13. If a quarter only of a field is cultivated, enter the whole field as waste. If half only is cultivated, enter half as cultivated, and half as waste; and if three quarters are cultivated, and one quarter waste, enter the whole as cultivated.
14. In measuring uncultivated land, you will divide it according to the old marks or bounds; should you meet with waste (anadi) having no such marks, you will direct them to be made. You will class uncultivated lands into fallow of 1, 2, 3, 4, and 5 years; waste cultivated, or not been cultivated within twenty years.
15. When a field contains a few tamarind, kinar, or other productive trees, you will make no deduction for the land under their shade, because the ryot derives a profit from them; but where there is a bher-tree, or several other unproductive trees together, forming a shade, you will measure the land occupied by it, and deduct it from the field.
16. In measuring purrimpoke, or land that cannot be cultivated, you will specify the extent of forts, of pettahs, of open villages, of the court-yards of houses, with the number and kinds of trees in such yards; of the banks of tanks, rivers, nullahs, ravines, hillocks, roads, kullar or barren land, wells, salt mounds, and of topes; stating the numbers and species of trees. You will also specify the purrimpoke in the fields of ryots, and deduct it from their land.
17. In tarbunds, or palmirah topes, you will insert the number of trees, and class them into male and female, young, productive, and old, or past bearing. You will also measure separately, the divisions or parts of the tope occupied by different ryots.
18. You are not to measure hills or beds of rivers.
19. You will consider as garden or baghayet, all lands, in whatever manner they may be watered, that do not yield rice, but produce raggy, jeware, tobacco, red pepper, &c. and you will enter as garden so much land only, as can be watered.
20. In measuring wet land, you will specify whether it is watered by large tanks, by great nullahs, such as those of the Toombadden and Pennah, by kumpli, or draw-wells, or by kushems or nullahs, proceeding from springs.
21. You will enter as wet land all gardens having a constant supply of water, and containing cocoa-nut and other fruit-trees. You will specify the quantity of waste land between the rows of trees of land cultivated, where the trees are thinly scattered; and of cultivated land where there are no trees. You will note the number of plants of young trees, of productive, and of old or unproductive trees, and specify whether they are cocoa-nut, soapari, tamarind, jamoon, lime or orange, &c. You will also enter as wet land, plantations of betel and sugar-cane; and likewise land producing tobacco and red pepper, &c. provided there is water enough for rice.
22. In wells and river kumplis, where there is a constant supply of water, and where the land, having formerly produced rice, is now, from some cause or other, cultivated with dry grain, you will enter as wet land, all that land which is marked out as atchkutt, or rice-fields, and which can be watered; but if, from the scarcity of water, such land is, in particular years only, cultivated as wet, you will measure it as dry.
23. When fields of garden or wet land are too large, they must be subdivided in the same manner as those of dry.
24. You will measure the beds of tanks, and class the lands included in them, according to the nature of the soil.
25. You

25. You are to enter as cultