportions, that is, to encompass almost the entire governmental power within their administrative districts; and, secondly, that the use of their powers was not subject to any outside check based on freedom of speech, on a free press, on independent courts, or on parliamentary control. The only check was that exercised from the inside by superiors, or as we should say "through channels." The limited human "span of control" made it impossible for the despotic rulers themselves, even when they had the best of will, personally to control the use of the P-powers they had delegated to their field officials, such as praefecti, vicarii, rectores, and curiales in the Roman Empire. Sometimes they sent a second bureaucracy of secret agents to supervise the regular officials and to inform the emperor of their misdeeds, and a third one to supervise the second. When local officials tried to quit, because of the squeeze in which they found themselves between popular discontent and pressure from above, they were forced to stay, and their offices were even made hereditary. It has been said that people within the Roman Empire were better off under bad and selfish rulers who thought only of their personal pleasures than under well-intentioned emperors with a passion for good administration, because it was the latter who extended and intensified the centralized public administration to fantastic proportions according to uniform patterns imposed on the most divergent sections of the Empire.

H. Litchfield and associates, Governing Postwar Germany (Ithaca, N. Y., 1953), p. 278 (pressure in favor of a conservative civil service act).

Slave bureaucracies

Less well known, but no less extreme, is the historical illustration offered by slave bureaucracies which in the early Middle Ages arose in the southwestern parts of Asia under the Abbasides, the Samanids and the Ayubites (Saladin), in Egypt under the Mamelukes, and later in Turkey under the Ottoman Empire. Veritable slaves held great bureaucratic powers under all these regimes. The Samanids were finally overthrown by one of their slave administrators (about A.D. 1000), who took over, and whose successors, or imitators, later ruled as "slave kings" from Delhi in the thirteenth century, establishing a bureaucracy of the B-1 type. The Mamelukes, too, though originally slave administrators of the Ayubites—their very name being derived from a word meaning property—became actual rulers of Egypt under a nominal, far-away caliph. Hence they also can be said to have established a full-fledged B-1 bureaucracy. The governing positions were passed on, not from father to son but from slave to slave.⁴ Closer to our time is the slave bureaucracy of the Ottoman Empire, as it was run from about A.D. 1400 to 1800 by the Osmanlis, whose ancestors had been nomads invading from the Asian steppes. The Osmanli padishahs, as Toynbee aptly puts it in his graphic description of the regime, "maintained their empire by training slaves as human auxiliaries to assist them in keeping order among their 'human cattle.'"⁵

The Prusso-German bureaucracy

The Prusso-German bureaucracy, which arose after the end of the feudal age to become hardly less proverbial than that of the Roman Empire, had a very different character. Although the P-powers of a Prussian Landrat (county executive), Regierungspräsident (district president), or Oberpräsident (provincial president) were likewise very strong, the use of these powers was not left unchecked from the outside, as it had been in the Roman Empire and in the slave bureaucracies. It was progressively subjected to public criticism by the free use of speech and of the press, to the review of the legitimacy of decisions by regular or administrative courts, and finally to parliamentary criticism as well. These outside controls facilitated a proper control from the inside, because the Prussian king did not have to rely only on complaints forwarded to him through official channels. But there was no guarantee that the king would respond to popular demands. The P-powers of the officials were thus enhanced by the authoritarian character of the regime. In addition to their P-powers, the Prusso-German officials wielded also very substantial II-powers, as illustrated by the influence the Geheimrat Friedrich August von Holstein, of the German Foreign Office around 1900, exercised in the rejection of British feelers in favor of an understanding. But this was, as the story of Mr. Mothercountry shows, in principle no peculiarity of the German bureaucracy.

Soviet bureaucracy

The most formidable phenomenon of bureaucratic rule today is the Soviet Union, where three bureaucracies exert themselves side by side: one under the regular departments of the government; the second, the secret police, under the Minister of the Interior; and the third, the party bureaucracy, under the party leadership. The second and third control the first, but all three are controlled from the inside only, just as in the Roman Empire, without the outside help of freedom of speech, of freedom of the press, of independent courts, and of freely elected and freely operating parliaments. The size of these bureaucracies outdoes that of any previously known in history. This is chiefly due to the fact that all industrial activities within the Soviet Union are being operated by governmental officials or government corporations. With more than fifty federal ministries the problem of co-ordination must have assumed inconceivable proportions. It is almost a miracle that this threefold bureaucracy has not yet collapsed under its own weight. But that it is cracking under the bureaucratic stress is not an unreasonable thought. Once the records of this totalitarian enterprise are thrown open to an independent examination, we may learn unparalleled stories about bureaucracies of both the B-2 and B-4 types.

The use of appointed officials in the Soviet Union surpasses even that under the Hitler regime in Germany. There the number of government employees and other government workers on all levels soared to over four and one-half million, or about one out of twenty of the population, not counting the party bureaucracy.⁶ But the economic sector, though closely controlled, was primarily left to private ownership and administration.

ARE THERE NO COUNTRIES WITHOUT BUREAUCRACIES?

Bureaucracy was at its minimum in the feudal world of the Middle Ages. Countries were then governed through what may be called "feudal channels" rather than through large centralized bureaucracies. The rights of the overlords—such as the emperor of the Holy Roman Empire or the kings of England and France—and the duties of their vassals (the barons and the territorial princes) and of the latter's subvassals were strictly limited. The vassals and subvassals took care of the public interests—in the major Germanic principalities even of judicial matters—within their respective fiefs. Consequently, the emperor and the English and French kings had only relatively small bodies of public employees under them.

It has, therefore, sometimes been said that the feudal world was free from bureaucracy, as, for example, Max Weber has contended regarding the Holy Roman Empire.⁷ But this is not entirely correct. In Ranke's history of the Reformation we are told that in the fifteenth century the German princes, nominal vassals of the emperor, repeatedly remonstrated to their overlord, Frederick III (1440-1493, great-grandfather of Charles V), against the influence he allowed his counselor, a man by the name of Prüschenk, to wield. The Emperor answered that he supposed "each of them also had his own Prüschenk at home" (ein jeder von ihnen werde auch seinen Prüschenk zu Hause haben).⁸ Indeed, bureaucracies of both the B-2 and B-4 types may flourish within the smallest body of public employees. One single clerk may make a bureaucracy out of a government.

⁶ Figures of 1942; see my The German Civil Service Today, Office of the U. S. High Commissioner for Germany, 1950 (mimeographed). They include no soldiers.

⁷ See Max Weber, "Wirtschaft und Gesellschaft" in Grundriss der Sozialökonomik, 2nd ed., Vol. 3 (Tübingen, 1925), chapter on "Bureaucratie," pp. 650 ff., one of the pioneer studies on bureaucracy in the entire international literature.

This is shown also by the postfeudal British administration, which until late into the nineteenth century remained one of amateurs aided by clerks, especially on the county level. Such a government might appear a nonbureaucratic paradise. Yet actually every clerk became a sort of Prüschenk, whose bureaucratic power of influencing the decisions of the gentleman-administrator was considerable, and was felt by the public to be so. As always, this was not entirely unfavorable, since it served to maintain consistency in procedure and policy and to avoid whimsical, cadi-like decisions.

Even more effective than England in avoiding bureaucracy was the United States up to the Civil War, because of the deep-seated aversion against any type of government, whether bureaucratic or unbureaucratic, which has been so singularly characteristic of this country's history. The ensuing tendency to deal with matters of common concern through voluntary ad hoc associations rather than by setting up governmental agencies is one of the most effective antibureaucratic devices ever invented. Yet it has been actually a dispersion rather than an elimination of bureaucracy, since the individual associations often got their own, male or female, Prüschenks, who did gradually come to hold the reins tight in their secretarial hands. At any rate, to implement community undertakings in the old style has proved impossible under modern conditions. Thus the number of government employees has grown constantly. The absence of parliamentary control over them under the American system of separation of powers stirred Woodrow Wilson in the 1880's to write his Congressional Government, in which he suggested such control, without any tangible success. There were some hundred thousand federal employees then. There now are twenty to thirty times more, and with their numbers grew their powers, both P and II.

MULTIPLIERS OF BUREAUCRACY

We have seen that it does not require many employees to produce a bureaucracy. A single clerk who serves an amateurish administrator may well gather considerable powers. But bigness surely has a multiplying effect. There is, first, the arithmetic impact of numbers; secondly, the increasing difficulty of reaching the head of the department owing to the jam in the bottleneck that leads up to him; and thirdly, the growing number of conflicts, both positive and negative, among officials whose numbers grow. As one European cabinet minister joked, a departmental headquarters that contains a thousand employees needs no outside world to be busy; they can keep busy all alone in intra-agency quarrels.⁹

Regulations

But the most pernicious effect of sheer bigness is the increasing need for regulations. The mere number of employees makes it necessary for the responsible chief to resort to written regulations, which are intended to assure equality of treatment. Designed to make provision for all possible cases, they often fit none perfectly. For simple and clear situations they are too complicated because of their insistence on details that are obviously irrelevant; in the unusual case they rarely meet the situation accurately.

Regulations crush initiative and engender red tape, the ubiquitous disease of all big bureaucracies. They tend to transform all living, spirited, and flexible human impulse at the top into formal, dull, inflexible paper work at the bottom, and by this transfiguration may substantially impair the original plans.¹⁰ The gravest shortcoming of "administration through regulations" is that, once established, regulations are hard to change. Therefore, they often remain in force long after they reach the peak of their usefulness, even though they may have become clearly inadequate and out of date.¹¹ The bigger the administration the greater the difficulty of getting regulations changed. If several departments have agreed on them and consequently have to consent to the change, the difficulties can become unsurmountable in controversial matters, even those of little importance—yes, particularly in minor matters, because department heads cannot give their valuable time to little things, and much time is required merely to understand the issues. If the President himself approved the old regulations, how can he be incommoded with questions of minor changes on which the department heads fail to agree?

Poor organization

Poor organization stands out as another multiplying factor of bureaucratic defects, second in importance only to bigness. It increases the number and intensity of log jams. It fails to provide for co-ordination within bureaus or divisions, or between them, or between departments.¹² These defects may be made worse through overdepartmentalization. In addition, absence of regional co-ordination may unduly increase the number of matters that must be referred to headquarters.¹³

Other factors

These two, bigness and poor organization, are the most general multipliers of bureaucratic defects today. Other multiplying factors, quite different in nature, are fortunately no longer so generally present. Where public employees enjoy particular privileges and prestige and where their enhanced position is associated with an authoritarian spirit, the bureaucratic character of the powers wielded by them will be the more marked. When, in addition, they are recruited exclusively from one class and when their esprit de corps welds them together into a kind of caste, then bureaucracy may stare everyone in the face. Such factors have played a considerable role in countries other than the United States, as they did for example in old Prussia, with many residues still perceptible in Weimar Germany, and some even today in the Bonn Republic.¹⁴ However, it would be wrong to look only to such features in the search for bureaucracies. Bigness and poor organization operate as multipliers of bureaucratic shortcomings quite independent of authoritarian and caste factors.

AMERICAN FREEDOM NO ESCAPE FROM BUREAUCRACY

Bureaucracy, then, is not the same everywhere in every respect. There is a particular Prusso-German way of being bureaucratic, a particular English, French, or Soviet way; yet there is also a peculiar American way. Different as the American brand is from all others, it is bureaucracy all right, of proportions not to be belittled, with both bigness and imperfect organization operating as powerful multipliers.

Many Americans seem to be satisfied that the differences between the United States public service and that of countries with an older bureaucratic record are acting as a counterweight against any kind of bureaucratic pull. Such antibureaucratic factors are seen in (1) the absence of a rigid scheme of organization, especially at departmental headquarters; (2) the absence of a static career officialdom, at least in services other than the foreign service, the armed forces, and the police; (3) the practice of a thorough change in the leading personnel after a change of the party in power; (4) the continual high turnover of public employees on all levels.

Closer analysis reveals, however, that this greater "looseness," flexibility, and freedom of American administration is highly paid for by a number of bureaucratic evils that are peculiar to the American scene.

When after every change of the party in power all the top officials within a big administration are replaced, that does not necessarily produce an unbureaucratic type of government. The first result obviously is the lack of up-to-date departmental knowledge and experience at the top. Departments where all top officials have recently been replaced are like men without a memory. The new officials must either start anew from scratch or rely on subordinates to a far higher extent than old-timers had need to. This implies that it is now the departmental officials in the middle and lower brackets who gain a considerable influence (II-power) in briefing their new superiors. Such lowering of the level in the bureaucratic reservoir is not altogether wholesome. There is likely to be more bureaucratic narrowness on the lower level than there was on the higher, and the memory of officials on the lower level is restricted to what has come to their knowledge. Public-minded citizens who had established fruitful relations with top officials have to begin anew. Whatever they did before, if still in the preparatory stage, is lost labor; the new man knows neither them nor the arguments and outcome of previous discussions. This is regrettable even when only one of the top officials has had to be replaced; where all have been, it implies a great deal of waste.

The one departmental memory that keeps going through all changes is that embodied in regulations—until they, too, are altered. Lack of a homogeneous civil service body and rapid turnover in personnel compel the American public administration to rely on written regulations rather extensively, more than countries with a less fluctuating personnel. Loose over-all organization makes co-ordination and control more difficult and tends to lead to overstaffing. It also hinders the ready change of defective and outmoded regulations. For all these and some other reasons poor organization, while looking pleasantly unbureaucratic, is likely to be a potent source of bureaucratic defects all over the field. As a result, no other western nation is so much in danger of seeing its public administration ruled by overdetailed, inadequate, and outmoded regulations as is the United States.

There is little to attract brilliant young men and women into services ruled by such regulations, and where the most attractive positions, that is, all those that permit the display of individual initiative, are exempt from the civil service and given to outsiders.

REMEDIES

The dream that one could have a public service in modern countries without a bureaucracy of the B-2 and B-4 types should be abandoned. We cannot improve the world by pursuing pipe dreams. Bureaucracy is here to stay. It may not be precisely endemic in human nature as such, but it certainly is so in large numbers of employees bound by detailed regulations. The problem is not how to govern without a bureaucracy but how to minimize its defects under democratic control.

As bigness is the number one multiplier of bureaucratic shortcomings great ingenuity should be employed to keep the number of public employees as small as possible. Restraint in the assumption of large-scale governmental functions and economical organization of all those services that must be run by the government are, therefore, the first postulates of an antibureaucratic campaign. Because of the multiplying effect of bigness it is also generally better to have several small bureaucracies than one big one. Dispersion of administrative functions among various units—such as states, municipalities, special authorities, government corporations, and private organizations—is, therefore, often healthier than centralization in one giant administrative machinery, provided that there is a clear distribution of functions and provided, further, that the dispersion does not lead to an increase in numbers. The American tradition of action through private associations rather than through government should not be allowed to die; it should be fostered wherever it can alleviate the burden of government and reduce its machinery. We should even take a new look at the use of trade associations for self-administration in appropriate areas under the ultimate control of democratic government.

But public administration in large countries will never again be reduced to proportions so small that the number of employees ceases to be a source of bureaucratic shortcomings. Next in importance, therefore, as a remedy for unnecessary bureaucracy is an organization so devised that it is able to control the bureaucrats and still to avoid the dangers of government by over-detailed, inadequate, or outmoded regulations. It follows that the best remedy for bureaucratic shortcomings in large administrations is not inefficiency, as the American myth has it, but efficiency; not poor organization but good organization, especially at the top, so that advisable changes can be brought about promptly. Efficiency in a democracy must include responsiveness, of course. But no big administration can be responsive unless it is efficiently organized and run.¹⁵

When we are annoyed by excessive bureaucracy the fault lies generally not with the employees but with the men at the top, who fail to give directives in clear and definite language or, worse, are not certain of what they themselves want the officials to do. If they know what they want and are able to issue clear instructions, they can generally make the appointed employees work satisfactorily, without undue bureaucratic shortcomings. Cases of conscious sabotage are very rare and can, as a rule, easily be taken care of where they occur. In particular, it is not the fault of the mass of employees but of their superiors if general regulations contain too many details or are impracticable or out of date, and if such faulty regulations cannot be changed readily.

Initiative, responsiveness, and friendly human relations should be cultivated on all levels of the public service by all suitable means.

¹⁵ For the postal service to be responsive means first of all to deliver mail promptly and frequently at low cost. This cannot be done unless the entire postal service is efficiently organized and operated. So it is with all services.

The Size and Cost of Our Government

By HARRY FLOOD BYRD

PUBLIC affairs in the United States are conducted through governmental structures in upwards of 100,000 local districts, 17,000 cities, 3,000 counties, and 48 states, and through the vast federal bureaucracy which influences action from county seats to world capitals and affects the lives of people everywhere.

The size, scope, and cost of the federal government alone are beyond comprehension. Federal, state, and local governments together collect more taxes, spend more money, and carry more debt than all the governments of the rest of the free world combined.

Along with operations of state and local governments throughout the nation, activities of federal agencies are to be found in every state capital—in fact in every city—and in every county of the country. Beyond the national borders federal agencies have extended their operations to 94 foreign nations and overseas regions.

Federal agencies own or occupy real estate amounting to hundreds of millions of acres in continental United States, not counting property around the world; they use space in tens of thousands of buildings. State and local requirements and holdings have not been estimated.

Reported direct employment of civilians by federal agencies totals 2.4 million, 2.25 million inside the country and upwards of 200,000 overseas. A congressional check showed federal employees in every county of the country except Armstrong County, South Dakota.

Reported direct employment by state and local governments totals 4.5 million, more than 1.1 million by state governments and nearly 3.4 million by local governments.

Combined, reported direct civilian employment by all the governments totals 6.9 million, or more than one in every twenty-five persons. If undisclosed employment, such as personal service procured under contract by federal agencies, and military personnel in the armed services were added, the ratio would rise to about one in sixteen.

PATTERN AND PERSPECTIVE

Functions and services of state and local governments have remained far more constant in pattern, over the years, than those of federal agencies. They still concern themselves mostly with education, public safety, maintenance and construction of highways and streets, and public health and welfare. Where they have been extended, it has been largely under pressure of federal programs in such fields as social security, unemployment insurance, and housing.

The federal government is still administering its traditional functions, such as national defense, control of money, and regulation of interstate commerce. But its expansion into foreign military and economic programs, and into education, health, social welfare, power, scientific research, business and agricultural subsidies, housing, banking, et cetera, is indicated by the total of 1,400 budgeted projects and programs into which federal funds are pumped through most of the 2,800 Treasury accounts.

For administration of all these programs, there are 70 principal agencies with 2,117 component units in the federal government. Virtually all state and local governments are characterized by bureau organization, and where they are not, they are capable of it. While the actual number of bureaus, or their counterparts, in these governments is undetermined, more than a quarter of a million would be a conservative estimate.

For those who adhere to the theory that the least governed are the best governed, there may be consolation in comparison with modern dictatorships, but, even with the decline in the value of the dollar considered, there is reason to pause over the following facts:

1. All governments in the United States annually are collecting revenue totaling eighty-five billion dollars; spending more than one hundred billion dollars; running deficits of more than fifteen billion dollars; and, at present, operating under a public debt burden of more than three hundred billion dollars.

2. As compared with twenty-five years ago they have increased revenue collections 700 per cent, expenditures 900 per cent, deficits 1,400 per cent, and public debt 900 per cent.

3. In the same twenty-five years the nation's population has increased 30 per cent; personal income has increased about 235 per cent; gross national product has increased about 260 per cent; and production, in index points, has increased from 110 to 241.

4. As between federal and state and local governments, compared with twenty-five years ago: state and local revenue collections have been increased more than 200 per cent, while federal revenue collections have been increased more than 1,500 per cent. State and local expenditures have been increased about 250 per cent, while federal expenditures have been increased by about 2,200 per cent. State and local deficit financing in the last twenty-five years has been increased by some 300 per cent. The federal government twenty-five years ago was operating with an 18 per cent surplus; now it is operating with a deficit equal to almost 15 per cent of revenue collections. State and local debt has been increased 75 per cent; federal debt has been increased 1,500 per cent.

Among other things, these figures show that revenue collections by governments in the United States are equal to more than one-fourth of our national income; that government expenditures are equal to one-third of our national income; and that the public debt exceeds our national income.

There are those who persist in emphasizing the fact that much of the vast expansion of government in the past quarter of a century, the cost of it, and the public debt, particularly in the federal government, are due to war and depression. Even if there is reason to regard this explanation with the interest which may be attached to a historical fact, it does not solve any of the problems created by the expansion, or pay any of the cost, reduce the taxes or deficit financing necessary to maintain the expanded government, or discharge any of the debt incurred.

It is true that in the past twenty-five years the federal government has acted in depression, war, and postwar conditions, with a sweeping series of "temporary emergency" programs for each. But invariably the emergencies have passed more quickly than the programs, which in many instances have been perpetuated.

EXPANSION IN REVIEW

Anyone reviewing federal agencies, functions, programs, and projects originated, resurrected, or reorganized in the past twenty years will find that merely listing them with thumbnail descriptions requires forty pages of small print. Some have come and gone completely. Others remain wholly or partially, in one form or another, and in one place or another.

It is difficult to generalize or summarize the federal expansion and to determine what part of it may have been directly attributable to emergencies, what part may have been attributable to normal progress, what part may have been a result of a combination of these developments, and what part has been due to the multiply-by-division characteristics of bureaucracy.

In some cases expansion has not been continuous, but instances of net retrenchment have been comparatively rare. In any event, expansion has progressed under various circumstances, in different degrees, and in assorted forms.

In addition to new bureaucracy generated by emergency, there has also been some expansion in so-called old-line agencies, functions, and activities, as the indirect result of emergency programs. It is equally true that in every emergency virtually all agencies, whether they are involved or not, have tried to justify expansion in the name of the emergency. And most often they have been successful.

Those who emphasize the emergency expansion overlook a large area in the federal government where with a minimum of emergency justification the spread of bureaucracy has kept the pace. A few samples are: the federal Office of Education, which in 1929 was spending 31½ million dollars a year and now is spending 200 million; the Forest Service, which in 1929 was spending 16½ million dollars and now is spending 94 million; the Bureau of Indian Affairs, which in 1929 was costing 37¼ million dollars and now is costing 103½ million; the Public Health Service and the Bureau of Reclamation, which in 1929 were spending little more than 10 million dollars a year each and now are spending a quarter of a billion a year respectively.

Emergency expansion

Examples of agencies and programs in which some degree of expansion may have occurred as the indirect result of emergencies could include: Public Roads Administration, for which in 1929 the federal government was spending $418,000 a year as compared with more than a half-billion a year now; promotion of civilian aeronautics for which in 1929 the federal government was spending 5 million dollars a year as compared with 175 million now; and the United States Civil Service Commission which in 1929 was spending 1¼ million dollars as compared with 20 million now.

There are a few cases of agencies originated in emergencies which have continued more or less intact, such as the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation and the Securities and Exchange Commission. Most cases in this category represent constructive expansion at relatively small expense.

In other cases, such as the Home Owners' Loan Corporation, agencies have hung on almost indefinitely pending slow liquidation.

There are other instances where agencies have continued without change of name but with continual changes in functions and programs. The Reconstruction Finance Corporation is an example. Although it got into trouble when it did not have a job to do, this depression-emergency agency lived to the full maturity of twenty-one years, and this year it has been replaced by a permanent successor.

In another type of expansion temporary emergency programs have remained as permanent additions after their original parent agency has departed. Many of the activities which originated in the old "Triple A" are among the examples. We still have some of the functions of the Resettlement Administration which, in continually modified form, found their way to survival through the Farm Security Administration and now reside in another successor, the present Farmers Home Administration.

The myriad housing programs represent another category of expansion. Started for the most part near the end of the depression, they found the war emergency convenient as a justification. They are still with us.

Without arguing the merits of the Tennessee Valley Authority power program or its contribution to defense efforts, for purposes of this discussion we may simply list it as an example of a federal agency activity which has completed the expansion cycle. At first, production of hydroelectric power was promoted as one of the multipurposes of river valley development. Now the emphasis is on steam plants to supplement the hydrocapacity.

Still another type of federal expansion is represented by the so-called public assistance programs, as distinguished from the contributory Social Security System. At the time the contributory system was established, it contemplated a policy of public assistance retrenchment as the Social Security program expanded. Actually, the public assistance programs were increased before the Social Security programs were expanded.

The Selective Service System is an example of a war emergency agency which was reactivated for a new emergency before its previous emergency activities could be fully liquidated. A similar, but not identical, example may be found in the present Federal Civil Defense Administration, which quickly followed the dismantling of the World War II Office of Civilian Defense.

The military establishment

Proper measurement of what has happened in the military establishment in terms of size, cost, activities, and use of civilian and military manpower is difficult, because it was thrown into the Korean War before its post-World-War-II peacetime adjustment was completed and before unification was accomplished. There can be no question about its tremendous cost or its world-wide activities—civilian and military. In both its civilian and military aspects a maze of bureaucracy exists. Perhaps in passing we should note that whereas it previously was headed by two Cabinet-level secretaries there is now one superdepartment with three subdepartments.

New things to come

Atomic energy is another field where expansion is difficult to measure, but in eight years the Atomic Energy Commission has been given nearly 11 billion dollars to spend. It actually has spent less than half of this amount, but billions are obligated under its outstanding contracts. Its practice of operating under huge management contracts and its largely undeveloped domestic-civilian potentialities may indicate new things to come in the realm of bureaucracy.

Foreign aid programs, projects, and activities are other phenomena recent in federal bureaucracy. Since World War II there have been thirty-two programs which have been identified with eight agencies for outright foreign assistance. Postwar authorizations have totaled 54 billion dollars for expenditure through these programs. To date 40 billion dollars has been actually spent in the administration of them. It is difficult at this time to determine whether the emergency is sustaining the bureaucracy involved or vice versa.

BUREAUCRACY AND REORGANIZATIONS

expanded in civilian, military, defense-related, and foreign assistance fields, nor should the examples referred to be regarded as a complete listing. The references should not be interpreted, necessarily, as appraisals. The categories and examples which have been mentioned are only samplings to indicate the vast expansion within the federal government. From them the growth of federal bureaucracy is obvious.

They lead also to the observation that the results of authorizations over the past twenty years to reorganize the federal government have not been spectacular. Abolition of functions, programs, projects, and activities has not been characteristic of the reorganization authority. Too frequently these reorganizations have simply piled bureaucratic superstructures on top of previously existing bureaucracy. For example, out of one reorganization came the Federal Security Agency, and out of another came a whole new department with Cabinet status. And where bureaucracy was reduced in one place, as in the Department of Labor, the bureaus or their functions too often were merely moved to another.

Actually, bureaucracy has been making net gains. In November 1944, when the first more recent survey of its kind was made, there were 64 principal agencies with 1,141 component units (including 23 emergency war agencies with 364 component units). In the nine years since then the number of principal agencies has been increased by 6, and the number of component units has been increased by 976. There are now more principal departments and agencies and more component units in the federal government than existed at the peak of World War II.

AREAS FOR RETRENCHMENT

Analysis of the programs and projects under federal agencies and units shows there is widespread overlapping in their various fields of activities. The following general references to duplication do not necessarily represent complete overlapping, but they do indicate areas in which continuing scrutiny might be profitable.

There are 25 component units in 5 principal agencies and departments concerned with foreign relations and trade.

There are 17 component units in 10 principal agencies and departments concerned with labor relations.

There are 12 component units in 9 departments and principal agencies concerned with government insurance, exclusive of pensions and retirement.

There are 72 component units in 16 departments and principal agencies concerned with loans guaranteed, insured, or made directly by the federal government.

There are 14 component units in 5 departments and principal agencies concerned with power and water power.

There are 26 component units in 15 departments and principal agencies concerned with housing.

There are 12 component units in 9 departments and principal agencies concerned with safety.

There are 20 component units in 9 departments and principal agencies concerned with education.

Indications have been given of how, in the expansion of federal agencies, programs, and projects, overlapping federal activities have developed within the federal government. But in the course of expansion by federal agencies, their programs, projects, and activities have also overlapped those of state and local governments. This, of course, refers largely to domestic-civilian agencies and activities, but some overlapping is present in defense-related programs such as civilian defense.

Within twenty years federal payments to state and local governments have been increased from 126 million dollars a year to 3,000 million. Twenty years ago, in the midst of the depression, payments to individuals through federal programs, including those through such relief activities as the Federal Emergency Relief Administration, totaled 1½ billion dollars. Now with virtually full employment federal payments to individuals are at approximately the same total.

These federal payments to state and local governments are being made through more than fifty federal programs, and in most instances they are going into fields where state and local governments have their own activities, such as agriculture, aviation development, streets and highways, conservation, natural resources, labor, employment and unemployment, vocational assistance, public assistance, housing, health, welfare, and higher and public school education. The federal payments to individuals flow out to them through nearly two score additional programs and activities.

Virtually all of these federal payments are tied to federal formulae, requirements, regulations, and supervision. So, as federal money goes out under these and other items of federal expenditure, centralized authority, control, and domination come in.

Expansion of bureaucracy not only breeds more expansion in kind, it breeds overlapping all along the line and centralization of authority and control at the expense of state, local, and self-determination. And this is not all of the expense of big bureaucracy. It has been estimated that the federal overhead involved in collecting tax dollars from individuals in states and localities, bringing it into the federal treasury via federal bureaucracy, and pumping it out again via federal programs costs at least 15 per cent of every dollar collected.

BUREAUCRACY AND TAXES

Even this is not all of the expense of bureaucracy to taxpayers. They are hit hard by overlapping assessments. Federal and state taxes now overlap on virtually every major source of public revenue. In some cases the overlapping extends even to local assessments.

During the past twenty-five years the position of state and local governments as compared with the federal government in revenue collection has been reversed. Now the federal government is the heavy-handed tax collector.

In 1932 the federal government collected 22 per cent of the total public take from the American pocketbook, and state and local governments collected 78 per cent. In the fiscal year 1952 (the latest year for which complete returns are available) total revenue collected by all governments in the United States was 85.4 billion dollars, with the federal government taking 73 per cent and state and local governments collecting 27 per cent.

In the fiscal year 1952, the total revenue figure included 83.2 billion dollars collected by all governments in the United States from tax assessments, as distinguished from other sources of revenue. Of the total tax collection 69.1 billion dollars or 83 per cent came from sources which were subjected to overlapping taxation.

The federal revenue in the fiscal year 1952 included upwards of 63½ billion dollars in tax collections. Approximately 92 per cent of the federal taxes came from sources which were subject to overlapping taxation. And of some twenty billion dollars in state and local tax revenue, approximately 53 per cent came from sources which were subject to overlapping taxation.

There are areas in the United States where sources of public revenue are subject to layer upon layer of taxes. For instance, in some communities individual income, admissions, and certain selected commodities such as tobacco, alcoholic beverages, and gasoline are subjected to federal, state, and local taxes. In addition, the federal government and state governments frequently overlap each other's tax assessments on corporation income, stock transfers, inheritances, et cetera. Beyond this, property frequently is subjected to both state and local taxes. In many areas still another overlapping layer of taxes is piled on by states in the form of general sales and gross receipts taxes. In some localities where local sales taxes are imposed there is still an additional layer.

It is extremely difficult, if not impossible, to calculate or estimate how much of the necessity for this burdensome and annoying overlapping of taxation should be attributed to needed, well-organized domestic-civilian, military, and foreign assistance activities within the federal government; how much to overlapping, nonessential, and inefficient agencies, programs, projects, and activities within the federal government; how much to federal programs and activities which overlap state and local programs and activities, or require state and local expenditures; and how much to state and local programs and activities which overlap in activity or requirements.

THE HARD FACTS

Those who will may emphasize occasions, argue reasons, or debate necessity for expansion of government in the United States—federal, state, and local—but these hard facts confront us now: for nearly a quarter of a century, with only temporary cutbacks here and there such as in state and local governments during World War II and in the federal government at its end, there has been continual increase in the size, scope, and cost of government, tax assessment, deficit financing, and debt.

In this period the federal government has been on a deficit financing basis for twenty of the last twenty-three years, through depression, postdepression, World War, postwar, Korean War, and now post-Korea. And the end is not in sight. State and local governments are following suit.

No one can foretell precisely where the breaking point lies, but today there are signs of the stress and the strain which have been caused by unrelenting government expansion. The most obvious sign is the federal government's present difficulty in finding any more sources of tax revenue. It is doubtful whether present sources can stand higher rates without diminishing returns.

Long-term commitments in advance for huge multiyear programs and projects have placed the rate of annual expenditure by the federal government virtually beyond control. Here again states and localities appear to be following suit.

The federal statutory debt limit has been reached.

In this impasse the federal government is talking about returning functions to states and localities. The states and localities are saying they cannot meet the additional expense until the federal government relieves their tax sources of dual assessment. Those who would hide from the reality of the situation are proposing budgetary legerdemain which they call "cash budget," "Ruml plan," et cetera.

If we have more government than we can pay for, or if we have more than we are willing to pay for, there is only one way to reduce it. That is to reduce it, not shift it.

Toward a Responsible Bureaucracy

By PETER H. ODEGARD

A GOVERNMENT without bureaucrats is like a centipede without legs, unable to move—even to save itself—and powerless to accomplish any of the goals for which governments are instituted among men. For it is upon the bureaucrats that we depend to see that these goals—or policies—are realized in practice. Without administrative officers—that is, without a bureaucracy to carry them into effect—the most fine-spun schemes for promoting the common defense, insuring domestic tranquillity, promoting the general welfare, and preserving the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity would be stillborn.

Yet there is a widely current notion that bureaucracy and democracy are somehow incompatible—that the bureaucrat and the democrat must forever be at odds. This popular antithesis between bureaucracy and democracy is, as Professor Friedrich says, “an oratorical slogan which endangers the future of democracy. For a constitutional system which cannot function effectively, which cannot act with dispatch and strength, cannot live.”¹

Nevertheless, the fears expressed by the demagogues pose problems which cannot be denied for those who want government to be both effective and democratic. Not the least of these is the problem of enforcing responsibility upon the bureaucracy. For among the so-called immutable principles of democratic theory is the assumption that power and responsibility must go hand in hand. Power without responsibility is the very definition of tyranny, and the transition from arbitrary to responsible government involves more than popular control of the legislature, the so-called policy-making branch of the government. It involves also popular control of the executive establishment and the bureaucracy through which public policies are translated from law into life.

As the functions of the state expand and the size and complexity of the bureaucracy increase, the search for ways and means to make these minions of Leviathan more responsible becomes both more important and more intense. But if bureaucratic accountability is to be real and equitable, the bureaucrat must know for what and to whom he is responsible. The Hoover Commission says:

The President, and under him his chief lieutenants, the department heads, must be held responsible and accountable to the people and the Congress for the conduct of the executive branch. [But] responsibility and accountability are impossible without authority—the power to direct. The exercise of authority is impossible without a clear line of command from the top to the bottom, and a return line of responsibility and accountability from the bottom to the top.

IMPLICATIONS OF RESPONSIBILITY

But “responsibility” implies more than mere accountability for what is or is not done, and more too than a strict adherence to policy mandates as they come from the legislature and/or one’s administrative superiors and associates. It implies also a high level of technical competence for the job one is called upon to do, a personal character that is loyal, honest, and reliable, a dedication to duty, and faith in the basic values of the society one serves. These values in turn will in final analysis determine the quality of the public service and the character and conduct of its servants.

A truly responsible bureaucrat is, then, a man of not one but many responsibilities. He owes a political responsibility to those who have final say as to policy and ultimately to the people who make and unmake them. He owes both a “political” and an administrative responsibility to his superior officers. He owes a legal responsibility to the courts (both administrative and judicial), lest he transgress the rights of citizens by abusing or exceeding his powers. He owes a professional responsibility to his fellow bureaucrats to maintain high standards of integrity and competence, lest he bring dishonor or disgrace to the “guild” of which all are members. He owes a moral responsibility to the highest ethical and moral principles of the state and society in which he lives and to which he professes allegiance. And finally he owes a responsibility to his own soul—to the honor and integrity of his own person—for without self-respect he can scarcely be expected to have respect for others or to deserve their respect in turn.

To explore fully these multiple loyalties and responsibilities is beyond the scope of this brief essay. It may, nevertheless, be useful to suggest some of the problems and perplexities that occur in thinking about a responsible bureaucracy in the modern state.

RESPONSIBILITY FOR SUBORDINATES

As far as the mass of bureaucrats have any political responsibility, it must be vicarious and not direct. A President, a Prime Minister, and the chief executive officers appointed to serve with them must, above all things, be politicians (and partisans, at that) and, as such, politically responsible not alone for their own acts but for those of their subordinates, however numerous and widespread.

As the leader of the government, and under the principle of collective responsibility as it operates in Great Britain, the Prime Minister is the center and focus of political responsibility. If the deeds of wayward and incompetent civil servants in the Home Office are attributable to the Home Secretary, so in like succession are they—through the Home Secretary—attributable to Her Majesty’s Prime Minister. And all together the ministers of the Crown must assume collective political responsibility not only for major lines of policy but also for administrative acts of thousands of civil servants of whose very existence they may be but dimly aware. It is in this combination of individual and collective responsibility to Parliament that the great strength of British democracy is to be found.

Political responsibility for the mass of bureaucrats in the American government is much less clearly defined. The President, to be sure, in final analysis must “take the rap” for what is or is not done. The heads of the major departments are political officers appointed by and accountable to him; and as they must answer for the acts of their subordinates, so the President in turn must answer for them. But the locus of responsibility is by no means as clear as in Great Britain. James Burns says:

The Founding Fathers did not clearly distinguish between the President’s executive authority and the supervisory powers of Congress over administration. On the contrary, they deliberately divided administrative power between the two branches as part of the system of checks and balances.²

THE ISSUE CONFUSED

The President’s power to control the bureaucrats derives mainly from his powers to appoint (and presumably by inference to dismiss) "officers of the United States whose appointments are not otherwise provided for" and to "require the opinion, in writing, of the principal officer in each of the executive departments." But these powers are by no means unlimited or exclusive, and at a hundred points Congress has, from the beginning, pared them down and impaired their effectiveness. The organic act establishing the Treasury Department, to cite one example, requires the Secretary "to make report and give information to either branch of the legislature, in person or in writing, respecting all matters referred to him by the Senate or House of Representatives or which may appertain to his office." And, although the Secretary was described in a subsequent law of September 11, 1789, as an "Executive Officer," he and the Treasurer of the United States were nevertheless required to make annual reports to Congress.³

Legislation setting up other major departments or executive agencies has not followed this pattern, but Congress has nevertheless found ways and means for interposing itself between the President and his executive subordinates and thus confusing the clear line of bureaucratic responsibility. The creation within major departments of numerous bureaus over which particular committees of Congress and even particular Congressmen exercise more control than ³ This dual responsibility of the Secretary of the Treasury has on occasion been a source of acute embarrassment to the President. For example, in 1833 Jackson ordered Secretary Duane to remove federal deposits from the Bank of the United States, on the ground that that institution was unsafe. This order seemed in sharp conflict with an equally strong resolution of the House of Representatives expressing confidence in the bank. When Duane chose to follow Congress rather than the President on this issue, he was removed by Jackson and replaced by Taney, who proceeded to carry out the President's order.

Nor is this confusion confined to the central corps of executive departments and agencies. It has been confounded by the creation of "independent" boards, commissions, corporations, and authorities, responsible (if they may be so described) not to the President, but to Congress. This so-called "headless fourth branch of government" has posed problems of administrative organization, management, and responsibility for which no one seems to have found satisfactory solutions.

The mixture of executive, legislative, and judicial powers in these bodies has caused no end of confusion among experts accustomed to a neat tripartite division of political powers. But the Brownlow and the Hoover-Acheson Commissions struggled vainly with the problem of making these agencies "responsible" without at the same time sacrificing their "independence."

CONSTITUTIONAL DIVISION OF POWERS

The problem of the "independent agency" is obviously too complex and too important to be resolved by mere structural or procedural reform. It involves a restudy of at least one basic principle of American constitutional law—the principle of separation of powers. Although not expressly spelled out in the United States Constitution, the principle has always been implied from the language of Articles I, II, and III, vesting the legislative, executive, and judicial powers in three distinct branches of the government. But there is scarcely an agency or official of the government that does not in one way or another exercise two or more of these "distinct" powers.

Wherever an official has discretion to decide controversies among persons or between private persons and the government, he may be said to exercise judicial power; wherever he has power to issue rules or regulations to which penalties for violation are attached, he exercises legislative power; and wherever he has power to direct, or control, conduct in terms of these decisions or rules, he may be said to have executive power. Mean is the official, and humble indeed is his station, who does not in some measure combine these powers in the performance of his duties. To call them quasi-judicial and quasi-legislative may help the judicial conscience to rationalize departure from fundamental doctrine, but to justify the "independence" and hence the practical "irresponsibility" of an agency of government because it exercises quasi-judicial or quasi-legislative power may be to establish a principle which, if extended to all officials or agencies whose powers may be similarly described, can undermine the democratic principle that public officials—including bureaucrats called commissioners—must be politically responsible to the people through their elected representatives.

REPRESENTATIVES OF THE PEOPLE

It is too often forgotten that the President—no less than the Congress—represents the people, and that it is through him, perhaps more effectively than through Congress, that bureaucrats can be held responsible. Although the political responsibility of bureaucrats is a vicarious responsibility in either case, in the Presidency it comes to fairly clear focus at one time and in a single office, whereas in Congress it appears in fragments and at uneven intervals. And whereas through Congress the bureaucrat's responsibility to his state or local "clients" is emphasized, it is through the President that the bureaucracy can be most effectively held to account for promoting the "general welfare" of all the people. Fortunately it is not necessary to choose between Congress and the President in our search for a responsible bureaucracy. Both are essential, provided we understand what it is we are striving to accomplish.

Not the least of the heavy burdens the President must bear is political responsibility for the conduct and misconduct of the executive establishment. Insolence, inefficiency, incompetence, and corruption in any executive official or agency are properly chargeable to him. He ought not to escape this responsibility, as Grant and Harding, and others too, have sought to escape, by talk of "betrayal" by "faithless men in high places." These men are his agents and for better or worse their deeds are his.

PARTY RESPONSIBILITY

And the President's responsibility is the responsibility of his party. Yet how often have we seen not only the President, but the party whose leader he is, seek (often successfully) to escape responsibility for the "evil deeds of evil men"—forgetting that these same "evil men" were his agents and those of his party! In final analysis political responsibility in a big democracy can be effectively enforced only through well-organized political parties. Hence it is that the search for a more responsible bureaucracy must be sought not merely in administrative reorganization or the redefinition and reallocation of powers and responsibilities, but also through a more responsible party system.

And if this is true of the President, it is equally true of the Congress. Congressmen no less than the President owe their election to the party in whose principles presumably they believe. Without responsible parties to organize and discipline Congressmen in terms of policies upon which as partisans they agree—the Congress itself becomes an undisciplined, irresponsible body of “freewheelers,” each seeking his own exaltation and each owing allegiance to state and local pressure groups upon which—rather than the party—his political future comes to depend.

We need to inquire, then, whether party responsibility is more direct and meaningful when applied to Congress or to the President. There is reason to believe that our major political parties—as far at least as concerns the general welfare of the nation—are less responsible at the congressional than at the Presidential level. Although it is true that our major parties may be described as loose federations of state and local parties, it is also true that they function more effectively in Presidential years than at any other time in presenting to the voter meaningful alternatives as to candidates and policies. The higher ratio of actual to eligible voters at Presidential elections is one evidence of this. Another is the identification of the President by the voters as the responsible leader of his party in the nation. It is also true that—for a variety of reasons—party labels mean less at state and local levels than at the national level; and party organization is less efficient and less disciplined at off-year than at Presidential elections.

The relative weakness of the parties at the state and local levels is reflected, as both cause and effect, in the greater power and influence of special interest groups. Many Congressmen, and some Senators, owe more to powerful pressure groups within their states or districts than they owe to the party under whose label they aspire to office. In any case the issues over which congressional campaigns are fought in off years are more likely to reflect state and local interests than the issues over which Presidential campaigns are fought.

What is said here of the relative effectiveness of political parties in enforcing political responsibility in national affairs as between the President and Congress applies, with even greater force, to state and local governments and as between the governor and the legislature. The situation is of course complicated in the states by hydra-headed elective executives and in local governments by the widespread tradition of nonpartisanship.

GENERAL WELFARE VERSUS SPECIAL INTEREST

If this analysis has any validity, it follows that a bureaucracy responsible to the legislature will be more responsive and more responsible to local and special interests than a bureaucracy responsible to an elective chief executive.

It is to be expected that a Congressman quite properly answerable and responsive to the cattle growers of his district should seek to “liberalize” grazing regulations in federal forest reserves or on other federally owned lands within his state. If the bureaucrats responsible for the making and enforcement of these regulations are answerable to the Congressmen, they will find it difficult to resist such demands for “liberalization” even though they conflict with general policies of the nation concerning the conservation and use of our natural resources. And what is true of grazing regulations is likewise true of countless other policies.

This is not to argue that Congressmen (taken together) are less concerned about the “general welfare” of the nation than is the President. Nor is it to lose sight of the intense pressures from special interests that are felt in the White House. It is, however, to say that the President, because his constituency is the nation, because he has at his beck and call mass communications facilities beyond the reach of any other person, because he is the dominant figure in his party, because of the power and prestige of his office, is less vulnerable to such special or regional pressures than is the average Congressman. Moreover, it is his responsibility to see that the general welfare is not sacrificed to special or parochial interests, and where he finds faithless bureaucrats who betray this trust, he has or should have power to discipline, expose, and if necessary remove them.

THE LEGISLATURE AS A SAFEGUARD

But, as I have said, the choice between a bureaucracy responsible to the executive (President, governor, mayor) and one responsible to the legislature (Congress, state legislature, city council) is not to be made in either or terms—nor under our system is such a choice open to us.

For, although the weight of constitutional authority, the dictates of practicality, and considerations of democratic theory point to the elected executive as the channel through which the bureaucracy is made responsible to the people, the legislature will continue to challenge this solution and to claim its share of control. And within proper limits it is a legitimate claim. For surely one of the basic functions of a representative legislative body is to maintain eternal vigilance over the bureaucracy to the end that the spirit as well as the letter of the law be observed in its execution and that the liberty of the citizen and the due processes of law be not sacrificed to the insolence of office masquerading under “reasons of state.”

Legislative bodies discharge this function through the enactment of laws which define the goals and standards of administrative action and the limits of administrative discretion; through the appropriation or denial of funds to administrative agencies, and the examination and evaluation of administrative policies and procedures when budget requests are under review; through more or less continuous inquiries of appropriate legislative committees, and special investigations launched in response to demands for more searching examination of particular agencies; and through the virtually continuous and informal contacts that individual legislators maintain—usually in response to requests from their constituents—with administrative agencies.

All these are legitimate and, under our system of government, inevitable devices available to legislative bodies for enforcing political responsibility upon bureaucrats.

Nevertheless, under present circumstances, it is not easy for the legislature to maintain effective surveillance and control over the vast and far-flung bureaucracy of the modern state. Even in the determination of the basic structure and powers of administrative agencies, the legislature is severely handicapped. To an ever increasing extent it has lost the initiative in the formulation of policy. Moreover, the scope and complexity of the problems with which legislation must now deal require that legislative standards be more general—not to say vague—leaving to the executive great discretion in the development of supplementary legislation (rules and regulations) to meet particular situations.

Nor can the modern legislative body hope to have access to information necessary to effective control of the bureaucracy, except through the bureaucracy itself. Even the power of special investigation may be limited by considerations of national security. The ever expanding scope of governmental activities shrouded in secrecy—if not mystery—makes effective control by a numerous legislative body difficult if not impossible. Congress, for example, is in these days called upon to authorize expenditures of fantastic dimensions for the development of atomic energy, for national defense, for foreign policy, often without the benefit of more than the most sketchy and elementary information. Such information as there is, is in the hands of the executive and subject to his control.

Under these circumstances, a responsible bureaucracy is possible only through a partnership of the legislature and the executive, based on mutual respect, trust, and confidence.

CONGRESSIONAL-EXECUTIVE RELATIONS

Certainly no one observing the American scene in these latter days would argue that such a partnership has characterized executive-legislative relations at the national level. Hearings before committees of Congress take on the appearance of adversary proceedings, with Congressmen as prosecutors and executive officers as defendants. Loose, exaggerated, and often unsupported charges of corruption, incompetence, moral depravity, and disloyalty have been hurled at administrative officers and at entire agencies by presumably responsible chairmen of committees. Observers watching the cold war between the White House and the Hill, even when both are controlled by the same party, might well conclude that the American government had indeed fallen on evil days. The very term bureaucracy has become a "snarl" word, symbol not of loyal and devoted public servants, but of functionless hangers-on—of doubtful honesty, morality, and loyalty. Obviously this is the way to ensure not a responsible, but a bitterly resentful, bureaucracy, crippled by fear, internal disunity, and dissension. Vigilance is indeed the price of liberty under law, but the line between the vigilant and the lawless vigilante must be maintained lest we betray the very freedom we seek to defend.

So much has been written about the dangers of executive usurpation and abuse of power that we have become less alert to threats of legislative usurpation. "The legislature," warned James Madison, "is everywhere extending the sphere of its activity and drawing all power into its impetuous vortex," and "... it is against the enterprising ambition of this department that the people ought to indulge all their jealousy and exhaust all their precautions."⁴

Madison's warning has a peculiar timeliness today, when some congressional committees have presumed to exercise not only powers of investigation and legislation normally associated with the legislative branch, but also executive and even judicial powers. Legislative intervention in the appointing power of the President has recently gone far beyond the so-called custom of senatorial courtesy. Attacks on prospective appointees as "security risks," loudly expressed doubts as to the loyalty of incumbents, and riders on appropriation bills forbidding the payment of public funds to named individuals are among the more recent devices of legislative usurpation, although the Supreme Court has branded this latter maneuver as being in effect a bill of attainder and hence invalid.

Illustrations of legislative intervention in administrative management are numerous and occur in virtually every major department of the government. And Senator McCarthy's "negotiations" with Greek shipowners concerning trade with Communist China mark a new level of legislative impertinence and usurpation. Only the so-called Bricker amendment, which would cripple Presidential control of foreign policy, compares with McCarthy's conduct as an example of congressional arrogance.

No better formula for producing a

confused, timid, ineffective, and irresponsible bureaucracy could be imagined than this tug of war between the executive and the legislature for control. James Burns says:

Responsibility for policy and administration becomes shrouded in a fantastically complicated network of ever shifting relationships among President, administrators, staff agencies, Senate, House of Representatives, committees, sub-committees, chairmen, individual legislators and among infinite combinations and permutations thereof.⁵

There is no easy escape from this situation. No reforms of structure or procedure, and no admonitions concerning good behavior will suffice without strong leadership on both ends of Pennsylvania Avenue.

If the major burden of enforcing bureaucratic responsibility should fall to the elected executive, it is imperative that the executive establishment be adequate, in terms of both the scope and structure of power, to make its control effective. The diffusion and confusion of power in a plural executive (as in the states), the intervention of the legislature in strictly executive functions, and the denial to the executive of power commensurate with his responsibility, all militate against a responsible bureaucracy.

In the far-flung, complex structure of the modern administrative state it is difficult at best for the executive to see or to know more than a tiny fraction of those for whose acts he is responsible. He becomes a prisoner of his top advisers and administrators. And with the multiplication of agencies and functions it becomes increasingly difficult for him to keep in very close touch with more than a handful of these.

The President is not only harassed by congressional interference and usurpation. He is denied many of the powers essential to effective executive control of the administrative machine. He lacks, for example, real authority to determine the organization and structure of the executive branch, and a large number of important executive functions in the so-called "headless fourth branch of the government"—the "independent" agencies—are outside his control. He lacks effective control over the federal budget, is "handcuffed and hog-tied" with line-by-line appropriations, and is denied the item veto. And he has only a limited control over personnel policy and administration, even within the regular executive departments and agencies.⁶

POLITICAL RESPONSIBILITY VERSUS PARTISAN LOYALTY

How far up or down the hierarchy of administrative authority the principle of political responsibility should extend has been a subject of prolonged and intense debate. The issue has been confused by failure to distinguish between political responsibility and partisan loyalty. The former is a salutary and indispensable characteristic of democratic government and should extend from the outermost reaches of the bureaucracy to the White House. The latter, unless carefully confined to top administrative posts which share with the President in the determination of high policy, can become a mask for the place seeker and the spoilsman.

This is not to imply that administrative policy-making is or can be confined to a narrow circle of partisan officials at the top. Policy and administration are the Siamese twins of politics and are associated at virtually all levels of the administrative structure—indeed wherever discretionary power is found. But this is a far cry from saying that partisan responsibility for policy should embrace the entire civil service. For the partisan neutrality of the civil service is a cardinal principle of the merit system upon which any sound personnel policy must rest. The tradition, now embedded in law, which bars civil servants from active participation in party politics is based on this assumption. How far this denial of an important civil right should extend, it is not easy to say. Certainly it should include professional, scientific, and technical workers upon whom we depend for continuity and competence in the public service. Whether it should also include the lower ranks of laborers and purely manipulative employees is not so clear.

To say that civil servants should not be held to any partisan loyalty or responsibility is not to say that they should also be exempt from political responsibility. Political responsibility in this sense implies that the civil servant carry out faithfully and to the best of his ability the policies of the administration, or government, of whatever party, in which the people have placed their trust. As former Prime Minister Attlee once observed, "We always demand from our civil servants a loyalty to the State, and that they should serve the government of the day, whatever its political colour."⁷ Anyone who cannot give this elementary loyalty to the state he serves cannot justly claim the security and immunity from partisan responsibility that characterizes membership in the permanent civil service.

⁷ Hansard, March 25, 1948, quoted in T. A. Critchley, The Civil Service Today (London, 1951), p. 60.

LEGAL RESPONSIBILITY

A responsible bureaucracy implies not only political but legal responsibility as well. The legal definition of bureaucratic powers and responsibilities is the heart of administrative law and an important part of the criminal code. Laws against bribery and corruption, fraud and deceit, misfeasance and malfeasance, are, of course, part of the machinery for enforcing this legal responsibility.

In his classic study of the Law of the Constitution, A. V. Dicey argued strongly against the importation or infiltration into English law of the so-called Droit administratif of France, which (according to Dicey) was designed to give civil servants a preferred status under the law, or at least a status different from that which ordinary citizens enjoyed. Under the French practice, said Dicey, the ordinary courts are incompetent to pass judgment on administrative or official conduct. Redress for wrongful acts by government officials or civil servants must be sought not in the ordinary civil courts but in special administrative tribunals. Moreover, in France, he said, responsibility for such wrongful acts, once established, was assumed not by the individual but by the state.

All this, argued Dicey, was in derogation of the sound English view that responsibility for wrongful acts rests with the individual, without distinction as to his status, whether as private citizen or as civil servant. In England, he wrote, "every official, from the Prime Minister down to a constable or a collector of taxes, is under the same responsibility for every act done without legal justification, as any other citizen."⁸ The public official can no more escape by casting his liability upon the state than can the private citizen. Indeed, the doctrine of state immunity from liability for the tortious acts of its servants ("The King can do no wrong") was a cardinal principle of English law.

American legal theory and practice have followed the English rather than the French tradition. Legal responsibility of the bureaucracy has been enforced through the ordinary courts, and liability for wrongful acts by civil servants has attached to the individual and not to the state. Responsibility of the government for breaches of contract has long been recognized, but a similar responsibility for the torts of its agents has had but a recent and reluctant recognition. Civil and criminal suits against public officials as individuals, plus resort to the great writs—quo warrant, mandamus, injunction, prohibition, habeas corpus—have been the usual remedies for bureaucratic wrongdoing. Proposals to establish a system of administrative tribunals on the French model have been made, but so far without success.

CHANGING LEGAL PATTERNS

Nevertheless there have been significant changes in traditional Anglo-American practice. The theory that a public officer was individually responsible for damages resulting from his wrongful acts may have helped to inspire caution and respect for the rights of others, but it was cold comfort to those actually damaged to know that their only redress was a damage suit against impecunious bureaucrats. So the fiction of individual responsibility has been maintained as the practice of publicly reimbursing officials in the amount of the judgments against them has grown.

Moreover, a distinction between governmental and proprietary functions has been made, according to which liability attaches to the government for the wrongful acts of its agents when pursuing the latter but not when engaged in the former. This distinction is grounded on the theory that the state derives no pecuniary benefit from its governmental activities—hence no liability—but does from its proprietary activities. However faulty in logic this theory may be, it has helped to extend the area within which government assumes liability for the wrongful acts of its servants.

Significant of the new trend is the Federal Tort Claims Act of 1946, which radically modifies the rule of immunity formerly applied to the federal government. Under this act the United States is made liable "for injury or loss of property or personal injury or death caused by the negligent or wrongful act or omission of any employee of the government while acting within the scope of his office or employment."⁹ There are exceptions, however, including (1) cases where the employees have exercised due care in the execution of a statute whether valid or invalid, (2) discretionary acts, and (3) intentional torts such as assault, battery, and false imprisonment. Where liability attaches, it is declared to be the same as that imposed on a private individual "in accordance with the law of the place where the act or omission occurred."

Reflecting a similar trend in England was the enactment in 1947 of the Crown Proceedings Bill. With minor exceptions this act admits state liability for the wrongful acts of public servants. "A person can enforce any claim as of right regarding contracts and torts. The state will admit liability for the wrongs committed by its servants or agents as any private citizen or public corporation does."¹⁰

Although we are a long way from the French system of administrative courts, it is possible to point to examples of some roughly analogous institutions in the United States, such as the Court of Claims, the Tax Court of the United States, and the Court of Customs and Patent Appeals. Moreover, quasi-judicial bodies such as the Interstate Commerce Commission and the Securities and Exchange Commission, together with a considerable number of agencies serving the needs of intradepartmental adjudication, might be transformed into something closely resembling administrative courts. But however logical such a plan might be, we are far from adopting it in this country. Moreover, the arguments for the French system, while impressive, are far from conclusive in a country like the United States with a federal system, a strong tradition of local autonomy, and an equally deep-rooted distrust of government in general. For some time to come we shall continue to rely mainly on the ordinary courts to ensure legal responsibility of the bureaucrats.

MORAL RESPONSIBILITY

But a truly responsible bureaucracy will depend as much—perhaps more—upon its own code of professional and civic ethics as upon external controls. Excessive regulation may hinder rather than help in the development of such a code, by cultivating “timidity” and government by rule book at the sacrifice of imagination and initiative. “Infinitely more important than compelling administrative officials to live up to minutely defined requirements of control is their acceptance of an ethical obligation to account to themselves and to the public for the public character of their actions.”¹¹

The growth of professional pride and esprit among civil servants, without which no professional code of ethics can have much meaning or effect, has had to wait upon victory over the spoilsman. Although the final battles in that war have yet to be won, it is not too early to make some conscious and concerted effort to create among public servants a greater sense of professional loyalty, discipline, and responsibility. Indeed, signs are not lacking that, in some sectors at least, this new professional spirit has already begun to emerge. Numerous organizations of public servants already exist through which higher standards of competence, integrity, and responsibility can develop.

The experience of other professions—medicine, law, and teaching, for example—can offer stimulus but also a warning to bureaucrats. For too often such associations become primarily concerned not with their responsibility for higher standards and better public service, but with the promotion of narrower and more selfish ends. Associations of civil servants have a special obligation to avoid these pitfalls and to cultivate at all times an intense and pervasive sense of public service and responsibility.

Loyalty to high standards of honesty, “scientific management,” and technical competence are, of course, of transcendent importance. But equally important is the bureaucrat’s responsibility to know and respect the wishes, values, and goals of the community he serves, not in supine response to the pressures of special interest groups, but through a dogged devotion to the basic policies of the state—even though this means resistance to these same special or parochial groups.

Although we have far to go in this country in achieving a truly responsible bureaucracy, we can take comfort in the progress that has been made. “No longer has the patronage peddler or the spoilsman the hold he once had on the federal service. No longer can it be fairly said that American city government is a failure, conspicuous or otherwise. No longer can it accurately be said, as George S. Taylor once said of Britain in the eighteenth century, that politics is “the trade of managing the state in the interests of the men in possession and their friends.” Standards of character and competence, of integrity and industry, in the public service will stand comparison with those in other walks of life. But it is not enough that they be “just as good”—they should be better. Just as government should be a model employer, so the public service and the public servant should be models for the community, as I believe they are even now.

It is fitting and proper for the community to expect higher standards among its public servants than in private life. But in the end administrative morality will reflect the morality of the community it serves. A society in which “caveat emptor” is still a basic principle of business, in which the clever man who can make a “fast buck” is eulogized, and in which private speculation is often concealed in acts of so-called public policy, ought not to be surprised if an occasional bureaucrat strays from the straight and narrow path.¹² The ancient English jingle has relevance even to our own times when it says:

The law locks up both man and woman
Who steals the goose from off the common
But lets the greater felon loose
Who steals the common from the goose.

The old aphorism that “every people gets the kind of government it deserves” is at best a half-truth, for the American people probably gets better government than it deserves. In a country where the “politician” is a symbol of corruption and dishonesty, if not dishonor, where a large majority of parents, as reported by the Gallup poll, prefer not to have their children enter the public service, where the bureaucracy is regarded as a legitimate object of ridicule and even revulsion and the term “bureaucrat” is a nasty name, how can one expect high standards of public service and responsibility? The wonder is not that we have not achieved a competent, devoted, and responsible bureaucracy, but that we have come so close to doing so.

Irresponsible attacks upon public servants are a luxury we can no longer afford—when our prosperity, our freedom, and even our survival may depend upon them. A responsible bureaucracy requires a responsible democracy—and a responsible citizenry. To create the one we must also create the other. To do so will require the best efforts of all who value our democratic institutions, whether they be in education, business, labor, or the professions.

Responsiveness Versus Efficiency in Public Service

By JAMES L. MCCAMY

TO be responsive, in the context of our title, means that executive agents of government must satisfy, in so far as is consistent with the public interest as defined in each case, the needs and desires of citizens in a democratic society. Efficiency means that public agents should accomplish maximum results at lowest cost. The conflict between responsiveness and efficiency can be approached in a number of ways, but, since administration is essentially the behavior of people, I shall approach it here as a problem of public personnel. Most of the reference is to the federal government.

If you ask a federal civil servant these days how he feels about responsiveness versus efficiency, he replies that he has never felt so beset by partisans who are hampering efficiency.

If you ask a thoughtful citizen, he replies that he never felt so helpless to judge the performance of a large and complex bureaucracy, and the only way he can measure its responsiveness is in the small area that comes to his notice.

Civil servants in the federal government have had a rough time during the past seven years. From the high purpose of winning the war, which followed straight upon the high purpose of conquering the depression, they awoke to the sequel of the early postwar Truman administration in 1946-48. A President who had not yet gained poise as a partisan or self-confidence as a national leader was flanked by a Republican Congress many of whose members seemed to hate government. Some Congressmen then and later appeared to long for a day when a tax collector and a constable would be the only executive employees needed.

HAZARDS TO MORALE—TRUMAN ADMINISTRATION

The result in those days of 1946-48 was a threefold shock for the career civil servant. First came a new kind of political intervention. Because the President was not yet sophisticated about his elevated role in party politics, civil servants discovered that party henchmen asked improper favors, held strategic posts, and generally dulled the high luster of the shield of public service. The atmosphere that was revealed in later dismissals and indictments was felt and discussed by the journeymen months before it became obvious in congressional committee action.

A second part of the threefold shock was the drastic cutback in spending and personnel after the war. Much of this should have been expected, of course, but no matter how surely one knows that the ax is going to fall, the actual impact is always a shock. In the post-war years the reduction in force, as it was conducted, gave weight to seniority and veteran's preference. It looked to many like a blow aimed especially at the efficient public servant. He could not possibly think that he was appreciated.

The third portion of shock appeared in the Truman loyalty program. Whatever his motive, whether it was anxiety over possible subversion or a hope to beat Congress to the cleanup and protect his administration from attack, Mr. Truman must go into history as the man who began, in 1947, the whole procedure based upon a premise that government workers were possibly disloyal. They had to prove their loyalty, often against odds. They had to answer questions about their affairs that no other group in society at that time had to answer. If their answers were not satisfactory, or if unnamed informants reported that they might be tainted, federal employees were caught in a nightmare. They were badgered worse than decent people should ever be by their fellow men.

Long before the more recent use of accusation and innuendo to make partisan news, Mr. Truman's loyalty boards were in private conducting hearings that lacked some of the essentials of due process in matters of procedure. One of Mr. Truman's Cabinet members, the Honorable Charles Sawyer, Secretary of Commerce, refused to accept the resignation of a man who had been denounced by Senator George W. Malone. A loyalty board failed to prove him guilty of disloyalty. As soon as the board found him loyal, the man resigned. Mr. Sawyer announced to the press that he was fired as a security risk. The Department of Commerce was one of a few agencies then permitted to dismiss employees as security risks without benefit of hearing. This episode was taken very seriously by government workers. It appeared to be a dismissal under the security program for reasons of political caution.¹

Adverse comment in these times always raises a doubt that the observer is tasting sour grapes, hence this personal note. I had accepted a job at the University of Wisconsin in the late summer of 1946 but stayed in the Department of Commerce until January 1947, when a succession had been arranged. W.

RESULTS OF LOYALTY PROGRAM

Responsible civil servants were, of course, opposed to Communists and disloyal persons whether in government service or outside it. They did not need to be advocates of disloyalty in order to object to the loyalty program. The program was objectionable to people of honor and dignity because it was founded on a premise of possible guilt that had to be expunged rather than upon the usual Anglo-American premise of innocence with guilt to be proved. It was also thought by some to be a costly way to catch a few questionable employees. The really serious spies were caught during the years of the loyalty program through typically quiet and thorough police work by the Federal Bureau of Investigation and were tried in court.²

Averell Harriman was still Secretary of Commerce when I left. I did not serve under Mr. Sawyer and have, in fact, never seen him. Since this concerns loyalty, perhaps I had better add that I left the government of my own free will before the loyalty program had started, but not because it was going to start. So far as I know, neither my loyalty nor my safeness as a security risk was ever questioned.

² For example see Oliver Pilat, The Atom Spies (New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons, 1952) for an account of the Greenglass-Gold-Rosenberg ring and Alistair Cooke, Generation on Trial, U.S.A. v. Alger Hiss (New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 1950). Newspapers of the time cover the Judith Coplon trial. The British side of the early postwar captures of spies, notably Klaus Fuchs, is retold in Alan Moorehead, The Traitors (New York: Charles Scribner's Sons, 1952). British atomic spies were related to the American cases. Neither loyalty investigation nor congressional committee investigation developed the telling evidence for court in these cases. Even the documents that were crucial in the Hiss trial came to light in a pretrial hearing in a defamation suit filed by Hiss against Whittaker Chambers, who had failed to produce them while testifying earlier before a congressional committee but later produced them for the committee, some two weeks after Hiss's attorneys

Returns from the loyalty program showed that the federal service was overwhelmingly loyal by the measurements of the program and according to the use made of the results of the investigations. The facts were reported by the head of the Federal Bureau of Investigation as follows:

By the close of business on June 30, 1951, 3,674,649 loyalty forms had been processed; 17,050 full field investigations and 19,410 preliminary inquiries had been initiated since the Loyalty Program became operative on August 1, 1947.

On the basis of loyalty investigations, the Civil Service Commission has advised, 330 incumbents and appointees had been removed from or denied Federal employment by their respective agencies; 8,688 had been retained or accepted after investigation. Other cases included those terminated for miscellaneous reasons such as withdrawal from consideration because of resignation. In this connection, Civil Service Commission records disclose that 1,837 persons resigned during Loyalty investigations and also that 1,503 additional persons resigned prior to adjudication of their cases.³

If you take only the 330 fired or refused employment, you get a percentage of about .00009 of the total number of employees who had been screened. If you add to them the 1,837 who resigned during investigation and the 1,503 who resigned prior to adjudication of their cases, and assume—although not with justice—that they were had given them to the Department of Justice. As for the absurdity of expecting to catch subversive employees by asking them if they are subversive, one should read Edwin A. Rothschild's satirical proposal for "Ending the Horse-Thief Menace," The Saturday Review, November 28, 1953, p. 28. Horse thieves, he says, will always answer truthfully, if asked, that they are indeed horse thieves.

of dubious loyalty, you get roughly .001 per cent. This hardly justified references to a Communist-ridden administration. Perhaps history will have to weigh the loyalty program in calmer times. It did search out a few subversive people and it gave the public, perhaps, a sense of assurance that something was being done. It brought emphasis to the whole subject of loyalty among federal employees and made them more conscious of the seriousness of their role. On the other hand, there is no question that it depressed morale among loyal employees, who felt that they had been singled out of society as suspect, and it may have lowered the prestige of public service in the minds of citizens.

NEW THREATS—EISENHOWER ADMINISTRATION

But the postwar shock to the morale of federal civil servants was to be followed by further blows. The Eisenhower administration found new ways to discourage the career civil servant. First, it made universal throughout the federal service possible dismissal as a security risk. Until then only a few agencies engaged in especially sensitive work could dismiss employees as poor security risks solely at the discretion of their chief executives. Under the Eisenhower order it was all one whether a man worked as an atomic scientist or as a gravedigger. If he was accused of questionable political associations, he could be fired. If he talked too much, drank too much, deviated from the norms of sexual behavior, showed other signs of moral turpitude, or held any other thoughts and acts in his heart or in his past that appeared to a security officer, a board, and his chief executive as questionable, he could be fired as a security risk.

Secondly, the economy ax cut again, this time into the higher total number of employees that was the result of postwar foreign policies, including the use of arms in Korea. Civil and military budgets felt the relentless push for savings. Reduction in force again haunted the sleep of civil servants.

Thirdly, the new administration set up a new category of the civil service to include confidential and policy-making positions. This was a substitute for the use of excepted positions to allow executives to hire their own choices for positions where they wanted loyalty to persons and policies. To the career civil servant, however, it meant that he could probably never reach a confidential or policy-making position without losing his tenure in a career. Philip Young, chairman of the United States Civil Service Commission, gave this reasoning for the new category:

[It is] a much needed clarification of the proper limitations of the civil service, giving agency heads the discretion that is absolutely necessary for good administration. Policy jobs should never be in the career service, and the career man should not be asked to develop, express, defend—and inevitably stake his working future on—a partisan political viewpoint. . . . We have limited to persons in the competitive service the legal protection against summary removal. . . . If an agency head is given, for sound administrative reasons, complete freedom to make appointments to certain positions, he should have exactly the same freedom to make removals from these positions. Hereafter anyone who chooses to leave the competitive service to take an excepted position will do so with the clear understanding that he is getting out of the career stream.⁴

gress who subscribed to this practice continued in the course they had developed over the years since 1938.

More was added when the Jenner committee of the Senate held televised hearings in which a summary of an FBI file concerning suspected espionage in the past was made public by the Attorney General, and in which the Director of the FBI testified in support of partisan testimony. This appeared to mean, at least at the time, that in the future the opposition party would have to run against what was in the secret files about personnel.

What could a civil servant think? He was doomed to fear. If his every act had to be analyzed to make sure that it could not be used against him for partisan gain, he was hardly a free man. His first concern had to be to stay out of the files!

This is no time, then, to ask the civil servant if he values efficiency above responsiveness. He has been responsive by demand and bedamned ever since 1946. Partisan administration has smothered him.

Far from being a threat of dominant bureaucracy, executive officials since World War II have been watched so closely, have been so sought out for past deeds, that they are timid if not frightened. This has been no period for civil servants to take initiative in any direction, including the direction of more efficiency that might mean less responsiveness. The best policy now for civil servants is to be as inconspicuous as possible.

PUBLIC REACTION TO RESPONSIVENESS AND EFFICIENCY

Citizens, nevertheless, still have reason to ask whether responsiveness or efficiency or both guide public servants. For citizens can see that government enters more and more into all our affairs, that it becomes larger through the years regardless of which parties are in power, that it becomes more and more remote from daily scrutiny by ordinary citizens because it is more and more technical and varied. For the period 1900-49, as Solomon Fabricant found, total employment in the United States increased about 120 per cent; government employment increased 500 per cent. In 1900 one out of twenty-four workers was on a government payroll; in 1949, one out of eight.⁵

Then how do we judge the efficiency of such technical operations as those performed by so many bureaucrats today? Does the Air Force have enough planes? Should we build more aircraft carriers for the Navy? Does the Army have the most advanced guided missiles? Who knows? Is the Treasury's handling of the interest rate on government bonds wise? Has Interior protected the public interest in its reclamation policy? Should Agriculture support prices at 90 or 100 per cent of parity or not at all? Is the cost of living index used by the Department of Labor based upon appropriate items? Does the Federal Trade Commission really protect us against false advertising of cures for disease? Do the budget and other staffs that were set up to get more efficiency really achieve it? Or do they think up forms, questions, and procedures that are more ritual than economical? Who knows? A few members of Congress who specialize can evaluate critically the executive performance in their fields. Some pressure group officials know the answers in some of the fields of government's incessant activity.

How can the rest of us judge when we do not know much about what government does? The answer is that we are more and more dependent upon the responsiveness of executive officials to public desires and needs. And if we get the most for our tax dollar, we are also dependent upon public officials to be as efficient as they can without failing to be responsive. For I take it that we Americans still prefer responsiveness to efficiency. We want government to do what we need and want it to do. We count the cost second.

THE ABIDING CONFLICT

There is an inevitable, a deep and abiding conflict between efficiency and responsiveness. Human nature is wasteful. Efficiency is the antithesis of wastefulness. Yet human nature enters all organized endeavor and government most of all in a representative republic.

The purpose of government in a democratic society is to serve human beings as efficiently as possible without denying responsiveness to human needs and desires.

We see this in many of the programs of government. Maximum efficiency in a farm program, for example, assuming that we do not want farmers simply to go bankrupt, might well be to purchase surplus acreage and convert it to hunting grounds. City people are now in a majority and millions of them seem to share a primordial, nostalgic urge to slay wild beasts. They do this at great trouble and expense. Charge them a fee for hunting on the new public domain and it is conceivable that they would pay back the purchase price with interest. The trouble with this solution is that many farmers want to continue to live on their own farms, and the rest of us agree to support their way of life as a good thing for the nation.

Or take military administration. We go to great pains to provide the utmost safety and comfort for individuals. We emphasize the saving of life and limb and giving the boys good, warm clothing and shelter so far as possible. Cigarettes and Coca-Cola are as much a part of supply as ammunition. We could save much money if we stripped fighting to its essentials and applied the standards of strict efficiency in military and many other government programs. So long as we remain human, in our culture, and retain democratic control of public affairs, we never will.

PUBLIC OVERSIGHT OF THE PUBLIC SERVANT

To assure responsiveness public servants must be watched at all levels of their hierarchy. They are. Some would argue that they are so closely watched that they can never devote themselves to the efficiency that is also a part of their work.

At the top they are subject to periodic election. Below the top they are subject to the leadership of those who are elected, in so far as decisions and actions come to the attention of or originate with political leaders. The interests of contentious parties are always in mind whenever political executives work. Unpopular decisions are avoided if possible, and if they have to be made in the public interest, they are made only after searching for all other ways that might serve the purpose and also hold or gain votes. If anyone doubts the power of periodic elections, let him watch intimately a sophisticated political executive (not a disinterested novice who was appointed for other skills than politics). Voters are Very Important People to politicians.

At all levels civil servants are watched, as others in this journal discuss at more length, by the courts, by the legislature, by staff units, by interest groups, and by citizens' organizations. We need add only that they are also watched by a free press, which is often a hostile press.

In this sense the press is not merely the metropolitan dailies and the wire services. It is also hundreds of trade journals that keep an eye on the officials who handle the small matters of most interest to their readers.

The same thing is true of pressure groups. For every imposing national association, there are hundreds of small specialized groups that watch over the shoulders of chiefs of small sections and even of individual bureaucrats who work on matters of their concern. We may hear more about the National Association of Manufacturers, the United States Chamber of Commerce, the American Medical Association, the American Farm Bureau Federation and the Farmers' Union, the American Federation of Labor and the Congress of Industrial Organizations, but in their own fields and reporting through their own trade press the small interest groups are always busy too. Watch manufacturers and assemblers of imported Swiss watch parts fight for the ear of the Trade Agreements Committee. California nut growers oppose imports, but candy makers and bakers like Mediterranean almonds, and the public servants who hear from both factions are those who recommend tariffs on nuts. The industrial consumers of fats and oils keep a vigilant eye upon officials who have anything to say about the sensitive web of lard, butter, and cottonseed, soybean, coconut, and palm oils.

It is important to conceive of oversight of the executive as something that has to occur in depth, for many decisions are made by executive officials located low in the echelons and far from the headquarters. Oversight of the President and heads of departments is not enough.

INESCAPABLE HUMAN NATURE

In the end, however, to get the desirable responsiveness of public executive agents combined with maximum efficiency, we are dependent upon the human beings within the public service. There is no substitute for human nature, and no way to escape it. If the public servants at all levels, both civilian and military, recognize their duty to both responsiveness and efficiency, we are safe from obeisance to a bureaucracy that puts efficiency first.

Our concern as a nation should be to keep the bureaucracy filled with the kind of human beings who want to be responsive as well as efficient. A chemical engineer in charge of water purification should have the ingrained attitude of responsiveness just as a commanding general should have it. The engineer can protect lives perhaps more efficiently with some foul tasting chemical, but he should not even want to.

The ways of securing and maintaining bureaucrats who are responsive and efficient are familiar to most of us. They include an open door for the qualified to enter public service, entrance by competitive examination, supervision to keep public servants aware of the responsibilities of public service, job security so that public servants will not have to compromise their integrity, a chance to rise to relatively high positions, and administration that will give them high morale. Also essential is a public attitude that will allow a public servant to feel that he is a respected member of society. Indeed perhaps the greatest threat to the nation from wanton accusations of disloyalty is that a public attitude of suspicion toward public service will develop. If this happens, good people will not enter and those who are already in it will feel ashamed of their vocation.

If we are dependent upon human nature for responsiveness and efficiency, we need, of course, to examine traits of personality and attitude, as well as traits of technical competence, to admit people to the bureaucracy and to measure them while in service. I have often thought that we need a layman's catalogue of personality types so that we could sum up a person quickly by placing him in one of the categories that all of us recognize as common. (Think what a saving of time this would mean in writing letters of recommendation! "Mr. Smith is Type 325. Sincerely yours.")

TYPES TO AVOID

For the public service, where we want personality types who will practice responsiveness as efficiently as possible, I suggest as a beginning the following to avoid:

The Adept Dodger

This type is always busy somewhere else when the mistake is made, or he creates a new flurry to draw attention from the mistake. In the lower ranks he is a policeman who was having a drink in his favorite saloon when the drugstore down the street was hijacked; then to provide an excuse he starts a fight in the saloon so that he can report that he was busy restoring order. In the higher ranks he is a general whose armies suffer defeat, whose intelligence system appears to be incompetent, but who covers his failure by bold proposals to start a bigger war and thus diverts attention so that he can remain a hero. All occupants of this category are skilled in publicity.

The Hearty Greeter

This fellow is all responsiveness to the influential and no efficiency at all. He spends his time making contacts. Anyone who might be in a position to help him or to criticize him gets the big hello, the effusive greeting, hearty laughter, and intimate address. At the top, he favors the Mayflower Hotel, especially for lunch, which he never eats alone. In the lower ranks, he never fails to remind a citizen when he has done a favor for him; he uses the telephone a lot to "keep in touch"; and he does his best to get to his boss and his Congressman with praise for them and affable fiction about how well he is doing his own job. He is more concerned with his own position, of course, than in responding to public need and desire. Efficiency? It's another joke. The fellows will be glad to hear about that one.

The Man Who Hates People

In the public service this type will always denounce citizens before he serves them. He thinks of the sins of people who, let us say, litter up public places before accepting the fact that Americans are fantastic litterers and that it is government's job to clean up after them. If he is a policeman, he denounces as criminals children who act like children, but illicitly. It never occurs to him to suggest that boys throw green apples at a harmless target instead of at Mrs. O'Leary's cow. He prefers to make arrests.

The Prothonotarial Keeper of Inflexible Rules

This one is dangerous. He thinks first of regulations and he always knows what they are. When democratic responsiveness is called for, he can always cite a rule and will insist that it remain unbent. He is, at heart, the cartoon figure of the notary or clerk, the prothonotary pure. It is more important to him that the rules are obeyed in the old folks' home than that the old folks are comfortable and happy. He will order a soldier who has just been through combat to court martial for taking cameras from the conquered foe, if the rule is against taking cameras. As a tax collector he will treat a poor widow who cannot pay exactly the same as a rich man who refuses to pay, for the rule says that all who fail to pay shall be prosecuted. This man's veins are filled with ink, his spirit with statutes.

In a democratic society where everyone is an individual and rules must be flexed within reason to fit individual cases, this type is a too common threat and always difficult to defeat, because he has the rule on his side and can always give a good reason behind the rule. He still appears in too many places. Unfortunately, he often deals with citizens who have no influence with higher-ups and therefore cannot evade him. He is a sinister threat to responsiveness in all bureaucracies in all lands.

The Man Who Never Questions a Client

This category is for all those who conceive of their jobs as doing without question whatever a client wants. They lead not, neither do they push. They ape the views of the publics with which they deal, never questioning, never explaining. Here you find a county agent who never thinks for himself, finds all his answers in the opinions of his farmers, no matter whether the farmers are wise or misinformed, and discredits the material sent to him from headquarters if it does not conform to what his farmers already think. Here also you find any Secretary of the Treasury who believes that all bankers are well informed, wise, and the best and only possible advisers the government could have on interest rates.

The Damn Fool

This category is so broad, of course, that it is impossible to describe it comprehensively in a journal of limited space. It includes the quartermaster who sends nothing but turkey up front to feed the boys, on the theory that if they like turkey for Thanksgiving and Christmas they will be lifted infinitely in their spirits if they have turkey every day. It includes the school administrator who runs for cover because he receives one disapproving letter when there may be a thousand clients who approve but who do not write letters. The federal department head who retreats when attacked without reason by a single member of Congress is also in this category. So is the executive who refuses to look ahead or meet the present but assumes that he may always just rely upon the past, until he is caught short by inevitable change. So is the staff aide who shows no discrimination in what should be brought to the attention of his boss, and the subordinate who unintentionally fails to show his boss the significance of an action about to be taken. This little list can grow almost indefinitely. The trouble with the damn fool is that he cannot be trusted to recognize when and how to be either responsive or efficient.

TOWARD RESPONSIVENESS AND EFFICIENCY

All these personality types should be kept out of public service, and if they slip in through some loophole of the entrance examination, they should be dismissed when discovered. Fortunately, they do not dominate our public service. On the contrary, in the main we are blessed with public servants of a very different sort. But for the perfect combination of responsiveness with efficiency all public servants should be at opposite poles from the unfortunate creatures who live within the categories listed above.

We can get them if we are careful in our selection. We can keep them if we treat them right. We have not been treating them right in the federal service since 1946. Instead, we have singled them out from the rest of society to suspect them of disloyalty until they prove their innocence. We have tormented them with fears of anonymous denunciation and costly preparation of evidence for hearings. Personnel actions may easily require legal counsel! We have made public servants live in fear of the files. They can hardly be either responsive or efficient when they must be afraid to do anything at all.

It was never the safest course in any bureaucracy to stick one's neck out; under recent circumstances it is the height of folly. But we need public servants who will stick their necks out both for responsiveness and for efficiency. God help us if we leave our public service to the prothonotarial keeper of inflexible rules. He is the best equipped to survive under a regime of threat, for he seldom if ever makes a mistake.

James L. McCamy, Ph.D., Madison, Wisconsin, is professor of political science at the University of Wisconsin. For two years (1939-41), he was an assistant to the Secretary of Agriculture. From 1942 until 1947 he worked in economic foreign relations, including a year and a half as chief of the bureau that handled lend lease, economic warfare, and missions abroad for the Foreign Economic Administration and a year as director of the world trade policy staff in the Department of Commerce.

The Recruitment and Training of Bureaucrats in the United States

By WALLACE S. SAYRE

THERE is a wide gap between the established patterns of recruitment and training of civil servants in the United States and the actual composition and organization of the bureaucracies. The doctrine and practices of the civil service personnel systems are designed, in large part, to deal with a kind of bureaucracy which no longer exists.

Certain characteristics of the bureaucracy in the United States determine the metes and bounds within which its recruitment and training ought to be conducted. To the extent that the civil service personnel systems, in their recruitment and training procedures, fail to take these characteristics of the bureaucracy into account, the formal personnel systems become mere ritual and red tape.

The controlling characteristics of the bureaucracy in the United States most closely related to its recruitment and training are that it is (1) highly federalized, (2) highly decentralized within the federalized jurisdictions, (3) highly specialized in its training and its work, (4) highly fragmented in its loyalties, and (5) in our society, neither a first-choice career nor an exclusive career. In short, the American bureaucracy taken as a whole is markedly pluralistic in its organization and composition; it is diverse in its attachments and its loyalties; and, for many of its members, it provides an episode rather than a career.

A BUREAUCRACY HIGHLY FEDERALIZED

The federal character of the American bureaucracy can hardly be exaggerated.

In terms of recruitment and training procedures there is almost no connective tissue between the members of the national bureaucracy and the forty-eight state bureaucracies, between a particular state government bureaucracy and the hundreds of city, county, village, and town bureaucracies within the state. There may be, in some states, the umbrella of a state civil service statute over all these separate bureaucracies, seeming to establish an integration of all the civil servants in the state under uniform general rules. But the integration is formal rather than real, and it does not touch the most significant aspects of the civil servant's work and life.

There is, for example, very little circulation between these bureaucracies by way of transfer or promotion. The bureaucratic career ladder rarely spans the gulfs between the hundreds of separate governmental jurisdictions. The rules and statutes, indeed, usually attach penalties to or prohibitions against circulation—such as local residence requirements, promotion barriers, cumbersome transfer procedures, the loss of pension and retirement benefits. The rules are set heavily against circulation, a fact which is emphasized not only by the presence of these barriers but also by the absence of personnel procedures to overcome them. To these conditions, adverse to mobility between bureaucracies, must be added a stronger version of the seemingly universal habit of organized groups to prefer promotion from within rather than the recruitment of "new blood" at the intermediate and higher levels. A bureaucrat from another governmental jurisdiction is as much "a stranger" to a civil service group as is a nonbureaucrat.

These narrow, compartmentalized worlds of the bureaucrats in the United States provide an interesting contrast to the career ladders of the politicians, who may realistically aspire to move upward from city or county posts to state and national offices. The barriers to movement between the bureaucracies are in sharp contrast, also, to the mobility which characterizes most nongovernmental careers in the United States.

HIGHLY DECENTRALIZED

Within a particular governmental jurisdiction the typical bureaucrat in the United States is less a member of an integrated city, county, state, or national government bureaucracy than he is a member of an organization called an agency, a department, or a bureau. While there will be some circulation of membership between these organizations (especially for a few categories of bureaucrats in the national government), the strongest identifications throughout a bureaucratic career are likely to be with a particular organizational unit of the executive branch.

To a considerable extent this fragmentation of the bureaucracy finds expression in statutory provisions for separate personnel systems, including separate systems of recruitment, tenure, compensation, and retirement. Even where the decentralization is not emphasized by statutory differences, it is deeply imbedded in personnel rules and practices. The result is that the conditions of membership in the bureaucracy vary widely within a particular government.

HIGHLY SPECIALIZED

The bureaucracies in the United States mirror a specialized society. The bureaucrat thinks of himself, and tends to be regarded by others, as a lawyer, a doctor, an engineer, a physicist, an economist, a forester, an agricultural scientist, a welder, or a bricklayer. His status and his behavior are associated with his specialization as much as, or frequently more than, it is with the "civil service." Those occupations in which specialization is least pronounced (or least recognized) are exceptions to this generalization, but all signs seem to indicate that the trend toward greater specialization is continuing upward rather than declining.

Specialization in the ranks of the bureaucracies is accompanied by increased professionalization of large groups in the bureaucracies. That is, corporate attachments are developed with other persons of like training and interests, across the jurisdictional and organizational lines of the bureaucracies. An economist, for example, identifies himself and his career with other economists, inside and outside the bureaucracies. This is true, in large part, of all those within the bureaucracies who are members of the established and organized professions and similar groups of specialists. The fraternity of profession in the United States is stronger than the fraternity of bureaucracy.

LINKED TO CLIENTELE GROUPS

Particular bureaucracies have strong alliances with the organizations representing the clientele served by these bureaucracies. Thus, the several bureaucracies within the United States Department of Agriculture are more closely identified with the national farm organizations than with the other parts of the national government bureaucracy. Similarly, the bureaucracy in the Veterans Administration is closely related to the veterans' organizations. Similar clientele relationships are to be found also at the state and local government levels.

These links with clientele groups are a significant characteristic of the American bureaucracy. They emphasize its pluralistic loyalties as well as its diverse sources of recruitment and training.

NOT A FIRST-CHOICE CAREER

The civil service in the United States provides for many of its members not a career but a strategic rung on a non-governmental career ladder. Many civil servants find that the public service offers, either at the beginning or at an intermediate stage of their careers, a kind of experience or training for a few years which promises to accelerate or ensure their subsequent advancement in a private profession or occupation. This seems to be especially true among lawyers, accountants, engineers, architects, doctors of medicine, teachers and professors, and young women, but it is a widespread practice among many other occupational groups.

The civil service in the United States is unusual in the extent of this steady flow into and out of the public service. As one of the most distinctive features of the American bureaucracy, this cross-flow presents problems to the personnel managers but net benefits to a democratic society.

Although the number of young Americans who decide upon the public service as a first-choice career has apparently increased significantly during this generation, the bureaucracy remains on the whole a second-choice occupation. This condition is especially emphasized in a period of full employment.

Many elements enter into making the civil service a poor competitor for talent in the United States labor market. A long tradition that the public service does not offer satisfactory careers accounts for much of the problem, since this tradition is translated into low prestige. Compensation levels in the public service are not usually favorable in comparison with other opportunities for talent. And the invasion of privacy which is recurrently the lot of the civil servant in the United States detracts further from its attraction for those who have other choices for their careers.

RECRUITMENT METHODS

The recruitment of the civil service in the United States has not adjusted its premises and its practices to these important characteristics of the American bureaucracy. Instead, the civil service personnel systems have been preoccupied with the preservation of their own traditional orthodoxy: uniformity of method in recruitment, the frustration of patronage aspirations on the part of the politicians, and the maintenance of meticulous objectivity toward the candidates for the public service. The result is that if a civil service candidate of 1890 could somehow become again a candidate in 1954 he would be more at home with the process than he would in any other aspect of contemporary American life.

The American bureaucracies, characterized by their fragmentation and variety, are recruited by formal personnel procedures which are singularly uniform. It is true that the actual recruiting process may in some instances be quite different, and in fewer instances the formal process may itself display innovations intended to recognize the variety of the bureaucracy. But, on the whole, recruitment is typically accomplished by (1) an official announcement that an examination will soon be given for a particular type of position and that applicants with certain specified qualifications may take the examination, (2) an examination (usually including a written test and often no other test) which is held on a specified date, and (3) the construction of a list of eligibles, ranked competitively, from which the names of candidates ranking highest are then certified to agencies for appointment. This procedure represents a valiant effort to impose a rigid uniformity upon a civil service which steadily grows more specialized and differentiated in its composition.

It is possible, although not probable, that the civil service personnel systems in the United States could have successfully imposed such a uniformity upon the recruitment process if their leadership had been bold enough, a half century ago, to adopt the British idea of three or four levels of general civil service examinations, each geared closely to a level of the educational system. This choice (if, indeed, it were ever a real choice) has long since been forfeited, at least as a general solution. Necessity would now seem to require the development of a system of recruitment which accepts the variety and fragmentation of the civil services as demanding a corresponding variety in the methods of recruitment. The past three decades have seen substantial instances of recognition of this necessity—the most notable being the practices developed by the Tennessee Valley Authority. But the main structure of the formal recruitment system remains largely unchanged. Alongside this formal procedure there has meanwhile grown up a counterpart system, informal and unpublicized, through which the governmental agencies recruit a considerable part of their staffs, observing the etiquette of the civil service rules while recruiting more nearly after the pattern of private employers. Other agencies have found it desirable to build their recruitment systems upon close relationships with special parts of the educational system (for example, the public schools with the teachers colleges, the forestry services with the schools of forestry).

The past decade has also seen a sustained effort to persuade the United States Civil Service Commission to delegate recruitment authority and responsibility to the executive agencies. This has now been agreed upon as a policy, and important initial delegations have been made. The actual operation of the new system—its advantages and its limitations—has not yet emerged into public view.

THE FALLACY OF SURPLUS CANDIDATES

A major (although perhaps inarticulate) premise underlying civil service recruitment methods in the United States is that there are in the labor market many more qualified candidates for the public service than there are jobs. It is this premise which supports the structure of recruitment practice, ranging from the minimum publicity of forthcoming examinations through all the intricate procedural steps between candidacy and appointment.

This premise of a surplus of highly qualified candidates, all of them eager and persevering in their determination to enter the public service, is obviously unrealistic in a full employment economy. It is difficult to understand how the premise ever became imbedded in civil service recruitment doctrine in the United States, especially since it has never been valid here except in a few situations on limited occasions in our history. Perhaps the premise had its origin in the excess of patronage applicants over available patronage jobs. If so, the fallacy lies in the equation of marginally qualified (or unqualified) patronage seekers with highly qualified career aspirants for the public service. The premise also perhaps gained accidental but temporary support from the depression decade of the 1930's, when a deficit in private employment opportunities coincided with the attractions of meaningful careers in an expanding and dynamic government.

Whatever its origins, it is clear that the premise is not a realistic one for the recruitment problems of the public service, as a whole and most of the time, in the United States. A more realistic premise would be that civil service recruitment processes must be shaped to meet the problems of a scarcity of highly qualified candidates for the public service, in a competitive labor market where the public service is rarely the most favored employer. Such a premise would require drastic revision of established civil service recruitment practices.

AN ENDURANCE CONTEST

Civil service recruitment processes now represent an endurance contest for the candidate. With few exceptions, the candidate for the public service, no matter how highly qualified, is confronted with barriers of delay and uncertainties from the moment he decides to become a candidate. In fact, his difficulties begin earlier, for he cannot easily obtain the facts upon which to decide whether he should become a candidate.

As an entrant in an endurance contest, the candidate for a civil service position needs to possess certain qualities if he is to emerge as a winner: he needs to have time to spare, patience to comply with a long series of procedural requirements (lengthy application forms, tests to be taken at fixed times at not always convenient locations, additional forms as he nears the end of the procedure, investigations with further questionnaires), and an absence of alternative opportunities. The most highly qualified candidates usually have alternative opportunities which cost less in time and in loss of personal dignity.

In this endurance contest, accordingly, the mortality rate is probably much higher among the highly qualified candidates, who abandon the process, than among those less qualified entrants who have a scarcity of choice in the labor market. But the loss to the public service is probably still greater because of the number of highly qualified prospects who, coolly appraising the civil service recruitment process, decline to become candidates at all.

This characteristic of the recruitment process no doubt has its roots in the traditional safeguards against patronage influences as well as in the premise that there is always a surplus of highly qualified candidates so anxious to enter the public service that no barriers of time or inconvenience will discourage them. It is further explained by the desire to follow a procedure which will provide elaborate evidence of equitable treatment of all candidates, a requirement which increases the formality and impersonality of the recruitment process, reducing much of it to unreal and unconvincing quantitative measurement of each candidate's qualifications. These explanations, however, do not improve the status of public service recruitment in a labor market where other employers use more realistic and less cumbersome methods.

TRAINING

There is no coherent theory of training for the public service in the United States, nor has there been developed any widely accepted concept of training civil servants after their initial appointment. Training was not among the concerns of the original civil service statutes, and it has not yet won statutory recognition except in rare instances and in limited form. The fact that recruitment of the civil service has been developed separately and in forms unrelated to the educational system has erected a high barrier against any broad or systematic program of training for the public service. A further consequence has been the inhibitions against assigning high priority to training programs as a responsibility of civil service personnel agencies.

Training for the public service in the United States is a by-product of the training developed for nongovernmental occupations and professions, the notable exception to this rule being the teaching profession. Several small and specialized areas provide additional significant exceptions: public administration, city management, forestry, public health, and, to some degree, the foreign service. The main body of public servants, however, is recruited in an employment market whose members have been trained for and have acquired their initial experience in private occupations. The training of civil servants in the United States, therefore, reflects the specialization and variety of American occupational life. Neither the national bureaucracies nor the state and municipal bureaucracies are the product of any uniform pattern of training and experience; instead, they each are built upon elements which civil service recruitment methods can extract from the prevailing market of talents in the local or national area of competition.

Within the past three decades there has been a steady growth of efforts to provide systematic training within the civil service. The national government especially has developed such programs, mainly through the work of particular agencies concerned with the in-service training of specialized groups of their own employees. These training programs, ranging from brief orientation courses for new employees to intensive seminars for executives and senior specialists, were accelerated in their development by the personnel needs of the wartime agencies, and the value of such programs to the agencies has been confirmed by postwar experience. Some states and a few cities have developed similar, although hardly comparable, programs of in-service training. By and large, however, in-service training remains a peripheral rather than a central emphasis of civil service personnel administration.

Security of Tenure—Career or Sinecure?

By O. GLENN STAHL *

TO the financier, security means a fiscal investment; to the international affairs expert, it means military or political protection against an enemy; to the custodian of secret documents, it means a strong safe and guarding against spies; to the psychologist, it means peace of mind and a kind of ability to know where one stands; to the social welfare specialist, it means insurance against economic misfortune; and to the civil servant, it means assurance that continuation of his employment will not rest on his politics or on other prejudicial considerations unrelated to his efficiency or to good administration.

At first blush these appear to be widely varying uses of the same term. Actually, there is a common denominator. There is a concept of stability, of inviolability, of protection, of insurance that runs through all these meanings.

In fact, this inherent, pervasive meaning of security is universal; for the quest for security is found in all stages and walks of life. Is it not being sought by the primitive hunter, stalking game and storing provisions? by the entrepreneur, inaugurating and consolidating a new enterprise? by employee unions, seeking an annual wage or stability of employment? by big business, promoting diversity of markets and adequate volume to assure continuity? by a nation, legislating in behalf of the aged, war veterans, and the physically handicapped, or negotiating for international understanding and mutual aid, or training a military force? by the politician, "mending his fences"? by the worker, probing the work plans and intentions of his boss?

The desire to be sure, to be protected, to find equanimity, to fulfill one's desires—in short, to be secure—is not the peculiar malaise of those who work for public authorities and draw their income from tax revenues. It is a basic human instinct so to organize one's life as to reduce to a minimum the conflicts, the stresses, the risks, the uncertainties that create threats or do harm to our mental, spiritual, or physical welfare. Indeed, we continually strive to organize ourselves so that life contributes positively to these needs. The only difference between the civil servant and the businessman in this respect is his standard of values—the goals he sets for himself and therefore the method necessary to achieve them. Both seek security in one form or another.

Security of tenure in the public service must be viewed in the context of this universal quest for security. If we narrow our application of the term to employment, the problem of security in the public service is seen to differ from that in private industry only in the need to deal with the peculiar threats to security in governmental organizations—principally the danger of making employment contingent upon factors other than the performance of the worker.

Meeting this danger was precisely the aim of the "security of tenure" espoused by the early civil service reformers and implied in the tradition of "merit system" laws. Its counterparts in private employment are such practices as an understanding between worker and owner in small organizations; closed shop or union shop clauses in union contracts; other negotiated agreements between management and labor; or even the social pressure on employers (especially in smaller communities) against capricious "firings." Its counterparts in general economic affairs are found in price supports on agricultural products, in the "fair rate of return" concept for public utility regulation, in various tax exemptions or adjustments geared to corporate health, and, anomalously, both in protective tariffs and in reciprocal trade agreements.

THE NATURE OF TENURE

Before discussing the effects of security of tenure in modern bureaucracy, it is well to review briefly what the so-called tenure provisions are like in the public service. A fair picture may be obtained by examining the federal situation, some of the larger and older state merit systems, and the teacher tenure laws.

A. Federal tenure

The emphasis in the federal merit system is much heavier on the selection process than on the dismissal process. The only provision of the federal Civil Service Act of January 16, 1883 relating to removals is the following injunction:

that no person in the public service is . . . under any obligations to contribute to any political fund, or to render any political service, and that he will not be removed or otherwise prejudiced for refusing to do so.¹

More detailed but still very broad is the basic removal provision of the Lloyd-La Follette Act of 1912,² which limits removals to causes that "promote the efficiency of the service" and requires reasons given in writing.

Executive Order 9830 and the Civil Service Regulations both stipulate a positive requirement that federal agencies shall remove, demote, or reassign to another position any employee in the competitive service whose conduct or capacity is such that his removal, demotion, or reassignment will promote the efficiency of the service.³

The regulation on removals goes on to require special notice of reasons and consideration of the employee's reply, as well as the following:

Discrimination shall not be exercised in removals, suspensions or demotions because of an employee's religious opinions or affiliations, or because of his marital status or race, except as may be required by law because of his political opinions or affiliations.⁴

The United States courts have, with minor exceptions, sustained the authority of the executive branch to remove career civil servants without judicial review.

Apart from the details of removal procedure and the stronger protection afforded veterans in the way of special appeal rights to the Civil Service Commission,⁵ the foregoing constitute the essence of tenure provisions in the federal civil service.

Additional light on the federal tenure situation is shed by data on removals and layoffs, or "reductions in force" as the latter are called in the federal service. During the fiscal year 1953⁶ there was an annual turnover of over 27 per cent (twenty-seven separations for every hundred persons in average full-time employment). Over 1 per cent of these separations were discharges for cause, and nearly 6 per cent were due to layoffs. The remainder were for the most part voluntary.⁷ This was a more or less typical year.

The discharge and layoff rates for this period, as well as the total turnover, were substantially higher (almost double) in manufacturing industries, which employ larger proportions of blue-collar workers. Although additional data does not seem to be available, there is every reason to believe that the difference (if there is any at all) would not be so marked between government and predominantly white-collar enterprises such as banks, utilities, insurance companies, and retail stores.

Any organization in which a fourth to a third of its employees change during a year and in which 7 per cent are involuntarily separated is hardly a stagnant one. This experience, along with the rather general and flexible provisions of federal law and regulation, indicates that many of the popular notions about the inviolability of the federal civil servant's retention in the government are invalid. At the same time, we would not advocate emulation of the extraordinarily high turnover rate in manufacturing industries (50 per cent last fiscal year), since it is unquestionably the reflection of many economic and management conditions other than efficiency.

In this connection it should be noted that only a small proportion of the federal service is not covered by some merit system. Out of 2,486,600 employees on June 30, 1953, there were 2,130,900 subject to the coverage of the competitive service under the Civil Service Act and another 105,300 under special merit systems such as those of the Tennessee Valley Authority, the Foreign Service, the Federal Bureau of Investigation, and the Department of Medicine and Surgery of the Veterans Administration. The great bulk of the remaining numbers are in such excepted assignments as overseas civilian jobs other than the Foreign Service and jobs of attorneys (the latter excepted by appropriation law riders). The "policy-determining and confidential" category, which is the principal locus of political appointment, numbers only in the hundreds.

B. State civil service tenure

Although veterans alone enjoy statutory appeal rights in the federal service, hearings are commonly provided by law for merit system employees in state jurisdictions who are threatened with dismissal. For example, among five of the states that have had strong and well-administered merit laws for almost as long a time as the federal government—New York, Massachusetts, Wisconsin, Illinois, and California—each one has in its basic statute a guarantee of a hearing before its civil service commission or board in the case of removals.

The basis for removal, however, is usually as broad in the states as it is in the federal civil service. The Massachusetts law carries the usual limitation of no removal of a career employee "except for just cause and for reasons specifically given him in writing."⁸ New York is somewhat more specific, defining the conditions of removal as "incompetency or misconduct.”⁹ Illinois has the most general provision, using only the phrase “except for cause” in its limitation on removal.¹⁰ Wisconsin elaborates to the extent of requiring “just cause, which shall not be religious or political.”¹¹ California’s law simply provides: “The tenure of every permanent employee holding a position is during good behavior.”¹² This statute and that of Massachusetts are the only ones among these five outstanding states that use the word “tenure.” The Massachusetts and New York provisions on removal extend to counties and cities in those states as well as to the respective state services.

It is evident from this significant sampling that any difficulty in separating inefficient employees from civil service jurisdictions is not likely to be due to the basic statutes establishing the principle of security of tenure for employees selected on merit. It is difficult to conceive how the laws might have been worded more broadly or have left more discretion to administrative authorities and still have provided some reasonable assurance that dismissals could not take place arbitrarily or for prejudicial or capricious reasons.

It should be borne in mind that only nineteen states have genuine state-wide merit systems functioning with some degree of effectiveness, although several others have limited or abortive laws on the books. All states, of course, have certain portions of their services covered by the merit principle as required by the grant-in-aid provisions of the national Social Security Act. As for the cities, two-thirds of those with over 10,000 population have merit systems, but only one-third of these cover all city employees. Only a small number of the 3,000 counties in the nation have merit systems.

Any unfavorable impressions of state and local governments and of their employees are more likely occasioned by the jurisdictions or parts of jurisdictions that are not under merit systems rather than by those that are.

C. Teacher tenure

An area of public service in which tenure has asserted itself strongly is in the public schools. Over the long road to recognition of their occupation as a profession, and as protection against favoritism and patronage, organized teachers have succeeded in promoting tenure laws in most states, many of them being very restrictive in the conditions under which termination of employment may occur.

In 1930 only five states had tenure laws of general application and seven had state or local laws in limited areas. By 1950 there were general state-wide tenure laws in thirty-three states, with five others having state or local laws of limited application.

Under most tenure laws a school board is required to consider the competence of teachers very carefully during a probationary period, usually three years in length, and to grant tenure status only where justified by their performance. The degree to which this probationary scrutiny is conscientiously handled by school administrators is the degree to which the restrictions on dismissals make sense. Loose entry via the probationary process makes a tight tenure law an anomaly by protecting the incompetent along with the competent.

Teacher tenure laws differ from general civil service laws principally in that their procedure on dismissal is more specific and usually more restrictive. The most common dismissal provision of civil service laws, as we have seen, is that the merit employee may not be removed without notice or for political or religious reasons, and that he is entitled to a hearing by the merit system agency. The National Education Association states as an essential of a good teacher tenure law, not only sufficient notice and a right to a hearing (commonly provided by regulation where not by statute so far as general public servants are concerned) but also, as the really distinguishing feature, “the right to appeal from the decision of the schoolboard to a tenure board, a higher educational authority, or the courts.”¹³

As a former school board member and as a citizen dealing with school boards, this writer is well aware of the hazards of leaving final dismissal authority in the hands of local school boards. The caliber of school board members in many jurisdictions leaves much to be desired. However, appeal to a higher level in the state school system should provide adequate recourse for the aggrieved teacher. Appeal to the courts is out of place in the making of such essentially administrative decisions as those affecting personnel, and it seems to me undesirable for a professional organization to be recommending it even as an alternative procedure.

On the whole, however, there is more similarity than difference between civil service and teacher tenure laws, so that for our purpose we probably do not need to make a sharp distinction in their effects.

THE EFFECTS OF TENURE

A. On turnover and removal

As implied by the opening discussion in this paper, there is a danger of over-emphasis on laws relating to tenure as compared with the realities of life. Many branches of private employment have a tenure system, formal or informal, of some kind. The point may be reinforced by the further observation that there are certain common elements affecting tenure in all employment that are more important in governing retention of employees than any arbitrary controls required by law or rule.

Layoffs

One of these natural factors affecting stability of any employment is the degree to which there are fluctuations or contractions in the activity concerned. Layoffs in the manufacturing industry are at a higher rate than those in the federal civil service, for example, because there is a higher proportion of blue-collar workers in this branch of industry than there is in the government. These craftsmen and laborers bear the brunt of industrial production shifts and technological changes.

There is a similar disparity in separations due to layoffs between the manufacturing industry and white-collar enterprises, such as insurance companies. Even within government, there are as sharp contrasts between different agencies or different activities within an agency as there are between certain kinds of government activity and certain kinds of business.

As a matter of fact, from the viewpoint of one inside the federal civil service, the difficulties faced because career employees have certain tenure rights do not loom nearly as large as the problem of instability due to frequent and significant changes in organization and program. The years since 1933 have not been quiet ones, and it is doubtful if there was as much normalcy as was commonly supposed in the “roaring” interval between World War I and the great depression. The morale-shattering effects of annual budget reviews and of appropriation cuts and threats of cuts come closer to creating administrative chaos than any other characteristic of the governmental process. It is amazing that so many civil servants maintain the equanimity that they do during the hectic spring and early summer of each year.

Dismissals for unsatisfactory performance

A second element of the employment situation common to most enterprises relates to dismissals for unsatisfactory performance or conduct. In practically all fields of work it is customary to expect summary action in the case of flagrant misconduct, such as drunkenness or theft. And this swift and definite action is just as likely in a governmental jurisdiction under a merit system as it is in private organizations or in public units not under a merit law.

The more usual phenomenon, however, is the similarity of action or inaction in cases where unsatisfactory performance is not dramatic or flagrant. There is a natural human reluctance to "fire" an employee, no matter what the enterprise or the degree of "tenure."

General statistics on "firings" in private business are not available, but there is every reason to believe that the 1.1 per cent annual proportion of separations for adverse cause in the federal service (20,299 in the fiscal year 1953)¹⁴ is probably exceeded only in certain categories of private employment such as manufacturing. Bear in mind, too, the more exacting methods of initial selection in public service, which should reduce expectancy for removal.

The popular notion that "civil service" rules mitigate seriously against dismissals of the incompetent in the government is one of the political myths of our time. The fact is that, where removals that should take place do not occur, the cause is primarily the same as that in business—the natural reluctance of supervisors and executives to take positive and drastic action, especially when there may be some dispute over its justification.

Firing is a very distasteful business in any organization. Even seasoned executives, with conspicuous exceptions to be sure, shrink from it and try every device possible to avoid it. It has been the author's experience that the public service has no monopoly on this reluctance. Such practices as "kicking a man upstairs," "palming off" a poor employee to another division, and overlooking the faults of a long-time worker are quite common in industry.

Reluctance to fire grows partially from unwillingness to hurt people severely for what may be easily rationalized as minor human failings, and partially from unwillingness to face up to the consequences of drastic action whether it be facing a protesting union official, an irate Congressman, or the requirements of a merit system.

In summary, the tenure features of most merit laws do not account for a lower layoff rate or for failure to eliminate unsatisfactory workers. Layoffs vary more as between occupations and activities than as between public service and private business as a whole. To whatever degree failure to "fire" exists, it is no different in government than in business and it springs from the same causes.

B. On employee behavior and performance

In addition to having little effect on turnover for overriding causes—such as removal for poor performance or reduction in appropriations—security of tenure has far less to do with other alleged negative attributes of "bureaucracy" than is commonly supposed. It has been widely assumed that protection against arbitrary dismissal breeds an attitude of indifference, with its attendant evils of timeserving, stifling of initiative, loafing, red tape, and uninquiring conformity.

This assumption deserves examination from two angles. The first is whether public employees, as a whole, exemplify these negative qualities in actual fact. The second is whether such conditions and attitudes, to whatever degree they do exist (no large organizations are without them to at least some minor extent), stem from the tenure aspects of civil service employment.

Facts about public employees

There is not space to include here a detailed analysis of the facts on the characteristics, behavior, and ability of public employees. These facts as far as the federal service is concerned may be readily gleaned from such documents as the United States Civil Service Commission publication, Facts About Government Work and Workers, April 1952; from the speeches and articles of Robert Ramspeck, former chairman of the Commission; and from the statement of the present chairman of the Commission, Philip Young, that "the people who work for government have even greater loyalty, more idealism, a stronger desire to get a job done and get it well done than employees of private industry."¹⁵ In fact, wherever comparisons are made—as in the case of scientific and professional awards, employee suggestion contests, and the testimony of prominent businessmen who have served in government—the public employee comes off best out of proportion to his numbers. We not only do not need to accept the prevailing myths that laziness and indifference are characteristic of public employment; we must do more positively to correct the erroneous impression about the civil service created by yellow journalism and political demagoguery.

Devastating, despairing, and ignorant criticism of public servants and of their effectiveness is in deadly contradiction to our vital need to attract and to hold outstanding qualified people in the public service. It has in it the germs of destruction of all government. No more subtle method of subversion exists and none plays more into the hands of the Communists than the recurrent campaigns of insidious, blanket derogation of public employees as a class. Nor is the situation helped by periodic forays into employee activities by demagogues, whether disguised in the name of national security or in the name of efficiency. It is high time that public servants were taken off the defensive and given recognition for their genuine achievements rather than notoriety for the misdeeds of a few. There will be problems of "bad apples" in every bureaucratic barrel, but civil servants and fair-minded citizens must join hands to combat the immoral and senseless mass-condemnation approach to the management problems of government. These problems not only are normal but are the same as those for all large organizations.

Tenure and inefficiency

There remains the question of whether such ineffectiveness as does exist (which is less in my judgment in government than in private employment) is due to the security aspects of civil service systems. On this point there are few facts to draw upon, so that we must rely more heavily on judgment.

The principal fact that is pertinent is this: if it is established that government workers are in truth at least as efficient and enterprising as those in other fields of endeavor, then we are more justified in crediting the merit system with that result than blaming it with the opposite. Furthermore, it goes without saying that where security of tenure does not exist—for example, in certain state and local jurisdictions—we see far more evidence of inefficiency, stagnation, and decrepitude than we do under merit systems.

The point to be made here is not that there is no room for improvement in the public service but that the problem is a matter of relativity. Personnel and management improvement needs are no greater in government than they are in business, in universities, or in other enterprises; perhaps not as great. We should continue to press for improvement in the public service above all places and to do it in part by positive recognition of the virtues of public service and public servants. In accepting the notion that security of tenure or any similar condition of employment breeds red tape or "bureaucratic" behavior, we are attributing a false charge to a wrong cause. Wherever there is bad management to overcome, poor practices to be corrected, or weak personnel to be disposed of, the conditions are more likely than not to have developed from human or organizational or fiscal frailties that are universal in our society and not peculiar to public organizations.

TENURE IN HIGHER POSTS

Tenure in the upper levels of the civil service cannot be disposed of in the same breath as that among the rank and file. Here we have some very special problems. When a career public servant reaches higher posts he is more likely to get public attention, to receive press notices, to be accepted as an "authority." When he works immediately under the political heads of his department, these conditions are accentuated and take on new meaning. It is difficult often to disassociate what the career man does and what he says from the "policy" of his chiefs. However, there appears to be general agreement that a career service worthy of the name must embrace positions of sufficiently high level to attract and hold men and women of high caliber, persons with the intelligence, the education, the imagination, and the other personal qualities that are essential to dynamic administration.

Since the opportunity for careers in the upper civil service is so much a part of the concept of tenure, it is worth some attention here. Although considerable question has been raised about the effects of the determination of the Eisenhower administration to make a clear distinction between career jobs and "policy-determining and confidential" jobs, not many will quarrel with the quantitative results per se. By the first of December 1953, less than eight hundred and fifty positions had been placed in the new Schedule C, exempt from the competitive examination and tenure provisions of the merit system.¹⁶ There is undoubtedly disagreement among impartial observers over the wisdom of exempting certain specific jobs, but these are details over which reasonable men may be expected to differ. The fact is that among the 827 jobs at that time placed in Schedule C only 216 had previously been in the competitive service and 176 were new jobs, the remainder having already been in excepted categories.

Policy determination as a criterion

A few observers, however, have expressed some doubt about the long-range utility of "policy determination" as the principal criterion for distinction between career and political posts. It has been suggested that degree of "public accountability" may afford a more practical concept, even though "policy determination" has been the traditional demarcation point in the reconciliation of the merit system idea with the need for responsiveness of the bureaucracy to the public will.

As the modern bureaucracy has expanded into new fields and drawn more and more upon specialized knowledge in the manning of its technical bureaus, it is more and more difficult to tell where policy leaves off and execution begins. The questions will always arise: what kind of policy—just that on public issues or also that on methods of administration? What level of policy—recommending, final decision-making, or something in between?

Some uses of the word "policy" in normal administrative practice would embrace the actions of minor employees, since decision-making of some order goes on at all levels in an organization. Coupled with this situation is the modern concept of delegation of authority, with its pressure, borrowed from the experience of private industry, to push decision-making as far down the line as possible. Does this open the door to an ever widening field for excepted jobs in our civil services and an ever narrowing area for the career service? Or does it merely show that our timeworn distinguishing concept will have to be sharpened or revised?

Interpreting "policy-determining" too narrowly would deprive political heads of the right to select immediate assistants and of the tools for control of the fact-gathering and law enforcement functions of the executive branch, leading to the danger of an entrenched bureaucracy unresponsive to the will of the people. Some students of public administration have long advocated a more generous allotment of exempt jobs to be put at the disposal of the heads of federal departments in order to avoid the onus of political involvement and responsibility infiltrating into the top of the career staffs.¹⁷

Interpreting "policy-determining" too broadly, however, can lead us into many areas where professional competence becomes at least as important as political sagacity. This creates the danger of adulterating the merit system or of requiring higher civil servants to be political eunuchs, either having no opinions or expressing none, which is stultifying to a good mind. Such a condition is not conducive to maintaining the kind of capacity, courage, and imagination that we need in the upper civil service.

Acts, not agreement, as the test

In any change in political leadership there will always be a few who mistakenly take the views or the alleged views of civil servants as the measure of their policy-determining responsibility. The answer to this is to put more emphasis on acts, not agreement. In fact, new political leadership might well encourage career employees to express themselves freely without fear of reprisal. After all, they may have been chafing under their previous leaders and may be bubbling over with ideas for reform.

There is ample authority to dismiss people who fail to implement policy decisions, whether for lack of sympathy or for incompetence. No subordinate can be expected always to "agree" with his bosses. And good bosses want and expect honest disagreement. Civil servants in particular have been in the habit of carrying out laws which in some instances they may find distasteful. If they can apply laws they object to, they can be expected to carry out the policies of the political heads of their departments, even if they object to those policies. Should there be evidence of failure in this regard, the remedy lies in removal of the individual for insubordination, not placement of his job in the political category.

Actually the policy differences between political leaders in the quasi-legislative decisions necessary to carry out most laws are often no greater between men of different parties than they are between men of the same party. There is some exaggeration in the classic commentary on the British civil servants that they serve a series of political ministers "with equal fidelity and equal contempt." But in this country there is more fidelity involved than is commonly recognized by the general public or by new political leaders.¹⁸

Mobility for career executives

A problem subsidiary to this general issue is that of reconciliation of the career concept for higher civil service posts with the desirability of matching personalities and so placing career men in juxtaposition to political heads as to facilitate happy personal relationships.

¹⁸ The following comments on the British situation by Sir Ernest Gowers, one of Britain's distinguished career civil servants, are illuminating:

If a civil servant "thinks that a proposal by his Minister is misconceived, it is his duty to say so, and why. But if he is overruled it is his duty to devise workable means of carrying it out, and he may find a craftsman's pleasure in doing so.

"Nor are civil servants often tried in this way.

"The few issues on which party feeling runs high assume at election time an importance altogether disproportionate to their bulk in the administrative routine which is the daily task of the civil servant. Of the multitude of decisions that have to be taken every day in every department, the vast majority would be decided the same way whatever party was in power."—Government Standard (American Federation of Government Employees, Washington, D. C.), October 16, 1953, p. 3.

The solution to this in the federal government seems to me to lie in greater mobility of executives in the career service. This might well be achieved by borrowing some features of the system used in assigning, compensating, and advancing military officers. If men now in the three or four highest civil service grades did not have their rank and status so tied down to an individual assignment and if it were part of the pattern for them to be moved about from one executive position to another from time to time without loss of rank, it would not only provide the government with broader-gauged executives and reduce the risks currently involved in movement from agency to agency, but would also provide the machinery that would facilitate reshuffling of executives where necessary at times of change in administration. Such a plan would obviously entail some kind of pool or corps concept. Career people above a certain level would be placed in a special category automatically, or selectively as the result of meeting certain criteria as to training and personal qualifications. They would be compensated on the basis of rank rather than current duties, available for reassignment where needed, and protected from loss of job or status under the vicissitudes of program or organization and under changes in political leadership.¹⁹

This is not the place to elaborate on the details, but the idea has interesting possibilities in providing a way to preserve tenure at high levels and yet make available to agency heads a more flexible means of utilization of career-executive manpower.

¹⁹ See, for example, the plans proposed in John J. Corson, Executives for the Federal Service (New York: Columbia University Press, 1952), pp. 78-85; and G. Lyle Belsley, Federal Personnel Management and the Transition (Chicago: Public Administration Clearing House, 1953), pp. 36-45.

CONCLUSION

If there are some basic observations to be gleaned from this paper, they are probably these:

1. Security is a condition sought after not only in all employment but in all aspects of life.

2. The tenure features implicit in merit systems in the public service are not so overprotective and restrictive as is popularly assumed.

3. Teacher tenure may be viewed as overprotective only to the extent that it promotes judicial review of what should be purely administrative determinations.

4. Turnover in the public service is affected more by the nature of the work and the fluctuations in appropriation, organization, and program than by tenure.

5. Removal of inefficient employees in the public service takes place at a reasonable rate but is affected by natural, human reluctance to "fire," just as in private employment.

6. Popular notions that deprecate public employees are not based on fact. Poor performance on the part of some cannot ordinarily be traced to security of tenure under merit systems but is more likely to be found outside merit system coverage.

7. The problems and deficiencies of the public service are basically no different from those in the management of all enterprise—public or private—and they are certainly no worse, if as bad.

8. Tenure in higher civil service posts should not be treated too lightly for the long-range good of public administration, but some easing of the problem of balancing career service requisites in the federal government with political responsibility would be provided by the "executive pool" idea, which also has several other virtues to recommend it as a forward step in government management.

SUGGESTIONS FOR IMPROVEMENT

A few additional points deserve attention in closing.

1. The public service at all levels could be improved and the strains on and doubts about merit system tenure greatly relieved if there were a stricter use of the probationary period in initial employment. This is the point where "reluctance to fire" should be most abhorred. It is the continuation of incompetency beyond the trial period that makes it harder and harder as time goes on for an administrator to bring himself to the unhappy effort of dismissal of an inefficient subordinate.

2. Criteria for removal of the genuinely incompetent would be clearer if there were less emphasis on so-called ratings of performance and more on requiring a certain minimum productivity and quality of work, commonly referred to as performance standards. The comparison of man to man bred by the rating concept (both in government and in industry) has probably led to more evil than good. Good management would be better fostered by examination of work goals and more research on optimum productivity.

3. Perhaps the most important element in assuring good administration, apart from initial selection of able people, is the climate of the management itself. Lack of a good program for selecting and training supervisors, absence of interest by top management in progressive methods and in adequate staff services, overcentralization of authority, lack of concern with human relations, just plain incompetent top management—these are more likely to produce indifference and "bureaucratic" behavior on the part of employees of any organization than is any overdeveloped sense of security created by tenure. In fact, such conditions cause poor administration precisely because they contribute to employee insecurity, using the term in the psychological sense.

With increasing consciousness in government that there is a body of knowledge and a set of aptitudes and skills that contribute to good management, we need have no fears for the future of public administration. The dangers to maintaining an efficient and responsible bureaucracy will lie in acceptance of quack nostrums or glib panaceas and in misguided attacks on the career concept cloaked under the guise of fostering efficiency or democracy. The vision of the founders of our merit systems has proved to be practical; their concept of the career public servant is still sound.

Administrative Law and Bureaucracy

By MARSHALL E. DIMOCK

THE relationship we are about to consider deals with matters of high policy arising on the borderline between business and government, and as such it deserves to be treated as objectively and as realistically as possible. Administrative law, now a large and important field of study, is best known for its concern with problems of public control, such as the regulation of labor relations or of electrical utilities. When the subject of public control arises in any discussion, the two questions that most frequently appear are, first, whether to control at all and, second, whether to control primarily through administrative tribunals or through the regular courts of law. Further, those who oppose control at all or the method of achieving it frequently use the word "bureaucracy" as a term of general condemnation.¹

This double usage of the term bureaucracy makes it a difficult theme to deal with in the present context, for if we were to consider public control as a policy, the discussion would be endless.

¹ The relation between administrative law and bureaucracy has frequently been commented on, but never, so far as I know, has it been consistently developed. According to James M. Landis in his book, The Administrative Process (New Haven, 1938, p. 4), to the English mind, the term administrative law "bespeaks bureaucracy." More intemperately, J. O. Boyd, in an article entitled "The Court System Contrasted with the Bureau System" (5 Iowa Bar Rev. 25, 28-29 [1938-39]), has said that "government by bureaucracies has all of the weaknesses of autocracy and few of its advantages. Continued growth of bureaucracy will mean the doom of democracy, the destruction of all progress, the complete bankruptcy of free government, and eventually will lead to fascism or some form of totalitarianism."

Because of this practical limitation, therefore, and because bureaucracy is more often associated with method rather than with policy, the present discussion will be confined largely to method rather than to the substance of controversial policies. To me, bureaucracy, in the popular sense, means a formal, rule-ridden procedure which interferes with managerial freedoms and individual initiative. The question, therefore, is whether administrative law, which protects as well as regulates, necessarily has a seriously deleterious effect on the efficiency of administration, the accomplishment of social purposes, and the safeguarding and reconciliation of conflicting interests. But even when so narrowed, the question is much too vast to be dealt with briefly; hence we shall do well if we merely open it up and focus on some of the issues involved.

BROAD AND NARROW VIEWS

In attempting to clarify our thinking in this controversial field, the first point to catch hold of is that administrative law, both historically and currently viewed, is more than the public control of important segments of the economy. Administrative law is concerned with individual rights as well as with public duties, with the nonregulatory programs of government as well as the regulatory, and with departments and bureaus as well as with regulatory commissions. Administrative law relates to the executive-administrative branch of government as a whole, where 95 per cent of government's civilian personnel is employed and where the citizen makes most of his firsthand contacts with government.

Administrative law is that body of decisions, rules, and regulations emanating from all three branches of government and from the Constitution itself and dealing with the powers and organization of the executive-administrative services of government, the procedural rules to be followed, and the rights and duties of the individual in his official dealings with these public agencies.

The administrative tribunals (the so-called fourth branch) are important, to be sure, principally because so much of public control legislation is vested in them, but it is all too easy to overemphasize their importance in relation to the whole of governmental administration. These regulatory tribunals are found at both the federal and the state levels and frequently they deal with concurrent problems, such as public utilities or industrial relations. The Hoover Commission reported in 1949 that for the federal government alone there were nine major commissions, employing about 12,000 persons, and costing some fifty-seven million dollars annually; further, these agencies in the fourth branch of government deal with a vast segment of the national economy, including labor, transportation, communications, electrical power, securities, and trade practices. But if anyone is inclined to think that these nine major regulatory commissions constitute the bulk of the problem, as far as administrative law is concerned, he need only look at the Final Report of the Attorney General's Committee on Administrative Procedure (1941) to learn that the regular departments of government annually dispense far more "administrative justice" than all the administrative tribunals combined. Examples are the Bureau of Internal Revenue in the Department of the Treasury, Immigration and Naturalization Service in the Department of Justice, the Bureau of Animal Industry in the Department of Agriculture, the Civil Aeronautics Administration in the Department of Commerce, the Wage and Hour and Public Contracts Divisions in the Department of Labor, the Bureau of Management in the Department of the Interior, or the Passport Division in the Department of State.

All of these programs have certain things in common: their administrators are empowered to adjudicate in individual cases; they exercise the delegated power to legislate by rules and regulations; and they have varying degrees of power to review their own primary determinations or to have them considered by courts of law. These, then, are three of the chief reasons why the relationship here being considered has come to occupy the importance in the public mind that it now enjoys.

Administrators help make law

The executive-administrative agencies of government not only execute the law, they also help to make it, which is an additional reason for the importance of administrative law and the complaint against bureaucracy in this area. Administrators help to make the law when they advise interest groups and legislatures, when they draft bills for consideration by the legislature, when they determine policies needed to give effect to major policies determined by the legislature, when they issue rules and establish standards that must be followed quite as much as the statutes themselves, when they promulgate policies and give meaning to ambiguous words in the process of applying general laws to specific situations, when they formulate procedural rules and review procedures that may be as important as the substantive provisions themselves, and when they hold hearings, either formal or informal, and hand down decisions that are binding unless upset by the courts. So regarded—and this has long been true in both the United States and Great Britain—more law, quantitatively speaking, is made by the administrative branch than by the legislatures and the courts combined.

There are, then, three good reasons why bureaucracy has rapidly surged to the forefront of men's consideration in the area we are discussing: first, government is now active in many fields, and this complexity is mirrored in public organization and in budgets; second, the growth of administrative tribunals has been rapid since the Interstate Commerce Commission was created in 1887; and third, administrative action often impinges upon the other two branches, requiring a redefinition of function that disturbs the traditional.

THE UNDERLYING PARADOX

Much of the complaint against bureaucracy is due to a failure to differentiate clearly between the control and the protective aspects of administrative law, because, as has already been said, while administrative law attempts to safeguard and promote the public interest through control procedures when monopoly, situations of social conflict, or similar issues are involved, it also protects the individual in his substantive and procedural rights in his dealings with the government. Hence the paradox: if we attack all of administrative law on the ground that it is burdensomely bureaucratic, when we seek to curtail government's activities in our own group interest, we risk the danger of weakening the protection of individual rights. Under modern conditions, administrative agencies no less than the courts must be relied upon for both public control and the safeguarding of individual rights.

A close look at administrative law shows that the three large areas which the citizen is especially concerned with are the powers, the procedures, and the protections that operate when administrative agencies touch private interests. The powers stem from constitutional provisions, legislative statutes, the rules made by administrative agencies and having legal effect, the decisions of these agencies having legal force, and court decisions relating to the whole of this matter. The procedures are the rules that must be followed either because the Constitution, a legislative statute, the precedents of the courts, or the decisions of the administrative agencies require it. Procedures also include the practices that are customary in the agency, even though no rules require them; actually such nonformalized proceedings are more numerous than the formal rules, constituting a safeguard against red tape and formalism. Finally, the protections are the provisions of constitutions, statutes, decided cases, or the rules of the agencies themselves that guarantee the citizen due process of law, a hearing in eminent domain proceedings, and the like, plus the remedies provided by the courts to afford the citizen legal relief. These remedies are the means by which a case gets into court or before a higher reviewing authority of administration or before the administrative agency itself, in order to secure relief when an individual's rights are invaded.

If we were to clear away the paradox and think clearly about what is involved in each of these three areas of citizen interest, it seems obvious that we should have to invent a term more descriptive than the catchall, bureaucracy.

Powers

When the effect of extended power is to limit the freedom of groups and to threaten their financial or other substantive interests, the resulting dissatisfaction is vented not only against the policy itself but also against the symbol which is the vehicle for the policy. And hence without necessarily attempting to deceive the public, the tactic of those who resist new authority is to belittle the instrument as the visible embodiment of the obnoxious policy. Similarly, when individuals and groups support an attempted extension of power, because they believe that either they personally or the country as a whole will benefit in consequence thereof, they attach a favorable connotation to the symbol which they hope will advance the interests they wish to further. Thus the same person may regard the same symbol as "good" or "bad" according to the effect it has on his interests.

Procedure

Considerations respecting administrative procedure are a little more complicated but no less realistic and bitterly fought over. The paradox is this: to make a procedure more complicated and rule-ridden will doubtless create more red tape and slow down the particular administrative process; this is manifestly bad if one opposes bureaucracy on general principle, but it is not necessarily bad, or at least is not thought to be bad as a temporary expedient, if the effect is also to pull some of the teeth from a law that is adversely affecting one's interest. Hence, under the guise of remolding administrative procedure in order to bring it more nearly in line with that of courts of law, there sometimes lurks a desire actually to increase red tape and bureaucracy in order to derive some immediate benefit therefrom. Red tape and bureaucracy may be and often are violently objected to in political polemic but they are nonetheless often consciously or unconsciously favored in significant areas of public control in the expectation that dissatisfaction with the administrative process may eventually undermine respect for and confidence in a particular policy that an agency is attempting to administer but which is opposed by a certain interest or group. Hence the paradox: bureaucracy in the sense of red tape, cumbersomeness, and delay is actually encouraged in some instances because that tactic is considered one of the surest ways of preventing certain policies from becoming law. In other words, those who talk most loudly about the evils of bureaucracy sometimes find themselves encouraging the very thing they claim most heartily to dislike.

Protections

About the third area of our investigation—the legal remedies available to the citizen—much has been written but little need be said here to point up the issues of public policy involved in the relation of bureaucracy and administrative law. No one with democratic inclinations will doubt that, consistent with safeguarding the reciprocal interests of society itself, individual rights should be surrounded with all possible safeguards for justice and equal treatment. Our American form of government is rightly praised because through written provision and by court decision it does this so well. Over against this socially desirable objective, however, stands the fact that long-drawn-out legal proceedings, often involving large expenditures of time and money, themselves contribute to this thing the public calls bureaucracy, namely, protracted, highly legalized, formal proceedings. Whether it be a public utility case starting with a state regulatory commission, being heard over a period of many months and involving issues that may bring the case to the state and federal courts and even to the Supreme Court of the United States, or whether it be a labor case starting with a hearing before a hearing officer, involving the taking of evidence, later proceeding to a national board sitting very much like a court of law, and eventually for final decision continuing through the hierarchy of courts already mentioned, the inescapable fact is that all the trappings of bureaucracy are present. There is hierarchy, professionalization, specialization, the recruitment of skilled personnel, a plethora of complicated rules and procedures, and protracted administrative and legal proceedings in which only the initiated of the legal fraternity can hope to have a chance of succeeding.

But what is the alternative? Surely not arbitrary action. This suggests that bureaucracy (meaning in this connection, formalized procedures) may be a price we may have to pay over an extended period of time for the safeguarding of group and individual interests. Under such circumstances the constructive policy would seem to be to improve internal procedures by humanizing and accelerating them, not by creating an atmosphere in which the opposite set of conditions will prevail.

THE BALANCING OF INTERESTS

In all three types of situation, therefore—in the struggle over power and its limits, in the rules of procedure devised to assure fairness, and in the remedies provided the citizen and his interest group to secure the full protection of substantive rights—there is inevitably involved a balancing of interests and requirements. In one set of scales private interest is weighed against the public interest. In another, sufficient procedural thoroughness and decorum to assure the individual his just deserts must be set against the need for administrative dispatch, lest the whole machinery of government break down of its own weight or stagger to a virtual halt.

Only by such a balancing of interests, moreover, does it seem possible to accomplish the things free governments are intent on doing. If governments did not regulate, some other method of settling conflicting interests and keeping special privilege in check would have to be substituted—for example, to deal with public utility enterprises. The alternatives are not numerous and they are surrounded with difficulties that to most people make them less acceptable than regulation, with all its faults. One alternative is arbitrary action, which is not to be considered. Another is to allow power groups to hold sway without hindrance, but this would prove as objectionable, judged by experience, as too much arbitrary power on the part of government. Still a third possibility is to vest the power formerly exercised by voluntary associations in the government itself, substituting public management for private management; but in addition to objections so well known as to require no repetition, this course would still further add to the bureaucratic difficulties of government and effect the opposite of the formula we are seeking.

It may be concluded, therefore, that there are areas of public policy in which major regulation seems to be the only method compatible with our democratic notions of government and of political economy. Hence there is no escaping the problem of trying to mitigate the difficulties inherent in the regulatory approach.

That much can be done along this line is hardly to be doubted. Experience shows, for example, that most of the proceedings before administrative agencies, where opposing interests are weighed and decided, may be and are in fact disposed of through informal proceedings rather than through formal ones, thus reducing the bureaucratic factors inherent in the administrative process.² Informal proceedings economize time, create an atmosphere of compromise, and save the money of governments and of individuals. Were it not for the fact that nine-tenths of all problems coming before public agencies can be disposed of by this informal method, with equal satisfaction to the private interests concerned, the machinery of government would almost certainly break down and our whole society would become so bureaucratized as to approach a state of rigor mortis.

To paraphrase the words of Walter Gellhorn in his Johns Hopkins lectures, the only hope of making major regulation work and of avoiding an excess of bureaucracy is to assure a cheap and speedy forum through informal administrative proceedings to those whose circumstances and immediate needs might be ill-served by extensive litigation of the traditional type.³ If the members of the legal profession were to insist upon formal proceedings in every case, thinking perhaps that this would increase their collective employment opportunities, the unwanted consequence might well be the breakdown of regulation and the substitution of large draughts of public ownership.

MANAGERIAL CONSIDERATIONS

It will also take a great deal of forbearance and understanding on the part of the legal profession if the administrative process is to be kept intact instead of being cut up into little pieces and rendered ineffectual. This issue is at the heart of the proposal that regulatory tribunals be deprived of all so-called administrative functions and that their role be confined to hearing and deciding cases. Here the analogy to courts of law on the one hand and to the operation of routine government departments on the other is almost certainly wrong.

Dean Landis has grasped this constructive concept of what the administrative process ought to accomplish in major areas of regulation such as utilities, securities, and labor relations. The administrative process, says Landis, is not simply an extension of executive power. It is more. It is the grant of all that full ambit of authority needed to plan, to promote, and to police—it is a rounded, statesmanlike view.⁴ Whether all administrative tribunals are actually succeeding in doing all the things that Dean Landis says they ought to do is, of course, an open question, and this subject urgently needs study. But that such tribunals should try to take a statesmanlike view of their functions seems clear beyond a doubt, and also that they are more likely to succeed if their functions are integrated rather than dispersed.

Gellhorn reminds us that procedural forms are not fetishes, they are merely means to an end; that no matter how embroidered the procedure may become, "qualified administrators must remain the very heart of the administrative process."⁵ Only as lawyers learn to respect the special skills of administrators, he concludes, is the administrative process likely to improve, for then the responsibility for producing results will be placed where it belongs. It is refreshing to hear a lawyer say:

⁵ Gellhorn, op. cit., p. 65.

There is no reason to suppose that public administration through official agencies is incapable of developing professional traditions and standards comparable to those developed by public administration through the courts.⁶

The main reason so many cases before administrative agencies can be settled by informal proceedings instead of by formal hearing is that administrators are steeped in their subject matter and often develop a kind of sixth sense enabling them to go to the heart of matters with speed and expertness.

What has been said about the need of due attention to managerial considerations in the administrative process applies equally to the forbearance and understanding that regulators should exercise in their dealings with the regulated. If more were known about considerations of public policy and the requirements of good administration in the various areas of public control where major regulation is involved, it would be possible to draw a firmer line of demarcation between what public authority should and should not interfere with in the internal management of concerns being regulated. All too often the pragmatic test is overlooked and regulation is judged by its extensiveness and its weight rather than by its practical results for public interest and public policy. As regulatory agencies become old and bureaucratized, we shall do well to remember the pragmatic test advanced by Gellhorn: "New agencies have been created or old ones expanded not to satisfy an abstract governmental theory, but to cope with problems of recognized public concern."⁷

In the last analysis, much depends on whether administration is heavy-handed and burdensomely bureaucratic or whether it is flexible and imaginative. Conditions of size and complexity create the conditions in which bureaucracy in its objectionable guises is likely to be found. On the other hand, if those who are responsible for administrative policy are sufficiently aware of these dangers and do enough to counteract them, administration can be kept democratic and responsive.

RECENT DEVELOPMENTS

With these considerations in mind, a wary eye should be focused on the developments of recent years when acts of so-called administrative procedure have been widely adopted in federal and state governments. The warnings found in the concluding chapter of Ferrel Heady's study of state experience should be noted. Statutes, says Heady, can set minimum standards which must be observed, thus making a kind of negative contribution to the improvement of regulatory procedure; nevertheless, legislation cannot provide a positive incentive for continual improvement in procedure. Such incentive must come from agency initiative, aided by advice and encouragement from the outside.⁸

This is good counsel. As we have seen, it is the procedural requirements of administrative law that give rise to the greatest dangers of bureaucratization. If we are to solve the dilemma of making democratic administration sufficiently effective to satisfy public aspiration and at the same time reasonably free from red tape, formalized procedure, costliness, and delay—all associated with bureaucracy in the public mind—we must either prevent the legal profession from dominating the administrative process or educate it to a better understanding of what is involved in the workaday aspects of practical administration and the higher ranges of public policy. The latter seems the more worthwhile effort.

Lessons from Recent European Experience

By TAYLOR COLE

SINCE the outbreak of World War II American influences have been felt in the organization and functioning of the bureaucracies of European states. Some of these influences have been the results of efforts of American officials abroad, notably those stationed in the occupied countries; others have come from American research and writing in the field of public personnel administration which have become better known abroad through the postwar visitation and educational programs sponsored by public and private agencies in the United States; and still others have been a by-product of the joint experiences in international agencies in which the United States has been represented. At the same time developments in European countries have been given serious attention in the United States. It is these developments, confined to the experiences of Britain, Western Germany, France, and Italy, with which this paper will deal.

By way of definition, we shall speak of bureaucracy as the whole body of civil servants and other public employees of a government and shall assume that a fully developed bureaucracy possesses certain known functional and behavioral characteristics.¹ In this connection European literature presents some of the same definitions and characterizations as are found in writing in the United States. The term "bureaucracy" often carries with it in Britain the invidious connotations which are associated with it in much of the American literature. Whether in Harold Laski's reference to it as a "system of government, the control of which is so completely in the hands of officials that their power jeopardizes the liberty of ordinary citizens," or Lord Hewart's conception of it as administrative lawlessness, or J. Ramsay Muir's emphasis upon "uncontrolled officialism," bureaucracy in Britain has often signified either services inefficiently performed, or not performed at all, or performed in such a way as to endanger individual liberties. Though bureaucracy has carried similar connotations in other European states,² different parentage can also be claimed for the term on the Continent. Max Weber's analysis of Bureaukratie furnished a conceptual approach which has had wide influence not alone in Germany. Indeed, Weber has been credited with being "the founder of the systematic study of bureaucracy." The International Political Science Association introduced its three-day session on bureaucracy in Paris during the summer of 1953 with discussions of Max Weber and Robert Michels which would have been approved by those responsible for the selection and ordering of the materials in the American compilation, Reader in Bureaucracy.³ Burocrazia, a monthly journal in Italy devoted to a study of problems of public employment in Italy and abroad, refers to the "reform of the bureaucracy" in the sense of the reform of the administration. In short, any examination of the European literature on bureaucracy must be done with an eye to the semantic difficulties.

European and American differences

Mention should also be made of certain differences between the European and American bureaucracies, for these have considerable bearing on the "relevance of foreign experience."⁴ In the first place political patronage is still much more limited in Europe than in the United States. The requirements of the Pendleton Act that examinations be "practical in their character" have been broadly interpreted in the United States in recent years, but there is less emphasis upon the general cultural examination than in Britain. The European conception of the public service as a distinctive career gives the bureaucracies a more closed character than in the United States.⁵ The tie-up between the educational institutions and the public services, evidenced in the requirements for entry into these services, is much closer in Europe than in the United States. Furthermore the maximum age limit for entry into the public service in Europe is normally lower than in this country. Such differences, when considered in the light of their historical explanations, cannot be ignored.

WARTIME TRENDS AND PROBLEMS

During wartime the differences between all bureaucracies are minimized by emergency pressures. In this connection Leonard D. White some years ago commented as follows:

The behavior of any public service is remarkably similar under emergency conditions. . . . The peacetime forms of all great public services are fundamentally alike, and it is not surprising that under similar conditions of stress and strain their adaptations should resemble one another.⁶

The crisis situation in the European states, as in the United States, was characterized by the overriding considerations of urgency and emergency demands; by the factor of scarcity and the necessity to seek an increasing number of skilled persons in a contracting labor market; and by the factor of expansion which was a resultant of the needs of the military machine. The consequences of the operation of these factors were several. There was a dilution of the bureaucracies by partially trained and untrained personnel. The sharp competition for manpower which developed continued after the end of hostilities. The need for speedy action favored those who could secure results, often at the expense of orderly procedures. The net result was a general deterioration of standards and a decline in the quality of individual performance, whether in Fascist Italy, France, or Britain.

The wartime necessities focused attention sharply upon new types of public employees in the public services. The most conspicuous were the rapidly expanded groups of professional and scientific employees—the chemists, engineers, statisticians, lawyers, and doctors. In Britain, as a result of the conditions which were criticized by the Barlow Committee in 1943, the Scientific Civil Service was the subject of a special report in 1945.⁷ Its recommendations, followed by a reorganization, were based upon a recognition of the role of the Scientific Service and of the necessity for improving the methods of recruitment and the conditions of employment. The problems raised by the professional and technical classes and their relationships to the administrative class for salary purposes were given attention in the Report of the Committee on Higher Civil Service Remuneration in 1949.⁸ New agencies such as the Department of Scientific and Industrial Research attest to the administrative arrangements devised to handle some of the scientific work in Britain. In 1949 there were, according to one estimate, some 47,663 civil servants who held professional, technical, and scientific classifications, a figure which represented a great increase over the prewar number.⁹

A second conspicuous type of new public employee has been the employee of the public corporation, the nationalized industry, the government monopoly, and the myriad of other public and quasi-public enterprises which have been instituted or expanded in recent years. Generalizations which would apply beyond national boundaries are difficult to make, but there is agreement that the existence of many of these enterprises has shifted some of the conflicts between the interests of the consumer and those of the proprietor or shareholder to conflicts between the interests of the consumer and those of the employees.¹⁰ Many of these employees are united in trade union organizations which include important percentages of the lower paid and unskilled workers of the regular governmental departments and which are able to exert considerable economic and political pressure. While the employer-employee relationships of these enterprises are normally governed by the same laws and regulations which apply to private industry, there has been a noticeable tendency in certain countries for these public employees to demand more and more of the rights and privileges of civil servants. The result is the emergence of new categories of public-legal relationships occupying a twilight zone between those of the government with private citizens, on the one hand, and those of the government with legally recognized civil servants, on the other hand.

POSTWAR LEGISLATION

In France, many years of discussion of a civil servant statut, spearheaded by the agitation of the civil servant associations, finally had their sequel in the enactment of the Law on Civil Servants of 1946. Western Germany, despite strong pressure from the occupying authorities to make a break with the past in many significant respects, relied heavily on her past experience in enacting the controversial National Civil Service Law of 1953. The traditional character of the German legislation, passed eight years after the Nazi military collapse, contrasts with the more pioneering character of the French legislation, which was passed during the early period after the end of hostilities. Serious discussion of civil service legislation has taken place in Italy, though it is doubtful if present party alignments will permit any substantial changes via the medium of a comprehensive statute on the impiegato pubblico. But all of the continental countries, in contrast with Britain, have felt the impacts of the traditional and the current pressures for new civil service legislation.

New administrative adjustments to provide greater uniformity and co-ordination, especially in recruitment, have been made. Although none of the four states here under review has followed American precedent in establishing an agency comparable in functions to our United States Civil Service Commission, the Civil Service Office directly under the Prime Minister in France and the Personnel Committee in Western Germany are examples of new agencies at the center with certain general jurisdiction. Despite some counter moves, the extension of Treasury control has continued in Britain.¹¹ The Office for Reform, under the Presidency of the Council of Ministers in Italy, has been primarily a research agency to the present, but it could be endowed with the power to implement some of its recommendations. In contrast to the trend in the United States, where certain of the traditional functions of the Civil Service Commission have within recent years been delegated to the departments, the trend in Europe has been towards more unified control by some organ or organs at the center. One objective has been to provide the greater uniformity by reducing the amount of departmental freewheeling. At the same time there appears little evidence that the constitutional injunctions in both France and Italy to provide some form of federal or regional decentralization will be implemented in any serious fashion. Nor have the related efforts toward what the Italians call bureaucratic decentralization been more fruitful. In short, the controls of the bureaucracies still run directly from Paris and Rome.

Limited foreign influence

On the enactment of this new legislation and the establishment of these administrative organs foreign influences have played only a limited role.¹² Allied pressures in postwar Italy were largely directed toward the purge from the public service rolls of those tainted with fascism or collaboration with the enemy. A casual comparison of the seniority rolls of several Italian ministries in 1943 and 1948 will indicate the limited extent of the purge, which began in 1944 and practically ceased with the legislative decree of February 7, 1948, which provided for the dropping of all proceedings against accused persons below a certain rank. No attempt was made to interfere with the continued application of the two most basic decrees dealing with the bureaucracy, No. 2395 of November 11, 1923, on the "hierarchical organization of the state administrations" and No. 2960 of December 30, 1923, covering such matters as appointments, promotions, disciplinary punishments, etc. Both decrees, it is to be noted, date from the early days of the Fascist regime and were based upon a broad delegation of legislative powers in December 1922 to the Mussolini government.

More direct pressure was brought in Germany to denazify and democratize the bureaucracy. But in the end, according to Arnold Brecht, only a few more than one thousand of the approximately fifty-three thousand civil servants removed or suspended in Western Germany because of former Nazi affiliations were finally excluded by judicial action. The Reinstatement Act of May

11, 1951, enacted to carry out the broad objectives of Article 131 of the Basic Law, has incidentally served to facilitate this process of reinstatement of former Nazis. Some faint reminders of the demands of occupation officials for legislative guarantees can be seen in those provisions of the Act of 1953 dealing with the Personnel Committee and those requiring officials to show continued evidences of loyalty to the Federal Republic. But with the exception of these and sundry other minor changes, the National Civil Service Law of 1953 is in the main a re-enactment of the provisions of the National Civil Service Code of 1937 with the specific Nazi features of the code carefully eliminated.

The lesson from this experience is that these reforms in the bureaucracies of European countries must come primarily from within, particularly in the case of countries which have suffered defeat and foreign occupation. Indeed, the chief contribution of the Allied occupation authorities to these reforms may have been their removal of certain of the impediments to the expression of the latent democratic forces in both countries.

POLITICAL RIGHTS OF CIVIL SERVANTS

The continuing controversy regarding the political rights which should be accorded civil servants has brought out sharply conflicting arguments. On the one hand, there is the traditional case for according to civil servants the same rights possessed by ordinary citizens of voting, of political activity, of candidacy for public office, and of holding parliamentary seats without loss of civil service status. The central principle, strongly defended by most civil servants, is that they are entitled as citizens to the same rights as any other persons, and that they constitute an important and informed segment of the electorate which should be "represented" at the polls, in political party gatherings, and, above all, in the legislative chambers. To quote the Masterman Committee in Britain, it is desirable in a democratic society "for all citizens to have a voice in the affairs of State and for as many as possible to play an active part in public life." On the other hand, there is the contention that the civil servants occupy a special position in the state which requires and justifies limitations on their political rights; otherwise there would be grave dangers from the organized pressures of a special interest group or caste, and the "neutrality" or "impartiality" of the civil servant would be jeopardized under a system where he could be at one and the same time voter, party activist, administrator, and legislator. There is nothing new in these arguments, except possibly the intensity of the clash of points of view in the postwar period and the novelty of certain solutions which have been recommended.

Two illustrations, centered on the crucial differences regarding the civil servant's right of candidacy for parliamentary office and the right to sit in the national parliament after election, will suffice.

Great Britain

In Great Britain, nonindustrial civil servants had not been permitted since 1927 to become candidates for Parliament. Industrial civil servants, at least in certain departments, were free to accept candidacy. In June 1949, the government published with approval the report of the Masterman Committee¹³ which recommended the division of the civil servants into two groups, the one to be composed of grades which would not be subject to any restraints on their political activities and the other to be composed of grades which would be subject to certain restraints. Parliamentary candidature was one of the types of political activities to be restrained. "The effect of this proposal," it was officially concluded, "was to give complete freedom to some 650,000" of the approximately one million civil servants, or "450,000 more than previously." These recommendations were later subjected to the scrutiny and criticism of a committee of the National Whitley Council, before which the differences between the Staff Side and the Official Side were presented and partially reconciled. The recommendations of this committee were to divide the nonindustrial civil servants into three categories. In effect, these recommendations, as they are being implemented by the government, will provide an intermediate category between the completely free and the restricted ones, as proposed by the Masterman Committee. The effects of this future governmental action have been summarized as follows:

When these present decisions are put into effect the position will be that, out of a Civil Service of some 1,000,000 individuals, about 62 per cent will be completely free; something like another 22 per cent will, subject to the acceptance of the need for discretion, be free to take part in all activities except Parliamentary candidature; while only some 16 per cent will be barred from taking part in national political activities. . . .¹⁴

Federal Republic of Germany

The Federal Republic of Germany provides a somewhat different type of case history. In the face of the precedents provided by certain provisions of the Weimar Constitution, Allied occupation officials either prohibited or placed restrictions on the right of civil servants to serve in legislative bodies. The position of the United States and British Military Governments was reflected in Article 26 of the Bizonal Law No. 15 of February 23, 1949, which provided:

An official may not be a candidate for election to public office or engage in public political activities in support of a particular party or political program. An official shall resign his employment before accepting nomination as a candidate in an election to a legislative body.

The period between the enactment of Bizonal Law No. 15 and the final passage on July 17, 1953, of the National Civil Service Law was marked by persistent efforts of the Allied officials to secure the incorporation of similar limitations in the Bonn Basic Law and later in the German legislation.¹⁵ The language of Article 57 of the new act which requires "separation from office" of an official chosen as a member of the Bundestag is vague and stipulates that subsequent legislation will regulate the matter in detail. But it appears that the stage is set to permit the candidacy of civil servants and leaves of absence from the service for those elected to Parliament, less generous provisions than had been included in the Weimar Constitution and more generous than the occupation authorities had desired.

Subversive political affiliations

The problem of political rights raises in an acute form the policy of governments toward their employees who are members of political parties considered dangerous to the state. In 1948 the British government announced a policy for dealing with employees suspected of close affiliations with fascist or communist organizations while engaged in handling matters requiring secrecy. After various discussions, a policy was announced to apply to persons "employed in connection with work the nature of which is vital to the security of the state." Guilt was to be based on present as distinguished from previous membership in communist or fascist organizations. The individual minister would be permitted to judge whether security considerations justified disciplinary action. Provisions were made for replies to charges and for hearings before an Advisory Board. If circumstances permitted, the employee in lieu of reinstatement might be transferred to another position which would be less sensitive than the former one from a security point of view. Otherwise he would either be permitted to resign or be dismissed. Despite criticisms directed at the procedures, the safeguards provided by the Advisory Board and by the intervention of the civil servant unions have generally been recognized as offering effective protection against action which violates British tradition.¹⁶ Up to 1950, it was estimated that approximately fifty civil servants had received notice, of which number only a very small percentage had been dismissed or compelled to resign.

In Germany, memories of subversion by civil servants during the Weimar period were kept alive by those Allied and German officials who were desirous of providing safeguards against a repetition in the present Federal Republic. The result was the insertion in the Federal Civil Service Law of 1953 of Article 52, which obligates the civil servant to accept and be faithful to the democratic principles of the Basic Law during his entire official connection with the state (including the period while he is pensioned). Despite expressed doubts as to the value of such legislative provisions, the writer's personal experience convinces him that both outside prodemocratic organizations and the legalistically oriented German civil servant attach weight to this Article in the new act. The result will be to furnish a legal basis for the exclusion of both Communists and Fascists from the public service in the future.

Thus, both Britain and Germany have given serious attention to the political rights of the civil servants, and each country has extended the rights of political candidature over those previously in existence. At the same time some cautious steps have been taken to discipline or to eliminate the politically subversive official.

ASSOCIATIONS AND REPRESENTATION OF PUBLIC EMPLOYEES

The rights of association of the public employees in Western European states have been either extended or more clearly recognized since the end of World War II. In Britain today, around 80 per cent of the nonindustrial civil servants are organized in at least three hundred staff associations or unions. The repeal in 1946 of Section V of the Trades Disputes and Trade Unions Act has broadened their right of outside affiliation with the industrial unions. In France, as well as in Germany and Italy where these rights had fallen victim to the prohibitions of previous regimes, the postwar constitutions have recognized broadly the right of association.

On the basis of these constitutional guarantees, a variety of public employee federations have functioned. In Germany, public employees are organized chiefly in the Civil Servant Federation, in affiliates of the German Trade Union Federation, or in the independent German Salaried Employees Federation. All of these federations accept the basic principles upon which the Federal Republic is based. In Italy—and the divisions in France follow somewhat the same ideological pattern—the public employees are organized primarily either in affiliates of the Communist-dominated trade union federation (CGIL, “Italian General Confederation of Labor”), of the Christian-Democratic-dominated federation (CISL, “Italian Confederation of Workers’ Unions”), or of the Socialist-Republican federation (UIL, “Italian Workers’ Unions”) or in independent associations.

Strikes

Whether legally permissible or not,¹⁷ frequent strikes have occurred among these organizations of public employees in both Italy and France. The most determined of these strikes broke out in France in August 1953, when both Catholic- and Communist-dominated unions supported the Socialist Workers Force and largely immobilized the French communication systems, the postal services, and other branches of the economy for a sixteen-day period. The resort to the strike has been occasioned by a number of factors, but the presence of large blocks of public employees in federations manipulated for political purposes by the Communist parties in both France and Italy has been especially significant. The pre-World-War-I problem of the relations of l'État et ses fonctionnaires has thus assumed the new contours which the post-World-War-II ideological differences have provided, and the recent developments provide no easy answer as to the most appropriate ways for dealing with the issues involved. But to the present, none of the European states have resorted to prohibitions and sanctions as extreme as those found in the Taft-Hartley Act in the United States.

Representative councils

One outlet for the complaints of public employees has been provided by the different types of employee representative councils which have either been created in their present forms in the post-war period, as in Germany and France, or have functioned in a state of renewed vigor, as in Britain. In the latter country, the Whitley Councils have undergone the transformation during the past fifteen years which a growing sense of mutual responsibility and a new generation of negotiators have stimulated.¹⁸ In particular, the emphasis has been shifted from formal to informal meetings, with a resultant speeding up of the process of making decisions and with the removal of some of the causes of friction in evidence in the formal meetings. Matters recently considered by the Whitley Councils which have not resulted in amicable discussion include the action by the government on the Masterman Report, the government's wage negotiations with higher grade civil servants, and the handling of the wage freeze. But mutual respect on both sides has served to strengthen the Whitley system, and the most recent evidence supports the appraisal of Herman Finer, who observed in 1949 that the National Council played an effective role during the reconstruction period after World War II and that the departmental councils “produced an invaluable and indispensable atmosphere of good and easy relationship between superiors and subordinates. . . .”¹⁹

The Fourth Republic in France has seen provision made in 1946 for representative councils. These include the creation of a Superior Council of Public Service at the general level and both administrative commissions and technical committees in the departments, all of which are organized on some parity basis. Experience with these is more limited than with the Whitley Councils, but favorable reports are not lacking as to their work on classification and other matters.²⁰ In Germany the works councils in the federal public service still rest upon voluntary agreement or on the uncertain basis of Control Council Law No. 22, pending the passage of a Personnel Representation Law.²¹ Representative councils are almost completely lacking in Italy.

In sum, Europe has provided us with a panorama of broad freedom of association, of serious strikes in the public services, and of effective experimentation with representative councils.

RECRUITMENT AND SOCIAL COMPOSITION OF THE BUREAUCRACIES

The social composition of European bureaucracies has been undergoing some changes, to which new recruitment methods have contributed. In Britain, wartime steps were taken to improve the opportunities of those with ability, regardless of social or financial status, and to make allowances for the sacrifices of veterans. Besides the use of the modified prewar methods of recruiting the administrative class, reconstruction examinations which included a series of “country house” or “CISSE” (Civil Service Selection Board) tests were introduced for those whose war service had interfered with their education. An adapted version of these reconstruction examinations is in use today. In addition, limited competitions have been arranged for the increased percentage of positions reserved for civil servants seeking to enter the administrative class from the lower classes. The effect of these innovations must be considered in the light of substantial changes in the educational system, particularly reflected in the growth in the number of state scholarships. But it appears that both the reconstruction examinations and the increased opportunities to enter the administrative class from below have made for some greater equalization of opportunity. In a curious sort of way the declining prestige and appeal of the administrative class²² may also have resulted in more egalitarianism and have contributed to pressures to broaden the field of selection. In any event, the British administrative class today is probably less of a preserve of a particular social stratum than in former times,²³ though the changes in the social composition have not been revolutionary.

France

The reforms of the higher civil service and of the higher educational system in postwar France have been inextricably related. Along with the establishment of the Institutes of Political Studies to serve as feeders for the National School of Administration, attention was directed toward the provision of scholarships for those with special abilities who lacked financial resources. The opportunity to attend the National School of Administration offered to civil servants who fall in the age brackets of twenty-six to thirty and who have spent five years in the public service has helped to open the higher positions to competent persons of experience from the lower ranks. Salaries, it should be noted, are paid to the participants in the three-year program of studies. Social and economic changes in France have been operating for several decades, as Walter Sharp noted in 1931, to alter the social base from which the higher civil servants are recruited.²⁴ One of the several effects of the post-war changes has been to accelerate these trends by broadening the opportunities of those from the lower social strata.

Italy and Germany

Neither Italy nor Germany has witnessed since the war any significant formal change in the regulations governing recruitment or in the legally prescribed qualifications of officials in the higher grades, that is, in Group A in Italy and in the Higher Service in Germany. The traditional legal training in the universities has been changed little since 1939 and, despite some slight concessions to the other social sciences in Germany, is still the usual door for entry. Studies of the social and class background of the student bodies in the universities would evidence the effects of the economic and political heritage of the previous decades. Some widening of the fields for recruitment has taken place in both countries. But there is a continued conviction by important groups, especially the trade unions, that the educational prerequisites still effectively exclude their members from entry into the higher positions in the public services.

The limited data available indicate that there has been a broadening of the social base from which the higher civil servants are recruited. In this sense, it is permissible to speak of some democratization of the bureaucracies.

CONCLUSION

Recent European developments have been of special interest to students of American bureaucracy. These have included the growing significance of new types and groups of public employees; experimentation in personnel management aimed to secure greater unity of control and co-ordination at the top; the extension of the political rights of nonindustrial civil servants and introduction of devices for guaranteeing political reliability; experience with old and recently introduced schemes of employee representation; and the broadening of the social base from which the higher civil servants are recruited.

If space permitted, there would be strong temptation to discuss some general theoretical problems to which the European experience is relevant. A few conclusions must suffice. Postwar British experience under the Labor Government did not justify the prewar concern and doubts of a Harold Laski regarding the "neutrality" or "impartiality" of the bureaucracy under such a government; experience under the Nazi regime in Germany requires modification of Max Weber's hypotheses regarding the political significance of the technical knowledge of the bureaucrat and regarding the normal functioning of the bureaucracy "even in the case of revolution";²⁵ and responsible bureaucracy, at least as we have defined it, has not been inconsistent with the continuation of democratic, constitutional government but has, rather, been indispensable to its functioning in Europe. However, these conclusions will merely serve as a final reminder that Europe still provides us in the United States with an essential laboratory for the study of our own bureaucracy.

Legislative Control of the Bureaucracy

By CHARLES E. GILBERT and MAX M. KAMPELMAN

A SALIENT feature of the American pattern of government has long been the crucial authority of Congress to determine the objectives, and many of the methods, of administrators. In recent years, however, a number of thoughtful observers have urged that legislative control of the bureaucracy be restricted. Generally these observers assert that restrictions on effective legislative control exist in fact and had therefore best be recognized, and that other forms of administrative responsibility should be developed.

Several alternatives or supplements to congressional control have been suggested. The chief ones are: (1) the sharpening of Presidential control and the exclusion of congressional control from all levels of the bureaucracy except over the President himself; (2) reliance on a sense of responsibility "built into" the civil servant through representative recruitment and professional training; (3) further institutionalization of administrative responsibility to the groups in society and the economy which the agencies of administration regulate and service, through various forms of private participation in governmental regulation.

These devices are not usually proposed as total substitutions for congressional control. They are proposed to fill in the gaps in congressional control and to substitute for congressional control in those areas where congressional supervision is said to promote discord and misunderstanding rather than more efficient administrative prosecution of the ends set by Congress.

THE CASE AGAINST CONGRESSIONAL CONTROL

What are the major complaints concerning Congress and the capacity of Congress for controlling bureaucrats?

1. A chief argument is that in a day of problems largely technical in nature Congress does not have the knowledge and expertise to legislate adequately on many subjects. Nor does Congress have the knowledge adequately to control bureaucrats after it has set them in motion on any particular problem. Bureaucrats, because of their specialized knowledge of particular problems, will have to take over the formulation of administrative policies governing these problems, and will even have to take the initiative in much fundamental legislation on these problems. The superior expertise of administrators, it is said, will put them beyond the competence of Congress to control; and, should Congress attempt control willy-nilly, it will only defeat its own purposes by crudely disrupting expert administrative activities and procedures. Congress, it follows, should confine itself simply to broad statutory declarations of purposes.

2. Congress, it is said, is not adequately organized to perform the function of control. The will of Congress is seldom a concerted one. It is the will of individual Congressmen who generally derive their power from (a) individual committees of Congress, (b) seniority, or (c) individual constituents with power and influence. Congress' knowledge is inadequate to write meaningful statutory directions for administrators. And all subsequent interpretations of basic statutes are the interpretations of individual Congressmen, or of congressional committees which are (a) "producer minded" and thus not representative of the whole will of Congress, or (b) acting at the behest of individual, "constituency minded" Congressmen, because Congressmen stick together on these things. Congressional committees, it is asserted, are never disciplined by Congress, and they often disagree with one another (further confusing the administrative process). Congress will often disagree with the President, thus still further confusing administrators. Finally, the time of Congressmen is limited—hence the specialized committees—so that Congress cannot regularly or periodically review administrative activity and experience. Therefore, individual Congressmen perform this function spasmodically and on the basis of individual administrative actions which are displeasing to the Congressmen or their particular constituents.

3. It follows, continues the argument, that Congress, in its present undisciplined form, is not really a very representative institution. Its actions are those of individual Congressmen, often at the behest of certain powerful constituents. The President, who represents all of the American people, is far more representative. His leadership of the bureaucracy should not, then, be subjected to disruptions at lower levels of the bureaucracy by unrepresentative segments of Congress. The bureaucracy itself may better represent the American people than does Congress. Civil servants are drawn from many areas of the land, they are educated in terms of the public interest (and do not face elections in particular constituencies), and they are inclined to the "public interest."

All of these criticisms of Congress stem from altered social-economic conditions which, it is held, present the need for altering our political institutions. The increased influence of large producer groups, the elevation of many erstwhile local problems to national importance, are held to have outmoded our electoral system, in some measure, and to lead to the need for minimizing local interests vis-à-vis national interests and maximizing technical proficiency and concerted action in government.

INSTITUTIONALIZING RESPONSIBILITY

Chief problems, then, are the feasibility of legislative control and the desirability of legislative control. The two problems are not really separate.

We do not believe that a sufficiently convincing case has yet been made for either the feasibility or the desirability of any or all of the proposed alternatives to congressional control at the expense of curtailing it. There is not space here to argue the many questions involved, but we may say that, in our view, the crucial question concerns the representativeness and responsiveness of the various agencies of our government and that we feel no other branches of our government are superior to Congress in these respects.

Congress is admittedly an institution with many faults. The bulk of the case for thoroughgoing congressional control of administration must rest upon a detailed and realistic assessment of the alternatives to Congress in this field.

The positive case for congressional control rests upon three grounds.

1. Responsibility should be "institutionalized." It should be placed in institutions which are clearly "political"—meaning that government must derive its authority from a broader social area than that of immediate controversy or regulation, and that governmental authority is accepted by public opinion as dispositive of controversy. This seems to us to exclude reliance on interest-group participation in administration.

2. It follows that the institutions in which responsibility is located should rest on firm bases of political support and should, for the sake of their own stability, be responsive to the many and variegated concerns of a large nation. They ought also to minimize purely "personal" leadership and direction.

3. There is this further value in legislative control—that changes in administrative purposes brought about by organizational factors within the administration itself face institutionalized criticism from outside the administration.

The remainder of this paper is concerned with specific methods of congressional control. It has been said that "the dangers [to democratic purposes] arise, not from lack of congressional zeal, but from an excess of it, with a resulting demoralization of administration."¹ We will, therefore, concern ourselves not only with the adequacy of Congress' weapons for control but with the problem of the proper use of these weapons so as not to defeat the broad ends of Congress.

METHODS OF CONGRESSIONAL CONTROL

Congress is involved in two functions vis-à-vis the bureaucracy—functions which Charles S. Hyneman² has called "direction" and "control." On the one hand, Congress, by statute, creates jobs for the bureaucracy to do, creates the bureaucracy itself to take care of the jobs, and lays down standards according to which the jobs will be performed. All of this is direction; it stems from the doctrine of the "rule of law"—that the government, like everyone else, is under the law, and must act in accordance with the law. Congress (with the concurrence of the President) makes the law. It is the people's agent for directing the bureaucracy as to what it is to do, how much it is to do, and how it is to do it.

It is, of course, not enough for Congress simply to tell the bureaucracy what to do. As the people's board of directors, it is also Congress' responsibility to see that its directions are in fact followed. It must in some way control the bureaucracy. This it does through regulating the financial resources of the bureaucracy, through some measure of review of the work of the bureaucracy, and through informing the bureaucracy in ways statutory and short of statutory what is its pleasure.

Direction and control are logically distinct, but closely related in fact. The appropriations process, for example, illustrates important aspects of direction and control. Delegation of certain lawmaking functions to the bureaucracy is generally essential if Congress is to attain the statutory ends it seeks. Yet excessive delegation may put the bureaucracy in a position beyond effective control, or throw control into the courts. Therefore, in discussing the various points of congressional power over the bureaucracy, it will be found that both direction and control center at many of these points.

Creating functions

To begin with, Congress decides what the bureaucracy shall do—it defines the job of the bureaucracy. Generally it does this in the broadest of terms, leaving much to administrative interpretation. Are the terms of the congressional grant of power too broad? And do they lead to administrative waywardness or confusion? The problem here is that it is difficult for Congress, at first, to know enough about the function it deeds to the bureaucracy to define it in very sharp terms. Moreover, too detailed definition of the function may defeat the purposes of Congress—it may so tie the hands of administrators that they cannot meet the conditions with which they have to deal. The most sensible procedure would seem to be for Congress to lay out the job it wants done in broad outline and progressively to fill in statutory gaps as administrative experience with the job becomes clear.

Such a procedure implies, of course, continuing congressional attention to the work of the administration. Generally, Congress has not adequately operated in this fashion. Instead of reviewing, in concert and with regularity, administrative experience on a particular job, it has usually left to individual Congressmen—reacting to particular constituents—to complain at administrative abuse of congressional intent. Review is thus spasmodic rather than regular, individual rather than concerted, related to particular cases rather than general experience, and from time to time it has taken the form of a congressional vendetta instead of a more refined directive. Congress will provide better direction as it focuses with more regularity upon review, through its established committees, and as it better organizes itself for concerted expression of its will.

Establishing organization

Congress not only adumbrates the job of the bureaucracy; it also sets up organizations to perform the job. Clearly, the power to establish the organization which performs the job means that Congress has a lot to say about the kind of job which the bureaucracy turns out, and the procedures by which the work is done. This is an important element of congressional direction. It is also a weapon of control, for Congress

—if it have the will—can at any time effect administrative reorganization, giving and taking away functions and powers. In this instance also it is, of course, possible for Congress to defeat its purposes by tying the hands of top administrators and rendering them unable to determine forms of organization which are congenial to them and with which they can work efficiently. The congressional problem is to strike a balance; to ensure an organization which in turn will ensure that the work is done as Congress wants it done.

The most important congressional choices here concern the headship of the organization (generally the choice is between a single administrator and a collegiate head) and the agency to which any new job shall be given (here the choice lies between the several existing agencies performing related work and the creation of a new agency to devote exclusive attention to the new work). Efficiency in performing the work would seem to dictate that Congress leave it to the head of the agency to determine the internal organization of the agency which actually does the work. There is some danger that when Congress organizes a new function it will not allocate it to the most appropriate administrative agency. On occasion, Congress does this with premeditation. This has been criticized because, it is said, the President is held partly responsible by the public for the proper functioning of the administration. On the other hand, Congress has the responsibility for assuring that the function which it creates receives sympathetic consideration. Thus, it appears desirable that government reorganization come up for periodic consideration.

As part of the legislative machinery, the President can, of course, veto an organizational statute of which he disapproves. For reasons already advanced, should Congress override his veto, this should count as an authoritative expression of the popular will on the subject. Under present procedure, the President has considerable initiative in reorganization, since most proposals for new governmental functions and new organizations come from the administrative branch and pass through its central point of control, the Bureau of the Budget.

Appropriations

A third aspect of congressional direction and control is the appropriation of the money which is the fuel of the administrative machine. Congressional authorization of functions and organization is not really meaningful until it gives administration the means to do the job.

Legislative power of the purse has traditionally been regarded as the key point of legislative control. Determinations of financial resources determine the extent of administrative action. Their main purpose is not to determine what jobs shall be performed, but the extent to which they shall be performed. Yet this often involves a choice of what functions shall be performed, and Congress may also—despite the statutory prohibition against substantive legislation in an appropriations bill—attach conditions which determine ways in which the job shall be done. Committees frequently do this orally or in reports. These are occasionally helpful, but also at times difficult for administrators to interpret.

Perhaps the most important aspect of the appropriations process is the opportunity it affords for continuing legislative review of administrative activity. The division between authorization and appropriation is said to "accommodate itself to the technique of planning, for programs may be laid out broadly, to be implemented annually at a tempo suited to conditions."³ The congressional appropriations committees work almost year round, and their members are generally senior members of Congress who have acquired detailed acquaintanceship with the workings of the bureaucracy. They are an appropriate and convenient organ of review, and they have adequate sanctions.

Appropriations committees, however, sometimes conflict, in their review, with other committees of Congress. It has been suggested that congressional review of the administration be centralized in the appropriations committees, yet it may well be that the appropriations committees are not and cannot be expected to be sufficiently concerned with the substantive aspects of administrative programs. Since these programs were created through the substantive committees, those committees have a vital review role to fulfill, along with the appropriations committees and the committees on government operations.

In recent years, Congress has attempted to co-ordinate and improve its appropriation procedure and intelligence. At one point it adopted and later abandoned a consolidated appropriations act designed to provide it with an over-all fiscal picture rather than a piecemeal appropriation approach. The consolidated appropriation is a good reform, particularly where it can be accompanied by an item veto. In the absence of an item veto, however, the appropriation control is too centrally located in the appropriations committees, and other members of Congress feel their ability to review appropriations is limited where individual items are inundated in the mass.

³ Arthur W. Macmahon, "Congressional Oversight of Administration: The Power of the Purse," Political Science Quarterly, Vol. 58 (1943), p. 174.

The limited staff of appropriations committees has handicapped congressional intelligence. Proposals are before the Congress to enlarge the staff and make more effective use of the General Accounting Office.

Standards

Congress must delegate rule-making powers to administrators. "Without capacity to give authorizations of that sort we should have the anomaly of legislative power which in many circumstances calling for its exertion would be but futility."⁴ The fact is that it is a key function of Congress to lay down standards to govern the performance of any functions it gives the bureaucracy—whether these functions be substantive or rule-making. These standards provide guidance for administrative officials and for citizens who deal with those officials, and they provide the courts with the bases for review of administrative actions.

Much of the law which is intended to provide standards for officials is out of date today.⁵ Moreover, some of this legislation goes to undesirable and extreme lengths, unduly curbing administrative flexibility. In part, it results from congressional ignorance of administrative conditions on specialized levels, which can be remedied by adequate administrative advice to Congress.

Congress' power to delegate its rule-making function has few restraints today. The question has not come up since the Schechter case⁶ and is unlikely to arise again. The danger remains, however, that excessive congressional delegation may give rise to administrative confusion and indirection, and may lead to excessive use of the courts in controlling the bureaucracy. Through the Administrative Procedure Act of 1946, Congress moved to make administrative rule-making procedures more uniform, more public, and freer of personal bias. A further control has been suggested: that Congress adopt procedures similar to the British Statutory Instruments Act of 1946. Under this procedure, certain administrative rulings would be laid before the Congress and would become operative after a stipulated period unless the Congress vetoed them. This procedure would tend to restrict the role of the courts. It seems to us far more desirable that Congress rather than the courts be the final arbiter in determining the will of Congress.

Appointments and removals

The constitutional basis for senatorial participation in appointments is thoroughgoing—the President "shall nominate, and by and with the Advice and Consent of the Senate, shall appoint" all nonelective governmental officers, though the Congress may vest exclusive appointing power of many of these in the President alone. This, of course, is what Congress has done.

A key problem in this connection is when to require congressional confirmation. Two standards have been used: the position of the office in the administrative hierarchy and the influence of the office on policy formation. At least one Senator has suggested that every job with a salary above $5,000 require senatorial confirmation. Since Congress frames the broad statutory policy, it seems reasonable that it will insist on habilitation and expansion of trade and industry."—EDITOR'S NOTE.

confirming policy-making administrators. Removal of officials is the prerogative of the President alone. Nevertheless, Congress has frequently displayed more influence in this field than the Constitution and the Myers case⁷ would indicate. Through its other weapons of control and its frequent ability to poison the atmosphere within which administrative officials must operate, Congress has been able to force retirement on officials on many occasions.

The significance of this aspect of congressional control is the fact that Congress may use it to provide that programs instituted by Congress receive "sympathetic" administration. The difficulty here is that Congress may use its power in this field to destroy vigorous and original administrators, and this has certainly happened. It is sometimes said that such administrators should learn to get on with Congress—yet, as we have seen, Congress is not a unit, and it may be impossible to get along with enough of Congress and do an efficient job at the same time. A partial answer to this problem is that the President can stand back of his man, if he feels that the man's position is, program-wise, important to his administration. Many Presidents will not like to do this, for those fights which center themselves on personalities are generally the hottest and the most dramatic fights; and they will often jeopardize other aspects of Presidential programs. But knuckling under to Congress will often have the same effect.

Criticism of senatorial confirmation

Three major complaints are raised against the practice of senatorial confirmation.

⁷ Myers v. U. S., 272 U. S. 52 (1926) declared unconstitutional an act of 1867 denying to the President the right to remove civil officials without consent of the Senate.—
EDITOR'S NOTE.

1. Exclusive vesting of the appointive power in the President is said to be essential to the efficient working of his administration, since the people will hold the President responsible for that administration, and since he must have congenial men to work with. But it may equally be held that the Senate is in large degree representative of the judgment of the people on the President's administration, that very few Presidential nominees are rejected by the Senate, and that the "political" requirements of effective administration mean that the President is generally unfamiliar with the records and personalities of the men whom he appoints. Senatorial advice may actually be helpful to him at this point.

2. It is often said that the hardships and vicissitudes of senatorial confirmation deter many able men from accepting Presidential nominations. Yet we may well wonder how often this actually happens and doubt the capacity of most of the men who are not willing to face political battles.

3. It is argued also that the requirement of senatorial confirmation has tended to overpersonalize issues—that individuals are made the scapegoats for programs unpopular in Congress. A partial answer to this criticism lies in the contention that there has been an educational value in this process—that where executive-legislative fights have centered on men, the programmatic aspects of the fight have generally entered the debate and the American people have been educated in the process. Yet it has happened that the programmatic aspects of debate on nominations have been too greatly minimized and that the issues which have been raised have been tangential. These abuses are rare and are the price we pay for assuring that legislative programs are carried out as intended and that top administrators have the confidence of Congress, which must continue to support their programs if they are to be effective.

Finally, it should be noted that, while Congress has given up its power to participate in the confirmation of all but a very few executive employees and has yielded up much of its patronage to the merit system over the past seventy years, it still retains some control over the general practices of the executive branch as regards the civil service. Committees of Congress are constantly reviewing the promotion practices and other personnel practices of the various administrative agencies. On the basis of this review, Congress is able to pass laws regulating such practices. Congressional regulation of these practices is important, of course, because of the effect of these practices on the morale and efficiency of government employees and because of Congress' constitutional responsibility for the cost of government.

Review and oversight

Surely congressional "control" implies more than simply setting up the job, the organization, and the standards, and providing the money and helping to provide the men. Review is necessitated, in part, because Congress cannot be absolutely sure of everything it wants administrators to do when it first provides tasks for administrators, and also because changing and highly technical conditions give rise to administrative interpretations of the directives of Congress which Congress wants to be sure are consistent with its own ideas of how the job should be done.

Many believe that Congress goes too far in its reviewing activities—that it should content itself with laying out broad statutory directives, but should not try to settle lesser matters of policy.

Yet it is generally acknowledged that these lesser matters build up into broad policies. It would appear that the objections are not to congressional review per se, but to the unsystematic pattern of it, and to the fact that it is not confined to trying to get knowledge but extends also to trying to give directions. This practice is said to disrupt Presidential control over the bureaucracy and to lead to confusions and conflict within the bureaucracy.

One authority has said:

The fact is that many administrative officials now receive a great deal more guidance from Congressmen than they get from the President. Congressmen are not content only to enact laws which lay down the general policy which shall guide the administrative official in his work. They like to tell him what to do in specific instances.⁸

Note that this quotation speaks of Congressmen, rather than Congress. It is safe to say that most Congressmen feel that they are in Washington partly as plenipotentiaries from their constituents to the administrative branch, and many Congressmen try to wring from administrators as many concessions for constituents as they can. In such cases, congressional "review" certainly has its dangers, for in many of these cases the Congressman is representing only special interest, and not the statutory intent of Congress when it wrote the law governing the administrator.

Techniques of review

The answer to this problem lies, we believe, not in the abdication of congressional review, but in the better organization of Congress for review, so that administrators can take this review as the work of the Congress as a whole. How can Congress best perform its reviewing function? One way is for Congress, on the recommendation of its committees entrusted with review, to write into statute the fruits of administrative experience. Another is for Congress, through joint resolutions, or committee reports, to give voice to its approval or disapproval of general trends of administrative policy. A third is to adapt the procedures used in reorganization plans, which could be extended to provide a congressional veto over administrative measures of which Congress disapproves. Such procedures would still allow the committees of Congress, and individual Congressmen, scope for review and fact finding but would confine direction giving to the whole of Congress. They would make for more consistency in congressional directions.

This is not to say that there is not a legitimate role for the individual legislator in performing his ambassadorial function. Why should he not render service to his constituents in the form of advice on how to deal with government agencies and of aid in dealing with them, so long as he is not asking for special treatment for constituents? Administrators will generally know when Congressmen are seeking special treatment. Congressmen gain valuable experience of the working of the administrative branch through this ambassadorial function. And in doing so they may bring individual abuses to the attention of Congress. It is usually through individual cases that Congress learns of administrative deviation from congressional intent—unless administrators are willing to seek clarification from Congress voluntarily.

How, in fact, does Congress carry out review? It does so through periodic reviews of appropriations committees, through the fact finding of its substantive committees, through personal consultation between Congressmen and administrators, through the efforts of Congressmen to answer constituent complaints against administration, and through investigations.

The Legislative Reorganization Act of 1946 tried to co-ordinate and facilitate congressional review by cleaning up the committee system of Congress, and by assigning the function of review to (a) the substantive committees in each field, (b) the appropriations committees, and (c) the committees on expenditures in the executive branch (now the committees on government operations) in each house of Congress. All of these committees were given enlarged staffs to do the job. Yet so far, according to an outstanding authority in this field, this scheme has met with only "partial success."⁹ The standing committees of Congress have been too heavily burdened with their legislative duties to spend much time on review, save where review occurs in connection with legislative activity.

Administrators' complaints

Many top administrators complain that this plethora of committees subjects them to undue review—that they are forced to spend too much time in testimony (often duplicate testimony) before both houses. Joint committee sittings have been tried, but generally Congress, particularly the House of Representatives, has seemed to feel that this procedure gives the Senate advantages over the House. It has, perhaps, tended toward rivalry rather than co-ordination.

Administrators have also complained that the committees of Congress conflict. This problem arises not only between the two houses, but between committees of the same house, where jurisdictional disputes occur. These disputes may be important policy-wise, since different committees represent, in their membership, different interests. But it may be argued that the disadvantages in this conflict are offset by the main advantages of congressional control and representation. Similar conflict exists in the administrative branch, sometimes created, it is true, by conflict between congressional committees, but often the product of the weakness of our party system as it affects Presidential control of administration.

Investigations

The final and perhaps the most drastic method of congressional control is investigation. There have been numerous examples of intelligent use of investigating power—instances when it had a valuable effect on administrative laxity, when it aroused public opinion and performed the useful function of public education, and when it resulted in bringing before Congress and the public facts which were not previously known or attended to.

There are, however, real problems where these investigations are concerned. They may serve chiefly as avenues of publicity for Congressmen without informing Congress as a whole; they are only important in educating the public where they are used sparingly and on crucial topics; they would generally be better used to sift and evaluate (often in private) information provided from the generally superior sources of the executive branch. Investigating committees have not been sufficiently subject to the discipline of Congress as a whole, and the results have thus not always been legislatively productive of anything save discord. Where they have centered mainly on individuals and personalities, committee procedures have been lax in safeguarding the individual: committees have acted as courts while shunning judicial procedure and they have needlessly damaged individual reputations by making public accusations which can rarely be overtaken by disproof and vindication.

Remedies regarding committee procedures have often been proposed, and sentiment has been developing among some Congressmen for their adoption. But remedies for the other vagrancies of investigations are more difficult to find, short of abolishing the useful functions of investigations. Nor are such thoroughgoing remedies possible, since investigation has long been considered, and has been held by the courts to be, a right of Congress incident to legislation. Current judicial doctrine interprets this very broadly.

Investigations are effective congressional weapons in the rivalry of Congress with the chief executive, since they provide publicity which can rival that accorded the President. Moreover, such publicity is a generous source of personal power for certain Congressmen. The attempt to curb investigations would thus be regarded in Congress as a personal attack on these Congressmen, a practice which Congressmen generally eschew.

Not only investigations themselves, but mere threats of investigation are often effective. Many times Congressmen are able to put pressure on administrators by threatening investigations; and administrators have learned that Congressmen stick together in these matters—the man who wants an investigation can often obtain it. The threat of investigation can, of course, be a valuable check on administrators who are out to warp the intent of Congress. But it can also be used to secure special treatment for special constituents, and thus itself warp the intent of Congress.

CONCLUSION

The separation of powers has institutionalized rivalry between the legislative and administrative branches, and has meant that the usual struggle for power between legislatures and administrations is more evident in legislative action in the American system than it is in some other systems. Congress, while not very amenable to discipline on most matters, can sometimes be relied upon to act as a unit when it feels that congressional prerogatives vis-à-vis the executive branch are at stake, for involved in these prerogatives are the personal positions of all Congressmen. Their standing in their constituencies is affected here, since that standing is often not so dependent upon the promotion of programs as it is upon the promotion of services on an individual basis. Where programs are important, Congressmen have found that the necessary delegations of recent years have made surveillance of the administration a continuing necessity which can only be enforced by sticking together on their rights in this matter.

The political status of Congressmen today, then, is often dependent less on the advocacy of programs than on the results of programs, and these are in the hands of the administration. Yet the function of Congress, in our system, is the advocacy and the legislation of programs. For this purpose congressional control is a sine qua non.

It is important, in a democracy, that the public not feel excluded from the operation of government. The growing magnitude of the bureaucracy may produce a popular feeling of helplessness and frustration. This vital problem is being met by competition between Congress and President for public support. Competition between reorganized and more coherent parties may serve as a means to the same end, but such party reform, when coupled with the acceptance of Presidential hegemony and minimal congressional supervision, may exclude minority party access to vital information. Such information, and the public education which flows therefrom, can best be guaranteed by the devices of congressional direction and control which we have been discussing.

Congressional control, of course, can defeat congressional purposes where Congress is not organized to keep its purposes in mind. Disparate and disorganized relationships with the bureaucracy will result in a bureaucracy of the same character. We believe, however, that too much emphasis has been placed upon a nicely ordered, symmetrical bureaucracy. There are certain purposes which Congress can realize only by placing certain functions in agencies where Congress will have easy access to them, and where it can be assured that these functions will not be pulled out of line by the force of the full administrative hierarchy.

Congress' main need is to assure that its relationships with these agencies, and with the whole of the bureaucracy, be so organized as to constitute the coherent and consistent will of the legislature. (This will may change from one Congress to another, and Congress must therefore declare itself when its will is modified.) When such a coherent and consistent will is evident, Congress will command more respect from the bureaucracy. Congress will think more in terms of over-all purposes and over-all bureaucratic organization, thus furthering main purposes before subsidiary ones, and Congress will conduct its review of administrative actions with more efficiency and effectiveness and will win more administrative co-operation in this endeavor.

Proposed improvements

Proposals for more effective congressional control within our constitutional system have been debated. They include reform of the appropriations and budgetary procedure; more adequate congressional staff; the adoption of procedure for legislative vetoes on administrative actions; the institutionalization of better executive-legislative relationships at the top level through some sort of council, thus minimizing prevalent mutual mistrust; and further use of informal consultation at many levels (often more effective than formal devices).

If it is too much to hope for voluntary congressional discipline and restraint in the interests of a unified congressional will on administrative matters, then these steps will have to wait upon reform of the American party system. The strengthening, centralizing, and better disciplining of the party system may be seen as a further and better method of institutionalizing responsibility. But cogent objections have been raised against party reform on the grounds that (1) the American people do not favor the kind of majority rule it would involve, preferring the less symmetrical but more immediate representation of minorities, and (2) that we cannot be assured that centralization of the party system would promote "political" purpose as against "economic" and sectional purposes, for it might lead to the capture of the parties by the large interest groups.

At present, the institutionalization of responsibility through Congress as it stands, or as it may be revised short of party reform, seems our best bet. For the present we must take Congress as it is—often more representative of many particular purposes than of certain common purposes. The immediate problem is for Congress better to adjust these particular purposes to one another, and to adjust them in large measure before Congress conveys its purposes to the bureaucracy, bearing in mind, however, that there are certain areas where the people of this country hold that the promotion of particular purposes is important.

Administration and the Courts

By JAMES HART

THE relation of the courts to bureaucracy cuts across every branch of American law: constitutional and statutory law, criminal and civil law, the common law and equity. It is accordingly so complex, and so involved in technical distinctions, that no attempt will here be made to explore its details. The present purpose is rather to capture, if that be possible, a few glimpses of its broad significance.

The clue to that significance is to be sought in the role of the judiciary in our constitutional system. The Constitution is formally the source of a legal order or regime of law; and this regime of law can be made effective in action only if, its application to any particular situation being disputed, there exists an independent third party which is empowered authoritatively to settle the dispute when, but only when, it is appealed to by either of the disputing parties.

Such independent third parties are the courts. Their third-party character is necessary to protect one disputant from having the other impose a settlement by acting as judge in his own cause. It is underlined by the fact that they may not take the initiative, but must sit passively until some plaintiff initiates before them some case against some defendant. Its bulwark is their independence, which is secured by such means as the tenure of judges and their immunity from criminal and tort liability for the manner in which they exercise their judicial powers.

The application of the law to a particular situation includes determining the facts of that situation by following the applicable rules of law. These rules may prescribe that the facts shall be those agreed upon by the parties to the dispute. They may establish as the facts those well pleaded by one of those parties and admitted upon demurrer by the other. They may provide that the facts shall be those found by judge or jury upon the basis of the evidence offered and allowed, including the testimony of witnesses for both sides, in accordance with the law of evidence. They may also provide that the facts shall be those found, upon the basis of notice and a hearing, by a quasi-judicial tribunal, provided those facts are upon challenge found by the court to be supported by substantial evidence in the light of the whole record or such portions thereof as may be cited to the court.

THE REPEATED PATTERN

In all branches of the law, and regardless of whether the government or an administrative official or agency is party plaintiff or party defendant, the role of the courts is in essence the same. The central pattern always consists of a plaintiff, a defendant, and a court as the independent third party settling the dispute by applying the law to the legally determined facts.

In a criminal case, the role of the plaintiff falls primarily to the prosecuting attorney, and the defendant is always the accused. But the role of the court is the same, whether the accused is a storekeeper indicted for murdering his wife or an official indicted for a misdemeanor in office.

In a tort case, the plaintiff may be the owner of a horse, and the defendant a neighbor who allegedly has injured the horse out of spite. The defendant may, however, be a health officer who has killed the horse without notice on the ground that it had the glanders.

In the law of contracts, the plaintiff may be a merchant who is seeking to collect from the defendant on goods delivered. That defendant may be an ordinary customer; but he may be an official who, in ordering registration supplies, acted ultra vires because the county was not subject to the registration laws, but who is alleged to have used apt words to bind himself personally. This is not to say that the law is the same for a contracting agent of government as for the agent of a private individual or firm. It is to say that the role of the court is in principle the same in both instances.

In equity, the plaintiff or complainant may be the owner of water-front real property who seeks to have the defendant or respondent enjoined from threatened action which he claims will work him irreparable injury. The defendant may be a boat company whose planned wharf the plaintiff alleges will obstruct entrance to his property; but he may be the Secretary of Defense, whose planned harbor improvements the plaintiff claims are in excess of his statutory authority.

Or take two of the extraordinary common-law writs. The plaintiff or relator may seek a mandamus against a municipal official to compel him to issue a license to engage in the hardware business, on the ground that under a city ordinance the only condition for the issuance of such a license is the payment of a fee which has been tendered and refused, and that it is therefore the ministerial duty of the official to accept the fee and issue the license. Or the plaintiff or applicant may seek to have a writ of habeas corpus issued to the immigration officer who holds him in custody under a warrant for his arrest and deportation as an alien illegally in the United States, when the plaintiff claims to be a foreign-born son of a native-born citizen.

Still again, the parties may be a manufacturing company and the National Labor Relations Board; but either may be plaintiff or defendant. For, the Board having served upon the company an order to cease and desist from specified unfair labor practices, under the statutory review provisions of the governing statute the company may apply to a national Court of Appeals for review, and the Board may apply to the same court for enforcement, of the order.

In the illustration last cited, whichever party moves first, the function of the court is the same: to affirm, modify, or set aside the order according to whether the Board's findings as to the facts are or are not supported by substantial evidence, its procedure has or has not been lawful, and its order is or is not in all respects of a legally permissible scope. The court's duty is no more to throttle the Board than it is to enforce its order without question, no more to curb the Board than to give it free rein. It is rather to adjudicate as between the parties by applying the law to the particular situation without fear or favor, and accordingly to grant enforcement to the Board or relief to the company.

This, moreover, is typical of the duty of every court in every case brought before it, irrespective of all differences in detail.

This responsibility of the courts as independent third parties is a crucial feature of a regime of law. It is admittedly such in the criminal and private law. Administrative law being taken to embrace all parts of the law which govern the relations between administrative agencies and private persons or organizations, it is presently pertinent to sum up the principal reasons why it is such in this area also.

A FEATURE OF THE CONSTITUTIONAL SYSTEM

Judicial review of administrative action is a time-honored feature of our constitutional system. Hence, the importance of continuity with the past as a starting point of orderly improvement establishes a presumption in favor of continuance of the institution. Such review is, moreover, in one form or another, a feature of the constitutional systems of the leading Western nations. Hence, the fact that it is the product of a commonly felt need among countries blessed with popular government and the reign of law strongly reinforces the presumption.

In affirmative support of the presumption, the rationale of the institution is as applicable today as it was in simpler times. Indeed, it is underlined by the administrative expansion of the last two decades. For it affirms that the settlement by a court as an independent third party of a dispute between a private party and an administrative agency is called for in the public interest.

On the one hand, administrators are invested with authority over persons and property; and human beings so invested are apt, whether from overzealous devotion to their task or from less worthy motives, to exceed or abuse their lawful powers. Protection of private interests against such excess or abuse is an indispensable factor in any civilized conception of the public interest. For such protection, however, it is not enough that the law define the scope of such powers and prescribe that they be exercised reasonably in respect alike to substance and to method. It is essential that enforcement of the law be in the hands of the courts as independent third parties.

On the other hand, administrative powers over persons and property are necessary means to reasonable statutory ends of so limiting private freedom as to safeguard vital interests of the community as a whole. If, therefore, the exercise of these powers is found by the courts to be in content and procedure within the law, the public interest requires that the administrative determinations be sanctioned by coercive judicial decrees quite as clearly as in the contrary event it requires that the private interests concerned be protected.

Whichever way the courts decide, moreover, the result obtains from the fact that it is produced by an independent third party a powerful moral sanction. Not least when the stakes are high, this moral sanction is promotive of orderly government, for it greatly facilitates compliance on the part of the losing party and acquiescence on the part of those interests in society which are disappointed at the outcome.

To such reasoning the objection may be raised that the supposed regime of law is illusory, since the law is what the judges say it is, and hence that it is indefensible to vest in men who are not politically responsible the authority in their final discretion to restrict the exercise by administrative commissions of economic controls authorized by representative legislatures.

It is now generally recognized, to be sure, that the courts are far from being mere automatons, mere passive mouthpieces of a pre-existing law which is always unmistakable in its general terms and perfectly clear in its bearing upon all possible situations. This is not to deny that in many parts of the law there is a substantial core of certainty in the application of the law to run-of-the-mine situations. It is to affirm, however, that throughout the law many hypothetical situations can be stated, and actual situations are constantly arising, to which the application of the law is uncertain, and will remain so until the court of last resort shall have spoken. It is further to affirm that notably in the dynamic field of administrative law there are whole areas of confusion.

Nor is that all. It is the precedents of the courts which have made the common law and equity what they are; and while the courts, in interpreting the written law, are limited by the language used, they fix the meaning of that language for all cases except those which patently come within its intent.

THE SUPREME COURT

Now it may be that the degree of uncertainty in the law is exaggerated by centering attention upon courts of last resort; for theirs is the task of resolving legal uncertainties. This is especially true of the Supreme Court of the United States, to which appeal of right can be taken only in limited classes of cases, and which otherwise selects, by granting or denying petitions for certiorari, the cases which raise new or doubtful questions of law it deems it important to pass upon. Small wonder, then, that this court is often divided.

It is further to be noted in passing that, while a Supreme Court decision which makes new law is retroactive with respect to the given situation, it increases the certainty of the law for the future—a result which is in itself advantageous for all concerned—and that, however wrongheaded such a decision may seem to some informed critics, it is at least a reasoned decision which at the worst overemphasizes principles which judges and other men have long cherished.

In the last analysis, of course, the answer to the objection which has been raised must be that in administrative law, as in the criminal and private law, the independent third-party role of the courts is too precious to be abandoned even though it involves the fallible judgment of men. If those men are now thought to have "liberal" predilections, the predilections of their predecessors were as consistently "conservative."

ALTERNATIVE TO JUDICIAL REVIEW

The best defense of this role of the courts is to contemplate the alternative. In administrative law that alternative would be to allow administrators to determine, subject to political controls, their own powers. Such political controls are new legislation, Presidential direction, and political pressure. New legislation would depend upon the contingencies of politics and the delays of legislative procedure and, once enacted, would have the meaning given it by those it was designed to limit. Presidential direction does not presently apply to several administrative tribunals for the significant reason that, their duties being so analogous to those of courts as to be considered quasi-judicial and their orders being subject to only limited judicial review, Congress has made them plural bodies whose members have overlapping terms and may not be removed by the President because he disagrees with their decisions. So vast has the national bureaucracy become that, even in relation to those agencies which are directly responsible to the President, his span of control stretches very thin; while, in any case, Presidential direction is by nature primarily political rather than remedial. It is notorious that political pressure from Senators and party chiefs spells favoritism rather than the insurance of impartiality. Political control would thus offer no specific or adequate protection to private interests against administrative orders, and might actually cause or aggravate administrative abuses. With administrative authority otherwise unrestrained, two great evils would be likely to arise. On the one hand, official decisions which were not liable to challenge before an independent third party would lack respect, receive at best reluctant compliance, and often be evaded through political influence and with a clear conscience. On the other hand, removal of the possibility of such challenge would be removal of restraints which that possibility now makes wholesomely operative.

BROADER ISSUES

The objection which has been under examination raises still broader issues when applied to the bearing upon administrative law of a feature of our constitutional system which does not exist in England or France: judicial review of statutes. Our courts may hold an administrative determination invalid not only because it is unauthorized by the governing statute, but also because that statute is itself unconstitutional. This unconstitutionality may of course relate as well to the administrative as to the other provisions of the statute. In order, moreover, to avoid a constitutional issue, the courts may give an exceedingly narrow interpretation of statutory administrative powers. It is thus not possible for American legislatures, as it is for the British Parliament, to define the scope and methods of administrative action, and to narrow or eliminate judicial review thereof, without these enactments being subject to invalidation at the hands of the courts.

Opposition to judicial review of statutes centers upon a ground which has no special reference to administrative law. From democracy conceived as an absolute dogma, and from a formalistic identification with democracy of whatever representative institutions bring forth, there is deduced the conclusion that every enactment of such institutions must be given the force of law.

The subject is too large for treatment in this place; but a few remarks may be ventured, with administrative law especially in mind. The first premise of civilized government is the sacredness of every human personality as having been in some sense made in the image of God. From the conclusion that in the long run government is more apt to conform with this premise if conflicts of interest are resolved only with the consent of a representative assembly chosen by universal suffrage in free elections and with free discussion, rather than by any sort of traditional or self-appointed elite, it by no means follows that the authority to govern, even with the consent of such an assembly, is in any civilized society unlimited.

Government is civilized only if the resolution of conflicts of interest is limited by recognition that all men and all groups and lawful organizations of men have mutual interests in the basic civil liberties, in procedural and substantive fair play for all, and in having disputes arising out of particular situations adjudicated by an independent third party.

Recognition of these limits may of course be provided in more than one manner. It may be so firmly embedded in the habitual moral convictions of a people that the resulting moral restraints are on the whole adequate. If it is not to some extent so embedded, it cannot be secured by any purely artificial means.

AMERICAN ATTITUDES

We Americans stand somewhere between these extremes. The essential restraints have high authority from our past to support them; and there are courageous men in every generation to appeal to that authority. But we also have habits of irresponsibility which enable the passions of the moment to override civilized restraints. It is probably well, therefore, that the constitutional limitation of due process, or fair play, is embodied, as obligatory even upon representative assemblies, in the fundamental law of the nation, and hence is to be applied as law when a court sits as an independent third party to settle a dispute between an administrator who relies upon a statutory provision and a private party who claims that that provision authorizes a denial of fair play.

Similarly, if judicial review of administrative action is a sine qua non of civilized government, should the supreme law of the land not ensure that the independent third party shall have untrammelled authority to exercise it? And how can it ensure this unless it gives that independent third party the last word on the scope of review which constitutionally must be allowed by statute?

THE ROLE OF CRITICISM

To justify judicial review in principle is not, however, to place it beyond criticism. General principles do not decide borderline cases. The choices which the Supreme Court is constantly making are choices of statesmanship, and judicial statesmanship, like political statesmanship, can falter and fail.

The suggestion may be hazarded that, aside from its deplorable stand in the matter of utility rate-making by administrative commissions, the old Court's most grievous failure, which justly brought judicial review into disrepute and almost inevitably led to the crisis of 1937, concerned administrative law less than such subjects as freedom of contract and dual federalism.

The new Court has corrected those errors, whether or not by going too far it is not possible here to inquire. It has also upheld Congress in devolving upon administrative agencies powers which, in the scope of their discretion, are in sum impressive, and to many alarming. Yet for the Court to refuse to sanction the vesting of such administrative powers, or so to control their exercise as to hamstring administrative action as a means to permissible statutory ends, would be to defeat with one hand policies it declared constitutional with the other. It would be to deny to Congress the "necessary and proper" means of carrying into execution its delegated powers. If our once individualistic democracy has been increasingly socialized, surely the devil is neither Congress nor the Court, but the industrial-technological revolution.

What has been said makes apparent the urgent importance of judges' of all grades being men of sensitive conscience and exceptional wisdom and of their having their minds and consciences advised by the most searching criticism of their work by philosophers as well as lawyers and dissenters from the bench, exponents of the humanities as well as social scientists. It is, however, always to be remembered of and by the critics that theirs too is a fallible human judgment.

Nor is it to be forgotten that judicial statesmanship is of a different order from political statesmanship. The criteria which the Supreme Court and its critics should consciously apply in administrative law are implicit in the rationale of judicial review of administrative action. It is the task of this independent third party to weigh in the scales of judgment conflicting ends which are always represented in the administrative law cases it decides by the parties at its bar. One of these ends is to have specific enforcement in individual cases of the statutory and constitutional limits of administrative powers. The other end is that the governing process be not rendered ineffective by undue judicial interference.

To say this is not to furnish a formula for the ready-made solution of particular problems; but it is the first lesson of wisdom that all such supposed formulas are illusory. It is, in truth, but to state a dilemma; but it is the second lesson of wisdom that the problems of life always appear as dilemmas. Without this realization men are apt to seize one horn without even considering the other, and thus to doom themselves to one-sided judgment.

In conclusion, a word to the layman. Were examination of administration and the courts now to proceed from the realm of generality to such specific questions as the methods, scope, and timing of judicial review, he would doubtless be surprised by two things. One would be, how many are the forms which the indicated dilemma in fact takes; and the other would be, how difficult the choices often become for anybody who does not focus his attention upon one of the competing ends to the exclusion of the other. The judicial task of maintaining a balance by sustaining administrators here and restraining them there is one of the highest that can be assigned to mortal men.

Staff and Management Controls

By HERBERT A. SIMON

AT the outset, it may be well to explain what the word "bureaucracy" means to me. In my vocabulary it does not serve as a swear word—a label for the quintessence of all I dislike about government—but as an approximate synonym for large-scale organization. In this, I think I conform to the original meaning of the term, although hardly to current popular usage. And I assume that the neutral sense of the term is intended in the title of this volume.

Big Government, along with automobiles and the atom bomb, is here to stay. It is conceivable, although not probable, that Big Government may become Slightly Smaller Government by decreasing in scale from hundreds of billions of dollars to tens of billions, but it will not become Small Government. As in the case of other natural phenomena, it needs more to be explained, understood and dealt with, than to be bemoaned. And it can even be strongly argued that a large part of the bemoaning is based on misinformation as to how Big Government operates in our country.

Large-scale organization inevitably creates problems of control. In every organization in our society there is always some person or group of persons whom we regard as having the legitimate right to determine the organization's program and the way the program is carried out. In business concerns, the legitimate right of control rests with the stockholders; in government, with the citizens. The problem of control is the problem of implementing that right. The board of directors in business concerns and the legislature in governments are formal devices whose main concern is the implementation of the right of control, and these are supplemented by many other devices, formal and informal—political parties are an example.

The problem of control is a serious one in large-scale organization because of two related facts: (1) those who legitimately control it simply cannot cope with its size—they have time neither to find out in detail what is going on nor to decide what should go on; (2) the employees in the bureaucracy may use this absence of accountability to further their own purposes, which may not be the purposes of the legitimate controllers. There is nothing about this situation that is peculiar to government. The executives of any large business spend most of their time dealing with these same problems: securing adequate motivation of manual workers and middle-level executives and supervisors, securing co-ordination of goals and activities, combating the venality of employees who are tempted to steal tools or accept bribes from vendors.

The phenomena we call "corruption," "confusion," and "inefficiency" in large-scale organization are the symptoms of the inadequacies of the control process. And the phenomena we call "red tape" are largely the unintended effects of our attempts to strengthen the controls by formalizing the procedures for co-ordination, communication, and review. "Red tape" is, so to speak, the secondary reaction produced by the sulfa drugs we have prescribed for the primary infection of lack of control.

CONTROLS OVER RESOURCES: THE BUDGET

Every military commander knows that when he has committed his reserves, he has had his say—he retains painfully little control over the subsequent course of the battle. It would be only mild exaggeration to say that, similarly, when the budget has been approved and resources allocated to programs and departments, the top level executives in large organizations have had their say. Control devices can help them ascertain that the resources have been used for the general purposes intended, but can have little detailed effect on the precise way in which they are used.

The budget is essentially an expenditure plan for a specified period of time, usually a year. Two basic kinds of decisions have to be reached in order to establish a budget; and to understand the budget process it is essential that they be distinguished clearly. First, there are decisions as to the objectives to be reached—the kinds of services and the quality of service to be provided. Second, there are decisions as to how much money, if it is spent efficiently, is required to meet these objectives. Much of the confusion that surrounds public discussion of “economy in government” can be traced to a failure to distinguish these two aspects of the problem. When we demand governmental economy do we mean that we want fewer and poorer services, or do we mean that we think the same services we now have, and the same quality of service, can be provided for less money?

A simple analogy with our household budgets will illustrate the distinction. If a husband asks his wife to economize on the food budget, does he mean that meat should be on the menu less frequently or that she should shop for the meat more carefully? The first is a question of service levels, the second a question of efficiency. And I am sure that any husband who supposes he can accomplish substantial economies in the food budget by improving efficiency, without affecting quality, will find a very unreceptive audience in his wife.

It is easy to cut a budget, governmental or otherwise, simply by refusing to appropriate more funds. But to cut a budget without reducing service levels—that is, by increasing efficiency—is an extremely difficult feat in a large organization. It is accomplished, if at all, by a painstaking re-examination of specific administrative operations—an examination that can be undertaken only with the help of the members of the bureaucracy whose efficiency is to be improved.

Here, as elsewhere in large-scale organization, control from above and without is a poor substitute for motivation from within. High-level review of budgets is an important tool for determining what services shall be provided, and at what levels. But the road to control of efficiency lies in a different direction: in the direction of a bureaucracy that is professional in its attitude towards its management tasks and that is technically equipped to find efficient ways of doing its work. Such a bureaucracy can be assisted in its search for efficiency by specialized units, but the function of these is more in the nature of “consultation” than in the nature of “control.”

Looking at the budget, then, as an instrument for allocation of resources and the determination of service levels, what can we say of budget practice in the federal government today? We can say, first, that a major advance has been made over the past thirty years in the fact that the federal government has a budget procedure that permits the President and Congress, in a reasonably orderly way, to view the expenditure program as a whole; and that it has in the Bureau of the Budget a considerable staff of trained personnel who can contribute real strength to the control process by their preliminary review of departmental appropriation requests.

Having noted this major accomplishment, we can ask what remains to be accomplished. Among the lines along which major improvements can be made in present federal budgeting are these: (a) reduction in the practice of making supplemental appropriations; (b) elimination of the confusion between commitments and expenditures; (c) development of techniques for measuring what the dollars buy as well as how many dollars are spent; (d) development of techniques for comparing alternative budget plans.

Supplemental appropriations

It is an all too common practice for federal departments to return to the Congress for supplemental appropriations when they have exhausted the funds appropriated to them for the budget period. The existence of this practice on a large scale is in itself evidence of the failure of controls. But the blame for the practice is not to be laid solely at the doors of the administrative agencies. We must not naïvely suppose that supplemental appropriations are required simply because agencies have failed to reduce service levels or increase efficiency as required by the mandate of Congress and the President—although this may sometimes be the explanation.

Another, and legitimate, reason for supplemental appropriations is the inability of the budget planners to anticipate what expenditures will be required. The fact that there was no budget in June of 1950 to fight the Korean War was not regarded as a reason for not fighting it. Unexpected international and domestic developments undoubtedly account in part for the practice. Over and above this, it must be pointed out that the controllers are often as much at fault as the controlled. If Congress enacts legislation that makes certain expenditures mandatory and then refuses to make appropriations adequate to meet these expenditures, a supplemental appropriation is inevitable. Moreover, if administrative agencies learn through this practice that the Congress does not always mean what it says when it reduces appropriations, the controlled cannot be expected to take the controllers too seriously. We have here a serious breakdown in control that has deep roots in the political process.

Commitments and expenditures

It is a common misconception that if Congress appropriates fifty billion dollars to the federal government for the year 1999, then fifty billion dollars, more or less, will be spent in 1999. In reality, a considerable part of the fifty billion dollars may be appropriated for battleships, hospitals, and bombers that will not be completed until the year 2001. And during 1999, the federal government may be spending additional large sums that were appropriated in previous years. In present federal budget practice, it is an extremely difficult accounting feat to deduce the spending rate from the amounts of the appropriations, and Congress encounters a corresponding difficulty in understanding how much it is really spending.

Measuring what the dollars buy

The idea that expenditure proposals should be classified in such a way that they can be related to the services purchased has gained widespread attention as a result of the Hoover Commission's advocacy of “performance budgeting.” The concept of “performance budgeting” goes back, under other names, at least thirty years, but the progress toward achieving it at any level of government has been less than spectacular. To develop a meaningful performance budget for the federal government is an extremely important task that will require a major research effort costing millions of dollars. What now goes on in the federal government under the label of "performance budgeting" is a pale shadow of the full-bodied idea.

The first step toward a performance budget involves a major reclassification of federal accounts so that we can discover how many dollars are being spent to provide each service. The second, and more difficult, step is to devise techniques for measuring the amount and quality of the services provided by each expenditure.

Some examples of performance budgeting can be found in the Forest Service, which has been employing the technique for more than fifteen years. From the Forest Service budget we can find out how much it costs to protect forests from fire—because the accounts are arranged in a way that brings all these costs together. On the service measurement side, we can also find out how many acres of forest are being protected; and with respect to results, we can find out how many acres are destroyed each year by fire. Other examples of the same kind can be cited; but as an over-all matter, only a small part of the total federal budget can now be analyzed in even these rough terms.

Comparing alternative budgets

None of the improvements discussed thus far solve the sixty-four dollar questions that have to be answered in any budget process: "How much additional service will an additional dollar buy, and how much less service will result from a dollar cut?" and "Could we get the same service for fewer dollars by doing it in a different way?" These are, of course, the questions of service levels and of efficiency with which we began our discussion of budgeting.

Make no mistake about the difficulties involved. How easy is it to estimate how many acres of forest land will be saved if we increase the fire protection appropriation by a million dollars? And how do we determine whether the million dollars should be spent for tractors, or for lookout towers, or for manpower, or in some other way? And if we can answer this question for fire fighting, how do we answer it for expenditures on tanks and planes?

In raising these problems, I do not mean to imply that they are hopeless of solution. But perhaps in the light of the difficulties that have been enumerated, the earlier estimate of a research effort requiring millions of dollars will now not seem unreasonable.

AGENCIES OF CONTROL: "LINE" AND "STAFF"

We have said that the problem of control in a bureaucracy arises basically because the controllers cannot cope with its size and complexity. The budget reduces this complexity to some sort of order, but hardly to a scale where it can be handled effectively by a President and a Congress. "The President needs help," said the 1937 President's Committee, and cries for help for both President and Congress have been frequent and strident.

Specific proposals for providing this help most often take the form of new agencies—"staff agencies" they are usually called—designed to share with the executive and the legislature the responsibilities of control. In the federal government, for example, we have a Budget Bureau, a Civil Service Commission, a Comptroller General, and a General Services Administration, all of which are involved in one or another aspect of the control process.

But does not this solution contain a fundamental paradox? The federal government is too large and complex to be controlled effectively by the President. We will remedy this by creating a new agency, thus increasing its size and complexity. Instead of having his dozen department heads to deal with, the President will now also have a Director of the Budget.

Are staff agencies "different"?

Those who recommend the proliferation of staff agencies as a solution to the problem of control deny this paradox by arguing that staff agencies are "different"—both in their relation to the controller and in their relation to the controlled. They are "different," it is said, in their relation to the chief executive because they "represent him," they "act for him" or "in his name," they are "a part of him." They are "different," it is said, in their relation to the bureaucracy because, unlike the chief executive himself, they do not "actually exercise authority," they "only advise and inform"; when they give orders, they exercise "the chief executive's authority, and not their own."

I must confess that this kind of language has always baffled me—as it must baffle laymen who have not grown accustomed to its constant use in the literature of administration. The President needs help to control the Department of Agriculture, say, because in the absence of such help he cannot be sure that the Department will accept his purposes, and those of the Congress. The Bureau of the Budget is to give him that help. But what guarantees that the Bureau will not develop its own bureaucratic purposes, will not implement these instead of the President's? The steward guards that the servant serve the master. But who guards that the steward serve the master?

Stripped of its metaphysical clothing, the argument for the staff agency is based on the premise that a relatively small administrative agency not possessed of special responsibilities of its own will be more likely to identify with the President, and less likely to develop its own bureaucratic purposes, than will a large operating agency. Stated thus, the proposition is not without plausibility, and has perhaps even some empirical evidence in its favor—although the evidence has really never been examined in a systematic and scientific way.

But if this is the reason that the staff agency helps in control, we should expect its effectiveness to be in inverse relation to (a) its size and (b) the degree of internal specialization within it. If the staff agency is large (and even the Budget Bureau numbers its employees in the hundreds), it has its own internal problems of bureaucratic control. And if there is much specialization within it, the over-all viewpoint identified with the Presidency will gradually yield to the partial viewpoint of specialized goals and objectives. When the Civil Service Commission has a disagreement with the Secretary of Agriculture—the one preoccupied with the problems of governmental personnel, the other with the problems of agriculture—which one "represents" the President and the will of the Congress?

What about the relations of the staff agency with the bureaucracy it is supposed to control? Again, the idea that "the staff agency does not really exercise authority, but only speaks in the name of the President" must be treated as myth rather than reality. If the President acts on the recommendations of a budget examiner for a reduction in a request from the Department of Commerce, the authority is, in some legal sense, the President's, but the judgment is the examiner's. The Secretary of Commerce, at least, will be under no illusions as to the authority exercised over him by the Budget Bureau. He will realize that only a small fraction of the disagreements that arise between him and the budget examiners can be appealed to the President—that the function of the Bureau is precisely to relieve the President of this burden of decision.

The price of control

In summary, we see that the processes of control can be strengthened by creating agencies whose primary function is to provide an "independent" review of the action of the administrative departments. But we see also that a price must be paid for these additional controls. The price is made up of several components: (1) the actual salary and other costs of operating the control agency, (2) the development of goals within the control agency that are not identical with the goals of the executive and legislature, and (3) the limits that are placed on the operating departments by the control agencies, which restrict the discretion of the department executives in discharging the responsibilities that are placed on them.

This last category of costs, costs arising from the limits placed on operating departments—leads us to the subject of "red tape." The summary report of the Hoover Commission contained this analysis, full of unintended humor, of the problems of control in the federal government:

Definite authority at the top, a clear line of authority from top to bottom, and adequate staff aids to the exercise of authority do not exist. Authority is diffused, lines of authority are confused, staff services are insufficient. Consequently, responsibility and accountability are impaired.¹

What the Commission did not point out—or see—was that the staff services, whose "insufficiency" it deplored, were a primary cause for the confusion in lines of authority that the Commission equally deplored. Let us cite a concrete example. One of the important functions of the Department of Commerce is to gather a wide range of statistics about the operation of the American economy. The notion of a "clear line of authority" would imply that the Secretary of Commerce and his subordinates should make the decisions involved in carrying out these statistical functions, and should be judged by the results. But before any federal agency can send a questionnaire to a business firm, the questionnaire must be approved, in its complete detail, by the Division of Statistical Standards of the Bureau of the Budget. The DSS is charged with the responsibility of eliminating duplication in federal questionnaires and ensuring the technical adequacy of statistical studies. Under these organizational arrangements, who is to be held responsible for the quality of the statistical services of the Department of Commerce? And how many review steps, over what period of time, must a questionnaire undergo before it is employed by the Department?

In spite of the delays and the ambiguities in responsibility that are inevitably created when such a review process is established, the advantages of the review may well outweigh its costs. But in assessing its value, it is important that we try to measure the net benefits, after all these extra costs have been deducted, and that we not delude ourselves into thinking that we have gained something for nothing. The staff agency can be a valuable device for solving difficult problems of control in large-scale organization, but it is a device that needs to be used sparingly and with discretion. It is a real question in my mind, and in the minds of other observers of large-scale organization, whether further improvement of control in the federal government calls for a greater, or a more restricted, use of this device.

CONTROL AT THE LOWER LEVELS

Thus far we have viewed the problem of control from the high mountaintops of the Presidency. The problem is of course duplicated at successively lower levels of the government. Most federal departments and bureaus, and many of the lower-level units, are of sufficient size to experience all the difficulties of large-scale organization.

Not only are the problems similar in these lower-level units, but many of the same solutions have been adopted. The budget process is of value not only to the President in weighing the competing claims of departments, but equally to the department head and bureau chief in controlling the allocation of resources within their respective units. Staff units, too, of varying degrees of elaborateness have emerged within the departments and bureaus: personnel units, budget units, organization and methods units, and others. Twenty years ago, the development of such staff units outside the military departments was most rudimentary; today they are a prominent feature of most federal units of any size, and of many state and municipal organizations as well—the appointment of an administrative officer in the City of New York being a recent instance of the general trend.

It is not necessary to repeat here our previous analysis of staff assistance. The same issues as those discussed earlier apply as we move down the administrative ladder to organizations of smaller size and lesser complexity. Units specialized for control functions can make a contribution at all these levels, but generalization is hardly possible as to how many are desirable or at what specific levels.

But as we move down the structure, mechanisms of control other than specialized units take on increasing importance. In administrative organizations having a fairly cohesive purpose, and drawing their professional staffs from a relatively homogeneous background, "internal" mechanisms take on more and more of the burden of control. The United States Public Health Service, for example, draws the largest part of its professional staff from the medical profession. In so doing, it is able to use the whole structure of controls which that profession impresses on its members. I do not refer to the official pronouncements of the American Medical Association, or to "professional ethics"—although both of these are important—but to the whole set of values, techniques, and standards of professional competence that the members of the profession have in common, and that are enforced through the constant interaction of practitioners and the significance they attach to the approval of their peers.

Professional standards do not guarantee conformity with the values of society or of its political mechanisms. Librarians may want more libraries, public health practitioners more clinics, fire chiefs more equipment, than citizens want or are willing to pay for. Hence, professional standards do little to simplify the resource allocation process that is the central purpose of budgeting. A budget process and top-level political review of budget allocations are still absolutely necessary to mediate the claims of the various professions, each with its own conception of the public welfare.

But if professional standards help little to solve the problem of service levels, they help a great deal to solve the problem of efficiency. Efficiency must start at the "grass roots" of the bureaucracy; it must permeate each small part of the mass of activities performed by a large-scale organization. And we have seen that the available techniques for control from the top are particularly ineffective for the task of detailed day-to-day supervision. The motivation toward efficient administration must derive primarily from the bureaucracy itself—from the professional standards it imposes on its members and the desire it instills in them to do a good job as judged by their fellows.

Although no careful comparative study has ever been made of the efficiency of government agencies, it appears to the casual observer that there is a high correlation between managerial efficiency and the degree of professionalization of a particular agency. The Forest Service, with its close parallel development of the federal agency and of university programs in forestry, is a case in point.

Government and business compared

Much has been made of the absence of the "profit motive" as an explanation of why government agencies are less efficient than business organizations. Even if we accept the assumption, which seems to me somewhat doubtful, that government agencies are, across the board, less efficient, I am not sure that the explanation holds water. In the first place, in any large business concern there are many activities whose contribution to profit cannot, in fact, be assessed in any very accurate way. In the second place, in the absence of a profit criterion, a professional group motivated to do a good job will develop score cards for excellence to take the place of the profit criterion. Much remains to be done, in both government and business, to develop and improve such score cards, and to relate the criteria of the smaller component units to the over-all goals of the organization. If the work on performance budgeting is carried ahead with sufficient vigor and imagination, it will in time contribute to the development of such criteria.

CONCLUSION

We have seen that the problems of control in large-scale organizations can be made to vanish only by doing away with large-scale organizations—something unlikely to occur in the modern world as we know it. Short of making the problems vanish, there are some things we can do to make them manageable, but only after a careful assessment in each case of benefits and costs. One such way is to develop, along the lines already projected, a budget process that would assist in the intelligent allocation of society's resources to the many governmental services that compete for them.

A complementary line of approach is the careful and judicious development at various levels within the bureaucracy of units whose primary function is to assist in the control process. In order to do this intelligently, we shall need to be more realistic than we have been in the past as to just how such units operate, what consequences they have in terms of authority, responsibility, and "red tape," and how far their values outweigh their costs. With the rapid growth of "staff" agencies over the past generation, the immediate need is probably more for reflection and consolidation than for multiplication.

Finally, the control of governmental efficiency will make its progress primarily through the developing professionalization of the bureaucracy itself. Careers in governmental service must become more respectable and respected—an item in which our progress has been mostly backwards since the war.

The examples of the professional corps and the university-profession-agency relationship that characterize some of the most efficient governmental operations need to be extended over a wider range of governmental functions, and over such time-honored municipal activities as fire, police, and public works administration.

In one sense these goals are nonpolitical—they can be accepted by Democrats and Republicans alike. In another sense they are intensely political. The rate at which they will be attained will depend critically upon public attitudes toward government. If the public accepts the common stereotype of the lazy, venal "bureaucrat," it will not expect efficient, responsible government, and it will not get it. To the extent that the public recognizes that the problems of efficiency in government are as serious as, but no more serious than, these problems in other large-scale organizations, we can expect substantial progress toward these goals.

Interest Groups and Bureaucracy

By EDGAR LANE

IT should no longer be necessary to defend the proposition that men's diverse interests define their political existence. While appeals for a common rededication to the convenient ambiguities of "the national welfare" are among the conventions of American campaign oratory, they fly in the face of much that we know (or should know) about ourselves. We are awed, even flattered, by descriptions of government as a distant monolith, greater somehow than the sum of the social parts from which it derives and exigent of the good citizen's total allegiance. But we actually pattern our collective life on the somewhat different principle that government is merely a specialized instrument for the protection or frustration of the various ends that groups of men happen to regard as important. Once grant that men have the right to differ on fundamentals, that they have the right to want more for themselves than for others, that they further have the right to seek by any honest means to impose their wishes on their fellows, and it could not have been otherwise.

Since these concessions lay close to the heart of our national life, there should be nothing startling in the fact that, from colonial times on, men and groups of men have sought both to prompt and to prevent the exercise of governmental power. This involves what Willard Hurst has called "if not the fundamental object of government . . . at least an aspect of government's main purpose," which is simply "that men should come to it, all the more so because what they want may be against the general welfare."¹ We need not here examine "the general welfare" as an objective reality. It is enough to say that it may at least reflect an operational consensus, and that one measure of a democratic order is the extent to which it protects men's right to assail it.

GROUPS IN POLITICS

A politics based on men's interests, organized to a greater or lesser degree, is not peculiar to the United States, or to constitutional republics, or, for that matter, to systems conforming to broadly democratic values. Even totalitarian states, theoretically enlisted in total service to parahuman ends, exhibit in practice a distinct, if fetal, species of interest politics. Our experience, rather, is distinguished by the unusual degree to which our interests have been organized and by the special conditions under which they have been politically effective.

Constructive analysis of interest politics in America must begin with the multifarious activities of organized groups—"pressure groups," "lobbies," or "interest groups" in the social scientist's more descriptive term. The origins and nature of these groups and their role in the political process have been extensively treated elsewhere, most notably in David Truman's The Governmental Process.² It would be redundant to say more here than that life is always less simple than it used to be, that we can no longer hope to live it substantially alone (if we ever could), and that the development of meaningful associations with others is the civilized man's response to the otherwise incommensurable bewilderment of the world in which he lives. Groups arise when and because men perceive the interests they hold in common. These interests, in turn, flow naturally and in great quantity from the functional specialization and diffusion of human relationships which largely define social growth. In the United States, a mobile and expanding population, a self-generative technology, an unquenchable regionalism, vast and usable material wealth, a broadly protected tradition of free political association and expression, and highly developed instruments of mass communication have all conduced to the proliferation of organized groups. The structure of our governmental institutions—diffused and accessible—has contributed no less significantly to the process.

And as the substantive jurisdictions of government have, largely under the spur of specialized group efforts, expanded so as to involve the significant shared interests of more and more people, more and more continuously, so have the groups organized around these interests become permanently active in seeking to affect or mitigate what government does. We do not have accurate knowledge of how many groups seek to impose their claims on agencies of government, nor do we know how much human or material expenditure their efforts entail. The Department of Commerce lists more than four thousand national associations alone, to say nothing of local, state, and regional groups. How many of these have been politically active in any significant sense? On the national level, more than five hundred groups have been deeply enough engaged in legislative politics to concede some liability to comply with the disclosure requirements of the Federal Regulation of Lobbying Act; several hundred others have not complied, although they are represented by hired agents who have. No parallel data are available as to the number of groups substantially engaged in seeking to affect administrative decisions, but there is no reason to assume that the aggregate figure would be any smaller.

Character and cost

If we do not know how many active political interest groups there are, we know even less of the character and cost of their exertions. Group reports filed under the Lobbying Act have recently indicated group legislative expenditures of approximately ten million dollars annually, but it is quite clear that this figure only begins to reflect the realities. In the states, the absence of uniform disclosure laws makes discussion of group activity the more hazardous, although it is plainly extensive. It is equally plain that on no level of government is public policy conceived, enacted, or applied—nor can it be understood—apart from the men whose interests are somehow touched by it.

The growth of political interest groups in America has been of special importance in the growth of public bureaucracies, at least partly because the concomitance of the two processes has been so little perceived. While "lobbying" and other overt manifestations of group political effort have conventionally been regarded as involving only the legislature, interest groups have been under no obligation to bend their activities to the abstract verities of separation of powers. They have been and are active, rather, wherever governmental decisions affecting their membership are made. In an era marked by the relative decline of legislative prestige and authority, the groups' concern with administrative policy-making is thus as natural as it is intense.

One aspect of the long-standing interrelationship between interest groups and administrative bodies is reflected in the establishment of agencies concerned primarily with clientele and service like the Veterans Administration or the Departments of Labor, Agriculture, and Commerce. Some of these agencies have developed directly out of politically articulate group demands for public subsidies and benefits, or for protection against the demands of other interests. In other cases, the establishment of a public agency serving a more or less unorganized clientele has served as a catalyst for the more effective grouping of the interests concerned, as well as of those interests which might be disadvantaged by the new agency's activities. Of the latter situation, the history of securities regulation in the United States is perhaps the readiest example.

Equally in point is the more recent development of a distinctive administrative process in agencies structured along other than purely clientele lines. Operating under general legislative charters, these bodies have been increasingly charged with the formulation and enforcement of binding rules affecting private persons. It should occasion no surprise that these persons and the groups in which they are organized should seek by every available means to ensure the conformity of the rules to their own interests. Their right so to do, moreover, has been explicitly recognized and procedurally safeguarded in such enactments as the federal Administrative Procedure Act of 1946. Irrespective of its special origins and purposes, legislation of this kind can be taken as a practical reflection of the depth of group involvement in administrative politics and as an effort to inject into the latter certain of the expectations of reasonable openness and equality of approach that have at least formally been associated with group-legislative relationships.

Action on various fronts

This does not mean that groups have turned their attention away from the legislatures; they act, rather, on different stages at different times, or on several stages simultaneously. At the risk of considerable oversimplification, one might contrast Collis P. Huntington's single-minded quest for outright congressional gifts with the very much more complex program of the Association of American Railroads, which might at one time be pressing Congress for statutory relaxation of the Sherman Act, petitioning the Interstate Commerce Commission for higher freight tariffs, and "educating" the electorate to the evils of publicly supported highways. These tactics and concerns are not unique; they demonstrate only the extent to which all groups, if they are to be effective, must conform their efforts to changing distributions of political power and changing patterns in its exercise. It is less a question of having so much energy to expend than of somehow finding enough additional energy to participate effectively in an ever widening decision-making process. Groups must constantly attune themselves to the working competence of government, which their own demands tend inevitably to enlarge.

GROUPS AND ADMINISTRATION

To say that groups are as significantly involved in the administrative as in the legislative process suggests the difficulty of precise delineations of group tactics in the two areas; they merge within groups as they may vary among them. For one group, informal personal entree to decisional centers may be sufficient to ensure a total accommodation of public policy to group objectives. For another, the most massive or determined external public relations campaign may accomplish or prevent nothing. One need think no further than organized labor's unsuccessful effort to head off the Taft-Hartley Act in 1947. Tactical choices or necessities hinge on such diverse variables as group resources and membership, on the group's prestige and promotional position, on the ease of its contacts with the inner reaches of government, on the nature and probable consequences of the policy at issue, on the innovative or preventive character of group objectives, on the presence or absence of well-entrenched competitive interests, on precedent, public expectations, preference, or simple hunch. The ways of group politics are many, and if they have never been fully catalogued they have been sufficiently described in the literature to obviate the need for further discussion here.

We should note, however, that the common strain in all group political effort is the achievement and exploitation of linkages between group preferences and the behavior of public officials—legislative, administrative, or judicial. Here, in essence, is "the group problem," if such there be. A group's political success depends on its ability to create and use official identifications with itself—to destroy, in effect, the fiction that a man becomes a political eunuch when he takes an oath of office. The problem is not so much that this fiction is one of the fundamental conceptual binders holding the system together as that it is destroyed with such fearful ease. The spark of life for the political interest group is thus its conversion of a phrase like the "public interest"—a deeply meaningful thing in a democratic order—to a self-serving shibboleth.

We are talking, in brief, about what the Douglas Subcommittee on Ethical Standards in Government more or less generically referred to as "involvement." In the simplest sense, this means nothing more than almost every man's penchant for approaching the world from the standpoint of his own inexplicit or inarticulate major premises. More difficult are those situations where the premises are shriekingly articulate, or, to change the figure, where the view is determined by deliberately polarized blinders. Our problem is the role of the interest group as shaper of premises for the bureaucratic mind and hanger of blinders on the bureaucratic nose. And since this is less a problem of "pressure" than of preferences, it is a boundlessly difficult one to analyze, describe, or solve.

THE REPRESENTATIVE BUREAUCRACY

Much of the current literature centers on the political interest group as a representative phenomenon, as a spontaneous but inevitable growth resulting from the manifest inadequacies of our system of undifferentiated territorial representation. Although it has led some observers to propose extreme institutional reconstruction along functional lines, this emphasis has been both accurate and essentially wholesome. It has, however, served to focus an excess of attention on the relationships of groups and explicitly representative bodies—that is, the legislatures—to the relative neglect of the administrative bureaucracy in its representative aspect. We are only partly right in equating the growth of bureaucracy with the development of expertise as the result of complex problems or the assumption by government of broader social responsibilities. For this complexity is seldom easily perceived, the assumption by government of new responsibilities is never a simple matter, and the view of bureaucracy as expert is often merely a deft piece of institutional public relations. Although operating under different patterns of public expectation, acceptance, and control, bureaucracy in the United States, in its origins, functioning, and ultimate accountability, is as representative as the Congress or the state legislatures.

But whom does bureaucracy represent, and how do interest groups affect its representativeness? We have already referred to the clientele basis of a substantial part of our administrative organization. Here is perhaps the simplest case of representative bureaucracy, exemplified by such agencies as the Departments of Labor and Commerce. Although having somewhat different origins and purposes, many of the "independent" "regulatory" agencies have also come to perform distinct services for the interests whose activities they were ostensibly created to police, a statement of which the pattern of public utilities and transportation regulation in almost all jurisdictions should be obvious and adequate proof. Under these circumstances, a regulatory mission can quite readily become a representative one. Other agencies have explicit representative arrangements worked into their formal structures or operating codes, a tendency of which the National Industrial Recovery Act was the supreme (although by no means the only or most recent) case in point.

This is interest representation within the bureaucracy of a fairly direct sort. More tenuous but even more durable are those group-agency linkages which rest on practice, personality, and tacit understanding. We need only note, for example, the almost universal assumption that certain high offices will be staffed from certain interested sources. Martin P. Durkin's brief travail as Secretary of Labor can be taken as a demonstration of the rigor with which such conventions are apt to be regarded, even under the most adverse conditions.

Bureaucrats in interest groups

This process, of course, has an even more significant converse; not only have bureaucrats been drawn from an associational milieu, but key figures in interest groups have also not infrequently been drawn from public life, bringing with them, it may be assumed, a web of experience and personal contacts which cannot but secure more hospitable hearings for group claims before their successor bureaucrats. Thus, an assistant chief counsel of the Interstate Commerce Commission becomes vice-president in charge of the Law Department of the Association of American Railroads; an Assistant Secretary of Agriculture becomes president of the United States Beet Sugar Association; an assistant general counsel of the Civil Aeronautics Board becomes general counsel of the Air Transport Association. The situation is familiar beyond the need for further illustration, and in each case it is difficult to withhold the conclusion that the client group is specially advantaged over its competitors.

What does this mean? On one level of analysis, it means that the groups concerned are not only one up on their less privileged counterparts but that they are also deriving the benefit of skills and relationships developed at considerable public expense. For this, the community must assume at least some responsibility, for so long as it persists in suffering its highest officers to subsist on journeyman wages and periodically retiring to private life the most forthright or committed among them, it is making their absorption by more narrowly defined interests inevitable. The fact that they have generally been absorbed with material profit to themselves is not necessarily evidence that they have "sold out" either the public or their own integrity, or that their employers are debauching the commonwealth. Although to a deeper social ethic it might be repugnant, according to the values which prevail in society at the present time there is nothing reprehensible in making unique and valuable experience available to anyone who is willing to meet the price, just as there is nothing reprehensible in meeting the price—or even in setting it irresistibly high. That there are men reluctant to capitalize privately on their public selves does not justify condemnation of those who make a different choice. We might better be grateful that the choice still exists.

Beyond the advantages which it affords the more strategically positioned groups, the constant and easy interchange of personnel between groups and bureaucracy suggests the limited value of the notion of externally applied group "pressures." The truth is that we should be less concerned about group "pressure" than about its absence. We should be concerned about those quietly stabilized group-agency relationships which preclude (or at least render meaningless) the conventional external demonstrations—demonstrations which groups nonetheless persist in making and which people who should know better persist in regarding as important. Interest groups become a real problem when they cease clamoring for attention. Silence accompanies the sure fix rather than the free market.

GROUP POLITICS AND THE PUBLIC INTEREST

Some group-agency linkages have apparently become so fixed and complete as to bring in question the basic function of so extensive a public bureaucracy as ours. This function is not easily described, but a few observations may be in point. In the first place, for all the current and sophisticated derogation of "the public interest" as a standard of reference or achievement, it remains the only one to which we can honestly repair. We may not know what "the public interest" entails in individual situations, but we court disaster in the long run by denying that it is even knowable. This is to say only that a democratic order cannot operate indefinitely in purely segmental terms. No matter how demanding the claims of its special clienteles, a bureaucracy must at very least make a brave show of being responsive—as it is ultimately responsible—to a broader consensus.

There is no good reason to deny that the main impact of groups on the administrative process is disruptive of an orderly and conscientious approach to this fundamental problem. The basis on which much of our administrative apparatus has developed, the close ties between groups and bureaucracy, the differentials in group resources and access to the bureaucracy, the very breadth of the responsibilities to which this bureaucracy is heir—all conduce to the making of decisions on the basis of immediate situations, a tendency against which all but the most heroic reconstruction or programmatic leadership can avail little. No blame attaches to groups which thrive on the proximity and vastness of the administrative state, but it is futile to deny their prosperity.

It would be equally futile to assert that the apparently chaotic tugging and hauling of groups on government must bring the system down in ruins about it. Somehow, as one of the contributors to this volume has noted elsewhere, "the public interest" is observed in the administrative process more often and more faithfully than we might suppose—or than we deserve. We can still point to administrative decisions made squarely counter to the wishes of every significant group concerned, decisions traceable solely to the vision or stubbornness of dedicated men.

Nor are we entirely without weapons for asserting more strongly the broader consensus on which the system truly rests. Administrative integration offers possibilities which have not yet begun to be explored. The reshaping of the political party into a mature, unified, and responsible force—a development for which there appears to be an increasing ground swell—could contribute no less tellingly to the shaping of rounded and consistent public policy, at least somewhat less subject to the diverse strains of group interests. The general application of the disclosure principle to group-agency relationships would almost certainly further the same end. The present Federal Regulation of Lobbying Act is suggestive of the form such disclosure might take, as well as of its possible results. The redrafting or more stringent enforcement of the present conflict of interest statutes would also have a wholesome influence, although scarcely a conclusive one.

Each of these approaches deserves the most careful consideration. No one of them, nor all of them together, can be expected to alter the underlying realities of which group political effort on the administrative level is merely symptomatic. They are, candidly, tangential in character, but nothing more fundamental is even remotely likely. There is no point in discussing means by which group politics might be curtailed, or by which administrators could be rendered immune from the presumed taint of their interests or experience. Better frankly to work within the limits of the possible. Within these limits, the tools for building a bureaucracy of maximum devotion to the public interest are more than sufficient. It remains only to use them.

Edgar Lane, Ph.D., Syracuse, New York, has taught at the University of Michigan, and Syracuse and Princeton Universities. In 1950 he served as a consultant to the House Select Committee on Lobbying Activities (the Buchanan Committee), and from 1950 to 1953 was managing and associate editor of the Public Opinion Quarterly.

Administrative Integration

By EDWIN O. STENE

EVERY large social organization is characterized by the presence of strong centrifugal forces which tend to generate autonomous operation of segments, and counteracting centripetal forces designed to draw the many activities into an integrated unity. In modern American society, with its traditions of political democracy and individual freedom, the centrifugal forces seem to be the more spontaneous and the more readily accepted by participants. The maintenance of a unified outlook and integrated operation, on the other hand, requires constant attention and planning on the part of an organization's executives.

Although the forces of integration in American governmental operations have been strengthened and systematized in recent decades, they have been faced with new and more powerful forces of disunity, and at the same time the enlarged span of governmental activities has increased the difficulties of integration, as well as its importance. Among the most important of these new forces of disunity is that of specialization—both specialization within the bureaucracy and specialization of pressure groups that seek to exert influence upon government.

SPECIALIZATION

America is a land of specialization. Specialization in industry, combined with the development of machines and assembly lines, has become a major contributor to our high productive capacity. But specialization is not limited to industry or even to business enterprises. It also characterizes the learned professions, the skilled service trades, and many areas of government service.

Skill at specialized work is a contributor to high efficiency, but it is also a disintegrating factor in organized effort, especially when associated with a large-scale organization and with weak counteracting forces of unity. Because specialists devote their time and effort to limited areas of activity, they develop a high degree of skill in the work they perform. But these skills tend to be narrow and intense, and to be accompanied by specialized knowledge and limited interests as well. Skillful performance of specific tasks means high productivity, provided the work is meshed with other parts of the total undertaking. Without effective integration, however, intense specialization among workers and among organization units may become an impediment to efficient and responsive public service.

Specialization tends to produce a concept of rights in the specialty, not infrequently accompanied by a neglect of or disregard for the broader rights of the community. Such narrow interests are reflected in jurisdictional conflicts among labor unions, and in the self-protectiveness often displayed by professional leadership. Small group loyalties tend to develop, together with concepts of "ins" and "outs" and somewhat of a contempt toward the "outs." Specialized groups develop a respect for their own colleagues, and doubts about the outsiders. These in-group loyalties often extend beyond the areas of performance in the specialties, and sometimes result in an inclination to disobey superiors who are not in the same specialty and to frown upon requests for intergroup co-operation. Loyalties within specialized groups tend to become particularly strong in large organizations where the individuals can easily restrict their primary associations to members of their own specialties and to subordinates of distinctly lower status.

Large-scale industry has probably demonstrated the greatest success in the use of specialized skills. That success, however, is not due merely to the fact of specialization. It is due in some measure to the fact that workers can be trained rather quickly for specific jobs, and also in large part to the fact that industry has developed highly integrated management controls. The authority of management is recognized in industrial operations; unified planning has developed extensively within the management group; and the function of management has emphasized the co-ordination and integration of activities. Moreover, the mechanized assembly line, which is largely a creature of management planning, serves to co-ordinate the specific and repetitive activities of workers. In contrast to the successful use of specialized labor in large industry, the development of specialization among the non-industrial labor crafts has resulted in relatively little increase in productivity, and sometimes in none at all. For example, bricklayers, stonemasons, and other skilled workers who do not make use of assembly line machines often do not produce as much per hour today as they did a half century ago.

In government the benefits of specialization have been relatively limited. The limited degree of achievement in this area is due in large part to the presence of other disintegrating forces that support the separatist tendencies of specialized work. Another reason is a lack of strong integrating forces that would give unity to the operations. Consequently there is need for emphasis upon integrating techniques in governmental bureaucracies—a need more urgent than is found in many other large-scale enterprises. But before the character of these integrating techniques is discussed, a further word should be said about the other separatist forces present in governmental operations.

OTHER DISINTEGRATING FORCES

To a large extent the forces of disintegration in American public administration arise out of the structural character of government. Some of them result from the mere size of the bureaucracy; others are due more to the structures established by laws and constitutions, and to the parallelism that has developed between the specialized administrative areas and the professional and industrial associations which seek to influence governmental action.

A major force of disintegration in state and local government, especially, is the traditional practice of electing administrative personnel. Historically, city governments were so organized that almost all important officials were elected. In more recent years the governmental structures have been simplified, but divided administrations still persist in many cities, and the multiplicity of elected officers remains almost as before in our state and county governments. These elected officers have autonomous areas of responsibility and interest, and they are not unlikely to resent attempts to integrate their work with that of their colleagues. Moreover, petty officers, whether elected or otherwise independent of a central administration, are poorly equipped to resist the pressures of specialized groups within their own organizations or among the interested professional and vocational associations on the outside.

A second important force of disintegration is the multipurpose character of governmental objectives, as represented by legislative policies. Government does not make a single product or even a small number of products such as characterize the output of most industrial plants. Its services are many and varied, and the legislative bodies are required to deal with a variety of seemingly unrelated goals. Sometimes those goals are in conflict one with the other, either in appearance or in fact. The legislative acts originate from different sources, and one proposal may be considered and acted upon with little or no concern at the time for its possible relationship to other policies that have been developed at other times for different specific purposes. Moreover, an administrative agency ordinarily carries out a program associated with a particular area of legislative action, and so its own goals seem unified and important, because the legislation with which the agency personnel is familiar expresses that importance clearly and positively.

Multipurpose governmental objectives are naturally associated with many different pressure groups. The most effective pressure groups strive for specific benefits ordinarily associated with specialized professions or industries, and very often they deal with specialized personnel within the governmental bureaucracy. Such special interest groups are seldom concerned about the problem of integration. To them that form of governmental organization is most desirable which will provide efficient and economical service in their own area of interest. Not infrequently they advocate semiautonomous governmental units under the leadership of boards which will represent the interest groups. Over-all integration of the bureaucracy, on the other hand, tends to lessen the importance of the specific objectives which these groups support and to make facilities for communication between the groups and the bureaucracy less convenient.

Another force which often supports disintegration is the political party system. Professional party workers, especially, tend to favor small unit autonomy. They find it more expedient to promote programs that please many specialized interest groups than to promote broad interest programs; and autonomy among small agencies within a bureaucracy makes the conflicts less obvious. Moreover, the problem of satisfying patronage seekers is a little simpler when promoted through many small organizations than when it must be pressed upon a unified bureaucracy. Manipulations for political benefit are not as easily publicized in a decentralized administration, and, like the pressure groups, the parties can more easily overwhelm the less important public agencies.

Local loyalties

In a large bureaucracy such as our national government, the geographical separation of governmental agencies constitutes still another important disintegrating factor. Distance makes communication difficult, and tends to emphasize the informal solidarity of the neighborhood group as against loyalty to the larger organization. The many studies of headquarters-field relationships emphasize the difficulties encountered by central bureaucracies in their attempts to maintain unified policy when working through many widely scattered local offices.

Finally, there is a tendency among group leaders—whether specialists or not and whether located in central headquarters or in isolated field areas—to strive for autonomy and to build loyalties among their own personnel at the expense of the broader loyalties. Informal association, the relative ease of internal communication, and the interest in specific, clear-cut objectives facilitate the building of local loyalties.

On the other hand public service is always an intangible objective difficult to comprehend. Water-plant operation or veterans' rehabilitation is much more easily understood by the workers and is likely to seem more important than the intangible idea called "service to the public."

To summarize in another way, the principal obstacles to an integration of governmental activities are (1) seemingly unrelated or conflicting purposes within the bureaucracy, (2) local loyalties among the subordinate groups, and (3) difficulties of maintaining free communication throughout the entire bureaucracy. These obstacles are especially difficult to combat in a large organization such as our national administration. However, they may also be important in small organizations if accompanied by legal structures that grant status and independent authority to several small divisions within the administration.

NEED FOR INTEGRATING FORCES

In the face of these forces of disintegration, present to a greater or lesser degree in every bureaucracy, there is a widespread demand for strong integrating forces in the governmental operations. Our problem is to achieve the goal of unified operation without destroying the basic democratic character of these operations.

"Service to the people" is a vague and much abused slogan, but it represents an objective that would be almost universally accepted in America as a proper function of government. The term could include many specific and unrelated services; yet a unity is inherent in service to the people even if it involves no more than a need to see that the programs and activities do not neutralize or immobilize one another. There are many areas of possible internal conflict, and so there is need for an overview that can serve to detect those areas and attempt to make them work in harmony rather than at cross purposes. The unity of purpose tends to be lost sight of especially in large-scale governmental organizations; hence the need for integration is the greater.

Despite some objections that "efficiency is not a goal," economy of operation is a universal need, and every government must seek to avoid unnecessary duplication and waste of effort and to minimize internal conflict. There again the achievement of the vague but important goal requires the presence of integrating forces.

The term "administrative integration," as ordinarily used, relates to the co-ordination and unification of operations within the administrative branch of a single governmental unit, such as the national government, a state government, or a municipality. Integration is essential within the major subdivisions of the bureaucracy as well as for the administration as a whole, and there are times when the activities of different governmental units may be sorely in need of co-ordination. In this discourse, however, attention is given to the integration of services within one unit of government.

BONDS OF INTEGRATION

Before enumerating the particular programs designed to integrate the bureaucracy, a word should be said about the principal forces that tend to bring the many activities and functions into a single unified program of co-operation. These forces, the bonds of integration, will be discussed in the order of the emphasis that they have been given historically in administrative surveys and in literature on administration from the time the subject became a major field of study.

The bonds of integration may be structural in character, or they may be procedural, or they may be psychological. Structural bonds relate to the lines of authority and the locations of working groups within the bureaucracy. Procedural bonds concern the ways in which work is performed, the lines of communication, and the flow of papers or other working materials. The psychological bonds arise from the habits, loyalties, and other intellectual and emotional attitudes of the participants as individuals and as groups. These main threads of integration are not independent of one another; often they are bound together or tangled in such ways that it is difficult or impossible to distinguish one from the other. Yet, for the purposes of conceptualization and analysis, they may well be considered separately.

Each of the specific bonds of integration has been emphasized at different periods of our national existence and in different situational areas. The emphasis has been determined in large part by the historical development of our governmental operations, and also by the conceptual scheme in the minds of the planners and leaders of programs. The nature of the counterforces of disintegration necessarily influences the programs of integration, as do the values placed on the different subordinate programs of any particular bureaucracy.

Students of administration have tended to fall into different schools of thought regarding the importance of integration and regarding methods to be applied. Shifts might be explained in terms of the development of administrative thought, but they have also reflected the needs and the lines of strategy designed to deal with problems that have existed at different stages of history. This latter fact is sometimes overlooked by those who criticize the more traditional schools of thought. For example, the early reorganizers emphasized centralization of authority in order to deal with a virtually complete autonomy that existed among many operative units of the bureaucracy. More recently, along with new developments in sociology and psychology, students of administration and administrators place more emphasis upon the informal aspects of organization. That does not mean that these newly emphasized factors have been proved superior to the old; rather they have supplemented the structural integration and have clarified our understanding of concepts of structure and procedure.

PROGRAMS AND METHODS OF INTEGRATION

No program of integration has achieved so great national significance as that of administrative centralization, represented by the reorganization movement. That movement can be traced back to the late nineteenth century, when the strong-mayor plan of city government and the short-ballot proposals came to the forefront. Reorganization of state governments became popular in the second decade of the twentieth century, when the New York Bureau of Municipal Research submitted its report on the New York State government, and when Governor Frank O. Lowden's reorganization program in Illinois and other state reorganizations attracted widespread interest. Leaders of the New York Bureau also participated in President Taft's Commission on Economy and Efficiency, but the Commission's report did not emphasize centralization of power as much as did the state reorganization reports, perhaps because the national government was not in need of basic constitutional centralization.

The conceptual scheme of the reorganization movement was expressed by A. E. Buck, in his reports setting forth standards of administrative organization.¹ From the point of view of integration, the standards included (1) centralization of authority in the governor, (2) functional organization of the state bureaucracy into a few departments, and (3) single administrators heading those departments and having full authority over subordinates within their departmental jurisdictions. The Buck theory of administrative integration has been criticized severely, on occasion bitterly, almost from the time it was systematically pronounced; and in recent years it seems to have lost its standing of respectability among political scientists. Yet the basic ideas of integration through centralized control form the heart and driving force of almost every state reorganization program to the present day. Moreover, the same ideas were fully accepted by the President's Committee on Administrative Management in 1937 and by the Hoover Commission in 1949. One of the strongest recent pronouncements of the doctrine of integration by centralization of authority is found in the report of the Hoover Commission, which advocates "a clear line of command from the top to the bottom, and a return line of responsibility and accountability from the bottom to the top."²

At the municipal level the doctrine of integration by centralized control found expression in the strong-mayor plan of government, and even more positively in the council-manager plan. Early rationalizations of these forms of city government emphasized the importance of the power to command and to hire and fire subordinates. The use of those powers—or even their possession in fact—never approached the positive-ness of the doctrine; and now the forms of government are justified primarily on other grounds. Yet the legal structure of authority remains basically the same, and its exclusion from either form of city government has been found to undermine the pragmatic advantages. Significantly, the commission form of city government, which became popular for a time because of its simplicity of structure and its use of the short ballot, later came to be regarded as a weak form of government. Its weakness lay in the fact that it violated the basic concept of integration by centralized authority, and consequently it fostered the free play of local loyalties and conflicting programs.

Achievements of centralization

The emphasis upon administrative centralization was a natural and reasonable response to the trend that characterized governmental organization throughout much of the nineteenth century. That trend was in the direction of electing numerous administrative officials and even some clerical personnel, toward the use of independent boards in charge of important branches of local and state government, and away from executive leadership. The countertrend of the twentieth century is far from complete, although considerable progress has been made. Yet it has been found that centralization alone does not overcome the separatist tendencies; or if the top control is sufficiently ruthless to achieve those goals, the accomplishment is accompanied by other and less desirable experiences. Nevertheless, centralization has achieved important successes, partly as a direct result of authority but also because it has been associated with other changes. Local loyalties have not been as strong or as inconsiderate of the over-all objectives as they were under decentralized bureaucracies. Conflicting purposes have been more likely to come to light and to be mitigated somewhat; and communication has been facilitated to the extent that the chief administrator or executive officer takes more interest than formerly in all activities of government.

Procedural changes

Integration by means of procedural changes has been emphasized in the organization and management programs of the national budget bureau and within some of the line departments, in studies of organization and methods at state and local levels, and in the development of emphasis upon program budgeting and staff planning. Originally the overhead functions of government—budgeting, personnel, and accounting control—were designed in large part to centralize control and to eliminate specific evils of spoils politics and legislative uncertainties. The more recent organization and management programs have been designed rather to eliminate waste motion at the operating levels and to promote program planning. The results have been an increase in over-all planning and, more important, an integration of procedures within the operating departments and agencies of government.

One weakness of the functional reorganizations under the early state programs was that, even though related agencies might be brought together under common leadership, the subunits too frequently remained as autonomous as before and procedures were virtually unchanged. The establishment of the Kansas Department of Revenue and Taxation in 1939 provided an example of the older tendency as well as the effects of procedural studies. The department was created with a view to consolidating tax collecting agencies of the state under a single leadership. Most of those agencies had been in two previously existing departments, and they had operated as relatively autonomous units responsible only to the leadership of their respective departments. Legislative action in 1939 laid the groundwork for more unified operating procedures, but that unity did not result from the mere consolidation of agencies. For a short time each division remained a distinct operating unit as before, performing all activities necessary to the collection of income taxes, sales taxes, or other specific revenues of the state. In the particular case, however, the legislature had appropriated funds to finance a survey of operations with a view to installing new procedures. As a result the mail receiving and cashier services were consolidated in a single office, and other common functions of the several tax collecting units were integrated. The integration was not complete, partly because division heads had been appointed before the consolidation could be effected; but it was a marked improvement over a mere unification under a single leadership.

In recent years administrative surveys and procedural changes have perhaps contributed as much or more to the integration of governmental operations as have reorganization acts. However, it must be remembered that the consolidation of procedures would be difficult or impossible except after control over operation had been centralized to a relatively high degree.

Psychological integration

The third, and in many ways the most important, method of integration is the development of common loyalties among employees and officials. This method represents a psychological identification of interests within the governmental unit as a whole, or within the entire bureaucracy, as distinguished from loyalties to the minor parts only.

In a sense the spoils system of appointment and tenure provided a unity of spirit. Employees of all divisions within the bureaucracy had a sense of indebtedness to a common political organization. But the common bond was the party organization rather than the bureaucracy, and the interests and efforts of government personnel were attached to the incidental objectives of public service. So far as integration of public service was concerned, party loyalty was an obstacle more often than a help.

After the shift from spoils politics to the merit system, emphasis tended to center around control by authority and by specific job assignments, with the results that employees often knew virtually nothing about the governmental operations outside of their own immediate environments, and that they tended to consider the central overhead agencies as little more than nuisances which caused delays and other interferences with the work of their operating units. Although loyalties shifted from party organization to the bureaucracy itself, and to superior personnel within the bureaucracy, there was a trend toward psychological disintegration rather than unity.

Psychological integration is only now beginning to draw the attention of administrators and political scientists. Private corporations are starting to recognize the value of reports to employees, of personnel counseling services, and of other demonstrations of interest in employee satisfactions. Manager governed cities are blossoming forth with investigations of employee attitudes and are engaging in other activities that call to the attention of employees the common interests of the entire city administration, and some of the departments and agencies of state and national governments are working toward similar objectives. Perhaps the most successful large public agency, so far as psychological integration is concerned, has been the Tennessee Valley Authority, where strong feelings of common interest were developed almost from the beginning.

The process of psychological integration is slow. To give it too much formalism is to destroy its objectives, while, on the other hand, the failure of officials to recognize its importance leads to separatist tendencies regardless of the organization of authority. Unlike centralization of authority, which may be instituted by legislative action or by directives from top management, and unlike procedural integration, which may be instituted by management services or by agency leaders, psychological integration occurs through the interplay of vaguely defined attitudes and behaviors at all levels of participation, including even the general public.

CONCLUSIONS

Forces of administrative integration have made significant progress in recent years, but at the same time they have been faced by increasingly difficult problems. The most important of these problems has been rapid expansion of government, and especially of the bureaucracy, for integration becomes increasingly difficult as the size of the bureaucracy becomes larger. In many ways, the new devices for integration have scarcely kept pace with the growth of our administrative organizations, at the national and state levels especially.

Another obstacle to effective integration has been the pressure of conflicting economic and political interests, many of them basically opposed to integration of the bureaucracy. Special interest groups tend naturally to seek autonomy and prestige for those branches of government with which they feel most closely associated. The integrating forces within the bureaucracy find, therefore, that their increased efforts are often countered by increased efforts of outside groups to maintain local autonomy and to resist unification.

Sometimes the errors of overcentralization tended to interfere with integration rather than to promote it. An overhead or staff agency which takes on excessive control in its own specialized field may meet resistance in the form of increased local loyalties among line services which it seeks to control. The specialized interest of the staff agency, like the specialized interest of line agencies, may interfere with the broader objectives of government; they may create antagonisms which divide the loyalties of the personnel; and they may serve to complicate the operating machinery. In such cases integration may actually result from a degree of decentralized control combined with new lines of responsibility and new efforts to promote psychological unity.

Constant attention is required to develop and maintain an integrated bureaucracy. Sometimes the emphasis needs to be upon centralized authority; sometimes it should center around communications; sometimes around operating procedures; and sometimes around the loyalties and motivations of personnel. At times the ends are better achieved by formal decentralization than by formal centralization. Whatever the strategic devices for integration, full achievement is never attained and perhaps not desired. Yet, within the limits of democratic operation, the struggle for integration of the bureaucracy must be a continuous struggle in a changing society where new developments both within and outside of the government tend constantly to foster disintegration and divided loyalties among the governmental personnel.

The Problem of Service Levels

By WILLIAM S. CARPENTER

THE problem of service levels has confronted the American people since the foundation of the colonies. The timely adjustment of local services to local government areas troubled the colonists of Virginia no less than those of Massachusetts. Throughout the long experience with local government on this side of the Atlantic the readjustments of areas and services have had to establish a balance among the factors of self-government, effective service areas, and taxpaying capacity. Upon the satisfactory establishment of this balance has depended the success of local government.¹

Government is basically a bundle of services to be performed in behalf of the citizens. When local government units were first created in the American colonies the framework was largely determined by the method of making a living in the particular colony. From an early date the economic existence of Virginia became rapidly dependent upon the cultivation of tobacco. "This colony is founded upon smoke," declared one royal governor as he returned to England in disgust. In order that tobacco raising might not be hindered, all forms of urban life were discouraged. Demands for the creation of towns went unrewarded. Virginia's Cure, a pamphlet which appeared in 1662, advocated the building of towns to promote religion and education. Bacon's Rebellion in 1676 gave rise to the demand for towns as a protection against the Indians, but the act of 1680 authorizing towns and storehouses was for the encouragement of trade and manufactures. This act was disallowed, but in 1705 the mercantile interests succeeded in obtaining the passage of the Act for Ports, which provided also for towns. The opposition to the act among the agricultural interests of Virginia proved to be too great, and it was repealed in 1709 by Governor Spotswood without having been put into effect. Neither in Virginia nor in the other southern colonies did towns come into existence until the chartered boroughs were incorporated in the eighteenth century.

THE NEW ENGLAND TOWN

While the county remained the familiar unit of local government in the southern colonies, Massachusetts and other parts of New England saw the rise of the town. Civil government in New England had to be consistent with religious ideals. Many of the early settlements were undertaken by congregations of people who came from England bringing with them their pastor and their church organization. These colonists were interested in the important business of making a living, but they were also immediately concerned to prevent interference by outsiders with their religious institutions. In the formation of local government, the New England settlers found models for their guidance in their ecclesiastical establishments.

Puritans in religion, the early colonists in New England had recourse to the church covenants through which various groups, electing their own pastors and teachers, declared their independence of the ecclesiastical authority of England. The formation of civil communities also sprang from the free will of the inhabitants. Neither definite land policy nor formal legal sanction marked the establishment of the first settlements. The five original towns in Massachusetts—Dorchester, Watertown, Cambridge, Salem, and Roxbury—were founded without express authorization, and it was not until after the transfer of the charter to the colony that indiscriminate settlement ceased. The Court of Assistants on September 7, 1630, ordered "that no person shall plant in any place within the limits of this patent without leave from the governor and assistants, or a majority of them." At the same time it was directed "that a warrant be sent to Aggawam to command those that are planted there to come away." Thereafter the original towns were accorded the same treatment as those whose inception was due to the General Court.

The New England town was a self-contained community centering about the church. The Massachusetts government in 1635 "ordered that no new house be built more than a half a mile from the meeting house in any new plantation to be established by the general court." More than one meeting-house could be built in a town, but only with the consent of the freemen given at a town meeting or by special order of the General Court. Although the Massachusetts settlers insisted upon the separation of spiritual and temporal authority, they agreed with John Calvin that the primary function of secular rulers is the care of piety and religion.

Legal status

The Massachusetts towns had no legal status because they could not be incorporated. Governor Andros, when he came to Massachusetts, is reported to have denied the existence of towns as legal entities. The governor was supported by a contemporary pamphlet which declared: "For you generally call that a town in America where a number of people have seated themselves together, yet 'tis very well known 'tis in name only, not in fact. I take that body of people to be a town, properly so called, who by some act of law have been incorporated, and in that sense there is no such thing as a town in Massachusetts, neither was there a power to make such before his Excellency's arrival, for one corporation cannot make another." Since the colony of Massachusetts Bay was the creation of a corporate charter, it could not give life to another corporation.

Although charters of municipal incorporation could not be issued by the Massachusetts General Court, a crude organic town act was passed on March 3, 1635/6, which recited that "the freemen of every town, or a majority of them, shall only have power to dispose of their own lands and woods with all the appurtenances of the said towns, to grant lots and make such orders as may concern the well-ordering of their own towns, not repugnant to the laws and orders of the general court." Such grants of rights and privileges did not confer corporate rights upon the towns, and the people of Boston in 1650 petitioned for a charter of incorporation. The matter appears to have been debated at some length before it was admitted to be outside the jurisdiction of the General Court.

The uncertain legal status of the Massachusetts towns was to some extent corrected in 1694, when the government of the province passed "an act to enable towns, villages, precincts, trustees for schools, and proprietors in common and undivided lands, grants and other estates or interests . . . to sue . . . and to defend all such suits . . . as shall be commenced against them."

By this act town affairs were to be closely supervised by the government of the province. It must be remembered, however, that laws after 1691 were enacted under the provincial charter, which provided that the assent of the king was essential to their validity. It was not until March 23, 1786, after the creation of a state government in Massachusetts, that the inhabitants of a town were formally declared to be a body politic and corporate and as such capable of suing and being sued.

THE MIDDLE COLONIES AND VIRGINIA

In the meantime chartered boroughs began to make their appearance in the middle colonies, where the advantages of trade as an adjunct to agriculture were recognized. In 1665, New York was created as a municipal corporation but did not receive a charter from the governor until 1686. Thereafter, until 1746, municipal incorporations were frequent in the middle colonies and in Virginia. There were no permanent incorporations in New England and only two south of Virginia. By 1776, municipal charters had been granted to twenty-three cities and boroughs in the colonies. The charter of Norfolk in 1736 recited that the place was "commodious for trade and navigation," and most if not all municipal incorporations were made in response to demands from commercial interests. These charters emanated from the crown, and were granted immediately by the governor or proprietor of the colony, although they were sometimes amended by acts of the legislature.

COLONIAL PRECEDENTS FOR READJUSTMENTS OF AREAS AND SERVICES

The methods of action whereby the readjustments of areas and services are accomplished are as old as the institutions of local government. The colonial precedents which today condition local government in the United States embrace not only the accepted local subdivisions of counties, towns, cities, and boroughs but also the devices whereby the units of local government can be adapted to the efficient performance of public services. Consolidation and annexation have their roots in colonial practice, and the special district in a variety of forms was early adapted to the performance of services which could not be obtained readily from the existing units of local government.

The rapid increase in population throughout the New England colonies led to the subdivision of towns in order that the people might be near the place of worship. New towns were ordinarily created in response to petitions from the localities, but these became so numerous that in Massachusetts they aroused the opposition of the provincial government. The distinguishing characteristic of a Massachusetts town was the right to send a full representation to the General Court. The creation of new towns meant an increase in the number of deputies to be elected by the people and thereby might lead to the destruction of the balance of power among the different branches of the provincial government.

The dilemma which confronted the Massachusetts colonists was resolved by the creation of special districts. As early as 1702 the special district had appeared as a device to secure to isolated groups of inhabitants the consolidation of religion. By an act of that year, "the inhabitants of each district, or precinct, respectively, regularly set off from any town, shall be and are hereby empowered to name and appoint a clerk, as of right towns by law have; and also assessors for the assessing and raising a maintenance and support for the minister of such district or precinct, and to make out a warrant, in form as by law prescribed for town rates or assessments, directed to the constable of the town or district. . . ." A further step was taken in 1752, when the service range of special districts was enlarged. In that year a portion of the town of Salem was erected into "a distinct and separate district by the name of Danvers." The inhabitants of the new district were to enjoy all the powers, privileges, and immunities of a town, "except that of separately choosing and sending one or more representatives to represent them at the general assembly." In other words, they were to have full powers of local government but were not to participate in colonial legislation through representatives of their own choice.

In Connecticut the special district took the form of a village created within a town or plantation. In 1680 the inhabitants on the east side of the river in the town of New Haven complained that they were too far distant from the church, and petitioned that they might become a village. The village of East Haven was established and was granted the powers of a parish. Whatever local services may have been furnished, the village did not have the responsibility for the care of the poor. This service continued in the town of New Haven. In 1707 the village of East Haven was made a village district, the act reciting that it acquired the powers of a town.

At the same time that colonial legislatures were subdividing towns and creating special districts they were also bringing about the consolidation and annexation of existing units of local government. From the very nature of the situation there were few consolidations, but annexations were frequently undertaken in order to provide more efficiently for the performance of local services. Throughout the eighteenth century the units of local government existed as agents of the province to supply those local services which the colonial legislatures wished to have performed.

CONSOLIDATION AND ANNEXATION— POSTCOLONIAL

Since the formation of the Union the methods of action through consolidation and annexation have been made available in some form by general laws in most of the states. Of course, in all states it is possible for the legislature to proceed with such readjustments through special acts, and the general laws on the subject in Massachusetts are designed merely to secure uniformity in petitions to the General Court for special acts of annexation and consolidation. The New England states have made very few provisions for readjustments of this kind, and neither consolidation nor annexation has been widely used in this section. Elsewhere the two devices have been applied by general laws to the readjustment of counties, townships, municipalities, and special districts. The statutes providing for annexation are more numerous than those for consolidation, and greater use has been made of them. It is superfluous to add that all general legislation on this subject is permissive in character; no modern legislature has attempted to follow the few colonial precedents of mandatory consolidations.

Consolidation involves the combination of two or more separate legal jurisdictions into one. It is ordinarily successful only where the jurisdictions to be consolidated are similar in social, economic, and other characteristics to an extent that will enable the new jurisdiction to function smoothly and efficiently. The voters of each jurisdiction contemplating consolidation should have the fullest opportunity to explore in advance of any final decision the advantages to be obtained from consolidation. There will ordinarily be opposition to any proposed consolidation.

This is sometimes wholly sentimental, but often has a stronger foundation. The consolidation of a rural community with one which is highly urbanized is likely to be mischievous. Since consolidation leads to uniformity in tax rates and assessments, it is likely to be accompanied or at least followed by demands for uniform services throughout the area. The attempt to extend services appropriate to an urban area throughout a rural community, where they are unnecessary and unwanted, may become a costly burden on a jurisdiction resulting from consolidation. The attempt to join a poor community which is heavily in debt to a prosperous neighbor nearly always leads to difficulties. In any case, there is likely to arise opposition from officials and public employees who fear the effect of consolidation upon their jobs. Careful consideration of all the elements in each situation should precede any vote on a proposal for consolidation.

Annexation is a method of action whereby the boundaries of a legal jurisdiction are extended to embrace additional area within an adjoining unit of local government. This procedure is peculiarly applicable where an urban unit and a part of a contiguous unit have become one community in fact, though not in law. In point of fact, every consolidation and detachment is also an annexation, since all territory must belong to some political subdivision. But annexation ordinarily is applied to territory which has already come within the service range to which it is to be joined. Although there is a solidarity of interests between the people in the two areas, difficulties are sometimes created by the governing body in the legal jurisdiction from which territory is to be taken. It must be remembered that in annexation three parties are involved, the people of the territory to be annexed, the people as well as the governing body of the unit of government to which the annexation is to be made, and the people and the governing body of the local subdivision which is to be diminished by the annexation. Little difficulty is likely to arise if the territory is small in area and embraces few ratables. But where any large amount of territory is to be changed from one legal jurisdiction to another, the more appropriate method of action is by consolidation.

INTERJURISDICTIONAL AGREEMENTS

Recourse to the procedures of consolidation or annexation has been less frequent than reformers desired because of the ease with which units of local government find means to continue their existence. In other words, a great many local governments are able through interjurisdictional agreements, grants-in-aid, and other devices to maintain themselves, although the citizens might be better served if more drastic changes were made in the structure of local government. Taxpaying capacity remains one of the most important criteria of sound government. But people will often for sentimental reasons cling to forms of government which by logical arguments can be shown to lack economy and efficiency.

An interjurisdictional agreement is a contract, written or implied, among two or more political subdivisions of a state or states for the accomplishment through joint action of a result which each is authorized to obtain independently. Agreements may be verbal or in writing. Quite frequently they are definitely authorized by statute, but many jurisdictional agreements find statutory anchorage in legislation which was not enacted with this end in view.

Co-operative enterprise through agreements cannot be justified on general principles. Each case must be decided on its own merits. Two or more jurisdictions may very properly build a bridge or construct a sewage disposal system. Where joint action has been undertaken in the fields of health and welfare the results have generally not justified the action. These are services which are better performed by transfer to the county or the state. Small units of local government should not undertake through joint action to perform services which are more properly confined to larger jurisdictions. In other words, this method is not universally valid for the readjustment of services and areas in local government.

Two views of interjurisdictional agreements are possible. The first is that co-operation among the units of local government is undesirable because it serves to continue the existence of many tiny units which would otherwise be forced to fold up. Municipalities which are too small or too poor to provide the necessary public services for their inhabitants ought to yield their powers to the county or the state and cease to function. If the conditions are favorable for consolidation or annexation, the areas unable to perform services for themselves ought immediately to join neighboring units to form self-sufficient political subdivisions of the state. In either case nothing is gained by postponing the day when a formal readjustment of areas to the performance of services must be made.

The second and more hopeful view is that co-operation will bring about the consolidation of areas more surely and more speedily than a policy which keeps units of government apart. Local officials learn by co-operation with their neighbors how to achieve results which they could not obtain independently. The rural township may indeed be the vestige of a political environment which has already passed away, but few people are willing to agree to its abandonment until they know how the services confided to it are going to be performed. When a number of important services are being conducted economically and efficiently through joint action by two or more units of local government, it is not a great step to co-operation in all functions of government.

STATE SUBSIDIES

Grants-in-aid or subsidies from the state to assist local governments in the performance of services are common throughout the United States. These take the form of grants similar to those made to the states by the federal government, or shared taxes. The latter comprise allocations from motor fuel taxes, motor vehicle registration and license fees, liquor taxes, income taxes, and sales taxes collected by the state. The amount allocated to a particular unit may depend upon the amount collected there, or may be determined by population or some other basis. The services supported by state aid vary among the states but schools receive generally the largest amounts from such grants or shared taxes. Every state now provides some financial aid to local governments through grants-in-aid or shared taxes, or both.

There has been a growing tendency in recent years to provide state aid for the general financial support of local government rather than benefits for specified local purposes. Some controversy has been aroused over the merits of state aid. On the one hand, it is argued that since the acceptance of state aid is usually accompanied by some state supervision, the local government authorities too often shirk their responsibility and neglect their duties. The result is a weakening of local government. On the other hand, advocates of state aid point out that most local services are state-wide in their importance. For example, a sound school system is of interest to the people everywhere. It is therefore the duty of the state to equalize the local tax burden so that units having small taxpaying capacity can be guaranteed the same amount and quality of local services as the units having much taxable property. The advantage appears to lie with the proponents of state aid. As long as the local governments are restricted to the property tax as the chief source of local revenues, community needs can probably never be satisfied out of local taxes. The state or the federal government, or both, will of necessity have to assist in bolstering the finances of local governments.

School districts

That is not to say that evils have not been created by policies adopted for the administration of state aid. Tiny school districts have been kept alive by state subsidies when sound educational policy has declared they should have been abolished. The Superintendent of Public Instruction in Michigan announced in 1951 that there were 4,918 school districts in the state. Of these, 3,168 had a population under one thousand and employed less than six teachers while 949 districts gave no instruction but sent their children to schools elsewhere. A careful study indicated that there should be no more than 253 school districts in all of Michigan. These school districts would be delimited in terms of community areas, with sufficient taxable property and sufficient child population to assure an adequate elementary and secondary educational program. Many of the problems of financing education in Michigan were found to stem from the inadequate and uneconomic organization of school districts.

The cure of such evils is within the power of the state legislature. While most people would agree that state subsidies to local jurisdictions must continue, they will expect that the greatest amount and quality of services will result from public expenditures. It makes no difference whether the tax dollar is derived from the property tax in the community or from one of the numerous sources of state revenue. The same degree of care in its expenditure is imposed upon governmental authorities.

It is the obligation of the legislature to scrutinize closely the devices through which state aid is distributed. No formula can remain constant in an environment which is rapidly changing. The Texas legislature in 1949 was confronted with more than five thousand school districts distributed among the 254 counties. In that year it revised its formula for the distribution of state aid to education and established a foundation program. The local fair share of school costs was to be calculated and the state was to pay the difference necessary to maintain a minimum standard of education. The act also provided that any school district which remained inoperative for a period of two years would be consolidated by the county superintendent with those districts to which they sent their children. The result has been to reduce the number of school districts to approximately two thousand.

Public attitude toward public employees

The emphasis in recent years has been upon the improvement of salaries paid to local government employees, including schoolteachers. This has been necessary, or many jurisdictions would have found their public services understaffed. But compensation is not the only factor in public employment. Nobody expects to become rich through working for the government. At the same time, any man or woman who enters government service has a right to be respected by the citizens of the community, as long as duties are faithfully performed. The overwhelming majority of public employees are conscientious, loyal, and industrious men and women who are genuinely interested in their work. They should be encouraged to take an interest in the program of government as a whole. Unfortunately they are too often rebuffed by citizens who regard them solely as sinecurists. A change in the attitude of citizens towards public employment could do much to improve government.

THE TRADITION OF LOCAL SELF-GOVERNMENT

The successful readjustment of areas and services in local government depends upon a contradiction and its outcome. On the one hand, the traditional theory of democracy in the United States has emphasized the importance of keeping the conduct of the public services, which are the real ends of all local government, constantly under the scrutiny of the community. Thomas Jefferson warned against the dangers to be expected from removing the government too far from its constituents. It has therefore always been easy to argue for the creation of new units of local government where these served to bring local services more directly under popular control. On the other hand, it has become apparent that a multiplicity of governmental units tends to defeat efforts to obtain economy and efficiency in the conduct of public affairs. Communities are created which have neither the population nor the taxpaying capacity to support the essential local services. Within these communities the ends of local self-government cannot be achieved and the democratic ideal becomes impossible of fulfillment.

Obstacles to the reduction of the number of units of local government spring from sentiments long enshrined in the public opinion of the country. People are often willing to pay a high price for local self-government. Recently the state of Maine undertook to deorganize rural towns in which debt limits had been reached and property taxes had become almost confiscatory. The resistance which the movement encountered was evidence of the strong popular faith in the institutions of local government.

The problem involved in this conflict between the traditional theory of democracy and the requisites of sound local government has long been recognized. It cropped out in a number of constitutional conventions in the states before the Civil War, where attempts were made to restrict the creation of units of local government. Recognition of the evils inherent in the multiplication of local government units did not, however, produce a remedy. All moves to readjust the areas and services of local government have had to be made on a checkerboard of local patriotisms. Particularist sentiment struck so deeply into the Michigan convention of 1850 that a proposal was made that "the legislature shall secure to the inhabitants of every United States surveyed township, having fifty inhabitants, a separate organization, provided the township left contain fifty inhabitants." The argument in behalf of this clause asserted that people would be encouraged to settle the unoccupied areas if they could be guaranteed the right to organize a government for themselves. Temporarily the argument prevailed, but the better judgment of the delegates finally caused this section of the proposed constitution to be dropped. The convention had even great difficulty in preventing the insertion of a clause which would give the boards of supervisors in the counties the exclusive power to organize new townships. It was apparent that at least a minority of the members felt that the legislature had been too slow in organizing new townships and wished to have this power taken over by the county authorities.

PRESENT NEEDS

The American conception of democracy found safeguards in the nineteenth-century state constitutions. That is to say, the people were secured in their right to make decisions in local affairs. This achievement was possible because the services to be performed were few and simple and could be directed advantageously within small political subdivisions. But a century of progress in science and technology has not only multiplied the services which government must provide but also has enlarged the area within which these can be successfully administered. The growth of rapid means of communication together with the increase of popular education has enabled an enlightened people to supervise larger areas of their government. While more decisions have to be made at governmental levels remote from the local communities, the conditions under which these decisions are reached can be more truly appraised than ever before. It is not too much to expect that the people will find the means of performing economically and efficiently the public services and at the same time retaining control of the government.

William S. Carpenter, Ph.D., has been a member of the Department of Politics at Princeton University since 1920. He was a member of the New Jersey State Planning Board from 1937 to 1944 and president of the New Jersey State Civil Service Commission from 1944 to 1951. He is author of The Development of American Political Thought (1930), The Unfinished Business of Civil Service Reform (1952), and coauthor of State and Local Government in the United States (1936).

The methods of action whereby self-government, effective service areas, and taxpaying capacity can be brought together in a nice poise and balance are well known. Success in the solution of the problem of service levels depends upon the intelligent application of experience gained in the conduct of local government since the early colonial days. In the readjustment of areas and services of local government the experience of the public officials must conspire with the needs of the people to produce an organization which will ensure the efficient and economical performance of local services within the democratic process. This may require the reallocation of major services, such as roads, schools, welfare, and health, to other units of government than those in which they are at present administered. It will undoubtedly require co-operation among the different units of government through interjurisdictional agreements designed to create a sound relationship for the conduct of services beyond the reach of a single locality. A wider use of the special district may develop in rural municipalities possessing urban concentrations. But interjurisdictional agreements or the use of the special district will in many cases be a preliminary step to the reconstruction of local government through consolidation or annexation, in order that legal jurisdiction may be fitted to service needs.

Citizen Organization for Control of Government

By RICHARD S. CHILDS

CONSTITUTIONS and charters set forth their specifications for American governments at various levels and assign a great array of tasks to the voters in serene, unthinking disregard of the fact that the sovereign voters may or may not deign to exert themselves to perform all those tasks. When, as so frequently happens, the voters ignore a given assignment, the fashion is to denounce the voters for "apathy," as a builder of a mill wheel might petulantly denounce a stream which fails to turn his heavy wheel in a dry summer. Thus, when the writers of Michigan's constitution provided that the state treasurer should be chosen by the voters, the voters promptly and perpetually ignored the assignment; only 4 per cent of them were able to name him when an official committee took a careful poll in 1950.¹ Having such an obscure and relatively small office on the elective list would work if the people would do the task thus assigned. Since they will not, there is no justification for retaining the office as elective, no reason for perpetuating a setup which has never worked. Yet the very commission which uncovered the fact of mere 4 per cent awareness bowed to the sacred cows of politics and shrank from the logical remedy of assigning to the governor the function of filling that office. And when the great bulk of voters thus ignore an elective office, a few politicians proceed to fill it, dealing with it as part of their own private bailiwick to their own private and partisan advantage. By misuse of such direct patronage, the "ins" entrench themselves against dislodgment by the "outs" and distort the democratic process.

Similarly, each Pittsburgh voter is supposed to select eighty-three candidates for as many offices in each four-year cycle. In fact he does nothing of the sort; he casts an informed vote on two or three top candidates each year and votes for the word Republican or Democratic on the rest of the list, thereby blindly accepting the slate prepared by the machine. In respect to this array of minor elective officers, the machine need not cater to decent mass opinion since there is almost no public scrutiny of these nominees.

Everybody admits that almost all American ballots are preposterously long, submitting lists of candidates for so many dull and trivial offices that only a professional politician is likely to know for whom he is voting on election day. But very little gets done to improve the situation.

CITIZEN CONTROL VIA PARTIES

In England, Europe, Canada, and elsewhere, voters join together in parties to capture government in the interest of a set of ideas, or school of thought, as to desirable public policy. But they commonly do their work on only two levels of government, electing a local member of Parliament in each district and a ward member of a local municipal council. The simple task of selection falls comfortably within the easy grasp of the voter, and the party which groups itself around a policy requires in its internal management nothing comparable to our busy, heavily manned American party machines. Furthermore, the foreign party managements must cater to open-eyed voter sentiment, for the voter has only the task of selecting one man on election day and knows what he is doing just as an American does when voting for President or mayor.

But our American parties must find and advance candidates to fill the elective offices in six layers of government—national, state, judicial (in states where judges are elective), county and (where local elections are partisan) township, city or village, and school district. They will be embarrassed by the necessity of forecasting and catering carefully to public opinion in respect to perhaps five of their nominees in a given district but can exercise fairly complete discretion on perhaps ten—or forty—others. Candidates have to be found and presented in either case, a gigantic task which cannot be handled by the mass action, or inaction, of unorganized voters. Hence our parties in the United States are no more than 10 per cent policy or clannish divisions; they are 90 per cent machines for taking hold of those functions of our peculiar democratic process which cannot be performed by the voters.

UNWIELDY CONSTITUENCIES

The party machines here must also solve the problem of mobilizing voters in our unique, big, unwieldy constituencies, such as the states in their state-wide elections. Finally, they have to deal with the unwieldy constituency of the nation when it is voting for President, when party mechanisms must contrive to bring together at quadrennial conventions a thousand-odd delegates covering every state, each backed by local organizations of sufficient importance to add up to adequate political power.

So our long ballots, our scatterations of petty elective offices, and the unwieldiness of some of our constituencies require elaborate machines and give them the opportunity to rule unscrutinized in extensive clouded areas of six-layered government.

Indeed the machine, instead of being the instrument in an American party, becomes its master.

Suppose our Socialist party, now uncorrupted by power, should show promising growth and begin to elect candidates! Membership being, under our practices, open to every voter, it would forthwith enjoy an influx of newcomers, including some merely intent on sharing the power. The latter would dismay the original idealists by their unwillingness to cling to doctrine if it gets in the path of victory; so the platforms would become less obnoxiously explicit and items alien to the original concept would be put in as voter bait. Management problems would multiply, a party machine would develop, and practical men would take it over with just enough use of doctrine to cloak their grab for power. At last the platforms would become general and equivocal, the candidates nondescript, and people would say "What real difference is there now between Socialists and Republicans?" Thus the party's machine, taking full possession, would juggernaut the party's soul!

Of course that is just what has long since happened in the two old parties; they are machines primarily, and in terms of doctrine, there are, as Norman Thomas remarks, wider differences within them than there are between them.

Thus the parties have ceased to represent principles, although they do divide on class and regional lines. People just are Republicans, their fathers were Republicans before them, their town has always been Republican, they belong to the clan and their thinking on public policy is densely colored by the question of whether a policy originated therein or was advanced by those curious characters the Democrats. And vice versa. We know, as Gilbert puts it in Iolanthe:

That every boy and every gal
That's born into the world alive
Is either a little Liberal
Or else a little Conservative!

In constituencies on each of the six levels of our governments, voters should logically divide differently, for the questions of policy that agitate the school district are not those that affect the county or the nation. Sometimes indeed they do manage to divide and be counted in issues peculiar to each level, but more often the machine operates at all levels, fills the offices at all the levels, and looks after its own interests in every case.

ATTEMPT TO REGULATE PARTIES

So, parties in our country being mostly machines and machines having such extensive arrays of functions that elude public scrutiny, the reformers in the Progressive era of 1910-20 contrived laws to regulate the party machines and their internal structures and procedures. The central feature of such laws was the government-managed direct primary now existent in every state but Connecticut. Most of those reformers, however, like writers of constitutions and charters, missed the fact that anything devised for mass operation must be simple. They left the party management free to devise the structures of their machines, and the party managers proceeded to organize protective complexities which only experts could operate. In Tammany Hall the selection of the party managers, known as assembly district leaders, has been arranged under the party rules so that the two hundred or so party voters in each voting precinct are called upon at the primaries to elect five or ten "county committeemen." There on an official ballot is the slate. It is very rarely contested, and when it is, there is the difficulty of inducing the voters to inform themselves as to which of the unlabeled slates will represent their purposes. Great numbers of these committeemen ignore their duties, and many others are unaware that they are committeemen! Then, in a mass meeting of from three hundred to a thousand, the committeemen elected on these slates docilely re-elect the assembly district leader who put them on the slates.

As to those powerful assembly district leaderships, factions of professional politicians have provoked sharp contests in this jungle battlefield, but dislodgment of a leader who has, in effect, elected his own constituency of county committeemen has involved difficulties that only such professionals can cope with. The conditions, like those of a chess game, do not prevent contests between experts, but do debar lay efforts to oust professionals.

The district leaders and their captains also put on the primary ballots their slates of ten or twenty delegates from each assembly district; these delegates then meet, several hundred strong, as "judicial conventions" to select party candidates for supreme court judgeships. Not one in a hundred voters could name to you the delegates he thus nominally elects, and the delegates when they meet, if they have not read the newspapers, need only be told by the leaders what candidate for judge to nominate when they arrive at the convention. The New York State Crime Commission, questioning the leaders in both parties, were unable to find any case in which these judicial conventions had ever disregarded the prior decisions of district leaders.

The logical reform is to let the party voters choose between the actual candidates instead of between two unidentified slates of intervening delegates, but inasmuch as such simplification of the voters' task could crack a machine monopoly, both party managements resist it.

NEEDED REFORMS

So in both the official and the intra-party elections, the control of government by the people through parties awaits sweeping, basic simplifications of governments at the state and lower levels to make machines relatively unnecessary and less potent. The democratic process will never work very well as long as it asks the voters at either primary or final elections to express opinions on matters concerning which they have no opinions to express. Voters of Ohio in 1952, for example, elected representatives to Congress. The office was lost in a ballot list of over forty minor elective state, county, and judicial offices, and a Gallup poll² in 1953 found that only 31 per cent of the voters knew their congressman's name. In Virginia, where ballots are quite short, 57 per cent of the voters gave correct answers.

Where people "just are Republicans" and "just are Democrats" in somewhat equal numbers, competition is usually genuine and party managements must find strong candidates and cater deferentially to public opinion in the case of the few top candidacies which the voters are sure to scrutinize. In the national elections, the nation being rather evenly divided between two parties, it became important for both parties to reach for the strongest candidates they could produce. The Republican state machines were lined up for Taft in 1952 and could probably have nominated him despite the wider appeal of Eisenhower

—if they had dared to do so in the presence of the Democrats that year.

The necessity of catering to the public does not, however, beset the machine in all constituencies. The two-party system, which is so often admired by its active participants, is, in about half the jurisdictions, only another of our myths. It is all too often in reality a one-party system where nomination by the dominant party is equivalent to election and the machine, consisting of a numerically small self-renewing managing group with lots of work to do, can practically appoint public officers for generations on end.

The test is whether insurgency has a chance, for democracy is essentially a government which the people can change. Every device and complication which, designedly or otherwise, baffles insurgency is antidemocratic!

So, to be objective, modern political reformers press for clearing away the clutter of minor elective offices. They would elect in the state administration only the governor (as in New Jersey), a single-house legislature (as in Nebraska), would appoint the judiciary (as in Massachusetts and New Jersey), would elect a board of county commissioners with an appointive county manager (as in seventeen counties), and elect a small city council with an appointive city manager (as in 1,200 communities, including 39 per cent of the cities with a population over 25,000). The result would be ballots of five offices or less for each voter to inform himself about each year. A similar simplification is demanded for the internal structures of political parties. Citizens could control such a system without much organization. These recommendations are set forth in the series of model laws of the National Municipal League.³

CIVIC ORGANIZATIONS

Discontent of citizens leads here and there to creation of those American institutions, the civic associations. They are completely outside of government and, unlike parties, can easily protect themselves from capture by self-seekers. Manned by a few devoted volunteers, understaffed, with pitifully few cash members, they assail impregnable political citadels with facts and invective. In New York City's seven millions, fewer than ten thousand persons support the strictly civic associations. But their findings are widely trusted by press and public, and amidst the records of rebuffs received are found more than enough achievements to justify what little they cost.

One of the best weapons, where available, is the initiative. Civic associations can get up the petitions to force a constructive measure onto a ballot, and the management of the dominant party is commonly unable to influence its party members on a referendum question to any such extent as it can when demanding loyal support for its labeled candidates.

Civic organizations are always nonpartisan. They recruit members from both parties but sometimes lose them when their criticisms are damaging to party interest or indeed to any local vested interest. Hence their vitality is drawn from the true independents, who in most communities are a trifling minority. Indeed only in a very few large cities do these organizations exist with a continuity and size capable of supporting a payroll. In small cities they are seldom strong enough to maintain an office and would hardly have enough to do to be usefully busy if they did. State-wide civic organizations hardly exist at all—the distances between members leave their operations in a condition of almost continuous lapse, as the valiant Robert Moses found when he spent several full-time years trying to maintain the New York State Association. Nor is there any nationwide civic organization representing general citizen interest, as distinguished from groups organized around limited objectives like the tiny National Civil Service League or serving special interests such as farmers or manufacturers.

Control of state and local government for the general interest is looked after mostly on a part-time basis by taxpayers associations, chambers of commerce, including junior chambers, and service clubs (Rotary, Kiwanis, Lions). When a single program is important enough, special temporary associations of citizens coalesce and do battle—for example, to procure adoption of the council-manager plan or to focus the good-government vote on a set of candidates in a nonpartisan election.

For technical assistance the local civic groups turn to specialized national associations such as the National Citizens Commission for the Public Schools, the National Recreation Association, or the National Municipal League.

The last named indeed began as an annual conference of the municipal civic groups for exchange of experience. This developed a school of thought and a body of doctrine as to the best technical attack on the excesses of political machines and begot programs for setting up the sounder and simpler democratic processes the need for which is indicated earlier in this paper. Its programs, unchallenged nowadays by any but the characters who comprise its targets, have been advanced by the local civic organizations where there were any but in recent years have been expedited vastly by the growth of the League of Women Voters. This organization, sometimes almost alone, more often in temporary combination with all available local allies and leaders, carries the ball in a hundred local contests a year. There are nearly a thousand local leagues today and 122,000 members—an immense new civic force. Their cautious, sure-footed methods protect them from being stampeded by superficial doctrines, and when they go to battle they ring doorbells for reform and turn out their members for practical personal work to a degree unprecedented in male civics. Joining together on state-wide programs they go out to sure defeat in legislatures with perennial pertinacity and always on the side of the general interest. Only a few of their locals or their state groups are big enough to maintain offices, but they enlist immense amounts of volunteer service to make up for lack of paid staff. There is nothing among the men like that great league!

CIVIC METHODS

The Leagues of Women Voters and the local citizens associations cannot and do not compete with political parties in promoting candidates for elective offices. New local parties are usually short-lived and vulnerable to capture, although one, the Liberal party, formed around the union workers of New York City's great garment industry, has persisted.

The Leagues of Women Voters are by their rules inhibited from supporting candidates but have "know your candidates" meetings which are sometimes highly revealing. Several of the big-city civic associations publish "voters directories" providing to press and members brief biographical data on the long array of candidates, most of whom would otherwise be poorly illuminated indeed, and single out for endorsement the preferred candidate in each contest. The most effective directories are those of Detroit and Cleveland, where the ballots sprawl out far beyond any ordinary voter's comprehension. The directory of the Citizens Union of New York City, which ought to be distributed to 2,000,000 voters, for financial reasons is limited to a circulation of 70,000, plus repetition in the press. Although candidates for minor offices such as the legislative seats eagerly seek its endorsement, its influence is hard to demonstrate. Of course there is a basic absurdity in having so many elective offices that such a directory is essential to informed voting!

Professional organizations of governmental servants develop professional pride and have a great influence in advancing and protecting good work in government. The profession of forestry, for example, is so dedicated to good forestry practices that it bulwarks the public interest. The Astin incident in the National Bureau of Standards stirred the scientific societies to highly articulate and effective protest against tampering with scientific findings. The medical profession will jump to the defense of a politically harried health officer or hospital superintendent and is being helpful just now in the National Municipal League's little crusade to get the coroner's function out of county politics. The Public Administration Clearing House has successfully promoted the organization of new associations of assessors, finance officers, police, city planning officials, and others whose central office admonitions on technical standards are more acceptable to their members than outside criticism would be. Local, privately supported bureaus of municipal research develop methodology for transient public officers, and their systems, once installed, are apt to last and save money until, years later, the bureaus come around again with a further improvement.

SUMMARY

From inability to control our complex of governments by the ballot box, we Americans have attempted to control government by means of parties and have then found it necessary to attempt control of the complex party mechanisms. Failing there, we have attempted to control public officers by concerted shouting at them through the organized alertness of civic associations!

But political chess is no game for clumsy masses to be required to play in order to protect their interests. The ballot game must not, by complexity, be made a game for experts only. As Woodrow Wilson said long ago, "Simplification, simplification, simplification is the task that awaits us!" In the forty years since then there have been some simplifications, particularly in municipal government by the council-manager plan, with successes which demonstrate that he was right and that the democratic process, if kept simple enough, can be operated under volunteer leadership with easy effectiveness just by ballots deposited by masses of citizens.

Richard S. Childs, New York, is chairman of the Executive Committee of the National Municipal League, where he has been a full-time volunteer since retirement from business in 1947. He started the short-ballot movement in 1909-19 with Woodrow Wilson and fathered the council-manager plan of municipal government, as related in his book Civic Victories (1952).

Bureaucracy and the Future

By PAUL H. APPLEBY

CARLYLE once illustrated a point by telling of a family of privilege living high on a mountainside above a squalid city and unconcerned about such problems as urban sewage disposal. When the plague came, he said, it did not stop at the foot of the mountain. Enlightened self-interest, if not altruism, has brought to many millions of us concern for the survival of civilization through its popularization and geographical spread, its freedom from confinement to elite classes or powerful states. The extension of civilization is now, as it has always been, a problem in organization and administration. It is a more complicated problem than ever before, because of the stage of civilization we have attained.

Civilization is the attainment and further pursuit of social and personal complexity. This complexity is sought through division of labor and through specialization and extension of activity, experience, and learning, all of which are possible only through progressively more intricate forms of social organization. The process diversifies and enlarges opportunity. It differentiates individuals in functions, experience, and interests, their involvements in and reactions to an enriched societal complex. It creates interdependence enlarging in every conceivable dimension—in number of persons affected, in geographical area, in number and in kind of functions, in technologies, and in bureaucratic structures.

It is easiest for people generally to attend to their specialized functions and situations, and hardest for them to see, understand, and help manage their expanding societal universe in terms of their largest and broadest interdependencies. Skill in organization tends to be limited to particular structures and functions. Most persons contribute to the multiplication, diversification, and extension of particular organizational efforts, thus complicating and burdening the general organizational mechanisms. The few who have concentrated on extending general order have tended to do it in specialized terms that do not sufficiently comprehend the cultural totality physically covered. Up to now history has told rather consistently of breakdowns in states and empires and of consequent stagnation and decline in grass-roots civilization.

The drive toward an extended civilization nevertheless recurs, pushing to new levels, affording over the ages an experiential learning of large dimensions and great promise, but a learning not intellectually well developed, transmissible, or well spread through areas and peoples become highly interdependent. Developments within single states and cultures now impinge more quickly and directly on other states and cultures and create interactions less immediately associated with military conquest than in centuries past. Acquaintance is also less immediately confined to trade in the conventional sense and moves through books, newspapers, and radio programs, so that the largely intranational achievement of independence and wealth in the United States has helped to fan hope and unrest among hundreds of millions who have little actual dealing with this country. Thus, we have become involved in a world revolution, and our own attainments stand threatened unless similar gains may be made really able elsewhere. The situation is largely a product of organizational performances, and poses new problems in how to organize and carry on improved efforts.

History is primarily the story of men's various efforts to achieve, maintain, and extend order for the sake of the enrichment that goes along with diversification of interchange. Unhappily, its written record has not often enough been produced by scholars who could see and think deeply in organizational terms. Yet it does reveal to us the fact that at every point of high advance the drive toward civilization has extended much beyond the current understanding of it. The concern for enrichment usually has been directed toward exploitation rather than toward the greater and more enduring enrichment that could have been had through addressing concerns mutual by methods co-operative. Although the record of arbitration and treaty negotiation goes back six thousand years, the large and dramatic drives were toward conquest and empire. For the first time in history we have in this century a large and conscious effort toward extensive co-operative order. The difficulty presented by powers still driving for empire is dramatic and vivid. But the difficulty we still have in the lagging understanding of our own aspiration is no less serious. We have not seen clearly enough that history is the story of the hard search for bureaucratic method, skill, and values appropriate to men's finer aspirations and fullest potentialities. We have too little understanding of bureaucracy, too little mastery of it. Our very approach to it is commonly petty, negative, and archaic.

Organization for individuality

We ourselves have moved so quickly from the most extreme, and probably unprecedented, pioneer condition of rugged individualism that we still confuse individualism—which is an anti-organizational phenomenon of isolation, mental or physical—with concern for individuality, which in its greatest dimensions may be nurtured only through organizational means. We tend in America as nowhere else in the world to organize more and more variously for specific functions, and to approach reluctantly and in confusion the great task of organizing society and societies in general.

Even apart from our foreign involvements, we are far from an adequate understanding of our present attainments and have inadequate ground for confidence that we can continue our present course indefinitely. We emerged as a society under conditions most extraordinarily favorable, with early political leadership most exceptional, but came quickly to a time when the tempo of total social change began a progressive acceleration which calls for organizational wisdom of the highest order. We have organized diversely for special ends far beyond any similar development elsewhere, greatly differentiating concerns, without often or fully facing the manifold problems of coherence and over-all mastery of organizational devices necessary for continuance on our course.

Failures recorded in the pages of history are attributable to lacks of balance in organizing drives. Their strengths have had corresponding weaknesses. We should be concerned about the weakness of our strength. Pendleton Herring, writing as a political scientist, observed two decades ago that democracy tends toward chaos, not toward unity; and of course there is no democracy in chaos. George Homans, writing as a sociologist, has observed that civilization is, in one of its aspects, centralization. In these two terms it might be seen that our problem is to achieve centralized democracy, but such a statement would have little of its real meaning, and would be greeted with horror, among those who have little understanding of organization or centralization. The second of these two terms is viewed as axiomatically evil; thus the interdependence of pluralism is shunted off the track of thoughtfulness. What is commonly espoused as decentralization is the drift toward chaos. It needs much to be considered as an aspect, a technique, or a mode of centralization. More broadly, there is great need for freer and fuller exploration and understanding of complex social organization. "Bureaucracy" is, perhaps, the commonest shorthand term for that phrase; if not fully synonymous it is at least inseparable from the phenomenon of systematic interaction of many persons associated in common and complex terms. Not all interaction is systematic, of course, and where system begins is hard to say. There are elements of control somewhat apart from formal and visible hierarchies. Division of labor, systematic relationships between differentiated functions, and some capacity for control may sometimes precede or be tangent to formal hierarchal structures; their association with hierarchy is commonly said to constitute a bureaucracy. Widespread division of labor and differentiation in function, intricate interaction of persons and functions, and the interactions of many diverse bureaucracies create a bureaucratic complex which itself needs to be considered in organizational terms. In particular, numerous specialized bureaucracies need to be somehow consciously and somehow functionally related to generalizing conceptions and to generalizing and unifying bureaucracies.

THE BUREAUCRATIC COMPLEX

Max Weber rates, perhaps, as the Adam Smith of organizational study.

His definition of bureaucracy was arrived at without much benefit of the last half century's experience, which would have pointed to important and growing differences between bureaucracies in democratic and nondemocratic societies, and especially to differences between public bureaucracies in advanced democracies and those in non-democratic states. His definition also had in particular a Germanic tinge which further limits the use of Weber's thinking in American application. His conception of bureaucracy was legalistically oriented to coercion. It is true, of course, that some capacity for control is central to all hierarchal organization, and particularly to the organization of sovereign government. However, it is precisely in the qualifications of control, the control of control, substitutes for it, the nuances associated with the elevation of popular politics, and modifications of control in manner and procedure deferring to diverse and humane values that democratic concern centers. Democracy has been specially seeking diminution in the impersonality of factors basic to Weber's thought: oversimplification of system in concentration on the literal "rule," the economic market, and bureaucracy as he defined it. Concern for the dignity of man, if it is not to be a vain hope, must peculiarly impregnate democratic bureaucracy, expressing itself in processes serving compassion and reflecting popular politics.

Free competition is more tolerable and useful within a democratic state than elsewhere precisely because government will direct and influence it there in ways serving a larger freedom than free enterprise alone. Democratic government will also separately appraise and alleviate some of the less happy consequences of the impersonal market and thus preserve it as a useful and acceptable device. International stress is as great as it is in considerable part because there is at that level no adequate central mechanism for treating the ill consequences of undirected bureaucratic intercourse.

The modifying effect of political democracy

Political democracy has greatly modified both the nature of private capitalism and the mores of public bureaucracy since the days of Marx and Weber. Among American industrialists there is a concern for mass buying power not at all understandable in those democracies which have not yet departed from the Weberian approach to administration. Chester Barnard, writing out of his rich experience in private administration, went well beyond Weber when he wrote that authority derives from consent, "lies always with him to whom it applies," and that "experienced and effective administrators prefer not to use authority."

It is a modern axiom, revealed as an indirect product of political democracy, that there is no more certain means of sabotaging superior authority than for subordinates to carry out its directives literally. This is an insight not possessed by many who speak glibly of "government of law." Government of the people, by the people, and for the people seeks some additional and importantly modifying values to be had only through differentiated administration.

Modern insights into administration point emphatically to the importance, in terms of sheer efficiency, of developing and utilizing diverse and numerous potentialities of personnel. The democratic aspiration points in the same direction and includes "citizens" with "personnel." Institutionally this underscores co-operative and flexible interaction with deference to the plural and subtle. This accounts for Macmahon's description of our present reality: "The problem of compulsion is lessened by the fact that the control methods of a moving consensus, although pinned initially by majority action at crucial points, will be a largely calculated interplay of inducements, incentives and indirect influences, not direct coercion." Outside of this described area, limited to modified compulsion, there are large fields of governmental activity involving research, service, and contractual relationships with no compulsion at all. The efficiency of the complicated and subtle procedures most distinguishing public bureaucracy under democracy is to be judged in important part according to criteria peculiar to democracy. These are subjective tests. But efficiency is to be tested also by the objective criterion of survival. There is some evidence and much hope that by this test, too, democratic ways are superior. The Weberian conceptions would not have been regarded as seriously unacceptable by the Hitlerian bureaucracy that planned the German advance into Western Europe. It sent single makes of tanks and trucks along particular roads so that single sets of supply parts might be sent along those same roads. This was highly efficient in aggressor terms, so long as the initiative was with the Germans. When improvisation became necessary in confronting novel conditions, advantage shifted to the democracies.

Improvisation and flexibility of bureaucratic performances increase in importance disproportionately to increases in tempo of social change. Both root in individual imagination, but require institutional testing and acceptance. In democratic society they are also subject to sanctions of political authority and public reaction. The utilization and development of individual capacities, deference to individual values, in structures providing system and responsibility, maximizing effectiveness of multiple efforts, yet with rapid adjustment to changing conditions and to highly diversified citizen conditions—all these are involved in the kind of bureaucratic performance to which we are committed. If, with Barnard, we see suppliers and customers as members of an organization, and if with "popular government" we see citizens as vested with powers of control, our consideration of the improvement of public bureaucracy in a more complicated future must range widely.

Bureaucracy's relating function

The relating of interdependent people and functions in ways serving central and common values might be one way of defining the bureaucratic function. Certainly, this relating function is crucial to bureaucratic performance. For many specialized studies it may be useful to define bureaucracy simply as organization characterized by hierarchal structure, and surely hierarchy is an important focus of attention. But hierarchy has more varied forms and processes than we are likely to assume. And what about the highly bureaucratic phenomena involved in the interaction of various bureaucracies not formally structured in a common, visible hierarchy? Is an independent company which by contract manufactures exclusively for Sears, Roebuck and Company wholly without a hierarchal dependency relationship to its solitary customer? Are the more common relationships between manufacturers, wholesalers, and retailers wholly unstructured and non-bureaucratic? Certainly if the United States fails as a society it will fail as a state; if it fails as a state it will fail as a society. The whole bureaucratic complex may not be a bureaucracy, but it is surely our major concern with bureaucracy. Bureaucracy is division of labor, effected, developed, and ordered through hierarchal arrangements and controls. Any single bureaucracy, no less than a functional specialist engaged in it, is a specialized instance of division of labor. In the end, numerous and diverse bureaucracies have themselves to be ordered.

In the study of bureaucracy, division of labor concentrates attention chiefly on specific bureaucracies and specialized aspects of bureaucracy. This is our great genius, and we may be reasonably confident that in the continuation of such studies we may find such improvements as are available to this approach. But while we appraise and extend that function of bureaucracy which is the development of division of labor and specialization, we largely ignore the other primary function—the business of relating and integrating specialisms, to make complexity tolerable, sensible, and fruitful. This is the hard task in any bureaucracy. In terms of the bureaucratic complex it is the supreme problem of advancing civilization.

Public and private bureaucracy

We tend not only to view bureaucracies one by one, or bureaucratic functions one by one, but also to consider public bureaucracy apart from private bureaucracy. Government has distinct and priceless characteristics, of course, but it is greatly dependent on the private organizational whole, just as private bureaucracy is dependent on government. Specialism obscures their interactions and interdependences. We tend also to be highly critical of public bureaucracy, and to sanctify its private cousin. Slanderous clichés on the one side and eulogistic clichés on the other are the counterfeits of thought most often passing as the currency of bureaucratic discussion. The gap between concerns rooted in our sprawling bureaucratic specialisms and our concerns for the relating and integrating functions of public bureaucracy is much wider here than anywhere else, now or heretofore. The gap is principally consequential to the enormous size, range, and variety of our private bureaucratic forms and functions. Whether or not this gap needs to be closed, and if so how much and in what manner, I am by no means wholly confident, except in one respect. I feel sure that the gap in understanding and consideration should be greatly narrowed.

It is extremely doubtful whether the average person can arrive at any comprehensive understanding of the bureaucratic complex by viewing it only laterally. Largely preoccupied with a few primary organizational memberships and a few others of secondary rank, he will not see clearly all his involvements in society regarded as a plane surface heavily populated with other and different organizations. Direct communication between all these bureaucracies and consciously directed reconciliation of them in terms of common indirect concerns would grossly overload the possibilities of cross-lots dealing. Some intellectual treatment in successive terms of increasing generality would appear to be essential. This very statement describes a phenomenon resembling the functioning of hierarchy. Indeed, the intellectual process requires facilitation through some concrete and operating social structures possessing hierarchal character. The theory of sovereignty places government at the apex of any such structure, and the bulk of our plural private bureaucracies at bottom levels, some of them extending moderately upward because of their size, scope, and number of functions. What structures occupy intermediate levels and perform intermediate organizing functions, what processes are used to transform specialized concerns into relationships and issues of progressively broader significance and usefulness—these are questions which, if pursued, should provide much needed illumination.

Democratic bureaucracy

Any general view of our structural totality, if it is adequate, must highlight elements peculiarly related to our democratic aspirations and present character. Our approach to democracy has been largely negative. We have not much studied democracy in structural terms more precise than those of a general Constitution. Yet Latin American constitutions greatly resembling our own have permitted governments to operate in terms very unlike our own. Even the Russian constitution has many elements of resemblance to ours. And the pre-Hitlerian bureaucracy in Germany without much shock served the Nazis about as readily as it had the preceding regime. Most of our few classical studies of bureaucracy have failed to differentiate well between the forms and processes of democratic and nondemocratic bureaucracies. The common unlearned view would tend to produce myriads of autonomies and to dissipate democratic effectiveness in perpetual consultation. Most of the legalistic treatments take a mystical view of impersonal "law," regarding only a small segment of the bureaucratic whole, that part much withdrawn from politics, and thus have failed to allow sufficiently for the shift from a monarchical to a popular sovereignty.

In a large view appropriate to our hopes for an expanding complexity, then, it seems to me that we need to consider bureaucracy as the vehicle of both specialism and integration, regard it in society-wide terms, and point it positively toward both democratic enrichment and democratic effectiveness.

BUREAUCRACY AS SPECIALISM

In modern democratic society, each citizen is a very special case. He lives in a single community, in one state, has one primary job in greater or less degree unique, has a set of family problems not identical with those of any other family, has a pattern of memberships, hobbies, and interests not just like the pattern of any other person. He embodies all of his past experience and training, and all the elements of his present condition and situation. It is inevitable that he considers all of the social and political problems to which he gives attention in terms of these things, which in their totality differentiate him from all other citizens. Individual "good judgment" consists in focusing on a specific problem all that one knows as a result of his past experience and present exposure. But of course the individual is limited by the very factors that make him an individual; he has not experienced what all other citizens have experienced, is not socially exposed altogether as they are. The others may have quite different judgments about the same problems. No matter what any of us may think about any problem, social and political wisdom is not private property but something that results from the interaction of the many who are concerned, through structures somehow ordering the interaction. The structures within which social decision makers act may provide for imperfect representational character. Responsibility may be to many less than "all those concerned." Yet the decision makers are always located within structures which expose them at the time to multiple forces nowhere else coming into focus so clearly. The decisions made at such points of exposure, therefore, are always narrowly confined by environing forces. They also always have a character reflecting a good deal of interaction between persons and groups holding various individual judgments.

I ignore for the moment the matter of qualitative differences between individuals in the same decision-making situations. The point now being submitted is that differences in exposure sharply distinguish the opinion of a citizen critic from the opinion of any responsible decision maker. The former always has a less relevant exposure than the decision maker. In matters of great scope and import, the gap between any single citizen and the decision makers in large institutions widely exposed is very great indeed. The opinion of each single citizen having a functional relationship to the decision-making institution is important; such opinions altogether define the area of discretion open to the decision makers. But, relevant to the decision made within that area of discretion, the citizen's opinion, at the moment, is likely to be largely irrelevant. At least, it is not substitutable for the judgment of the decision makers until it has been subjected to the same bombardment as the judgments of those having the exposures of responsibility, and has been modified accordingly.

No one's past experience ever equips him adequately for a broader responsibility; confronted with the new responsibility, he is too likely to decide in terms of his previous exposure. One's past experience is always, in an important sense, a handicap because of its tendency to weigh too heavily in the new situation. I have observed this frequently when men have been given hierarchal promotions; the one promoted tends to interfere too much with his successor in the field of his past experience, and to see the affairs of men once his peers but now his "inferiors" in terms of his own past preoccupation rather than in terms equally relevant to all his subordinates. If a highly successful businessman goes into the government on the expectation that his business experience fully fits him for the governmental post, he will make tragic blunders because his past experience is not directly relevant. In almost every particular way, the past experience will be a limiting handicap. It is only when past experience is used as generally and indirectly relevant that it is an asset in a post of different exposures and responsibilities. The only equipment that anyone has, of course, is his past experience and his new exposures. The problem represented by the broader responsibility requires emphasis on the new exposures, whereas the tendency is to rely on the old ones.

Universities

The commonest form in which the limitations of specialism appear, of course, is found in the functioning of persons who remain permanently in substantially one status; they are specialists in function and place. In this form limitation appears as a "bureaucratic" attitude, when the word is taken in its common, opprobrious meaning. This is to say that it is the attitude vigorously and unyieldingly insistent on looking at everything else in terms of the individual's special preoccupation. I saw this attitude exemplified on one occasion when a chairman of a sociology department at a university—not my own—sent me a memorandum dealing with the "proper administration of a sociology department." It was a lengthy argument that no one in the university or in the outside world had any "right" to have any say about the conduct of a sociology department except sociologist members of the department. This attitude is often formulated as an espousal of "democratic administration." As a doctrine, this is in fact an unconscious syndicalism, but as a matter of practice it is merely an impatience with the cumbersomeness of that true democracy which brings to bear many points of view. Talk of this kind, like the writings of Spencer and Marx, seeks escape from the whole social reality of the university universe, solving the problems of interaction by excluding many important elements.

The professions and industry

Universities are by no means the only organizations where such tendencies are evident, although they are, of course, citadels of specialism where, up to now, the interest in and preparation for pluralistic development have far outrun positive interest in social organization. There is probably no field of functional preoccupation which does not very similarly seek autonomy. In business, the pursuit of monopolistic position is only one form of the same drive against "interference." The medical profession is just now a notable example of a group demanding freedom from outside interference. Usually, too, public agencies are locating new hospitals to suit the convenience of medical men, with rare attention to public convenience.

The tendency to break down democracy into small and autonomous units is not everywhere a simple reflection of specialism. Sometimes it is also a sentimental or theoretical desire to extend the values of political democracy to the private field. "Industrial democracy," for example, is sometimes proposed as a pattern for single institutions. If industry became generally and thoroughly so organized, concern for the "integrity" of their institutional democracy might so support their syndicalist specialisms, however, as to give us less, not more, of a democratic economy. "Autonomous" and "social" are antipathetic terms.

It is not the intention here to argue for any particular kind of organization of universities, professions, or industries, however; rather it is desired simply to draw attention to the social involvements of institutions and practices and to the insufficiency of general doctrines or attitudes based merely upon special concerns. A pluralistic society needs to some degree to be able to relate its diverse parts to each other and to the societal whole. Specialism is inevitably, by itself, parochialism. It has also a peculiar logic which compounds the difficulties of general order.

Military specialism

This logic of specialism is well illustrated by the trend in military organization. In World War I the proportion of the total army organizational personnel engaged in face-to-face combat as riflemen was estimated at 21.71 per cent. In World War II the corresponding estimate was 10.39 per cent.¹ To some extent the difference is accounted for by the distance of the Pacific theater from the United States, but the general factor of determining importance was the need of the military to take account of new learnings, new inventions, new technological resources, and newly realized and newly feasible concerns for humane values—all resulting from the various achievements of specialism. This continuing expansion of "overhead" is an index of civilization, but it moves in the direction of having only one man engaged in combat with all other uniformed personnel, and a very large part of the energies of society, devoted to pursuing collateral business and making available to the reduced combat manpower increased power of other kinds.

¹ Both figures are based on total military and civilian personnel, except air force. In World War I the War Department had 3,516,504 military and 300,000 civilian employees. In World War II it utilized 5,984,114 military and 1,147,202 civilian persons. If air force had been taken into account, the shift emphasized above would be very substantially greater.

Education

The same tendencies exist in every other functional field. It may be worth while to cite the situation in education as a second example. The case of history may be sufficiently illustrative. Each year adds to the content of history in four dimensions: through the increase in time covered, through the increase in availability of historical materials relevant to the past, through new approaches to old materials, and through the spread of historical concern to areas of the world—such as India—not heretofore much incorporated in Western historical study. To be generally learned in history is steadily less possible if its content merely reflects these increments, and to be really learned in history makes impossible any great learning in other fields concurrently increasing in number and depth. If academicians are slow to realize the present dimensions of the universe of academic learning, they cannot go on for many generations more without appraising the social "overhead" costs of really intensive education and the grave difficulty in the way of providing broadly educated persons.

I once conversed with two very successful industrial entrepreneurs who were themselves inventors. These two happened to be in agreement that "the way to make most money most easily is to invent gadgets and doodads rather than anything at all fundamental." While our total research and experimental resources do produce many new products that have fundamental significance, this use of personnel and the larger use of manpower in developing and turning out doodads—physical, functional, and intellectual—make constant and increasing demands on our total energy pool.

We have moved definitely, of course, toward the great reduction of energies spent on what used to be regarded as essentials and find much real enrichment in the whole process, but somehow we have to equate all of these various, potentially unlimited demands on human capacity. And we have increasingly to relate what we do in our single society to what is done and sought in other societies. This is another aspect of the logic of specialism; it expands the social universe as it enlarges the functional ones. In the end, both aspects point up the general problem of the general management of the fruits of specialism.

BUREAUCRACY AS INTEGRATION

Bureaucracy facilitates specialism, but it is also the initial and the final, if not the exclusive, medium for the integration of specialisms.

The concern for pluralism is a rather modern one, with important aspects peculiar to democracy. Primitive society was characteristically a single, comprehensive bureaucracy uniting the disciplines of interpersonal relations, religion, the economy, and government into a single cultural discipline embedded in custom, ignorance, and a core hierarchy. Feudalism at a later stage provided a rather comprehensive unity. It is a significant feature of the genius of democracy that it opens up many opportunities for informal and collateral supports to unity rather apart from bureaucracy, with a much higher capacity to contain diversity. It is also a significant feature of democracy that it opens the way to larger, formal bureaucracies, greatly extending and stabilizing political order.

In any society there is, and must be, a certain capacity to tolerate diversity, confusion, and variegated unrelatedness. The difference between such tolerance in any primitive society and the same kind of tolerance in our society is vast. It may be confidently believed that we here have by no means reached the ultimate limits of possibility, and that by improved organizational skills we may continually extend this capacity. Improvement of our intellectual comprehension of pluralism is itself an aid, and by shifting some of our intellectual efforts away from specialism to this general view, we may go much farther on our way. We can also be encouraged by the fact that in lieu of verbalized understanding mere familiarity with complexity will serve in some measure. The American people do not "understand" the huge bureaucracy that is the postal service, itself constituting one-fourth of our civilian national governmental bureaucracy, but familiarity with it gives us a sense of understanding sufficient for our needs. In the same way, children of today are incorporating jet planes and television into their pattern of the familiar.

The economic "market" serves as a rather automatic and unplanned ordering of diverse activities in special and limited terms. There are, within the area of the market, many bureaucracies. The term "administered prices" recognizes such structures, and differences in their functioning reflect differences in their power.

A certain amount of integration is also achieved by a somewhat automatic and unconscious adjustment of our specialisms to each other and to our general societal character. This is a phenomenon without conscious organizational design, but it extends into a higher dimension in which rather definite structure is achieved. It reaches this dimension in the interaction of groups and institutions where, for example, dependence of a producer company on suppliers and customers creates a kind of loose and more or less transient hierarchical relationship between them all. In a still broader way, Dr. Arthur Morgan has called attention in Antioch Notes to the complicated interaction of groups in America as constituting something new under the sun, which, "emerging without conscious intent, combines the vigor and creativeness of free enterprise with a wide range of checks and balances" tending to be "most effective in large, far-flung industries where lack of social control would be most serious."

Wherever there are relationships of dependence, there is organizational form and, therefore, something of bureaucratic character, firm or loose, consciously or unconsciously developed. There are many specialized domains of order, some of them spreading laterally through large parts of the society but extending hierarchically upward very little. Their upward form is chiefly as an organization of power seeking general influence in terms of special concerns, rather than as an upreaching toward a comprehensive general order. They thus do manage the relations of many specialized interactions, performing a limited but often valuable and acceptable part of the job of organizing and managing society. They do it within confines set up by the public and its government and under conditions in which interaction with government is crucial both to government and to the private scene. General social integration of our complexity has no vehicle except government: its agency as integrator is uniquely structured in democracy, where the public control rests in private citizens.

Private bureaucracies

Citizens act and react chiefly in private bureaucracies which form the power patterns of the society among these groupings. Power differentials are according to: (1) wealth, which is to a considerable degree directly translatable into power; (2) structure, including (a) size and location of membership, (b) depth of and degree of agreement on particular sentiments behind exercises of power, and (c) the structural designs in terms of maximizing and channeling the power potential (involving cohesiveness and action capacities); (3) leadership; and (4) the nature and extent of contextual competition and disinterest.

Aside from single, greatly unified bureaucracies there are in the private scene structures which pyramid or associate bureaucracies. Some of these seek rather exclusively to integrate special interests in extended areas and to maximize power for limited purposes (such as increasing profits or extending communication, mobility, and community). Always, perhaps, a gain in general prestige (an aspect of power or of power potential) is a consequence of the creation of these superbureaucracies. Often an increase in social power is a primary objective. Illustrations of the two classes of purposes would include such varied structures as the bureaucracy of the First Methodist Church of Oshkosh, with its district, "conference," and "general conference" superstructures; county Farm Bureaus with state and national superstructures; local and United States Chambers of Commerce; local unions, craft or industrial unions, and national groupings of each form. There are many formally federal forms in private bureaucracies, and many informal structures of dependence, like-mindedness, imitativeness, and "logrolling." The total result is a somewhat definite structuring of the whole society, with some rough translations of the locally special into more widespread special postures.

A governmental farm policy proposal found acceptable to a few score farm leaders is ordinarily deemed to be acceptable to twenty-five million farm folk. These farm leaders, heading separate bureaucracies, are almost as much a hierarchy among themselves as an oligarchy. Similarly, the commercial, financial, industrial, labor, medical, legal, journalistic, and other important communities in America have considerable cohesion and form, despite their pluralisms, and they exercise great influence. It may be guessed that these various hierarchies together constitute or effect some general loose social hierarchy of a million or so persons who can determine fairly well what is acceptable to the whole people. They perform this function in part through special roles in communication, interpretation, and leadership, the latter reinforced by dependence of many others, imitation, and a popular preoccupation with narrower specialisms which rather unconsciously accepts some general direction.

All of those specialized substitutes for a comprehensive bureaucracy have limitations, of course. They treat with reconciling and relating parts of the pluralistic whole, and other parts not integrated may be of equal, if different, importance. The economic market, for example, makes no room for that compassionate concern for individual persons which is a high value in democracy. No private enterprise can shoulder very much responsibility for the state of the general economy or general employment. No American industry engaging in foreign activity will exemplify the whole American interest in that area. The citation of such limitations could go on endlessly.

It is also true, of course, that none of these relatively unintegrated contributions to integration would be of much significance, if they were possible at all, apart from the conditioning context of and their dependence on the formally comprehensive bureaucracy of sovereign government. Some enlargement of the consideration of multiple factors in private actions is a direct product of confining structures created by government. Some of this larger orientation is an indirect result of the government's mere being; its capacity to intervene in response to popular appeal causes private organizations to defer more to popular concerns, even when the government has shown no immediate inclination to intervene.

The governmental bureaucracy

The governmental bureaucracy is the one special organizational structure whose forms and capacities are oriented to general comprehensive integration. Its sovereign position is that of the one wholly conscious and intended, fully systematic bureaucracy at the service of the society at large. There is no principle that properly limits its capacity. Only the procedures necessary to its actions and the general judgment of society set limits, and these limits are variable. But we may see in general terms something of the pattern of occasions that cause the public to resort to the vehicle of governance. Government attends to the most general concerns, and in such fashion as to lead to general courses of action that are considerate of minorities and individuals. Government attends to crisis. Government deals with other governments. And government provides enough ordering of the ordinary to make it acceptable and workable.

The forces operating against resort to government are many and diverse. The proliferation of special private organizations and their extensions of power go on apace. The burden on understanding complexity is heavy. Our confidence in the future is often uneasy. It seems to me that as we continue our course we are more likely to prove insufficiently unified than to find ourselves governmentally regimented and standardized. Even our governmental bureaucracy is not basically unified, but broken into many parts, with thousands of local jurisdictions, forty-eight states, and a national government with considerable and jealous differentiation of powers in branches, the legislative branch divided into two equal houses, the executive branch distinctly least unified among the action arms of important nations. Things centralized in Washington are there drastically decentralized. Other nations have no notion whose commitment on our behalf has any real meaning, and tend never to count on our action at all until we have acted. As a people we are volatile, mercurial, and preoccupied with our specialisms.

We are far more organized in particular than any other society, and less organized in general than any of the large and advanced countries save France—an exception that is hardly reassuring. In some important areas elsewhere, general order is bulwarked by inheritances from an earlier feudalism. These elements of social structure unhappily have undemocratic connotations, but they do contribute to order and continuity. Democracy would seem to require some more conscious structural developments than we have yet recognized or devised, in some part as substitutes for old forms, in some part to take account of new dimensions in internal complexity, and in part to provide for extranational extensions of order. To these ends, we need much more study of the kind reflected in the final chapter of George Homans' The Human Group and in the introductory sections of Pitman B. Potter's Introduction to the Study of International Organization (first edition).

Present problems

The chief problems facing us in our efforts to advance civilization Homans identifies as those of emotional isolation, group conflict, circulation, communication, and control. "Circulation" he defines as the process by which able persons are brought to positions of responsibility in a society. We have no conscious process for the development and identification of really general leadership, except belatedly and partially in nominating conventions. Apart from political parties we have no conscious process of communication by which the many preoccupations of specialism may be related and progressively translated into terms of broad significance. We react hostilely to the very idea of general societal control. Yet the elements of internal isolation and intergroup stresses extend themselves rapidly.

In recent decades, it has become increasingly clear that our long survival in terms of internal values is heavily involved in problems of world order. At the world level there is no historical tradition to lean on, and any presently acceptable structures are necessarily embryonic. At the international level disparities and diversities are dramatically vivid, whereas our internal diversity is so little regarded and understood as often to yield to the assertion that we are regimented and standardized. Most of our thinking about world order is nonstructural and sentimental. The most common structural idea proposes no more than a simple federalism, in terms little changed since our own national beginning. Experience since then should be the crucial focus of our needed learning.

We cannot afford to take it for granted that democracy will endure through an ever more complicated future by relying on structures merely historical and spontaneous. In our own time we need some inventions. We need a more positive approach to bureaucracy, we need to know more about it. If we are to continue to pursue pluralization with any confidence, we need to be sure we are allowing sufficiently for the degree and kind of integration appropriate and necessary to it.

HOSTAGES TO ORDER

A young man from India with Arts and Laws degrees, now pursuing graduate work on the campus of my university, recently put a question to me reflecting his thoughtful concern for his own society. "With all the differences in cultural origin of the people here, and with all your divergent and exacting special concerns, what keeps your society together?" This, I think, is the "$128 question," answers to which, if thoroughly pursued, might prove disturbingly vague and fumbling. We tend to assume our unity without much concern for the amount and distribution of glue in our bodies politic and cultural. I do not pretend to know the answers to the question of my Indian friend, but it may be that I can suggest some of our assets and some of the points to which more conscious attention might be given.

To begin with, we must recognize our pluralism as itself an asset if some of its values are used sufficiently in ways relevant to our concern for effectiveness and survival. It stimulates imagination, inventiveness, and ingenuity in general, making them available wherever there is enough realization of need for them. The geologist president of the Standard Oil Company (New Jersey), Eugene Holman, has given in the *Atlantic Monthly*² a reassuring view of another field of social concern which is analogous to the one in present discussion. In an article entitled "Our Inexhaustible Resources," he recalled how man moved from the stone age to the bronze age, thence to the iron age, on into the steel age, and currently into the age of lightweight metals, plastics, and atomic fission. In this familiar progression, he saw this significant fact:

each age has been of shorter duration than the previous one, and each has unlocked larger storehouses of potential richness than the preceding. Something of the same sort of progression has been true in the field of social organization, enough to reveal the logic of expanding and enriching order. By turning more of our capacities to these possibilities, this logic can be confirmed and greatly accelerated.

Intermediate organization

As already suggested, merely understanding society in organizational terms will relieve us of much unnecessary and futile distress, increasing our tolerance for diversity. Improved understanding can also guide us in structuring private organization in such a manner as to serve better some general needs and to narrow the great gap now existing between the innumerable variations of individual and group attitudes and attitudes consonant with the general interest. This great area between what is organized in particular and what needs consideration by the public at large is capable of a good deal of what I have elsewhere³ referred to as "intermediate organization." This kind of organizational conception is almost exclusively related to the private area, although it could influence governmental policy, public administration, and political organization.

One example of intermediate organization is afforded by instances in which leaders of the National Reclamation Association can reconcile competing and divergent interests in irrigation in the eleven western states, thereby taking positions far advanced from the particular ones of single chambers of commerce, single reclamation districts, and single states, toward an approximation of the general public interest.

³ In an essay entitled "Managing Complexity," Ethics, January 1954.

² Vol. 189 (June 1952), pp. 29-32.

Another example is set forth in the book, American Capitalism, by J. K. Galbraith, Harvard economist, in which he elucidates "the theory of countervailing power," under which private interests may be more often and more consciously used to balance themselves in the general interest. Where such conscious use of multiple structures is made, social rationalization is much more cogent and much more relatable to differentiated values than through laissez faire.

Many different kinds of opportunities for more conscious and improved "intermediate organization" exist in the area of private organization concerning functions not primarily "political" in the special sense of that word. But the organization of politics offers additional opportunities for improving social clarity and coherence. I do not refer here to the actual political but nonpartisan functioning of governmental administrative bureaucracies in the multiple adjustment of interests usually quite unmarked by partisan connotations. I point, rather, to such things as party structures and procedures, party discipline and responsibility, registration and voting procedures, representational arrangements, nomination methods, and to the rarity in individual governmental jurisdictions of an actual two-party system. Much of the citizen frustration commonly ascribed to the bureaucracy has its real occasion in these other structures and processes. The tendency to take particular functions out of politics and to break the political process into many not very well-related parts confuses responsibilities and overloads citizens. A recent Harper's Magazine article makes a plea for fixing state elections at times other than those when national elections are held; in one view this makes sense, but it is to be questioned whether that view is adequate.

The point here being urged is that there be some fairly clear relationships between different levels of instrumentalities, some upward stair-stepping of mechanisms equipped at successive stages to give relatively more general treatment to matters not felt to have been satisfactorily related in lower-level interchanges and lower-level coordination. Many concerns can be sufficiently treated by those directly involved; some need treatment at a broader level; some at a still broader level. The levels fairly readily available should be numerous enough, definite enough, and near enough to each other to facilitate translation. Administrators know that these are the essentials to more delegation and more decentralization in the real meaning of the word, as well as the essentials to the fixing and clarifying of responsibilities. This directional orientation of structure is the chief significance of a unified view of social organization. It less implies advocacy of any structures than provides a way of seeing and considering our bureaucratic complex.

The directional orientation of structure toward successively higher facilities for ordering affairs points most dramatically today toward the international and world levels. Internally it makes especially vivid the enormous difficulty of translating concerns of our sprawling domestic specialisms into foreign policy. It is recognition of this gap which causes such an observer as Samuel Lubell to say that today "the overriding issue is the new necessity for what might be called a 'national state'—for a government strong enough to define and enforce the national interest in a world in which atomic war constantly threatens."

Majority government

Lubell, as one example among understanding political reporters, shares concern with political scientists specializing in politics over the growing difficulty of the American people to achieve majority positions. Our increasing complexity and pluralization are fundamental deterrents, but the belief here being stressed is that structural arrangements can overcome this difficulty. Majority positions in this country never were so frequent and clear as many have believed, however, and, while more obtainable in earlier years, very often were feasible for reasons now anachronistic or otherwise irrelevant. Lines of cohesion dating back to the Civil War, and earlier, long provided the structural means for achieving majority. The disappearance of old sectional characteristics as they have given way to new and more numerous block interests—very hard to reconcile apart from acute crisis—reveals fundamental weaknesses. Among important democracies it may be said that the United Kingdom has most constant majority government, the United States and France the least constant majority government and the most continuing government by interest blocks separately and in extremely temporary and uneasy association.

The United States, because of its geographical scope and its most extraordinary complexity, has more intrinsic need for block government than Britain has, but we also have need for more majority government than we usually achieve. We talk glibly about having majority government, but pay little attention to the structural means for attaining it. This is important to the proper handling of internal affairs. It is especially difficult and urgent at the level of foreign affairs, most of the intrinsics of which are far removed from the view of most citizens.

Government is everywhere essentially the product of the effective public. All of our interrelated structural arrangements very largely determine what is—and when there is—an effective public in the United States. All else depends upon leadership, which our structures at once overload and restrain.

However much in one short essay there may appear to be overemphasis or distortion, it seems undeniable that more attention is owed to our social structures. Except for threats from the right to the basic essentials of free thought and expression, which can be met effectively if we have the will, there seems to be no diminution in our pluralizing momentum. We cannot afford to take it for granted that democracy can be effective and endure nationally through an ever more complicated future by simple reliance on structures historical and impromptu. The longevity of democracy is also importantly involved in the extension of order into the world dimension. Both internal and external concerns are heavily involved with organizational forms and values. Increasing burdens are to be laid on bureaucracy in times to come. We need much more understanding of, and skill in, bureaucratic design and management.

Paul H. Appleby, LL.D., Syracuse, New York, has been dean of the Maxwell Graduate School of Citizenship and Public Affairs of Syracuse University since 1947. After a long experience in publishing and editing weekly newspapers, he served as executive assistant to the Secretary of Agriculture (1933-40) and Under Secretary of Agriculture (1940-44), in the latter period also representing the United States on various food commissions. From 1944 to 1947 he was assistant director of the Bureau of the Budget. He is the author of Big Democracy, Policy and Administration, Morality and Administration in Democratic Government, and of frequent magazine articles.

Report of the Board of Directors to the Members of The American Academy of Political and Social Science for the Year 1953

DURING the year the staff of the Academy continued to occupy the premises at 3937 Chestnut Street. This place of business is well designed for our purposes and is the best working place we have had in the history of the Academy.

MEETINGS

The Fifty-seventh Annual Meeting of the Academy was held in the Benjamin Franklin Hotel in Philadelphia on April 10 and 11, 1953. The attendance was large and participation by members of the audience was active. The subject of the meetings was "NATO and World Peace," which became, as usual, the subject of the volume of THE ANNALS published in July 1953.

PUBLICATIONS

Because of mounting printing costs and staff salaries, the buying power of the funds derived from members' dues has been reduced. We have, accordingly, made a slight reduction in the total number of pages of THE ANNALS. The average number of pages per volume during 1952 was 247, for example, whereas the average number for 1953 was 239.

THE ANNALS during 1953 covered these topics:

January	Puerto Rico: A Study in Democratic Development
March	Mental Health in the United States
May	Judicial Administration and the Common Man
July	NATO and World Peace
September	Congress and Foreign Relations
November	The Impact of Atomic Energy

Total sales of THE ANNALS, indexes, pamphlets, and monographs during 1953 amounted to $11,747, which compares unfavorably to the figure of $13,725 for 1952.

MEMBERSHIP

Membership rose from 16,806 at the end of 1951 to 17,065 at the end of 1952, but, based on the same system of counting, declined to 16,428 at the end of 1953. Toward the end of the year new memberships registered a sharp turn, however.

FINANCES

The Report of the Treasurer reveals that there has been a deficit in Academy operations throughout 1952 and 1953. The Board will accordingly entertain resolution to raise the dues for membership. Our dues have not been changed since the Academy was established in 1889; they are therefore widely out of line with the present costs of operation. To meet the operating deficit, and finance the cost of litigation in connection with the libel suit, the proceeds of securities owned by the Academy to the amount of $25,000 have been used.

CHANGE OF OFFICERS

Dr. Ernest Minor Patterson, President of the Academy since 1930, retired May 31, 1953, to become President Emeritus. Dr. J. P. Lichtenberg, Secretary of the Academy since 1941, died March 17, 1953. Dr. Carl Kelsch, Vice-President of the Academy since 1912, died October 15, 1953. Anne Elderton, Assistant Secretary of the Academy since 1944, was elected Secretary May 15, 1953. Miss Elderton resigned as secretary December 27, 1953.

Two veteran employees also retired, one of these having held the position of first editorial assistant for twenty-four years, and the other having handled our annual meetings for thirty-four years.

Dr. James C. Charlesworth, Associate Editor of THE ANNALS since November 1949, and acting Editor for a period of a year and half, in 1950-51, took office as President of the Academy June 1, 1953. Dr. Richard D. Lambert was appointed Assistant Editor on the same date.

The officers and staff of the Academy have not yet become fully adjusted to these changes, but we are pleased to report that the staff is in a good state of morale and is working assiduously to strengthen the administration of our affairs.

Respectfully submitted,
THE BOARD OF DIRECTORS

REPORT OF AUDITORS

January 23, 1954

CHARLES J. RHOADS, Esq., Treasurer, American Academy of Political & Social Science, Philadelphia, Penna.

Dear Sir:

We herewith report that we have audited the books and accounts of the American Academy of Political and Social Science for its fiscal year ended December 31, 1953.

We have prepared and submit herewith Statement of Receipts and Disbursements for the year ended December 31, 1953.

The Receipts from all sources were verified by a comparison of the entries for same appearing in the Treasurer's Cash

Book with the records of bank deposits and were found to be in accord therewith.

The Disbursements, as shown by the Cash Book, were supported by the proper vouchers in the form of cancelled paid checks or receipts for moneys expended. These were examined by us and confirmed the correctness of the payments made.

As the result of our audit and examination, made in the manner above indicated, we certify that, in our opinion, the accompanying Statement sets forth the results of its operating activities for the period under review.

Yours respectfully,

(Signed) EDWARD P. MOXEY & Co.

BUCHANAN, WILLIAM, and HADLEY CANTRIL, with the assistance of VIRGINIA VAN S. ZEREGA, HENRY DURANT, and JAMES R. WHITE. How Nations See Each Other: A Study in Public Opinion. Pp. ix, 220. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1953. $5.00.

Incredible as it may seem to some, the cold fact remains that an important current issue with the United States is whether we should try to make our allies of the free world dance to our own tune or whether we should treat them as equal partners in a coalition pledged to securing freedom and keeping Communist aggression in check. A vocal minority within American public life appears to believe that it is possible for the United States to cast the rest of the world in its own image—and some might add "and make them like it."

If it does nothing more, this book sheds a good deal of light on the difficulty and probable impossibility of expecting the rest of the free world to make itself over in the American mold. It might come as a surprise to some in the United States to learn that a sizable part of the people in Australia, Britain, France, Germany, Italy, Mexico, Netherlands, and Norway think the Russians are harder working than we. Or that we are not looked on as being especially brave, peace-loving, or intelligent. Or that, to many, we are looked on as being conceited and even domineering.

It might also come as a surprise to some who have charged our allies with being "soft" on Communism to find that the prevailing view among the peoples of these nine countries is that the Russians are domineering, cruel, and backward. There are few signs, indeed, that the people of other lands have been any less alert than the American people in realizing what Communism has done to the Russian people.

There is one discouraging over-all note in the book: far less than a majority appear to believe that ultimate world peace is possible of attainment. But a counterbalancing optimistic note is that nearly four out of every ten think that there should be some form of world government.

If we are to find the way toward real international co-operation, studies such as this are essential to the understanding of mankind. Methodologically, one would hope that such studies could be set on a trend basis and that in the future we could gain more and better data on how people's attitudes in the various countries are formed and how they change over a period of time. For instance, it would be interesting to know the changes, shifts, and developments that have occurred since the field work for this book was completed back in 1948.

Such studies as this book describe add greatly to our total knowledge and ultimate understanding. With information along these lines, we have an important part of the necessary underlying fabric for building free world unity and eventual peace. Without it, we might well fall victim to our preconceived prejudices and rationalizations, and this is inevitably the road to division, despair, and disunity.

PHILLIPS, WILLIAM. Ventures in Diplomacy. Pp. 477. Boston, Mass.: Beacon Press, 1953. $5.50.

Forty years of an outstanding American diplomatic career are reviewed in this fascinating and well-written memoir. Though Phillips has included some private autobiographical material, the emphasis throughout is on his official life. The result is an outstanding contribution to the diplomatic history of the last half-century and a matured analysis of the diplomatic art itself.

Beginning as an unpaid private secretary to Ambassador Choate in the London of Edwardian England, the author served in his first official job in the China of the Dowager Empress. His account of official State Department life in Washington in Theodore Roosevelt's and Wilson's administrations offers a keen insight into the somewhat chaotic, highly personalized methods of policy making before World War I.

His most important assignments were as Undersecretary of State (twice: under Harding and Coolidge, and again under Franklin Roosevelt), as Ambassador to Italy in the years leading up to Pearl Harbor, and as personal representative of the President, with rank of Ambassador, to India for a period during World War II. For the student of foreign affairs, the work has documentary significance of the first rank in its descriptions of those periods. Two examples will suffice: his strong campaign for a merit system in the foreign service during Wilson's administration, and his repeated urgings of Roosevelt to bring pressure on Churchill to release Gandhi and Nehru during World War II.

A diplomat of the old school, Phillips none the less met well the challenge of an increasingly complex world order. His regrets at the passing of the easy informality and high esprit of the old foreign service are few and slight. He speaks with enthusiasm of the technical improvements in the handling of foreign affairs, and particularly of the increased awareness of American opinion of the worldwide responsibilities of this country in the present and future. His advice to young people contemplating a foreign service career should become a classic statement.

If the quality of diplomacy is a major ingredient of a nation's strength, we may feel fortunate that men of Phillips' stamp have chosen this career. The book, written originally for his family, will stand as an example and a guide for future works of its type.

BROWDER, ROBERT PAUL. The Origins of Soviet-American Diplomacy. Pp. xi, 256. Princeton, N. J.: Princeton University Press, 1953. $5.00.

This excellent monograph is a fresh and penetrating analysis of the circumstances surrounding the establishment of diplomatic relations between the United States and the Soviet Union in 1933. The author has combed all available American and Soviet sources to provide a scholarly and thoroughly documented account of the background, the negotiations, and after-effects of recognition.

On the basis of a careful examination of the journals of the period, Professor Browder finds that the major factor in inducing business leaders and the general public to favor recognition was the hope that a great expansion of Soviet-American trade would help end the depression. These exaggerated expectations were less evident in Washington. So far as the Administration was concerned, trade was a "cloak" for recognition, but not the "primary objective." The main purpose was to remove a barrier to international co-operation, to stem Japanese aggression in the Far East, and to preserve peace in Europe.

The chief obstacles to recognition were Communist activity in the United States, the repudiated Russian debt, and the demand of the Administration for legal and religious safeguards for American citizens in the Soviet Union. Initially, the American negotiators insisted that all of these issues had to be settled by iron-clad agreements before recognition could be extended. Litvinov was willing to give assurances on Communist propaganda and to guarantee legal and religious rights to Americans in the Soviet Union, but the debt issue proved refractory. Instead of delaying recognition until a precise debt settlement was arranged, President Roosevelt entered into a "gentleman's agreement" by which Litvinov agreed to remain in Washington after the resumption of diplomatic relations "to discuss . . . the exact sum between the limits of $75,000,000 and $150,000,000 to be paid by the Soviet Government." The discussions were held, but were soon suspended to enable Litvinov to return to Moscow. Negotiations continued over the next years, but no agreement was reached.

The high hopes and good will which ushered in recognition were soon replaced by increasing dissatisfaction and irritation with Soviet behavior. As a result of the failure to reach a debt settlement, Soviet-American trade dwindled to very modest proportions. The participation of American Communists in the Comintern Congress in Moscow in 1935 was treated as a violation of the pledge of noninterference in American affairs and further weakened American confidence in Soviet good faith. "The quest for mutual understanding proved futile," and Bullitt, the American ambassador who had arrived in Moscow in 1933 filled with enthusiasm for the future of Soviet-American relations, departed in 1935 bitter and frustrated.

In Professor Browder's view, American "misconception and naïveté" about the Soviet Union "paved the way for future disillusionment." His assessment of the recognition episode is somber and perceptive. "In that period," he points out, "America had the opportunity to study at first hand the conduct of Soviet foreign policy. Clearly revealed was Moscow's propensity for the clouding of central issues by resort to long and tedious arguments on peripheral points of misunderstanding. Evident likewise was the necessity of securing a simultaneous sine qua non for every concession to Russia. Promises for the future brought only frustration and tension. . . . In the light of past experience, the United States should have entered the World War II alliance with Soviet Russia aware of the methods and principles of Soviet diplomacy and prepared to act accordingly. Unfortunately, the lesson was badly learned . . . it is difficult to avoid the conclusion that a more practical, less idealistic approach during the Second World War was justified by the experiences of recognition and its aftermath."

BARNES, HARRY ELMER (Ed., in collaboration with WILLIAM HENRY CHAMBERLIN, PERCY L. GREAVES, JR., GEORGE A. LUNDBERG, GEORGE MORCENSTERN, WILLIAM L. NEUMANN, FREDERICK R. SANBORN, and CHARLES CALLAN TANSILL). Perpetual War for Perpetual Peace. Pp. xiii, 679. Caldwell, Idaho: Caxton Printers, 1953. $6.00.

The editor describes this volume as "a critical survey and appraisal of the development of American foreign policy during the Presidency of Franklin D. Roosevelt, and of its results, as they have affected the course of world history, the national interest of the United States, and the welfare of its citizens" (Preface, p. vii). However, the formulators of our foreign policy from 1914 onward (President Hoover specifically excepted) are indicted for stupidity, and at times malevolence, in their "meddling abroad in situations which did not materially affect either our security or our prestige" (p. 6). As regards our security it was "not even remotely threatened in the case of either world war" (p. 6).

The reviewer believes that the book might be more effective if the collaborators did not virtually extinguish the light they seek to throw on our recent foreign policy, in clouds of invective and streams of abuse.

Wilson was "a so-called statesman who promised peace while weaving a web of war" (p. 81). He drank lemonade but ordered it "heavily spiked with the hard liquor of deceit" (p. 81). Roosevelt, sly war monger, insisted on peace at Munich because "he did not want any war to start in Europe which might terminate so rapidly that the United States could not enter it" (p. 171).

The chief task of the collaborators is to uncover conspirators and reveal conspiracies. The editor is the chief prosecutor, enthusiastically assisted by seven collaborators. American historians who do not accept revisionism are "court historians," prostituting themselves as special pleaders to "whitewash" Roosevelt's foreign policy. Others, including publishers, who have a "stake" in perpetuating the "historical blackout" are determined "to stifle or silence revelations which would establish the truth with regard to the causes and issues of the late world conflict" (p. 8). It is the herculean task of Barnes and his collaborators, therefore, through "robust Revisionism" to expose the conspirators and their "academic hatchet men," set the record straight, and thus warn the American people against being duped into a third world war.

In spite of prodigious toil in an attempt to cull all possible damaging circumstantial evidence to prove that President Roosevelt, assisted by his fellow criminals, Marshall, Stimson, and others, callously lied the country into war, the revisionists do not quite make it. Rather does the ex-President still remain the consummate and essentially pragmatic politician who gradually was convinced by the totalitarian powers that the United States must abandon neutrality or compromise the nation's security and welfare. The President's moves in preparation for the conflict do not seem to this reviewer to constitute evidence that they were part of an evil design to "maneuver" the country into war. Rather do they seem to represent the prudent foresight of one who bore the chief responsibility for the nation's defense and would have been culpable had he failed to shoulder it.

WILLIAMS, FRANCIS. Transmitting World News: A Study of Telecommunications and the Press. Pp. 95. New York: Columbia University Press, 1953. $1.00.

The average, intelligent reader is well aware of some of the influences which distort or prevent the free flow of international news: censorship, propaganda, and the tendency of news distributors to offer an erratic supply of information which emphasizes the sensational. The same reader is unlikely to give much if any thought to news fetters in areas such as inadequate technical facilities and unreasonable economic restraints. Yet, as the present work amply demonstrates, the quality and quantity of world news are widely affected by such factors, in some instances to an alarming degree.

The study, Transmitting World News, was commissioned by UNESCO in the hope of facilitating beneficial measures at the next International Telephone and Telegraph Conference to be held in 1954 or 1955. A more competent author could scarcely have been selected. Francis Williams, a former British editor and government official, is author of one of the most thoughtful books on the press to appear in recent years, Press, Parliament and People (London, 1946.) Not only does he possess first-hand knowledge of telecommunications problems, but he combines a zeal to better existing conditions with all-around fair-mindedness and a sense of what is economically practicable or otherwise feasible.

Although the present statement is brief, it is packed with facts and cogent arguments. There is a short historical introduction and a strong plea for making news "not merely the concern of those professionally involved in its collection and distribution, but of all men and all nations." There follows an examination of both national and world news agencies with the intent of showing where their facilities are adequate or inadequate and why. Each of the major methods used in transmitting world news—the use of ordinary, commercial facilities on a cost-per-word basis, the lease of point-to-point circuits (both wire and radio), multiple address broadcasts, teleprinter systems, and facsimile and telephoto services—is described in terms of what is presently being done and what can be expected. Mr. Williams' best efforts, however, are in the area of economic problems. Some of the inequities pointed out in news-transmission charges, for which there appear to be no sensible reasons, are little short of startling. The author not only shows how some of these discrepancies affect the news adversely but how improvements may be made on an economical basis.

This excellent study deserves a far larger audience than the one for which it was specifically prepared.

AMERICAN GOVERNMENT AND HISTORY

MILLER, PERRY. The New England Mind: From Colony to Province. Pp. xiii, 513. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1953. $6.50.

The present study takes up the story of the evolving pattern of New England's thinking at the time when the generation of the founders was passing away. It ends when the Mathers have left the scene, and when the Great Awakening is about to usher in a new era. The Bible Commonwealth had been a covenanted society, rightly enjoying special evidences of Divine favor, yet subject to condign wrath should it fail to measure up to the rather exacting standards which a Puritan Deity imposed. Politically and socially, control was in the hands of the saints who did not hesitate to constrain the unregenerate to walk aright. The prevalent homiletic device of the period, the Jeremiad, emphasized the sins of the community, the consequent loss of Divine favor, the inevitably ensuing misfortunes, and the need for repentance and reformation. Particularly suited to the idea of the covenant, the Jeremiad lost its effectiveness as this concept faded.

For the pattern changed with the times. Prosperity as such had never troubled the Puritan, who could see in the increase of his worldly goods the evidence of Divine favor. Yet as New England developed economically, a more secular point of view evolved. The second and third generations lacked the devoted enthusiasm of the first, and parsons saw their flocks shrinking. They therefore resorted to the Half-Way covenant, the admission of persons, normally the children of church members, to quasi membership, thus enlarging the congregation at the expense of the church. The Bible Commonwealth came to an end when Massachusetts lost her charter. Part of her peculiar institutional system was indeed salvaged when Increase Mather secured the new charter of 1691. Yet she was now a royal colony, and the saints could no longer employ the arm of the state to control the unregenerate—not, at all events, with former assurance.

While in a measure isolated, New England Puritans were responsive to developments elsewhere. They were influenced by, though not always in step with, the non-conformists of old England; and they were able, with an ease which is nothing short of astonishing, to absorb the Newtonian Physics. The central figure in this study is inevitably Cotton Mather. Disrelish of him as a human being does not prevent the author from recognizing his intellect, his learning, and his influence.

Any intellectual history which is of much use has to be written in the idiom of the age which it depicts. Professor Miller's study meets this requirement admirably. He appraises the Salem witchcraft debacle, the inoculation controversy, and countless other developments in the light of contemporary standards. He has written with sympathy and understanding of men whose tastes and ways of thinking are obviously remote from his own, and has succeeded in being profound without being heavy. This is a highly significant study. Anyone interested in American intellectual development will ignore it at his peril.

MORGAN, EDMUND S., and HELEN M. MORGAN. The Stamp Act Crisis. Pp. x, 310. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press (published for the Institute of Early American History and Culture), 1953. $6.00.

This is a good and useful book. For it is a careful study of the events, the men, and the ideas (chiefly American) that were involved in the crisis in the relations between thirteen of the English colonies in America and the mother country that was precipitated by the so-called "Grenville program" of imperial reform, and, in particular, by the Stamp Act of 1765. It is also the elaboration of a thesis: the thesis that, had Parliament not repealed the Stamp Act, and had the English government attempted to enforce it, the American Revolution would have begun in 1766 instead of 1776. As a study of the Stamp Act crisis, the book is admirable; as a statement of this thesis, it offers food for interesting thought—and ultimate rejection. As a matter of fact, this thesis invites an equally plausible thesis, if not, indeed, a more plausible one, that had England enforced the Stamp Act, the Revolution might never have occurred at all!

The most valuable parts of the book, probably, are the penetrating biographical sketches of the friends of America who were, for the most part, the victims of the mob that were manipulated by the Sons of Liberty. The discussions of the ideas and behavior of such men as Francis Bernard, John Robinson, Daniel Dulaney, Thomas Hutchinson, Jared Ingersoll, and John Hughes, considered against the background of their training and the provincial party-politics of which they were to a high degree the victims, are genuine contributions to an understanding of the true issues in the crisis. There is some room for doubt of the authors' analysis of the ideas of these men in one or two cases. For while the authors present a good case to show that Thomas Hutchinson, for example, "was just as convinced as his demagogical enemies that Parliament had no constitutional [italics are the reviewer's] right to pass either the Sugar Act or the Stamp Act" (p. 210 et seq.), the claim does not seem to be adequately proved. In any case, Hutchinson certainly took the opposite position in 1773 when he wrote to the Massachusetts House of Representatives, the mouthpiece of which was Sam Adams. Whatever Hutchinson may have thought before the Declaratory Act, it certainly seems abundantly clear that in 1773 he did not think Parliament had no "constitutional" right to tax the colonies.

It is in Part Four, "Revolution Delayed," that the authors most clearly present their thesis that by the repeal of the Stamp Act alone "rebellion and civil war had been avoided and the strength of the empire preserved" (p. 281) and that the repeal "staved off revolution in 1766" (p. 292).

Yet it would be a rash historian, indeed, who would say that the activities of the Sons of Liberty and allied local politicians indicated the sort of popular strength and unanimity that would have been necessary to stage a successful "revolution" in 1766. It does seem certain that, sooner or later, the continental Americans, at least, would have demanded, and insisted upon, some larger measure of autonomy within the Empire, and, conceivably, upon totally different grounds. They were, indeed, working toward "something bigger than themselves" (p. 256).

But in 1765 they were confused as to just what this "something bigger than themselves" was. The English, too (whom the authors would have done well to study much more thoroughly than they have), were confused; the English, too, were wrestling with the problem of conceiving and defining clearly "something bigger than themselves." It is a question of perspectives. It appears that the authors have let themselves be misled by the extreme, if prescient, remarks of a few men like John Hughes.

Yet the rejection of the speculative part of the book does not in the least diminish the brightness of the fact that in its purely narrative and analytical parts, partial and incomplete though they be, this little book is, in fact, a very useful study of the "prologue" to the American War for Independence.

JEFFERSON, THOMAS. The Papers of Thomas Jefferson. Edited by Julian P. Boyd, with Mina R. Bryan and Elizabeth L. Hutter, associate editors. Vol. VII: March 1784 to February 1785. Pp.

xviii, 652. Princeton, N. J.: Princeton University Press, 1953. $10.00.

Like its predecessors, the seventh volume in this epoch-making edition of the writings of Jefferson places the world of scholarship in continued debt to Julian Boyd and his associates. The presentation, discussion, and accompanying commentary of each document satisfy the most fastidious standards, while the format and printing are worthy, on aesthetic grounds alone, to enshrine permanently the thoughts of America's foremost philosopher-statesman.

In the period from March 1784 to February 1785, which the new volume covers, Jefferson is still laboring to cut and set in place the foundation stones of the new government. A fine example of his craftsmanship is his argument concerning the coinage and the adoption of the dollar as the unit of currency. There, where he plunges into the intricacies of monetary policy, he displays his unerring gift for penetrating analysis, clear thinking, and lucid expression.

The same quality emerges in the new role which Jefferson undertook in the latter half of 1784—as a diplomatic envoy. Sent to Paris to negotiate, along with Franklin and Adams, a series of commercial treaties, Jefferson now becomes a source of information, not only on the international relations of the United States, but also on the politics of the European powers. A significant pointer to future action is his warning about the piracy practiced by the governments of the Barbary Coast. His advice represents a frank blending of long-sightedness with shrewd realism. "We have two plans to pursue," he states. "The one to carry nothing for ourselves, and thereby render ourselves invulnerable to the European states; the other (which our country will be for) is to carry as much as possible. But this will require a protecting force on the sea. Otherwise the smallest powers in Europe, every one of which possesses a single ship of the line, may dictate to us, and enforce their demands by captures on our commerce. Some naval force then is necessary if we mean to be commercial. Can we have a better occasion of beginning one? Or find a foe more certainly within our dimensions?" (p. 639).

Residence in Europe does not prevent Jefferson from paying attention to his correspondence, though he reminds his friends of its difficulties. A letter mailed directly to France took seven weeks to arrive, and was virtually certain to be opened and read en route. As for the undesirability of visits to Europe by young Americans, Jefferson has this critical observation to offer: "Indeed from what I have seen here I know not one good purpose on earth which can be effected by a young gentleman's coming here. He may learn indeed to speak the language, but put this in the scale against the other things he will learn and evils he is sure to acquire and it will be found too light. I have always disapproved of a European education for our youth from theory: I now do it from inspection" (p. 519). The writer of those words was, at that time, aged forty-one. To one of his advanced years, and possessing an intellect so rare, Europe fortunately did have something to offer, as his reports on recent technological inventions and book purchases bear witness.

DE VOTO, BERNARD (Ed.). The Journals of Lewis and Clark. Pp. lii, 504. Boston: Houghton Mifflin Company, 1953. $6.50.

Although the Lewis and Clark expedition (1804-06) is a well-known historical fact, it is unlikely that many readers have studied it from the original journals kept principally by its two leaders, Captain Meriwether Lewis and Second Lieutenant William Clark, the latter a cocommander of the expedition and called "captain." While the edition of the journals that Mr. De Voto now presents is an abbreviated one, it doubtless will be adequate to all the needs of the general reader. The editor warns that the full edition is necessary for scholarly purposes.

The experiences of the Lewis and Clark party—largely military but ably assisted by civilian members—as they made their way up the Missouri River, over the Rocky Mountains, and down the Columbia River to its mouth, and on the return, constitute a story of adventure, danger, narrow escapes, and marked resourcefulness of the leaders in meeting emergencies. Always vivid in their descriptive passages, the journals often rise to the level of superb literature. Especially memorable are those portions describing vast grasslands on which grazed great herds of buffaloes, deer, and elk; the hair-raising encounters with grizzly bears; the tense moments with unfriendly Indians; and the running of rapids, a feat that sometimes even filled the natives with wonder.

Although Lewis was the better prepared scholar, Clark seems not to have been his inferior in incisiveness of intellect or in aptness and precision of vocabulary. Clark's unorthodox spelling ("jentele brease," "few," "surcumfrance," for example) is one of the delights that awaits the reader, although it may leave his orthography somewhat confused.

The all-round competence of Lewis and Clark, aged 30 and 34, respectively, in 1804, was amazing: minor surgery, bone-setting, midwifery, and administration to ailments ranging from sore eyes to pleurisy, rheumatism, ulcers, and venereal disease, all came within their ken, especially Clark's. And all the while they had to safeguard the limited supplies upon which the expedition depended; negotiate with Indians for horses, food, and guides; supervise the building of boats and canoes and the killing of game; plan encampments and forts; gather specimens of the flora and fauna; and make maps and write reports.

As long as distinguished service to country is deemed worthy of note, the Lewis and Clark expedition must remain a glorious chapter in the nation's history. Mr. De Voto and his publishers are to be commended for their efforts to make the account of this expedition better known to the American people.

NEVINS, ALLAN. The Statesmanship of the Civil War (The Page-Barbour Lectures, University of Virginia, 1951). Pp. vii, 82. New York: The Macmillan Company, 1953. $2.25.

Allan Nevins is a phenomenon of American historiography, remarkable alike for the number of his publications and the variety of fields into which he has directed his research. At present his major attention is directed to a multi-volume history of the Civil War, The Ordeal of the Union, three volumes of which have appeared. This little volume represents certain reflections that have arisen in the course of the larger study.

Professor Nevins first raises the question as to what constitutes statesmanship. He suggests that intellectual power, moral strength or weight of character, and an instinct for the needs and opportunities of a current crisis, all of them infused with a passion for some great ideal—such as nationalism or democracy—are essential qualities.

In contrast with the period of the American Revolution, that of the intersectional conflict produced for the most part only second-rate talents. Jacksonian democracy had perhaps created in the electorate a taste for a certain coarseness of mind and character among their elected representatives. Furthermore, the challenge to most men of both sides was simply the relatively uninspiring one of defending a status quo—political union for the North and the anachronistic institution of slavery for the South. In the Confederacy it was only on the field of battle that true leadership appeared. Jefferson Davis, charged with the greatest civilian responsibility although he would have much preferred to lead the armed forces, had many admirable qualities. But he failed utterly to win a true following either among the colleagues who shared his responsibility for governing the Confederate nation and its component states or among the people at large. Thus, for all his devotion to Southern nationality, the way was open for the cancer of state rights to destroy the organism which it had caused to abort from the parent union.

Of all the Civil War generation only Lincoln, humbly willing to accept the verdict of history without attempting to supply anticipatory alibis, deserves, Mr. Nevins concludes, to be accorded the rank of a civilian statesman. He was able to maintain a working relationship with even the most provoking of his associates to the extent necessary to get the job done, and when the opportunity arose he taught them all lessons in realpolitik. Never did he forget that the purpose of military victory was to bring back the rebel enemies as fellow citizens, as equals. By abolishing slavery, at the right time and in the best possible manner, he signalized the opening of a new era not simply of Negro but of human rights. He called upon the people of all lands and all times to lift up their eyes to new horizons "for man's vast future."

Mr. Nevins, in his characteristic smooth literary style, modestly presents these reflections not as final conclusions but as an invitation to thought about some of the larger implications of the sectional struggle. His readers will be grateful for the opportunity to share in the pleasure that must have come to his audience in Charlottesville two years ago.

LA FOLLETTE, BELLE CASE, and FOLA LA FOLLETTE. Robert M. La Follette: June 14, 1885-June 18, 1925. 2 vols. Pp. xx, 730; vii, 731-1305. New York: The Macmillan Company, 1953. $15.00.

For almost 25 years Belle Case La Follette and Fola, wife and daughter of Robert Marion La Follette, worked with boundless effort and affection to produce this superb biography. Although no claim to cold objectivity is advanced these volumes are no mere eulogy. This lengthy book—perhaps it is too long—is the detailed story of Fighting Bob's quarter century in American politics. Naturally the authors have believed with one of La Follette's contemporaries that no American of La Follette's generation "impressed himself so deeply upon the life and thought and institutions of America" as did their husband and father.

La Follette was a genuine product of the frontier and from his entrance upon the "strenuous life" always fought for his conception of a more workable democracy. The chief dangers to the further development of our form of government, as viewed by La Follette, grew out of increasingly centralized corporate power exercised by economic moguls. As Governor of Wisconsin, 1901-1906, he succeeded so well in curtailing the further growth of concentrated economic power and in regulating existing corporations that his state was widely acclaimed as the most successful experiment in our democratic processes.

Riding the crest of the wave of American liberal reform, for which he himself was greatly responsible, La Follette entered the United States Senate in 1906. Here he was to remain until his death in 1925. Although always in the spotlight of national interest, he was never in a position of control in Washington as he had been in Madison. What influence he exerted was on the domestic scene. His sincere isolationism, fired with an aggressive courage, brought him wide condemnation during World War I. Never in sympathy with the Wilsonian concept of making "the world safe for democracy" La Follette relentlessly sought to make the American republic more secure.

With Roosevelt snatching the leadership of the Progressives from him during a moment of mental and nervous exhaustion, Battling Bob bided his time until 1924 to challenge entrenched conservatism again. As the presidential nominee of the Progressive party at that time he received over 5 million votes or about one-sixth of those cast. His death followed a few months later in 1925.

While not the definitive biography, this voluminous contribution to recent Americana will be welcomed as a rich source of information about the life of this courageous American.

ROOSEVELT, NICHOLAS. A Front Row Seat. Pp. xi, 304. Norman: University of Oklahoma Press, 1953. $4.50.

"I do not know of any young man of his age who has his qualities," wrote Theodore Roosevelt to Robert Bacon in 1914 concerning his 21-year-old first cousin Nicholas. Out of context the sentence has the ambiguity of a Delphian Oracle. In retrospect it would seem to have been prophetic of a notable career.

Nicholas grew up in intimate association with the great tribe, and he notes that "whenever two or more Roosevelts met each talked vociferously and ceaselessly paying no attention to what anyone else tried to say." These memoirs are crystal clear except where the reader gets lost in a tangle of cousins, aunts, uncles, nieces, and nephews. Indeed a genealogical chart is necessary and is provided on pages 288 and 289. As a frequent guest at Oyster Bay, Nicholas fell under the spell of the incredible Theodore who was 34 years his senior, and consequently his judgments on this personality lack scientific objectivity. However it must be said that Nicholas deals kindly with the Hyde Park branch of the great tribe and was indeed a frequent White House visitor as a guest of distant cousin Franklin.

His diplomatic career got its start while a graduate student at Harvard in 1914 when President Lowell advised him to accept the opportunity to go as secretary of the American envoy at Bordeaux, to which city the French government had just fled, before the threatened fall of Paris to the German army. Next he was secretary of a mission to Spain. Following the armistice he was one of the ten aides of President Wilson at the Paris Peace Conference and was in charge of the mission in Budapest when the Communist coup d'état made Bela Kuhn dictator.

Back home he was secretary and aide to General Leonard Wood in his campaign for the Republican nomination for President. When Wood became Governor General of the Philippines, Nicholas went with him as vice-governor. His final diplomatic service was as minister to Hungary in the early thirties.

Nicholas Roosevelt's diplomatic experience equipped him for his career as a journalist. He became an editorial writer of the New York Herald Tribune and the New York Times and a special correspondent of the latter paper as well as of several European dailies. During the second World War he was deputy director of the Office of War Information. He was the author of several books on foreign affairs and lectured extensively in that field.

The title A Front Row Seat appears justified by the intimate acquaintances of Nicholas. Among others than those already mentioned were William Jennings Bryan, George Clemenceau, Herbert Hoover, Alfred M. Landon, Ogden Mills, and Wendell Willkie.

These memoirs are written with the sparkle and lucidity of a superior journalist, which qualities the author feels that most American historians lack. They are also in his opinion "handicapped by not having had the training in evaluating the importance, as well as the credibility of material which is basic in good journalism."

As befits a one-time graduate assistant of the late Professor Edward Channing, the book is remarkably free from slips of the pen. However Chester Arthur was no Warren Harding, and historians do not so readily accept cousin Theodore's heroic version of the Venezuela crisis of 1902.

LEUCHTENBURG, WILLIAM EDWARD. Flood-Control Politics: The Connecticut River Valley Problem, 1927-1950. Pp. 339. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1953. $5.00.

OSTROM, VINCENT. Water and Politics: A Study of Water Policies and Administration in the Development of Los Angeles. Pp. xviii, 297. Los Angeles: Haynes Foundation, 1953. $4.00 cloth; $3.50 paper.

Water does not become a political issue unless there is too little or too much of it, as these two excellent studies of water politics demonstrate. Ostrom's book is a detailed account of how a have-not community, Los Angeles, secured the water supplies essential for its phenomenal growth, and how water shaped the political institutions and the community patterns of the region. The City of Los Angeles was deliberately organized as a unit of government to assure control of the water resources of San Fernando Valley. The Metropolitan Water District has followed a careful policy of annexation guaranteeing its effective control over the entire regional complex of watersheds and ground water basins in the area.

Ostrom follows the fascinating flow of water politics wherever it leads. He explains the Spanish system of pueblo water rights on which the entire system was based. He analyzes the political process by which municipal power operation was achieved. He discusses the interesting history of the Los Angeles Water and Power Department, concluding that the Department was more efficient in the earlier days when it was "in politics" than later when the goals of a "business-type" administration were substituted.

Seeing how control over water has been used to mold the life of this region, Ostrom is moved to ask whether in other areas public control over natural resources is being employed as consciously or wisely. "What human ends are being served by the nourishment of the local 'grass roots' by the Corps of Engineers? To what kind of society is the Bureau of Reclamation committed by its policies of organization and operation?" He is even led to speculate whether the municipal corporation, operating so successfully in the form of the Metropolitan Water District, might not be a preferable alternative to the device of the federal valley authority.

If Ostrom's story is that of governmental institutions adapted to their resource task and in full command of the situation, Leuchtenburg's tale is one of a continuing stubborn and short-sighted refusal to consider the policies and governmental readjustments which could protect the Connecticut Valley from the conditions which subjected it to three catastrophic floods within eleven years. The record, up to the close of the narrative in 1950, is one of almost complete failure. Less than 5 per cent of the total drainage area of the valley has been brought under control. The reservoirs that have been built are single-purpose, no power being generated. Pollution of the river is still largely uncontrolled.

Leuchtenburg gives his assessment of the reasons. One is the conflict among federal agencies, with the Army Engineers operating in their traditional splendid isolation. A second is the parochialism of the states involved, bitterly resisting any prospect of federal intervention and agreeing to the mild co-operation of an interstate compact only under the threat of a Tennessee Valley Authority for the Connecticut. Experience with the compact convinces Leuchtenburg that it is a hopelessly inadequate device, and he quotes the Izaak Walton League's statement that "as a legal means of putting off the day of reckoning in pollution control, the inter-state compact probably has no equal."

Finally, Leuchtenburg suggests that failure on the Connecticut results from the habit of turning every water resources problem into an ideological dispute and of viewing every question as a moral issue. Vermont agriculturists and private utilities equally wrap up their selfish interests in states' rights language. The author concludes: "If the future development of the Connecticut Valley is to be accommodated to the New England faith in local authority, the state governments must demonstrate that they are interested in exercising power not to frustrate action by government at any level but to develop the river in the interest of the people of the valley."

BARTLEY, ERNEST R. The Tidelands Oil Controversy. Pp. x, 312. Austin: University of Texas Press, 1953. $5.00.

This is a study in federalism arising from disputed claims over the oil-producing tidelands of the United States, based largely on an examination of "the history and legal background" of the three leading tidelands oil cases. The study is presented in fifteen chapters including a brief statement of the problem (Chapter 1) and a chapter of conclusions. Dr. Bartley summarizes the development of the territorial concept of the marginal seas, reviews the bases of claims thereto attributed to the several states, analyzes the judicial controversies, and digests political points of view gathered from congressional hearings and debates and from actions taken and proposed by officers of the executive branch. In his analysis the author runs the whole gamut of legal concepts, state-federal relationships, party politics, political pressures, and private interests. The tidelands issues are here presented in a manner calculated to emphasize the possibilities of and the consequences of direct clashes between the states and the nation in our federal system.

The author implies the fabrication of a legal doctrine (the doctrine of paramount powers) to justify an assertion of authority by a power-conscious central government. Having taken advantage of the relatively insignificant oil controversy to voice the doctrine, the author sees these same forces urging its eventual extension to claims of jurisdiction over territories and commodities never before believed to be within the reach of national power.

The doctrine of paramount powers, he asserts, is an extension of the concept of inherent powers and must therefore be associated with theories of external sovereignty. It is thus not an appropriate device for reading new meanings into those delegated powers which relate exclusively to matters of internal concern. Even so, there is the constant threat of encroachment. He states that the doctrine could perhaps be extended, "to cover first the bed of a river which is an international boundary, and later the beds of inland lakes and rivers which are not international boundaries." He questions, however, the possibility of extending the doctrine inland, for example, to the "iron ore in the Mesabi Range."

To me the most disappointing feature of the study is the author's all too casual analysis of his principal thesis, the doctrine of paramount powers. The analysis is neither complete nor entirely convincing. Dr. Bartley says that the doctrine of paramount powers "bears more than a superficial relationship" to Mr. Justice Sutherland's "famed inherent-powers" doctrine; "... it is obvious," he says, "that the two ideas are cut from the same cloth. . . ." These observations are not necessarily self-evident truths. Yet the ensuing analysis is neither searching nor penetrating. In fact, beyond the assertion, the identity of the two doctrines is established almost exclusively by a process of word matching. If the doctrine of paramount powers is "the contribution Justice Black has made to American constitutional law" (presumably in this series of cases), it would appear to merit a more exhaustive consideration. If the doctrine is destined "to have far reaching effects," it should at least be placed in proper historical perspective, even in a study not limited to the constitutional and legal aspects of the controversy.

Certainly a great mass of materials has been collected and analyzed, and a wide sweep of original and secondary sources has been exhausted. One can well disagree with the author's conclusions and still be rewarded from a reading of the book. One must also admire the industry and perseverance which made this first full length study of the tidelands oil controversy available. The author's opinions and conclusions present a point of view on a highly controversial issue, and one which may well be confirmed.

BEYER, WILLIAM C. Limited-Term and Excepted Appointments in the Civil Service. Pp. iv, 186. Philadelphia: Published by the Author, 1953. $3.00.

The subtitle of this volume is "A Study of the Legal Provisions by Which They Are Regulated in Fifty-nine Jurisdictions in the United States." It is the product of assiduous scholarship and will undoubtedly prove to be a useful handbook for state and local merit systems the country over.

Provisional, temporary, seasonal, emergency, and excepted appointments—all exceptions to competitive examination for entrance—are covered in as many sections. Each part contains an introductory chapter, defining terms and significance; where appropriate there is a chapter on conditions attaching to the type of appointment; and there are one or two chapters on controls and on status of the appointee. In addition, recommendations are made for the type of statute needed to cover each category of appointment. Nine descriptive charts illuminate the text with convenient summaries of existing laws and practices.

In addition to the federal government the situation in 20 states, 30 cities, 6 counties, and 2 special districts is included. The value of this compendium and of its well-considered, concrete legal proposals is stressed for state and local jurisdictions, because there are some notable omissions so far as the federal civil service is concerned. The timing of Mr. Beyer's study was such that it did not embrace developments in the United States government more recent than 1950. This is unfortunate, but it is understandable that in such an encyclopedic analysis a cut-off point must be made somewhere.

Less clear is an omission in the last section on "Excepted Appointments." Here there is no reference to the procedure in the federal service for excepting "policy-making and confidential" positions, now known as "Schedule C jobs" but covering a category that has existed in "Schedule A" for many years. Although not typical of the usual merit system plan under which political posts are excepted entirely by statute, this time-honored procedure in the largest civil service of them all is deserving of some analysis in a book carrying the title that this one does.

TAYLOR, ELEANOR K. Public Accountability of Foundations and Charitable Trusts. Pp. 231. New York: Russell Sage Foundation, 1953. $3.00.

Russell Sage Foundation has made a timely move in publishing the first analysis of provisions for public accounting by foundations and charitable trusts. In the present Congress, as in the previous one, a Select Committee of the House has embarked upon an investigation of foundations. Moreover, two bills requiring a more detailed accounting by foundations and trusts to the Internal Revenue Service, most of which would be made available to the public, are before the Ways and Means Committee. Therefore, federal and state officials, foundation officers and trustees, and lawyers, for whom the publication is especially designed, as well as others concerned with the social usefulness of endowments, will welcome this volume. Between two covers are not only the facts concerning present state and federal provision for the supervision of foundations and trusts but also a thoughtful presentation of the possibilities inherent in the regulation of foundations by their own trustees and a specific proposal regarding the most satisfactory form of governmental regulation.

Professor Taylor considers separately provisions in the states for the supervision of trusts, both testamentary and inter vivos, and those for the regulation of charitable corporations. Discussion centers upon an analysis of the regulatory machinery in the twelve states, where the majority of foundations and trusts are domiciled and where officials have been most concerned with the question of supervision.

To readers unfamiliar with provisions for state supervision of trusts, the revelation of the paucity of regulation will be shocking. Only two states, New Hampshire and Rhode Island, maintain registries of trusts. Elsewhere, the establishment of inter vivos trusts, not subject to public notice with the probating of a will, can entirely escape public attention. Availability of information concerning the existence of corporate foundations was found to be greater, although only a few states, Massachusetts being outstanding, required any type of report.

While the author covers the federal government's attempt to regulate certain abuses of the privilege of tax-exemption through amendment of the Internal Revenue Code in 1950, she concludes that, "basic supervision over charitable trusts and foundations is a State function." The development of regulatory machinery at the federal level would be "a fantastic break with American tradition."

Instead she proposes that there be established in the office of the attorney general of each state a registry of all charitable endowments, whether testamentary trusts, inter vivos trusts, or foundations incorporated under the not-for-profit corporation laws of the state. Such records, she believes, would at least provide a sound basis for establishing other provisions for accountability.

More skillful organization and presentation of the material collected by Professor Taylor would have increased the usefulness of this important book. Nevertheless, it must be hailed as a valuable edition to publications dealing with philanthropic endowments.

ECONOMICS AND INDUSTRY

KUZNETS, SIMON, assisted by ELIZABETH JENKS. Shares of Upper Income Groups in Income and Savings. Pp. xli, 725. New York: National Bureau of Economic Research, 1953. $9.00.

In this volume Professor Kuznets has produced a model of empirical research involving a large mass of statistical material. The many sources of information on the income distribution have been thoroughly sifted, the data carefully refined into meaningful quantitative concepts, and the results analyzed with insight and due regard to their limitations. Moreover, the detailed results are presented as an aid to future research, and the aims of such research are indicated.

The limitation of the study to the upper income groups was dictated by the available source material; but as the income and savings of these groups are related to total income and total savings, this does not detract from its substance and interest. Within the scope indicated, the author examines the level of the upper income shares and the changes in them over the past three decades, the income and social characteristics of the upper income groups, and the changing shares of the upper income groups in savings.

The most striking conclusion of the study, perhaps, is the significant decrease in the shares of the upper income groups that has occurred in the postwar years. During the two interwar decades, the average shares of the top 1 per cent and 5 per cent of the population in total income were 13 per cent and 25 per cent. In 1947 and 1948, however, the top 1 per cent received 8.5 per cent of income and the top 5 per cent, 18 per cent. For disposable income, that is income after taxes, the relative decline was even more substantial. It would seem that this change is not due to transitory factors since the range of variation in the upper income group shares that occurred during the violent cyclical swings of the interwar decades was considerably less. The reduction in unemployment, the lower level of interest rates, and steeper income and estate taxes were all probably crucial factors in this change.

With respect to the shares of the upper income groups in savings, Professor Kuznets gives attention mainly to changes during the business cycle. He finds that the savings-income ratios for the upper groups fluctuated much less than those for the lower groups. As the income shares of the upper groups were mildly counter-cyclical, their savings were a fairly stable proportion of total income. Thus, the violent swings in the over-all savings-income ratio must be due to wide variations in the savings-income ratios of the lower income groups. He concludes that, in so far as the savings of the two groups flow to different types of investment, the differences in their behavior must be given serious consideration in studying the nature and causes of cyclical fluctuations.

HELLER, WALTER W., FRANCIS M. BODDY, and CARL L. NELSON (Eds.). Savings in the Modern Economy. Pp. xix, 370. Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press, 1953. $5.00.

This book is made up of the papers presented at a Conference on Savings, Inflation, and Economic Progress and a summary of the discussion. The meetings were held in 1952 at the University of Minnesota, arranged by the School of Business Administration of that University, and sponsored by a number of business firms. The participants included academic, government, and business economists.

The papers covered a very wide range in subject matter, interest, and importance. There were papers on the savings concept itself and its measurement; on the savings behavior of corporations and individuals; on the need for less (or more) saving; and on the savings problems in the underdeveloped economies. Some of the papers seem to have been written to persuade noneconomists; others were at the highest level of technical competence and made significant contributions.

In the space allotted to this review, one cannot do more than pick out a few of the outstanding papers for comment. In this list, I should certainly include the ones prepared by Irwin Friend (The Concept and Measurement of Savings), by Raymond W. Goldsmith (Trends and Structural Changes in Savings in the Twentieth Century), and by John Lintner (The Determinants of Corporate Savings). The first presents an authoritative account of the measurement of personal saving. The problems and uncertainties involved are clearly indicated; incidentally, the comments of Daniel H. Brill deserve careful attention.

Goldsmith's paper summarizes his important findings on trends in savings over the last 50 years. Measures of the volume of saving, of the amounts saved by individuals, corporations, and government, of the forms of saving, and of the savings-income ratio over the period are provided. Inevitably, a summary of this sort raises at least as many questions as it answers, but it certainly increases one's appetite for the complete study.

Lintner's study of Corporate Saving seems to me to be a most significant contribution. He properly emphasizes the importance of the saving of this sector. After describing the relatively few earlier studies of this form of saving, he examines various hypotheses bearing on the relations between the national income and corporate profits, and between corporate profits and dividends. In particular, he questions the "ratchet" approach to the determinants of profits.

The book presents other interesting materials; in this connection, I should make special note of the papers bearing on Canadian and British experience. The whole volume will be of real interest to economists, and to other social scientists who are interested in one of the most important phenomena of the economy. None of the papers requires a specialist knowledge for its understanding.

COCHRAN, THOMAS C. Railroad Leaders, 1845-1890: The Business Mind in Action. Pp. xii, 564. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1953. $7.50.

It is only recently that business leaders have had their spokesmen among historians. Businessmen, being men of action, have not been especially articulate in their own defense. Indeed, the agrarian crusaders, the "Muckrakers," the antimonopolists, the spokesmen for labor, and the economic determinists have all taken a hand in portraying the businessman chiefly as a greedy villain. Yet this could hardly be a balanced picture, for it is obvious that the American businessman has been largely responsible for the nation's tremendous economic progress. A group of historians of business appeared in the last generation and undertook to examine business records and to report on their findings. It was high time this was done. Yet Dr. Cochran is no apologist for the business leaders. He is primarily interested in discovering their attitudes, their ethics, and their motives.

Railroads were the country's first really big business. This book is based on 100,000 letters by 61 railroad presidents, written between 1845 and 1890, a period when railroads were expanding rapidly and were first being subjected to government regulation. Out of the 61 presidents however, about 15 receive most of the author's attention. They include such names as Henry Villard, James F. Joy, John Murray Forbes, Stuyvesant Fish, and William Henry Osborn. Conspicuous for their absence are Jay Gould, Cornelius Vanderbilt, and Charles Francis Adams, Jr.

The task that Dr. Cochran set for himself was an extremely difficult one. It was to show the composite attitudes of these railroad presidents towards such problems as ownership and control, improvements in managerial organization, ways of commanding capital, the strategy of railroad expansion, the desirability of innovations, treatment of customers, rules of competition, methods of dealing with labor, influencing public opinion, and submitting to government regulation. He does not attempt to show how each of the 61 felt towards each of these problems. Instead he generalizes as much as possible on each problem and then gives illustrations from the writings of several presidents.

Although the men differed in their attitudes, there were more similarities than differences, for they all had the same problems to face and a common conception of the "social role" they were to play. The social role, says Dr. Cochran, quoting Dr. Leland Jenks, is "an understanding shared more or less fully by the members of a group as to what a given position entails for any individuals who occupy it." For example, a clergyman will not behave like a circus barker, nor will a railroad president hold the same values as a college professor (pp. 13, 223). Railroad presidents might differ on the question of slavery, but on railroad problems they tended to see alike. Each "considered himself an agent of civilization," one of whose chief responsibilities was to build up the country. They disliked rebating but accepted it as a necessary evil to achieve their goal and to stay in business. They shared a hostility to organized labor, a distrust of politicians, a belief that the public misunderstood them and so should be told as little as possible, and a belief that "pooling" was desirable although it needed to be regulated. Maximizing profits appears less important than is generally supposed.

The book is well organized. The assumptions are clearly stated at the outset; a discussion of railroads in the east and in the west gives a general picture; and then the major topics are covered, chapter by chapter. The book is extensively footnoted—50 pages of fine print at the back. Also there are some 275 pages of selections from the letters of the 61 presidents. The index is full and helpful. Although a book of this kind must of necessity be somewhat disjointed, Dr. Cochran has done everything possible to make it cohesive. Historians critical of nineteenth-century businessmen should read this book and qualify their sweeping condemnations.

MALENBAUM, WILFRED. The World Wheat Economy, 1885-1939. Pp. xv, 262. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1953. $6.00.

The reader is given a very clear picture of the maladjustments to be encountered in the up and down trends of the world wheat industry during a 55-year period, taking into consideration the acreage, yield, production, carryover, consumption per capita, supply, and demand in the older and the new countries. The factors that contributed to expansion on new lands and contraction on old ones, as well as those of weather, technological progress, geographical shifts, standard of living, and industrialization, are taken into consideration in attempting to arrive at a solution of the present wheat problem.

The trend in production has been up, and the consumption per capita and the price per bushel have been down, during the 55-year period. The world wheat carryover August 1, 1939 had reached the record total of 1,150 million bushels, with the world wheat price one of the lowest on record. The world yield per acre, based on five-year averages, shows an upward trend and is rather encouraging in that it is not downward as one might expect from the gloomy soil depletion and erosion stories of the 1930's. The author concludes that, for the future, man can increase still more the general level of wheat yields per acre. The question is rather whether man is prepared to pay the costs of the more intensive practices necessary to obtain higher yields.

The relation of the standard of living to the consumption of wheat per capita varies in the different areas. Higher living standards were accompanied by a definite shift to wheat bread on the part of bread consumers in Europe, whereas in exporting countries like Australia, Canada, and the United States, the consumption declined. The explanation is that in the latter countries bread does not form the basis of the diet. Total human consumption in this country was lower in the last five years than in the five prewar years, despite a population increase of 10 per cent.

Following World War I, France, Italy, and Germany placed effective tariff rates on imported wheat, to protect their own wheat growers from the low-cost foreign wheat coming in. The tariffs were effective and increased domestic production. United States grain exports in recent years have been concentrated in those areas to which our government has been giving financial assistance. In 1950, 250 million of total exports of 365 million bushels were financed in whole or in part. In the crop years 1949 and 1950, an average of about 170 million bushels of wheat imported into Europe were financed by the Economic Cooperation Administration; this was almost one-third of all wheat imports. If the foreign agricultural producers objected to the U. S. pouring a flood of goods into their country following World War I, at prices below their cost of production, and set up barriers to keep them out as cited by the author, how must they feel at this time when we unload our surplus goods on them as gifts or by financial assistance?

Solutions by international agreements have not contributed importantly either to increasing or stabilizing the world price of wheat or to expanding the international trade in wheat. The quota agreement of acreage reduction was not lived up to by the leading exporting nations.

The author concludes that the general movement of wheat prices, both absolutely and relative to other commodities, has been a declining one from 1885 until the outbreak of the recent war, and that the pattern of world output does not reflect the pattern of prices, although the supply actually produced did have an influence on world prices. It would seem that the author has the answers to the above in his early discussions on expansion into new lands, mechanization, and tillage improvement methods in dry-land areas.

Although the author may have given a rather gloomy outlook for the wheat grower, the book is of value because it summarizes widely scattered information and opinion on a very serious present-day subject.

GILMAN, GLENN W., and JAMES W. SWEENEY. Atlantic Steel Company and United Steelworkers of America. Case Study No. 12 in series "Causes of Industrial Peace Under Collective Bargaining." Pp. xiii, 101. Washington, D. C.: National Planning Association, 1953. $1.00.

This is one of the best of this excellent series, and a distinct credit to the co-directors of the project, Joseph N. Scanlon and Charles R. Walker, and to the authors, Glenn W. Gilman and James W. Sweeney, of the School of Industrial Management of Georgia Institute of Technology. Oscar Ameringer used to say that a successful organizing campaign in the South would have to be conducted by leaders with a religious message, and the reader feels the deep ethical guideposts of conduct in this story of the deep South. Relationships resolve themselves into questions of what is right and what is wrong in each particular case. Against this backdrop of ethical standards which dominates the scene, the union and the management successfully carry on an intricate pattern of industrial relations of undoubted benefit to both.

The authors place the emphasis where it rightfully belongs. The culture of the Piedmont area is not unique, but it is certainly strongly differentiated from the pattern of some other regions, particularly the industrialized North, which is a partial amalgam of cultures of many origins, with some fairly recent additions. The Piedmont culture is, from one viewpoint, simple, and the course of action resulting from it is direct and unmixed with dissenting viewpoints. There seems to be no division of opinion about the desirability of collective bargaining among management; there are no fractional groups in the union. Even union elections are free from competing slates of candidates representing basic cleavages in the group. Political, racial, (the Negro has an assured place in the union), and policy issues do not divide either union or management.

There is a great deal to be learned from this relatively simple cultural pattern. Because of the powerful ethical standards that guide relations, some important principles stand forth in clear view. For example the industrial relations manager keeps no statistical records, because to have a man numbered and classified would be an insult to his personality. The union contract, another example, is simply a working document, not a legalistic charter of strict formulation. Much more important is what the union and management agree upon. Or, consider the informality of collective bargaining procedures for another example; no formal records are required or kept, no precedents are established, either party may informally initiate proceedings, and bargaining on the contract and on grievances shade into one another.

Because it is a simple, informal system, based upon an essentially complicated but stable social structure, it deserves careful study by students, teachers, and practitioners of collective bargaining. Comparisons with labor relations in other plants will point up many desirable attitudes and practices that are in effect in the Atlantic Steel Company. FREDERICK L. RYAN

LORWIN, LEWIS L. The International Labor Movement: History, Policies, Outlook. Pp. xviii, 366. New York: Harper & Brothers, 1953. $5.00.

Dr. Lorwin's earlier book, Labor and Internationalism, dealt with the history and the importance of the international labor movement up to 1929. At the time of publication that was the only systematic study of its kind, and the book became a classic. The present volume includes an abbreviated version of this earlier book and then brings the story up to date. It thus has additional chapters on the great depression and the rise of Hitlerism, the Second World War, the labor movement of the postwar era, World Federation Trade Unions, and International Confederation of Free Trade Unions. It ends its presentation as close to publication date as modern publication techniques permit.

The emphasis throughout the volume is on the presentation of the facts themselves; the author keeps himself as far as possible in the background. This has tremendous advantages in terms of objectivity; however, this reader at least regretted on several occasions the absence of critical comments on the part of the author, the more so as a close and astute observer such as Dr. Lorwin can speak with particular authority of some of the events discussed in this book. Thus, the story of the I.F.T.U. anti-depression program (pp. 167-168) or the meager record of the contribution to the Matteotti fund (p. 169) seems to me to require some comments so that the uninformed reader not be given the "official" version alone. This applies also to the alleged total refusal of German labor leaders to come to terms with Hitler (p. 173) or the story of De Brouckère's negotiations with the Comintern which ended with a complete reversal of Socialist policy (p. 185). In the same vein, it would have been desirable if the strength of the Morgenthau ideas in the W.F.T.U., or the British-United States rivalries in the leadership of the I.C.F.T.U. had been pointed out to the reader.

It is perhaps more important, however, to point out the author's particular approach. A Continental European would probably have put far greater emphasis than Dr. Lorwin on the ideological developments to the neglect of facts and policies. The author's sound realism in this respect seems to me to make his book particularly valuable. On the other hand, compared with John Price's International Labour Movement, Lorwin's volume deals less with structure and organization, but more with the uses to which they have been put.

At a time when the struggle for the soul of the industrial worker of the world is in full swing and its outcome one of the main issues of the battle between East and West, this book will prove invaluable to scholars, statesmen, and journalists alike.

MORSE, NANCY C. Satisfactions in the White-collar Job. Pp. x, 235. Ann Arbor: Survey Research Center, Institute for Social Research, University of Michigan, 1953. $3.50.

The "Human Relations Program" within Michigan's Survey Research Center has been carrying out a series of studies on organizational effectiveness. These studies have chiefly revolved around questions of employee satisfactions, morale, character of supervision, and productivity. Miss Morse's book is a major contribution to this continuing research program.

The central concerns of this study revolve around the characteristics in the work situation that lead or do not lead to work satisfactions. A large number of specific variables are examined within the general categories of financial returns, job prestige, intrinsic job satisfactions, involvement in the company, pride in the work group, and character of supervision. Other variables relate to such "objective" characteristics of the respondents as age, sex, education, and length of service, and such "subjective" characteristics as need and aspiration levels. The whole is cast within an explicit theoretical framework that attempts to specify the general relationship between motivation and environmentally-derived satisfactions.

A part of the use made of the theoretical scheme is an explanation of the circumstance that this study, like others in the series and outside it, finds no necessary relationship between morale and productivity. If work satisfactions and productivity are both tests of organizational effectiveness, much further research and constructive theorizing will be required to determine the conditions for their joint accomplishment. These conditions are likely to involve the character of training and selection as well as organizational variables as such.

Although neither space nor my competence allows a detailed discussion of the issues, I am not altogether happy about the conceptual distinction between "satisfactions" and "motivation," nor the uses to which the distinction is put in formal theoretical statement and interpretation of data. Levels of satisfaction are obviously a function of aspirations as well as fulfillments. The use of other language ("tension-reduction" and "potential energy expenditure") is not necessarily helpful in finding objective indicators of aspirations or expectations, which, among other things such as cognitive perceptions, would be necessary to predict how individuals will respond to the same environmental circumstances. In short, I wonder if the rather formal theoretical sections say much beyond the following: the degree of satisfaction workers will report about their work situations will depend on what they think they are getting out of it but also on what they want to get out of it; whether a worker will be productive or not depends on whether it serves his balanced interests to be so.

This study is a technical research report with few concessions to the general reader. The exposition is consistently clear and coherent, however, and the summaries largely nontechnical.

TORFF, SELWYN H. Collective Bargaining: Negotiations and Agreements. Pp. ix, 323. New York: McGraw-Hill Book Company, 1953. $5.50.

The author, a university lecturer in industrial management, attributes an extensive background of experience and other assistance on the book to the Chicago consulting firm in which he is an associate.

The book contains little documentation or case material except a number of useful citations to National Labor Relations Board and court cases in connection with points discussed in the text. It will serve as an up-to-date briefing for practitioners in industrial relations; and, because it helps to see perspectives in the larger picture, it will also find use in various training programs.

The nineteen chapters are grouped into four major parts. In Part Two ("non-economic" issues), Chapter 7 on no-strike clauses and Chapter 9 on management rights seem particularly useful. "To the employer in a unionized plant," says Mr. Torff, "the no-strike clause is probably the most significant provision of the collective bargaining agreement to which it is a party. . . . Virtually every [such] agreement is a series of concessions from the employer to the union and the employees. The only real concession running from the union and the employees to the employer . . . is the pledge . . . to refrain from strikes, slow-downs . . . during the life of the agreement." A number of (unidentified) specimen no-strike clauses are discussed, as well as sanctions available through legal and other channels. The matter on disciplinary actions for infractions of such agreements contains some sound and important generalizations, including the assertion that union stewards and officials "are charged with a higher degree of responsibility than rank-and-file union members" for preventing violation of this part of their contract.

A short chapter suffices for management rights clauses, which are held not analogous to the no-strike agreement since management retains the residue of rights not bargained away explicitly in its agreement with the union. (More might well be said on past practice in the plant, as additional evidence of management concessions to workers.) The usefulness of a management rights clause as a reminder to union members is briefly set forth, together with a warning against language suggesting that management has only the rights explicitly enumerated in the clause.

Part Three, on "economic" issues, is naturally much concerned with numerous aspects of wages. A very brief treatment is included of that hardy perennial source of disputes, alleged misclassification of specified employees; and somewhat more is given on bargained-out job descriptions and evaluations. Unions will find some support here for severance pay and guaranteed wages and employment.

Part Four, on administration of agreements, deals first with grievance procedure, then, in the concluding chapter, with arbitration. The legal aspects and history are rehearsed at some length; and it is explained that voluntary settlements are usually preferable to litigation—also why the union is almost always the complainant in grievance procedure, including arbitration. Agencies assisting in selection of arbitrators are mentioned; but the National Academy of Arbitrators and publishers of arbitration decisions may feel aggrieved by omission of reference to them.

CLOW, ARCHIBALD, and NAN L. CLOW. The Chemical Revolution. Pp. xiv, 680. New York: British Book Centre (and The Batchworth Press, London), 1953. $10.00.

This book, in manuscript, earned the Senior Hume-Brown Prize from the University of Edinburgh. The purpose of its authors has been "to create something new out of hitherto unexplored ground common to economic history and chemical technology." The 25 chapters include such important developments as the Economy of Common Salt, Soap, Vitriol, Calico Printing, Glass, Pottery, and the Fermentation Industries. There are 110 illustrations, 16 diagrams, a Glossary of Dead Chemical Language, a Chemical Chronology from 1610 to 1856, the period covered in the book, 28 pages of bibliography, and a full index.

The authors have not only examined a huge volume of source material but have digested it with understanding. The reviewer, a chemist (in the American sense), can find no fault in the treatment of the technology. Social consequences, such as shifts in population, occupation, and domestic life, are constantly pointed out, but without any evidence of purpose to bend them to the support of a particular social theory.

For example, we read of the effects of deforestation resulting from the dependence upon wood of "eotechnic" industries, including the production of iron, salt, soda, saltpeter, gunpowder, soap, sugar, pottery, lime, and many others; and of the effects of the large scale production of soap after Chevreul, early in the nineteenth century, had elucidated the nature of composition of fats and the chemistry of their saponification.

The final chapter, on "Social Personnel," gives an account of the men and societies mainly responsible for the advances in chemistry which laid a large part of the foundation for the Industrial Revolution.

The authors of this book have brilliantly succeeded in the task they set for themselves.

DEGRANGE, McQUILKIN. The Nature and Elements of Sociology. Pp. viii, 668. New Haven: Yale University Press, 1953. $8.50.

It is extremely difficult to review Professor DeGrange's book. I am charmed with it in one sense. He is obviously one of the few social scientists alive who is truly well versed in the works of Comte, Sumner, Spencer, and Ward. It is a pleasure to read what he has to say of them and to reflect that though the times may have passed them by there is much to be learned from a rereading of them. This is particularly true of Comte of course. Professor DeGrange knows Comte's work in the greatest detail and takes us back through it seeking out "the nature and elements of sociology" as these were conceived by the coiner of the term.

The volume is accurately named. It has to do with "the nature and elements of sociology." Professor DeGrange wants to know what sociology should be like. He seeks an ontologically correct answer to this question. Empirical theories and the like are incidental or are means to this end, but his primary concern is not with them. As such the work is not scientifically but is, rather, philosophically oriented. I am an unfortunate reviewer for this work because such efforts appeal to me only when the author is clearly aware of the distinction between such work and scientific work. But my objection runs deeper than an aesthetic concern. I know of no scientific problem that has been solved, or even had its solution aided, by first deciding whether it fell within the field of sociology or anthropology or psychology or economics or whatever. When these field distinctions become masters of the analysis rather than aides in it, we are done in. Furthermore, there is something to be learned from the history of the natural sciences in these respects. They certainly cannot and do not account for their present advances by having first cut the cake in an ontologically correct fashion. In view of the history of recent scientific development the author strikes an ironically grim note when he states, ". . . there is no connection between sociology and psychology. They are two distinct sciences dealing each with an isolate of its own as definitely and as clearly as do physics and chemistry" (p. 228).

As an excursion into thought provocation from masters out of the past this volume is superb, but positively speaking it has little to offer modern developments in the science. For the author there have been two great social theorists, Comte and Sumner, with Spencer getting off the track between their times. Pareto and Durkheim are referred to but only as verification of some point from the masters. Little time is spent with analysis of social phenomena. The book places sociology. For example, one of the reasons that sociology precedes psychology in the scientific hierarchy plumped for is that ". . . the advent of sociology as a science antedates the rise of psychology" (p. 286). The book goes at length into a distinction between "humanoids" and "men." The evidence for this distinction is not clear to me, but the argument in connection with it is consistent with Comte's view of a three stage development of social systems.

The culmination of the volume is movement toward and hope for an ethic derived from science. This is done quite differently than the pragmatists would do it and with many caveats along the way about the methodological limits of science in these respects, but it is done. Comte founded a church that seemed ridiculous to many who admired his work in other respects. Professor DeGrange at the end of his work has gone as far as we are likely to see in redeeming this last hazy phase of one of the great figures in intellectual history.

CURTI, MERLE (Ed.). American Scholarship in the Twentieth Century. Pp. ix, 252. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1953. $4.50.

This book is a pleasant surprise. Many readers will approach it, as did this reviewer, with a certain wariness. How can six collaborators, given roughly thirty-five pages each, cover the rich diversity of American scholarship without superficiality? Professor Curti and his co-authors provide an instructive answer.

This is one of the Library of Congress series on American Civilization. According to the original plan, science was to be the subject of a separate book and was omitted from the present volume. One may regret this, as one may regret the omission of a variety of minor scholarly fields, but, even with these omissions, the task is of well nigh unmanageable proportions.

Professor Curti's opening essay, though not the most well-knit piece in the book, must have been by all odds the most difficult to prepare. Covering such disparate matters as changing emphases in scholarly pursuits, the development of scholarly organizations, sources of financial support, and freedom of inquiry, the author provides an extraordinarily useful review of the intellectual and social context in which American scholars have worked.

Perhaps the most brilliant essay in the book is Rene Wellek's piece on literary scholarship. Displaying all of the superb assurance in opinion which one has come to expect of the literary scholar, Wellek reviews the movements of the past fifty years, appraises their contributions, and suggests the path which literary scholarship must take in the years to come. One may not accept all of his judgments, but one must admire the incisiveness and erudition which characterize his thinking and writing.

Equally lucid and competent are W. Stull Holt's essay on historical scholarship and Arthur Murphy's on philosophical scholarship. Professor Murphy's essay, a brief history of the ideas with which philosophers have been preoccupied since 1900, provides excellent background for the other essays. In his treatment of the social sciences, the late Louis Wirth is handicapped by the necessity of reviewing several fields which have shown markedly different courses of development. His summary of the achievements of the social sciences is a bit uncritical. Walter Agard, on classical scholarship, is predictably concerned with the defense of this embattled field, but his approach is constructive.

A book so brief on a topic so large can easily be criticized for its shortcomings. The principal shortcoming is that to a considerable degree each contributor deals with his special field as though it were self-contained. Yet the effect is remarkably coherent, and the reader comes away with a variety of suggestive generalizations about American scholarship since 1900. Professor Curti and his coauthors undertook an extraordinarily difficult task and have carried it through with distinction.

MEAD, MARGARET, and RHODA MÉTRAUX (Eds.). The Study of Culture at a Distance. Pp. x, 480. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1953. $5.00.

The editors of this volume are also important contributors to it. They define it as a manual on the study of national character, particularly in cases where direct field work is not possible. This is not a situation they advocate as desirable. Many of the formulations and much of the material derive from the Columbia University Research in Contemporary Cultures initiated by Ruth Benedict. The cultures from which most illustrations come are Russian, French, Polish, Chinese, German, and East European Jewish.

Parts I and II deal primarily with theory. They contain an excellent and modest statement by Geoffrey Gorer. Part III discusses group research considered essential to the task. Part IV, on informants, makes a useful distinction between the informant and the interview technique. Parts V and VI deal with the analysis of themes and imagery in films as well as in oral and written literature. Part VII is a lukewarm appraisal of projective techniques. In Part VIII Rhoda Métraux opens new and interesting fields in her article "Resonance in Imagery." Parts IX and X are titled, respectively, "End Linkage: an Analytic Approach," and "Application of Studies of Culture at a Distance." The total effect of this collection is somewhat incoherent, but it contains charming, penetrating, and provocative vignettes like the interview on friendship in France, the passages on Russian sensory images, and Leites' analysis of Camus' L'Étranger. Much of the material is published for the first time. Some is in the form of abridged versions of articles that have appeared elsewhere. Some is written as mortar for the volume. I am not sure that this all adds up to a manual, but it is nonetheless good reading.

The study of national character has not gained general acceptance among social scientists for various reasons. Perhaps the most commonly expressed objection is that "it is not scientific." The editors and some of the contributors would appear to agree, since there is frequent reference to the aesthetic, intuitive, and perceptual gifts needed for such analysis. Whether in fact such capacities are any more irrelevant to science than "intelligence" is certainly open to debate. There is certainly no attempt to dodge objectivity and rigor although they are not always easily achieved at this stage of the inquiry. Unfortunately, I seem to detect also a certain esoteric note in the volume. This may be no more than defensiveness against ill-informed and destructive criticism. A fair-minded reading of this volume will not necessarily convince opponents of the validity of national character studies, but it should allay the caricature of such research so frequently indulged in by its enemies. Whatever the ultimate appraisal of this type of inquiry may be, its proponents will have contributed importantly to sensitivities and techniques in cross-cultural studies.

Gemeinschaft und Politik. Jhg. 1, Nr. 1, Oktober 1953. Pp. 48. Bad Godesberg am Rhein: Institut für Geozologie und Politik, 1953. Published quarterly. 2.—DM per copy, or 6.—DM annually.

The new and energetic intellectual life of West Germany has been marked by a boom in publishing and by the emergence of a series of scholarly journals. The most recent of these quarterly publications, Gemeinschaft und Politik, is edited by Dr. Rolf Hinder, of the Institute for Geosociology and Politics, Bad Godesberg. The editor and his colleagues are convinced that there is a necessity for an interdisciplinary approach to the problems of contemporary society and government. The specialized approach of current science has led man to live his life in details without understanding the deeper relationships between the seemingly different strands of his communal pursuits.

"Gemeinschaft und Politik," says the editor in his lead article, "is intended as a program for the social sciences. It hopes to show the coresponsibility of science as against public life. The colorless position of the positivists must yield to the genuineness of those who are earnestly concerned with the meaning of society. A realistic approach can be achieved only by drawing a power of conviction from spiritual work. . . ."

The articles in the initial issue are mostly of local or national German interest. Johannes Arndt, director of the geographical-geological section of the Museum of Wolfsburg, contributes an article on the problems of modern city planning. Professor Walter Taeuber, of the University of Würzburg, writing on the cultural tasks of the domestic economy, denounces "false leaders" (Falsche Fuehrer) and calls for a new élite of scientists who understand the nature of leadership. Dr. Werner Lindner writes about forms of cemeteries and monuments as social and cultural-political expressions. Günther Pacyna contributes an article on agricultural politics versus land politics.

The articles are written with that painstaking, conscientious, almost colorless technique which has come to be associated with German scholarship. While the papers in general show some regard for an interdisciplinary approach, they are so specialized and so oriented to the German scene that they may not be of intense interest to scholars outside Germany. Nevertheless, the new publication will be welcomed to the community of world scholarship and its editor encouraged to continue his praiseworthy attempt to help secure a synthesis of the social sciences.

KINSEY, ALFRED C., WARDELL B. POMEROY, CLYDE E. MARTIN, PAUL H. GEBHARD, et al. Sexual Behavior in the Human Female. Pp. xxx, 842. Philadelphia: W. B. Saunders Company, 1953. $8.00.

This is, as the reviewer sees it, one of the most significant books of our time despite certain serious shortcomings.

The principal limitations may be briefly set forth as follows. (1) The nature of the sample. Although the cases are sufficient in number, they consist of volunteers and do not constitute a representative, random sample. Groups underrepresented include those over 50, Catholics, devout Jews, rural residents, inhabitants of the Southeast, Northwest, and Rocky Mountain areas, those previously married and now widowed, separated, or divorced, and those with less than a college education. Because probability sampling was not used, it is difficult to know to whom the generalizations apply. (2) The lack of an explicit hypothesis to be tested. The data constitute an inventory of sexual outlets; but the bearing of the data on, say, marital happiness or individual adjustment, must be surmised. (3) Method. Personal interviews were utilized, which yield mainly data based on recall and not data based on records of behavior, although a little material of the latter kind was included for purposes of corroboration. Recall introduces error of memory, if not deception. (4) Moralizing. The book, while primarily a scientific study, mixes propaganda with fact-finding, for Kinsey is exercised about our Puritan sex tradition. Kinsey is not content to let the facts speak for themselves, although in this regard he offends less in this volume than he did in his earlier book on the male.

Yet the book remains a powerful book, one of the most important books of our time, mainly because it deals with a highly significant topic in a monumental way. It is not great like Freud's work because of its ideas, and yet it is not just another book on sex. Consider the effort that went into the making of this book. Fifteen years of labor, about 8,000 interviews averaging one and one-half to two hours (equivalent to 1,500 eight-hour days), plus the hundreds and hundreds of hours required in correspondence and in the communities in setting up the interviews and in becoming acquainted with the subjects and their social situations. Since each subject was asked between 300 and 500 questions, all together more than 3,000,000 answers were recorded. In addition, records were scanned including sexual calendars, diaries, correspondence, scrapbooks, 16,000 works of art, clinical studies, and many thousands of previously published studies. Hundreds of consultants gave advice on the project, and the results in the book are presented in 179 tables and 155 figures. We have never had on this significant subject of sex anything like this herculean labor. No wonder it is a landmark and must be reckoned with. While the Kinsey study was possible because of the social changes regarding sex attitudes and behavior in the first half of the twentieth century, the Kinsey report itself becomes a powerful influence for the full and free discussion of sex behavior.

KONVITZ, MILTON R. Civil Rights in Immigration. Pp. xii, 216. Ithaca, N. Y.: Cornell University Press, 1953. $3.50.

The author undertakes a critical evaluation of American immigration and naturalization policy, points out what he considers to be the principal inequities in present procedures, and frankly presents his own views. Altogether, the book is an argument for more liberal treatment of the alien. The subject is discussed under three headings: first, admission and exclusion policies; second, deportation policies; and third, naturalization. Under each of these topics the author first gives a brief review of the historical background of the present policies and procedures, then points out hardships or inequities that may arise, and ends by giving his own recommendations.

As the author states, his manuscript was largely completed before the publication of the report of the President's Commission on Immigration and Naturalization, but has been amended to include footnote references to that report. It also includes material as recent as President Eisenhower's message to Congress of February 2, 1953.

In most respects the author's position parallels that of the Commission; but several points of difference in recommendations are noted (p. ix).

The evaluation of immigration policy is made from what can perhaps best be characterized as a humanitarian point of view, with only incidental reference to labor market, economic, and demographic implications. Without space to summarize the author's treatment of the subject, it can be noted that he especially condemns the nearly absolute administrative authority in matters of exclusion and deportation, with only limited opportunity for judicial review of administrative decisions; and he further condemns what he considers to be unjust and impolitic discriminations between racial and other classes of immigrants, between alien and citizen, between native-born and naturalized citizen.

There is a bold facing of the problem that faces any man of good will: given that the subversive and disloyal must be excluded or deported, how can procedures be devised that will not do violence to fundamental human rights or endanger the innocent?

If the author errs, it is perhaps in trying too zealously to make his case against the immigration laws and in presenting a more unfavorable than representative picture of their operation. And it is perhaps assigning too large a role in international affairs to immigration legislation to imply that the abrogation of the Gentleman's Agreement with Japan set us on the path that led to Pearl Harbor (pp. 6-7). To cite an example that really proves nothing, relations with China have not been perceptibly improved by the repeal of the Chinese Exclusion Acts ten years ago.

UNITED NATIONS, INTERNATIONAL LABOUR OFFICE. Report of the Ad Hoc Committee on Forced Labour. Pp. vii, 621. New York: Columbia University Press, 1953. $3.75.

There have been numerous regional and national studies of forced labor, in one or another of its disguised forms, since the technical abolition of slavery in the United States and finally in Brazil. The report of the Ad Hoc Committee, working under the joint auspices of the United Nations and the International Labor Organization, is the first attempt to gather together all the facts currently bearing on forced labor in all countries of the world. It should be the most penetrating and comprehensive study of the subject ever made. In conclusiveness, however, it leaves much still to be said.

The committee had access to voluminous reports on all debates in the UN Economic and Social Council. It sent questionnaires to the governments of all countries and invited nongovernmental agencies and private individuals to submit complaints and supporting documents. The report represents a two-year study, and contains 129 pages of summaries and 492 pages of documentary papers.

By its terms of reference, the Committee was limited to the study of legally entrenched national systems, particularly those with economic, political, or ideological purposes, thus excluding forced labor in violation of domestic law, as well as penal and correctional types. This has made it, essentially, a study of the laws and regulations applied to such labor in the countries under investigation.

Of the 81 questionnaires sent to the various governments, 48 were returned after an urgent follow-up request for information. Governments which did not reply included such populous and reportedly flagrant offenders as the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, Roumania, Bulgaria, Poland, Egypt, Portugal, Mexico, and twelve of the South American Republics. On the later list appear 9 of the 23 countries in which forced labor was alleged to exist and which were exhaustively examined by the Committee.

Each of the 20 countries, or territories administered by a country, was treated separately: the complaints against it, the regulations governing labor in it, any peculiar circumstances under which it fell short of standard practice, and the Committee's conclusions.

These individualized treatments bring out the high complexity of the question of forced labor; the thin line between it and other types of labor; the difficulty of applying any simple, universal yardstick; and the impossibility of getting a true perspective of the subject without taking into account rigid wage scales, long term wage contracts, living conditions, and other pertinent data excluded by the terms of reference from consideration by the Committee. It is perhaps this fact which has softened the language of censure, even in cases where the evidence, both in the summary and in the pertinent documents, appears to be convincing. The last statement of the General Summary, however, leaves no doubt about the Committee's attitude: "The Committee feels, therefore, that these systems of forced labor in any of their forms should be abolished to ensure the respect for and the observance of human rights and fundamental freedoms."

UNITED STATES SENATE. Retirement Policies and the Railroad Retirement System: Report of the Joint Committee on Railroad Retirement Legislation. Two Volumes. Pp. xxv, 770; lxxv; vii, 173, xvii. Washington, 1953. I: $2.00; II: 45 cents.

These two volumes on retirement policies contain much valuable information and were prepared with excellent professional care under the able direction of Senator Paul H. Douglas by Robert A. Wallace, the staff director.

Part I, on "Issues in Railroad Retirement," is an extensive compendium of over 800 pages of the many complex and challenging issues faced in the inauguration, evolution, and improvement of the Railroad Retirement program. In a larger sense, Part I is a very useful and interesting case study of the financial, actuarial, social, political, economic, and administrative problems arising from the establishment of an industrial pension plan. The report brings together in one convenient place such useful information as the historical and legislative development of the program, the administration of the disability insurance provisions, and the assumptions and methodology in making actuarial estimates. The report deals extensively with the question of "co-ordinating" or "integrating" the railroad retirement system with the social security system—a problem which has vexed the two programs since their inception and engendered much controversy, and which was the reason for the establishment of the joint congressional committee making this report.

Part 2, dealing with "Economic Problems of an Aging Population," contains a summary and brief analysis of valuable statistical information on the number, income, employment, and retirement of aged people, and data on old-age and survivors insurance, old age assistance, and private pension plans. There is also a useful digest of selected recent references on problems of the aging. Both volumes have an extensive index.

The report contains no recommendations either on the railroad retirement program or social security legislation. Nevertheless, the information contained in the report will be of great value because as a fact-finding compendium it is well organized and documented and points up issues and problems.

The economic needs of the aged are going to be with us for a long time in the future. The programs providing for the aged are growing and changing. The number of aged is growing, and their needs will change as our economy changes and as various other economic and social changes in our economy occur. The Douglas reports should serve as an excellent guide to the kind of material that must be brought together from time to time if our legislators and the community as a whole are to evaluate and to make intelligent decisions on the complex economic and social questions that we face as our population ages.

MATLIN, MATTHEW (Ed.) Crime Prevention Through Treatment. Pp. vii, 241. New York: National Probation and Parole Association, 1953. $1.50 paper; $2.00 cloth.

This volume represents a collection of papers which were presented at the 1952 meeting of the National Probation and Parole Association. They primarily contain points of view, philosophy, and suggested good practices for the treatment of adult and juvenile offenders.

Judge Irving Ben Cooper, Chief Justice, Court of Special Sessions, New York City, contends that the judge nowadays really must be a good diagnostician and understand the possible alternatives for the proper treatment of the individual case. Mr. Ervis W. Lester of California makes out a very excellent case for a program of preparation for release in the adult correctional institutions. Mr. John A. Wallace of Minnesota contends that the family should also be prepared for the parolee's return home. Mr. Jean Long of the New York Parole Division presents a plan for job reference and job information which will help institutional parole officers and parolees in getting job placements. Mr. Frank J. Remington, Wisconsin Law School, tussles with the felony-misdemeanor confusion in the law and suggests that the distinction be abandoned as far as it relates to disposition of cases. Dr. William Oldigs, Chief, Milwaukee Probation Department, claims that probation service for the misdemeanant can be effective—even the drunk and disorderly cases have an 81 per cent success record on probation.

Paul W. Tappan, former professor of New York University and now Federal Parole Board member, presents the argument for easing up on civil disabilities of adult offenders since they interfere with complete rehabilitation of the offender. Dr. Kenneth Chapman, Medical Director, U. S. Public Health Service Hospital, Lexington, Kentucky, presents a very fine and hopeful view for the treatment of the drug addict. Libby E. Sachar, Judge, Juvenile Court, Union County (Elizabeth), New Jersey, laments the fact that juvenile judges have not taken over the treatment approach to juvenile delinquency. Several authorities come to grips with the practical necessity of screening juvenile court cases through intake procedures (Judge Harry W. Lindeman, Charles S. Antolina, Sherwood Norman). Mr. Charles H. Boswell, Chief Probation Officer, Juvenile Court, Indianapolis, contends that the probation department needs to keep actively after fathers in nonsupport cases who lapse in payments and should develop a business-like plan to follow up each support order in systematic fashion.

In general, the tone of the articles is good; however they rehash progressive thinking that has been current for several years.

STRAUS, ROBERT, and SELDEN D. BACON. Drinking in College. Pp. vii, 221. New Haven: Yale University Press, 1953. $4.00.

This book, a product of the Center of Alcohol Studies at Yale, is primarily a report on a survey of 15,747 college students in 27 colleges who provided usable responses to a pretested questionnaire on the drinking of alcoholic beverages and attitudes of students about such drinking. The data were collected during the period 1949-1951. The remainder of the book consists of an excellent general background of the history of drinking in America and the controversies surrounding the alcohol problem.

The analysis of the survey results centers largely around the attempt to find reasonably homogeneous subgroups in the definitely heterogeneous class, "college students." Throughout the analysis, subclassifications are made by sex, by religious affiliation, by income group of family, with frequent additional classifications relating to degrees of customary drinking and scores on a "social complications" scale. It is impossible to summarize fairly in this brief review the findings given in the 108 tables. A few points, however, may be mentioned. The authors admit that one cannot determine from the data what college attendance has to do with the results, because there are no controls taken from noncollege groups. From certain responses, however, which are believed to have forecasting significance, it appears that about 6 per cent of the male drinkers and 1 per cent of the female drinkers manifest signs of being potential problem drinkers, and this corresponds to sex differentials in the general alcoholic population. One is led to believe from this and other evidence that statistically, but not necessarily for particular individuals, it is highly doubtful that college life has an important influence on drinking habits. Less than 6 per cent of the male or female drinkers said that the college room or fraternity was the usual place of drinking, and the vast majority started to drink before entering college. Males are more prone to drink with males than females with females.

Great emphasis is placed on trying to obtain reasonably reliable estimates of influences. For example, if home practice and church preaching conflict, the church influence appears to be minor.

In general, this is an excellent study, although it is not easy to read. The main adverse criticism of this reviewer is that the questionnaire as used was not included. It is especially to be hoped that the authors' tentative findings concerning the possibility of detecting incipient problem cases and their susceptibility to treatment may be justified after further study. What place is more ideal than a college for such further study? The authors' final plea for greater emphasis on drinking as an area of research in college should be taken seriously.

TUNNARD, CHRISTOPHER. The City of Man. Pp. xxii, 424. Illustrated. New York and London: Charles Scribner's Sons, 1953. $8.50.

PARKINS, MAURICE FRANK. City Planning in Soviet Russia: With an Interpretative Bibliography. Pp. xiv, 257. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1953. $6.00.

The publisher engages in a legally permissible seller's puff in characterizing Professor Tunnard's as "the first important book to emphasize the role of art in city planning since Camillo Sitte's The Art of Building Cities was published over sixty years ago." (The belated English translation of this classic was hailed in this journal in 1946.) It is fair to say that the second half of Tunnard's imposing and beautiful volume is an illuminated, humane, richly learned, and deeply felt treatise on the relationships of architecture, landscape architecture, civic art, and city planning, in the tradition of Sitte, Unwin, Lanchester, Saarinen, Rasmussen, and others.

As a social scientist interested in urbanism, I applaud every ringing declaration that traffic surveys, population analyses, and tallies of substandard houses alone do not create the city of man which must reflect his spirit and his aspirations. Tunnard distinguishes housing projects that "tend to impose a pattern rather than establish a design." He calls for the fresh recognition of the "Grand Design": "a principle of composition married to a recognition of the power of art"—that made "the Renaissance City . . . the truest expression of the power of man to create an esthetically satisfying environment," because artists and sculptors were called upon to give the Piazza of San Marco its form.

Tunnard illustrates with rich reference to history the forgotten role of color and of moving water in civic design. He has firm views on the falsity of the "town-country" of Ebenezer Howard—of the proper separation (and appropriate spare urban use) of "Leaf and Stone."

The middle chapters of the book belong in some sort of planner's New Yorker: "profiles" of a forgotten prototype of romantic planning at Llewellyn Park, New Jersey; of Newport, Rhode Island as the embodiment of one high point in American social tradition; and other bits and pieces of planning Americana.

In the first part of the book Tunnard seems to fall in the trap that he recognizes when he says that "all the latest New York buildings, including the UN complex, were planned by architects who fancy themselves economists, sociologists, or businessmen." His attempts to trace the origins and growth of cities are disorganized and inconsecutive, with many insupportable generalizations about economic forces. Part 1 of the book is poor; Part 2 is charming but inconsequential; Parts 3 and 4 are authentic, pregnant, and significant.

Mr. Parkins' terse and concise 120-page monograph on City Planning in the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics is based upon the literature listed in an annotated bibliography of equal length, without benefit of visit to USSR. Admittedly one cannot tell how closely the dogmas and principles recited correspond to actuality. Early chapters show the impact of rule by ideology. If the "Planning Structure and Process" portrayed in Chapter VI prevail in fact, it is hard to see how any cities get built at all. The chart of "Structure of the Committee on Architectural Affairs of the USSR" includes a dotted line for "ideological leadership" from the Central Committee of the All-Union Party of USSR to the Committee on Architectural Affairs, a wavy line of "general economic directives" from the State Planning Commission, and a solid line of command from the Consul of Ministers of USSR—and these lines radiate down to each city planning bureau. The brief chapter on "Criticism and Self-Criticism" shows the same processes at work in city planning as in biology and music: the accepted style of the 1930's is now "bourgeois" and "marasmic." The Central Executive Committee of the Party has forced the removal of a high official of the Academy of Architecture for "cosmopolitanism."

The monograph presents useful data on standards, number of city plans underway, and other categories culled from the reports. These are helpful for comparison, but no more proof of fact than parallel reports from national ministries in any other country.

GINSBERG, ELI, JOHN L. HERMA, and SOL W. GINSBURG. Psychiatry and Military Manpower Policy: A Reappraisal of the Experience in World War II. Pp. xi, 66. New York: King's Crown Press, 1953. $2.00.

This small but important volume may well be considered a turning point in applied psychiatry and possibly in psychiatric theory in general. By the end of the second World War, the United States found itself confronted with the unexpected problem of manpower shortage. Personnel to man war machines, turned out at such high speed, was lacking. This was the reason for the establishment of the Conservation of Human Resources Project at Columbia University.

In Chapter II, the authors question the meaning of the figures in which the psychiatric activities are reflected, that is, rejection before induction and separation from the services. The result is that these figures mean very little. There was no uniformity of conditions; instead, local influences prevailed; and, worse, there was a complete lack of what, in the language of cybernetics, may be called feed-back information. Irrespective of the numbers he saw, no psychiatrist achieved real experience, because there was no opportunity to learn about the correctness of the prognoses that had in the beginning been made mainly on the basis of clinical personality diagnoses. It is a flaw in the central organization of psychiatric service that such a condition was allowed to exist to the end of the war.

Notwithstanding this fact, most of the psychiatrists, whose answers to a three-point questionnaire form the backbone of this book, thought they were in a position to make a theoretical adjustment and formulate practical suggestions. As to the former, there was agreement that we need more consideration of motivations, the morals, and the morale of the soldiers. However, the answers, as far as they are embodied in this book, seem to indicate a lack of deeper understanding of the problem of motivation. The respondents were guided more by such aspects of motivations as they could grasp at random, here and there. This is obvious in Chapter IV, Military and Civilian Life. The aspect of industrial motivations is too much simplified; likewise, the incentives suggested for the soldiers are too superficial. A survey of motivations in industrial life should be put on the wanted list for future research. The reviewer wants to direct the attention of the group to such a survey which appeared in the Journal of Nervous and Mental Diseases, Volume 94, Number 6, December 1941, page 679 ff.

The book contains a number of worthwhile observations on motivations, generally speaking, governing the change from the civilian to the "You're-in-the-Army-now-situation." It is interesting to note that the converse problem, turning back to civilian life, is not mentioned. This has played a big role in Europe, especially in Germany. The viewpoint is important wherever the regular Army, with the signing of peace, is reduced to skeleton numbers.

This report on the confrontation of psychiatric theories with real-life problems shows that psychiatrists came down to earth. In the psychiatrists' co-operation with sociologists rests the hope of future valuable achievement.

BOWEN, HOWARD R. Graduate Education in Economics. Supplement to American Economic Review, Vol. XLIII, No. 4, Part 2, September, 1953. Pp. xv, 223. Menasha, Wis.: American Economic Association, 1953. $2.50.

This volume reports a study which was sponsored by the American Economic Association but is not an official report of the organization. It is a status study concerning the profession of economics and graduate education in economics. The study was carried out during the academic year 1951-1952. The author interviewed 250 professors, heads of departments, and graduate deans at 30 universities, as well as many graduate students and professional economists. He also sent questionnaires to department chairmen, graduate professors, professional economists, graduate students, and supervisors of economists in federal agencies.

A great deal of information is made available here with regard to the number and variety of professional economists; salaries of and demand for economists; standards for the master's and doctor's degrees; quality of graduate students in economics; recruitment, admission, and selection of graduate students; the content of graduate programs; research and verbal skills; research training and dissertations; teacher training; residence requirements and the length of time actually taken in graduate study; the nature of graduate departments; instructional procedures; and numbers of enrollments and degrees awarded.

Although the study relates directly to economics, much of it will be useful to those interested in graduate education in other fields. This is especially true of the sections dealing with admission and selection policies, foreign language requirements, dissertations and research training, teacher training, and instruction methods.

In addition to statistical information relating to the items listed above, the author summarizes the opinions he found in regard to such matters as admission practices, a common core program, relative value of various courses, a broad versus a narrow program of study, a course in methods of research, foreign language requirements, and training for teaching. The author also makes his own suggestions and recommendations concerning many of the issues and problems pointed up by the study.

It is to be hoped that this report will stimulate departments of economics to make careful evaluations of their policies and programs. For instance, there is need for agreement as to whether the master's degree is to represent a standard of achievement or be a "consolation prize" for those who fail to attain the doctorate. There seems to be general agreement that the graduate program should be built around a common core of subjects, but it appears a majority of professors agree on only one subject to be included in this core for the master's program and only three subjects for the doctoral program. There is general dissatisfaction with the foreign language requirements, but in most places they remain unchanged. There is general consent that the majority of Ph.D.'s in economics become teachers, but little agreement as to the effect this condition should have on their graduate education. Mr. Bowen has provided a point of departure from which graduate departments can work toward the solution of these and other problems. WILLIAM H. CARTWRIGHT

MORTON, JOHN R. University Extension in the United States. Pp. xv, 144. University, Ala.: University of Alabama Press, 1953. $2.25 cloth; $1.00 paper.

This study which was sponsored by the National University Extension Association is essentially a survey of the extension practices and services of the 75 member institutions. The principal topics included in the study are the following: historical development, functions, organization, financing, facilities, staff, curriculum, consumers, and methods of institutional adult education. The tables provide excellent summaries of the current administrative practices which should be of much interest and assistance to university administrators.

The definition of "university extension" used by the author is concerned with eleven extension services, including: correspondence instruction, lectures, summer sessions, extension classes, publication services, resident centers, library services, films and visual aids, broadcasting, conferences and institutes, and special community services.

Presumably, by definition, and because fewer than 10 per cent of the National University Extension Association's members are privately supported higher institutions, no account is taken of the work of the evening session or evening college variety which many urban colleges and universities conduct. Nor is there an analysis of the work and problems of the very important and successful adult education program of co-operative agricultural extension under the auspices of the United States Department of Agriculture and the land grant colleges. No reference is made to experimentation currently in progress in a number of universities in such new and promising fields as educational television, workers' education, and international relations.

Although university extension has gained substantial status within the university administrative framework and offers its facilities annually to thousands of adults, Morton indicated that these services are still required to be virtually self-supporting. His data show that approximately 70 per cent of the cost of extension services come from the fees of extension users and that in the case of about one-third of the institutions this source of income accounts for more than 80 per cent of the extension budgets. The author points out how this undue dependence upon fee income and the negligible foundation support for special projects sharply restricts new and experimental activities.

A special canvass of extension service "users" indicated significantly that 90 per cent of the group expressed satisfaction with the services rendered. The median age of users was approximately 35 years, almost three-fifths were men, and only 5 per cent had not completed high school. Approximately three-fourths held full-time jobs. The principal occupational groups enrolled were business and industrial workers and teachers. About 75 per cent indicated that their primary motivation was to earn credit toward college degrees.

This volume provides a comprehensive statement and summary of university extension services and is a valuable handbook for university administrators and others interested in this important segment of adult education. Professor Morton has made an important contribution to a neglected area of higher education through marshaling and presenting many facts in an interesting and significant context.

DIMOND, STANLEY E. Schools and the Development of Good Citizens. Pp. xiii, 215. Detroit: Wayne University Press, 1953. No price.

This is the final report of the Citizenship Education Study carried on through the joint sponsorship of the Detroit Public Schools and Wayne University. Assistance in the financing of the study was given by The William Volker Charities Fund, Inc. The study itself was carried on over a period of five years from February 1945 to June 1950. A small staff and more than 300 teachers and administrators developed the program; its activities were directed by a special committee, jointly chaired by the Superintendent of Schools and the President of Wayne University. Eight schools were selected to participate in the study. These schools, six elementary and two secondary, represented distinctly different types of school population and communities, yet each was typical of public schools in any metropolitan community.

The staff did not attempt to develop its own program and to carry it out in the participating schools. Instead the entire program was developed over the years through the close and continual co-operation of the teachers and administrators of the participating institutions. The activities were developed on the basis of three fundamental concepts: "1. The place to begin improving citizenship education programs is with a particular school and its problems. 2. In each school educational leadership must be given an opportunity to function. 3. The process employed for improving citizenship programs should be consistent with democratic values."

All who had responsibility for the development of the program conceived citizenship in the broad context of developing in children: allegiance to the ideals of democracy, the practice of human relationships consistent with a democratic society, and knowledge, skills, and ability to help in the solution of social problems and to facilitate the process of democratic living. The study included not only an appraisal of the usual citizenship material but also the utilization of the entire curriculum in developing these major concepts, the non-instructional activities of the school, and the relationship of the institution to the total community. Both standardized tests and other measures were used in an effort to determine the extent to which the program was influencing the behavior of the students. While it appeared evident that real values were developed during the five years, the test and community data indicated little change. There was very real gain in the development of co-operative relationships among all of the participants in the study, but as the author points out "Changes in the behavior of children over a span of a few years is quite slow. The educational increment from year to year is exceedingly small, but it is the constant addition of small increments that makes the difference in the education of the child."

The major conclusion of the study is that "the missing ingredient in citizenship education programs is a course of action capable of bringing about the satisfactory emotional adjustment of all children." Many helpful suggestions are included in this report of ways through which the school may be more effective in bringing about the emotional adjustment of children.

PHILOSOPHY AND RELIGION

ROY, RALPH LORD. Apostles of Discord. Pp. xii, 437. Boston: Beacon Press, 1953. $3.75.

When the reader lays down this book he feels like exclaiming, "Incredible!" But the amazing account which the author gives of the lunatic and disreputable "fringes" of American Protestantism is too well documented and supported by other evidence to be discounted. Much of it is a description of the "Protestant underworld," by which the author means "those who espouse ideologies which are immoral, undemocratic, and subversive of the Christian faith."

Mr. Roy disarms hostile critics at the outset by explaining that he is a Republican and "generally a supporter of the 'middle way' of the present administration." Moreover, he permits himself but little commentary, letting his facts tell the story. His exposé is in two parts: "The Ministry of Hate" and "The Ministry of Disruption."

In the first part the "minister demagogue" Gerald L. K. Smith is quoted as calling General Eisenhower "the Jew-bought candidate" for the presidency and Adlai Stevenson a "Jewdealer." Evangelist Gerald Winrod, three times indicted for sedition, appears as a fanatical anti-Semitic fascist whom "dozens of Protestant ministers" support. Catholics, Jews, and Negroes are denounced by supposedly Christian leaders in violent and sadistic language.

In the second part of the book the bitter battle over "modernism" is described, and a sordid story is told of sectarian intrigue directed toward the sabotaging of the co-operative movement in Protestantism and the paralyzing of denominational agencies. The unholy alliance between theological fundamentalism and economic reaction is revealed in all its crudity. Greed and ambition are seen feeding on ignorance and fear.

The author looks at all this with admirable objectivity. He shows how the "red" menace is exploited to the detriment of honest liberalism, but he also reveals the irresponsible use, by a very small but very aggressive group, of ecclesiastical influence to advance revolutionary ends.

"Protestantism's apostles of discord," says Mr. Roy, "appear to be gaining in numbers and in strength." On the other hand he makes it clear that much of the present commotion in Protestantism is created by small dissident groups that are desperately trying to sound big. Many a splinter is posing as a sizable limb on the Protestant tree. But no extenuating considerations can make Apostles of Discord anything but a disturbing and depressing book.

To be sure, harrassed church leaders may find a bit of comfort in reading of the brawls and tantrums that are currently the stuff of secular politics at all levels. But this is cold comfort to Christians who believe in the redemptive mission of the church, and desire it to become the "conscience of the community." It would appear that Protestantism has been growing much faster in size than in internal communication, fellowship, and spiritual discipline.

BRAUER, JERALD C. Protestantism in America: A Narrative History. Pp. 307. Philadelphia: Westminster Press, 1953. $3.50.

Narrative histories of American Protestantism that combine lucidity with comprehensiveness are few. As a popular account of the Protestant heritage in this country, Dr. Brauer's useful volume has much to commend it. It should fill a needed function and prove valuable both as a readable and compact survey for college classes as well as for the general reader who wants a preliminary briefing on the currents of thought and action that make up the Protestant story in America.

According to Dr. Brauer, who is a member of the church history staff of the Federated Theological Faculty of the University of Chicago, two dominant traits of American Protestantism have been "a constant free experimentation and search for a fuller manifestation of God's truth and will, and . . . a sustained effort to avoid going beyond the truth and light already known in the Bible and codified in certain basic beliefs and confessions" (Foreword).

Within this framework of "free experimentation and an enduring Biblicism" the author has brought together in three hundred pages a very succinct account of Protestant development. A wealth of historical facts are skillfully woven in narrative style, starting with the Church of England in the Jamestown settlement, the Puritans of New England, the Revolutionary War, The Age of Reason, revivalism in the early 1800's, dissension and sectarianism, slavery and schisms, the Civil War, Dwight Moody and Billy Sunday, evolutionism and biblical criticism, the social gospel, World War I and its aftermath, the depression, World War II, and the postwar era.

The vitality of Protestant faith is revealed in its adaptation to new historical and cultural situations. Despite differences of belief and emphasis, which are treated with fairness and balance, there is an essential cohesion between the varying strands that bind them together in a single movement.

It would be unreasonable to expect, in a short popular work, a detailed account of the various aspects of such a history. Protestantism in America does not claim to be more than a readable story of the main outlines. As such it provides a compact survey of the struggles, divisions, witness, and basic strength of the American Protestant heritage. The volume should meet the needs of religious educational workers and undergraduate classes in religion, as well as providing collateral reading for courses in the history of American culture. In furnishing a popular narrative review of a significant topic, Dr. Brauer has made a useful contribution.

WEBER, OTTO. Karl Barth's Church Dogmatics. Translated from the German by Arthur C. Cochrane. Pp. 253. Philadelphia: Westminster Press, 1953. $6.00.

Here is a book for the theologically initiated. Laymen will find this schematic outline of Barth's eight-volume Church Dogmatics hardgoing due to its preservation of Barth's fine distinctions, his technical vocabulary, and his slanted biblicism. However, since Barth is doubtless the most widely discussed theologian of the day, an effort to read him becomes a duty for the informed. Only Volume One of his 6,000-page work has been translated hitherto. Hence this digest of Barth's essential position largely in his own words introduces an important body of literature.

Barth, it will be remembered, left the University of Bonn in the middle thirties rather than "Heil Hitler." Since that time he has been a professor at the University of Basel. Weber, professor at Göttingen, brought out this analysis of Barth's major work in German in January 1950. Now comes a translation by Cochrane, a long-time student of Barth and a professor at the University of Dubuque in Iowa. The ecumenical movement, whose language is mainly English, may subsequently deal with Barth more adequately. His thought has been much misconstrued, though several of his shorter single works have been translated for some time.

Cochrane's translation is quite adequate, for it pleases even Barth! Weber's editorial work is designed to introduce the curious to Barth himself and hence it seeks to be unobtrusive. As a whole, this objective has been realized, though the condensation of eight volumes into one leaves some large issues still cryptic. But it is the obscurity of Barth, not Weber, that leaves us searching now and then for the right pair of semantic glasses to see what has been meant.

For Barth theology, or "dogmatics" as he prefers to call it, is the exposition of the "Word" or the revelation given in scripture. Whether God exists is not open to debate (p. 73). Barth takes the existence of God as given in the existence of the Church. He is revealed in scripture which is the possession of the church. Dogmatics is a "function of the church" then by which it examines its language about God (p. 19). Dogmatics is a special pathway to knowledge, though its propositions are statements of faith (p. 20), and faith is something given to us by the Word (p. 30). The criterion of dogmatics is "the Word" (p. 23).

It is a merit of Barth's work in theology to warn against the presumption that human reason can "by searching find out [all about] God." Yet his discussion of revelation, the basis of theology, indicates that revelation supplies a criterion for revelation, and frankly that does not help much! We may be cautious about using human reason as an "analogy of being" (p. 125), but its standards have to lay hold on the revelation somewhere, or man can never know how to relate himself to God or to accept his human responsibilities. To say that "dogma is an eschatological concept" forgets that this judgment itself invokes a whole apparatus of human thinking which keeps us aware of other things besides dogmatics.

Many doctrines receive illumination from Barth's treatment of them. This will be apparent especially in the relation of ethical questions to theology discussed in the last four chapters of the volume. Yet his serious entertainment of angelology as an "annex to Christology" (p. 195) reveals the complications of a too strictly biblical theology. His love of paradox (for example, "God's wrath appears in his love," p. 88) and his new uses of old terms leave one wondering if he is needlessly obscure.

Nevertheless, Barth's reaction to humanism, his stress on the love of God which "elects" to save us (p. 54), his emphasis on humility (pp. 81, 108), and his treatment of evil as the possibilities God has passed over and which he seeks to circumvent (pp. 187-189) are contributions to contemporary thought deserving careful appraisal. An honest struggle with the profoundest themes of Christian thought does not always result in unambiguous conclusions. But it may turn the problem over so that a new beam of light falls on it; that is perhaps the theologian's greatest service.

BIGONCIARI, DINO (Ed.). The Political Ideas of St. Thomas Aquinas. Pp. xxxviii, 217. New York: Hafner Publishing Company, 1953. $1.25 paper; $2.50 cloth.

The social sciences have long needed a one-volume edition of St. Thomas' writings on man and society. For political science, at least, this book will fill the gap. The text is mostly from the Summa Theologica, Part II, with a few pages from On Kingship.

More excerpts would have made the book more useful for the other social sciences. Perhaps a later edition may include more of the early chapters of Kingship, some of the commentaries, and additional "questions" on law and ethics, especially those on heresy, war, equity, and precepts of justice (S.T., II-II). Even for political science the present selection is a bare minimum. The editor's excellent preface, however, rounds out a full picture of St. Thomas' political thought. But no effort is made to relate Aquinas either to the history of social theory or to the society that produced him.

St. Thomas (d. 1274) was the master theologian and philosopher of western Europe's later middle ages. The isolated rural community, the social basis of early medieval culture, was being transformed by the renewed rise of town life and commerce. The transition from Greco-Roman urban society to early medieval rural society had involved the triumph of otherworldly over worldly values. As Augustine epitomizes the world-outlook or ideology of that earlier era, so Thomas expresses the spirit of the later.

The eleventh-century rebirth of urbanizing trends meant on the ideological side a revival of secular values and a rediscovery of classical philosophy, especially Aristotle's. Thirteenth-century western Europe was something of a balance of rural and urban elements, and so was its philosophy. In reconciling the rival Augustinian and Aristotelian dogmas, Thomas combined two great traditions of thought: Christian supernaturalism and Greek rationalism. The framework of his cosmology is Christian; its political content, chiefly Aristotelian. Yet his work is an organic synthesis, a whole greater than its parts.

That the West in this era of revolution and reaction should show renewed interest in Thomist orthodoxy is not surprising.

At least four one-volume excerpts have been published in English since 1948. The Modern Library and Everyman editions are mainly theological in content. The Blackwell selection has the best coverage of Aquinas' political thought, but it prints only the conclusions of the "Questions." This Hafner version, fortunately, includes the arguments as well as the conclusions. Its text is the official Dominican translation revised and clarified by the editor.

No single book can convey adequately the structure of St. Thomas' immense work—the Summa Theologica alone runs to a score of volumes. The present edition, despite its brevity, is the best short introduction to the political theory of Thomas Aquinas now available in English.

DEWICK, E. C. The Christian Attitude to Other Religions. Pp. x, 220. New York: Cambridge University Press, 1953. $5.00.

In this courageous book, the author, who is an educational missionary of long experience, never flinches from facing all the challenges of the modern world. He writes with considerable restraint, avoiding what an eighteenth-century bishop once described as "the exhorbitance [sic] of enthusiasm and bigotry."

He opens with a statement of the counterattacks which confront the Christian movement today from: (1) modern political movements with ideologies of their own, (2) the older oriental religions, and (3) new religious movements such as Spiritualism and Theosophy. He refers to the invitation of the Oriental non-Christian faiths to co-operate with them against secularism, and to the allegations of scientists that the attainment of truth can only be relative and never absolute, and to the allegations of students of religions that many features in the teaching and practice of Christianity which were formerly assumed to be unique have, in fact, close parallels elsewhere.

In his second lecture Dr. Dewick surveys the various answers which have been made to these various challenges, and he shows that different Christian groups give different answers—for example, that Fundamentalist groups in America have not a good word to say for communism, whereas others, while repudiating the Marxist atheistical presuppositions, see in communism elements which are a true judgment upon the existing social and economic order. In the face of the ancient non-Christian faiths, the answers are classified into those of (1) war and conquest, (2) aloofness and discontinuity, (3) comprehension and fulfillment, and (4) co-operation.

In the third lecture, Dr. Dewick seeks to elucidate the actual message of Jesus Christ in relation to other religions. He shows that the traditional Jewish attitude was one of aloofness and discontinuity, and even of hostility. Yet in the Gospels, if we be reasonable, we must accept the fact that insofar as Jesus had contact with the adherents of other religions he was restrained in his criticism. He spoke favorably of individual Samaritans and could say of an individual Roman officer, "I have not found so great faith, no, not in Israel." Although Dr. Dewick rightly detects in Jesus a note of authority which would not have endorsed the superficial slogan: "all religions are equally good," he notes the universalistic passages in the Synoptists (Mark XIV: 9, Matthew XXIV: 14, and Luke XIII: 29); yet he considers further that the saying "There is none other name . . . whereby we must be saved" needs to be interpreted (as perhaps Robert Barclay the Quaker interpreted it) to mean by "the name" "the experience of the Eternal World of God," and he quotes Archbishop William Temple as endorsing this interpretation.

The fourth lecture, on the tradition of the Church, shows the latter as successively (1) on the defensive against other religions, (2) in power over them, and (3) oscillating in the post-Reformation world between liberalism and exclusiveness.

The fifth lecture calls for a recovery of first principles by a consideration of the positive teaching of Christ, and insists that the revelation of God in him is complete and exhaustive in the sense of being distinctive rather than exclusive.

The sixth lecture calls for a reform of missionary policy and practice in the light of first principles. In the concluding pages we find a personal definition by the author of what he conceives to be the aim and purpose of Christian propaganda, that is, the advancement and fuller realization of the Reign of God, either here or in some sphere beyond our knowledge, with God conceived in Christian terms.

Dr. Dewick would no doubt have written willingly with more fervor and converting zeal, but his aim was clearly to review and to persuade, and here we think he has been successful. Yet his argument is so closely knit and so dispassionately put forward that the reader must follow it closely if he is not to misperceive the significance of what he reads.

SPANN, J. RICHARD (Ed.). The Church and Social Responsibility. Pp. 272. Nashville, Tenn.: Abingdon-Cokesbury Press, 1953. $2.75.

Like any anthology, this assembly of fifteen articles on the social attitudes and obligations of the Christian churches displays inequalities and discontinuities. It is, however, far above the average symposium, and at times its high quality and vital relevance to present situations make one wish that at least all ministers would read it. The contributors have been wisely chosen. No one is better fitted to write on "The Church and the State," for example, than Anson Phelps Stokes; or on "War and the Christian Ethic" than Roland H. Bainton; or on "The Church and World Political Order" than Walter W. Van Kirk. To an extraordinary degree the writers have succeeded in being outspoken and forthright in dealing with controversial problems, pulling no punches and dodging no issues, while at the same time maintaining a convincing fairness and objectivity in their judgments.

It may be invidious to select any one article for special mention but, to this reviewer, Eddy Asirvatham's treatment of "World Economic Problems" is an especially brilliant and timely statement. Americans desperately need to hear what he has to say if they are to understand our nation's present problems in dealing with international affairs. On another reader, Donald M. Maynard on "The Family in Relation to Church and Community," or Walter W. Sikes on "Race Relations and Civil Rights," or L. Harold De Wolf on "The Church in the Prevention and Treatment of Crime" might have a similar impact.

Undergirding the whole symposium is the basic conviction that, while Christianity is centrally and intimately concerned with persons, one by one, it cannot be so concerned with any sincerity if it does not tackle constructively the social, economic, and political problems which so profoundly mold the lives, affect the characters, and shape the destiny of persons. It is an intelligent plea for the social gospel and a useful guide to churchmen who desire to understand it and to do something practical about it.

TAYLOR, G. AIKEN. A Sober Faith: Religion and Alcoholics Anonymous. Pp. ix, 108. New York: The Macmillan Company, 1953. $2.00.

A man must be born again to be a Christian, it is said. A man must be just that desperate before he is ready to join the transforming fellowship of Alcoholics Anonymous, in the view of this author, a Christian minister, who tries to draw a parallel between A.A. and religion. His parallel, though, it seems is really not with respect to religion, but the organized Christian religion—specifically, the Church. The Church does not do so well in this parallel.

One parallel, at least, the author does not draw. He might have mentioned the estimate of the Alcoholic Foundation regarding users of alcoholic beverages, on the one hand, and the estimate of Christian church members, on the other. He would find 50 million who are no strangers to the taste of alcohol, among whom are to be found between 3 million and 4 million problem drinkers, one million of whom are confirmed alcoholics, yielding approximately 100,000 active A.A. members in the United States and 29 foreign countries.

It is estimated that there are millions of people who are no strangers to the Christian Church, with respect to regular or occasional attendance, millions of church members, considerably less who take church membership more or less seriously, and here the parallel probably breaks down. Christians, defined in terms of those who have really been born again—would they be less than A.A.'s 100,000? I suspect so.

Here is an interesting and sympathetic view of A.A. and a desperate attempt to see "What has A.A. got that I haven't got? . . . Is there anything this Fellowship can say that's worth listening to, not only about alcoholism, but about religion?" (He did not say the Church.)

The author makes an analysis of the Twelve Steps of A.A. and the successive steps in a profound religious experience, and he finds a striking four-cycle parallel: impotence, dependence, fellowship, and service.

He might have pointed out, too, that in the same way an alcoholic is no true member of the A.A. fellowship (that is, that his safety is not assured) until he makes it his business to help lead others to it; likewise, no man is a true Christian until he makes it his business to lead others to Christ.

He might have pointed to the lack of another parallel between A.A. and the organized Protestant churches with respect to step eleven, which says in part, "praying only for knowledge of His will for us and the power to carry that out." It seems to some people that pulpit prayers seem to go quite beyond this and consist of considerable attempt to tell God what to do.

In the end the author sounds a note of uncertainty with respect to his parallel in the very title of his last chapter, "An Unresolved Conflict." There is no merger of ideas, he maintains—just parallel highways, headed in the same direction. After saying that A.A. does not pretend to replace the Church, it appears at times his parallels are drawn with this in mind. He is not satisfied with A.A.'s treatment of sin. At this point he faces the question troubling him the most: How can you account for A.A.'s success in view of its seeming impatience with some of the things that Christians declare are a necessary part of the God-man relationship? His partial answer is not very convincing to this reviewer.

In the end he concedes that the A.A. in principle is essentially correct, and that it is an "almost perfect analogy of true religion, which is unique in its claims."

But elsewhere he expresses some grave doubts with what appear to him as trends toward institutionalization and more formalization of A.A. Could our author be pointing at what may be a weakening aspect of the formalized and institutionalized religion of the Christian Church?

This is recommended reading for all church folk and all drinkers. True Christians and A.A. members only can afford to skip it. This will not be too serious to either publisher or author.

MANSON, T. W. The Servant-Messiah: A Study of the Public Ministry of Jesus. Pp. vi, 104. New York: Cambridge University Press, 1953. $2.00.

The present volume contains in substance the Shaffer Lectures for 1939 delivered at Yale University Divinity School. These have been revised and expanded for a course at Cambridge, offered in 1951, and it is this revised version of the original Yale lectures that is here presented to the public.

The first chapter, "The Messianic Hope," deals in rather masterly fashion with the religious background in Israel just before the time of Christ's ministry. The position is adopted that the Palestinian Jews of that time were ready to acclaim anyone who might appear as a champion of Israel's cause and "to take up arms in a holy war for the kingdom of God" (p. 35). Of particular interest is the author's discussion of the Sadducees, whom he regards as a political body that passed from the scene when the Jewish state as a political entity ceased to exist. The name Sadducee, it is maintained, resulted from the transliteration of the Greek word sundikos into Aramaic or Hebrew.

The author proceeds next to sketch briefly the work of John the Baptist, whom he regards as having received a prophetic call. Indeed, John was a "true prophet of the Amos school" (p. 47), a proclaimer of stern judgment, who was the last to try to carry out a religious and moral reformation, and who failed, albeit the failure was a magnificent one.

Three brief chapters treat of the Messianic Ministry, its principles and practice, and the Passion, and a last chapter deals with the Risen Christ. To understand Dr. Manson's treatment of these matters we must recognize that he regards the kerygma in which the Christian case is presented as asserting: "(a) that Jesus was descended from David; (b) that he fulfilled his Ministry among the Jews; (c) that he was crucified; (d) that he was raised from the dead and exalted to God's right hand; (e) that he will come again" (p. 53). This material is further enclosed in a framework, but the author thinks that there is a solid "body of historical material which makes an intelligible and credible story" (p. 54).

The present reviewer is unable to accept this fundamental position, for it appears to be insufficiently objective. Furthermore, it limits the picture of our Lord, so that an adequate understanding of His ministry cannot thereby be obtained. To obtain such an understanding, this reviewer believes, one must approach the Gospels from the standpoint of historic orthodox Christianity.

EDWARD J. YOUNG

WILD, JOHN. Plato's Modern Enemies and the Theory of Natural Law. Pp. xi, 259. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1953. $5.50.

Nothing I have read in the field of ethics and political theory meets the need of our time so profoundly as this treatment of the problem of right and wrong in personal conduct and in the social order. The study of Plato is incidental to the purpose of the book. The purpose is to demonstrate that right action and right social order are determined by the nature of man; that this nature is a tendency or process of change which conforms to a certain structure when it is not impaired; that this tendency can deviate from this structure or fall short of completing it, in which case the deviation or deficiency is evil; that human choice and human action can enable this tendency to conform to the structure or hinder it from so doing; that right action and right social order enable the tendency to fulfill itself according to the structure which is distinctive of human nature, while wrong action and social order do the opposite.

Not only the human being but every living thing and, in a more indefinite way, even nonliving things, says Wild, are what they are by reason of a process of change having a structure which is common to all members of the species.

Thus good and evil are determined by the nature of things when nature is understood to be structures more or less completely fulfilled by the process of change which occurs in each existing thing. Moral obligation is the demand of this inherent constitutive tendency in man to fulfill itself according to the structure which distinguishes the human being from what is not human. To be sure, human beings are still human when this tendency deviates from the required form; but when this occurs internal self-destructive processes get under way. In the living organism we call this disease. When it occurs in the human mind the psychotherapists have various theories about it, but they all recognize it as a kind of impairment.

Present day thought makes many objections to this interpretation of right and wrong and to this interpretation of nature. The author recognizes these objections and meets them. He shows that Plato and Aristotle initiated this approach to the problem of ethics and social order; and since their time many have defended it. The ethical theories now dominant in philosophy oppose it; but these current theories are unable to provide a demonstrable basis for a universal ethic. Wild's interpretation of natural law can provide such a basis.

STRAUSS, LEO. Natural Right and History. Pp. ix, 327. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1953. $5.00.

The present volume is an expanded discussion of lectures delivered at the University of Chicago under the auspices of the Charles R. Walgreen Foundation. Attempting to remedy the neglect of political philosophy in responsible government, the author seeks to re-establish a natural law doctrine as a basis for the limitation upon state authority. The abandonment of the natural right theory has led to an unqualified relativism, with disastrous consequences which can be remedied only if the historical trend is reversed.

Beginning with Plato and Aristotle, the classical natural right concept emerged in medieval thought as the basis for the Thomistic notion—only to be challenged by the social theorists at the beginning of modern times. The political philosophies of Hobbes and Locke, while inferior to classical theory, were more effective, for the moment. Subsequent developments by Rousseau and Burke could not patch up the weaknesses of modern political theory. The fundamental dilemma of contemporary social science results from the dualism of nonteleological natural science and teleological social behavior, and the deplorable consequences of this dichotomy appear in the perversions of positivism, the meanderings of the historicists who seek for the essence of man's humanity in the historical process, and the irresponsibilities of those amoral social scientists who take refuge in the fact-value dualism.

Today our task is to discover some absolute natural standards, if we are to provide a basis for just laws and resolve the conflicting claims of social groups. The present volume is devoted largely to the history of the problem, and there are hints that a subsequent study will reveal a solid basis for a rehabilitated natural right theory.

GOMPERZ, HEINRICH. Philosophical Studies. Edited by Daniel S. Robinson, with a Foreword by Philip Merlan. Pp. 287. Boston: Christopher Publishing House, 1953. $7.50.

This posthumous volume of original essays covers the period from 1935 to 1943

during which the author was visiting professor of philosophy at the University of Southern California. Previously he had served as professor of philosophy at the University of Vienna from 1924 to 1934 and was in intimate contact with members of the "Vienna Circle," such as Carnap and Schlick, whose views he shared in essentials.

The papers reprinted here deal with the history of early Greek philosophy, ethical theory, and epistemology. Those dealing with the history of Greek philosophy are models of clarity and precise scholarship which compare favorably with those of his illustrious father, Theodor Gomperz, whose Greek Thinkers he edited. The paper on "Problems and Methods of Early Greek Science" serves to illustrate the author's ability to summarize briefly and clearly the results of his profound research in the earliest phases of Greek scientific thought.

The essay on "The Concept of History," written in 1937, is to my mind one of the best in the volume. As against the facile distinction of Rickert between the "understanding" of history and the "explanation" of science, Gomperz indicates the need for employing both methods. "It seems hardly possible to draw a precise line of demarcation allowing us to practise 'understanding' while renouncing 'explanation'" (p. 218). Gomperz avowedly inclines to the positivistic view of Leopold von Ranke that history should describe "how things really happened" and demonstrates how the contrary thesis which denies the possibility of historical truth leads from history to myth. Gomperz frankly confesses that he hardly knows how to refute the opposite view by argument (p. 221). In the last analysis his position is that "This seems to be one of those disagreements that cannot be settled by argument. Indeed, values are objects of faith and resolve, not of proof and demonstration. We cannot, perhaps, prove truth to be an ultimate value. The only thing we can do is to believe in it and to strive for it" (p. 222).

As indicated also in his "Autobiographical Remarks," Gomperz was inclined to the view that "in ethics, all that philosophy can do is to clarify alternatives: decisions are, ultimately, made by the will, not by reason" (p. 22). In discussing the question whether "the end justifies the means," he concludes that "it depends on sentiment" and that sentiment ultimately depends on "the spirit of the age" (p. 145). The problem of how far collective responsibility may be carried as over against individual responsibility is one, he maintains, which cannot be answered by appeal to principle but only pragmatically by ascertaining how far collective responsibility may be carried "without revolting our feelings." In sum, Gomperz tended to adopt a pragmatic attitude in questions of ethics since he had no absolute theoretical convictions as to the objective validity of values. "In practice," he concludes, "compromise works better than an ideal" (p. 25). At the same time, he preferred freedom to security and felt that one ought not to be neutral in the struggle between good and evil, although he himself failed to provide any theoretical justification for his stand. As Dr. Merlan has indicated in the Foreword, there are for Gomperz no final cognitive certainties on which to base rational action—a position which reflects "the tragedy of the scientific spirit" which he felt so deeply but which he and the intellectuals of his generation were powerless to avert.

HEALD, MARK M. A Free Society: An Evaluation of Contemporary Democracy. Pp. xii, 546. New York: Philosophical Library, 1953. $4.75.

This is a broadly conceived, well-reasoned, systematically organized, clearly expressed, largely philosophical treatise upon the doctrines of liberal democracy viewed both as a process of government and as a form of social relationships. It is not presented as a study of democracy from the technical viewpoint of professional political scientists but offers a redefinition of the basic concepts of political, economic, and social democracy. Ethical and spiritual concerns and bases are strongly emphasized.

Mr. Heald is deeply concerned with the preservation of individualism in a free society as he faces up to the necessity of government and state authority to achieve the fundamental purposes of civil society—namely, protection, peace, prosperity, and progress. He recognizes the problems encountered in making democracy work and appreciates its weaknesses, but, after comparing it with fascism, bolshevism, and moderate socialism, he strongly affirms the survival power of democracy in the confused, chaotic world of today. Significant in this survival power is its respect for moral and spiritual values of life and its faith in man and his cultural destiny.

He examines at length the dilemma in choosing between coercion and individualism, sees a strong trend toward authoritarianism everywhere today, but believes that too much emphasis is placed upon the coercive and restrictive nature of government. It is his conviction that the fundamental freedoms of human beings can be preserved by earnest efforts at sincere democratic procedure in the organization of civil society (as not found in totalitarian "isms"), so that in terms of civil liberty individualism becomes fused with general social welfare. Thus, democracy comes to be viewed as a program for social as well as for individualistic values.

The chapters on "Democracy, Ethics, and Christianity," "Democracy and Authoritarian Society," and "The Preservation of a Free Society" are specially to be commended.

"Democratic doctrine embodies," says the author (p. 482), "at one and the same time, an ethical ideal and a set of practicable procedures. It is a way of life, a goal of personal achievement and self-realization, and a formula for adjustment and cooperation. It is the only tolerable system of civil society for individuals with differing aims and values. . . . In a free society, men may have anything they choose, either bad or good. Without freedom, men will have no choice, and only the bad will prevail, because then only might determines right."

Mr. Heald is a member of the Department of History at Rutgers University.

MURPHY, GARDNER. In the Minds of Men. Pp. xiv, 306. New York: Basic Books, 1953. $4.50.

In this book Dr. Garner Murphy, at the request of the Ministry of Education, Government of India, gives a nontechnical report of his impressions regarding social tensions in India. It is encouraging to the social scientist in India to find that his government feels the need for organizing research to explore the reasons for social tensions, as well as the need for scientific approach in the promotion of better understanding among different peoples. For the first time, on the Indian scene, a leading social psychologist is applying the method of science to the analysis of group prejudice and hostility, thus opening up for Indian psychologists a hitherto unheeded area of attitude survey and measurement.

For an Indian it is gratifying to note that, in this book, Dr. Murphy speaks not only of tensions but also of the many constructive forces such as the essential Indian tolerance, the basic education, and the universities, which are working for national unity. Very sympathetically and delicately, he has isolated and identified the subtle causal factors that make for cohesion and conflict in our intergroup relationships. With a sensitive and scientific imagination he has probed in the minds of a foreign people and revealed their strengths and weaknesses.

His observations on the upbringing of Indian children, their emotional patterns, their attitudes, and their habits, in their causal relation to their mature social outlook and behavior, are a first-class contribution to scientific group-psychology.

Many well-meaning Hindus will heartily agree with his view that the whole conception of "exclusion" in Indian society is a functional one based upon the hierarchical position of groups; that is, one is "excluded" from the privilege of higher groups, not because of hatred or what would be called "prejudice" from the Western point of view." They will regard all talk about caste frictions and social tensions as disturbing ideas from the outside. However, caste prejudices exist, and we have to remove them by bringing about change in our attitudes and practices backed up by the pressure of progressive education and policies. The chapters on "The Insecurity of the Muslims" and "The Frustration of the Refugees" show great understanding and insight into the anxieties and suspicions of the Muslims and the disappointments and anger of the refugees. At the same time we find genuine appreciation of the very real difficulties of the indigenous population. Drawing upon his vast experience, in India and outside, Dr. Murphy has given us very significant and weighty generalizations regarding human relations in times of stress and some valuable suggestions to improve them. However, I would have liked to know a little more about the stability of the reported results and, in general, about the conditions of reliability and validity of interview-questionnaire data. To suggest a slight correction, my own experiment was conducted on school adolescents and not on college students as stated on page 114.

Those of the persuasion of economic determination of all social difficulties would consider that most of the problems of social tensions discussed in this book are peripheral rather than central—the only basic tensions being those between the exploiting capital and militant labor or between the ruthless landlords and the armed peasantry. Murphy's diagnosis on page 117, that "economic frustrations are of major importance and that economic rehabilitation is now the primary problem," may give this group some comfort and feeling that he has hit the nail on head. It is, however, exceedingly naïve to suggest that the topic of caste feelings, the Hindu-Muslim tension, and the refugee rehabilitation, discussed in this book, are not important problems and it is false simplification to regard them all as merely economic. The more fruitful approach is to recognize that the social scene is continually changing its tension-patterns and therefore there is really no resting on oars but a need for constant and co-operative scientific research. I hope it will be possible for at least a few social scientists to follow up Murphy's wise and inspiring lead.

TREVOR-ROPER, H. R. The Gentry, 1540-1640. Supplement I to The Economic History Review. Pp. 55. New York: Cambridge University Press, 1953. $1.00.

Whether interpretations which stand the test of time advance the cause of scholarship more than hypotheses that provoke critics to further effort is a debatable question. It need not trouble Professor Tawney. He has both to his credit. In this essay Mr. Trevor-Roper seeks to modify what he disarmingly calls the "faulty formulation" of Professor Tawney's now famous theses on the rise of the gentry and the contemporaneous decline of the aristocracy in 1540-1640. He likewise presents certain theses of his own.

The first charge is that Professor Tawney's distinction between nobility and gentry made on the basis of their economic difficulties is "artificial." Mr. Trevor-Roper himself finds a decline among part of the aristocracy under Elizabeth though he observes an even more important rise under James I. He partially agrees also with Professor Tawney in noting a rise within the gentry at the same time, though to him both phenomena have taken place, not as Professor Tawney suggests, by careful estate management or the lack of it; but by the acquisition (or lack of it) of lucrative offices stretching from the highest offices of the Crown downwards. I believe that Mr. Trevor-Roper has made a significant contribution in pointing out this important source of the wealth of many Elizabethan and Stuart families. That he regards it as supplanting rather than supplementing Professor Tawney's reasoning on the nature of the "rise" when such occurs is less convincing. Are they mutually exclusive explanations? Or are they manifestations, one economic and the other political, of the same thing—the exercise of initiative and use of "business methods" by both gentry and aristocracy to keep or augment their fortunes in uncertain times? Only more thorough analyses made of the whole of England will answer that question.

But it is in his handling of the minor gentry that Mr. Trevor-Roper lays himself most open to question. He does well to point out these "mere gentry," some, perhaps many, of whom were suffering reverses. But did they all feel "themselves to be a depressed and declining class" who "consoled—or armed—themselves with religious dissent" (p. 52); whose disgruntlement and difficulties "gave substance" to abortive risings, and finally "led directly to the Great Rebellion" (p. 32)? In supporting these and other points of view, interesting if as yet unproved, Mr. Trevor-Roper does indeed, in good American vernacular, stick his neck out. But, as I suggested in the beginning, scholarship can be advanced in different ways.

BROWNING, ANDREW (Ed.). English Historical Documents, 1660-1714. Vol. VIII of "English Historical Documents," David C. Douglas, general editor. Pp. xxxii, 966. New York: Oxford University Press, 1953. $17.50.

This is the second published volume of an impressive and important enterprise, which, when complete, will present in 13 volumes an easily accessible and comprehensive body of documentary evidence for English history from circa 500 to 1914. Early in 1953 appeared the volume on the period, 1042-1189.

The declared aim of the editors is to facilitate "that direct study of the evidence which alone can give validity to historical judgment," and they believe that "the essential prerequisite for the healthy development of English historical studies is wider acquaintance with the original authorities." It is, however, highly doubtful that that vague constituency, "the reading public," will, in any considerable numbers, seize the opportunity here offered. Too often the average person is interested in the study of the past merely to justify his own present. And even those more objectively minded, but uninitiated in the mysteries and limitations of historical method and interpretation, will find little meaning in stark texts presented without comment.

But for those who are willing to make the effort necessary to bring documents to life, and especially for those whose business it is to teach and study history, this project is of great significance. Fairly close study of a period on the basis of the more important sources will now be possible without recourse to a large library. For this purpose, the soundness of this particular volume is attested by the commanding reputation of its editor, Professor Browning, an outstanding authority on the later Stuart period. His is no conventional source book. It is true that for strictly legal and constitutional material the recently published collection by W. C. Costin and J. Steven Watson is more complete. But for history broadly conceived we have here assembled in some 400 items by far the most comprehensive collection of contemporary documents on the period. There are of course the standard items illustrative of constitutional conflict; but there are also extensive sections on Public Finance, the Church, Social Life, Trade, the Armed Forces, Scotland and Ireland, and important personalities.

The selection is often perforce arbitrary, but there is likely to be little serious quarrel with the choice made by Professor Browning. Much out of the way material appears; a few selections come directly from manuscripts, enough to make one wish for more. There are brief but useful introductions to the various sections. Students will especially appreciate the fresh and stimulating treatment of the period as a whole, in the general introduction. The selective but critical bibliographies will be consulted with profit; however, relatively little material published since 1940 is included.

BENNETT, GEORGE (Ed.). The Concept of Empire: Burke to Attlee 1774-1947. Pp. xix, 434. London: Adam and Charles Black (distributed in New York by British Book Centre), 1953. $4.00.

This is Volume Six in the "British Political Tradition" series edited by Alan Bullock and F. W. Deakin. The series presents selections from "contemporary documents of the most varied character" and should, according to the London Economist, not only "prove a godsend to the undergraduate but a source of great pleasure to the historically or politically minded layman." The documents in this volume are hardly of a "most varied" character, since nearly all are either excerpts from speeches of politicians or from nineteenth-century works dealing with imperial or colonial issues.

The selections are, however, numerous—128 in all, few occupying more than three pages. At least half of them deal with the broader aspects of imperial policy, as expounded by such politicians as Burke, Brougham, Huskisson, Disraeli, Joseph Chamberlain, and Churchill, and by such writers as Adam Smith, Cobbett, Macaulay, Bentham, Wakefield, Buller, Carlyle, Goldwin Smith, Froude, Dilke, Seeley, and Hobson. Among the remainder, selections illustrating the constitutional development of the Dominions are well represented, but neither India nor tropical Africa receives comparable attention. There are no explanatory footnotes, and each speaker or writer is introduced by no more than a half dozen sentences of biographical data.

Teachers of British imperial history will find this collection very useful indeed, but its value to the uninitiated American student or layman is greatly lessened by the absence of adequate explanatory material. This reviewer found the 28-page introductory essay a masterpiece of compression. Nevertheless, the author, perhaps unconsciously, takes for granted a background of far more than the rudiments of this vast subject. Even British students and readers are likely to be mystified by such phrases as "Westminster Model" (p. 16) and "High Commission Territories" (p. 24), to say nothing of "Mervousness" (p. 26). Admirable as it is in providing an excellent choice of contemporary materials, this book would have benefited greatly by fewer and longer excerpts accompanied by more editorial comment. Also, how could the Empire get from Burke to Attlee without Kipling and Rhodes?

GASH, NORMAN. Politics in the Age of Peel: A Study in the Technique of Parliamentary Representation, 1830-1850. Pp. xxi, 496. New York: Longmans, Green and Co., 1953. $8.75.

The House of Commons reform of 1832 did not make as great a break in British parliamentary development as historians sometimes unconsciously assume. Norman Gash, in his fascinating analysis of electoral realities, demonstrates in detail the continuation of many practices and conditions which had characterized the older political system. This result followed naturally on the principles of the reformers, who were only interested in allying new interests with the old governing class and this only so far as necessary. They therefore consciously arranged a system which had a complex variety of franchises and constituencies and even preserved in a limited degree the family, proprietary, and "government" boroughs. In Ireland after 1832 one man in twenty had the vote, in England and Wales one in five (p. 89). In the election of 1832 one English borough (Reigate) polled 101 votes, choosing one member; another (Liverpool) polled 8,600 votes, choosing two members.

Our author introduces us to the actual working out of the system over a period of two decades. To those who do not realize how the office seeker and his friends operate in our day it may be a little shocking to read of voters lining up to receive payment for their votes, of Sudbury and St. Albans being deprived of representation because of their flagrant corruption, of the 185 official inquiries occasioned by the first six general elections which took place under the reformed system, of the systematic rioting during the South Staffordshire election of 1835 (pp. 149-151), and of the deals by which the contenders sometimes divided two-member constituencies between them. Perhaps the book places too much emphasis on these aspects, but there can be no doubt that the picture as presented here gives one a feeling of seeing normal human beings coping with understandable problems much better than does the amusing but grotesque Eatanswill election of Dickens' Pickwick Papers.

The specially detailed account of the elections and electoral maneuvers in Berkshire (chapter XI) vividly illustrates the way candidates were selected and the factors which determined their success or failure. The chapter on "club government," which traces the origins and workings of the Carlton Club and the Reform Club, throws welcome light on the elaboration of party machinery necessitated by an expansion of the electorate. The author has carried out a minute investigation, making use of extensive manuscript and other documentary material, yet he has skillfully kept the subject in focus.

HUTTON, GRAHAM. We Too Can Prosper: The Promise of Productivity. Pp. 248. London: George Allen and Unwin (distributed in the U. S. by The Macmillan Company, New York), 1953. $2.75.

One of the most important international experiments since World War II has been the investigation made by 66 Anglo-American Productivity Teams of our manufacturing and managerial processes. Although wide publicity has been given to the studies published by these Teams in scholarly and popular journals, prior to Graham Hutton's survey no single volume presented an overall view of the project, or emphasized special divergencies between British and American conditions which are vital when the transfer of industrial and managerial technique across the Atlantic is contemplated.

There is no peculiar American secret about high wages, high manufacturing outputs, and high standards of living, as Mr. Hutton points out. However, admittedly, there are many things which, in combination, make the American industrial machine "tick" and its British counterpart "backfire." Basically, the comparative productivity of the average British worker and the average American worker lies in the will to work which the people in the tight little island have lost, at least temporarily.

The rise of the "couldn't care less" attitude toward employment and the decline of the abiding philosophy of a day's work, honestly performed for a fair wage, for the good of the worker, his family, and, in the larger sense, his country, are closely correlated with two wars, rationing, and taxation. It is an insidious, demoralizing element which must be rooted out of every aspect of British industry. Then American shop procedures, managerial methods, company publicity, and cost accounting can aid in the elevation of personal and plant peacetime goals.

If this modern psychological phenomenon, which cultivates leisure rather than effort, afflicts the United States, the productive impetus, easily won and carelessly guarded by the American people and admired by Graham Hutton and other discerning economists, will fall into other hands, the great American industrial pattern passing from reality into history. In this present volume our industrial genius is described in detail as is the contribution this genius could make now and tomorrow if it were somehow miraculously harnessed and transferred from Pittsburgh and points North, South, East, and West to Birmingham, Liverpool, Manchester, and the Clyde.

Coupled with the man in the street's desire to labor must be greatly enlarged facilities in Great Britain for the study of every aspect of business management. In the United States, business is a profession, an honorable career to be prepared for at a University and pursued happily throughout one's life. In contrast, in England, as Mr. Hutton indicates, this field is considered somewhat beneath the talents of the Oxford or Cambridge man. With the decline in the number and importance of Civil Service posts abroad and the drastic readjustment of the economy at home, it is imperative that graduates of British Universities come to regard business management as a profession of intellectual standing and social prestige comparable with law and medicine, and one which makes as great a contribution to the Crown as a civil appointment in the Commonwealth and Colonies.

EGGLESTON, FREDERIC W. Reflections of an Australian Liberal. Pp. iii, 301. Melbourne: F. W. Cheshire, 1953. 27s. 6d.

In this book Sir Frederic Eggleston reflects on a lifetime in Australian public affairs. Though somewhat unevenly written and organized, we can be grateful for a trenchant critique of Australian politics. With great insight, Sir Frederic probes into the philosophy and record of parties and politicians.

Though he has some pungent things to say about the liberal party, his sharpest words are reserved for the Country and Labor parties. The Labor party has set the pace in Australia but, in the view of the author, it fails in the crucial test of service to the whole community. Many of the major problems in Australia, as in other advanced countries, are bound up with the operation of large-scale industry. Upon the efficient and capable operation of industry, therefore, the prosperity of the community depends. Yet, the author points out that the Labor party is apparently unconcerned with maintaining and developing the productive structure of the Commonwealth. It preaches class war depicting the capitalists upon whom industry depends as morally depraved and sinful in their desire to make their enterprises profitable. "I do not hold any brief for the capitalist—but, if nine-tenths of our industry and enterprise are to be conducted under capitalist conditions, it is no use sabotaging the industry by which so many of the needs of the community are provided . . ." (page 54).

His criticism of the Country party is equally severe. Though he recognizes that the primary producers have worked harder and endured more than any section of the community, he finds the party which represents them to have played a selfish and unenlightened part in political life.

The future of Australia, Sir Frederic asserts, depends on the development of an overwhelming social idea which will attract the loyalty of the majority of her people. In Australian politics the parties which represent vested interests have had the initiative. On the other hand, with all its shortcomings the Liberal party and its predecessors have reflected views which are a truer expression of the Australian pattern as a whole. And for this reason they have held office and have exercised leadership to a greater degree than any other party.

Much of this book will be unpalatable to many Australians. Yet, it is to be hoped that it will be widely read and discussed, for Sir Frederic has gone to the roots of Australian problems. And, until these basic weaknesses are recognized, the progress of Australia will continue to fall far short of the hopes of her people. No one who wants to understand Australia today can afford not to read this book.

Small Towns of Natal: A Socio-economic Sample Survey. Natal Regional Survey Additional Report No. 3. Pp. xi, 113. Pietermaritzburg: University of Natal Press, 1953. 17s. 6d.

Dunn Reserve, Zululand, The. Natal Regional Survey Additional Report No. 4. Pp. xiii, 69. Pietermaritzburg: University of Natal Press, 1953. 15s.

Africa has a plethora of continent-wide surveys, a paucity of detailed studies. The need for the latter is being ably tackled both in quality and quantity for its own region by the University of Natal. Under the direction of Professor H. R. Burrows, an economist who should be noted for his skill in building up social-science-wide research teams, four volumes and six reports have already appeared in print with more to follow.

Report No. 3, Small Towns of Natal, looks at the general population characteristics, types of families, their income, and their housing situations of seven towns representative of Natal. Of the 45,000 individuals surveyed, about 47 per cent were African, 31 per cent European, 17 per cent Asian, and only 4 per cent Coloured. Among the Europeans, the home language was English in 50 per cent of the cases, Afrikaans in 42 per cent, and both in 8 per cent. In Newcastle and Ladysmith Afrikaans predominated by 58 per cent and 50 per cent, respectively, the former figure being closer to the national average.

The Asians spoke an Indian language and sometimes a European one in addition, but not two Indian languages, which, it is suggested, may be a bar to intermarriage among Asians unless the wife accepts her husband's tongue. Hindustani, Tamil, Gujarati, and Urdu were most common in that order although significant variations between towns were found. Nearly all the Africans spoke Zulu at home.

The masculinity ratios of the seven rural towns per hundred females were 95 among Europeans, 108 for Indians, and 119 for Africans. The drift of the European men to the pioneering areas of southern Africa (Southwest Africa, the Rhodesias, and lately the Orange Free State goldfields) is reversed for Natives. Where the women normally do the agricultural work, the tendency for the male African is to go off alone to town to work.

Age structure in the towns shows a maturing European and a multiplying Indian population. Over 50 per cent of the Indians were under 16 against 34 per cent of the European and 38 per cent of the Africans. In the 60 and over bracket there were twice as many Europeans (9 per cent) as Indians or Africans (both 4 per cent).

Family types in these rural towns show marked racial differences. The man-wife-children household occurred in 45 per cent of the European cases but only 31 per cent of the time among Africans, where in 19 per cent of the cases men were alone and in another 9 per cent the household had a man, wife, children, and other relatives. Among Indians, 3 per cent had relatives in the ménage. Among couples with children, the average family size was 6.3 for Indians, 5.2 for Africans, and 4.5 for Europeans, and was reasonably constant from town to town.

The racial complexity of South Africa is emphasized by the Dunn people, subject of Report No. 4, who are descended from one John Dunn, born in South Africa of a Scots father, who sired over 100 children from some 48 African wives. Dunn became a powerful chief in the Zulu nation and had his own territory, where some 200 of his descendants live today. For some tax purposes the Duns are "Natives," under liquor laws they are "Coloured," while under the Sugar Act governing cane quotas a number of them are classified as "European." The report examines social problems and legal cases arising out of the Duns' chaotic position.

FAINSOD, MERLE. How Russia is Ruled. Pp. xiv, 575. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1953. $7.50.

Professor Fainsod's book is one of the most important studies on the Soviet Union ever published in the United States. It must be admired for its wealth of material and for its balanced judgments. The author knows, for instance, very well how to utilize and evaluate the statements given by the refugee from Soviet rule. The events since the downfall of Beria, which occurred after the completion of the book, prove the correctness of various tentative remarks of Professor Fainsod on the future developments in the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics.

The book is a sociological-historical description of the power system, which, established by Lenin, found its definitive complete form under Stalin. The first part is devoted to the "seedbed" of revolution and to the seizure of power by Lenin's Bolsheviks. The second analyzes the Communist Party, and the third the instruments of its totalitarian rule (constitutional myth, terror, bureaucracy in the army). The fourth is devoted to controls and tensions, paying particular attention to the conditions in Soviet agriculture and factories.

The mixture of Soviet politics, composed of utopian elements which continue to operate as a formal belief in a particular mission justifying total power and utilization of all means, with a cynical realism ready to apply all kinds of maneuvers and manipulations is brought out with great clarity and many details. The basic identity of the regime despite all change and adaptation to new situations is not overlooked. Professor Fainsod shows the roots of the urge for centralization and belief in elites which culminated in the deification of Stalin, in the writings and policies of young Lenin. Brilliant is the chapter on terror. Professor Fainsod realizes that Soviet terror is directed not only against concrete enemies but that it is destined to create general insecurity which is decisive for the working of the totalitarian regime. Very enlightening is the survey of the various oppositions in the Bolshevik Party and the analysis of the party organization with its changes. The chapter on the army ought to be pondered by those who expect an end of Malenkov's regime by a revolt of the marshals.

In future editions some repetitions can be easily omitted and a few words on the role of Stalin's personal secretariat added. The Russian Research Center of Harvard University must be congratulated for having published this outstanding work.

GARTHOFF, RAYMOND L. Soviet Military Doctrine. Pp. xviii, 587. Glencoe, Ill.: Free Press, 1953. $7.50.

Soviet Military Doctrine is an important, much needed, and potentially very useful contribution to our knowledge of Russian power. In a field in which accurate information is as vital as it is rare, this painstaking, exhaustive, and thorough analysis represents a most welcome pioneer work which may serve as a model as well as a source book for future students of the subject.

Mr. Garthoff's study was made as a part of the research program conducted for the United States Air Force by the RAND Corporation. In pursuing it he had to consult a wide variety of sources and sift an enormous amount of material in Russian, German, and English; in consequence, his bibliography covers some 60 pages and constitutes one of the major assets of the book.

According to the author's own words, he intended to discover and clarify "that which is taught, believed, and intended by the Soviets as the basis for their conduct of war and battle." But beyond that he also wanted to find and formulate "those tenets which are themselves not recognized by the Soviets as part of their formal doctrine, but which nevertheless actually play a substantial role in it." This is most important, because, as his material strongly indicates, there are sometimes significant discrepancies between Soviet military theory and practice, due mainly to an over-evaluation of Stalin's "always correct" Military Science, which is said to have won the Soviet-German War, and to a tendency to draw lessons only from recent Russian victories, conveniently overlooking Soviet mistakes and failures.

The work is divided into three parts. The first part, dealing with the bases of Soviet military doctrine, points out that one of its main pillars is the assumption that war and peace are only two aspects of the perpetual struggle for world domination, in which one either destroys or is destroyed. However, after tracing the influence of Marxism, Imperial Russia, and foreign military authorities on Soviet military thinking, the author concludes that it corresponds closely to that of the West and that it is fundamentally sound.

Part II is an analysis of Soviet principles of war, in which the author discusses those assumptions and beliefs about military science and art, which are accepted in any armed force as the basic guide for its conduct of military affairs. He brings out the fact that the Soviets have an almost exaggerated faith in the efficacy of the offensive, which to a large extent was responsible for their lack of preparedness against the German attack in 1941.

Part III is concerned with the operational and tactical employment of combat arms, and shows the central position of ground forces in the Soviet military doctrine. Air Force and Navy are regarded primarily as auxiliaries of the Army. Consequently, the belief that war could be won by air bombing alone is considered "pseudo-scientific" and alien to Soviet military art. This does not mean, however, that Russia is incapable of developing a strong "strategic bombing" force in case of need.

Numerous notes, an appendix showing the organization of the Soviet Armed Forces, another discussing the failure of the Soviet armies to stop the German invasion, a glossary of special terms, and an index complete the book and increase its usefulness. Written in a readable style and presenting material of the greatest interest to all of us, the book should be read not only by the military professionals but also by all persons interested in Russia and in foreign policy in general.

Police-State Methods in the Soviet Union.

Coercion of the Worker in the Soviet Union. Prepared by the International Commission Against Concentrationist Regimes, under the direction of David Rousset. Translated by Charles R. Joy. Edited by Jerzy G. Glikzman. Pp. 63. Boston: Beacon Press, 1953. $1.50.

In recent years a few American writers, none of whom to the best of my knowledge has ever been in a concentration camp, have propounded the thesis that the Soviet legal system is a highly advanced one which poses a challenge to the West to develop its own along similar lines. This rubbish has been refuted by a number of authoritative studies dealing with Soviet labor law, forced labor, the status of minorities in the Soviet Union, and the like, among which the writings of Vladimir Gsovski and Solomon Schwarz deserve special commendation. What has misled the "challenge" school has been mainly its failure to comprehend the fundamental distinction between political and nonpolitical crimes. Soviet treatment of the latter sometimes bears a semblance of justice, even of leniency, especially as it is described in the writings of official apologists such as Vyshinsky. In reality, however, many acts, such as offenses against labor discipline, which ought to be considered nonpolitical, not to say noncriminal, are assigned in effect a political character.

Political crimes are dealt with of course by agencies of the secret police which operate almost wholly outside the framework of statute law and hence tend to escape the notice of the "challenge" school.

The exposure of these agencies, mainly for the benefit of a European rather than an American audience, has been the principal concern of the International Commission Against Concentrationist Regimes, led by David Rousset and composed of alumni of Nazi or Soviet concentration camps. The two brief, attractively published volumes under review are among the fruits of their labors.

The main merit of the first is not its description of the administrative procedures by which millions have been condemned to forced labor, for these have been described before. It lies rather in its analysis of the terrible phenomenon of mass deportation, of which less is known outside the Iron Curtain, except in the case of the notorious "dekulakization" process associated with the collectivization of Soviet agriculture during the period of the First Five Year Plan (1928-1932). Mr. Rousset documents in some detail the deportations from the Baltic states in 1941, and less fully the forcible evacuation of the populace of the Crimean and Chechen-Ingush Republics in 1946, in revenge for their pro-German attitude during the war.

The second of the books under review deals mainly with the stringent labor discipline imposed upon "free" Soviet workers, as distinct from those who work in forced labor camps. The condition of the "free" workers is almost as unfortunate as that of the unfree, for there is nothing to protect them from the decrees of an omnipotent state. They are often denied the right to choose their place or type of work; their trade unions have degenerated into agencies of regimentation rather than of protection; the workers are seldom free to leave their jobs; lateness and absenteeism are serious offenses. The dictatorship of the proletariat has become a dictatorship over the proletariat.

The non-Communist peoples of the world, and especially those of Europe, owe Mr. Rousset a debt of gratitude for his tireless exposure of conditions which, but for American statesmanship, might well have become theirs, not in 1984, but in 1954.

HASSMANN, HEINRICH. Oil in the Soviet Union. Translated from the German with the addition of much new information by Alfred M. Leeston. Pp. xvi, 173. Princeton, N. J.: Princeton University Press, 1953. $3.75.

The Russian oil industry is an area in which data are highly inadequate even after publication of reports delivered at the Moscow Congress of the Communist Party in October, 1952, containing oil production figures previously unavailable. Also, recent events in the Middle East point up this 1951 work in German by Dr. H. Hassmann, now translated into English, brought up to date, and enhanced in its usefulness by the addition of maps and numerous footnotes, by A. Leeston of Dallas.

The book's factual, nontechnical presentation provides much pertinent information not readily available elsewhere. Its second and third parts trace the historical development of the Soviet oil industry and contain a scrupulously fair inquiry into the industry's geographical distribution, production techniques, exports, and domestic consumption. The author failed to extend this valuable discussion as he might have if he had omitted entirely Part I, "The Basis of the Russian Oil Industry"; the few paragraphs which Dr. Hassmann could spare for each of the numerous topics, such as population, Russian history, Constitution, and the like, are too elementary to contribute much even to the knowledge of a reader entirely unfamiliar with the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics.

The fourth section, "Problems of the Russian Oil Industry," correlates Soviet oil with the country's economy, the world situation, and oil problems in the United States. Russia satisfies much of her requirements with coal and electricity where other countries would use oil, and Soviet demand cannot be compared with that of other nations. But the fact remains that Russia's oil output has not kept pace with either her own industrial production or with world oil output. The Soviet economic system must not be blamed for this, since, while hardly suited to European countries, it is "inherently justified" under Soviet conditions "unless the Soviet government is judged by the narrow criterion of production results."

The world's richest oil region is on Russia's doorstep, and oil deliveries from the Middle East, where Western military bases are being built, could solve all Soviet oil problems. Should Russia succeed, it would mean such an increase in Soviet economic power that "the political aspect of the world would be altered, too." On the other hand, says Dr. Hassmann, an artificial restriction of Russia's oil demand is not possible without endangering her economic and political prestige. In this lies the danger to peace.

Dr. Hassmann's intimate knowledge of, and nonpartisan approach to, a subject loaded with political implications makes this book a timely and useful contribution.

STERN, H. PETER. The Struggle for Poland. Pp. 79. Washington, D. C.: Public Affairs Press, 1953. $2.00.

The author presents us with an excellent sketch of the principal events concerning the Polish question during World War II with special reference to the Soviet-Polish conflict set in the context of East-West relationships. Most postwar writers on the Polish question, he writes, ignore "the difference between what was desirable and what was possible." The author disagrees with those who hold that "the struggle for democracy in Poland was hopeless from the start," but admits that "Western ideas of justice" could not have been imposed "without difficulty." As he sees it, the Western mistakes consisted "less of losing sight of a desirable solution than in diplomatic errors and a lack of careful planning in achieving it." Poland's chances of survival "as a democracy," he says, depended upon "Western diplomacy, not alone on Western ideals."

According to the author, Poland had fallen to Communist control before the Western powers became fully aware of Soviet aggressive designs. At Yalta, he says, the United States felt that formal acquiescence in the Russian border demands was the only means to supplant "the de facto government which was rapidly communizing Poland." Consequently, the earlier policy of postponing agreements on territorial questions until a postwar peace conference was abandoned. Had the Western Powers, he writes, insisted and been able to obtain more precise terms regarding the exact composition of the new government, a definite date for the election and its supervision, and a guarantee that the terms be faithfully executed, the Soviet attempts to subvert the Yalta agreement could have been prevented (pp. 61-62).

The author contrasts Soviet and American policies. The Russians "took great pains constantly to strengthen their position by seemingly minor moves"; the American efforts were "sporadic and usually exerted only after the problem had become acute." In the author's opinion the changing Polish scene demanded "continual assessment of new developments and prompt response to each individual situation as it arose." Instead the United States relied too heavily on "the few 'crucial' wartime conferences and overall agreements." Yet in spite of this speculation the author wonders if America's actions by themselves could have altered the chances for Polish independence. Stern concludes weakly that such responsibility as may rest with the United States is due in large part "to an undervaluation of the less dramatic tasks of diplomacy." What the author really says is that the independence of Poland was lost due to American diplomatic failures, but, even if our diplomacy had not failed, Poland might still have been lost. One is reminded of a quarterback who gambles on the fourth down; if the play works he becomes a great hero; if the play fails, heaps of criticism of all shades are showered upon him from the sidelines.

Thus, the fundamental question remains unanswered: Can a determined line of policy, emanating from within the Kremlin walls, based on perfidy and Machiavellianism and dedicated to world conquest, be effectively challenged by a democratic policy based on moral principles? Although Mr. Stern presents us with a concise and able discussion of the various ramifications of the Polish question, he does not add anything to what has already been written on the subject.

BORKENAU, FRANZ. European Communism. Pp. 564. New York: Harper & Brothers, 1953. $6.00.

This book is good medicine for "intellectuals" who opposed Fascist aggression and slave labor, but who later insisted on "academic neutrality" when confronted with the same phenomena under Soviet auspices. Borkenau's heavily documented factual masterpiece blows away the myths propagated by Frederick L. Schuman, Alvarez Del Vayo, Vera Micheles Dean, and others.

"Before the purge trials," writes Borkenau, "it had been perfectly possible for an ill-informed Westerner to be a genuine liberal and at the same time a genuine friend of the Soviet Union. After the shock of the trials, mental dishonesty was necessary to remain in that position." Ever since Willi Munzenberg perfected techniques of Communist conquest of the "intellectuals," the task of winning them over, "especially rich intellectuals in socially and financially assured positions, was the easiest task of all." In England and America "a sharp divergence emerged between the party's insignificance within the labor movement and its significance as a factor in intellectual life."

Analyzing Western policy and attitudes between 1941 and 1945, the author states that "enthusiasm for Russia and 'anti-fascism' merged into a blind delirium of subservience to Stalinism. . . . The communists had no need to propagandize Russia. That was done for them by the press, the radio, by society as a whole." Borkenau is particularly severe on Western policy for eastern Europe in this period: "All anti-Communists of eastern Europe were abandoned . . . the exact counterpart of the Munich policy." Referring primarily to Mihailovich of Yugoslavia and Kupa of Albania, he writes: "nothing could provide a Balkan leader with a more effective passport to eternity than unswerving loyalty to the West." Borkenau concludes that this appeasement was "not so much an error of judgment but a moral disease."

Borkenau sheds much light on the French and Spanish Popular fronts: "The fascist danger in France was largely imaginary. . . . The whole policy of the Popular Front was directed against an imaginary enemy." He quotes Krivitsky approvingly: "The Soviet Union seemed to have a grip on Loyalist Spain as if it were already a Soviet possession," and he then details the bloody roles played by Negrin and Del Vayo. The author thinks poorly of Blum as "naïve"; he shows how thousands of innocent Frenchmen were murdered by Communist "courts" in 1945, and he exposes the double roles played by D'Astier, Joinville, and Cot. His discussion of Jouhaux and Bidault casts some doubt on their anti-Communism. The role of Freemasonry as an ally of Communism in France is rather convincingly demonstrated.

Of Czechoslovakia, Borkenau comments: "Benes and the Czech Socialists gambled away their national independence (in 1948) by a unique combination of folly, sentimental Panslavism, and lack of pluck at the decisive juncture." As for Yugoslavia, he proves that Tito's Partisans "arose, not as an anti-German, but as an anti-Chetnik movement."

This definitive work on Soviet foreign policy and Communist development in Europe urges the Western democracies to "severely repress the clandestine acts of the Communist parties." He concludes that "If we have nothing to oppose Stalin but a passive policy of containment—then we shall be defeated."

WESTERN CONTINENTAL EUROPE

WHITE, THEODORE H. Fire in the Ashes: Europe in Mid-Century. Pp. 405. New York: William Sloane Associates, 1953. $5.00.

A man walked up to the Duke of Wellington, Britain's most famous and most handsome warrior, and said: "Are you Mr.

Smith?" The Duke replied: "Sir, if you believe that, you will believe anything." Mr. White's report on Europe in mid-century is built around three true stories, namely, those of Pierre Bertaut, former resistance fighter and ex-head of the French secret police; of Willi Schlieker, one-time aid to Hitler's boss of industry, Speer, later a small-time dealer in the gray and black market for steel, and now a Ruhr baron; and of Joe Curry, ex-miner, trusted official of the Labour Government and now a labor relations director of the Coal Board. According to Mr. White, the stories of their respective countries are "refracted" in these individuals which means, I presume, that Mr. White considers them representative, nay typical, specimens of their national societies.

Now by this method, it would be just as easy to tell the story of France by the story of, let us say, a well-known novelist, one-time Communist, resistance fighter, and now Gaullist deputy; the story of Germany by that of a former high bureaucrat, member of a conspiracy to overthrow Hitler, and now editor of a stanchly democratic periodical; and the story of Britain by that of a successful "spiv" who now dabbles in left-wing Labour politics. There is as much that is characteristically French, German, and British "refracted" in these individual lives as there is in Mr. White's selections. Mr. White's method is useless because it is arbitrary. Since it is arbitrary it is necessarily tendentious: Messrs. Bertaut, Schlieker, and Curry are Messrs. Bertaut, Schlieker, and Curry; they are not Mr. Smith (or M. Dupont or Herr Mueller).

It is Mr. White's thesis that, at the end of World War II, the peoples of Europe wanted a social revolution and that we wanted them to have it. Though, in Europe, some people and certain political factions may have wanted just that, other people and political groups wanted reconstruction and restoration, peace and quiet. The American people, as distinct from a small band of officials privileged to experiment abroad with doctrines which they were unable to apply at home, were emphatically disinterested in fomenting social revolutions in Europe. It is not surprising that Mr. White, armed with his "revolutionary" thesis, views the perennial crisis of France as caused by the frustrations of the brave hopes of the Resistance (the seamy sides of which he appears to ignore) and the reactionary mentality of French capitalists. But it is surprising that he fails to mention that France is saddled with an impossible constitution which would gum up the works of the most progressive national society, and the absurdities of which are stanchly defended, because of strictly partisan considerations, by the Left.

There are lastly some internal inconsistencies. On page 92, Mr. White writes that "the major organs of the French press [are] now back in the hands of the same men who had run them before the war." I must confine myself here to controverting this statement on the basis of the information supplied by Mr. White on page 346: "[The French Communist Party] is the greatest publishing enterprise in all France, owning and controlling more daily newspapers [sixteen] than any other publishing group. . . ." This publishing eminence was achieved by the simple expedient of "liberating" existing newspapers from real and alleged collaborators and hanging on to them. In any case, Communist affluence represents a considerable displacement in the control of the French press as compared with the prewar situation.

It is with a deep sense of regret that I put aside Mr. White's volume. There is much in it that bespeaks keen powers of observation and sensitive response to injustice and misery. His discussion of the power struggle within Russia, for example, is distinguished by originality as well as analytical skill. As it is, infatuation with a shaky thesis and hasty generalizations destroy the book's usefulness. The title is indeed appropriate: fire in the ashes emits some heat and smoke but hardly any light.

TAYLOR, A. J. P. Rumours of Wars. Pp. ix, 262. London: Hamish Hamilton, 1952 (New York: British Book Centre, 1953. $3.25).

There are thirty-five delightfully readable essays in this volume dealing with the history of war, politics, and diplomacy in modern Europe. For the purpose of describing them, there are no precise categories into which they can be classified. Almost all of them, however, reflect two firm convictions of the author: first, that a historian has the duty and privilege of making moral evaluations, and, secondly, that the triumph of western civilization depends upon a stanch adherence to democratic idealism.

In commentaries on Herbert Butterfield (History and Human Relations) and George F. Kennan (American Diplomacy, 1900-1950), Mr. Fisher challenges the "detachment" of those who claim to write history from a morally-detached, "realistic" viewpoint and who reject a foreign policy based upon moral ideals. In his discussion of Kennan and in two other eloquent pieces at the end of the volume, he mobilizes the evidence of Western man's success in relying upon democratic principle and contends that the West, in its international dealings, must answer intolerance with tolerance, intransigence with a readiness to compromise, and unquestioning enthusiasm with scepticism, and must deal with grievances by redressing them.

In a number of essays on Germany, the author's recurrent theme is the tendency of some historians, in common with others, to gloss over that country's record of aggression. Britain, he apparently feels, is in danger of forgetting, as it did in the thirties, that the traditional basis of its security is the balance of power on the continent.

As for the Soviet Union, the author concludes (in an interesting piece entitled "Can We Agree with the Russians?") that, though World War III is not inevitable, stable agreement between the two systems is impossible. But the way to deal with the Soviet Union, he says, is to stop giving the impression that we doubt our ability to negotiate, that we have lost faith in the efficacy of democratic procedure, and that we think Communist propaganda is bound to win out against ours in an open field of argument. Communism, he claims, thrives on hardship. It is therefore in the interest of the West to negotiate with Russia for mutual economic advantage.

Every rise in the Russian standard of living would, he believes, lessen the punch of Communism as a fighting creed. Russia's strength for war is in the numbers and incredible toughness of its manpower. Economic development, says Fisher, "will both use up the manpower and soften the men."

GÖRLITZ, WALTER, and HERBERT A. QUINT. Adolf Hitler: Eine Biographie. Pp. 658. Stuttgart: Steingrüben Verlag, 1952. No price.

This is the first complete biography of Hitler to appear in Germany after the war. Both authors are specialists in writing popular biographies and political history. Görlitz in particular has been a prolific biographer of quite an assortment of people: Hannibal, George V, Lincoln, Mussolini, Stresemann, to cite just a few. He may also be known to American readers for his History of the German General Staff.

The biography is written for popular consumption. It gives evidence of a wide search of material, and its value is enhanced by a name index with a family tree. The authors evidently did considerable research on Hitler's origin and youth, and found new material not previously published. However, one often wishes that dubious statements or obvious conjectures were documented by footnotes.

Görlitz and Quint relate how Hitler's views of man and the world were conditioned by the frustrated German nationalism in the multi-ethnic Dual Monarchy. This book offers a vivid image of Hitler's embittering struggle for livelihood and self-respect in Vienna. The peculiar microcosm of a down-and-out orphan, a man without roots, leads him to project for himself a jaundiced image of man and world. In the chaos after World War I Hitler's life starts to become interwoven with history. He is a catalyst to the rise of the Nazi Party, and one sees how his extraordinary skills in demagoguery and intrigue lead to his becoming its Fuehrer—eventually undisputed and crowned by charisma.

After an attention-holding account of Hitler's rise to power, the book levels off in content and quality, especially on the last years of Nazi rule. Here it occasionally lacks depth of analysis, and is inadequate in history. For instance, on one of the most significant points, Hitler's real intentions, the authors would have us believe that the announcement in November 1937 to von Neurath, von Blomberg, Göring, von Fritsch, and Raeder of his proposed conquests was not really a policy statement. Internal evidence from the famous notes of Colonel Hossbach and evidence from the biography itself contradict this view. To cite just one, Hitler enjoins the group that his statements are to be treated as his last will and testament in case of his premature death.

The authors were never quite able to cut the umbilical cord connecting them to their German origin and their German audience. Their bias is strongly nationalist, not sympathetic to the Weimar Republic or its institutions. Though they bring out the self-seeking identification in Hitler of personal ego and political super-ego, and particularly the consequences of Hitler's va banque game in foreign affairs, they cannot rid themselves of a considerable amount of awe of Hitler's person. In the final chapters, pity for their fatherland is mingled with pity for Hitler. Hence terror, violence, fear, death, mass slaughter, of the very essence of Nazism, appear in small letters in this book. The over-all impression is one which would not leave an un-reconstructed Nazi dissatisfied.

In other respects, too, the book often tries to be all things to all men. We find research mixed with conjecture, as in the unnecessary projection of Hitler's thoughts and feelings.

These approaches appear in high relief by a contrast with Alan Bullock's Hitler: A Study in Tyranny (New York: Harper, 1952), also published in 1952. It is clear in Bullock, as it is not in Görlitz, that Hitler stood against the Christian tradition and the messages of human rights and individual dignity of Western civilization. Bullock does not subdue the evidence of Hitler's evil and duplicity.

This German biography of Hitler and the postwar German autobiographies lead this reviewer reluctantly to the conclusion that most German participants in the recent holocaust have not been able to rid themselves of the shadow of strong biases and national identification.

WARBURG, JAMES P. Germany: Key to Peace. Pp. xix, 344. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1953. $4.75.

Few Americans have given more attention to the postwar problem of Germany than James P. Warburg. Eight books and at least seven pamphlets on the subject have come from his pen since 1944; in addition, he has delivered numerous lectures, forwarded communications to Washington, and so forth. The present volume draws rather heavily on his earlier works and indeed its main purpose is to bring them down to date, pointing particularly to developments under Truman-Acheson and Eisenhower-Dulles. For the most part the discussion is provocative in character, and one can hardly question the deep sincerity which motivates the author despite the almost devastating criticism which he makes of what he regards as bungling on the part of the United States in virtually everything attempted in Western Europe since 1945.

Scholars may find somewhat trying both the author's tendency to see many complicated problems in terms of clear black or white, right or wrong, completely foolish or eminently wise and also his fondness for dramatic conclusions—for example, America's "falling in love" with the cold war and devil theory of the world crisis—but they will also discover a considerable amount of substance in his analysis. Thinking persons cannot dismiss the major queries which he makes whether or not they accept his arguments. While he may seem to overdo the ignorance of Europe on the part of informed Americans, it is difficult to challenge his emphasis on the lack of knowledge and even interest in German problems among the mass of United States citizens.

After reaching the very depths of pessimism on the basis of the past record Mr. Warburg finds it worthwhile to offer a six-point program which he thinks might still save the day. This involves returning territory beyond the Oder-Neisse Line—except for East Prussia and Upper Silesia—to a united Germany, putting the Saar under a United Nations mandate for some years, neutralizing Germany under a peace treaty providing disarmament for five to ten years, extending freedom in economic and political organization to the Germans, and so forth. And he appears to find some reason for believing that these could be achieved despite the recent attitude of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics if the United States were really desirous of preserving world peace.

LITCHFIELD, EDWARD H., and ASSOCIATES. Governing Postwar Germany. Pp. xvii, 661. Ithaca, N. Y.: Cornell University Press, 1953. $7.75.

This is a very timely volume. It evaluates the kind of Germany to be incorporated into the Western power complex at a time when opinion is so heavily weighted on the why and how of incorporation.

Seventeen authors with both scholarly and practical experience in German affairs have contributed the twenty chapters of this work which treats "the functions, the processes, and the levels of government" in Western Germany and, to a lesser degree, in Eastern Germany. Emphasis is rightly focused upon contemporary German institutions rather than upon military government. However, most chapters weigh its impact and that of the Imperial, Weimar, and Nazi eras. Useful appendixes include the Basic Law and the Occupation Statute.

In the period since May 8, 1945, characterized by Professor Litchfield as one of "Occupational Legal Sovereignty," and without precedent in international law, Germany has again achieved considerable freedom in molding her political institutions.

Chapters on local government, state government, the federal Constitution, the judiciary, and personnel management both implicitly and explicitly delineate a growing conservatism. A substantial return to the Weimar pattern and strong centralizing tendencies are indicated. Professors Friedrich and Spiro attribute much of this growth to the delegation of specific functions to the federal government instead of to the Laender. Similarly, Professor Brecht presents an excellent essay on the return of bureaucracy to its traditionally pre-eminent place in German affairs. Legal rather than operative norms govern administrative science, asserts Mr. Glaser, because the Federal Ministries interpret laws executed by the Laender.

Chapters on budgetary problems, legislation, public finance, and police confirm the proliferation of federal authority through such means as the use of concurrent legislative powers in taxation, federal emergency powers over Laender police, and the extreme authority of administrative departments over financial legislation. A notable exception is the decentralized banking system described by Mr. Howard Jones.

The search for stability, the resurgence of traditionalism in political parties, and an analysis of postwar elections combine with an excellent functional discussion of the electoral process in two chapters by Mr. Scammon. Through no fault of the authors, the most recent Bonn election results are not included.

Herta Kraus deplores the lack of an ideology and of the Weimar client participation in Health and Welfare administration.

The traditional philosophy of a special education for the intellectually gifted beginning, for the most part, after the four-year Grundschule persists.

By and large, this is an excellent reference work. However, one must observe that a better balanced work would have resulted if the informative chapter on Labor by Professor Taylor had been accompanied by one on business; that a basic dilemma of East German government is that of reconciling its position as a Soviet satellite with the political necessity of appealing to German unity sentiment; and that in the field of foreign policy, Germany's freedom from an armament burden is an important reason for her economic viability and perhaps for the success of her current regime.

NOBLEMAN, ELI E. American Military Government Courts in Germany: Their Role in the Democratization of the German People. Pp. x, 261. Washington, D. C.: The Provost Marshall General's School (copyright 1953, by the author), 1950. No price.

The author of this volume, Dr. Eli E. Nobleman, served as the Chief of the Military Government Courts Branch, Legal Division, Office of Military Government for Bavaria, Germany. In this position he equipped himself admirably to analyze the documentary materials which are the heart of his study and to relate them to the American objective of democratizing the German people. Although the book is published as Training Packet No. 52 of the Provost Marshall General's School and is designed to provide source material for instructional purposes, it will prove useful to students of international law and to all who are interested in American occupation policies of the last 130 years.

Dr. Nobleman begins with a chapter on the international law applying to occupational tribunals, a chapter which introduces the discussion appropriately although it adds little or nothing to our understanding of the subject. In Chapter II, he deals with American military government tribunals prior to World War II, giving us a concise statement and a fair evaluation of the practice of the past; he brings out that for the most part those tribunals (1) were staffed by army officers, (2) conformed closely to procedures followed by court-martials, (3) lacked many of the safeguards of Anglo-American justice, and (4) concerned themselves primarily with the protection of American armed forces, leaving to the indigenous courts cases involving infractions of local law. The most illuminating chapter of all is the third, which explains with convincing concreteness the organization, composition, jurisdiction, and procedure of the occupational tribunals in Germany from the combat period of World War II through the postsurrender occupation. Chapters IV and V deal, respectively, with civilian military courts and with military government courts as a force for democracy. Thirteen appendixes to the book provide the reader with orders and proclamations relating to occupational tribunals from the Mexican War on down to the present.

Dr. Nobleman gives ample support for his conclusion that "American military government courts have played a more important role in demonstrating democracy and its advantages to the German people than any other governmental operation." By their essential fairness the courts were much more than an agency for the protection of American armed forces; they were "guarantors of the fundamental rights of the inhabitants of the occupied area." Those courts won the confidence of the German people and provided an atmosphere in which they could reorient their thinking.

REITLINGER, GERALD. The Final Solution: The Attempt to Exterminate the Jews of Europe, 1939-1945. Pp. 634. London: Vallentine, Mitchell & Co. (distributed in the U. S. by Beechhurst Press, N. Y.), 1953. $6.00.

Last February I met in Germany a distinguished group of Germans discussing the German-Jewish problem, and the majority of them did not know that the "final solution," or general liquidation of the Jews, was a plan set by the Hitler government. The German youth does not know and is not told about what went on, and therefore cannot have any sense of responsibility concerning the extermination of the Jews, and others, in the gas chambers of Auschwitz and other camps.

The digesting of the material, its evaluation, and the reporting on what was meant by the "final solution" are indeed a major undertaking. Therefore the book by Gerald R. Reitlinger, The Final Solution: The Attempt to Exterminate the Jews of Europe 1939-1945, deserves recognition.

Reitlinger starts his narrative with a chapter on forced emigration and pogroms in September 1939, but the story really begins with the "week of the broken glass" when mass arrests of Jews followed the assassination of van Rath, third German Legation counselor in Paris, by Grynszpan. Interestingly enough, the term "final solution" is already found in 1938 German Foreign Office papers, but its meaning at that time was not general physical destruction but forced mass emigration—expulsion of the Jews as paupers.

Apparently, the decision to exterminate the Jews physically was the result of deliberations by Hitler, Himmler, and his brutal Gestapo henchman Heydrich, chief of the Reich Security Office in Berlin until he was shot by Czechoslovak partisans near Lidice. To the inner circle of the people preparing the plan to kill as many Jews as possible belonged more than 200 officials—by the way, not all of them Nazis.

The value of Reitlinger's matter-of-fact presentation is that all the material about the happenings in the various European countries is given with sources, and there appear no gaps left open. The only issue we have to take with Reitlinger is his appendix, "Statistical Summary of the Final Solution," where he tries to prove—though there is no proof possible—that instead of the accepted figure of 6 million Jews "only" 4.5 to 4.7 million Jews were killed.

All available sources—the testimony of the Nazis before the International Tribunal, the investigations of Jewish and non-Jewish scientific institutes, and the studies of the German population expert Professor H. Arntz—have confirmed the figure of 6.1 million Jews, all of whom were killed in the gas chambers; some died also from such reasons as starvation, epidemics, and suicide. With that exception Reitlinger's book, The Final Solution, appears to me the best and most thorough study on this question, and I agree fully with the author when he exclaims: "The mood of Nuremberg has passed. Men whose conduct was far worse than that of most of those who were found guilty and hanged are alive and free; others are released from their prisons from time to time in some confused notion of appeasement."

FORD, FRANKLIN L. Robe and Sword: The Regrouping of the French Aristocracy After Louis XIV. Pp. xiii, 280. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1953. $6.00.

In the 1770's and 1780's the nobility of the robe, the personnel of the 31 sovereign courts of France, took the lead in defending aristocratic privilege. Professor Ford in this important and illuminating book finds that the years 1715 to 1748 were the crucial ones: it was during this period that the noble judges, some 2,000 to 2,300 in all out of a total of about 190,000 nobles, assumed this leadership.

The reign of Louis XIV was marked by a curious ambivalence towards the nobility. They received all the honors, as well as pensions and sinecures; but at the same time they were excluded from civil office (except the high administrative posts), deprived of influence in the shaping of policy (the few ministers excepted), and forced at times even to pay taxes! No wonder then that when the king died in 1715, the upper ranks of the nobility hoped to regain political power for the protection of their privileged position. It was however soon evident that only the noblesse de robe had the qualifications necessary for this task.

The judges of the sovereign courts, like other officials, had for centuries bought their offices, a system regularized and stabilized by the famous "Paulette" decree of 1614; but, in addition, the high judiciary had by the middle of the century acquired hereditary nobility by the very purchase of office. It took some time before the robe was accepted by the non-robe nobility—this social fusion was completed during the years 1715–1748. Moreover, both in wealth and education the robe was well above the great majority of nonrobe nobility. Besides, the noblesse de robe had functions. They had the highest judicial as well as many administrative responsibilities; but, most important, the right of remonstrance gave the Paris Parlement the opportunity to interfere with the actions of the Crown, and to acquire even popular favor by such interference. Practically quashed by Louis XIV in 1673, the right of remonstrance was revived in 1715 when the Regent found it necessary to win the support of the Paris Parlement to upset the will of the late king. The right of remonstrance became the most powerful weapon for the retention of aristocratic privilege.

Since the noblesse de robe was the only noble rank which combined political power, social position, wealth, and education, it is easy to see (thanks to Dr. Ford) why it took over the leadership of the nobility. And also it is clear that the monarchy was doomed when it succumbed to the concept of a medieval nobility demanding its privileges.

The reviewer's only criticism of this admirable book (incidentally, it is also attractively illustrated—a welcome change in the printing of monographs) is that it might have been carried further, at least to 1771.

DURAND, CH. Le Conseil d'état Napoléonien: l'Emploi des conseillers d'état et des maîtres des requêtes en dehors du conseil. No. 45, Nouvelle Série, Annales de la Faculté de Droit d'Aix. Pp. 142. Aix-en-Provence, France: Bibliothèque de l'Université, 1952. No price.

Administrative history is a relatively neglected field. For that reason, this brief monograph (Professor Durand's second on the Napoleonic Council of State) will be useful to specialists. It is consciously aimed at that audience alone.

The scope of the volume is narrow. Its single purpose is to show how Napoleon used the members of his reorganized Council of State as a staff of top-level troubleshooters in administering his Empire. These special assignments extended to almost every conceivable aspect of administration, both in France and in the satellite areas. M. Durand classifies them under four headings: (a) membership on other governmental boards or commissions; (b) short-term assignments as inspectors or diplomats; (c) long-term appointments on detached service, especially in the colonies or in conquered provinces; (d) part-time posts in Paris itself, involving continued active service in the Council of State as well. So common was this practice that about four-fifths of the Councillors served at one time or another on some sort of special assignment.

Napoleon's purpose was not merely to use trusted advisers to get difficult jobs done. Rather, it was to keep those advisers from degenerating into mere theoreticians, divorced from the practical problems of government. The Emperor, a man of action himself, never overcame his suspicion of the cloistered man of thought. He felt that if the men who drafted his laws could be immersed frequently in the tasks of daily administration, they might be protected against "that systematizing spirit, that tendency to ideology and metaphysics" which must always afflict policy-formulators who think too much and act too little.

M. Durand believes that Napoleon's experiment was, on the whole, a wise and successful one, and that its drawbacks were clearly outweighed by its advantages. He admits, however, that there can be too much of a good thing, and that the Emperor carried the practice to excess. The Councillors' energies were so often diverted to other duties that the Council of State was hampered in carrying out its own functions. One is reminded of more recent experiments in Washington, where policy planners find themselves constantly drawn into the stream of daily action and diverted from their effort to take a long view.

Incidentally, the precedent set by Napoleon has been followed to this day. Councillors of State are still used on special assignment, although far less frequently than in Napoleon's time.

CHAPMAN, BRIAN. Introduction to French Local Government. Pp. 238. London: George Allen & Unwin (distributed in the U. S. by The Macmillan Company), 1953. $4.25.

This well-written monograph fills an important gap in the literature on local government in contemporary free Europe. As the basis for his study, the author, one of the younger British political scientists, has combined thorough documentary analysis with direct observation and interviewing in France itself. Following an interesting introductory description of the framework of French local political and administrative institutions, there are illuminating commentaries on the interaction of local politics and administration, on the riddle of local government finance, and on the operation of the French system of central control over local government. The study also includes an up-to-date survey of the problems of government in the Paris metropolitan area.

Mr. Chapman rightly points out that "local government in England has hinged on the development of particular services in local areas, whereas in France the emphasis has been on the evolution of local institutions." This being so, the French tend to place local government efficiency on a lower value scale than the insurance of effective safeguards against abuses of authority—a behavior trait, be it noted, equally conspicuous at the national level. Even so, in Mr. Chapman's view, French municipal government is efficient in the sense of "the prompt, smooth and predictable passage of matters requiring decision to a known authority [by way of prefect and mayor], who can and does take those decisions on his own responsibility." This reviewer's experience with French local authorities both before and since World War II would suggest a considerably less favorable estimate, but perhaps Mr. Chapman sampled a different segment of the "departmental" and communal bureaucracy.

On the other hand, the author properly contends that "there is more interest in local matters and more vitality in local government in France" than in England. One important reason for this lies in the fact that in France but not in England local political office is the natural stepping-stone to national political careers. As a distinguished French scholar observed years ago, France has had more great mayors than prime ministers, and the postwar situation does not appear to have changed much in this respect.

One special point made by Mr. Chapman is worth noting here. The ill-fated experiment with "regionalization" attempted by the Vichy regime has made it unlikely that any further extension of regional administration will take place in the near future. The département, although artificial in origin, is now so much a part of the French pattern of parliamentary politics and elections that it seems a fixture, administrative economy to the contrary notwithstanding.

FITCH, GERALDINE. Formosa Beachhead. Pp. ix, 267. Chicago: Henry Regnery Company, 1953. $3.50.

Formosa Beachhead reflects valuable personal experiences of the author on two levels. Mrs. Fitch knows both the China mainland and Formosa through more than passing contacts (she lived in China for a good part of her life, and she visited Formosa three times in recent years); and she fought vigorously for an American China policy that would recognize Mao Tse-tung and his followers for the genuine Communists they always were. Mrs. Fitch met many Chinese who were prominent in Nationalist China and who today on Formosa and in the United States of America are upholding the banner of Free China; and she also met Americans who, for a variety of reasons, cherished (and spread) illusions about the Chinese Communists. Thus she is well-prepared to understand the extraordinary mixture of misguided action and self-defeating passivity that characterized America's official attitude toward China during and after World War II.

Formosa is the starting point of her story. In a punchy and popular style she introduces her readers to the "Beautiful Isle," as the Portuguese called it, and to its people; and she returns to the Formosa story again when she later discusses the present government, its efforts at reform, and its military strength. Two chapters, "The Landlords! The Landlords of China!" and "Farmer Chang of Formosa," go far to counteract the often repeated misconceptions of tenancy conditions in pre-Communist China, and to point up the differences between the dishonest and enslaving Communist agrarian revolution on the Chinese mainland and the honest and constructive land reform accomplished recently by the Chinese Nationalists on Formosa.

The data included in these chapters deserve the widest attention. They raise important questions concerning the chances of a Nationalist return to the mainland. Mrs. Fitch is extremely optimistic about the success of such an enterprise. While sharing her desire to see the mainland Chinese liberated, the reviewer feels that the problems involved—and these are complex—should be studied with an eye on the socio-military developments in Russia during the first years of Soviet power.

The chapter headings, "Which Experts on China were Right?" "The White Paper—a Lie that Failed," "China Lobby?" and "Is America Safe?" indicate both the explosiveness of the American section of Mrs. Fitch's book and the frankly polemical way in which she deals with her subject. Particularly important is her discussion of the "China Lobby"—the Nationalist lobby, which was pathetically small and ineffective, and the Red China lobby, which was eminently and disastrously successful in shaping American public opinion. Few spokesmen of the anti-Communist camp are as familiar with certain details of the "China Lobby" as is Mrs. Fitch. Her presentation provides an urgently needed antidote to a much-publicized legend.

FEIS, HERBERT. The China Tangle: The American Effort in China from Pearl Harbor to the Marshall Mission. Pp. x, 445. Princeton, N. J.: Princeton University Press, 1953. $6.00.

"Tangle" is too mild a word for the apparently insoluble problems which confronted the American government in its wartime involvements with China. The inability of the administration—despite the most earnest efforts of all the highest officials involved—to effect an outcome conforming to the interests of the American and Chinese people (as understood by our government) is a somber chapter in recent history and an explosive issue in domestic politics. Herbert Feis lays before us this first objective account, based upon all the available American evidence, of what we tried to do and how we failed to bring about what was, perhaps, unattainable—a free, strong, democratic, and friendly China.

The study is more comprehensive than the State Department's "White Paper" on China, the United States Army's history of the China-Burma-India Theatre, or the published reminiscences of various participants. It is far more lucid than the reports of various Congressional investigating bodies that have pried into the subject. In pursuing his study Feis had generally free access to State Department archives, records on China in the Office of Chief of Military History of the Army, and, directly or indirectly, pertinent parts of the papers of Roosevelt, Morgenthau, Hopkins, and Hurley.

From reading this narrative it is amply evident how hard the American government worked to uphold China in the war against Japan, to restore it as a united and independent country, to secure for it a place of authority among the nations, and to avert the threatening civil war. In seeking these worthy ends there was always a great divergency between the Chinese and American governments concerning the necessary means. These fundamental divergencies, which arose from differences in culture, in strategic situation, in political and economic systems, are laid out clearly. China always demanded a greater voice in decisions and a greater volume of aid than America believed wise to grant. During the war, American planners had their eyes riveted upon Japan; the Nationalists had theirs fixed upon Russia and the Chinese Communists. After the war American officials clung to their vision of a peacefully united China; the two hostile parties in China clung each to the vision of supremacy over the other.

Events were transpiring in China—political and social conflicts, war weariness, inflation, famine, and wise or foolish acts of men—over which America had no control. Events were transpiring throughout the rest of the world—decisions in Russia or Japan, distant battles which shifted the balances of power and upset time tables and calculations, demobilization fever that robbed this country of its military might. All these were part of the China tangle. Feis does not indulge in praise and blame. The theory that a conspiracy within the American government brought about the loss of China finds no support in these carefully written pages. No single American or Chinese is harshly treated, though clashes in concept and personality are not concealed.

The note on which the excellent book closes is really its theme. Let us study again the record. But we "need not make excuses either to ourselves, the Chinese people, or the rest of the world" for having pursued the purposes in China that we did.

NORTH, ROBERT C. Moscow and Chinese Communists. Pp. ix, 306. Stanford, Calif.: Stanford University Press, 1953. $5.00.

Mr. North takes as his principal theme the story of the Soviet impact on the course of the Communist revolution in China. He approaches the question in the spirit of objective historiography, and employs a substantial documentation to support his analyses and conclusions. Since the Soviet impact on the Chinese Communist revolution was especially pronounced prior to 1935, about one-half of the volume deals with the events of the 1918-1935 period. Where Mr. North retells the fairly familiar parts of that story, his account will be of interest for the general reader; where he probes into more obscure historical questions, employing an original documentation derived from his personal interviews with some of the surviving actors—Chang Kuot'ao and M. N. Roy, in particular—Mr. North is speaking primarily to the specialist in the history of the period.

Sino-Soviet relations within the Communist apparatus of world revolution have been highly complex, and Mr. North faces their ramifications squarely. Thus, he examines the early orientation of Lenin and the Comintern toward China and the effects on subsequent Soviet policy toward China of the Stalin-Trotsky feud. Similarly, from the Chinese aspect, he traces internal political developments within the Chinese Communist Party before and after Mao Tse-tung's rise to a position of unchallenged control. The principal political relationships of the Kuomintang to the Chinese Communists necessarily receive some attention. Passing rather rapidly through the World War II period, Mr. North devotes two chapters to the recent period (1945-1953) of the civil war in China and the subsequent experiences of the Chinese Communists in the realms of domestic and foreign policy. In these concluding substantive chapters, the author considers the interests and policies of the United States as these are shaped by the unfolding of the revolutionary situation in China and by the new relationships between China and the Soviet Union.

Mr. North's book is not written in popular style, although he evidently seeks to bring a "message" to his readers concerning their attitude toward the emerging political situation in Asia. The evident intellectual integrity of the author constantly keeps the reader informed of the differences between conclusions based on scholarly documentation and conclusions derived from personal judgments and opinions. The volume itself, reviewed from a colorful, paper-bound copy, is a helpful addition to the bookshelf of contemporary world affairs.

BEARD, MARY R. The Force of Women in Japanese History. Pp. 196. Washington, D. C.: Public Affairs Press, 1953. $3.75.

Between 1935 and 1939 a committee of scholars in Tokyo, under the leadership of the then Baroness Ishimoto (now Mrs. Kanju Kato), prepared a series of biographical and historical sketches pertaining to Japanese women for an encyclopaedia on the world's women to have been published in Austria. The war prevented the issuance of this work, but the Japanese sketches have been assembled by Mary Beard and published in this volume. Half of the pieces concern women in Japanese court circles in ancient and medieval times; the remainder deal with social and political events in the modern age as they relate to women and women's rights. The final chapters, apparently written in 1950, bring the story up to the point of enactment by the Diet of legislation providing for the woman's ballot, and the encouragement by the government of population control measures.

Mrs. Beard has chosen to present the sketches with only a minimum of linguistic editing; consequently the reader may find them somewhat awkward in style and not a little opaque. The pieces are decidedly uneven, with some of them engaging in voluminous and often irrelevant detail, while others are broader in scope and more incisive in content.

The role of women in Japanese social and cultural history is a topic of first-rate importance, and one that badly needs thorough and insightful treatment. Interesting as these sketches may be, they provide little more information than may be obtained from existing standard English-language works on Japan. The book contains no analysis of the position of women in Japanese patterns of value, nor in the distinctive hierarchical, yet achievement-oriented system of Japanese social relations. Also lacking is a study of the great differences in the roles of women in social classes, communities, and occupational groups. For these reasons the book's chief value lies in its simple biographical flavor and often charming treatment of the Japanese scene, particularly in ancient elite circles.

BATTISTINI, LAWRENCE H. Introducing Asia. Pp. xiv, 289. New York: John Day Company, 1953. $3.75.

Introducing Asia, by Lawrence H. Battistini, is a generally sound but extremely brief historical introduction to Eastern Asia and the Indian subcontinent. Despite the rather expansive title (this reviewer anticipated a work of at least a thousand pages) the book contains nothing at all on Western Asia and runs the whole gamut of Indian history in 35 pages. China, Japan, Korea, Southeast Asia, and the Southwest Pacific are treated in the rest of a slim 264 pages of text, from which must be subtracted 17 pages of maps (very worthwhile ones) and sketches.

With such brevity the author must, of course, cover centuries in paragraphs or even in sentences, and he must depend upon generalization or implication to carry the subject across the valleys to the mountain tops on which alone he has time to alight. Hence supreme care must be exercised in the choice of almost every word, particularly so those key words of "implication." It is to the credit of the author that most of his words are well chosen, and his generalizations and implications, though over-simple, usually set a clear projection in the right direction.

Occasionally they do not, however, as in the following cases (reviewer's italics): page 20 places the Mohammedan invasions of India in the "early centuries after Christ" (perhaps before Mohammed was born?); pages 46-51 fail to consider Mongols and Manchus as part of a general Chinese northern frontier problem, and have Mongols violating Chinese traditions less than Manchus (the opposite being more likely); page 70 has the Jesuits in Ming times enjoying success until persecutions "set in" (rather invited by Rome?); pages 180 ff. give no explanation of how or why the Japanese militarists after 1930 "began exerting a dominating influence over the civil government"; page 184's "However, President Franklin D. Roosevelt," would better read "Moreover, President . . ."; page 231 makes Pakistan "constitutionally" a "theocracy," which it is not; page 233 has American policy bringing the Filipinos toward self-government "after World War I," which would seem to give the unsympathetic Republicans of the 1920's credit for Wilsonian and Rooseveltian steps in that direction; page 206 ff. and page 253, on the American occupation of Japan and Korea, respectively, seem tinged with an overly rosy glow.

There are some errors in dates and spelling: for example, read 1638 for 1689 (p. 10); 9 A.D. for 8 B.C. (p. 44); 1882 for 1878 (p. 146); Pan for P'an but Ch'ien for Chien (p. 46); Chu for Chuh (p. 165); dates of early Chinese dynasties are rounded off mercilessly (p. 39).

These shortcomings detract from the book, but they are not numerous enough to spoil it. The further reading and source lists at the end of the book show the author's acquaintance with and use of numerous standard texts and special studies in the field. For the uninitiated general reader Introducing Asia can serve as a pleasant, easy, and yet sufficiently reliable introduction to a vast and complex field of knowledge.

LILIENTHAL, ALFRED M. What Price Israel. Pp. viii, 274. Chicago: Henry Regnery Company, 1953. $3.95.

The establishment of an independent Israel has given rise to some speculation as to what the relationship would be between world Jewry, particularly American Jews, and the new state. The reason for the wonderment lies perhaps in the fact that the event was in a number of ways unique in history—the creation of a state ex nihilo, so to speak, by the efforts of people scattered throughout the world but at the same time united by the bonds of a common history and religion. No one wondered what the relationship of American Czechs, Poles, or Lithuanians would be towards their countries of origin after these achieved their independence following World War I, also with the indispensable assistance of Americans, for that was considered as a "natural" occurrence. Yet, basically, the case of Israel is not any different. Only the circumstances are.

After a flurry of excitement over an admittedly remarkable achievement, the Jews, like other ethnic groups in America with a similar experience, are "getting used to the idea." They have been showing, to an ever diminishing degree, be it noted, an interest in the new state, which expresses itself chiefly in monetary contributions. A tiny number, perhaps much smaller than in the case of the above-mentioned nationalities, have even gone to settle there. But beyond that Jews, even when Zionists, remain unquestionably attached as much as any other ethnic group, as other Americans, to their country, which is the United States.

Mr. Lilienthal, however, fears that this is not the case. He feels that the whole effort of American Jews in helping the Palestinian Jews to gain their independence and their subsequent interest in Israel amount to little less than disloyalty to America. He, therefore, felt duty-bound to write this book to enlighten the American public of the true state of things.

The book is largely devoted to an account of the political efforts of American Jews on behalf of Israel. Now, politics, whether one likes it or not, often involves "ugly" tactics, manipulations, and pressures of all kinds. This undoubtedly was also true in this instance. The author, however, inclines to see in these political activities a kind of sinister plot on the part of American Zionists to sell out American interests. Non-Jews who have been helping in the efforts, from former President Truman, Mrs. Roosevelt, and various senators, congressmen, and governors down to mayors and other civic leaders, are suspected of being either cheap politicians, disregarding American welfare, fools, or dupes of the Zionists. In some cases, they are pictured as individuals seeking expiation for sins they feel they have committed against the Jews and thus relieving their guilty consciences. Mr. Lillienthal somehow cannot conceive of such persons taking an active interest in this "un-American" affair except for ulterior motives. He is bitter, cynical, and even abusive when writing of their role in the Zionist effort. On the other hand, active opponents of Israel—advocates of a pro-Arab policy—are considered as being, by this very fact, humanitarians working for the best interests of America.

Thus, what supposedly was to have been an objective evaluation of an historical event and its implications for America and American Jews, designed to clarify an issue presumably beclouded by misleading propaganda, turns out to be a one-sided and extremely subjective interpretation of it which the reader is asked to accept as fact.

PATAI, RAPHAEL. Israel Between East and West: A Study in Human Relations. Pp. xiv, 348. Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society of America, 1953. $4.50.

Geographically, Israel is situated in the Middle East; its social-economic-political-cultural structure is, however, based on Western patterns. More than half of its present population is European or American born, and the rest is of Asiatic and African origin. During the first four years of its existence (1948-52), the State of Israel doubled its population by absorbing some 700,000 immigrants, one-half of whom came from Africa and Asia and the other half from Western countries. On the crossroads between East and West, Israel, in its internal demographic structure and rapidly changing socio-cultural values, presents an interesting field to the social scientist.

Professor Patai, having lived in Jerusalem for some 14 years prior to the establishment of the State of Israel and having visited Israel twice in the last five years, has attempted to treat the topic from the human relations angle. Professor Patai approaches his study with sympathy, with the command of the language of the country, and with access to its current publications; it is regrettable that the result is far from satisfactory.

The author's long historical digressions are not always illuminating and are often superfluous. The book contains many statistical tables, quoted from reliable sources, but Professor Patai quite often applies the statistics of 1939-40 to the entirely different scene of the 1950's. Again, it is one thing to cite statistics of 1950 for illustration purposes but not quite justifiable to draw "scientific" conclusions from constantly changing figures relating to the short period of Israel's existence as a State. The sources used by the author are a mixed lot; alongside most reliable ones, the author sometimes depends too much on a newspaper article. At times the informed reader will wonder where the author gathered, for instance, that "the most numerous Oriental Jewish community [in Israel] insists on separate schools for their own children" (pp. 284-5). It just is not so.

However, the main shortcoming of the book is a more serious one. The author embarked on his study with the preconceived basic premise that the European-American born Jews in Israel and those who arrived from Asia and Africa represent the clash between Western and Eastern civilizations. Glamorizing the Eastern culture and tradition, he bemoans the Western Jews' "colonial" attitude towards what they consider their "inferior" Eastern brethren and their attempt to force westernization on them. The premise does not hold true in Israel. Many of the facts cited by the author in proof of his theory are of a temporary and passing nature, some of them greatly changed even in the few months since the publication of the book.

The 700,000 immigrants from fifty-odd countries, districts and territories, coming from all corners of the earth, have brought with them into Israel fifty-odd languages and cultures representing worlds apart, ranging from medieval times to the twentieth-century atomic age. These newcomers have joined a community of an equal number of Jews, two-thirds of whom have been living in the country less than 15 years, having also arrived from numerous countries with varying backgrounds. Add to that the 170,000 Arabs living in Israel—a mixed lot of Moslem and Christian communities—and you get an unusual melting pot—all of this is in a comparatively small country where an old-new State and cultural society are being rapidly built and expanded, where the country is coping with great economic odds, and where politically it is not yet at peace with its neighbors. The country and its people are facing an interesting challenge, which bears watching. But the problems besetting Israel and their impact on the human relations within its borders are somewhat different from what they appear to be in the book under review.

KOENIG, NATHAN. A Comprehensive Agricultural Program for Puerto Rico. Pp. xii, 299. Washington, D. C.: United States Department of Agriculture, in co-operation with the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico, 1953. $1.75 (paper).

Koenig, Special Assistant to the Secretary of Agriculture in the United States, produced this study in co-operation with some 100 agricultural experts in Puerto Rico organized in 14 task forces. The book presents very extensive, detailed information concerning most aspects of agriculture and rural life in Puerto Rico and is useful for their improvement. The effective utility of the book has been enhanced by the series of conferences on the Island in which Mr. Koenig took part following its publication, by the extensive reports about the book in the newspapers, and now by its use in the public school system. This is entirely consonant with the practice of the Government of the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico, which stimulates research about its basic problems and then uses the research extensively in drafting its policy and in launching its operations.

Agriculture provides 40 per cent of the national income of Puerto Rico, which is too low for a reasonable level of living (the per capita income is about four and a half times greater on the Mainland). If present knowledge about seeds and cultivation were used, food production, exclusive of sugar (which cannot be expanded beyond its legal quota of 1,080,000 tons), could be increased 171 per cent in about ten or fifteen years. Improvement and diversification would increase the production of many crops for the local as well as the export market: for example, oranges could be increased 289 per cent, avocados 295 per cent, sweet potatoes 252 per cent, bananas 97 per cent, corn 155 per cent, and cotton 321 per cent. To attain these goals, three factors must be greatly improved and expanded: education, capital and credit, and market facilities.

The definition of these goals and of the factors which would make them attainable in about a decade is a valuable instrument for the improvement of agriculture and the level of living in Puerto Rico. The detailed information facilitates planning and operations to diversify and modernize food production. But the difficulty which is not sufficiently recognized is the cost of improvement. Only 53 per cent of rural children of school age are in school despite the fact that the government spends over one-fourth its budget for education. Similarly, where will capital be found for the cost of improvements in farm operations and for the purchase of family farms? Development always hinges upon improved education and increases of capital, but their cost in low income economies can only be met very slowly. In this competent study, the cost of the improvements recommended is rarely counted.

LINARES QUINTANA, SEGUNDO V. Tratado de la Ciencia del Derecho Constitucional. Vols. I and II. Pp. 505; 513. Buenos Aires: Editorial Alfa, 1953. No price.

Segundo V. Linares Quintana, who has established a reputation as one of Argentina's most distinguished scholars and most prolific writers in the field of constitutional law, has just published the first two volumes of a massive five-volume "Treatise on the Science of Constitutional Law." Two more volumes are now in press; the final volume has yet to be written. Each of the first two volumes contains more than 500 pages, so it is reasonable to assume that the final work will run to about 2,500 pages, or very nearly one million words.

The scope of the work is sufficiently broad to justify such an outpouring of words. It ranges from ancient Greece to modern Argentina; from the United States of America to the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics. It deals with the antecedents of constitutional government (Vol. I, Pt. I) and also with constitutional law in the atomic age (Vol. I, Pt. IV). It has something to say about almost every modern constitution, and about some of the more important documents of earlier days. Indeed, the author's principal weakness—if indeed it can be considered a weakness—is his tendency to cover too much ground without saying a great deal about any one subject. Yet he could fairly say in rebuttal that his remarks, though often brief, are almost always to the point, and that he has performed a real service by bringing so much material together in a single integrated work.

One may perhaps wonder how anyone can talk and write freely about constitutional guarantees of liberty in Perón's Argentina. The answer may perhaps be that such an attempt is foredoomed to failure. Dr. Linares Quintana served as professor of constitutional law in the Universities of Buenos Aires and Eva Perón (formerly La Plata) for many years, but he has recently been dismissed for failure to expound the "national doctrine"—in other words, the Peronista hocus-pocus that goes by the name of Justicialismo. The first two volumes of Linares Quintana's new work have indeed been published in Buenos Aires, and have not been confiscated by the authorities. But their subject matter is quite general, and their criticisms of the Perón regime are merely implied. So neither the author nor the censor has yet met the acid test, which must be faced in subsequent volumes. The very fact that such questions must be raised is an eloquent indictment of Perón's Argentina.

WAGLEY, CHARLES. Amazon Town: A Study of Man in the Tropics. Pp. xi, 305. New York: The Macmillan Company, 1953. $5.00.

This is a socio-anthropological study of the inhabitants of a small town in the Amazon Valley of Brazil. It is based mainly on data gathered from June to September 1948, during a survey of UNESCO for the International Hylean Amazon Institute. During these three months, Dr. Wagley, Professor of Anthropology at Columbia University, and his associates lived in the community (referred to throughout the book by the fictitious name of Ita), visited in the homes of the residents, participated in the daily life activities, and collected case studies of 113 families covering details of their diet, expenditures, income, personal possessions, and other related information.

The book supposedly gives a representative picture of conditions in the region of the Brazilian Amazon "where a distinctive way of life has been formed by the fusion of American Indian and Portuguese cultures during the past centuries." It is both a study of the adaptation of man to a tropical environment and a study of an underdeveloped area.

The scope of the work is best indicated by the titles of the eight chapters arranged in order as follows: I. The Problem of Man in the Tropics; II. An Amazon Community; III. Making a Living in the Tropics; IV. Social Relations in an Amazon Community; V. Family Affairs in an Amazon Community; VI. People Also Play; VII. From Magic to Science; VIII. A Community in an Under-Developed Area.

The author finds that the standards of living in Ita are relatively low as indicated by such factors as the primitive agricultural techniques, inadequate housing, lack of sanitation, and high death rates. He points out that anthropologists have often argued for "cultural relativity," insisting that progress, good and evil, success and failure, beauty and ugliness, are values relative to the particular culture in which they are found. While he feels that this point of view is helpful in teaching one to understand, tolerate, and respect other ways of life, he would also hold that "when a culture, through lack of technological equipment and for reasons of social organization, fails to provide for the material needs of man beyond a mere survival level, that society and culture must be judged inferior."

The author is convinced that the major deficiencies in well-being in this area are due to social and cultural factors and could be altered greatly by the introduction of different techniques and ways of doing things. He says "tropical climate presents many difficulties to human life, but none that are insurmountable when adequate technical equipment is available." He hastens to add that never in history has the best of Western technology been available to the people of this area. The author contends that our most advanced technology is aimed at controlling and exploiting the Temperate Zone. The central problem, therefore, is one of adapting some of the modern techniques of living now found in the Temperate Zone to tropical conditions; and to do this in such a manner as to retain the many positive values which have survived through generations of life in that area.

The book is interestingly written and should be of interest both to the layman and to the student of the social sciences.

NEW THIS SPRING!

GOVERNMENT BY THE PEOPLE, 2nd Edition

By JAMES M. BURNS, Williams College and JACK W. PELTASON, University of Illinois

Here is a new edition of the popular study of American government that stresses people and dynamic processes, rather than minutiae of laws and institutions. The new edition covers the first year of the Eisenhower Administration; added factual material is presented, and the book has been reorganized in such a way that facts are more easily grasped by the student.

960 pages . 6" x 9"

PRINCIPLES OF AMERICAN GOVERNMENT, 2nd Edition

By ALBERT B. SAYE, MERRITT B. POUND, and JOHN F. ALLUMS; all in the Political Science Department, University of Georgia

This text presents the basic principles, organization, and functions of American government, with particular emphasis on constitutional principles and civil rights. It provides an effective orientation to the field of political science. In the new edition, many chapters have been expanded, and material has been brought completely up to date with new developments such as the Steel Seizure Case and the McCarran Immigration Act.

448 pages . 5 5/8" x 8 3/8"

THE GREAT ISSUES OF POLITICS

By LESLIE LIPSON, University of California, Berkeley

This text offers a new analysis of the fundamentals of the political process. These are presented to the reader as a series of basic issues which arise in every political system, in any kind of state, in all forms of government. The book is original in its theme and approach, treating the subject in a novel way never before attempted. Designed as a discussion between the author and the reader, its aim is to help the reader think about the problems which are basic to politics.

480 pages . 5 5/8" x 8 3/8"

INTRODUCTION to INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS

By CHARLES P. SCHLEICHER, University of Oregon

Drawing upon several of the social sciences to give students an integrated approach, this is a clear and comprehensive introduction to international relations. The text focuses upon the dynamics of the international political process, national power, nationalism, sovereignty, international law, war, and pacific settlement of disputes. It discusses the attempts to organize a world society, describes the machinery for conducting interstate relations, explains the foreign policies of many nations. It concludes with a summary of the major problems and trends of contemporary international society.

FOREWORD

Twenty-three years ago—in September 1931—a volume of THE ANNALS dealt with prison reform. Then, as well as now, recent riots and disturbances had revealed glaring defects in our prison system. Most of those defects still exist, for progress in penology moves on leaden feet, but here and there penal management and methods are being reorganized so that better advantage may be taken of our growing scientific knowledge of human behavior and our penal institutions transformed into positive assets in the prevention of recidivism, which is their primary task. The authors of the articles in this volume are active and prominent members of the vanguard of this movement, and I owe them all a special debt of appreciation for their friendly co-operation.

The Prison: Asset or Liability?

By SANFORD BATES

AN asset, according to my dictionary, is "any article of value in the valuation of a person's property as compared with his debts." The plural of the word is defined as the "entire property of a person, association, or corporation, applicable to the payment of debts."

A liability is "state of being liable; debt or obligation," and the plural means "debts or money claims against a person or a company."

Nevertheless we need not be too hasty in assuming that because the prison is a place where a great many men are sent for the purpose of paying their debt to society it may be accounted an asset.

Modern society must invest money in a number of projects which it would be difficult to classify as assets under our definition, yet they serve a purpose and contribute to the welfare of a community. A prison may be a dismal place and at the same time a necessary investment in the safety of a modern state.

The question implicit in the title might be put this way, Does a prison do more good than harm, that is, does it increase general public safety and prosperity? or, by intensifying the resentments and inabilities of its inmates, does it diminish the public safety? If it does the former, it could be regarded as an asset. If the amount of good is exceeded by the amount of harm done, then it may fall into the classification of liability. But having so classified the prison, we should still find difficulty in knowing what to do with it, or what to do with the human beings confined in it.

More than two decades ago the so-called Wickersham Commission appointed in Washington to investigate the treatment of crime and criminals, in one of its volumes, undoubtedly written by Frank Tannenbaum, condemned prisons in unmeasured terms as positively harmful. The point was made that they did not succeed as a school for the instruction of inmates, as a business enterprise for the production of usable goods, or as a disciplinary institution. Parenthetically one might ask how, under the circumstances generally prevalent in a place of punishment, adult men can be educated under duress, or how a business could succeed if it took only the community's rejects for workmen, had no way of discharging them, and gave them very little incentive to produce good products.

These thoughts raise the question as to what we have a right to expect from the prison as we now operate it. While men are sent to prison as a penalty for a wrong they have committed, with the inherent promise by the court that there they will be taught through suffering and deprivation not to offend again, is it fair to expect the prison to be a truly regenerating influence?

THREE PURPOSES OF A PRISON

On one occasion I asked a prison guard who was a candidate for civil service promotion in a certain eastern state, "What are the three purposes of a prison?" His answer was: "(1) to punish murderers, (2) to punish robbers, and (3) to punish burglars." That could well have been a correct answer a century ago. Even a schoolboy today gives the following answer: (1) to carry out the sentence of the court and administer punishment to the individual; (2) by so doing to deter others from crime; and (3) to rehabilitate the individual prisoner and thus prevent his recidivating.

Is it possible to achieve these three objects simultaneously? If we place too much emphasis on one, do we jeopardize success in the other directions? Many go so far as to justify withholding a complete system of rehabilitation lest the notion of deterrence be minimized. As I have said elsewhere, is it possible to make a man sorry that he committed a crime and yet glad that he went to prison on account of it? It sounds a bit absurd put this way, but how much short can we fall of this dual accomplishment and still say that the prison is an asset?

In a challenging article entitled "Keep Your Convicts,"¹ a prominent industrialist some years ago advanced the theory that it was not the commission of the crime that made men unacceptable to a job in industry but the fact that they had spent some time in prison as a result of it. Have we got ourselves into something of an impasse in the solution of our problem, if the remedy proposed for crime does more harm than the crime itself?

Can we punish constructively? Or, stated otherwise, does the degree to which the prison foregoes punishment measure its success as a social instrument? Without withholding punishment and risking success on the first two of the objectives of a prison, have we ability and insight enough to make punishment through deprivation and discipline an improving experience?

We have been asking ourselves these questions for a great many years, and we have with considerable optimism felt that these three objects could be reconciled and that the prison might become an asset. But things have happened in the last two years that make it necessary for us to re-examine our conclusions. A series of destructive prison riots, an unprecedented record of escapes from our juvenile correctional institutions, and a disheartening rise in the rates of crime and juvenile delinquency have somewhat shaken our faith.

MASSACHUSETTS STATE PRISON—1811

Let me show you two pictures. The first comes from a book printed in 1811 describing the Massachusetts State Prison:

... the outer walls are 4 ft. and the partition walls, 2 ft. thick. Each cell has two openings for the admission of air and light, each 2 ft. in height and 4 inches wide ... with glazed windows, double-grated with iron bars 2 inches square ... competent judges pronounce this to be among the strongest and best built prisons in the world. It has these advantages over other buildings of its kind. It can neither be set on fire by the prisoners nor be undermined. Its walls are built of hard flint stone from 6 to 14 ft. long.²

Among the rules set up at that time by a board of managers imbued "with the heartfelt desire of aiding in the honourable and Christian views of the governments" were the following:

If the warden ... shall suffer any convict committed and in custody as aforesaid under sentence of solitary imprisonment to be at large without the cell or apartment assigned to such convict, or to be there visited, conversed with, comforted or relieved, contrary to the rules and regulations of said prisons ... he shall be punished by a fine of not exceeding $500.00. ...

Each of the officers of the prison shall be furnished with a gun, bayonet, the necessary accoutrements, and a cartridge box containing at least twelve cartridges with balls, and a strong heavy cutlass to be kept in good order in a safe and convenient place for use, in cases of insurrection of convicts and when self-defense becomes indispensable.

To prevent as far as possible intercourse with the convicts from abroad, to seclude them from the world, and thereby to leave them, as far as it is practicable, to their own reflections, to profit by the lessons of morality and religion bestowed on them while in confinement, that when they again return to society they may be improved in their minds and dispositions, it is important that as few visitors as possible be admitted within the precincts of the Prison.³

A prison menu

The diet of the prisoners will be as follows:

Monday, Thursday, and Sunday	Breakfast and Supper—Three gills of Indian meal made into hasty pudding, half a gill of molasses, half a pound of coarse bread.
	Dinner—Three quarters of a pound of coarse meat or offal made into soup, half a pint of potatoes, and half a pound of coarse bread.
	Breakfast and Supper the same.
Tuesday and Friday	Dinner—One quarter of a pound of salted pork, half a pint of peas or beans, and half a pound of coarse bread.
	Breakfast and Supper the same.
Wednesday and Saturday	Dinner—Half a pound of salted fish with one ounce of butter or hogs' lard, and half a pound of coarse bread, and a pint of potatoes. ⁴
	Breakfast and Supper the same.

This house of punishment

While it is melancholy to find so many of our fellow beings lost to honesty and virtue, as to be sentenced to this house of punishment, it is a solace of incalculable value to find that here they are well taken care of, sufficiently though coarsely clad and fed, that in the regular routine of labour, they acquire counter habits to their former lives of idleness and profligacy, and are favoured with a steady attention to their moral and religious conduct and conversation, and that all which human benevolence can accomplish is here industriously and anxiously applied that there may be "joy in heaven over one sinner that repenteth."

With the heartfelt desire of aiding in the honourable and Christian views of the governments, the present Directors have undertaken to perform the arduous duties assigned them by the Executive. In their regulations respecting visitors they have been governed by a knowledge of the evil which a promiscuous admission of company occasions. They hope in this and their other regulations to receive the support of their fellow citizens, and they sincerely desire that the blessing of providence may aid their humble exertions for the welfare of those unfortunate beings whose depredations on society have subjected them to the discipline of the Prison; and that those who are restored to society, as well as such who are condemned to pass their miserable lives in penitence and labour, may have reason in another and a better world to bless the authors of this institution.⁵

Although it is written as fiction, Dr. A. J. Cronin's recent book, Beyond This Place, presents a graphic record of what the old-time prison could do to the character of even a decent individual.

Suppose we now move ahead 140 years and for our second picture visit one of the new federal penitentiaries or a modern prison in a northeastern state.

⁵ Op. cit., pp. 19-20.

TODAY'S PRISON

Except for those who live in dormitories, each prisoner has a separate cell, frequently somewhat like a menagerie cage, to be sure, but fairly well ventilated (often in the newer prisons by an outside window), with running water, a bed and mattress, and probably a toilet. He goes out three times a day to meals, where he may converse with his fellow convicts. A considerable number of the prisoners have daily work to perform, albeit not at a high rate of speed and with very small wages, sometimes a few cents a day. In the winter he will have at least an hour a day in the open air, and in the summer perhaps two or three hours, with opportunity for baseball, softball, touch football, and so forth. He will see one movie a week; he will have a radio in his cell, although he may have to deposit a dollar or two for the rent of the headphones (some of our prisoners object to being obliged to pay this amount); and he will have access to a fairly good library. His diet, in contrast with that described in the first picture, will be selected by a dietitian, and, although it will not be sumptuous, it will be designed to furnish an adequate amount of nourishment, and he may supplement it with limited purchases from a commissary. He will be visited by the doctor, the psychiatrist, the chaplain, the social worker, and he can have an interview with the warden or the deputy warden at reasonable times. He will have a visit perhaps once a week or every two weeks from his relatives, and from his lawyer at any time he wishes. He has free access in writing to the governor, the courts, the commissioner, the head of the department, and the judge who sentenced him. He can receive a practically unlimited number of letters and write to approved correspondents. If a near relative dies or is fatally ill, in most prisons he will be allowed, in the company of an officer, to make a visit home. And, finally, when a small part of his sentence is served he will appear before the Parole Board, where he will have a personal hearing and, unless his record is bad and the prospects of his success are dim, he will have opportunity to serve the latter part of his sentence under supervision in the open air.

At the time of our disturbances in the spring of 1952 we were amazed to receive letters from susceptible people who pictured the men in our prisons as living in dark cells and being beaten and starved. We pointed out that they were infinitely better off than men in most European prisons.

Now comes the "sixty-four dollar question." Does the prison of today as described above have greater success in reforming individuals and preventing crime than did its grimmer predecessor? Why did prisoners recently stage such violent disturbances at a considerable risk to themselves? Is there an analogy between the change in prisons and the change in our society generally? We all now have many more creature comforts and more of the habiliments of civilization than formerly, but are we any better behaved? Are we actuated more by ethical concepts than when living conditions were more severe and we lived more simply? Has the improvement in our prisons been limited to these material matters, and have we failed to recognize the spiritual needs of the men who live there and their need for self-discipline?

PRISON REALITIES

The causes of crime are many and complex, and it is generally conceded that the conditions in our prisons contribute only to a very minor extent to the prevalence of crime. But, we must ask, are there conditions existing that, no matter how improved may be the prison plant, still militate against complete success? The fact persists that no matter how sumptuous we might make a prison, it would still be a prison. Men would be sent there not because it was deemed to be a pleasant place but because they were to be punished or deprived or disciplined. Nothing really compensates for the loss of liberty. Prisoners must be recognized as being difficult personalities to start with; they have become used to self-indulgence; they have been conditioned to believe that the crooked get along best; the character of their environment may have put a premium on stealing, conning, and lying. In the institution they will be introduced immediately to an abnormal condition where there must be conformity, and a stifling of emotions and appetites; they will be surrounded by rules and reminders of restraint; they will have to get accustomed to the restricted life of an institution and when their term is over they will have to be reaccustomed to the greater freedom and self-reliance on the outside. There are ample reasons why men are not, even in our best prisons, broadened by confinement.

In the midst of our present-day concern over the increase in juvenile delinquency and the stubborn prevalence of criminal activity, we are assailed by new and recurring doubts as to whether we have been going too far or even in the right direction in the treatment of the delinquent and the criminal. For example, has the juvenile court made too many naïve assumptions about the effectiveness of kindness on youngsters? Does the Youth Authority have a complete realization of the facts of life in its application of a more indulgent approach to the adolescent criminal? In our modern institutions have we relied too heavily on the mere relaxation of punishment?

I inquired of a well-known Wall Street financier, who was serving a term, what he thought of the prison. His reply was, "Too long and too easy." It has been pointed out that celerity and certainty of punishment are more deterrent than severity. Perhaps because we apprehend such a small proportion of offenders, we lengthen the sentence out of all reason and then attempt to ameliorate conditions by granting privileges and to shorten the sentences by early releases. It is the fact of being caught and imprisoned that deters crime as much as what happens inside.

PUNISHMENT

If the prison is to become an asset, we cannot do away with punishment without putting some new motivation in its place. We cannot abolish the old kind of prison treatment without installing a new and equally effective discipline.

It is an ignorant or cowardly warden who as a result of the bestowal of excessive indulgences and unearned privileges eventually finds that the prisoners are taking over the management of his institution. His successor will pay with blood, sweat, and tears for his interpretation of what constitutes modern penology. A warden who is sufficiently honest and sincere to be safe from criticism, who is courageous enough to insist on obedience by all, and who is wise enough and calm enough to explain the necessity for such discipline may have a rough time of it for a while, but he will be the one who in the long run will set the standards of the new prison treatment.

Punishment is the necessary result of a breach of law, whether it be a law of nature or a law of man. In neither case will the punishment always be inflicted for the first offense. Winston Churchill realized that punishment was an essential element in reformation when he referred many years ago to men in prison who "have paid their due in the hard coinage of punishment." But if the prison is to be an asset, the punishment necessarily administered must not be brutal or vengeful or so out of proportion to the character of the crime as to defeat its ends. It can be made to mean something, even though this result can be achieved only by intelligent and resourceful men and women.

CONTRIBUTING DISCIPLINES

The kind of psychiatrist who says that all convicts are sick men dodges an issue and so far has presented no ready cure for the sickness.

The social worker who believes he must keep on the side of his convicts is on the wrong side; he must get them on the side of law and order. The rather ridiculous stories in the book called My Six Convicts, so presented as to lead the reader to believe they were facts, are an example of this disastrous philosophy. They were not the author's six convicts. Rather was it his responsibility to see that they realized they belonged to society and must be loyal to it, not to him.

The chaplain who preaches that the Lord will forgive sinners must not attempt to make a hit with his compulsory parishioners by absolving them of blame for their acts.

And the teacher who merely makes a crook a more able or intelligent crook has not made him a better citizen.

Practitioners of all of these disciplines, however, must of necessity have a hand in the conduct of a modern prison.

Every person from the warden down to the lowest watchman in a penal institution should have a psychiatric approach, the kind of approach which looks beyond the name of the crime which a man committed and into the motivations which led him to do it. He can understand these motivations without condoning or relieving the individual of responsibility.

All should have the approach of the social worker, who seeks not to relieve an individual of his responsibility to himself, to his wife and family, to his community, and to his state, but to confront him with these responsibilities and show him how to fulfill them.

Likewise, all should have the religious approach which leaves vengeance to the Lord and tries to assist an individual, through penance and promise, without thought of selfishness or sadism.

Finally, nothing is more important in a prison than to substitute the educational approach for the punitive one. There may be in the institution only a few professional schoolteachers, but the whole staff can go about their tasks as though the prison were a school in which adult men can learn even while undergoing an unpleasant experience.

The warden who faces the discouraged, envious, selfish, scheming, and disappointed group of individuals who are given into his charge needs the advice and assistance of all these disciplines. Prisoners, whatever may be their relative positions on the outside, have equal rights, privileges, and obligations when they come into his institution. He will be confronted by men who are sharp and clever and quick to take advantage of his weaknesses, but he will do his job best not by showing the inmates how they can escape punishment but how they can profit by it. The head of a prison who towards his group shows friendliness, courage, good humor, infinite patience, combined with an inexorable sense of justice and a strict adherence to the law and the regulations, will deserve success.

One of the great contributions to penology was made by the late Kenneth Pray, Dean of the Pennsylvania School of Social Work, in a paper delivered before the National Conference on Social Work. He did not take the position maintained by some social workers and psychiatrists that punishment should be eliminated because it makes rehabilitation less likely, but he advanced the theory that through punishment men can become better, that punishment can be constructive and helpful, that the opportunity of social workers is to make this interpretation to the probationer, the parolee, the prisoner, and their families, not without sympathy but still with firmness reconciling them to their situation and assisting them to profit from it.

PRESENT STANDARDS

The treatment of the convicted offender is so important a matter that sentiment should not supplant or impede sound judgment—and this means excessive sentiment in either direction. A desire to coddle the criminal is as bad as a vengeful attitude towards every person who has received a sentence.

Of course, a prison to be an asset must be built according to the architecture of 1950, not 1800. It must have guards who are recruited not because of their physical prowess but because of the breadth of their vision and the depth of their understanding. It must be under the control of a warden who is not selected because he carried a certain county for a certain political party, but because he understands human beings and what can be done for them and is not afraid to enforce the rules against them.

It must also provide meaningful work for prisoners. The misguided viewpoint that just because men have committed a crime they should not be permitted to labor and help support themselves and their dependents must be replaced by a realization that human beings, in as well as out of prison, must be taught that they may live only by the sweat of their brow. The distinguished committee that investigated the riots in New Jersey made this statement in their report:

All those who had short-sightedly opposed the extension of a reasonably diversified system of productive industries, none of which would be large enough to offer any serious competition to free labor and all of which would be producing goods for the use of the departments and agencies of the State and its political subdivisions, must accept their share of the blame for the situation at the time of the riots.*

The prison must offer opportunity for spiritual contact and for education, not only in the multiplication table but for living, which includes the practice of group therapy as made famous in some of the New Jersey institutions. And all these opportunities must be based upon a firm, reasonable, and well-interpreted disciplinary procedure.

If the chance can be given to the inmates to perform a service to their fellow men, as happened in the experiments carried to success in some prisons during the war, where new serums were perfected which saved the lives of thousands of servicemen, then that may be the finest discipline that could be devised. It certainly is in the public interest to teach prisoners the value of a requital, that by serving the public they have wronged they can balance the account in their favor.

A wise warden will find opportunity within the limits of authoritative control to organize the well-behaved members of the inmate body into a committee with whom he can consult.

After serving sentences whose terms have been lengthened or shortened according to their deserts, prisoners will be sent out not with a suit of clothes that can be easily recognized and nothing in their pockets, but with parole supervision under a system whereby the public can be protected from future depredations and the parolee assisted over a difficult transitional period.

* Report of the Committee to Examine and Investigate the Prison and Parole Systems of New Jersey, Trenton, N. J., 1952.

It will take courageous and persistent leadership to bring about this kind of a prison, but it can be done without sacrifice of the sanctions of the law.

Careful reading of the authoritative document issued by the American Prison Association as to the causes of the riots indicates that in most cases one or all of the above characteristics had been lacking in the prisons where trouble started. These lacks were many times emphatically not the responsibility of the warden or the supervisory department but had resulted from careless legislation or from a lack of understanding by the public.

The old-time penology was easy, but its harvest of embittered and dangerous men was great. The newer principles of penology which the American Prison Association has been advocating for many years are not easy to implement. Justice Brandeis once said of democracy that "it demands continuous sacrifice by the individual and more exigent obedience to the moral law than any other form of government." In the same way it will require more than lip service to these principles to improve conditions in our prisons permanently. It is hard for prisons to stay reformed. They can quickly become a liability.

PUBLIC INTEREST

One encouraging factor nowadays which must be noted is that the prison has ceased to be the thing of mystery and neglect that it was a century ago. Through frequent visits to inmates, through practically unlimited correspondence, in and out, through the admission of newspapers and radio to the prison, through frequent visits by lawyers, legislators, and others, the prison has now become, as never before, the interest and the responsibility of the public. If alert, the public will realize that it has an interest not only in the cost of prisons, not only in the proper control and distribution of products of prison labor, but in the reliability of their human produce, the degree to which prison treatment has been effective. It must live as neighbors with the men who are discharged therefrom, and unless the underlying purpose of imprisonment has been not revenge but discipline, society will not be protected beyond the mere time of incarceration.

LIABILITY OR ASSET?

If carelessly handled, the prison will always be a liability. It can make bad men worse. It can teach habits of idleness and slothfulness, and it can give men opportunity to connive for the commission of even worse crimes.

On the other hand, the prison can teach lessons in self-control through discipline, educate men for life in a democratic civilization, rid diseased bodies and minds of their disqualifications, inculcate habits of work, and present valuable opportunities for research into the nature of crime and the causes of criminality.

Many years ago President Hoover asked me a searching question: "Which is the more important to our communities, to reform the small number of criminals that get into our penitentiaries or to teach the great mass of our citizens that crime does not pay?" I, of course, made the obvious reply that with proper conditions both could be done, that there was no fundamental or insuperable inconsistency between these two objectives.

Winston Churchill, in the quotation referred to above, urged an "unfailing faith that there is a treasure, if you can only find it, in the heart of every man." With this optimistic viewpoint the prison which aims to bring out the best in each inmate may become an asset to the community. If it merely confirms and intensifies the worst, it must remain a liability.

As Kenyon Scudder says in the title of his book, "Prisoners Are People," and the prison must act on this simple assumption even though they are bad people. And, finally, we do not have to decide on the future of the prison by deciding whether it is an asset or a liability, because in a sense the public has no choice. Some kind of an institution for the protection of the public and the discipline of its inmates must be maintained. Although alternatives to the prison such as probation, parole, and honor camps may be developed, the hard core of determined criminals must be segregated for a time, and perhaps forever, from their fellow men. Whether in the future we can call the prison by a different name depends upon the success that we achieve in improving its objectives. Let us hope that, like any good business house, it will be able at least to keep its balance sheet such that whatever its liabilities may be they will always be exceeded by its assets.

Sanford Bates, LL.B., LL.D., Trenton, New Jersey, has been commissioner of the New Jersey Department of Institutions and Agencies since 1945. He was commissioner of Boston's penal institutions (1918-19) and of the Massachusetts Department of Correction (1919-29), director of the federal Bureau of Prisons (1930-37), executive director of Boys Clubs of America (1937-40), and parole commissioner of New York State (1940-45). He is president of the board of Federal Prison Industries, Inc., has served as president of the International Penal and Penitentiary Commission, and received in 1950 a decoration from the Dutch government for his long services in the field of international prison reform. Besides serving as officer or board member of many organizations he has been a lecturer at various universities and schools and is the author of Prisons and Beyond (1938).

Evaluating a Prison

By JAMES V. BENNETT

TIME was when the American prison was the subject of great controversy at home and abroad. Principles of justice and humanitarianism were at stake. Men of stature and vision were active in the two great cultural centers of a young nation, Boston and Philadelphia, and visitors like Dickens and Tocqueville were finding the American prison a fascinating social experiment. But these debates were concerned largely with the value of imprisonment as a deterrent to crime. Only Dickens tried to judge prisons on their disciplinary methods, on their program, and on the way they were administered. More recently "prison reform" has been the cement which bound many a Victorian era group together so that it could decry the inhumanities of some prisons, the economic drag of the contract-labor system, and the blight partisan politics cast on penal progress. The controversies that raged about the mutual welfare league of Thomas Mott Osborne caused sharp clashes of opinion among prison administrators as to the validity of his methods. And now more recently the rash of prison riots has caused searching inquiry as to why they occurred, how they can be prevented, and by what standards a prison can be evaluated.

What indeed are the fundamental criteria for judging the modern prison? Results, to be sure, would be the supreme test. But the figures available to show the kind of prisons that turn out the largest proportion of men who do not again come in conflict with the law are meager and open to question, as incidentally are most of the statistics relating to crime.

Parenthetically, one of the crying needs in the field of correctional work is for more information about the influence of the various programs of treatment on the conduct and adjustment of the offender. Yet at the present time no research of any kind is being carried on to determine the effect of different methods of institutional treatment. We must depend on such figures about repeaters as come from the Census Bureau report. For the year 1946 these show that of the 36,926 prisoners released from state institutions 53.9 per cent had had prior commitments.¹ In other words prison had failed to rehabilitate, redirect, frighten—describe it as you will—over half of those sent to them. But when these figures, bad as they are, are analyzed in detail they show how inconsistent are those making the report. We note for example such absurdities as Virginia having only 13.7 per cent of its prisoners returning while in West Virginia 51.1 per cent were repeaters.²

A much better basis for judging failures or successes comes from carefully made samplings. Several of these indicate that at least 55 to 60 per cent of the prisoners leaving prison today will return within five years. In some places the recidivist rate exceeds 70 per cent. We must be cautious, however, in too quickly condemning the prison, because a large proportion of the more hopeful offenders are skimmed off by the ever widening use of probation, leaving the prison to work with the handicapped, the seriously psychopathic, and the habitual offender. A man having absolutely no arrest record, no prior commitments of any kind, is a rare arrival in all prisons. The truly first-time loser in prison is limited to a few accidental offenders, contempt of court cases, and white-collar criminals.

Lacking unassailable statistical data we must judge the prison then on the basis of empirical standards. We have to ask ourselves whether this or that situation or program is calculated to bring about the desired results. We appraise much of our educational program, our courts, our law enforcement agencies on whether their methods will stand time-honored tests. And so it must be with prisons. What scale can be used to find the specific gravity or, to change the metaphor, "the atomic weight" of a penal system?

LIMITED ESCAPES

The first, and to many, the only measure needed to determine how well a prison serves its purpose is to decide whether the sentences of the court are faithfully executed. Here the prisons rate high. Few men escape permanently. When one takes into consideration the antiquity of most prisons, the flimsiness of some prison structures, the Rube Goldberg character of the locking devices, the hit or miss standards used in selecting men for "trustworthy" assignments, the extent of overcrowding, personnel shortages, and the increasingly more desperate character of offenders, there are few enough escapes. For the calendar year 1952 the numbers of escapes and returnees are given in the accompanying table.

In other words, a relatively small number of prisoners succeed in escaping when one remembers that upwards of 200,000 men and women spend some time in prison each year. Out of the average prison population on any one day—about 150,000—less than 200 were unaccounted for at the end of the year. These may yet be captured, of course. Since January 1, 1937 upwards of 300,000 men have been committed to federal prisons, and out of those who have escaped or walked away from farms and camps, only 7 are now unaccounted for.

PRISON EXPENDITURES

Prisons like other public agencies have to be judged on whether the taxpayer is getting full value for his dollar. To say that most penal institutions are prudently and frugally operated is a gross understatement. It would be more accurate to say they are austere operated, getting only crumbs from the most limited of budgets. Comparative data are meager, as methods of computing prison operation costs vary widely. In judging the dollar costs shown in annual reports and budget statements, one must take into account the size of the institution, its location, salary standards and perquisites of personnel, the extent of farm activities, budgetary practices with respect to inclusion of plant maintenance in operation costs, and a host of other items.

A number of samplings, however, have shown that the cost per prisoner per day for the ordinary prison, omitting hospitals for the criminal insane, women's institutions, and small prisons having a population of less than three hundred, varies roughly as follows:

* Two states operate their prisons with trusty guards, the only paid personnel being the warden and his staff.

These figures do not take into account credits for industrial earnings or the sale of agricultural products, breeding stock, the value of prisoner labor used in road construction, and the like. As a matter of fact, there are a few prisons that are actually self-supporting or very close to being on a self-sustaining basis.

But taking the very highest figure, ordinary prison operating costs are low enough when one compares them with the cost of hospitals, sanitariums, or homes for the aged, in none of which there is any element of safekeeping.

PERSONNEL

Of equal importance in judging the prison is of course the personnel. Are they individuals of high caliber in all that term connotes? Are they individuals who look upon their job as challenging every one of their faculties, or are they mere litters and timeservers themselves? Are they part of a career service where rewards are made on a basis of merit alone? It goes without saying that the method of appointment and tenure of office have an important bearing on the type of men who manage and operate the prison. If employees are appointed under a genuine merit system, if their tenure is permanent, subject only to removal for misconduct, their sense of security and their independence and objectivity in making decisions are assured. Such persons can be guided by principle and can plan with reference to the future.

Manifestly, one of the tests to be applied in determining the caliber of employees or workers in any occupation is the salary scale. While there are of course some callings which men enter because of satisfactions accruing from the nature of their work, and this applies to some prison workers, in the main the attraction is the pay scale. Where the pay is good competition for jobs is keen and qualifications can therefore be set high. In most American institutions the pay of prison officers is nothing short of scandalous. It ranges from $100.00 a month for a seventy-hour work week for the ordinary prison officer, or guard as he is frequently called, to a maximum in one state only of $400.00 a month including overtime pay regularly allowed. The usual scale is now between $50.00 and $60.00 per week for a forty-eight-hour week, two weeks' vacation, and a moderate amount of sick leave. In the federal system the entrance pay for custodial officers is

$3,200.00 per annum gross and the average pay is about $3,500.00, approximately $67.00 per week. But in all too many states the pay averages about $45.00 a week for forty-eight hours' work—roughly $1.00 an hour as compared to average hourly earnings of $1.75 an hour for industrial workers. Is it any wonder that the only questions some wardens ask of applicants for jobs are: "Is he warm?" "Can he see?"

The qualifications of a prison officer and the hazards of his job closely approximate those of a member of the state police or highway patrol, and it seems reasonable to suggest that he receive a commensurate salary. But actually this is not the situation in any state or in the federal system. In some systems the officers also receive various perquisites gratis or at a nominal cost. Housing, uniforms, farm products, meals, are frequently extra emolument that makes such jobs more attractive. But even when these are included the pay is usually less than that of a semiskilled industrial worker.

There are other factors to take into account in judging the personnel—the extent of their training, selection methods, retirement provisions, tenure, and the influence of partisan politics. And it is precisely this point which bears so much on the kind of prisons a state operates. Bad as the spoils system is in any public agency, it is fraught with greater danger in the law enforcement field, including prisons, than in any that comes readily to mind. Where prison officers hold their jobs through political preference it is easy to understand how it is possible for favoritism to permeate the system. The "big shot," the "wheels," the "politicos," get their special cells, the privilege of eating special food "off-the-range," unlimited visits, trusty assignments, and similar favors wherever the personnel are responsive to political pressures or jobs are handed out on a patronage basis. In all too many places wardens are virtually without authority to discharge employees unless they commit some gross breach of the rules.

PLANT AND FACILITIES

The fourth guidepost in measuring a prison is the plant and facilities. Little can be done to upbuild the prisoner unless the environment in which he lives is something more than a cold and comfortless abode of wretchedness. Out of 152 state penal institutions only 17 are less than fifty years old. The Maryland prison was built in 1805. The one presently in use at Charlestown, Massachusetts, held the malcontents and outlaws of the Revolution. The Trenton, New Jersey, prison dates back to 1835. And so it goes. The persistence of these ancient and obsolete structures is of course a millstone about the neck of progressive penology. No counterpart to this longevity can be found in any other public institution. They no more can serve the purpose demanded of a modern correctional system or carry the load heaped upon them by a public and by courts who demand the reform or care of a psychopathic sex offender, a drug addict, or a sworn enemy of society than the rude bridge that arched the flood can carry today's turnpike traffic. It is self-evident that there can be no program directed at giving the prisoner skills unless there are shops, classrooms, industrial facilities, and equipment. Chapels, auditoriums, libraries, and counseling facilities must also be available for helping wherever there is any possibility of reaching and changing the prisoner's philosophy and his way of life. No prison can operate unless it has a modernly equipped hospital, not only to treat the prisoner's physical ailments but to rid him wherever possible of those physical handicaps which are so often an important contributing factor to his maladjustment.

One of the reasons why prisons have moved forward at so sluggish a pace and cramped antiquated institutions continue to struggle along in crowded cities with cold-water cells, walk-arounds for recreation yards, and dilapidated shops is the failure of the administrator to recognize that these ancient bastilles reach a point when no more money should be spent upon them. To attempt to modernize a century-old institution by patching up long outmoded cell blocks or crowding modern kitchen facilities or a hospital amidst a jumble of cell blocks, shops, or storerooms is wasteful in the extreme. And where this is done it is a faithful index of the sort of leadership a prison system boasts.

PRISON ARCHITECTURE

Another test for use in judging a penal system is the extent to which the architectural standards of a hundred years ago repeat themselves. John Haviland (1792-1852), the Philadelphia architect, was the father of classic American prison architecture. His ideas as embodied in Philadelphia (the Eastern State Penitentiary), Trenton, New York (the Tombs), and a half-dozen other places have long since been shown to be out of step with modern standards. Yet even today we see them duplicated, with a few modern frills. Concrete and toolproof prison construction reminiscent of John Haviland costs today at least $10,000 a man in most parts of the country. Some recently constructed prisons have run upwards of $15,000 a man to build. Individualized casework and classification, however, have taught us that relatively few prisoners require maximum-security facilities of this type. Louisiana is now building an institution to replace the scandalous shacks that made Angola one of the worst prisons in the United States. The new prison will have diversified types of housing—maximum-custody inside cells, outside strong rooms, different types of dormitories, a hospital, receiving building, administrative offices, and the like at a cost of roughly $3,000 an inmate exclusive of the cost of the site. It has no wall, of course, and about half of the less difficult type of construction is being done by inmate labor. California's new prison at Soledad, modeled closely along the lines of the federal institution at Terre Haute, cost approximately $5,000 an inmate. But some prisons complete with a wall, conventional cells, and a reasonable layout of shop buildings are costing, or being estimated at, from $12,000 to $15,000 an inmate. This is too high a price for most states, even taking into account current labor and material prices. So something better must be found.

The experience of the State of California with its institution at Chino and of the federal government with its correctional institution at Seagoville, Texas, is living proof that there may be no need to build costly cell blocks except for a few chronic escape artists, a few desperadoes, and a few who have lost all hope. Certainly Chino, Seagoville, Annandale, the Wisconsin prison camp system, and other similar facilities show that there are a substantial number of prisoners who can be handled in so-called "open institutions." As a matter of fact, the old controversies that used to rage about the solitary confinement, or Pennsylvania system, as opposed to the congregate or cellular (Auburn) system have their counterparts today in discussions as to the relative merits of a super-security prison like the new Norfolk, Massachusetts, prison or a Seagoville. In its over-all design this new federal prison is constructed on the unit or cottage plan. It has no walls, no gun towers, no visible physical restraints whatever. Yet it works. It has operated successfully for eight years. During that time 4,382 men have been sent there—most of them directly from the courts with only superficial screening—and yet but 32 have escaped. All of these have been recaptured. California has had much the same experience.

CASE HISTORIES

But no such institution can operate successfully unless its classification methods have been developed to the point where intelligent judgments of each individual prisoner can be made. A fair way to judge a prison is by the kind of records that are maintained. Do they describe fully and accurately the prisoner, his offense, his mental capacity, his employment history, his institutional record—do they give, in short, a complete picture of the prisoner? Good case records are vital to any system that seeks to individualize the treatment of prisoners.

These records too are essential for routine operating purposes. A prisoner cannot be disciplined intelligently unless the deputy warden or the disciplinary committee have knowledge of the prisoner's case history and his whole behavior pattern. Discipline cannot be maintained at a high level through any system of rules, tables of punishment, or arbitrary and hasty decisions. Each case must be handled on its merits by an objective person or group with no show of emotion or assuming the misbehavior to be a personal affront. And every action or observation relating to the prisoner must be painstakingly and fully logged for the guidance of all concerned.

PLANS AND STUDIES

A prison system must also be measured by the amount of thought and ferment that goes into planning its future development. Obviously there is hardly a state that cannot look forward to the day when its population growth will not require additional correctional institutions. If costly mistakes are to be avoided and advantage taken of employment pump priming through construction of public institutions, advance consideration must be given to future needs. This calls for studies of existing institutional needs, for appraisal of program, for surveys by people outside the system as well as by those closest to the problem. Where there is resistance to acceptance of legislative studies, to reports by informed outsiders, the system will not progress.

PROGRAM AND PHILOSOPHY

But the acid test of the prison is its program and philosophy. A program without a philosophy and without definite objectives is empty of value. An administration without an idea or sense of direction is mere routine. A sound philosophy of prison management will result in a fine balance between the demands of custody and the individual's need for correction and rehabilitation. The elements of a modern prison program are fairly well known, and the recent publication by the American Prison Association, The Manual of Suggested Standards for a State Correctional System, marks the diversity and range of these elements. The extent to which they have been put into practice varies widely. Some pessimists have estimated that of the 167,000 men and women in federal and state institutions less than one-third ever come in contact with any real rehabilitative force. This may be so, and if it is a fact it is because those in charge do not really believe prisoners can be rehabilitated or limit their hope to a few who obviously ought not to be considered real criminals in the classic meaning of that term. If defeatism, mistrust, skepticism, are everywhere manifest, if there is a tongue-in-the-cheek attitude, then, of course, the whole program will be a farce. Such an institutional climate will not be hard to detect and will be the mark and measure of its leadership. It is this constant heart searching to find the good in every prisoner and build upon it that Sir Winston Churchill declares to be an unfailing test of the civilization of any country. Probably no other standard for evaluating a prison is needed.

James V. Bennett, LL.B., LL.D., Chevy Chase, Maryland, has been director of the federal Bureau of Prisons since 1937, having served as assistant director from 1929. After the war he was appointed head of the Prisons Branch of the American Military Government in Germany and later was awarded the War Department's Exceptional Civilian Service medal and the Navy's Distinguished Service Award for this work and for acting as adviser in connection with methods of custody and treatment of military offenders. He is a member of the District of Columbia bar and has been active in the work of the Section of Criminal Law of the American Bar Association, having been its secretary for over ten years.

Behind the Prison Riots*

By AUSTIN H. MACCORMICK

THE years 1952-53 have the dubious distinction of being the darkest years in modern American penal history. During the eighteen months from April 1952 through September 1953 there were about thirty prison riots, or other major disturbances—more than had taken place in the entire preceding quarter-century. In 1951 there were a few disturbances that now appear comparatively unimportant in retrospect. The riots of greatest magnitude and importance began in April 1952, when the violent and destructive revolts that flared up almost simultaneously in the ancient New Jersey Prison at Trenton and the huge Michigan Prison at Jackson touched off a series of explosive disturbances in prisons throughout the country.

The series seems to have stopped at last, except for occasional outbursts in prisons that are still seething with unrest. Long overdue improvements have been made in some prisons; conditions and practices that should never have been allowed to exist are being corrected at last. Concessions have been made to the prisoners, some constructive, others purely conciliatory and of questionable merit. Prison officials have been putting into effect some of the measures of riot prevention and control recommended by the American Prison Association's Committee on Riots, whose excellent report was published in May 1953 and has been widely distributed.

But the prison world is in a period of uneasy calm, at best. The major characteristics of our prisons which formed the basis of the riots have not materially changed, and the roots of the riots in the minds and emotions of the prisoners probably run deeper and more tangled than ever. Our prisons are still a fertile field for trouble. No state has a right to feel smug or secure because it has escaped trouble thus far. For every prison that had a riot in the 1951-53 series there were a half-dozen that had just as much reason to expect one.

The riot pattern showed neither rhyme nor reason. Riots rocked institutions of every age, size, type, and quality: the oldest, Massachusetts' 148-year-old Charlestown Prison; the newest, California's medium-security institution at Soledad, opened in 1951; the largest, the 6,500-man Jackson Prison; one of the smallest, the 500-man Utah Prison; the Louisiana Penitentiary, rated until recently the worst prison in the country but now being transformed by a reform administration; and the Federal Reformatory for young men at Chillicothe, Ohio, considered one of our best institutions.

The form the riots took in prison after prison did not vary greatly: a sudden flare-up of violent rebellion, seizing of hostages, setting fire to buildings, looting of food supplies, hordes of prisoners running through the cell blocks and yards like madmen, assembling of extra guards and police, display of armed force, negotiations between riot leaders and harried officials, sullen surrender and release of hostages, return to wrecked cell houses, chaos and confusion crippling the prison for months, and finally the ominous quiet of a volcano after an eruption.

The most sinister feature of the 1951-

53 riots¹ was the taking of hostages. This was not a new procedure but it had never been done so widely before. That hostages held by desperate prisoners armed with knives are in grave danger is certain, and officials who considered ordering an armed attack on a barricaded building knew that they might be signing the death warrant of guards whose wives were waiting outside the gates of the prison as miners' wives wait at the shaft head in a mine disaster.

There have been several instances in prison history where rioters carried through their threats to "send out the hostages' bodies on a platter one at a time" if their demands were not granted. Officials know this, and sometimes negotiate with rioters at great length or make humiliating concessions to save the hostages' lives. It was nothing short of a miracle that the hostages during the Jackson Prison riots came out of 15-Block alive. Not only were the men holding them highly unstable psychopaths, if not insane, but their weapons included straight razors, as deadly weapons as one can put in the hands of excited and desperate men.

After the Trenton Prison riot, on the other hand, the hostages said that they did not feel in grave danger, that the riot leaders appointed picked men, armed with knives, to guard them against attack by excited or revengeful prisoners, that the rioters shared food and water with them, and so on. The prison officials negotiating through a barred window did not know this, however, and the hostages themselves must have felt at times as though they were being guarded by temporarily well-disposed rattlesnakes.

HOW RIOTS BEGIN

The way riots begin does not differ greatly from prison to prison. They are usually started by a few ringleaders, sometimes men of the quiet-agitator type, who stir up other prisoners to start trouble and stay in the background themselves. Sometimes the ringleaders are reckless and unstable men who are not accustomed to weigh the consequences of their actions, and they continue leadership of the riot down to the bitter end. The leaders in the seizure of 15-Block at Jackson Prison were of that type. Earl Ward, the king pin, has a high I.Q. but has not in many years received a better rating than "homicidal psychopath" and in his youth was twice committed to state hospitals. "Crazy Jack" Hyatt, his first lieutenant, has been living up to his nickname for years. The handsome young prisoner who tricked a green guard into opening his cell, put a knife against the guard's ribs, took his keys, and opened Ward's and Hyatt's cells, was classified as an overt homosexual. Another of the 15-Block hierarchy, whose picture appeared in magazines and newsreels throughout the country as that of a big-shot riot leader, was a nineteen-year-old homosexual who is also epileptic. An older prisoner who was Earl Ward's self-appointed lieutenant in the main inmate body on later examination showed signs of marked mental deterioration. He proudly told an investigating committee of arming a group of prisoners with knives and cleavers and of rounding up some extra hostages, whom he delivered to Ward in 15-Block.

Whoever starts it, a riot picks up recruits rapidly. Prisoners are drawn into it from sheer excitement, others join it eagerly because of their grievances, and others are swept in against their wills, either because they do not know how to get out of the path of the storm or because they do not dare to stay out for fear of reprisals from other prisoners. In many riots, however, a large percentage of the prisoners do not participate at all. At Jackson Prison there were theoretically over two thousand men involved, although some of them committed no violent acts and were probably going along with the mob against their wills. About three thousand prisoners stayed out of it entirely, and a large percentage of them were outspoken in their bitterness against the rioters. Another fifteen hundred were outside the walls on farm and forestry camp assignments and were completely out of the riot picture. At Jackson and in other riots, moreover, prisoners have resisted the rioters, stopped fires, protected guards against injury, and saved power plants and other expensive installations from destruction.

THE UNSTABLE AS RECRUITS

The unstable prisoners, of the type generally placed in the vague but convenient category of "psychopaths" and more inelegantly classified in prisons as "screwballs," are the most ready recruits for any riot task force. Our largest and most secure prisons tend to become the dumping ground or catch basin for all the prisoners who are a serious problem in other institutions, including some who should be in a state institution for the mentally ill or defective instead of a prison. At Jackson Prison the "ordinary," relatively stable prisoners lived in the cell blocks known as the North Side and manned the industries and the more important maintenance details. The remaining 2,500 prisoners inside the walls lived on the South Side. It was in the latter area that, with the exception of the men under punishment or in permanent segregation in 15-Block, most of the unstable and "incorrigible" prisoners were quartered. The big riot at Jackson, beginning the morning after Ward and his followers seized 15-Block, was almost exclusively a South Side affair.

At the time of the riots the population of the prison included over a hundred insane prisoners and another two hundred who had been in the institution's mental ward but were deemed well enough to be quartered in ordinary cell blocks "until they blew their corks again." There was not a single psychiatrist on the prison staff,² and officials stated that they were able to get the overcrowded State Hospital at Ionia to accept insane prisoners only by swapping them "body for body" for criminal sexual psychopaths who were recognized as receiving no benefit from being in the hospital and were occupying valuable space. The prison had more than a hundred and fifty sexual psychopaths, who were scattered through the various cell blocks and were receiving no special treatment whatever.

Hundreds of passive homosexuals and aggressive "wolves" were similarly scattered through the prison, mostly on the South Side, except for those who had landed in 15-Block. The problem of perversion was accentuated by the policy of holding at the prison young prisoners who belonged in the Reformatory but were not acceptable there because of low mentality or epilepsy. Some of this group were locked in their cells at all times for protection.

Trenton Prison similarly had for many years been the dumping ground for misfits and problem cases from the other New Jersey correctional institutions: insane, mental defectives, psychopaths, epileptics, young offenders who could not get along in the reformatories, passive homosexuals, "wolves," escape artists, and agitators.

OVERCROWDING AND IDLENESS

At both prisons, overcrowding and idleness accentuated the problems presented by these unstable elements in the population and produced tensions and pressures in the more stable prisoners that made them potential recruits for a revolt. Jackson Prison was not only the largest in the country in population but also, with 57.6 acres inside the walls, a vast and sprawling compound. Huge as it was, it was so overcrowded at the time of the riots that men were sleeping on cots in the cell-house corridors. In spite of the excellent industries, farms, and forestry camps, at any given time there were 1,750 men idle, an idle population equal to the total population of Sing Sing Prison.

Trenton Prison, an ancient and grimy institution opened in 1836, was so overcrowded at the time of the 1952 riots that 300 of the 1,300 prisoners were quartered in the ninety-two cells of Wing 4, a 116-year-old cell house. About four hundred men, 30 per cent of the population, were completely idle. During the summer months they spent approximately twenty hours a day in their cells, in the winter close to twenty-two hours. Just after the riots I went into a gloomy cell house built in 1870. On one of the tiers a young prisoner was sitting close to the bars in the front of his cell, clothed only in the lower half of a pair of pajamas, with a makeshift chessboard and pieces cut out of cardboard on his knees. He was playing a game of chess with another prisoner on the tier above him and five or six cells away, and I heard them shout their moves back and forth through the din of this crowded idle house. He was nineteen years of age. At Jackson, in the South Side cell houses where the cells face each other across a wide corridor, hundreds of prisoners spent most of their time pressed against the bars of their cells like animals in a zoo, holding shouted conversations with prisoners on the tiers above and below or across the way, conversations that were hardly more intelligible than the screaming of animals.

THE TEENAGERS

Not all prisoners are markedly unstable by nature. Many of them become restless and reckless after months or years under the tensions produced by conditions like those just described. The main factor in the instability of others is their youth. The "hard core" of the July 1953 riot in the Oregon Penitentiary, which receives prisoners down to the age of fifteen, was a comparatively small group of youths in their late teens. It was the same age group that staged a riot in one wing of the California Prison at Soledad soon after it opened in 1951. One way of accounting for the outburst in this institution, the newest and one of the best in the country, is that it had been filled up very rapidly to relieve overcrowding at San Quentin and had not yet finished its "shakedown cruise." The chief reason, apparently, was that the group of younger prisoners had been hearing about other riots and wanted to show that they too could be tough.

Another of the best institutions in the country, the Federal Reformatory at Chillicothe, Ohio, had a riot in September 1952, that was also a case of the wrong kind of youth movement. All the prisoners there are in their late teens and early twenties. The personnel and program are superior to those of most correctional institutions, and there seemed to be no big basic reason for a riot. The prisoners afterwards said it started as a protest against the light evening meals and against "flies in the food," and there was no intention of carrying it to extremes of violence.

The excitement mounted rapidly and rose to the point of frenzy when some prisoners started beating on tom-toms that were used in an inmate band. The drum beating could be heard for two miles and seemed to release primitive impulses in the young rioters. The officials finally used gas to prevent the destruction of buildings, and later laid down a barrage of tracer bullets, one of which wounded a prisoner. This increased the prisoners' fury, and the revolt lasted for hours, ending only when they apparently quit from weariness rather than a return to common sense.

After it was all over, the official report of the affair stated that the evening meal had for some time been inadequate, that the steward had cut the meat ration 20 per cent below the Bureau of Prisons standard without getting approval, and that there were "flies all over the kitchen, in the food, and everywhere else in the institution . . . every table was covered with flies . . . they had dropped into the jello, into the soup, and into other food." The steward was replaced, but the damage was done. This riot is a perfect example of how one bad factor in an otherwise excellent institution can unleash insensate fury.

A single factor such as bad or insufficient food is frequently the fuse in prison riots, but there has to be explosive material ready to blow up. The many prisons in which a large percentage of the inmates, half of whom are in their twenties or younger, spend long years in enforced idleness, are locked from fourteen to twenty-two hours a day in narrow cage-like cells or in overcrowded dormitories reeking with perversion, and can rot like vegetables in a cellar for all anyone cares, have at all times the explosive quality of dynamite.

It is a pertinent fact that you can burn dynamite, but it is dangerous to jar it. The population of a prison can burn for years with the slow fires of bitterness and frustration. But let an unstable psychopath yell "When do we eat?" some day in the mess hall. His tablemates may attack the nearest guard, and in ten seconds a riot gets under way that may take days to bring under control. That explosion may set off a riot in any other prison within range of its shock waves, and that in turn another and another, until a veritable chain reaction is in progress.

One factor that is obviously of enormous importance in the creation of tensions and pressures in prison is the sexual problem: not alone the effect of sexual deprivation but also the demoralizing effect of seeing or sensing the perverted relationships which poison the atmosphere of correctional institutions. This subject is not discussed here because it is too difficult and dangerous an area to enter unless one has at his disposal more space than this entire article covers. I am always reluctant to discuss the sexual problem in prisons, moreover, because there are already too many people who think of all prisoners as wild beasts, without realizing that they too might become bestial if they were locked long enough in an iron cage.

"PAREGORIC PRISONS"

There are only a few good prisons in the country and only a few very bad ones. The great majority of our state prisons are mediocre. Their buildings are either ancient firetraps or "whited sepulchers" with pretentious twentieth-century buildings and nineteenth-century programs. Most of them are so overcrowded that there are two men in every cell, and the makeshift dormitories are jam packed so tightly that you could ride a bicycle down the line of beds. There is nowhere near enough work for all the prisoners, and many men have less than two hours of real work a day. The educational program frequently consists of a few classes in the three R's, taught by prisoners. The "idle and unassigned" men loaf for endless hours in the prison yard or are locked in their cells most of the twenty-four hours. Lockup time is 5:00 P.M., or sometimes 4:30 P.M., for all the prisoners except those who are lucky enough to have work assignments or yard privileges that extend beyond that time. The cell doors open again at 6:30 or 7:00 A.M., the beginning for most men of another day of deadly monotony.

When you walk through the cell blocks in one of these prisons in the evening, you see men lying on their beds with radio headphones on, staring vacantly at the ceiling, or trying to read by the light of a dim bulb, or swapping jailhouse chatter with their cell mates. At the end of the first month of their sentences they have had enough sleep, enough radio, enough hours in a cage four and a half to five feet wide to last them a lifetime.

Prisons of this type are run on the principle of what I once called "paregoric penology," remembering the old remedy for keeping bothersome babies quiet. The constantly changing political appointees who head them and the mediocre, underpaid guards who man them go on the idea that "a good prison is a quiet prison." As long as there are no escapes, no disturbances, nothing to draw unfavorable publicity, they do not care that the prisoners are drifting along on a low physical, mental, and moral level and that most of them will leave the prison worse than when they entered it.

Discipline in the "paregoric prisons" is lax. Almost anything goes except escape. Favored prisoners are granted special privileges, and anyone with money on the books or in his pocket can buy extra food stolen from the kitchen. Prisoners with the right connections sell jobs, cell assignments, transfers to the prison farm, food, extra blankets, soap, special clothing, everything that is not nailed down. Payment is by cash in the many institutions that do not make any serious attempt to keep it out; in all prisons cigarettes by the pack or the carton are legal tender.

This may begin to sound to the average citizen like the description of a bad prison, but it is the picture of ordinary ones of the type found in the great majority of our states. These prisons do next to nothing affirmative to help prepare their prisoners for life in free communities when their sentences end, and in that sense they are destructive. But the bad prisons are definitely and directly destructive, and sometimes seem to be deliberately so.

HOW BAD CAN A PRISON BE?

A good example of a bad prison was Kilby Prison in Alabama as Dr. Edward Galway and I saw it in 1949, when we surveyed it for the Osborne Association. It is difficult to say which is worse in prisons in the long run, extreme laxity or excessive severity. Certainly there is nothing worse than a combination of the two such as we found in Alabama. Flogging with a heavy leather strap was the routine punishment, and the guard who inflicted it could take the hide off a rhinoceros. Yet almost no efforts were made to prevent the offenses that were punished by the lash.

Open gambling was permitted, and the warden told us that he guessed some men had several thousand dollars "stashed away" somewhere in the prison. The doors of the cells, which housed a dozen men each on double-decked beds, were left open until 8:30 in the evening, and men wandered freely from cell to cell and from one gambling game to another. No record was kept of who lived where, and prisoners changed cells and cell mates at will.

Stabbings over gambling debts or tied in with perversion, which was rampant, were frequent, but neither the stabbings nor the practices that led to them were taken very seriously. One afternoon we saw in the prison hospital a man who had been stabbed in the lung. That night we saw the man who stabbed him wandering around the cell block as free as a lark. He had been flogged and then turned loose. He took down his clothes and showed us what the strap did to him. He was a wild-eyed psychopath, and unquestionably had already obtained another knife and was ready to use it. Whether he was a wild beast when he entered the prison or not, he had certainly become one.

Influential prisoners had an easy time of it in the Alabama prison system. One wealthy man, serving a sentence for murder, lived in a special room where his wife and business manager were allowed to visit him, and went home frequently for week ends. Another wealthy prisoner lived at the prison ranch, wore civilian clothes, ordered both prisoners and guards around, kept his car nearby, went off on frequent trips, including one to the Mardi Gras, and spent about as much time at home as he did before he was sent to prison for shooting his son, a returned veteran, during a quarrel over business matters. That the two men were receiving these special privileges was known not only to the other prisoners but also to the public. Two conscientious parole board members protested repeatedly but without effect.

What I have said thus far bears on the question, What causes a rioter? more closely than on What causes a riot? But too little thought, it seems to me, has been given to the pent-up feelings, the tensions and pressures, the bitterness and sense of grievance, whether or not they have valid basis, that constitute the mental and emotional state in which prisoners are ready to riot. This state of mind exists even in our better prisons, because they are prisons, and the chances that it will reach the point of explosion are obviously greater in a prison or correctional system that is maladministered.

MALADMINISTRATION

The report of the American Prison Association's Committee on Riots, published in May 1953, is concerned mainly with causes that have their basis in maladministration, and with methods of prevention and control. After stating that "the immediate causes given out for a prison riot are usually only symptoms of more basic causes," the report lists the fundamental causes and forms of prison maladministration as follows:

- A. Inadequate financial support, and official and public indifference.
- B. Substandard personnel.
- C. Enforced idleness.
- D. Lack of professional leadership and professional programs.
- E. Excessive size and overcrowding of institutions.
- F. Political domination and motivation of management.
- G. Unwise sentencing and parole practices.

In my opinion, of the factors listed the most important single one outside the prisons is F, political domination and motivation of management. The most important one inside the prisons is C, enforced idleness, although one of the most potent factors in producing bitterness and grievance is the last one listed, unwise sentencing and parole practices. "Unwise" is entirely too mild a word for the laws and procedures under which a young first offender serving a thirty-year sentence imposed by one judge has as his cell mate another first offender, as like himself as an identical twin, who was given five years for the same offense by another judge.

COSTS OF ENFORCED IDLENESS

It is a curious thing that the public stands for enforced idleness in prisons, considering how much it costs on a short-range and long-range basis. It is high time the taxpayers demanded that every prisoner who is able to work be provided with productive employment, preferably of the type that has training value for the future, and that free labor and industry abandon their shortsighted opposition to prison industries, insisting only that they be properly diversified and that prisons not be permitted to flood the market with shoddy goods at substandard prices. It is time too that prison administrators got up off their swivel chairs and started telling legislators and the public exactly what enforced idleness may mean not only in terms of destruction of state property during riots but also in destruction, for which the public also pays the bill, of the ability and the will of prisoners to make an honest living on release.

The taxpayer has a right to demand that everything possible be done, without exploiting the prisoners or permitting undue competition with any sector of free labor and industry, to reduce the annual bill of 200 million dollars for the operation of our federal and state prison systems. That prisoners can and will work under proper leadership was demonstrated beyond question during World War II, when prisons throughout the country produced war goods valued at over 138 million dollars and agricultural products worth an additional 75 million, with thousands of men voluntarily working long extra hours.

The immediate cost of operating prisons, however, huge as it is, is secondary in importance to the long-range cost to society of crimes committed by men who have not been prepared while in prison for free life as law-abiding, self-supporting citizens but, on the contrary, have been actually unfitted by years of enforced idleness to keep up with the fast competitive pace of the working world outside of prisons.

The restrictive federal and state legislation that has been passed in the last twenty-five years and the persistent opposition of lobbyists who try to defeat every specific legislative proposal for the establishment of a new industry have shackled prison labor to the point where it is estimated that 40,000 of the 170,000 inmates of our prisons are in practically complete idleness. The effect this has on the prisoners has been thrown into lurid highlight by the riots.

SUCCESSFUL PRISON INDUSTRIES

The way in which the problem may be solved is being demonstrated by a number of prison systems, notably the federal system and California's. Instead of sulkily blaming free labor and industry for all their problems of idleness, they have enlisted their aid in working out a solution that is fair to all concerned. Both systems have organized their prison industries as one would a manufacturing corporation, and have on the boards of directors representatives of labor, industry, retailers and consumers, agriculture, and the general public. Whenever they have planned to open a new industry or expand an old one they have called in representatives of the industry under consideration and have obtained their agreement on what amount of production would be fair. The federal system produces goods for sale to government departments and services only, and California for state departments and agencies. As one concrete example of what can be accomplished, southern textile-mill operators co-operated in planning the cotton mill at the Federal Penitentiary in Atlanta, the institution's largest and most profitable industry. Last year this penitentiary, once a notorious idle house, did not cost the taxpayers a single dime.

The California Department of Corrections, similarly, in getting authorization for the large textile mill soon to open at San Quentin as the modern replacement of the old jute mill, secured the co-operation of the textile industry. The Department has made notable progress also in developing harmonious working relations with trade unions in the development of its vocational training programs. A score of advisory committees representing various unions have been established and visit the institutions regularly to help in the planning of new vocational courses and necessary buildings and equipment, keeping training programs up-to-date and in line with the newest developments in the trades involved, examining prisoners before they are released, helping them get union cards and jobs, and giving them friendly guidance and help after they get out.

FARMS AND FORESTRY CAMPS

Industries and organized vocational training are not the only answers to the problem of idleness. Some of our better prison systems, even those in the northern climate, operate large farms where the men live in ordinary farmhouses or in barracks and work under trained farm supervisors but not under guard. A number of states, notably California and Michigan, operate forestry camps on a trusty basis and save incalculable sums by fire prevention and other types of conservation work. During the summer months California has over a thousand prisoners in its camps, preventing as well as fighting fires and building roads, using none of the custodial and disciplinary practices characteristic of road camps of the chain-gang type. Michigan now has about six hundred men in conservation camps. Such things as these are the answer to enforced idleness in prisons, and in part the answer to the question, How can we prevent riots?

POLITICAL DOMINATION

"Political domination and motivation of management" is politely placed in next-to-last place in the American Prison Association Committee's list of fundamental causes of maladministration of prisons. Yet recognition of the evil influence of politics appears in the discussion of all but two of the causes listed. It could well appear also in the discussion of "enforced idleness," for the power that has been wielded to strangle prison industries has been mainly political power.

The most destructive result of political control of prisons is its effect on personnel, the factor of paramount importance in correctional work. People with neither training nor experience in such work and frequently with no aptitude whatever for it are given political appointments as department heads and parole board members, as wardens and other key institutional officials. As the report of the Committee on Riots states, "While serving their apprenticeships at the top instead of at the bottom of the personnel pyramid, they are able to exercise little constructive leadership, and often bring disaster to themselves and to the programs for which they are responsible. In many cases, just as they are beginning to develop competence in correctional administration and aptitude for it, the wheel of politics turns and they are replaced by another set of inexperienced appointees."

In one of our largest states it has proved practically impossible to fill well-paid top positions in the prison system with experienced administrators because the system is known to be dominated by politics and no qualified career penologist is willing to accept appointment where security of tenure and freedom to administer without fear or favor are not assured.

Political control of prisons frequently means a change of personnel on all levels whenever a new party, or a new faction in one-party states, comes into power. I once visited a state just after a new governor came into power and found that everyone in the prison system from the director and wardens down to the lowest paid clerk had been replaced. Sometimes wardens of politically dominated prisons survive a change because they have influential friends in both parties, having played politics on both sides of the street and down every alley.

There are other evil effects of politics too numerous to mention: graft in varying degrees on building contracts and on purchases of food and other supplies, sale of jobs and kickbacks in salaries, pressure to grant special privileges or early parole to favored prisoners and to give the better work assignments to personnel with political connections, and so on. The worst over-all effect, however, is the mediocrity of physical plants, personnel, and programs characteristic of politically dominated prisons and correctional systems.

The building programs of politically dominated systems do not keep up with their needs, and institutions are dangerously overcrowded. Industrial and farm programs struggle for their existence and prisoners deteriorate in idleness. Salaries are on such a low level that custodial personnel are continually leaving for better jobs, and the institutions are staffed with green guards lacking proper qualifications for their jobs. Fully qualified professional personnel, both because of the salaries and the working conditions, will not accept appointment in the medical, educational, and other rehabilitative services, and these activities are too frequently staffed by people who find it difficult to get jobs in the free world. It is only fair to say that there are also in our prisons custodial, professional, and technical personnel—guards as well as doctors, teachers, foremen, farmers, and so forth—who are able, conscientious, and well adapted to prison work. But the political system cripples their efforts, subjects them to constant frustration, and fires them when their jobs are wanted for someone with an influential political sponsor.

The report of the Committee on Riots closes its discussion of political domination with the following: "Any state which seriously wishes to reorganize its prison system and place it on a sound foundation, must begin by developing an organizational structure as free from improper political influence from top to bottom as it is possible to make it within the framework of a democratic form of government."

OUR BEST PRISON SYSTEMS

The two best prison systems in the country, the federal system and California's, have had for some time the good fortune to be as free as one can realistically hope to be of political domination, the former for nearly twenty-five years and the latter for about a decade. During those periods they have risen from the status of being among the worst prison systems in the country to a joint position of leadership in the United States, which probably means in the world.

They are headed by two of the ablest career administrators in the prison field, the United States Bureau of Prisons by James V. Bennett, the California Department of Corrections by Richard A. McGee. In both systems professional and technical services are staffed by fully qualified personnel with civil service appointments, adequate salaries, and security of tenure. Correctional officers and other custodial personnel are also under civil service and must meet relatively high standards for appointment. They then receive systematic in-service training of both the theoretical and the practical type.

Both systems operate diversified institutions ranging in custody from maximum-security prisons to open farms and camps, and in function from industrial institutions to reformatory where vocational training is stressed and medical centers for the physically and mentally ill. The classification services determine what degree of custody, type of job, and special training and treatment each prisoner needs. Their recommendations are carried out, as far as possible, in a well-balanced program of employment, general education, vocational training, medical treatment, and other rehabilitative activities.

These are not the only two prison systems in the country that are coming close to accomplishing their dual function: to hold prisoners during their sentences under decent conditions in as secure custody as each requires, but no more, and to prepare as many as possible by rehabilitative training and treatment for successful return to free life. But they are the best of our prison systems, and they clearly point the path all prisons must take. The lesson of the riots is that we cannot reform our prisoners until we have reformed our prisons.

Austin H. MacCormick, Berkeley, California, is executive director of the Osborne Association and professor of criminology at the University of California. He was assistant director of the United States Bureau of Prisons from 1929 through 1933, and Commissioner of Correction of New York City from 1934 to 1940. He received the Presidential Medal for Merit for his services as the Army's chief consultant on correctional problems in World War II. During the 1951-53 prison riots he served as consultant in several states, notably Michigan and New Jersey.

Catchall Jails

By ROY CASEY

What has the gray-haired prisoner done?
Has murder stained his hands with gore?
Not so—his crime's a fouler one—
God made the old man poor!

These lines by the poet Whittier express perhaps the greatest contributing factor in the yearly "catch" of nearly two million persons who for various lengths of time become inmates of America's "catchall jails," in any case, of those who remain there for any appreciable length of time. Jails, which are the most costly units of our correctional and penal systems to maintain on a per capita basis, are institutions for criminals without money or without "connections." Criminals with money or influence have devious ways of staying out of jail and, to the discredit of our American system of justice, many offenders undeserving of probation get by somehow without going to prison though convicted of heinous crimes.

With the exception of the so-called city or county "workhouse," "work farm," "prison camp," "work camp," "house of detention," and similar institutions known by various names, whose functions are to hold convicted offenders for the serving of misdemeanor sentences (one year or less), all jails can perhaps be classed as of the catchall kind.

There are 3,073 counties in the United States and at least 99 per cent of them maintain a county jail of some kind. A few of these counties do not have jails of their own, and some maintain two or more institutions of a jail type. Consequently, the round figure of 3,100 county jails is perhaps a reasonably accurate one.

Rand McNally's Road Atlas for 1953 lists approximately 200,000 cities, towns, and villages in our forty-eight states. There are no available statistics as to how many of these centers of population have jails or lockups. A conservative estimate of 5 per cent might be made as to the number which provide some place of detention for their local law violators. This would place the probable number of city jails and town lockups at 10,000. There are approximately 4,600 cities and towns in the United States with populations of 2,000 or more. No doubt each of these has a jail of some description, while many large cities maintain two or more. Until more accurate statistics are compiled on the subject, we might strike an average from the preceding data and not be far wrong in assuming the total number of county, city, and town jails and lockups in the United States to be at least 10,000.

JAIL POPULATION

Through these 10,000 jails there passes each year one American citizen out of every hundred of our population. Some perhaps remain only long enough to be booked and to post bond, if their offenses are minor, or if they have money or influential friends. Others stay locked up with the usual "catch" of the police dragnets: drunks, prostitutes, sex deviates, murderers, rapists, dope addicts, dope peddlers, embezzlers, gamblers, insane, juvenile delinquents, first offenders, highjackers, confidence men, ex-convicts, chronic alcoholics, kidnapers, amnesia victims, traffic law violators, disturbers of the peace, bums, vagrants, victims of economic reverses "without visible means of support," suspects held for investigation (illegally, in many instances), detained witnesses (when frequently the criminal himself has money for bail and a smart lawyer, and is free on the outside), immigration detainees, bank robbers, white slavers, procurers for prostitutes—all thrown together or only nominally segregated. Some stay in our catchall jails a day, a week, a month, a year, or sometimes longer, to await trial in our overcrowded and slow moving courts of justice, or while serving sentences for misdemeanor violations, or perhaps awaiting a new trial or an appeal. In all too many instances some are completely forgotten, apparently by God and man, and left to brood over the injustice of man to man in a land whose motto is "Freedom" and whose fundamental law proclaims that a man is considered innocent until adjudged guilty by a jury of his peers.

These are our American jails. They vary in size from the four- or five-bunk "hoosegows" maintained by small towns and counties to those holding one thousand, two thousand, and in one instance three thousand inmates. Through all of these, infrequently in the smaller ones, but almost continuously in the larger ones, pass each year a motley crowd of nearly two million violators of the law.

Conditions within these jails are not wholly within the power and the province of their custodial and administrative staffs to establish and control. Many factors are involved besides those of operation, and the public is perhaps too quick to blame jail officials for things they are helpless to deal with and to correct. Many of the deficiencies of our jails have their bases in archaic or ill-advised laws, or in customs and procedures followed by our courts of justice and by our elected or appointed law enforcement, budget, or appropriation officials whose areas of responsibilities overlap those of the jail administrators.

EFFORTS TOWARD REFORM

There is, however, rapidly developing in a large and influential segment of the American public an awareness that problems of health, of public welfare, of economy, of justice, and of community self-respect are involved and that there is need for better managed local jails. Credit for this development can be shared by many organizations and by our news disseminating agencies, which often bring vividly to the public's attention the daily happenings within its jails. The press, the radio, and more recently television are powerful influences in arousing the public's interest in its jails. The more frankly and efficiently these agencies perform their services as the "public's eyes and ears," the more certain is our progress in improving these ten thousand units of our penal and correctional system which are at our very door.

The history of prison reform movements goes back many years, but not until well into the twentieth century was particular attention given here in the United States to our common jail system. The American Prison Association has pioneered in the movement for better city and county jails, and in more recent years other influential and nationwide organizations have entered the fight for a cleanup of these local institutions. Among them special mention should be made of the National Jail Association, the National Sheriffs' Association, and the Jail Inspection Service of the federal Bureau of Prisons. Many other agencies of a state and local nature too numerous to name here have given powerful and effective impetus toward jail improvements.

Despite the progress being made and the effective work that is being done by groups and individuals who are giving unstintingly of their time and effort, there are many perplexing problems yet to be solved, some of which have not yet been recognized by our law enforcement, judicial, and correctional agencies.

BASIC PROBLEMS

Some problems connected with jails are fundamental and universal, and their nature and scope must be recognized and acknowledged if progress is to be made. As long as the nature of mankind remains what it is and has been through the centuries, there will be the necessity of depriving some individuals of their freedom because their conduct meets with disapproval by the majority, or at least by the most influential members of the majority. In the United States our jails and prisons are the institutions designed and designated to perform this function of criminal segregation. And human nature being what it is, these institutions will always be necessary, as essential in the scheme of things as are our hospitals. Consequently, an enlightened citizenship cannot safely ignore these ten thousand institutions scattered throughout the length and breadth of our land.

What are some of the fundamental facts about jails? First, jails must perform the primary function of keeping in custody and under control those persons whose conduct has been, through due process of law, adjudged inimical to the best interest of the community. Concomitant with this right of the community to protect itself by depriving an antisocial individual of his freedom, there is its duty and responsibility to protect such an individual's civil and human rights during the period of his incarceration, when he himself is helpless to prevent the violation of those rights. Fortunately what we are pleased to call civilization has advanced far enough to make the average thinking citizen aware of the fact that he is "his brother's keeper," that "a tooth for a tooth" and "an eye for an eye" justice will not correct the evils of criminal behavior, and that criminals are still human beings. Second, for each time a jail or prison door opens to receive a new commitment that same door opens to release someone back into the community. Unless the care, treatment, and rehabilitation programs of jails and prisons endeavor to carry out the best possible objectives it is almost a certainty that society will have returned to its midst criminals more of a menace to its safety after release than before commitment.

JAILS AS WAY STATIONS

Jails are the first way stations to prison for criminals whose conduct requires the loss of their freedom, and every inmate confined in state and federal prisons, reformatories, and correctional institutions has come by way of some city or county jail. Because jails are of a catchall nature it is a difficult task to formulate and carry out effective care, treatment, and rehabilitation programs to meet the needs of their heterogeneous and transient population. Progress is being made in some larger cities and counties whose normal jail populations of both sentenced and unsentenced prisoners are sufficiently large to make feasible the classification of inmates into groups and areas of confinement and the development of effective rehabilitative programs. Not all large population centers are doing this, however, and most of those which have endeavored to accomplish something are doing only a superficial job and are developing only a few of their potentialities. It is true, moreover, that it is next to impossible to devise work or rehabilitation programs for the vast majority of inmates in these catchall jails. The majority of such inmates are there awaiting police investigation, a preliminary hearing before a magistrate, or trial, and the duration of their stay in jail is generally short and uncertain. Also many offenders who receive jail sentences, get only five, ten, fifteen, or thirty days, or small fines to "sit out," and it is hard to fit such short-term prisoners into a correctional or work program. Moreover, the range of their ages and their social, educational, and occupational backgrounds make each a problem unto himself and militate against group training, guidance, and therapy. The smaller the jail and its population, the more difficult it is to work out and maintain constructive programs for inmates and the less likelihood there is of institutional or community resources being available.

PROGRAMS FOR SENTENCED PRISONERS

There are many possibilities for developing those inmates who get sentences of substantial lengths—enough time to adjust themselves to some educational, vocational, work, or other rehabilitative program—into better citizens, more capable of making good after release. These possibilities depend on two things. First, if the county and the cities within the county are sufficiently large they can establish, preferably as a joint project, a short-term correctional institution for their sentenced prisoners. Second, there can be established state regional work farms or workhouses to handle sentenced prisoners from the smaller cities and counties whose resources and number of committed prisoners are not sufficient to justify institutions of their own.

THE UNSENTENCED JAIL INMATE

Although a state and its larger cities and counties may provide necessary correctional institutions for short-term sentenced offenders, there will always remain the necessity for maintaining local places of temporary detention for offenders awaiting a magistrate's hearing, for some who cannot make bail while awaiting trial, and for others whose cases are on appeal, or who have been granted a new trial. These classes of individuals generally make up a large percentage of jail inmates, and the responsibility for their detention under as favorable an environment as possible always presents a challenge to the custodians of the jail and to the community. Such prisoners cannot be moved to other institutions until certain legal and judicial requirements have been met. While none may remain long in jail, their total number constitutes a major detention problem. Because most jail prisoners come into and go out of jail so rapidly it is difficult for good and effective procedures to be maintained in important matters pertaining to their incarceration. It is almost impossible for jail employees to come to know them as individuals and the problems each presents. During the few hours or few days such prisoners stay in jail they cannot be effectively screened and classified as to custodial and health risks, tendencies for homosexual acts, suicidal and homicidal urges and other mental abnormalities, and many other factors on which proper segregation, care, and treatment rest.

In institutions which are established and operated primarily for prisoners under sentence, officials have sufficient time to study their inmates, to set up a care and treatment program on an individual basis, and to make changes when necessary, but this is not so in our thousands of catchall jails. In most of them new prisoners arrive without prior notice at any hour of the day or night and leave just as suddenly. The arresting officer frequently knows but little about the man he brings in—often not even his name. The prisoner's personal, criminal, and medical histories are either totally lacking or so incomplete as to be valueless. Despite the absence of such important information the jail's booking officer must immediately decide where to put the prisoner, if the jail is fortunate enough to have more than one section for segregation purposes.

SANITATION

Only in a few of our biggest and best jails are provisions made for new prisoners to be examined by a physician until hours or days have elapsed after commitment and for decent standards of personal hygiene to be maintained. In the vast majority of catchall city and county jails prisoners are compelled to continue to wear their own clothes regardless of how filthy or vermin-infested they may be; facilities for delousing drunks, vagrants, and bums are totally lacking; and too frequently hot and cold running water, soap and towels, any sort of provision for bathing or even for washing face and hands are nonexistent. Such deplorable conditions are almost universally found in our smaller city and county jails, and too often they exist in large ones which have funds to provide these necessities, but fail to do so.

No state or section of the country has a monopoly on either good or bad jails, as records of the federal Jail Inspection Service show. Some of the most revolting and deplorable conditions of filth, overcrowding, and lack of adequate facilities for segregation, sanitation, and control of common jail irregularities have been found almost literally within the shadows of the capitol buildings of some of our richest states that are reputed to have high standards of living and a highly developed social consciousness. On the other hand, some small jails in states commonly considered poor and backward are maintained at decent levels.

WHO IS RESPONSIBLE?

The responsibility for high or low standards in our thousands of jails falls on three groups: first, the public; second, the officials responsible for appropriations for maintaining jails, and third, the officials who operate them. The relative importance of their responsibilities is perhaps in the order named.

In the matter of public service and public institutions, a community receives only what it is willing to pay for or what it is willing to tolerate. If local jail conditions are bad and facilities are inadequate public demand can soon correct these deficiencies. It may take a local jail scandal involving finances, brutal treatment of inmates, a tragedy connected with a jail kangaroo-court killing, the suicide of a juvenile inmate, collusion in the escape of a dangerous prisoner, or any other of the many irregularities which are likely to happen in poorly equipped and poorly managed jails to arouse the community's interest in and demand for jail improvement. There is nothing so effective in arousing a community's interest in its jail as a bright spotlight of publicity thrown on it by press, radio, and television. When these "eyes and ears of the public" have done their job effectively, fairly, and without personal and political bias or vindictiveness, officials who hold the purse strings and those who run the jail cannot long resist the community's demand for better jail conditions. It is true that officials who operate jails may not make the best use of those facilities which tax money provides, or may through carelessness and indifference allow such facilities to be abused, broken, or destroyed, but when an aroused public demands an accounting these officials cannot and will not shirk their responsibility.

bility. The community can and should provide adequate building, equipment, supplies, and salaries for operating personnel, and then compel its public servants to make proper use of them.

When the community maintains an alert and intelligent interest in its jail, and when the officials who hold the purse strings do their job well, those who operate the jail can hardly fail to fall in line. Many jail officials can and do accomplish much and maintain decent institutions despite the indifference of the public. However, good catchall jails are a co-operative responsibility. Good jails are dependent on both adequate and well-maintained physical plants, and on proper and well-administered operational procedures.

PERSONNEL SELECTION AND TRAINING

Proper and acceptable standards in jail operations in turn are dependent on capable and trained personnel. All other factors may be present—a well-designed and secure building, adequate equipment, sufficient and wholesome food supplies, and reasonably high salary scales, but if personnel are untrained and incompetent, if they are lazy, careless, and untrustworthy, or if there is dissatisfaction, dissension, and working at cross-purposes, bad conditions are certain to ensue. As long as the appointment of jail employees is on a personal or political basis, or so long as merit and devotion to duty are not the basis for job and salary advancement, conditions are sure to suffer and the community should not be surprised when unfavorable news emanates from its jail. To ensure against such a situation progressive jail administrations should endeavor to start their jail improvement by raising personnel standards and promoting a training program for employees. Many deficiencies in a jail's physical plant can be almost fully compensated for by proper selection and training of its staff.

Training, of course, presupposes the appointment to jail jobs of qualified persons who are capable of being trained for their responsibilities. In addition, salary scales and working conditions which will attract competent, intelligent, and trustworthy employees to such work are essential. Beginners in jail custodial assignments should meet reasonably high standards in physical condition and work attitudes and come within age limits that ensure adaptability to new ideas and ways of doing things. Jail jobs are not for persons who are strongly opinionated or who think they can be adequately guided by intuition or hunches. Specific qualifications are too numerous to list here, but a few of the more fundamental ones can be mentioned: alertness, sufficient physical agility to cope with sudden and dangerous situations, and a capacity to make prompt and correct decisions when confronted with situations demanding them.

PATTERN FOR PROGRESS

If a community has provided for jail purposes a properly designed and adequately equipped physical plant together with sufficient funds for its operation and particularly for competent personnel, officials whose responsibility it is to manage the jail are without excuse when they fail to meet the standards established for good jails by such recognized agencies as the Jail Inspection Service of the United States Bureau of Prisons, the National Jail Association, and similar groups that have devoted years of study to jail problems. These specialists in their field are always ready to give free consultation and advisory service to communities and public officials in solving jail problems.

However, despite the progress that has been made in recent years, particularly in raising operational standards and in the almost complete elimination of the vicious kangaroo courts which formerly exercised unlimited power over inmate activities and conduct in most city and county jails, local communities still have many difficult jail matters to deal with.

Substitute institutions in place of jail detention now appear to be out of the question, at least in the foreseeable future. So long as crimes are committed and criminals have to be segregated from the more law-abiding citizenship, places of detention are as necessary for community welfare as are hospitals, fire stations, schools, and churches. Consequently, communities with self-respect and a well-developed social consciousness need to exert every conceivable effort to see that their jails have as few inherent evils as possible. To this end intelligent and concerted action on the part of officials and groups of leading citizens is necessary to ensure provisions for adequate physical plants and competent personnel for their jails. In addition, news gathering and news disseminating agencies must serve the public by keeping it fully informed concerning jail conditions.

However hopeless it now appears for local jails to be replaced with something better, there is one possible and effective measure for improvement which should not be neglected or forgotten. This is the always present possibility of keeping jail populations to the lowest feasible count. To accomplish this there must always be full co-operation and teamwork among the three local agencies involved, the courts, the prosecuting and investigating officials, and the law enforcement officers. When these agencies function together efficiently, the average time accused persons remain in local jails is materially shortened, and the daily average inmate count decreases accordingly. Unless the United States can develop ways to prevent juvenile delinquency and reduce crime, we are not likely to see any decrease in the nearly two million yearly commitments to our ten thousand catchall jails, but the total number of jail days these persons remain there can perhaps be cut substantially, and the crime-breeding and demoralizing effects of confinement under bad jail conditions can be lessened.

Do Our Prisons Cost Too Much?

By MYRL E. ALEXANDER

PRISONS are public tax-supported institutions often in the news because of disturbances, riots, or escapes, but seldom because of their less spectacular successes. Their goals, strengths, weaknesses, and failures are discussed everywhere, from pulpits to tavern bars, and from university classrooms to farmyard fences. Inevitably, the discussions turn to prison costs, since ultimately taxpayers bear the burden of prison support, and people are interested these days in the returns they get for their taxes. Street improvements, police and fire protection, school systems, and libraries are tangible benefits easily seen and experienced in the life of the community. But prisons are intangible and mysterious institutions tucked away in some remote section of the state, seldom thought of, and never seen. The harassed taxpayer sometimes reasons that after all, if a man steals, assaults, embezzles, or rapes, he belongs in "durance vile," he goes there, and the community is better for the riddance.

But those who must work closely with community problems and with the prisons are joined by many responsible citizens in the realization that these human problems are not solved by merely putting them out of sight for a time and that the ultimate cost of prisons cannot be measured by the fiscal statistics of legislative appropriations. A perspective encompassing five, ten, or twenty years leads inevitably to a most difficult question, What kind of a return are we getting for the money we spend on our prisons?

The cost of maintaining and operating prisons, like any other cost, can be evaluated best in terms of the return received on the investment. Profits in a business or a factory can be measured with precision. The returns from an investment in a church, a school, a program for the blind, or a Boy Scout troop can be measured only in terms of intangible human values. Dividends on an investment in prisons must be measured in terms of both human values and social protection.

Any attempt to compile and analyze the precise costs of American prisons is an impossible undertaking at the outset. No two prison systems use fully comparable methods of cost accounting and, surprisingly, few systems even attempt to employ any kind of valid cost accounting. Moreover, legislative appropriations do not necessarily have a direct relationship to actual costs. It is not unusual for a legislature to appropriate minimal funds for prisons with the understanding that prison administrators must supplement the appropriation with extensive farm or industrial production and somehow eke out an existence as best they can. Under those conditions the prison administrator must devote most of his energy and time to revenue-producing activities, and he is an unusual administrator who does not eventually develop a distorted big business perspective of prison administration.

There are other prison systems whose appropriations are based on performance budgeting related directly to the actual costs of operation. The administrator under those systems is able to allocate funds for essential activities and to prepare and justify more realistic appropriation budgets. The procedure does not necessarily guarantee adequate funds but it does provide a more realistic approach to the entire fiscal structure of prison management.

In the study of prison costs, one must always be aware of the fact that cost statements are not in themselves a measure of the quality and worth of a prison system. Personnel costs are a case in point. Cost statements of two different prison systems may reflect comparable expenditures for personnel and similar salary scales. In one system, thorough and continuous personnel training has been developed, and selection and retention of personnel is under a civil service system having the strengths and attributes of a constructive career service. The other prison system having comparable costs may be subjected to open political recruitment, provide no personnel training, and be honeycombed with political intrigue, unskilled handling of prisoners, and indifferent business management. The two systems have comparable costs but widely divergent results.

In some respects, however, the dollars and cents costs of our prisons can be evaluated and, in fact, must be subjected to careful scrutiny if we are to have any real expectation of improving the product of our prisons and, thereby, the return on our investments in prisons.

CAPITAL EXPENDITURES

The costs of new prison construction can be evaluated more accurately than regular operating costs. Even in construction costs several variables are involved, particularly the thoroughness of preliminary studies of inmate characteristics, population flow, and the function of the new institution in the total prison system. Whether construction is to be by contract or the use of prisoner labor directly affects costs.

Most of our present prison plants were built when prisons were intended to intimidate, coerce, and prevent escapes through sheer force and physical security. But in the past twenty-five years a new body of administrative experience has developed which has substantially altered the older concepts of the prison plant itself.

The classification method of inmate study, diagnosis, and treatment has produced new approaches to prison administration which are reflected in prison construction. The distribution of inmate populations to a series of diversified institutions having specialized functions in a prison system has substantially altered the old principle that every prison must be designed with an eye to the most difficult prisoner group. Large numbers of prisoners can now be housed in medium- or minimum-security institutions. To be sure, a maximum-security unit is needed in most systems for the most dangerous and difficult group of prisoners within the system, but the design of all prisons need not be geared to the security requirements of the few.

It is abundantly clear that prison construction costs ascend sharply in direct ratio to the degree of security required. According to current cost estimates compiled by the Construction Section of the federal Bureau of Prisons, camps for minimum-custody offenders in rural areas can be constructed at a ceiling cost of $2,000 per inmate. But a maximum-security prison will cost $15,000 per inmate. An average penitentiary, housing 1,200 inmates, will cost approximately $8,500 per inmate, while a medium-security correctional-type institution can be constructed for about $5,000 per inmate.

Those states having smaller prison populations often cannot develop a diversity of institutions. Under provisions of the Interstate Compact for Control of Crime, two or more states may enter into a reciprocal agreement to supervise parolees and probationers and to provide care and treatment of prisoners. While the Compact has been widely used for reciprocal supervision of probationers and parolees, it has seldom been utilized for prisoners. Under its provisions neighboring states can develop a series of specialized institutions similar to the prison systems operated by larger states. In the future, it is possible that through operation of the Compact, prison construction can be planned jointly by smaller states at reduced construction costs to each and with far more adequate services than one of the participating states could possibly provide for itself.

As prison design develops toward more functional plants geared to the needs of a diversified prison system, the cost in capital investment will be substantially less than under the old American prison tradition. But wherever we continue to build large catchall prisons, or to sink money in addition after addition to ancient, outmoded prisons, we can expect diminishing returns on the capital investment.

OPERATING COSTS

Although capital investment in prison plants can be evaluated with reasonable exactitude, the operating costs of prisons are elusive, often unavailable, and frequently without real significance. While prisoner population statistics and the amount of appropriations for prison operations are usually known, the actual costs of the several pertinent features of expenditures are seldom computed or available. Despite that fact, however, certain general observations and conclusions can validly be made.

Personnel salaries and requisites are the major cost of operating any prison system, with the exception of those few states who use prisoner guards in lieu of a paid officer staff. Rarely are personnel costs less than 50 per cent, and in at least one instance they are as high as 72 per cent of the total operating budget. As stated earlier, however, the cost of personnel is not in itself a true measure of personnel efficiency and effectiveness. An exception, obviously, is the state which pays its untrained guards $100 a month for an 84-hour work week.

The objectives of the modern prison reach beyond mere custody to the more constructive goal of redirecting attitudes and behavior toward acceptable life standards. Therefore, when personnel expenditures are restricted to a staff responsible for nothing other than security, subsistence, and administration, the prison must inevitably fall short of its real goal. An investment in a carefully selected and trained staff, including those trained in the professions which deal with human behavior, will assuredly return far greater dividends on the proportionate additional personnel investment required.

Another important item in prison costs is plant maintenance and operation, which naturally varies somewhat with geographical location and skill of management. Plant operation—heat, light, water, sewage disposal, and cleaning supplies—is always costly. Experienced engineers estimate that approximately 2 per cent of plant replacement cost must be expended annually in plant maintenance. Equipment replacement and repair is never inexpensive.

The prison must furnish food, clothing, laundering, shoe repair, personal hygiene supplies, release transportation and gratuities to the prisoners. Food costs alone in American prisons will vary from 35 cents to 85 cents a man day, depending upon production of the prison farm, procurement policies, nutritional standards, efficiency of menu planning and preparation, and how many of the staff and guests are fed out of the prison mess. Release costs are variable, depending upon the location of the prison in relation to large centers of population. Gratuities to released prisoners is an old and often debated story, but few prison administrators can begin to give a prisoner sufficient funds to meet his barest needs for even a few weeks after release. The cost of prisoner care varies widely, but usually is amazingly low. In the federal prison system, for example, actual cost for this entire feature is currently within a few mills of 75 cents per man day.

After the plant has been operated and maintained, the personnel paid, and the prisoners clothed, fed, and released, there remains only the question of whether any funds have been left over for religious and recreational activities, medical supplies, library, educational and psychological testing supplies, and similar costs of inmate treatment and training activities exclusive of personnel. In some prisons virtually nothing is left for those activities and in others little more than a token fund. Some institutions have turned to using profits from inmate store sales, handicraft sales, and even paid conducted tours of sightseers to finance education, recreation, and welfare activities.

THE MANAGEMENT FACTOR IN PRISON COSTS

To the most casual student of prison costs, it is evident that experience and skill in management determine to a high degree the effectiveness of the prison. The preparation, justification, and presentation of budget requests to legislative committees or to administrative agencies alone requires special experience and skills. Budgeting and managing appropriated funds by central administrative authorities vary greatly. Control and management of prison dollars by institutional administrators affect in widely diversified ways the real goals of the prison. But as long as prison management is characterized by constant administrative turnover depriving prisons and prison systems of the managerial skills which come only through long experience of sincere, intelligent, dedicated prison administrators, the taxpayer will continue to get minimal returns on his investment in prisons. Some personal experiences document that fact.

In one large penitentiary where the staff changes every election year, the library is a pitiful collection of Western pulps and old public library discards. Yet I saw enough money wasted in the uncontrolled use of soap powder, toilet paper, and cleaning supplies to stock the world's finest modern prison library.

In another institution which had sought assistance in preparing a justification for a proposed $25,000 appropriation for education and classification personnel (the institution had none) an ancient six-foot garden wall surrounding a large plot in front of the prison, outside the security area, was surmounted by four completely useless tower boxes requiring the services of sixteen officers to man around the clock and the calendar at an average salary of $2,700 a year. The four towers contributed little to security. A modern control tower erected in front of the institution would have given greater security, could have been manned by four officers, and would have saved more than enough money to provide essential treatment personnel. But the garden wall with its little towers had stood unchallenged for more than fifty years.

In yet another prison an administrative policy of assigning only extreme behavior problems to a modern prison industries plant so completely stymied production and training that profits of untold thousands of dollars were lost which could have been available for a program of inmate training with increased profits for the state.

In another section of the country a prison warden's pride and joy were his beautiful dairy barns and steam-heated swinery. The dairy herd produced more than four pounds of milk per day per inmate in the institution, despite the fact that the most liberal nutritional standards do not exceed one and one-half pounds of milk per man per day. More than two and one-half times the necessary cost of stock feed went into that dairy herd. The warden also liked to see his hogs go to slaughter well fattened. Despite expert opinion that ideal slaughtering weights are approximately 225 pounds, the institution purchased feed and fattened hogs to one hundred pounds excess weight, producing mostly unneeded cheap lard. And that institution had no educational director, vocational director, caseworker, or full-time physician.

Dollars wasted through unskilled management have no impact upon ultimate goals of the prison and are lost forever to the taxpayers.

Yet throughout the entire American prison scene there is an accumulating body of improved managerial experience, and proven, successful methods are being practiced here and there throughout the country by prison administrators. Perhaps the most notable step taken in recent years toward improving prison management is publication by the American Prison Association of the Manual of Suggested Standards for a State Correctional System (revised 1954). But those principles can be translated into daily practice only after mature experience in prison management. Nowhere on the American prison scene is there a school or an executive workshop which provides a forum for the exchange of grass-roots practice in the management of prison funds or compiles proven managerial practices. The publication of the Manual of Suggested Standards should be followed by the organization of a forum or a workshop in prison management where career prison administrators and junior executives can come together for a week or two each year to systematically study, compile, and organize a body of working methods and techniques which would contribute to the more rapid development of superior managerial skills in prison administration.

PRODUCTIVE PRISON LABOR

One of the most costly aspects of prisons is the widespread failure to provide productive employment for prisoners. Less than one-half of the available prisoner manpower of the United States is constructively employed, and the proportion is increasing. This idleness in American prisons costs the taxpayers millions of dollars annually. Prisoners should contribute to their support to the greatest possible degree consistent with a philosophy which does not permit exploitation. Their productive efforts can ease the taxpayer's burden by producing and processing much of the food they consume; by maintaining and preserving plant and equipment; by performing public works such as reforestation, land reclamation, and road building; and by producing a portion of the goods used by the state and its political subdivisions. Prison riots and disturbances bred by conditions of endless enforced idleness result in other direct and unnecessary costs to the taxpayers.

Perhaps more important than the direct and immediate costs are the unmeasurable indirect costs resulting from the deteriorating effects of idleness on men. Whereas meaningful productive employment offers training, self-respect, and hope, mass idleness fosters mental and physical stagnation with the promise of future additional cost to the taxpayer.

A well-balanced productive prison work program is essential. It should take into account the needs of the state in reducing the costs of imprisonment, and both the present and the future needs of the prisoners. In most prisons, maintenance, farming, and training activities cannot provide enough useful work for all prisoners. The remainder must be employed in a diversified prison industrial program using modern methods and equipment to train prisoners in present-day industrial skills. It is generally accepted that the state-use system of industries, which supplies a reasonable proportion of the diversified products used by government agencies, best meets the requirements of our present penal philosophy and is least objectionable to the self-interested groups who oppose prison industrial programs. Prison administrators must develop a forthright approach to this problem. An effective mandatory purchase law by all the state agencies and political subdivisions for such products and services as may be available from prison labor is essential. The guidance of an advisory policy board composed of public-minded citizens representing the major interests concerned is useful in interpreting the problem to the public and in meeting the resistance of groups who oppose such a program in their own narrow interests.

Full productive employment of prisoners must be attained if the burden of unnecessary prison costs is to be lifted from the economy of the nation.

A PROFIT AND LOSS SUMMARY

While prison costs are elusive, inaccessible, and subject to wide variations in interpretation, certain general facts are clear. Prison construction has not kept pace with accumulated experience, population increase, or scientific knowledge in dealing with human behavior. The majority of our prison plants are ancient and outmoded structures which act as barriers to the actual practice of modern correction philosophy and contribute disproportionately to the ultimate cost of prisons.

Personnel costs represent a major part of every dollar spent on prison operations. But too little—sometimes nothing—is expended for professional treatment personnel. Personnel expenditures per se mean little except when evaluated in connection with personnel standards, training, and performance. The total annual cost of prison operations includes very little for the financial support of broad programs for inmate treatment and training.

The failure to provide alert, flexible, realistic management is one of the most glaring aspects of prison costs.

Widespread idleness of prisoners, the direct result of our failure to provide constructive prison industries, is an intangible but very real and unnecessary cost in American prisons.

The cost of our prisons can be measured only in terms of their ultimate effect upon those hundreds of thousands of men and women, who, when released from prison, resume normal community life. Those who have found in prison only experiences which embitter and thrust them deeper into criminal pathways, and who again commit crimes only to return again and again to the prison, compound beyond imagination the ultimate cost of prisons. On the other hand, those persons who, through constructive prison experience, are able to carve out useful, productive, law-abiding niches in society return dividends far beyond any calculation on funds invested in their reformation.

Our prisons in their failures are piling up costs beyond reckoning. To be sure, there is a developing awareness in some sections of the country that unreasonable frugality accomplishes little more than to delay the eventual price which must be paid for our prisons at usurious rates of compound interest.

In facing squarely the issue of today's prison costs we can only conclude that if we would reduce our ultimate costs, a small additional fraction of today's expenditures must be invested now in the widespread development of career personnel, in the replacement of outmoded prison plants, in more effective programs of inmate treatment and training, and in the development of badly needed research in prison administration. This additional investment is the one best hope of freedom from the encumbrance of tomorrow which the prisons of today place upon our economy.

Does the Prison Reform?

By GEORGE B. VOLD

THE fact that this question has been included as an appropriate title for analysis and elaboration in a 1954 symposium on prison reform is of itself perhaps more important than any simple yes or no answer that might be given. It is well to remember that there was a time when such a question would not have been asked because the prison was not expected to serve a reformatory function.

Imprisonment came into penal practice as a substitute for corporal and capital punishments and not as a device to make men good. Apparently it was conceived of as softer, less painful, less horrifying for the convicted criminal than the otherwise familiar and traditional brutalities of crude and savage abuse of the body. The object of punishment, then as now, was to frighten the culprit through painful experience so that he would not again yield to temptation and commit crime. Imprisonment as a substitute penalty therefore had to be a sufficiently unpleasant and disagreeable experience so that the inmate would be as thoroughly frightened at the evil consequences of his criminality as if his punishment had been an agonizing ordeal of physical pain.

Yet concern for the consequences of punishment is implicit in the very idea itself. Theoretically, punishment should lead to a change in behavior so that the individual who has been properly punished will not again become involved in misdeeds. If he continues to misbehave, it has usually been taken to mean that the punishment was somehow inappropriate, principally that it was not sufficiently severe.

Characteristic of this whole frame of reference is the basic principle of some kind of scale of severity increasing with the seriousness of or the repetition of the offense. As a normal consequence, imprisonment was first used as a substitute penalty in the punishment of petty crimes. Vagrants and "sturdy beggars" or were incarcerated in "workhouses" or jails as a substitute for whipping, branding, and other mutilations long before imprisonment began to be used as a suitable punishment for more serious offenses. When imprisonment began to be used for many kinds of offenses, it was nevertheless on the general assumption that it was less severe as punishment than the penalties for which it was substituted.

REFORMATION BY IMPRISONMENT

The transition from the idea of imprisonment as a form of punishment to one of imprisonment as a device for the reformation of criminals constitutes a large chapter in the history of penology that need not be reviewed here. It should be noted, however, that always there has been the persisting problem of repeaters in crime. Undoubtedly the failure of the system of increasing severity of punishments, both corporal and institutional, to control recidivism had a considerable part in bringing about the so-called reformatory movement.¹

It is a well-established fact that the savage punishments of earlier days were notoriously ineffective in keeping those punished from repeating their misconduct.² A single short account may serve as a useful illustration:

In spite of the absence of modern identification procedure, the recidivist was often recognized. . . . In 1617 a woman who was strangled at Amsterdam was found to have been arrested previously twenty-one times—seven times in Amsterdam, three times in Leiden and in Delft, twice in Haarlem, and once in Alkmaar, Middelburg, Dortrecht, Wesop, Enkhuizen, and The Hague. Altogether, she had been exposed on the scaffold eleven times, whipped eight times, branded five times, and her ears cut off. She had been banished for life seven times. During 1603-6, one Amsterdam offender was whipped six times and branded five times; in 1614-16, one was whipped eight times and branded four times; in one year, 1616, one man was four times whipped and thrice branded; while during 1614-18, one had a record of eleven whippings and five brandings. The prisoner who in 1617 had his eyes pierced, recovered the sight in one eye, but within a few years he had been six times whipped and thrice branded.³

Few will quarrel with Professor Sellin's interpretative conclusion that "the ineffectiveness of public and severe penalties was becoming obvious to those who imposed them and to other thoughtful citizens."⁴

The historic "Declaration of Principles" of the Cincinnati, Ohio, meeting of the First Prison Congress in 1870 therefore comes as climax to a long process of change in thinking about crime and punishment. One of the "principles" mentioned above includes the famous statement that "the supreme aim of prison discipline is the reformation of criminals, not the infliction of vindictive suffering."⁵ Since that time there has been increasingly general acceptance, in verbal expression at least, of reformation as the desired end product of imprisonment. Controversy continues over how to promote or achieve reformation, but there is no dispute about its desirability as an end objective. The terms "prison" and "reformatory" persist but with no real difference in purpose between the two institutions.

This present-day emphasis on the need for the rehabilitation of criminals makes the question of whether prisons do accomplish reformation one of crucial importance for modern penology. For the past several decades the prison—that historic institution that whatever else it sought to do must always guarantee the secure confinement of its inmates—has been the central unit or principal device for the implementation of whatever "treatment" our society has sought to carry out on its convicted offenders. As such it is the visible symbol of the entire penal system. If the prison fails to reform, then it follows as a necessary logical inference that the present penal system, as a whole, fails in any major accomplishment of its declared purpose and objective.

Enthusiasm for the ideal of reformation as the objective of penal practice must not be permitted to color judgments about actual accomplishments in the realization of the ideal. If reformation is taking place, it should be apparent in terms of factual data about those involved in crime and subjected to penal treatment. Information about the outcome of prison treatment must be examined with impersonal objectivity reardless of whether it gives comfort to or tends to discourage belief in the reformation ideal.

Two general kinds of source materials are available that throw some light on the principal problem, namely, information about recidivism, that is, the failure to reform, and information about positive accomplishment, the story of those who have changed from criminality to noncriminality. The principal sources and indications, including some tending in both directions, will be summarized in the sections that follow.

FIGURES ON RECIDIVISM

Considerable statistical information is now available on the prevalence of repeaters in the various jurisdictions or levels of procedure that handle criminals. These statistics do not add up to a single conclusive index, but the tendency of the many separate reports to point in the same direction suggests a consistency that invites the serious attention of everyone concerned. Some of the more important indicators of the extent of recidivism in the United States are reviewed below.

Police information about previous arrests

When the police arrest a culprit, are they dealing with a "first timer," or are they taking in a person who has been arrested before? Obviously, absence of statistical information about arrests cannot be taken uncritically as an indicator of actual nonarrest. It may mean only that no report of arrest was made to a central agency. The basic information now available appears in Table 1.

The seeming increase in recidivism shown in these figures represents in all probability primarily the fact of more complete reporting of arrests by local police to the FBI. Also, of course, as the time span increases during which uniform records have been kept the degree of coverage increases in depth as well. As coverage increases, both in space and in time, the probabilities are increasing that a condition of "no record" actually means no previous arrest. But for the present, it must be remembered that there are still a great many arrests made every year that are not reported to the FBI and about which no information is available as to previous arrests. In other words, police information about recidivism understates rather than overstates the actual condition as far as arrests are concerned.

Sentenced prisoners in jails and workhouses

Statistical information about prisoners in American jails and workhouses is notoriously inadequate and unreliable. These institutions are under local government control and no central reporting system, nor any type of uniform definitions or classifications, has ever been worked out for them. The Census Bureau no longer concerns itself with this kind of statistical report. The decennial census of population, which does attempt to count noses wherever found, records no data on previous arrests.

Scattered information about those serving sentences in jails and workhouses, as distinguished from mere detention, is relatively consistent, however, as the following figures show:

1923, Special Census Bureau Report,⁶ 46.8 per cent of those committed to jails or workhouses had been previously committed.

1933, Special Census Bureau Report,⁷ 58.5 per cent of those committed to jails or workhouses had been previously committed.

1934, Connecticut Jail Study,⁸ nearly 80 per cent had records of previous criminality.

1937, District of Columbia Jail Survey,⁹ about 77 per cent had records of previous criminality.

Many other special jail studies have been made, usually concerned with the deplorable conditions of housekeeping and general care provided but giving no systematic attention to the difficult question of recidivism. It should be noted in the above figures that, with improved sources of information in the more recent studies, the recidivism rate is much higher than the one reported in 1923. If a current report for the country as a whole were available, it would probably show that approximately three-fourths of those committed to jails and workhouses have been previously committed.

Prisoners in state and federal prisons and reformatories

These institutions deal almost exclusively with persons convicted of felonies, that is, relatively serious crime. Understandably enough, therefore, more effort has been expended on discovering previous records for this group than for any other type of prisoner. Even so, it must be remembered that any failure to discover or to report a previous conviction results in the kind of error that understates, rather than overstates, the amount of recidivism involved. The average proportion of prisoners with previous commitments in all institutions reporting is shown below for the years indicated:¹⁰

1923—50.5 per cent of all prisoners received from the courts.

1930—55.4 per cent of all prisoners received from the courts.

1933—50.8 per cent of all prisoners received from the courts.

1939—50.3 per cent of all prisoners released from the institutions.

1946—51.1 per cent of all prisoners released from the institutions.

A more detailed breakdown shows percentage distribution for 1946 (Table 2).¹¹

• TABLE 2—PREVIOUS COMMITMENTS OF ADMISSIONS TO FEDERAL AND STATE PRISONS, BY PER CENT

Prior Commitment	All Institutions	Federal Institutions	State Institutions
With prior commitment information reported.....	100.0%	100.0%	100.0%
No prior commitment.....	48.9	55.9	46.1
Jail or juvenile institution.....	20.2	18.4	20.9
1 prison commitment.....	18.0	14.6	19.4
2 prison commitments.....	7.2	6.1	7.6
3 or more prison commitments.....	5.7	5.0	6.0

These averages do not have a great deal of significance in view of the fact that variations in reports on prior commitments are considerable among the several states. A few examples will illustrate the point.¹² California, a state with relatively complete statistical service, reports only 25.0 per cent as with no previous commitment, while 39.9 per cent had previous prison commitment and 35.2 per cent had been previously committed to jails or juvenile institutions. Comparable information for New York State is: 40.6 per cent, no prior commitment; 24.6 per cent with prior prison commitment; 34.8 per cent with jail or juvenile institution commitment. On the other hand, Arizona reports only 19.0 per cent as having a prior prison commitment; 0.6 per cent with jail or juvenile institution commitment; and 80.4 per cent as having no prior commitment at all. It seems reasonable to conclude that such differences reflect primarily differences in the completeness of information and variations in reporting procedure rather than in the actual frequency of recidivism involved. Where the information is most nearly complete, these recidivism figures check in general with the police reports on arrests.

With the reorganization of government statistical services after World War II, the Census Bureau discontinued its regular reports on prisoners. No generally comparable source of information is now available and therefore these series end with 1946. The "National Prisoner Statistics" currently issued in fugitive form by the United States Bureau of Prisons is only a stopgap effort to keep alive some of the more immediately needed administrative series. It has not attempted to publish information on currently received reports on prior commitments. In its own report¹³ on federal prisons for 1952 only 38.9 per cent are shown as without previous commitment. In other words, 61.1 per cent had already experienced institutional treatment before their current admission to the federal prisons.

Special Follow-up Studies—Massachusetts

Of follow-up studies now at hand, probably the best known and the ones with the most complete information about all aspects of the inmates concerned are the studies by Sheldon and Eleanor Glueck. These authors reviewed and interpreted their findings in a little book prepared for the English Studies in Criminal Science series and published in 1945.¹⁴ The after-discharge conduct of two principal series of offenders (500 reformatory inmates and 1,000 juvenile delinquents) are reported on through three separate five-year follow-up periods (fifteen years) for each series. The arrangement below gives the per cent who were recidivists (officially delinquent plus unofficial delinquency) for each period:¹⁵

	Period I	Period II	Period III
Juvenile delinquents	85.4	73.2	63.4
Reformatory inmates	80.1	69.9	69.2

In another follow-up study of women after confinement in the Massachusetts Reformatory for Women, the Gluecks report a situation not significantly different for the first five-year follow-up period. Thus there were only 15.2 per cent who did not become delinquent either during the parole period or in the five years after release from the institution. That is to say, 84.8 per cent were recidivists by individual case follow-up.¹⁶

Special Follow-up Study—Minnesota

In a recently published¹⁷ follow-up study of the inmates of the Minnesota State Reformatory, St. Cloud, the findings were slightly less dismal than those reported by the Gluecks for Massachusetts. The St. Cloud report was for the whole group of 345 men who left the reformatory during the fiscal year 1944-45. Their subsequent conduct was carefully checked through June 30, 1950. "... 47.2 per cent were clear of offenses and revocations during the follow-up period . . . [with] . . . recidivism not exceeding 52.8 per cent."¹⁸

¹⁸ Ibid., p. 626.

There is also an interesting comparison of after-conduct of 183 parolees and 110 released on expiration of sentence. Of the parolees 57.9 per cent were involved in later offenses but only 52.7 per cent of the expiration group had subsequent offenses.¹⁹

Many other statistical findings could be cited in further elaboration of the extent of recidivism, but there seems to be no point in additional detail. Sufficient material has been reviewed to show why the conclusion is generally accepted that "all studies show that a large proportion of offenders are recidivists."²⁰

INFORMATION ABOUT REFORMATION

It is still impossible to demonstrate statistically that reformation, when it occurs, is due to institutional treatment. Penology, in this sense, is in the same boat with medicine. When a sick patient recovers it is always somewhat problematical whether the recovery was brought about by the treatment prescribed, or whether the patient possessed recuperative powers and got well in spite of treatment. When the patient dies there is no question about failure of treatment, but when he recovers the situation is much less clear. Failure to achieve reformation can be demonstrated—the inmate returns to crime and in due season comes back to the prison for postgraduate treatment. But for the one who does not come back—did he change his behavior because of prison training and treatment or in spite of it? No information now available can give any serious scientific answer to that problem.

It is a basic fallacy of the sentimental approach to rehabilitation to assume that every inmate committed to prison constitutes an equally good prospect for rehabilitation. Actually, some are very poor risks while others are relatively much more promising prospects. Whether one views the apparent preponderance of recidivists in prison as an indication of failure to accomplish reformation or places the emphasis on the smaller segment successfully salvaged from further criminality seems to be largely a matter of temperament and point of view.

The fact that from 20 to 40 per cent or more of offenders do not repeat their misconduct in such ways as to be returned to prison is of tremendous significance in view of the long chain of factors, involving all kinds of negative selection, that precede commitment to a penal institution. All recidivism studies show considerable proportions who did not recidivate. In the more careful follow-up studies this fact has been verified through elaborate individual case study.

Thus the Glueck reformatory series revealed that a total of 140 cases out of an initial 417 achieved reformation in the sense of nondelinquency for fifteen years after release from the institution. This is approximately one-third of the whole group and should not be dismissed as insignificant.²¹

All responsible prison administrators, parole agents, and others who have worked directly and intimately with the criminals in prison know, through personal knowledge of after-conduct, of numerous individual cases of whom it may truthfully be said that reformation has taken place—be it because of or in spite of prison experience.

The conclusion is inescapable that some reformation or rehabilitation does take place in the course of present penal treatment procedures. Whether the proportion reformed represents all that possibly can be done is quite another matter. Presumably no type of treatment would rehabilitate 100 per cent of prison inmates. How increase the proportion who are reformed or rehabilitated? Suggestions for some more adequate answers to that question will have to come from other considerations than attention to recidivism per se.

IMPLICATIONS FOR TREATMENT PROGRAMS

The fact that the people who enter our prisons have more often than not been in institutions before poses a number of interesting questions for the future. Does the poor record of accomplishment result from misconceptions and mistaken ideas about what needs to be done? Or do the poor results flow from facilities (buildings, materials, staff, and personnel) inadequate to do what clearly needs to be done? Or is extensive rehabilitation, as such, possibly an essentially hopeless task, and is only a decently humane program of more or less permanent care needed, the cost of which may in part be offset by the returns from efficiently managed prison labor programs?

Rehabilitation, according to the present orientation of penology, seeks to provide two kinds of services, seeks to do two kinds of things, from which it is hoped that the rehabilitation of the inmates will result.

1. Ideally, there should be adequate psychological and psychiatric services to uncover the deep-seated mental disturbances assumed to be significantly related to individual misconduct. When the individual "gets straightened out inside," he understands himself and his surroundings better and therefore seeks a more intelligent life orientation than crime—hence reformation should take place.

2. Similarly, there should be adequate

(and fairly elaborate) programs of education and vocational training to correct the ignorance, poor habits, and lack of skill (presumably due to unfavorable environment and underprivilege) that are assumed to be important factors in the unfortunate individual's criminality.

These two general techniques, either singly or in combination, encompass almost the entire battery of procedures with which the modern "treatment program" in prison hopes to bring about rehabilitation. Perhaps one of the difficulties may be the very inadequacy and inappropriateness of this basic approach.

Viewed from a somewhat different perspective, the high proportion of failure in reformation is seen to be logically related to the composition of the population treated. The ordinary prison population may be characterized as consisting of three segments, or parts, namely:

1. The psychologically disturbed, for whom crime is some sort of symbolic release of persistent and deep-seated mental conflict. The only effective treatment known, and that is not very effective, is that patterned on the modern mental hospital. Many patients are released from mental hospitals as "improved," but the lapse rates for most mental ills are very high. Readmission, in relation to first admission, often gives rates not too dissimilar from those found in criminal recidivism statistics.²² To the extent that the prison population is made up of similarly disturbed people, high recidivism rates rather than complete reformation should be expected.

2. The unskilled and uneducated but otherwise "normal" person whose need is to acquire sufficient skill to earn an honest living. Too often, however, such unskilled inmates are also of very limited ability, so that no high level of skill or accomplishment can be achieved. Frustration, defeat, and ineffectiveness are inevitable consequents. The problem is often more one of downgrading self-expectations than of supplying the skills and training that would make possible successful achievement of high expectations. That aspect of the American educational problem, outside of prisons as well as inside, so far has not been met in any adequate manner. The end result, however, is high recidivism rates rather than reformation.

3. The psychologically "normal" and educationally "average" persons who identify themselves with a different, an "antisocial," or a non-law-abiding way of life. Such people represent no special training problem in the ordinary sense—they are often well-trained and well-adjusted individuals who are only marking time in prison. They are not disturbed; they have no need of, and no interest in, advice or counsel; they are only waiting to get out to resume their customary life orientation. The prisoner whose incarceration involves political or religious principles is typically of this kind. So, too, is a large segment of the dishonest "high class crook" type whose only difficulty is that he is "agin" the forces of the organized community rather than with them. There is no present information or "wisdom" that can supply any effective programs for the reformation of this group. In this case, too, the result is more likely to be recidivism than reformation.

IMPLICATIONS FOR RESEARCH

If there is any validity in the above analysis, it is apparent that the high recidivism rates come about as a result of a combination of a number of basic factors. The mere increasing of facilities and manpower to do better and more completely what we now are doing will not help much unless there is developed a comprehensive and deeply searching program of research as the springboard for new techniques of treatment.

Serious research needs the support of regular budgets and a stable, skilled group of research workers. That seems to be the principal next requirement, and the response must come, first of all, from top-level responsible administrators. When basic research gets budgetary support, as well as lip service, from those in control of budgets, several new pages may be turned in the still to be written chapter on how to increase the proportion of inmates rehabilitated, or reformed, as a result of prison experience.

The Process of Reception in the Adult Correctional System

By NORMAN FENTON

FOR some offenses, the law makes commitment to prison mandatory. In the majority of cases in the criminal courts, alternatives to prison commitment are probation, fines, incarceration in the local jail, or, in some states, commitment to a hospital for the mentally ill or mentally defective.

If there are no local diagnostic clinics serving the criminal courts, then it is reasonable to suppose that men and women may be sent to prison who could have been handled in some other way more economically and more humanely. Many individuals now sent to prison and examined there in the reception center may be found by clinical study not to have required the drastic treatment of prison commitment. Had they been studied by the courts and the personality features of their cases revealed, the judges might have been able to use methods more suitable than prison commitment. Ideally, it would be desirable to work toward the concept of preprison clinical screening under local or state auspices, so that the sentence to prison may be used only when absolutely necessary.

Acceptance by local and state authorities of mutually overlapping responsibilities has been more ready for juvenile delinquents than for adult offenders. A generation ago, the states of Illinois, Ohio, and California, to mention but three, had developed resources directed toward keeping children and youth out of state institutions. These resources were principally local clinical centers or traveling child guidance clinics. To fortify the efforts of the clinics and the probation officials, other local resources were established, such as the employment of visiting teachers, the addition of counseling services in the schools, and the enrichment of local recreational facilities—all of these designed to help children and youth at the local level and to try to prevent institutionalization in state correctional schools.

It now seems desirable and necessary to develop more resources for adult offenders to prevent their institutionalization. Again, as in the history of the treatment of juvenile delinquency, the clear recognition of the overlapping responsibility of local and state correctional agencies must be the preface to this development. If the local agency is too small or too poor to establish clinical resources to screen out from the parade of prison-bound human beings those who should not go there, then the state must establish such resources. The state should be empowered to provide clinical study and to recommend to the local judicial authorities alternatives to prison commitment in individual cases.

In California, where the average rate of probation for all the counties has been reported as about two cases in five and the range in the use of probation from a little less than one in five to almost three in five, it is obvious that more persons may be sent to prison than need be. In fairness, one might add that in some jurisdictions, perhaps, probation may be used for some cases that really need treatment in a correctional institution for their own welfare and for the protection of society. Until by adequately staffed diagnostic clinics the state and local authorities join in the screening of convicted offenders before use is made of prison commitment—as in New Jersey, where a beginning in this direction has been made—we shall never fully appreciate to what extent commitment to prison is used unnecessarily.

FROM "QUARANTINE" TO THE RECEPTION CENTER

Whatever the situation may be regarding the screening of cases before institutionalization, state prison authorities, it would seem, can no longer evade their responsibilities for the diagnostic study of prisoners upon admission to prison. Advances in clinical methods for the personality appraisal of adult offenders have been such as to offer practical help to those in charge of prisons. From the custodial standpoint, the anticipation, through individual diagnostic study, of prison maladjustment in individual cases and the forewarning to the custodial staff that certain prisoners may try to escape or to engage in assaultive behavior, is good management practice. The need for efficiency in the operation of prison maintenance or correctional industries makes the clinical appraisal of the capacities and interests of new inmates (employees) as necessary as are the screening and assignment methods of personnel departments in large mercantile or industrial establishments. Early recognition by the reception center staff of the needs of newly received inmates is essential for corrective medical and psychiatric services, for education or vocational training, for guidance in religion, or for individual or familial social assistance. The prison may thereafter utilize its treatment resources for the welfare of those inmates who are most likely to profit from them.

All but the most ignorant and insecure prison officers, those who are sometimes "symptomatically omniscient," have recognized these practical values of the study of newly received prisoners and have established some type of initial observation and "quarantine" procedures. The current trend is away from the use of a few "holding" cells for segregation of the newly committed inmates, with inmates and staff members interviewing them and co-operating in case recording, toward introduction of the professionally staffed reception center. Reception centers have been developed in several states and are now under consideration in others. If the prisons are ever to become genuine treatment agencies, this transition from the procedures of the quarantine section to professionally staffed reception centers seems necessary.¹

PURPOSES AND VALUES OF RECEPTION PROCESS

It may be profitable at this point in our discussion to summarize the general objectives of the adequate reception process.² These are:

1. The study of the personality and social background of the newly committed inmates by a competent professional staff.

2. The screening of prisoners for assignment to particular institutions and to special segregation units in terms of their needs and the custodial provisions of the institutions.

3. The planning of a program of individual treatment for consideration by the staff of the receiving institution.

4. The preparation of individual case studies of value in the assignment of men to work in the maintenance of the prison and in correctional industries in accordance with individual needs and institutional provisions.

5. Recognition of the prison subversives and the psychopaths, and recommendation of individualized programs to prevent escapes, assaultive behavior, arson and other destruction of property, and other incidents unfortunate both for the inmate and the institution.

In addition, the reception center has these further values:

It offers an excellent locale for individual and group methods of adjusting the inmates to being in prison and for their orientation to the opportunities and restrictions of prison life.

The results of case studies in the reception center may reveal the need for specialized institutions not as yet provided in the state prison system and for additional or improved segregation or treatment facilities in existing institutions.

In a broader sense, the systematic and consistent collection of data regarding the characteristics of the men received makes possible the constructive development of the entire training and treatment program of the prison.

Finally, the data from the careful and consistent case studies of the reception centers lend themselves readily to research into the causes and treatment of delinquency and criminality. Findings from these studies may ultimately lead to the prevention and control of the types of social maladjustment leading to prison commitments.

RECEPTION NEEDS IN THE SMALL PRISON SYSTEM

As the prison system obtains appropriations for clinical services, the question arises whether or not to utilize these resources in a reception center for newly received prisoners. The size of the prison system may determine the answer. If the prison facilities of a state are limited to an institution for ordinary male prisoners and a reformatory for younger men, it would seem to be impractical to establish a separate reception center. In contrast to necessities in the larger states, to be discussed later, it should be possible in the smaller states for the same members of the clinical staff to continue to counsel and treat the man from reception to discharge from parole. In some of the larger states at present the inmate may develop rapport first with one group of caseworkers in the reception center, thereafter with others in the institution, and finally with those on the staff of the parole bureau. If recent experience in psychiatric casework has taught anything, it is the value, ordinarily, of continuity of treatment rather than this relaying of cases from one caseworker to another. In the small prison system, clinical resources should be integrated with the entire program of the correctional system rather than limited to the reception process.

THE LARGER PRISON SYSTEM

In the larger prison systems where there may be several geographically rather widely separated prisons, some with overlapping characteristics as to kinds of inmates and types of programs, valid arguments may be offered in favor of the centralized reception center. For example, almost five thousand male prisoners are received annually in the California reception centers. Most of them are classified for transfer to one of the state's six prisons. A few who have been returned for parole violation may be recommended for transfer from the reception center to one of the honor camps. Also in each of the prisons there may be special units for the segregation of particular types of inmates, such as the effeminate sexual deviate, the blind, the elderly, and the tubercular. It is evident that a centralized reception process, separated from the individual institutional programs, is a practical necessity in California.

Because of the size of the state, adult male offenders are received in two centers—one with a capacity of 408 in the south near Los Angeles on the grounds of the California Institution for Men at Chino, and the other with a capacity of over 800 near San Francisco on the grounds of the California State Prison at San Quentin. The Department of Corrections operates two prison buses, which take the men after classification in the reception centers to the prisons and segregation units recommended for them by the reception center staff and approved by the Director of Corrections. To achieve effective classification in a prison system the size of California's, which receives inmates from fifty-eight different counties, the separate reception center seems to be almost a necessity. For states of intermediate size, careful study and analysis of many factors will need to be made before deciding whether to have a separate reception center or to integrate these clinical resources with the staffs of the institutions.

THE RECEPTION CENTER—ADMINISTRATIVE SETTING

an existing prison or as a separate facility, may be answered only by study of the local situation. In the small prison system, for reasons of economy, the reception center should be on the grounds of one of the institutions. Administratively, the head of the center should report directly to the warden or superintendent. The administration of the clinical phases of the program may be separate. Whatever particular arrangements are made, the success of the program will usually depend primarily upon the good will and co-operation of the staff of the host institution with the center.

In the larger prison system, the center should have a location independent of any other institution and it should be separately administered. If this cannot be done, then as great an approximation as possible to the independence of the agency should be developed. There are many reasons, almost all on the basis of economy, which are significant in answering this moot question in favor of the location of the reception center on the grounds of an existing institution and administratively under the head thereof. Opposed to these is the basic fact that the reception center is a departmental operation and should not be subordinated to the management of the particular institution where it is located. There is always the danger that objective attitudes toward institutional assignments may be negated by local interference. The warden of the host institution may bring pressure to bear to have the more desirable inmates transferred to his place and the more troublesome prisoners sent to other institutions to rehabilitate.

The broader purposes of the reception center as an agency for collaborating with local jurisdictions in preventing prison commitments is another obvious departmental function, and a forceful argument for the separation of the reception center from any local institutional entanglements.

PHYSICAL FACILITIES

Whatever the administrative auspices, the physical facilities must be carefully planned.⁸ The different types of inmates received in a reception center make it necessary to have good security and custodial control. Facilities for the segregation of special types and for disciplinary cases are necessary. Dormitories are not desirable. Some of the cell arrangements must be of maximum security, other of medium security, with outside windows. Ordinarily, minimum-security facilities should not be used.

The resources of the center should include adequate and soundproofed offices and interviewing rooms for the staff. For the purpose of providing constructive activities, dayrooms are necessary with facilities for reading, correspondence, and quiet games; so likewise are a gymnasium and good and easily accessible outdoor recreational facilities. Classrooms for group counseling and remedial education, general shops for trial of performance abilities in the manual skills, and arrangements for religious services and instruction are other necessities. Pleasantly furnished visiting rooms should be provided.

The receiving unit should be carefully planned. The procedures during the period immediately after the actual reception of the inmate from the county authorities would differ with each prison system; their importance for morale should be recognized. A manual of procedures for the reception center may be prepared to cover these admission procedures, including the checking of commitment papers, preliminary physical examination, dressing in, the details of identification, and the like.

PROGRAM

The first and perhaps the major emphasis of the program of the reception center should be to obtain as complete a picture as possible of the inmate and his needs. This will be done not only through the customary clinical channels, but also by observations in other situations, such as group counseling sessions, recreational activities, attendance at religious services, and classroom and shop behavior. The inmate's relations with those who visit him and with others on the outside are also very important areas of observation.

Since the minimum time necessary with adult prisoners for an adequate admission study and prison orientation is two months, the above activities are essential not only for the purposes indicated but also to prevent the idleness and destructive talk that exist in the ordinary jail or "quarantine" section of the prison. The thoughts of the inmate from the time of admission should be guided toward consideration of the situation he will face when released to society. At the same time, and in the same focus, the relationship of the therapeutic aspects of the prison program to adjustment on parole must be explained. For a time, in one prison system, the members of the parole board and the chief of the parole bureau spoke to the inmate group at regularly scheduled intervals and permitted them to ask questions. In this way it was possible to allay some of the false rumors and to counteract somewhat the rantings of those in the group who had failed on parole.

While stressing in the reception center preparation for release, it is also important to clarify as far as possible in the minds of new inmates the nature of the program in the reception center and the prisons. This may be accomplished in part by booklets about the reception center and about each of the prisons. The training and treatment opportunities described for each of the institutions may be presented also by illustrated lectures. The rules and regulations of the prison system should be explained by a member of the custodial staff, sufficiently mature to deal calmly and helpfully with whatever questions and comments the inmates may offer.

THE CASE SUMMARY

The reports prepared by the reception center represent the combined results of all the tests, interviews, and observations of the various staff members.⁴ To a large extent, the work of the reception center must be evaluated from these reports. It is extremely important, therefore, that they be clear, concise, and comprehensive. The case summaries should not only demonstrate the professional competence of the staff, but also be readily understandable and usable by the layman in institutional work.

The reception center summary or report should include material under each of the following headings: social background; criminal history; initial adjustment to the institution; medical examination; psychological study; vocational study; educational history and analysis; religious background and attitudes; recreational interests and abilities; psychiatric evaluation.

THE STAFF CONFERENCE

Staff discussion of the case has been called the guidance conference or case conference. In the reception center this takes place when sufficient data have been assembled, usually after the man has been there about six weeks. The clinical staff, together with the teachers, work supervisors, correctional officers, and others who can attend, should meet in a friendly, democratic session at which all report their findings. There should be no domination of the conference by any one specialist. What the teacher or correctional officer has to say should be given the same recognition accorded the contributions of the professional clinicians. The human problems dealt with are so difficult and have so many aspects that no one person, however self-assured, could possibly have all the answers.

Half an hour or longer is required, on the average, for adequate discussion of a case prior to the preparation of the admission summary. Difficult and dangerous cases usually need much more time. It is unfortunate when the case-load pressure requires the staff to telescope the case conferences.

Data from all ten areas of inquiry noted above are reported by the staff, who also try to evaluate their observations. Relevant questions may be raised during each presentation. An attempt may be made, thereafter, to interpret each history in terms of the relationships of causal factors to the problems the man presents, with a view to trying to understand what may be responsible for his antisocial behavior. To be of most help to the man, an effort should be made to ascertain the unmet needs in his life, during childhood or later, which may have brought about conflict or frustration and prepared the soil in which the personality disturbances grew. This phase of the study is exceedingly difficult.

The group as a whole may later formulate some tentative explanation of causal factors, why or how the man developed his problem. The conference should also consider the degree of treatability of the man, how much can be done for him.

Classification has too often ended with diagnosis. After all the significant facts are in, the important question remains, what should be done for the inmate? It is important, therefore, that each staff member outline briefly and specifically what steps should be taken in his area of treatment to eliminate the man's deficiencies and to help him solve his problems. By having such recommendations made by the individual staff members as a part of their reports, they are forced to formulate their suggestions prior to the staff meeting. Time and effort is, therefore, conserved at the staff meeting for evaluating the recommendations in relation to the entire clinical picture.

Finally, recommendations are formulated by the group for the types of treatment most needed by each individual in order to help him solve his problems. All types of treatment may not be available at the institution to which the man may be transferred. Alternative recommendations must be included which may more nearly accord with practical possibilities. Recommendations for desirable treatment should not be omitted entirely, however, because the reception center also has the function of stimulating the improvement of institutional programs in order more adequately to meet the basic needs of inmates.

Some assurance is necessary that the recommendations of the reception center will be carried out as far as facilities permit. In one jurisdiction this has been accomplished by a statement in the official departmental transfer order to the effect that the recommendations of the reception center shall be the basis of the treatment program in the receiving institution. Subsequent follow-up in this prison system has revealed a very encouraging correlation of reception center recommendations and the actual program for the inmate in the receiving institution.

The case conference, or guidance conference, not only serves the purpose of integrating the data about each man and planning for his guidance and treatment in the institution but also provides an excellent occasion for the study of the functions and procedures of the reception center itself. As a medium for in-service training it is very valuable. Additional staff members of the reception center and some from the other institutions and from the parole bureau may also profit by attendance.

SUBSEQUENT TREATMENT

After the case study has been completed, the inmate must be prepared for transfer from the reception center to a regular institutional program. Before leaving the center, the inmate should be advised regarding the results of the clinical study. Unless his interest in the program planned for his welfare be elicited, constructive outcomes are not assured. If the inmate recognizes his problems and has gained some insight into how he may proceed to overcome them, a major objective of the reception center will have been accomplished.

The effectiveness of the reception center is dependent upon the adequacy of the total environment offered subsequently by the receiving institutions. Although helpful in many ways, individual diagnosis and orientation to prison, in themselves, offer no assurance of later good adjustment in the institution or on parole. The constructive influences of the institutions, especially perhaps their resources for vocational training and psychotherapy, are the crucial factors. Unless the prison system as a whole is geared to an equally high level of correctional service in social welfare, religion, medicine, and other areas of treatment, the reception center program may have only a limited effect upon the later lives of those who enter there.

Because an adequate reception process is expensive, its limitations under inadequate support must be clearly recognized. A clinical staff under pressure on an assembly-line type of case output may carry out many of the objectives of the reception process, but the more subtle clinical values, which only ample and unhurried opportunity for case discussion and thoughtful case analysis make possible, may be lost. If the reception process in the correctional system is ever to achieve maturity as an operation, it must have adequate legislative appropriations to accomplish all of its purposes, including the more subtle ones, to which laymen are blind. In the public service, as in life elsewhere, what is best is likely to be expensive. Reception centers are no exception to this axiom. If the prisons are ever to be genuine treatment agencies, it is essential, likewise, to provide adequate clinical and other resources to carry out in the institutions, and subsequently during the period on parole, the treatment for the individual prescribed in the reception center.

Saving Prison Waste

By RICHARD A. MCGEE

SINCE institutional care is the most expensive form of treatment in common use, we ought to use it only when other methods appear to be impractical or inadvisable. The growing use of probation and the gradual strengthening of probation services during the past half century is a healthy trend, but it is accompanied by an attitude on the part of many probation executives and judges which is unsound if not dangerous; namely, that institutions are so bad that only those who are virtually hopeless should be sent to them. This does not square with the fact that, except for the two or three per cent who die in institutions, those sent away all come home sooner or later. If we maintain institutions which are merely places of temporary banishment, they must, of necessity, become not places to which criminals are sent but places from which criminals come.

There can be no rational theory about prisons which does not conceive of them as places of re-education, treatment, and readjustment. To believe that the mere purposeless service of time in a listless, degrading environment will produce such an objective is infantile.

It is not the purpose of this article to plot grand strategy for the total struggle of making the prison a place for correction and rehabilitation; rather, let us consider one of the most obvious types of prison waste, namely, the waste of the time and energy of thousands of human beings who could produce and, by producing, reduce the public fiscal burden and at the same time improve themselves. Failure to meet the challenge will cost society untold treasure not only in dollars but in the sum total of human resources which is the basis of all our wealth.

There are many ways of making constructive use of a prisoner's time besides engaging him in productive work. They include, to mention some of them in passing, education, vocational instruction, psychiatric treatment, wholesome recreation, reading, religious instruction, and guided group activities. But even the richest program for adult prisoners should be built around a normal forty hours a week of productive work of such a character as to develop acceptable work habits, marketable skills, and some economic return to the state.

OPPOSITION TO PRISON WORK

Few disinterested students of the problem will quarrel with the principle involved. The difficulty lies in the opposition of organized labor on the one hand and of organized business on the other. Unsound and often irrational as this opposition is in terms of the general public welfare, it has had its way to a large extent because the public has not been interested and because prison administrators have been almost helpless in the face of the potency of the forces arrayed against them.

It is difficult, too, for the prison administrator to appreciate what the shouting is all about when he considers that of the 170,000 state prisoners in the United States in 1953, probably not more than 50,000 would need to be employed in industrial production in order to eliminate the worst of the idleness problem. Viewed against the 60,000,000 persons gainfully employed in the country, this seems pitifully small, indeed—a ratio of one to 1,200. Yet to hear the ravings of some of the opponents of prison labor, one would think it a major threat to the very foundations of our free enterprise system.

One is tempted to undertake a review of the whole history of restrictive state and federal legislation aimed at controlling prison labor and to attempt an analysis of the forces which place these laws on our statute books. However, this has been well done elsewhere.¹ Perhaps it is worth while to point out here merely that such restrictions were first imposed because of abuses of the use of prison labor, but more recently, especially during the depression of the 1930's, because of political activity aimed at eliminating competition. The movement to restrict and control prison labor was started for the purpose of correcting a public evil, but most of the activity of this kind since World War I has been negative and rarely in the public interest. Here is an excellent example of the pendulum of reform swinging too far.

THE CALIFORNIA PROGRAM

Be all this as it may, the blunt question we must ask ourselves is, What can we do about it? The statesmen of both labor and industry must be encouraged to make a new approach to the prob-

Flynn, "The Federal Government and the Prison Labor Problem in the States," The Social Service Review, Vol. 24, Nos. 1 and 2 (March and June 1950), later reprinted for private distribution by The John Howard Association, Chicago, Ill.; Blake McKelvey, American Prisons: A Study in American Social History Prior to 1915 (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1936), pp. 93-125 and passim; U. lem on a nationwide basis. The prisons are a part of our democratic system of government. It is time that both labor and industry took a positive interest in this matter since they are largely responsible for the restrictions which now hamstringing prison employment programs. All this is not to say that prison administrators and state officials might not struggle a little harder to find some remedies of their own. In 1947, the State of California instituted a program which may be of general interest. The state anticipated a doubling, or even a trebling, of its prison population during the postwar decade. This presented a multitude of problems, not the least of which was how to develop employment for several thousand inmates in the face of a long history of active and rather effective opposition to the expansion of prison enterprises within the state.

Acting on the theory that the forces at work in the state which had opposed prisoner employment ought to assume a positive responsibility for a problem of government to which they themselves had contributed, a small conference of leaders of labor and industry was called by the governor. They were willing to recognize the problem, but expressed fear that these proposed industries, backed by what they called the "unlimited financial resources of the state," might grow into a socialistic Frankenstein. They wanted to see some better controls established than the law then provided. A long series of conferences and discussions followed between business and labor leaders and the Director of Corrections. Growing out of these, a law was enacted which created a Correctional Industries Commission² consisting of two representatives of industry, two of organized labor, one of agriculture, and one of the general public. Each member is appointed by the governor for a term of four years. The seventh member, who serves as chairman, is the Director of Corrections. The scope of the responsibility assigned this commission, as stated in the law, is that it ... shall recommend productive industrial and agricultural enterprises in the prisons and institutions under the jurisdiction of the Department of Corrections in such volume and of such kinds as to eliminate unnecessary idleness among the inmates and to provide diversified work activities which will serve as means of vocational education as well as of occupational and financial support.

² This commission took its general form and concept from Federal Prison Industries, Inc., which has proved so successful in developing a program for the United States Bureau of Prisons.

The law made it quite evident that the commission was to find practical ways "to eliminate unnecessary idleness," and "to provide diversified work activities" by determining "the advisability and suitability of establishing, expanding, diminishing, or discontinuing any industrial or agricultural enterprise involving a gross annual production of more than twenty-five thousand dollars value."

To carry into effect successfully this vital and difficult responsibility requires continuing co-operative relationships with labor and industry. Relationships of this kind were established through such organizations as the State Chamber of Commerce, the State Manufacturers' Association, the State Federation of Labor, the State Council of Industrial Organizations, the State Farm Bureau Federation, the California Council of Agricultural Associations, and with the subsidiary or auxiliary subdivisions or units of these state organizations. These co-operative relationships are the result of putting into practice the kind of thinking exemplified by Howard Coonley, a former president of the National Association of Manufacturers, when he said:

Mistakes have been made by management and by labor. There must be an end of indictments, of accusations, of fault-finding, on both sides. We must behave differently in the future. We have the resources both material and human. What we need is the common sense to work together with a common understanding of the purpose we want to accomplish; and we should behave so as to benefit the public, the worker, the employer, and the consumer. There must be no exploitation by any one person of another person, or by any one group of another group.

SERVICES OF STATE COMMITTEES

With adequate co-operative relationships guided by the kind of thinking cited, the operation of suitable productive enterprises in prisons can be made practicable by:

1. Providing co-operative services through state committees which will aid in (a) exploring and selecting suitable markets in state agencies and (b) determining types and quantities of commodities which can be manufactured for tax-supported agencies by prison productive enterprises.

2. Providing co-operative services through state committees which will aid in (a) integrating the vocational training program with the program of productive enterprises and (b) co-ordinating the services of state departments which can contribute to enhancing the effectiveness of the rehabilitation of prisoners and their placement in gainful employment.

FUNCTIONING OF STATE COMMITTEES

Specific examples will serve to illustrate the practical way in which appropriate state committees can and do function. The Director of the State Department of Education, in co-operation with the Director of the State Department of Corrections, appointed a state committee designated as the State Correctional Industries Implementing Committee and assigned to it the responsibility of "promoting the manufacture of articles for public schools after appropriate exploration and experimentation." The State Committee proceeded as follows:

Four area meetings were planned in co-operation with representatives of the State Department of Corrections. On display at each of these area meetings were articles suited to the needs of the public schools already being manufactured, and samples of articles which were being considered for manufacture on recommendation of the committee. The co-operative area meetings had these practical results:

1. Public school officials, and especially purchasing officers, had opportunity to see and appraise the specific articles being manufactured by prison enterprises.

2. These same individuals were provided a rendezvous for exchanging experiences and ideas concerning articles being manufactured, as well as new articles proposed for manufacture.

3. Opportunity was afforded for making suggestions, based on actual experience, designed to help in improving some of the articles on display.

4. An estimate was made of the total quantity of each displayed article that might be purchased during a fiscal year by the school districts represented in each area meeting.

5. Supplementing the estimate, a survey was made based on the established contacts, which provided data sufficiently comprehensive and reliable to justify the establishment by the Correctional Industries Commission of a substantial productive enterprise, without opposition from any source.

Following these area meetings the State Correctional Industries Implementing Committee published a leaflet, which was widely distributed, entitled "A Platform for The California State Correctional Industries Implementing Committee." In part, it read as follows:

The State Department of Corrections can serve the public schools in terms of the following services:

1. Display for Inspection and Evaluation the Articles Manufactured by Correctional Enterprises on Recommendation of Qualified Personnel.
2. Manufacture Articles for Experimental Use in Classrooms. Any school district may request the manufacture, by California Correctional Industries, of sample items for experimental use, when such items hold promise of state-wide acceptance.
3. Manufacture in Sufficient Volume the Articles Selected for State-Wide Use.

The same co-operative procedure can be, and has been, used with other state departments and agencies, and with state and local labor, industrial, and agricultural organizations. A convincing example is the support which was obtained for the establishment of a cotton textile mill at the State Prison at San Quentin, California. Arrangements were made for appropriate committees, or groups, to visit the prison, see and appraise the physical facilities available for the mill, meet with the Correctional Industries Commission, and become fully informed concerning the proposed enterprise. The organizations represented were: California Cotton Co-operative Association, California State Federation of Labor, California Industrial Union Council—CIO, California Manufacturers' Association, California State Chamber of Commerce, California Farm Bureau Federation, Agricultural Council of California, Pacific Coast Garment Manufacturers, U. S. Department of Agriculture—California Research Cotton Station, National Cotton

Council of America, Textile Workers of America—CIO, International Ladies Garment Workers, Amalgamated Clothing Workers of America, California Cotton Mills, San Francisco Chamber of Commerce—Industrial Department, Los Angeles Chamber of Commerce—Industrial Department, and the Central Valley Empire Association. The substance of the information given the representatives of the co-operating bodies was that qualified textile engineers reported the proposed cotton textile mill could be operated successfully under certain prescribed conditions. The result was unanimous action by the Correctional Industries Commission providing for the establishment of a cotton textile mill at the State Prison at San Quentin. The opposition which had been expressed initially by some was withdrawn. The mill will be in full operation beginning in January 1955, with unanimous approval.

These examples are intended to confirm the fact that the co-operative approach is the procedure which can, and does, provide the services that contribute effectively to the solution of the prison labor problem. The common expression which predicates the need for a co-operative approach is: "I'm not going to stick my neck out." There is a prevalent fear that sponsoring or endorsing the establishment of productive enterprises in prisons, as an individual, is very likely to make that individual, as one person expressed it, "the target of attack." Because of this too prevalent attitude, the co-operative approach is the way to get practical results. These results may be enumerated, briefly, as follows:

1. Determination of markets for state-used articles which can be manufactured by productive enterprises in prisons.

2. Estimating the market for each such state-used item.

3. Enhancing the effectiveness of the services of prison productive enterprise by continuous co-operative planning.

4. Establishment of better understanding of the rehabilitative and economic benefits of the program of productive enterprises.

5. Providing key individuals with the kind of information which can be used in establishing better understanding by the general public of the urgent need of reducing idleness in prisons through sound productive enterprises.

TEST OF REHABILITATION

One of the most practical and understandable ultimate tests of rehabilitation is satisfactory performance in a suitable job. The solution of the prison labor problem requires, therefore, the integrating of the prison vocational training with work experience in a prison productive enterprise and with placement opportunities in free society. The case of a rehabilitated prisoner will serve to illustrate the integrative process. The inmate started to work in the bakeshop in the State Prison at San Quentin. He completed a total of 4,800 hours with a very good record. When his case was referred for parole, he was recommended for placement as a baker. With the co-operation of the Bakers' Union, he was employed as a second-year helper, at the prevailing wage scale, in a large nationally known baking corporation. His work record is excellent and he is well thought of by his superiors and his coworkers. He has received several increases and has been given additional training in various departments so that he would be familiar with all aspects of the work. He will complete his training on the job.

Again the co-operative approach is found to be the practical way to integrate the rehabilitative process of the prisoner, namely, vocational training followed by related job performance in a productive enterprise in prison, fitting the inmate, on his being released, for placement in a job in which he can make maximum use of his vocational training and work experiences in prison, and providing opportunity to complete his education and job training in free society.

INTERAGENCY AGREEMENT

Acting jointly on this conviction, the directors of three state agencies appointed a State Coordinating Committee consisting of two representatives from each department to function in accordance with a specific agreement. The three departments are the Department of Industrial Relations, the Department of Corrections, and the Adult Authority (Parole Board). The agreement reads as follows:

I. Purpose

Service with respect to the training and placement of inmates is being rendered throughout the State by these three agencies. Although there is a close correlation in scope of endeavor, the realization that there is a need for further coordination of efforts and conformity in practice has resulted in the recognition that a general description of policy is deemed advisable. The Adult Authority is interested in training men for proper placement upon release from the institution, to have such training recognized as substantial and as meeting the requirements set forth by the Department of Industrial Relations in the California Apprenticeship Training Program under the Division of Apprenticeship Standards. Arrangements will be made with the Department of Industrial Relations and the Adult Authority to make placements that will complete the training begun in the institutions and correlate the program of supervision to give the individual every opportunity to develop his trade skillfully and under normal procedures.

II. Policies of The Department of Industrial Relations

It shall be the responsibility of the Division of Apprenticeship Standards:

- A. To inform its personnel, concerned with the administration of the Apprenticeship Training programs, of the extent and nature of the training programs offered by the Department of Corrections in the various state correctional institutions.
- B. To inform its personnel, concerned with the administration of the Apprenticeship programs, of the extent and nature of the services provided by the Adult Authority for placement and supervision of parolees.
- C. To the maximum extent possible, to keep the Department of Corrections and the Adult Authority informed of employment opportunities for apprentices and other on-the-job trainees.
- D. To provide the Department of Corrections and the Adult Authority with information that will assist in the establishment of apprenticeship and trade training programs in the correctional institutions.
- E. To appoint representatives to work with designated representatives of the Department of Corrections and the Adult Authority developing procedures based upon this agreement and in coordinating activities resulting from this agreement.

III. The Policies of the Director of Corrections and The Adult Authority shall be as follows:

- A. To inform personnel, concerned with training and placement activities, of the extent and nature of the services provided by the Division of Apprenticeship Standards.
- B. To insure, through regular channels, any instructions necessary to implement this agreement and any procedures that will effect correlation.

- C. To arrange for classification and referral of applicants to the appropriate joint apprenticeship committee.

- D. To provide the Division of Apprenticeship Standards with such information as will assist in the coordination of apprenticeship and trade training programs in the institutions. However, it is understood that such information is confidential and only such information as may be legally disclosed will be exchanged.

- E. To request the appointment of representatives of the Division of Apprenticeship Standards to serve as consultants to the various institutional trade advisory committees.

IV. Joint Policies

- A. The Department of Industrial Relations, the Director of Corrections, and the Adult Authority will appoint staff representatives to a Coordinating Committee. This Committee will meet on call to determine joint policy in establishing methods and procedures for both training and placement, to coordinate their services, all for better utilization of opportunities for inmates in apprenticeship and in other on-the-job training programs.

- B. The agencies will encourage correctional inmates who qualify to participate in apprenticeship and other preparatory training, and further to advise and guide them towards the procedure that will be followed upon their release on parole.

- C. The agencies further agree that inmates or parolees will not receive preferred treatment, but a mutual agreement is necessary to insure proper processing for apprenticeship.

GOALS OF REHABILITATION

The provisions of this agreement point clearly to the fact that there are certain major ends in the rehabilitation of the prisoner which must be achieved if the prison labor problem is to be solved. These ends, briefly enumerated, are:

1. Adjusting the prisoner to useful living in prison, with hope for a better life in the future. The prisoner must be made to feel as one did when he wrote: "I entered the Guidance Center at San Quentin not knowing and actually not caring where the road might end. Now at least I do have something definite in mind and can see in my tomorrow a new era."

2. Providing meaningful employment so that the prisoner will not feel he is "the forgotten man" but, rather, that he is using his time to improve himself in ways that will make him better able to adjust to the outside world with satisfaction to himself and benefit to the community.

3. Assigning the prisoner to a job in a prison productive enterprise so as to make maximum utilization of all his previous education and work experience.

4. Securing for the prisoner, on release, placement which will afford him opportunity to make maximum use of his institutional training, and enable him to make arrangements for completing his job-training requirements guided by the appropriate Trade Advisory Committee and by the Local Joint Apprenticeship Committee.

5. Developing in free society an understanding and intelligently helpful attitude towards the prisoner who is making an honest effort to live in the community as a useful and responsible person.

It is obvious that when these enumerated ends are achieved the prison labor problem is solved; but the achievement of them requires well-integrated services. Trade advisory committees are of very practical assistance in securing such integration.

TRADE ADVISORY COMMITTEES

The co-operation of labor and of industry, which is indispensable in establishing and operating prison productive enterprises, functions in the most practical way through these trade advisory committees, which can, and do, render the following practical services. (1) They give practical and up-to-date counsel concerning a proposed productive enterprise in prison. (2) They recommend the kind of equipment required for the efficient operation of the enterprise. (3) They help to formulate standards designed to ensure the development of the skill, technical knowledge, and attitudes required to succeed on the job. (4) They recommend the kind and quality of items to be produced. (5) They meet at the institutions at stated intervals to give critical and constructive evaluations of the enterprises and make specific recommendations. (6) They help in securing suitable employment for those qualified inmates who are ready for parole. (7) They help in arranging, under prescribed procedures, for completing on the job the training started in the institution and pursued during the period of incarceration. (8) They help to develop intelligent public interest in the program of prisoner rehabilitation.

A member of the California State Correctional Industries Commission, Mr. Frank K. Runyan, President of Western Merchandise Mart, at a meeting of Governor Earl Warren's Council, made these observations concerning trade advisory committees:

No matter how efficiently and scientifically our penal institutions may be conducted, continuous education of the public is essential. This is particularly true of our correctional industries if they are to serve effectively the constructive purposes for which they are intended. Simply stated, the basic purposes of our correctional industries are: first, to provide the means by which prisoners may acquire training and good work habits; second, that upon their return to society, their adjustment will be such that they will be accepted as self-respecting and self-sustaining citizens; and third, to recultivate their mental processes so that they will think straight and give a full measure of service in their new lives.

In realizing these basic purposes, our Trade Advisory Committees, a number of which have been created recently, are becoming increasingly effective. Those selected for these Advisory Committees are men who have a sympathetic understanding of our problems and a real desire to be helpful in solving them. They are prominent and successful executives of industry and of labor, specialists and leaders in their respective fields, and they are willing to contribute their time to improve the functioning of our correctional industries.

The members of these Advisory Committees contribute in three ways: first, in practical advice on designs and standards of technical equipment and "knowhow" so that the men leaving our institutions may be capable of adapting themselves to modern equipment and methods; second, through their direct aid and influence, the absorption by industry of paroled and discharged men is accelerated; third, and most important, is the service of these advisers as influence centers in improving our public relations and education that more people may become more aware of the end purposes of our correctional institutions program and its beneficial results, both human and economic.

The men of these Trade Advisory Committees are giving freely of their knowledge and time. They are doing a fine job in helping to implement in a very substantial way the programs of both your Adult Authority and your Correctional Industries Commission. As these Committees gain experience, the state administration, the taxpayers, management, labor, and the public at large may be justly proud of them. On behalf of the Commission I should like to bespeak for them merited recognition and encouragement and an expanded field of operation.

To facilitate in a practical way the "expanded operation" recommended by Mr. Runyan, a pattern for trade advisory committees was formulated to govern their activities and facilitate expansion of operation. This pattern was unanimously approved in principle by the Correctional Industries Commission. It reads:

A PATTERN FOR TRADE ADVISORY COMMITTEES

Governing Policy

The productive enterprise will have for its primary purpose to provide meaningful work for which the inmate has respect and through which opportunity is afforded to acquire good work habits and basic skills which will be fundamental assets in any gainful occupation, and will be of practical value by helping to make the inmate capable of adjusting more readily to community living as an acceptable member of free society.

Occupational Fitness

A productive enterprise is not expected to turn out every inmate fully qualified to be gainfully employed in a specific occupation. The Advisory Committee will give guidance on matters concerned with the continuation of training after release, which will enable parolees to complete their training while gainfully employed.

Appointments

The members of the Advisory Committee will be appointed by the Director of Corrections under general policies to be determined in consultation with the Correctional Industries Commission.

Chairman

The chairman of the Advisory Committee shall be chosen by the Committee members.

Composition

Each Advisory Committee will be composed of representatives from industry and from labor.

Meetings

Regular and special meetings shall be called by the chairman, except that at least four regular meetings shall be held in each calendar year.

Reports

At reasonable intervals appropriate reports will be made by the Committee to the State Director of Corrections.

Equipment

The Advisory Committee will be consulted regarding types and quantity of equipment deemed essential for the successful operation of the enterprise.

Visits to Institutions

Each Committee member will be issued an identification card which will admit him to an institution for the purpose of appraising the program in which he is interested and reporting his findings to the Committee of which he is a member.

EXTENT OF IDLENESS

In discussing procedures and techniques designed to aid in practical ways of solving the prison labor problem, the current extent of idleness in a prison—and what is being done about it—is the primary consideration continuously to be kept in mind. Each institution should make a careful analysis of its population to determine the approximate number of inmates which must be engaged in maintenance and housekeeping services, the number that are not available for assignment because of illness or other incapacity, the number that are engaged full time in training projects, and the number engaged in productive enterprises. The difference between the sum of these figures and the population, of course, represents the current degree of idleness. It is not enough to determine the extent of idleness at a given date, but, rather, a perpetual inventory of idle men should be maintained and a conscientious effort made to predict the amount of idleness which may be expected in the months and years ahead. These figures should be accurate and should be made available to the public, to the legislature, and to the fiscal authorities of the state. It follows, then, that there must be continuous planning for the development of work projects to absorb the idleness existing or anticipated.

The severity of the idleness problem in the state prisons of this country tends to fluctuate with the economic cycle. When there is full employment, labor is less concerned about the alleged competition of prison labor. When there are ready markets and a shortage of goods, business organizations are less disturbed by this matter. In periods of economic depression there is more public resistance to prison labor. Opposition from these different sources takes the form of political pressures upon the governor and his subordinates, and during legislative sessions more restrictive legislation is introduced and efforts are made by devious means to retaliate against the prison system by attacking its appropriations. The fact that the top-flight leaders of both labor and industry are on record enunciating a reasonable policy of state-use industries for prisons does not prevent local labor and business interests from resorting to every trick in the political bag to keep prison industry from developing if it offers the slightest threat to some individual manufacturer or group of employees.

PUBLIC RELATIONS

This being the case, this observer sees no easy solution to the prison labor problem. The only hope lies in gaining the co-operation of labor and industry in terms of specific people and specific organizations. This involves a continuous effort in public relations between the prison system and the leaders of free enterprise. This cannot be done successfully as a part-time activity of a warden or a director. California has made its approach to the problem by the employment of a full-time field representative for the Correctional Industries Commission who devotes his entire time to the direct personal public relations aspects of the problem. Whether this would be a suitable approach in another setting may be open to question, but the fact remains that prison industry must develop friends and supporters in labor and in industry, and this cannot be done in any way other than through personal contacts and a co-operative attitude.

The most anomalous situation in the whole field of prison administration lies in the fact that the public appears to reject the idea that prisoners should contribute to their own support by economic production and, at the same time, the public is reluctant to authorize the appropriation of the large sums of money that are necessary to carry on constructive programs of vocational education and psychiatric treatment, which offer two of the most promising hopes for the practical rehabilitation of the prisoner. Prison administration, as presently constituted, has demonstrated little capacity for resisting the pressures of selfish economic interests in holding down the development of prison industry, and that same weakness is manifested in the failure of the prisons to convince economy-minded legislators and taxpayer groups that it would be wise economy in the long run to make use of the time that men spend in prison to improve them mentally, morally, and vocationally. We are inclined to argue in generalities and to make our appeals on a basis of sentiment. This approach has met with little success in the past, and there is no reason to believe that it will meet with more in the future.

PILOT PROGRAMS

The most promising approach to convincing public bodies that it pays to spend money on rehabilitation is to set up small pilot programs which do not require large sums of money. If funds cannot be obtained from public sources, they are often available from foundations; however, no foundation will be willing to risk money for experimental purposes unless it is set up under the best possible guidance and leadership and with some assurance that it will continue over a sufficiently long period of time to prove or disprove the hypothesis upon which it is based. As a practical matter this, again, will mean that the prison system must bring in outside advice and assistance. These pilot or experimental programs are, in their essential nature, research projects; consequently, each experiment should be designed by research experts and during the period of the operation should be subject to the supervision of research specialists. These are normally not found on the payroll of a prison. It is usually not difficult, however, to obtain the co-operation of universities and private voluntary associations. Because of the very nature of such projects and the materials with which they deal, it would be unusual to obtain any conclusive results in less than five years. Because of the political uncertainties of government, it is obviously difficult to carry on projects of this kind. The greatest hope lies in the few jurisdictions in the country in which there has developed a tradition of stable and continuous administration; however, even in these jurisdictions there can be no guarantee that there will be a steady flow of funds, however small, to finance such projects. Here lies a fertile, but fallow, field for the wise use of the grants of foundations.

It is so obvious that it seems futile to say: we are not going to learn new and better techniques for treating convicted felons unless we are given an opportunity to experiment in the atmosphere of science rather than in the climate of political pressures, economic competition, and sentimental preachments.

Correctional Institution Personnel—Amateurs or Professionals?

By A. A. EVANS

"OH! He's a guard out at the prison," she said, in response to my question where I could locate my friend. This was a completely natural statement of a neighborly lady in the community where my friend resided. But it also epitomizes the public concept of the correctional worker today and the public attitude toward him. It thinks of him as someone who merely carries a gun, turns keys, and maintains order. The public still considers him the same "guard" or "hack" that he was known to be thirty years ago. It tends to look upon him through force of habit as an amateur.

CORRECTIONAL WORK IS BIG BUSINESS

As an occupational field, penal and correctional work engages the full-time attention of many thousands of persons and the utilization of facilities and resources reaching multibillion dollar proportions. The core of the correctional task—changing human behavior through modifying attitude—influences every decision and action of employees and staff in this work. The civil service examination announcement for the basic correctional officer position in the federal service states that incumbents of this position "are responsible for carrying out plans developed for correctional treatment and for modification of attitudes of persons who have been confined." Correctional work is the influencing of others to gain their respect, to accomplish a change in their attitudes, to improve their behavior and understanding of responsibilities for normal, socially acceptable conduct. What are the special qualifications and attributes required of an individual to succeed in the fulfillment of this mission? What progress has been made in the development of a professionally skilled corps capable of accomplishing this task?

WITH THESE HANDS

Since there is no counterpart to correctional work in civilian life or private industry, correctional institution administrators must train all employees in firearms and self-defense as well as in how to obtain co-operation of the frequently warped personalities with whom the employees deal. Every correctional employee must be qualified for his responsibility as a supervisor, a leader, a foreman. He must not only know the duties and responsibilities of the exact position to which he is assigned, but also have an understanding and knowledge of methods for handling attitudes which are in conflict with the law. In the face of being tempted, threatened, and frequently maligned, he must possess patience, a resolute character, and intuitive understanding of human nature.

Many states and the federal government include penal and correctional workers in the civil service. Under the merit system there is competitive examination for initial appointment. The individual brings to the position such native intuition and resources as the stature and prestige of the position attract. In the past most persons have entered the correctional field accidentally. At a time when they were interested in a change of job, their names as eligibles on clerical, mechanical, social worker, librarian, or other civil service registers available for government-wide appointment were certified to Departments of Correction for consideration. Frequently an inquiry from a Department of Correction as to availability for employment is the first occasion for their considering work in this field of endeavor. Quite often they have not previously visited a penal or correctional institution and have no conception of the duties and responsibilities of employees engaged in this work.

THE LABORER IS WORTHY OF HIS HIRE

In the long-range planning of organized Departments of Correction, an essential element of the planning is the development of personnel possessing high qualifications and capability for more responsible assignments. To get this quality of personnel it must be recognized that recruitment for the variety of skills, trades, and professions required in correctional work is in competition with private industry and other government employment opportunities. A good salary is probably the most important means of interesting individuals in a type of employment which they had not previously planned as a career.

The compensation attached to a position determines to a large degree in this, as in all other occupations, the number of able men and women who are willing to accept it. The $100 per month salaries paid correctional employees in some jurisdictions do not attract amateurs possessing a capability for training and development which will ensure their success in this work. A prime reason that some persons engaged in correctional work are amateurs is that the rate of pay is inadequate to attract persons with a potential for successfully handling correctional problems. The ability of these individuals in the public service to devote the best of their time and energy to the task is impeded if they have personal worries as to their financial future, or as to the welfare, security, and support of their families. A tabulation or comparison of wages paid correctional workers in different geographical areas does not satisfactorily focus attention upon this facet of the problem. It is natural that the wages of correctional personnel should vary, since there is variation from area to area in living costs and wages paid in other occupations. But it is essential that the salaries of correctional workers maintain an equitable relation to the cost of living and to the salaries of other positions carrying comparable responsibilities and requirements. As things stand today, the salaries paid correctional workers are out of line. And at the same time the correctional worker is confronted with increased living costs and higher taxes. Many of these employees see inflation precluding their setting aside any savings, equity, or resource for emergencies, for the education of their children, and for the future well-being of their dependents. Persons who enter this important function of the public service ought to be able to expect a decent opportunity for comfort and saving and for the proper upbringing of their families. A recent survey in one jurisdiction disclosed that the average take-home pay of the correctional worker was the same as that paid garbage collectors—and at that time the latter were on strike in that jurisdiction for a wage increase.

The position of the correctional worker makes it difficult for him to supplement his income from outside activities. He should in propriety avoid part-time work which dissipates his energies, interferes with his recall in event of emergencies, or reflects unfavorably upon his reliability as a counselor and an influence for uprightness among inmates. In the nature of things this closes to him many sources of supplementary income. Yet in the face of higher living costs with which correctional salaries have not kept pace, it has been necessary among some penal and correctional staffs for as many as half of the employees to take up outside part-time jobs.

Moreover, management is continually confronted with pleas from some of its most promising young correctional officers for advice on how they can remain in this work. Though they find very interesting and challenging the many dynamic situations which arise, the position does not offer a salary which will enable them to maintain a growing family. These are the persons correctional institution administrators would search for when trying to find individuals most likely to succeed in this work. Their loss compounds itself in the consequent discouragement of others in the same generation from seeking a career in this field.

AROUND THE CLOCK

The nature of his position and duties requires that the correctional worker be available for frequent emergency call. He must render, for his compensation, not merely a full day's work, but the dedication of his whole life. His work is fraught with many hazards; he is frequently physically assaulted; he and his family are the objects of threats of reprisal, bribes, and ridicule. The burden of these onerous incidents to his service is not confined to his working hours. While the community and society require that his conduct and performance be such as to merit confidence and trust, he is at the same time the whipping boy of that society. While he strives earnestly to protect society, to lift the standards of his profession, to improve the quality of his influence in modifying the attitudes of persons confined, he is being belittled, ridiculed, and maligned. Just as the neighborly lady saying, "He's a guard out at the prison," was subtly expressing her low esteem of my friend, so also does the public too often ostracize and look down upon persons engaged in this work.

For, you see, my friend has never been employed as a guard. In fact, the agency with which he is employed has had no guards on its payrolls for more than eighteen years—well-nigh a generation. The institution at which he is employed is not now and never has been a prison. Change in this attitude of society towards its correctional staff has been very slow. Are members of this occupational field expected to reconcile themselves to the fact that other generations will come and go before the public accepts the correctional worker as socially and economically equal?

SELECTIVE RECRUITMENT

The task of supervising and guiding prisoners is no job for amateurs. The correctional worker must have a potential to benefit from training, to become skilled in all phases of his work. It is necessary to look for skills, talents, and capabilities in those recruited for this work. We mean not only skills, talents, and capabilities for doing a particular job, but also for teaching it to untrained and frequently resisting inmates.

Pinpointing the qualities of personality and experience most likely to assure success in the correctional field has long engaged the attention of administrators. Research along this line can make a vast contribution to success of the individual and progress in the profession. An experiment was undertaken by the federal Bureau of Prisons to ascertain whether there is a correlation between results of a practical judgment test and success in adaptation to correctional work.

Each new appointee during a period of one year was given a written practical judgment test at the time of entry on duty. There were 150 such appointees who took the test and completed one year of employment. The average score attained was 203. Instructions provided with the test stated that when taken by schoolteachers, foremen, accountants, and junior executives in private industry, half of them scored above 190 and half below 190, and in one of the largest industrial organizations the mean score for a group of 109 industrial engineers was 207. The scores achieved by the 150 new correctional employees indicate that there had been success in recruiting persons with a rather high degree of practical judgment in dealing with supervisory problems.

The test, however, does not measure whether an employee likes correctional tion on the book. Also, (4) during his basic indoctrination when he was being oriented in the organization and policies of the service, qualifying in firearms and physical training, performing on specific key posts under the immediate instruction and supervision of experienced officers, and writing on seven assigned subjects pertaining to this work, he was rated by some thirty different persons and these ratings were converted into an over-all grade on basic training.

The accompanying tabulation reflects the results of these several processes for a typical group of the new employees at one of the institutions which participated in the program:

work or chafes under it, whether he is lazy, whether he has courage, is cool in emergencies, is patient, and whether he has a devoted interest in helping others solve their personal problems.

At the conclusion of the first year of service the supervisors at the respective institutions were requested to (1) rank these new employees in order of successful job performance and (2) rate them in relation to a score of 100 as indicating outstanding performance in every area. In addition, (3) each new employee was required to study a textbook written for correctional work and was required to take a written examina-

When we attempt to make correlations of the rankings based on the year of job performance as supplied by the supervisors with the practical judgment test score, or with the over-all rating on basic training, or with the examination grade on the textbook covering the work of the organization, we find insufficient pattern to indicate definite conclusions. Validation was undertaken by experts on tests and statistics. It was their judgment that a correlation of nearly 80 per cent was reflected.

It is evident that we have here a very intricate matter, one which is sensitive to the effectiveness of supervisors as instructors. It is also sensitive to the latitude of opportunity afforded in the different institutions for the exercise of judgment and participation in management. It offers some promise as a tool for use by administrators in the selection of personnel and the measurement of their suitability for this field of endeavor.

The training and development of personnel can only succeed when built on a solid foundation. It is with and through these hands that the correctional institution administrator must work. No matter how many, how beautiful, and how well-fitted his facilities, without quality in his personnel his program cannot succeed. There is no substitute for the personality, the genuine interest, the ability in judgment, and the knowledge and understanding of personal relationships between workers and inmates. Yet the poorer and more inadequate the facilities and the tighter the budget for providing reasonably adequate food, clothing, shelter, and generally accepted comforts of human existence, the greater the burden upon personnel and the greater the need for staff competence.

TRAINING CORRECTIONAL WORKERS

We have already mentioned the need for basic orientation of personnel newly entering this field. There is no counterpart in private industry, no course in elementary school, high school, or college, experience in or completion of which will enable the newly appointed correctional officer to become fully productive on his first day of duty. While custody, discipline, and security have always been recognized as the first duties of correctional personnel and take precedence over all other functions, it is now equally recognized that the correctional worker—who is in contact with the inmate at work, in quarters, at school, in the library, the visiting room, on the recreational field, when the inmate eats, sleeps, bathes, or does any other of a million normal or abnormal, natural or unnatural, things—is the individual who has the greatest influence upon the inmate during his institutional life. He is the employee through whom the modification of attitude must be accomplished. He is the individual who represents to the inmate the prosecutor, judge, and warden in the execution of the sentence. He implements a program of reformation and rehabilitation coincident with assuring custody of the inmate, or he effectively undercuts and thwarts those programs. He is the most frequently seen and felt human link between the inmate and the institution's administrative and management staff.

Which it will be—constructive or obstructive—and whether he is to remain in this field, depends in large measure upon his orientation, his on-the-job training, close supervisory assistance, and the evaluation of him during his first year of employment. The practice of placing the new employee in the most remote fringes, in the towers, during his early years of employment has been thoroughly discredited. His first days and weeks afford the golden opportunity for interpreting to him his responsibility as a counselor and leader of persons in need of constructive guidance. During this period the lack of prior experience from which to formulate prejudices and misconceptions can be exploited by correctional administrators. Capturing those early opportunities to train and indoctrinate new employees in the ways supervisors would like them to perform is possible in this specialized field of work as it is in few other occupations. New employees are far more likely not to depart from guidelines to the achievement of desired objectives than they are by trial and error "on their own" to hit upon successful methods of performance.

AUTHORITARIANISM VERSUS PROFESSIONALIZATION

Systems of administration and operation for handling large groups of individuals have traditionally invoked an authoritarian spirit. It has its advantages. Chaos and confusion are avoided. "Prussian" discipline, orderliness, and mass subordination become the watchword of those who cannot trust subordinates to show initiative, judgment, and resourcefulness. In the authoritarian-type organization the individual must subordinate himself completely. To permit the exercise of initiative at various levels of supervision and operation is to complicate and disorganize the machinery of precisionlike performance, claim the authoritarian devotees.

The goal of correctional treatment is the reformation of individuals, preparing them to assume upon release the responsibilities of normal living in modern society. The content and purpose of employee training in correctional institutions should be geared to the achievement of this objective. The transition for the inmate commences with his first contact with correctional personnel. This transition continues and progresses as each further contact fills out the pattern of preparing the inmate for successful living, good citizenship, responsibly facing economic, social, and other situations and problems.

In the basic orientation training of new employees entering this field, it is essential they be indoctrinated in the tremendous influence which relationships bear upon the programs and upon all of the individuals. The relationships between coworkers, between workers and the public, between institutional departments, among the inmates, between employees and the inmates, influence every thought and act of the individuals in this institutional community. These relationships play all-important roles in motivating others to do or refrain from doing the things we wish done or left undone rather than irritating or aggravating them to the opposite course; they constitute the generating force which sets the tempo and behavior pattern of the institution. To a large extent they determine the success of the treatment or rehabilitative effort. During this background indoctrination of basic training new employees are told about, observe, and finally perform under close direction actual assignments in the various institutional departments. They see how experienced personnel work together to get the total job of operating an institution accomplished. The reasons for doing things in a particular way, as well as the way of doing things, are explained to them. They have a firmer grasp upon the co-ordination and integration techniques and relationships of the organization as a whole; they are shown that it is the sum of the parts which makes success.

By the nature of these relationships and objectives, success in correctional work is largely dependent upon the employee's professional skill in working with others, whether this skill is inherent in his personality and brought to the position from other experience or acquired by training and development on the job. When we speak of the professionalization of the institutional worker we mean the encouragement of these qualifications and skills which he must have in order to handle successfully the difficult persons who come under his control.

GOLD IS TRIED IN THE FIRE AND MAN IN THE FURNACE OF ADVERSITY

The correctional worker is tested over and over again. A new group of inmates arrives each day to match wits with him. The public hears much of the confirmed and notorious criminal who often successfully uses delaying and nuisance tactics during his competition with the prosecuting officials. In recent years the agitating and annoying methods of some troublesome defendants have taxed even talented, experienced, and venerated occupants of high judicial seats to the end of their patience and perseverance.

The public expects upon conviction and sentencing that these individuals will be handled justly, firmly, securely, and in anonymity by the correctional worker. More remarkable still, the public hopes that prior to completion of the sentence these individuals will have been reformed. A large-sized expectation from a small group of employees working in an environment which houses a concentration of such individuals! It is in truth no public responsibility to entrust to the hands of amateurs.

CONTINUED TRAINING

With a view to meeting this herculean responsibility the correctional worker's training must continue throughout his employment. In his career the demands upon him represent an ever-moving horizon. Upon a sound base of initial training and understanding, his further training should include: first, technical training—to enable him better to comprehend the specialized duties of his particular job and organizational function; second, cross training—to capture the experience of others and to integrate the various institutional segments, and so to prepare himself for promotion to more responsible staff and supervisory positions.

Much of his learning incident to acquiring a depth and breadth of understanding of interpersonal relationships will be accomplished on his own time by studying books, magazines, and articles suggested by his supervisors and available through the staff library, and by participating in college-level training. Just as the burden of responsibility in all his relations with inmates rests upon him, so also does the burden of responsibility for maximum utilization and development of his own skills, aptitudes, and abilities rest upon his initiative. Through training he will have access to the fundamentals, to the time-tested results of trial and error, to the experience of those who have preceded him.

Training on state or government time should include periodic refresher sessions at least quarterly. During these periods new policies, trends in population, improved procedures and techniques, may be presented by the correctional institution administrator and discussed by or with members of his staff before groups of correctional workers. It is ever the duty of the administrator and his department heads to interpret policies, give leadership, and foster an understanding of the programs among the workers who implement those programs. These sessions afford an opportunity for the administrator to "see and be seen" by all of the employees. They provide a medium for promoting a sense of feeling "on the team" in this joint endeavor. Another opportunity occurs as the administrator and his staff contact workers on the job, making inspections, encouraging, and counseling with the employee and discussing problems or operating procedures. Keeping in mind on these occasions that quality cannot be inspected into a product, that the real watchword for quality is the correctional worker as an individual, enhances the probabilities of successfully imparting knowledge and sharing information with the subordinate.

Training is the democratic process of sharing experience. It permits the younger and newer employee to leapfrog the years of trial, and the problems which have confronted others and been resolved. It goes on continually in an organization imbued with a strong moral sense of mutual understanding and reciprocity. When the worker is stimulated to pride in his work he does quality work. When overconfidence and the immediate needs and pressures of his organization influence him to allow slipshod performance to get by, he does a disservice to himself, to the inmate, to his coworkers, and to his organization.

WHO WILL LEAD THEM?

In correctional work there has been a tendency for each organization to blaze its own trail instead of profiting from the experience of others. The duplication of cost in this repetitive method of improving techniques and principles points up the need for a pooling of resources and knowledges, and, as a corollary, the need for an organized, continuing, joint training enterprise for correctional administrators. Jurisdictions which have placed their correctional services on a career basis can profit by this type of top-level, broad orientation for administrators, particularly for those who have developed in a specialized phase or function of correctional work. The decision-making process of the executive, particularly the decision-making responsibility over areas of operation in which the individual has had no experience, represents the most profound and difficult part of the transition from worker to supervisor to administrator.

While intra-institutional training programs can alleviate this through committee assignments, cross training, "acting" designations, and seminars or forums, the preparation for decision-making administratorship responsibility can be only partial. Training at the top is even more important than at the bottom. Too often the techniques and procedures advocated in the better training classes for the worker fall short of their objective because they are to some degree in conflict with the policies of the untrained administrator. It is extremely difficult (when not impossible) to effect any changes or reforms in an institution where there is only lip-service support from the administrator, or where the desired objectives are not understood by him or are not in line with his ideas and policies. The quality of correctional administration is dependent upon the quality of correctional executiveship in the administrator.

Progress has been accomplished in many places throughout the nation in the correctional treatment of offenders. The need for an organized, joint, continuing program at a designated center for the sharing of that experience and for progress in the training of junior correctional-institution executives is upon us. Training is the communication of ideas to improve understanding, promote sound relationships, and strengthen that leadership which influences a response of followership from within.

As a force for overcoming fundamental weaknesses in American prisons, none shows greater promise than fortifying the administrative, management, and personnel capabilities. This is a movement in which local, state, national, and international jurisdictions have a mutual interest, to which they can make a contribution of ideas, and from which they can benefit by exploiting the experience of others.

AMATEURS OR PROFESSIONALS?

In the nature of things, many persons newly entering correctional work are amateurs. Many of them are prevented from acquiring experience, competence, confidence, and professional skill in this field. In those jurisdictions where frequent and complete turnover of personnel occurs, the task is committed recurrently to the hands of inexperienced and untrained employees who have no opportunity to build upon their own experience or the cumulative experience of others. In those jurisdictions where the pay does not attract individuals with capacity for growth and success the solution of correctional problems is entrusted to hands unequal to the task.

On the other hand, in systems which offer a respected career to the individuals entering the field, which have a sound classification and pay scale with promotions based upon merit from within the organization, and in which a strong sense of mutual assistance prevails among the personnel, there the gains of each generation can be passed on to their successors. A professional devotion to the work and an understanding of its rehabilitative possibilities replace the insecurity and instability of an untrained personnel gravely concerned with its job tenure.

The Open Institution

By KENYON J. SCUDDER

AMERICA cannot solve her crime problem by locking men in prison. Neither can she adjust men in prison and prepare them for the day of release by dumping them into a great bastille.

It is a well-recognized fact today that a prison experience is apt to bring out the worst in a man and leave its permanent scar upon his personality. Therefore what happens to men in prison will in large measure determine their attitude upon release. Now 98 per cent of those who go to prison return to the community some day. We should be greatly concerned whether they come out soured and embittered against society for having placed them there or full of hope and new courage for the future because we have afforded them ample opportunity to improve their condition during incarceration.

One reason for clinging to outmoded prison traditions of the past is the fundamental fear that men will escape if given the slightest opportunity. So we continue to build our prisons of concrete and steel, with clanging doors and electric locks, with armed guards and barbed wire, on the old theory that since we cannot determine who can be trusted and who cannot, we must treat all men alike, expecting them all to escape.

I am certain that the sternest warden of our penal institutions in America will admit that if he had the proper facilities in the form of different types of institutions for different types of prisoners, and the necessary trained personnel to sort out and place the hardened and dangerous offenders in the proper maximum-security institution, he would need such a secure unit for not more than 25 per cent of all his prisoners. The rest could be handled in medium- and minimum-security institutions.

Twelve years ago the men at Folsom Prison in California refused to work. Their attitude was expressed by a prisoner: "What? Me Work? Why the judge sentenced me here to do time, not to do work."

As a result, it was difficult to administer that institution. Later, when prison industries were introduced and men experienced the dignity of work, the whole atmosphere at Folsom changed, and now men line up each morning eagerly asking to be employed.

I once asked Bob Heinze, warden of Folsom, California's super maximum-security prison, how many of his 2,600 men were too dangerous to be at large in the prison yard. He replied: "If I could lock up eighty men and keep them away from the general population, this place would be a paradise."

Since then the State Department of Corrections has furnished a new unit for such a purpose, housing two hundred men. The warden is experiencing difficulty in keeping it filled. Even the willful troublemakers would rather behave than be deprived of the meager freedom of a prison yard.

And yet with few exceptions our states have been unwilling to support any change in their penal systems, content to go on as before. The majority of the prisons of the world are still of a maximum-security type, surrounded by high walls bristling with guns and other restrictive devices.

In twenty-three states our prisons are from seventy to one hundred and ten years old and should have been torn down long ago and replaced by another type of prison.

During the last three years we have witnessed the greatest series of prison disturbances in the history of our country.

While some states and penologists recognized that there was a better way to administer our prisons, it was the federal Bureau of Prisons led by Sanford Bates and James V. Bennett in the 1930's that blazed a new trail in the housing, classification, care, and treatment of prisoners. As a result, some states have now surpassed even the Bureau's fine achievements.

THE CALIFORNIA STORY

During the last nine years under the leadership of Richard A. McGee, director of corrections, and with the splendid backing of former Governor Earl Warren, the prison system of California has been completely overhauled; new medium- and minimum-security prisons and a new institution for women have been built, two reception-guidance centers have been set up, in the north and south, and a medical facility for those in need of such service, thus providing a state-wide system of classification and treatment of all offenders regardless of the seriousness of their crime.

The real beginning of these changes in California's penal system occurred in 1935 when an enlightened legislature decided that prisoners should be treated as individuals and that the more hopeful cases should be separated from the hardened offenders. To that end provision was made for the "segregation" from the hardened criminals of those prisoners capable of moral rehabilitation and restoration to good citizenship.

A farm-type institution with suitable buildings and program was proposed, and a site of 2,600 acres was secured near the town of Chino in southern California.

The project was under the direction of a state board of prison directors, a group of five unsalaried lay members appointed by the governor and confirmed by the state Senate.

It was then that fear entered the picture. The custody-minded prison board, dominated by custody-minded wardens, differed in their ideas on prison management from the intent of the legislature. "If southern California wants a prison, a prison it shall be," they said, and because of the great fear of escapes they proceeded to build an old-type penitentiary. The two prisons we then had were in bad shape. On the national rating scale for the United States California stood second from the bottom.

In spite of this, the prison board started two maximum-security cell blocks at Chino, surrounded half the 2,600 acres with a high chain link fence topped with six strands of barbed wire, and erected ten gun towers, all of which had no place in a minimum-security prison. They further planned a twenty-foot wall to surround all the buildings and expected to provide five additional gun towers to keep the men in at night.

In 1938, after a serious disturbance at San Quentin prison, the intransigent prison board was removed and with the appointment of a new board the way was opened for a more reasonable attitude toward a minimum-security institution.

OPPORTUNITY KNOCKS . . .

In 1940, I was appointed superintendent at Chino and given a free hand to select my staff. Here was such an opportunity as seldom comes to a state more than once in a century to start a new type of institution for the first offender. The brutal and impersonal treatment I had witnessed at the hands of ignorant and untrained guards in institutions where I had worked convinced me that there should be some better method of dealing with prisoners if they were to be restored to useful citizenship. Why not weave into this new fabric the best we could find in the good prisons in America and develop a different pattern for the care and treatment of men in trouble?

Here, emphasis would be placed on freedom of choice, acceptance of responsibility while in prison, and preparation for return to community life. We would recognize that individuals change slowly; therefore, the process of adjustment must be gradual. It is easy to be good with a gun in your back when you are told what to do and when to do it. It is quite another thing to have to accept responsibility while in prison, the kind of responsibility you are expected to assume in a free world outside the walls. We must follow a new prison philosophy, namely, "that there can be no regeneration except in freedom. That rehabilitation must come from within the individual and not through coercion."¹

CHINO'S STAFF

In selecting our staff, why not look for young men just out of college, who perhaps had never seen a prison; young men with vision and courage and a desire for a career in penology? Then we should not be tied down by old traditions binding us to the many outmoded methods of the past. And since we were not going to build the inside wall with its five additional gun towers, we should be forced to rely upon the personality, ability, and courage of the staff to handle the men without the use of force and firearms.

Could such staff personnel be found? There were 50 positions in the budget for Chino and 2,300 people had signed up for those jobs. Most of them had been promised a position by some politician.

We gave a screening examination which eliminated all but 700 who could meet our minimum requirements. Then we interviewed the 225 who scored the highest. From this group we selected the 50, in spite of vigorous political opposition. Most of them had an A.B., although we were not looking for degrees, and only one had ever worked in a prison. We were looking first of all for men who understood how to handle people.

These young men were given an intensive eight weeks' training course before we were ready to open the prison. The course included instruction in the use of firearms so that no one would get hurt. Then we locked up the guns, and they have never been used except in case of escapes. Through the teaching of judo, the art of self-defense, we developed in each man poise, courage, and confidence in his own ability to deal with any emergency that might arise without resorting to arms. A part of each day was devoted to the theory of handling men, some sociology, psychology, problems of discipline, and the general philosophy of freedom that was to govern the institution.

They were a fine-looking group with an eager desire to make good on this new job. This careful selection of staff has paid big dividends to the State of California, as evidenced by the positions these men hold today, twelve years after the institution opened. Thirty-nine are still with the Department of Corrections, five as associate wardens or superintendents, five on the Director's staff in Sacramento, and all the others advanced in position and making their individual contributions to the work of the department.

THE FIRST BUS LOAD OF PRISONERS

We had quite a discussion about how to transport our first load of men from San Quentin to Chino. Old-timers said we should get a prison car with locks and bars, handcuffs, and leg irons or we would never get them there.

We had personally interviewed each man, and he had been carefully selected to make the trip. Many had families in southern California, mothers, wives, and children whom they had not seen in months or years, lasting ties that should anchor the men to Chino. Eagerly they inquired about the visiting privileges, whether the family or friends could come to see them.

"My wife can make it up here to San Quentin only once a year," one man said, "and then she can't bring the baby."

"Do you really think I can make it?" another inquired. "I'd like to write my wife."

"Go ahead and write her," I said, "for you will be one of the men to open the institution at Chino."

On July 10, 1941, instead of a prison car we chartered a Greyhound bus and took the first group the five hundred miles to Chino as ordinary passengers. There were thirty-four convicts and three of us. We had no handcuffs, leg irons, billy clubs, or guns, and there was no lock on the bus door.

We arrived at Chino at six o'clock that night. I couldn't have asked for a better behaved group.

As the young, unarmed supervisor, dressed in sport clothes, waved us through the front gate, a new institution was born, based upon this new philosophy of freedom.

The reaction of the men was something to remember. That night we waded through the mail home. One man wrote: "Dear Mom: You don't have to be ashamed of getting letters out of this place because it isn't a prison. It's the California Institution for Men." Another said: "Dad: When I arrived, I lost my number and got back my name 'cause they call me Jack around here."

That was twelve years ago. Since then Chino has grown from those 34 men to a population of 1,800, of whom 300 are in five forestry camps administered by the institution.

More than thirteen thousand men have been transported to Chino by bus. We have never had a single man attempt to escape en route, and the conduct on the bus has been exemplary.

ESCAPES

When we decided not to build the inner fence around the buildings with its five additional gun towers we thought we might lose 10 per cent of our men by escape. The first four years we lost less than 4 per cent. Now, with 1,500 men at Chino proper, our escapes are less than 1 per cent, and the housing units are never locked.

This fine record has been maintained because of the highly selective process made possible through the two reception-guidance centers in the department; in addition, it is a great tribute to the men and the personnel.

At Chino, we endeavor to take all the glory from escaping.

"There are certain responsibilities you must carry," they are told.

"First, you must decide whether you are going to stay here or escape. It's easy to get out of here. Let us tell you how to get over the fence. Just take your jacket, throw it over the barbed wire and over you go—and you won't cut yourself getting out. If you stay on the inside of the fence you can enjoy limited freedom. When you drop down on the other side you are a fugitive felon and we will bring you back no matter how long it takes. Many more years will be added to your sentence and you can never come back to Chino.²

Fear of escapes dominates every institution. It magnifies itself and becomes a challenge, especially in the absence of a proper classification system and institutional facilities to serve the different types of prisoners. When these are present, escapes are few.

The offense a man committed has little to do with his selection for Chino. We have everything from murder to passing bad checks. The selection is based on the man himself, on his attitude and whether he is likely to get into trouble again. The largest number at Chino are in for robbery with a gun; next burglary, grand theft, and bad checks. A few murderers are selected toward the end of their imprisonment to give them a chance to get ready for release and to accept responsibility for their own custody. It is the man and not the offense that is important.

DISCIPLINE

Discipline in a minimum-security prison must be handled on a fair and impartial basis. How can we maintain order when fear is removed?

Men in prison, with the exception of the 25 per cent who must be confined in maximum security, do not want trouble. They want to get out and to do it in the right way, and they will respond to just treatment.

By means of a disciplinary committee, all cases involving serious infractions are given a fair and thorough hearing. If the man cannot get along with other people or has refused to co-operate with the institution officials and program, he is removed from the group until he is willing to do so. We have no isolation unit at Chino. No man is sent to segregation for any stated length of time, such as fifteen or twenty-nine days. We have no restricted diet, every man getting the same food as others, even to his dessert, although he may be locked up and not allowed to go to the dining room.

A man is placed in segregation only until he declares that he can behave himself and is now able to get along with other people. When he does so declare himself, he is released. We seldom have him locked up more than twenty-four hours, and he is seldom placed back in segregation. With 1,500 men at Chino and 300 in our forestry camps, we often go thirty days without a single man locked up for discipline. Very few have to be transferred to a higher-security prison.

VISITING PRIVILEGES

In a minimum-security prison, liberal visiting privileges help to develop further an atmosphere of freedom and to place responsibility upon the individual inmate.

During our first year at Chino, visiting was limited to one hour a week, under close supervision, but with no screen between the man and his family.

We were then impressed with the type of visitors who came each Sunday. They were a good cross-section of society and conducted themselves very well. Statistics showed that men on parole had a much better chance to succeed where the family had been kept together. In order to encourage family visiting, the men were allowed to build a beautiful visiting area outside the Administration Building. They constructed a large pergola, planted lawn and trees, and built many varicolored picnic tables. Here the family unit could visit together on Saturdays, Sundays, and holidays.

When you visit at Chino, you can bring the children and a picnic lunch. Over the loudspeaker a voice calls, "Will Mr. Johnson come in and meet his guest."

As Mr. Johnson appears, his little girl runs across the room and jumps into her daddy's arms; while he holds her closely, the wife comes up with the food basket. He embraces his wife and picks up the basket.

"Come on out to the visiting grounds."

The wife looks around and says, "But where are the guards?"

"There are no guards here, honey," he replies. "Come on. I'm the host." And for four hours the little family can visit undisturbed with no one listening in to the conversation.

The men say, "It's a wonderful thing to be able to visit with your children and not have them forget you while you're in prison."

Occasionally there are abuses. Some marijuana, heroin, and liquor are found, but we deal severely with individuals receiving them. We have to take some chance if we are ever to make progress in prison reform.

Every Sunday we have a thousand visitors, men, women, and children, and they are a much better behaved group than you would find in any public park. We think the liberal visiting privileges at Chino have contributed a great deal to the adjustment of the men. It is one of the best things we have done.

Another factor contributing to an atmosphere of freedom is that the men are not escorted to work, meals, or recreation. They are responsible for their own custody. In the big dining room, no guards line the walls as 1,500 men are fed cafeteria style. They sit where they please, linger over their coffee, and leave the dining room when they are through.

WORK, WORK TRAINING, RECREATION

The Department of Corrections has emphasized the importance of constructive useful work, and in our prison industries or in the many other tasks to be performed all men work seven and a half hours a day. Over half of them are paid from two to ten cents per hour. If by this process we merely teach them to get over the fear of work we have accomplished a great deal.

More than six hundred are in trade classes half a day; the other half day is devoted to helping run the institution by means of useful work. Through classification, each man is interviewed, his case studied, the findings and recommendations of the guidance center reviewed with him, and he is placed in the kind of training and work he has requested.

Classes in bricklaying, tile setting, plastering, welding, machine shop work, body and fender repair, auto mechanics, and a host of others, taught by journey-men instructors furnished by the Chino High School District, furnish men with skills to sell to an employer upon release.

This is of great importance in a prisoner's ultimate adjustment, because our records indicate that 85 per cent of the men who go to prison have no special skills to make them employable. We must give these men an opportunity while in prison to correct this deplorable condition, so that when they leave prison they will be able to secure and hold a job.

Men in prison must be kept busy in useful work and wholesome recreation for their leisure hours. The recreation program ranges from football to checkers. Music, radio, television, dramatics, play their important part. It is amazing what talent a prison population contains. Too often we never afford it opportunity for expression. When we do, men rise to great heights and receive a great deal of therapeutic treatment in the mere performance.

RELIGION

There is an important place for religion and spiritual counseling in every prison in the world. Too often it is overlooked or pushed aside, the last thing for which adequate provision is made. It calls for carefully selected and well-trained chaplains who have a genuine interest in the welfare of prisoners. When the religious program is sincere the men will respond.

Each Easter and Mother's Day we hold the religious services on the visiting grounds and invite parents, wives, and children to come an hour earlier than usual for their visit. Between four and five hundred come. The robed inmate choir, as they march out singing their processional, give dignity to the service from its opening moment. I have sometimes wondered what was going through the minds of the visitors and the men as together they join in the hymn, "He makes the woeful heart to sing."

One Easter Sunday the Columbia Broadcasting System used a poem written by one of our men, a Negro. There was a hushed silence when the announcer said, "And now the prayer, 'I Walked With God,' by F. H."

I walked aloft with God the other night
Among the stars above the village green.
A thousand angels lent their light
To mark my way and they remained unseen.

I knelt before His throne
And kneeling there, laid bare my heart
And bade Him enter in.
And lo! The grace of God shone everywhere
And I arose refreshed and cleansed of sin.

I walked abroad with God the other night
And learned the wondrous glory of his might.
He spoke and put my fears and cares to flight.
God smiled and made me whole the other night.

As the prayer ended, I thought that perhaps through his poetry this man really had found God.

Now the state has furnished us with two beautiful chapels, Protestant and Catholic, which have added a great stimulus to the religious services.

SOCIAL LIVING

Men in prison often fear the day of release. How will society receive them? Will there be a whispering campaign against them in the neighborhood? What about traffic, bright lights, noise and confusion in public places? Will they be able to meet and converse with people?

One night in 1942, the California Community Players from Pasadena played Charlie's Aunt for our men. There were twenty-two in the cast. About forty of our men helped to put on the show. Afterwards Mrs. Scudder invited the cast over to the house for refreshments, and with them the forty men. It was raining outside when they arrived.

Here were about seventy people in our living room. Things were a little tense at first. Then Mrs. Scudder opened the door to her dining room and we all went in for refreshments. The table with its lace cloth, candles, silver service, and flowers was a beautiful sight. We each picked up our ice cream, cake, and coffee and went back to the living room. Some sat on the floor, others stood in front of the fire. Then with the food came a hum of conversation. One of the men went to the piano and began to play the songs America loves to sing, "Home on the Range," "Let Me Call You Sweetheart," and the whole house burst into song.

I stood in the doorway looking at the group. As our men dress in civilian sport clothes when they have them, if I had not known each individual I could not have told who were free and who were not. They were all people together, but forty of them were reaching out for that precious thing called freedom and trying to get it back again, for now they realized what they had lost.

When the men left that night to report themselves to their dormitories, unescorted, there were tears in the eyes of men who had not shed a tear in years. Since that night, we have had more than a thousand men in our home on the grounds and never have we had the slightest difficulty. They have conducted themselves as gentlemen. And in each case we have seen some of the pressures removed, pressures of doubt and frustrations, a relaxing of tensions and an eager determination not to treat freedom so lightly in the future.

CLASSIFICATION AND SELECTION

In setting up a minimum-security institution in any state adequate facilities must be provided for the proper classification and selection of men from the prison system. A few wrong selections can cause a lot of trouble.

One of the best means of selection is the facility known as a reception-guidance center. In California, instead of prisoners being sent by the courts to any particular prison they are committed to the state Department of Corrections, and the director instructs the sheriffs of the various counties to deliver them to the guidance centers at San Quentin or at Chino. At these centers an able staff of trained psychologists, psychiatrists, social workers, and counselors study them for a period of two months before any final action is taken on which prison they shall be sent to.

When Chino opened it was estimated that we could handle about 6 per cent direct from the two guidance centers. With the many forestry camps and the ranch units connected with several institutions, in all of which men work with little supervision, the California state Department of Corrections now has 37 per cent of its prison population serving their sentences under minimum security.

Chino is only one institution in a department of seven, and all of the others contribute to its success by sending the better type of prisoner to be handled under its program.

In the twelve years since Chino opened, 13,025 men have been received. There have been only two acts of violence against any member of the staff. Three hundred and seventy-two have escaped; of these, all but sixteen have been apprehended. Last year we had our largest population and our lowest escape record.

PAROLE

It is difficult to estimate the final success or failure of parole. California has an excellent parole system handled by an Adult Authority of five members appointed by the governor and confirmed by the Senate. These men are carefully chosen, devote full time to the work, and are amply paid. They do an excellent job, entirely free from political influence or interference. They attempt to deal with the facts in the best interests of society and the prisoner.

Available figures indicate that the rate of failure on parole is much lower from Chino than from the other institutions in the state. We should expect that, because these men are carefully selected as the better prospects for successful adjustment if kept away from the hardened offender. About 8 to 10 per cent commit new felonies. Another 20 per cent are returned from parole on a technical violation. They get drunk, won't stay on the job, leave the state without permission, or refuse to report. The percentage of return for technical violators depends of course on the type of parole supervision given, which varies greatly in the different states.

RECENT PROGRESS

In the past twenty-five years several states have made real progress in the care and treatment of men in prison. They have abolished the silence system and the striped clothing; mail and visiting privileges have been improved; and men are being classified and trained for useful work. These few privileges were granted over the years in spite of a hue and cry that prisoners were being coddled and that trouble would surely follow. But trouble did not follow. Instead, in these few prisons men are being better prepared for the day of release. In some other states little progress has been made, and men are still treated with brutality and utter disregard for their welfare.

Seagoville, Texas, a minimum-security institution of the federal Bureau of Prisons, is an outstanding example of what can be done with carefully selected and well-trained personnel. Wallkill, New York, is another splendid institution where emphasis is placed on training and adjustment instead of on mere custody. Several states have extended the forestry camp program, an excellent way to get started in minimum security, for the outdoor life and the sense of freedom in these camps bring out the best in men as they approach the day of release. Construction costs and upkeep are much less, and more men can be handled on a six months' turnover schedule than in the large institution. In addition, these men make excellent fire fighters and more than earn their entire keep through the work they perform.

Minimum-security prisons should be kept small. Seagoville with its three hundred men is ideal. No such institution should ever exceed a thousand men. When it goes beyond that figure individual treatment must give way to mass treatment.⁸

WHAT OF THE FUTURE?

And what does all this treatment of adults in prison add up to?

Simply this. If we can successfully adjust men in prison after they have run the whole gamut of the law, if we can get them over the fear of work, if we can send them back to society a little better than when they entered, then how much more sensible it would be if we could reach these cases earlier in life before the damage has been done. Reach them in the early years of childhood before they become delinquent, before we allow them to enter upon a criminal career. We make our criminals in this country. They are not born into crime. Then why not place our emphasis upon prevention by reaching these cases at the source of trouble—in the average community?

When society realizes that her prisoners are people, that they come from her communities and will return there again, then I think she must turn her attention upon those unsatisfactory conditions that exist in every community in this country, conditions that breed delinquency and crime, and enlist the help and assistance of the average citizen to clean them up.

When she does that, society can start closing down her prisons.

⁸ The California Institution for Men with its 1,500 is too big but we have been forced to this high figure because of the unprecedented population increase in California, an increase of four million people in twelve years.

Kenyon J. Scudder is superintendent of the California Institution for Men at Chino, California. He has served as superintendent of the Whittier State School in California and probation officer of Los Angeles County, California. He is the author of numerous articles and of a book, Prisoners Are People (1952), which is now being turned into a motion picture by Hall Bartlett Productions of Hollywood.

Resocialization Within Walls

By LLOYD W. McCORKLE and RICHARD KORN

AS the concept "socialization" implies group membership, so the derivative concept, "resocialization," implies changes in group memberships. Many findings in the social origins of individual behavior suggest that the problem of reshaping the antisocial attitudes and values of offenders is related to the possibility of altering the patterns of group membership which they bring with them into the prison. The question therefore arises, To what extent does the prison community provide opportunities for altering the group memberships and reversing the socialization process which contributed to the criminal behavior of those incarcerated in it? A necessary starting point for this inquiry would appear to be an examination of the prison community as a functional social unit.

A prison is a physical structure in a geographical location where a number of people, living under highly specialized conditions, utilize the resources and adjust to the alternatives presented to them by a unique kind of social environment. The people creating and enmeshed in this environment include administrative, custodial, and professional employees, habitual petty thieves, one-time offenders, gangsters, professional racketeers, psychotics, prepsychotics, neurotics, and psychopaths, all living under extreme conditions of physical and psychological compression. The formal administrative structure of the prison may be comprehended in a brief glance at its table of organization. This table reveals a series of bureaucratically arranged positions with the warden at the top, and formal flow of power downward from his position. A more penetrating glance at the social structure of the prison reveals an ongoing complex of processes that can neither be described nor anticipated by a static enumeration of formal powers and functions. For interacting with this formal administrative structure—and in many ways independent of it—is another social structure, the inmate social system, which has evolved a complex of adaptational processes with which inmates attempt to cope with the major problems of institutional living.

THE INMATE SOCIAL SYSTEM

Observation suggests that the major problems with which the inmate social system attempts to cope center about the theme of social rejection. In many ways, the inmate social system may be viewed as providing a way of life which enables the inmate to avoid the devastating psychological effects of internalizing and converting social rejection into self-rejection. In effect, it permits the inmate to reject his rejectors rather than himself. If it is valid to assume that the major adjustive function of the inmate social system is to protect its members from the effects of internalizing social rejection, then it would seem to follow that the usages of this system are most beneficial to those who have most experienced the consequences of, and developed defenses around, social rejection. It would also follow that the system would find its strongest supporters among those who have, in the process, become most independent of the larger society's values in their definitions and evaluations of themselves. We might also expect to find that those individuals whose self-evaluations are still relatively dependent on the values of the larger, noncriminal society and whose supportive human relationships are still largely with its members would have the most difficulty in adjusting to a social system whose major values are based on the rejection of that larger society.

If these inferences are correct, we may only conclude that the inmate social system is most supportive and protective to those inmates who are most criminally acculturated—and conversely, most threatening and disruptive to those whose loyalties and personal identifications are still with the noncriminal world. Observation supports this conclusion. The nonacculturated offender is rejected not only by the society which defines him as a person, but he suffers the double jeopardy of rejection from the subsociety in which he is now forced to live. In effect, he is denied membership in both. The adaptive inmate, on the other hand, is not only protected from loss of the group membership which defined him as a person, but he is placed in an environment where that membership is assured and his personal adjustment consequently powerfully bolstered. Continued group acceptance of these individuals is based upon their adherence to inmate codes and values.

CHARACTERISTICS OF THE SYSTEM

The first and most obvious characteristic of the inmate social system is the absence of escape routes from it. The offender is not only incarcerated in a physical prison without exit; he is enmeshed in a human environment and a pattern of usages from which the only escape is psychological withdrawal. Another aspect of the inmate social system is its rigidly hierarchical character, in which vertical mobility, while possible, is highly difficult. The causes of this immobilizing rigidity are various.

The numbers of roles an individual may play are severely limited and, once assigned, are maintained—particularly at the lower status levels—with enormous group pressure. The degree to which the individual can partake in the selection of his role is similarly limited and conditional. From the moment the new inmate arrives from the court or the county jail, he is exposed to a series of very direct defining experiences. It is of interest to note that those inmates who participate in and administer these experiences are frequently those who recognize that the inmate is somewhat near their level, a perception which stimulates anxiety in them. For example, an obviously tough professional hoodlum will create no special problem to the majority of the lower-status inmates who, responding to minimal clues, will either avoid him or immediately acknowledge his higher status. The arrival of this inmate, however, will pose a threat to the wing's chief "bad man," who will be expected to challenge the newcomer to a battle of mutual definitions.

There is an additional aspect of this defining process which sheds light on another characteristic of the social structure, namely, its extreme authoritarianism. The role-defining conflicts carried on by inmates on or near the same status level point up the fact that any situation of equality is a situation of threat which must be resolved into a relationship of superordination and subordination. However vehemently inmates in groups demand equal treatment and condemn favoritism, inmates as individuals continuously press for special personal advantages. Where demands for increased permissiveness have been granted by authorities, the results have almost invariably been that the rigid authoritarian patterns have not been destroyed but merely transferred to a new and less stable center of gravity. The history of inmate self-government reveals that the yielding up of powers by the external ordering authority usually generates patterns of internal group coercion more punitive, more rigid, and incomparably more discriminatory than those which they supplanted. This authoritarian character of inmate relationships suggests that members of the system afford no exception to the general psychological observation that the victims of power tend to regard its possession as the highest personal value.

Possession of power

The dominating value of the inmate social system seems to be the possession and exercise of coercive power. There are probably no relationship functions which have escaped the influence of this factor. Even usages of mutual aid have been contaminated and made subservient to it. To illustrate: one way to proclaim possessive rights over another inmate is to help him in some way, usually by material aid. New inmates, unaware of the subversive motivations behind these services, are quickly apprised of their coercive character. Once an inmate has accepted any material symbol of service it is understood that the donor of these gifts has thereby established personal rights over the receiver. The extreme degree to which these mutual aid usages have been made dependent to power struggles is illustrated by the custom of forcing other inmates to accept cigarettes, a frequent prison invitation to submission. Aggressive inmates will go to extraordinary lengths to place gifts in the cells of inmates they have selected for personal domination. These intended victims, in order to escape the threatened bondage, must find the owner and insist that the gifts be taken back. Should the donor refuse to take them back, the receiver may be forced to fight him then and there.

One measure of the inherent cohesive strength of any social system is the degree to which behavior controls have been individually internalized, thereby obviating all but a minimal degree of interpersonal coercion. Since the basic values of the inmate social system, personal power and exploitation, are inherently inimical to co-operative group living, enormous pressures are required to prevent the inherently centrifugal forces from disintegrating the system. These pressures are supplied in part by the external control and punitive threats of the official world. In the absence of these external unifying forces, order can be maintained only by the most tyrannical inmate rule.

Evasion of rules

Like every other social organization, the inmate system provides not only rules and sanctions for their violation but also methods for evading those rules and escaping the sanctions. The disruptive forces inherent in the basic personal value (personal domination through the exertion of coercive power) have generated techniques for the violation of the most fundamental ordinances in support of group unity. The power of these disruptive forces is indicated by the fact that even the most sacred rule of the inmate code, the law against squealing, is daily violated and evaded with impunity. Contrary to the propaganda generated by the more solemn of the inmate clergy in defense of their code, informers and betrayers require little or no seduction by prison officials. Actually the main administrative problem presented by informers is not gaining them but avoiding them, since they come as volunteers from all levels of the inmate hierarchy.

In face of these weaknesses and internal contradictions the question arises, How does the system avoid breaking down and why have prison officials generally failed in exploiting its weaknesses? A part of the answer may lie in the fact that prison officials have generally tended to use the inmate power structure as an aid in prison administration and the maintenance of good order—not realizing that in this attempt to manipulate the structure they themselves are more used than using. Far from systematically attempting to undermine the inmate hierarchy, the institution generally gives it covert support and recognition by assigning better jobs and quarters to its high-status members providing they are "good inmates." In this and in other ways the institution buys peace with the system by avoiding battle with it.

THE WORK SITUATION

The freedom from the necessity of earning a living in prison introduces a striking difference between the requirements of material success within and without the walls. A significantly different configuration of traits and aptitudes acquires value, some of which represent direct reversals of those developed outside. In prison the direct relationship between work done and material value received has largely broken down. The relationship between individual productivity and personal status is even more markedly broken down. From a sophisticated inmate's point of view this relationship seems to become a negative one. Strategic placement and effective informal connections rather than individual productivity are the crucial methods for the attainment of material goods.

As a consumer-producer, the inmate lives and trades in two economic worlds: he is a barterer in the informal and illicit inmate market and a wage earner in the prison work system. The contrast between his behavior in these two worlds is most revealing. As a trader in the informal inmate barter system, he is resourceful, ingenious, and usually co-operative: there is a kind of "Better Business Bureau" tradition which is generally effective in encouraging the liquidation of debts. As a wage earner in the prison labor system he is, by contrast, encouraged to be nonproductive, dilatory, and contentious, articulating his work relations with the institution in terms of declarations of rights and grievances. In many modern institutions, the "workers' rights" of inmates go beyond the most extreme of those advanced by organized labor on the outside.

Inmates' attitudes

The following is a summary of the sophisticated inmate's view of his economic rights—those attitudes and values concerning work most frequently articulated to institutional officials by leading spirits of the inmate social system:

The fundamental authority in defining the inmate's job obligations is tradition. Inmates are to be required to work only so much as the tradition concerning given jobs requires. Any departure from these traditions—especially those departures in the direction of increased work for the same pay—are violations of the inmates' work rights and justify obstructionism. (In a certain penal institution, for instance, "tradition" had established that one inmate lay out all the salt cellars on the mess tables while a different inmate was required to lay out the pepper.)

Increases in the amount of time or output may only be required under extraordinary circumstances and merit increased pay or special benefits, since these added efforts are "favors" extended by the inmates. The inmates have a right to resent and take reprisals against any of their number who "show the rest up" by doing more than the traditional amount of work. These hostile attitudes toward more energetic inmates effectively condemn them to the deteriorating work patterns enforced by the group. Any inmate who performs more than the usual expectation must prove that he has received a special reward—usually food or informal permission to evade some institutional rule.

The providing of jobs is a duty of prison officials and a right, rather than a privilege, of inmates. Once assigned to a job, there are only a limited number of legitimate reasons for which an inmate may be "fired." None of these legitimate reasons includes adherence to the accepted job tradition. Thus an inmate rarely feels that he may rightfully be dismissed for laziness, if he performs only the usual amount of work traditionally required, despite an increase in institutional needs, since the tradition protects him from any definition of himself as lazy. Inmates generally feel that the fact that they are paid less than comparable civilian workers entitles them to produce less.

The total result of the prevalence of these attitudes has been to reduce "imprisonment at hard labor" to a euphemism existing chiefly in the rhetoric of sentencing judges and in the minds of the uninformed public. The inmate social system not only has succeeded in neutralizing the laboriousness of prison labor in fact, but also has more or less succeeded in convincing prison authorities of the futility of expecting any improvement in output. Responding to a multitude of pressures within and without the prison, most institutional work supervisors have adopted patterns of expectations which are largely supportive of the inmate position.

Supervisors' attitudes

The following summarizes what the writers have found to be the prevalent attitudes of work supervisors toward convict labor:

Convicts are inherently unindustrious, unintelligent, unresourceful, and uninterested in honest work. They are, generally speaking, a worthless lot of men who have never learned, and can never learn, good work habits. In the face of these facts, the supervisory staff cannot be held in any way responsible for the low output of prison labor. Any attempts to force increases in output of prison labor are dangerous and must be resisted by realistic administrators in order to protect what little work can be secured from inmates.

But there is another reason for the low labor standards of inmates. Convicts may not justifiably be expected to do as much work as their civilian working counterparts because their pay is so much less. It is basically unjust to demand that a man work as much as he would have to work on the outside for as little as he earns on the inside.

One is reluctantly forced to the conclusion that, in adopting a set of expectations which support inmates' attitudes, prison work supervisors have surrendered to the realities of inmate pressure rather than to the realities of the work situation. This surrender has implications that extend far beyond prison walls, since it encourages inmates to fixate work habits which severely cripple their ability to make realistic work adjustments upon release. Since the inmate's ability to make an effective noncriminal adjustment on the outside is directly dependent on his ability to hold a job, the conclusion is inevitable that the fostering of deteriorated work patterns in prison represents a considerable contribution to recidivism. It is probable that the much decried "prison idleness" in its brutal honesty represents far less of a contribution.

There is another far-reaching evil in this surrender to the inmate social system. In manipulating supervisory authorities into support of his position, the adaptive inmate destroys a major therapeutic objective of the prison experience, namely, that of learning compliance to duly constituted authority. By learning that he can successfully deceive, connive, and evade, the inmate is re-encouraged in the hope that, by using the social skills perfected in prison, he may avoid the unfortunate "errors" that first trapped him and sent him there.

THE CUSTODIAN

Probably the most important and strategically placed individuals involved in the problem of reconstruction of attitudes are the cell-block officers and shop instructors—those representatives of the external community who come in direct, face-to-face daily contact with the inmate. How these individuals relate to the inmate determines, in the long run, not only the care and treatment policy of the institution, but that of the larger society as well. Consequently, any attempt to evaluate reconstruction within walls must make a careful and exhaustive analysis of these highly significant relationships.

The responsibility of those who man the locks is as confining, in many ways, as is the imprisonment of those confined by them. The keeper of the keys is a prisoner too. By the time he retires, the custodian will have spent from eight to fifteen years totally within the prison walls. During this time he will have been personally and singly responsible for the custody and discipline of many thousands of inmates. During most of the time he has spent inside the walls he will have been continually outnumbered and continually under the threat of being outwitted by inmates whose obedience to him is protected only by his status as a symbol of power. His duties are as manifold as those of a commander of troops and as hazardous as those of the commander whose forces may at any time cross the brink of rebellion. One of the hazards of his situation paradoxically is the ease with which he can be lulled into forgetfulness of its hazards.

In order to preserve his status as a symbol of authority, the custodian must surround himself with a social distance which prevents the realities of his weaknesses from becoming apparent to the inmates. The realities of his situation are most unfavorable. He is dependent in part on inmate personnel for the physical mechanics of operating his wing. He is also continuously exposed to numerous techniques of deception. However, these tangible weaknesses do not form the main hazards threatening his effective functioning. These are more intangible and, as such, difficult to detect and even more difficult to control.

The inmate social system has developed techniques to exploit the custodian's psychological as well as his physical vulnerability. These techniques are aimed at a reduction of the social distance protecting his role as guard, outflanking it with a personal relationship, and exploiting that relationship for the inmates' own purposes. Once the relationship between keeper and inmate is on a man-to-man basis, the dependency and vulnerability of the custodian become apparent. "Obeying orders" becomes transformed into "doing the guard a favor." When obedience undergoes this transformation, reciprocity becomes operative, "One favor deserves another." Should a keeper now refuse to return the favor, the inmate feels it within his right to become hostile because of the keeper's "ingratitude." Once the Pandora's box of special favoritism is open it cannot be shut again without a painful and dangerous demonstration of how fickle are the personal relations between those improbable "friends"—the keeper and his prisoner. Neither can be loyal without violating the principles and risking the rejection of the groups which define their roles and set the limits of mutual accommodation. Once these limits are passed, and it is usually the inmate who attempts to pass them, one or the other must balk. This is interpreted as a "betrayal" which terminates the relationship and transforms the friends into enemies. In the process, both become discredited by their own groups—which have now victoriously redemonstrated the insurmountability of the mutual antagonism.

It thus becomes apparent that a breakdown of the social distance between the inmate and his keeper must, sooner or later, result in the exploitation of one by the other and the ultimate degradation of one or both. It is at this point that the most hazardous consequences of this breakdown emerge. Having lost, through a personal relationship, a large measure of the control which had previously been protected by his formal, impersonal role, the keeper is far less able to cope with the powerful and eventually antagonistic emotions which that personal relationship unleashed. A violent resolution of the conflict now becomes increasingly probable, unless harmony can be re-established by a new capitulation or coerced by a convincing show of force.

THE PROFESSIONAL STAFF MEMBER

When the activities of the various categories of prison personnel—administrative, custodial, maintenance, and professional workers—are compared in terms of a clear definition of function, a curious result of the comparison emerges. Of all the personnel at work at the prison, the professional workers are charged with the most far-reaching and socially urgent responsibilities. These are, however, the very persons who are assigned roles and functions which are defined in the most ambiguous and uncertain terms. The new custodial officer, for instance, comes into a defined situation, with his expectations concerning his role reinforced by tradition. Almost anyone he meets has a more or less clear expectation of what his behavior ought to be in practically every situation, and these expectations set distinct limits to individual deviation. In well-run institutions, the very uniform he wears functions as a kind of insulation against personal failings; it is understood that security and discipline require that the official community organize its responses around the role rather than the man. Consequently, it is universally acknowledged that the institution will support the uniform, within limits, whatever the personal characteristics of the individual who wears it. A comparable situation exists in the cases of the administrative and maintenance personnel. Here, too, objectives are limited, well defined, and matched with reasonably effective powers for their realization.

But what of the psychiatrists, the psychologists, the social workers, the counselors, and classification specialists—those to whom the larger society has assigned the mission of resocialization within walls? What are the work aspirations and expectations which are to guide their operations? What are the traditions which will unify the expectations related to their work and set standards for their behavior and the behavior of the personnel interacting with them? They do not exist; they never existed.

The professional entered penal treatment through the breach in the wall forced by the zeal and indignation of the nineteenth-century religious reformers. His forebears, the humanitarian reformers, moved by a profound faith in the direct educability of human nature, sincerely believed that the problem of crime could be solved by a combination of decently treating and religiously exhorting confined criminals.

It is the tragedy of modern correction that the impulse to help has become confused with treatment and seems to require defense as treatment. One of the more ironic difficulties with this position is that, when one makes "rehabilitation" the main justification for humane handling of prisoners, one has maneuvered oneself into a position potentially dangerous to the humanitarian viewpoint. What if humane treatment fails to rehabilitate—shall it then be abandoned? The isolated survivals of flogging and other "tough" techniques which still disgrace American penology remain to remind us that this is no mere academic question.

The bleak fact is that, just as the monstrous punishments of the eighteenth century failed to curb crime, so the more humane handling of the twentieth century has equally failed to do so. Professional workers in penology have an overriding obligation to acknowledge this failure and to seek for its causes. In their inquiry they ought not to exempt their own concepts and methods from scrutiny.

We shall now attempt to examine a process by which the professional services, by defining themselves as the rescuers and helpers rather than the rehabilitators of convicts, helped to maneuver themselves into exploitation by the inmate social system and collaborated in their own neutralization.

"TREATMENT BY HELPING" NEUTRALIZED

In the first part of this paper the observation was made that the inmate social system appears to function as an adaptation to social rejection and punishment, enabling the offender to avoid the pathological effects of converting the hostility of society into hatred of himself. Rather than internalizing this hostility, as does the typical neurotic, the adaptive inmate appears to be able to turn it back upon society, using the misery of prison life as his reasonable pretext. If this interpretation is correct, it may help explain the failure of any attempt to rehabilitate which is based on easing the harshness of prison life.

In order to externalize hostility, individuals must find external objects or conditions against which to express that hostility. The harshness of prison life has been suggested—and is, in fact, suggested by inmates—as the external condition which satisfies this requirement. The question now arises: given the need to externalize hostility, would the effect of improving specific conditions be to reduce the hostility or would it require the inmate to find new outlets for it? Putting the question in a different form: does acceding to the demands of the aggressive adaptive inmates result in a decrease in their protests or does it give rise to new demands around which the hostility generates new protests? Observation and experiences with the results of acceding to inmate pressure strongly suggest the latter.

Much as he protests bad prison conditions, the adaptive inmate requires them, because his system of adaptation creates in him a need to protest. By finding reasonable pretexts for aggressive protest, he is able to accomplish at least three essential psychological objectives:¹

1. The cathecting of hostilities originally generated by his failures in human relations generally and his resentment at confinement in particular.

2. Reinforcement of his self-picture in the role of a martyred victim of superior force, with attendant justifications of his "heroic counterattack."

¹ None of the remarks above justifies complacency about vile prison conditions. One of the worse consequences of these conditions is that they supply reasonable pretexts for the externalization of hostilities which could be utilized more therapeutically in internal disruption of the inmate social system.

3. Absolution of any personal sense of guilt or responsibility for his offense against society by emphasizing and concentrating on society's real or fancied offenses against him.

The implications of this widespread psychological orientation for any treatment based chiefly on permissiveness and helping will become painfully obvious for any professional staff member who enters the prison with a missionary zeal and a determination to undo, by openhanded giving, the "evils of generations of prison corruption." The inmate social system has an infinite reserve of grievances and injustices with which to capture his sympathies and divert his efforts. The new professional can walk through the corridors of the cell block reserved for the most notorious prison "bad men," and hear the noble principles of the Declaration of Principles of 1870 mouthed by the most cynical and deteriorated of inmates—men who a moment before and a moment after they speak with him will be ridiculing his naïveté to the very "brutal hacks" they complained about to his face. All too frequently the lingo and point of view of the professional becomes the property of the articulate champions of the most aggressive and corrupting inmate forces in prison. Like some strange human hothouse, the prison has a way of developing a species of flowery "bleeding hearts" which put forth especially sticky and luxurious blossoms to ensnare the new professional. It is almost as if the inmate social system recognizes the special value of these articulate inmates and puts them forth as a kind of burnt offering with which the professional can make penitential sacrifices on his personal altar of social conscience. The inmate social system throws a diversionary human screen of institutional "problem cases" around the professional staff member, eating up his time and mis-directing his efforts away from his proper target, the system itself.

LACK OF TREATMENT RATIONALE

Mention has been made of the lack of any systematic theory of correctional treatment. This situation is closely related to the absence of any comprehensive and tested theory of crime causation. Since the majority of professional personnel working on the treatment of offenders have been trained in the field of psychological therapies, it would be of interest to determine to what extent their methods of correctional treatment are in harmony with the larger body of theory and practice available in social and psychological pathology and treatment.

We are not prepared, in this paper, to enter into the controversies concerning the nature of the malady—personal or social—from which the habitual, acculturated offender suffers. Assuming, for the purposes of discussion, that he is suffering from some form of personality deviation or disturbance, we may raise two questions. First, do contemporary theories of psychotherapy, however diverse, agree on any common core of requirements and procedures? Secondly, if this common core be ascertainable, what inference may be drawn from it for some general statement of a treatment rationale for offenders? Our survey of contemporary theories and methods of psychotherapy persuades us that such a common core exists, or is at least implicit in contemporary practice. The following summarizes our understanding of the principles of any form of psychological treatment. These are principles common to all methods, from the most superficial brief counseling to the most intensive and extended depth therapy.

1. The person must somehow be brought to an awareness that his difficulties are related to motives and patterns of perception within himself. His attempts to account for these difficulties by blaming a hostile or unfavorable human environment must be analyzed as deriving at least in part from a natural human tendency to avoid guilt and self-rejection. He must be assisted in the gaining of an awareness and a motivation for the taking of present initiative toward change or growth within himself, and he must be shown the fruitlessness of evading this responsibility by futile attempts to change merely his environment.

2. This assistance toward understanding comes about through some relationship with the therapist (or therapeutic situation) in which the individual actually attempts to make his faulty modes of perception and behavior work. Repeated demonstrations of this failure may be necessary before he is able to abandon them. It is important that these failures be not interpreted by him as indicating that he is a worthless or helpless person.

3. Finally, the individual must be provided with opportunities for the learning, testing, and fixating of newer, more effective modes of perceiving and relating to his human environment. As these new patterns emerge and are found rewarding in terms of increased success in relations with the self and others, they tend to become more and more established in the individual's total pattern of adjustment.

Therapeutic changes based on the processes just cited are critically dependent on the individual's taking the first step of locating the source of his difficulty somewhere within himself. But it is against this first and all-important acknowledgment that the inmate social system mobilizes all its forces and values. This mobilization takes the form of defining all situations in terms of grievances and demands justified by those grievances. On the basis of this orientation, the inmate social system divides the whole world of people with whom it relates in terms of a simple dichotomy: there are people who persecute inmates and people whom inmates may exploit. When the professional staff member defined himself as the friend and helper of the inmate he was automatically redefined by the values of the inmate social system as one to be exploited as a champion of inmates in their grievances against society in general and the custodian in particular. Any deviation from this assigned role—especially in the direction of co-operation with measures of custodial control—were then viewed, quite logically, as a betrayal by the professional of his mission to help the inmate. Treatment—defined as help—at this point becomes the enemy of control.

But it is only through strict and careful measures of control that the inmate may be brought face to face with the inadequacy of his faulty technique of adjustment, as he tries to carry out the same pattern of violation and evasion of rules within the institution that required his institutionalization in the first place. By defining himself as one who only aids and eases the inmate in his prison adjustment, the correctional therapist implicitly contributes to the frustration of the all-important objective of demonstrating to the inmate that his pattern is ineffective. Treatment, viewed in this way, now becomes an obstacle to therapy.

CONCLUSIONS

The total result of the interacting trends and processes described has been to isolate the confined offender from socially beneficial contact with individuals outside the inmate social world and to prevent the formation of relationship bonds which might redefine him as an acceptable member of the noncriminal community. This is the major dilemma of penology.

The writers see little possibility of a resolution of this dilemma within the universally prevailing context of a large institutional approach. Large institutions (walled and unwalled) are dependent on the development of a bureaucratic apparatus based on formal structuring of human relationships. This formal structuring, which is required for the efficient and secure operation of the large institution, is in turn dependent on the maintenance of a social distance which sets crippling limits on contact with members of the official community—the only available representatives of the larger society. Where these limits have been redefined—as in the case of the professional worker—the results, to date, have largely been supportive to the inmate social system and have contributed to the weakening of measures of control.

Effective measures of control are viewed as essential to any therapeutic program which would attempt to demonstrate the ineffectiveness of the coercive or conniving or evasive personal and social adjustment which the adaptive offender brings with him into prison. Only after this demonstration is made will it be possible to create the relationships and set up the learning situations required for the fixations of new patterns of behavior. In order to participate effectively in this two-phase therapeutic process—the breaking down of old and the building up of new behavior patterns—the professional and the custodian alike must work to heal the breach which traditionally divided treatment and custody and which ultimately weakened both. The custodian's definition of the therapist as an enemy of discipline and the therapist's conception of the custodian as an obstructor of treatment must be replaced by new definitions which view both as united collaborators in a unitary therapeutic program.

The Legal Rights of Prisoners

By PAUL W. TAPPAN *

NO asset in our cultural heritage has been more precious than the sense of justice and the methods by which we have traditionally sought to fulfill it. We have accepted as a rudimentary necessity of social control the fair testing of man's legal guilt of crime. The struggles of democratic revolution in England and on the Continent have erected a bulwark of procedures to assure a full protection against wrongful conviction, so that innocent suspects might not be accused as criminals. In this country, the legal rights with which history has endowed the accused have persevered more or less intact through the vicissitudes of recurrent emergencies and hysteria.

The critical observer of our culture is confronted with a strikingly different picture in our methods of dealing with convicted criminals. For the accused, there is regularity and uniformity assured through the rule of law, but once convicted, offenders are handled under a veritable chaos of procedures, philosophies, and objectives. In sentencing and treatment, one finds an administrative hegemony little restrained by legal or due process conceptions. This contrast between a well-defined legal ordering of trial and a poorly defined administrative system of sentencing and treatment appears to be rooted largely in the differing historical evolution of each. The modern correctional sanctions, together with their supporting theories and procedures, have developed in the main subsequent to that renaissance of criminal law in which our basic ideals of justice were molded.

The old retributive penology was predicated on the view that the proven criminal was an "outlaw" without legal rights. Not only might he be subjected to the crudest penalties, but he lost his citizenship (if not his life), his identity of person, and his property. The historical development of a legal due process to protect those accused of crime did not substantially alter the nature of punishments inflicted on those convicted. Religious, moral, and political conceptions established little refuge for the criminal, once his guilt was established. However, humanistic influences, particularly during the nineteenth century, came to alleviate some of the barbarism in the treatment of offenders, to provide extenuations, exceptions, and escapes from the full rigor of punishment. There has been a gradual and considerable change in modern penology under the impact of social humanitarianism, of behavior sciences and permissive philosophy, and of diverse other cultural influences. Correctional treatment has been swayed by new and often conflicting ideologies of individualization, rehabilitation, social protection, and social reform. But the changes have occurred for the most part administratively, with little relation to conceptions of due process and the rule of law that had developed during the eighteenth century and before. In an age of reliance upon administrative judgment and process, we have deprecated the restriction of executive authority by law. As in other areas of governance, we have looked, often with dewy-eyed expectancy, to the expert, though with great uncertainty in the field of corrections as to what constitutes expertness. We have sought abstract, loosely defined goals, with a minimum of direction or control by law over the authorities charged with the treatment of the criminal.

* Acknowledgment is made to Samuel W. Widdifield, whose statutory research in his unpublished J.S.D. dissertation, "The State Convict" (Yale University School of Law, 1952), has been invaluable in the preparation of this material.

Thus it is that as we look to the legal rights of prisoners in the United States we find, in vivid contrast to the substantive law of crimes and to the law of evidence and procedure, that there are broad penumbra of vague legal specifications and areas of deep shade, where the law is wholly silent. Rights of citizenship and of person and property attaching to the criminal have not been clearly defined by constitution or statute. The convict generally has the right to appeal from conviction and to protection against cruel and unusual punishments but, as we shall note in more detail below, even these protections are limited and vary in practice. Certain other rights and restrictions are established by law in some jurisdictions, but there is no consistency in the matter.

LOSS OF RIGHTS

There are four main ways in which ordinary political or civil¹ right of the individual may be taken away as a direct or indirect consequence of criminal conviction.

Civil-death statutes

1. Special statutes may attach the status of civil death to the offender, usually on the basis of a sentence to life imprisonment or to death.² Civil-

² It is a popular myth that felony conviction results automatically in a loss of citizenship. The notion may be traced historically to the status of civil death under ancient law and the doctrines of attainder and corruption of blood by which the chattels of the felon death statutes survive today in some seventeen jurisdictions, though the meaning of the term is far from uniform in these states.³ It has been held that the convict who is civilly dead cannot sue to enforce his rights in court. The seriousness of this restriction is discussed briefly at a later point. In several of these states, offenders under life sentence are specifically prohibited from exercising rights to contract or to sell or inherit property. In some, their property is distributed after conviction as though they were actually dead.⁴ In others, it may pass at once under a will, though it is unlikely that this could result in the absence of a statute specifically so providing. Ordinary political rights to vote, hold office, testify, or act as juror are extinguished.

Civil-death statutes are among the most primitive survivals in our system of penalties. It appears clear that where certain rights should be taken from the felon, this ought to be done in specific terms rather than under a civil-death law.

Suspended rights

2. Rights may be suspended during a term of imprisonment less than life.

were forfeit, his lands escheat, his heirs cut off. These doctrines were restricted and then largely abandoned during the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries. Even under old law the forfeitures of civil death, inflicted for felony and treason, were not complete, since the criminal could contract and be sued and, if later pardoned, could sue for wrongs sustained. The outlawry of another day is virtually extinct, though modern civil death still carries some of its restrictions, as noted in the text. Federal law provides for the deprivation of citizenship for a certain few crimes against the government today.

⁴ Alabama, Kansas, Maine, Missouri, New Hampshire, Rhode Island, Vermont.

Nine of the states with civil-death statutes⁵ and one other⁶ provide for the general suspension of rights during imprisonment short of a life term. Where no such statutes exist, it appears that convicts can sue⁷ but that where rights are suspended, they cannot,⁸ though they may be sued and can defend against an action.⁹ The right to hold public office or positions of honor or trust is suspended during imprisonment in several states,¹⁰ though a majority of jurisdictions provide for actual forfeiture persisting after incarceration rather than mere suspension. The right to testify is suspended as a matter of convenience in most jurisdictions, but a number of states provide that the offender's deposition may be taken in prison.¹¹

Permanent deprivations

3. Conviction of a felony, generally, or of specified crimes involving "moral turpitude" may result in the absolute loss of certain rights. Commonly, these statutory provisions establish the deprivations on conviction coupled with imprisonment, and one must look to the provisions on restoration of rights to determine whether the conviction terminates rights or whether imprisonment merely suspends them. The laws are neither consistent nor clear in this matter. It appears from the statutes that there is not mere suspension but full deprivation (unless and until there is a subsequent restoration by pardon or other means) of the right to vote in at least thirty-five states.¹² In a majority of states, there is also actual forfeiture of public office and positions of trust.¹³ A few states disqualify the felon for jury duty.¹⁴

Marital rights and status present a somewhat peculiar problem. Rights of cohabitation are suspended universally. In other respects, policy varies extensively. In several jurisdictions, life imprisonment involving civil death automatically terminates the marriage, without the necessity for any legal action.¹⁵ In others, the spouse must secure a decree even though the prisoner is civilly dead.¹⁶ In thirty-six states, conviction of a felony, coupled with imprisonment, is a ground for divorce, and if a divorce is granted pardon does not restore conjugal rights.¹⁷ In some

Deprivation by commissions or boards

4. Conviction may be the basis of action by a licensing agency or professional board to deprive the offender of certain rights, usually those of employment. This is an indirect method of determining his rights. In the fields of civil service regulations for governmental employment, licensing and revocation of license for certain professions and other occupations, and rights of compensation for injury or other wrongs and of residence within the United States, deprivations may often be determined by commissions or boards rather than by courts of criminal law.

State statutes commonly list some of the following who may be deprived of their occupations as a result of their conviction of an infamous crime: accountants, barbers, civil engineers, detectives, automobile operators, embalmers, hairdressers, junk dealers, real estate brokers, liquor store owners, pawnbrokers, pharmacists, midwives, naturopaths, nurses, veterinarians, chiropodists, chiropractors, dentists, physicians, surgeons, and lawyers. It is the general rule that a licensing agency, court, or governmental department may refuse to issue or may revoke a license or permit in such occupations where it is shown that the offender has been convicted of a felony, a crime involving moral turpitude, or an offense specifically designated as a basis of exclusion.¹⁸ Where revocation has occurred, the offender generally has a right of appeal to a court for review, as provided by statute. He may have a similar right to appeal if a license is denied him. The power to issue or revoke is a specialized administrative one, however, and the courts will not generally overrule the decision of an agency without a clear showing of gross abuse of discretion.

It may be noted that there is some provision limiting or postponing the exercise of civil or personal rights directly or indirectly (as, for example, by tolling the statutes of limitations) in every state. Since the deprivations that we have mentioned are derived to a large extent from the common law, it is probable that some losses of rights are drawn from tradition in jurisdictions where there are no express statutory provisions therefor.

RESTORATION OF RIGHTS

We have summarized briefly the general patterns relating to the suspension or deprivation of rights entailed by criminal conviction. It is apparent that the existing structures have developed crescively and differentially throughout the country over a period of time. There has been nothing uniform or systematic in the philosophy or objectives by which the rules have developed. And there has been little effort to assure a regulatory due process of law to protect either the offender or the public. In practice, two or more of the methods described above are employed in most jurisdictions in denying or limiting offenders' rights, and the restrictions differ considerably in nature, as we have noted. Commonly it is impossible to determine from the statutes alone whether particular rights are lost, suspended, or retained by the offender.

Colorado Law, c. 58, § 58, provides for anticipatory suspension without notice or conviction.

Under the Alcohol Beverage Control Law, state liquor authority had discretion either to grant or withhold a license from a pardoned convict. Op. Att'y Gen. (1934) 116 (N.Y.).

A pardon issued to a doctor whose license was revoked after conviction of manslaughter does not restore the right to practice. State v. Hazard, 139 Wash. 487, 247 Pac. 957 (1926). To reinstate an attorney to the bar, there must be a factual demonstration of innocence as well as a pardon. In re Finos, 256 A.D. 288, 10 N. Y. S.2d 29 (1939). It is clear that a pardon does not necessarily and automatically restore a license.

Further confusion arises from the variation in practice as to the restoration of rights forfeited or suspended. There appear to be several patterns by which rights may be restored. (1) Restoration may occur automatically, by operation of law, upon discharge from imprisonment or from parole. (2) An ordinary executive pardon may restore some or all rights automatically or particular rights may need to be specified in the pardon. (3) Some form of special action of certification, as provided by statute, may be required.

State pardon

The most generally prevailing method of restoring civil rights that have been denied as a consequence of conviction is through pardon by the state. Some or all rights removed may be restored either by pardon or by some similar form of executive or legislative clemency in thirty-seven states.¹⁹ In ten of those noted, only the suffrage is restored by pardon,²⁰ but in one of these (Rhode Island) the voting privilege may not be restored where conviction was for perjury or an infamous crime. Two others (Nevada and Virginia) prohibit the subsequent holding of office or positions of trust. A minority rule, prevailing in at least five jurisdictions, requires that the pardon must provide specifically for the restoration of any rights that the executive may wish to return.²¹ It should be noted, moreover, that in certain situations, rights lost may not be restored even by a full and unconditional pardon. Thus, property interests that have been vested in others cannot be returned. Pardoned offenders who have been rendered civilly dead are most likely to have suffered permanent loss of property rights, of course. Also, where a spouse has exercised the privilege of divorce from the offender, the convict cannot regain connubial rights through a pardon. The writer has noted elsewhere his opinion that pardon is a poor device for restoring civil or other rights.²²

²² "While in theory pardon is an act of executive clemency, to be used sparingly in instances where innocence has been shown subsequent to conviction or where some other injustice has been worked, actually in many jurisdictions the pardoning power is often used by the chief executive of the state as a substitute for parole and in this connection may be badly misused. It does not make sense or justice to grant restoration of civil rights either generally or by specific provision through the governor's pardon and to withhold these rights from those released on parole or discharged at the expiration of sentence. The effect is to make restoration a matter of gubernatorial leniency rather than a considered policy of correctional rehabilitation. Other methods, therefore, are desirable to restore the offender to the normal rights and duties of the citizen in the community."

Enforcement of franchise loss

Enforcement of provisions for the deprivation of the franchise and other political rights, when they are not automatically restored upon release from imprisonment, is generally of a quite superficial nature. Unless a special investigation is made into voting frauds, for example, the police and FBI files are not ordinarily consulted to determine whether men have been convicted of crimes. There are laws in most if not all jurisdictions, however, making illegal registration or voting and the usurping of office crimes, and such laws undoubtedly act as some deterrent. When an offender moves into a jurisdiction where his prior conviction or incarceration raises a bar to certain civil rights he may wrongfully but unknowingly exercise the rights that he has lost without being discovered. It has been held that where the defendant honestly believed that his rights had been restored by a pardon, he was improperly convicted of willful and knowing violation.²³

Automatic restoration

The most liberal, least discriminating method of restoring lost rights is to return them automatically upon completion of sentence. Wisconsin provides for automatic restoration when the offender serves out his term, or otherwise satisfies the sentence of the court. Somewhat similarly, Ohio law restores forfeited rights to all prisoners who have served their maximum terms or who are granted final release by the Pardon and Parole Commission. In Colorado, rights may be restored either by pardon or service of a full term, and in Kansas "citizenship" is restored where the governor commutes sentence or where prisoners are discharged from supervision. In several jurisdictions, a time factor or some other element is introduced into this sort of provision. Thus, Missouri law releases from disabilities prisoners who have had only a single felony conviction, who have received good time allowances, and who have lived in the community without further offense for a period of two years. In South Dakota the criminal discharged from the penitentiary with a clear record of good conduct is restored to full rights. Tennessee restores rights automatically after six months or three years, depending on the offense involved, except for infamous crimes, where a court action is required. Several states apply a rule of restoration to probationers comparable to the principle recommended by the Model Act of the National Probation and Parole Association. Delaware allows the striking of the verdict or plea of guilty from the record, when a probationer has complied with all conditions of his probation. Idaho and Illinois provide, somewhat less liberally, for the restoration of civil rights upon completion of the probation period. In Oregon, the probationer or parolee may exercise all civil rights that are not "political," presumably voting and holding office.

Certification

A more selective approach to restoration has been established in several jurisdictions where some form of certification is required for the purpose. A California law of 1944 provides that any felon released from a state institution may apply for a certificate of rehabilitation and a pardon after completing his sentence or parole period with satisfactory behavior. The certificate restores most civil rights. In New York a certificate of good conduct may be granted by the Parole Board, upon application of the offender, after he has conducted himself satisfactorily for five years after suspension of sentence, release on parole, or termination of sentence. This certificate ends disabilities that were created by conviction. Certificates of good conduct are also issued in Colorado, Minnesota, Ohio (at the Women's Reformatory), and Wyoming. In these states, however, certification is by the warden of the institution and on the basis of that action the governor will restore civil rights in Minnesota and Ohio and may do so in Colorado and Wyoming.

Restoration of licenses

Finally, where licenses or permits to practice certain occupations or professions are taken away by special boards or commissions, such privilege is ordinarily not restored merely by pardon or by certification of the sort noted above. These deprivations represent the effort of an occupational group to protect itself and the general public against dangers that may be threatened by the criminal. Once an agency has withdrawn a privilege, it must itself act positively to restore it and may refuse to do so, depending on the law and the rules under which it operates. In order to force its favorable action, it must generally be shown in court that the agency has abused its discretion.

RIGHTS GENERALLY RETAINED

We have discussed above some of the rights that are lost as a consequence of criminal conviction or imprisonment and how these rights may be regained. Our penal system also provides specifically for the prisoner's retention of some rights of person and property, generally so that he may be protected from excessive abuses. As we have noted, the tendency has been to avoid or mitigate the harsh consequences that historically have attached to civil death and to imprisonment. There are serious problems involved, however, in the lack of consistent policy and even more in finding means by which to make these rights real in practice.

As to property rights it is the general rule that the prisoner may sue. However, as indicated above, where rights are generally suspended, the inmate cannot sue. This is a serious restriction on his power to secure remedy for injuries or wrongs that may have been done him during imprisonment. It is generally held, however, that the prisoner may be sued and can, therefore, defend such action. Moreover, except where statutes specifically provide to the contrary it appears to be the rule that the prisoner may contract and may take, hold, convey, or inherit property. In several jurisdictions, provision is made for the appointment of trustees to care for the prisoner's property until after his release. And in thirty states there are provisions suspending the statutes of limitations during imprisonment, so that where inmates cannot sue while imprisoned, they may have their action after release.²⁴ In at least twenty-eight states the laws make some provisions against forfeitures, so that the historical consequences of attainder and corruption of blood may be avoided.²⁵

PROTECTIONS AND REMEDIES FOR THE OFFENDER

One form of protection for the convicted offender is the provision against cruel and unusual punishments that may be found in the Eighth Amendment of the federal Constitution and in those of all states except Connecticut and Vermont. Presumably, the infliction of cruel punishments would also be in violation of the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. Seven of the states establish in their constitutions the principle that punishment should be proportioned to the offense. Unfortunately these general provisions do not inform at all concretely as to what should be considered cruel. They are generally interpreted to refer to the kind rather than the amount of punishment, but conceptions of excessive cruelty vary. In nine states, specific laws prohibit corporal punishment,²⁶ and in some others restrictions are imposed on the forms or conditions of its employment.²⁷ Such practices as whipping and striking, showering, tying up, and using the strait jacket, gag, or thumbscrew are prohibited in a few states.²⁸ Only one jurisdiction (Louisiana) prohibits solitary confinement and many provide specifically for its use, some with severe dietary restrictions to accompany it. The Attorney General's Survey in 1939 observed that solitary segregation was being used in all but four prisons of the United States.²⁹ That report also noted that at least twenty-six prisons were employing some form of corporal punishment; probably many more were, since it is difficult to secure valid information on this sort of question.³⁰ It appears that constitutional and statutory provisions are of limited utility in protecting the committed offender, mainly because we have found it difficult to define what is improper and because enforcement of a good policy is extremely difficult.³¹ Perhaps sound practice depends more on the good sense and humaneness of individual wardens than anything else.

Legal remedies

The legal remedies available to the prisoner against wrongs occurring to him during confinement are injunctions, habeas corpus writs, and civil suits for damages. Unfortunately, these are by no means always adequate. As Samuel Widdifield has noted:

... it has been held that disciplinary punishment is peremptory and not subject to review except where there has been gross excess. The problem of proof may be a difficult one to surmount. In states where the prisoner has been declared civilly dead or has had his civil rights suspended access to the courts may be impossible. Further, the prisoner may not be permitted to see a lawyer, or may not be able to afford one, in order to be made aware of his rights. Most objectionable, the prison officials may do everything they can to prevent a prisoner from asserting his rights.³²

The remedy of injunction is ordinarily not allowed unless it can be clearly shown that irremediable injury to property or personal rights is threatened.

³² Samuel Widdifield, "The State Convict" (J.S.D. dissertation, Yale University School of Law, 1952), p. 132.

The writ of habeas corpus, however, may be used to rectify mistreatment under both state and federal practice. Its effectiveness has been limited by the holding that recourse to federal process can only be had after state remedies are exhausted. The record in Illinois reveals that the state courts can effectively prevent such remedies over an extended period of time, and it has recently been held that the federal courts will provide remedy where the state has failed to do so.

A civil suit for damages sustained is a somewhat inadequate remedy, not only because it is not designed to prevent injury initially, but because in a number of jurisdictions, as we have seen, the prisoner cannot sue until after discharge from incarceration. The difficulties of proof are greatly increased, of course, when this is the case. There is a federal civil rights statute that may be invoked for wrongs sustained, either under state or federal imprisonment. A few states have similar laws. Actions brought under such statutes must be taken against the warden or his staff, however, since state governments are protected from suit. The courts have generally held that it is the duty of prison officials to exercise reasonable care to protect the life and health of the prisoner.³³ There have been very few such suits successfully pursued, however.

Criminal action may be directed against those responsible for prison mistreatment or neglect of duty under the federal civil rights law and special criminal statutes in some thirty-four states.³⁴ These provide generally for
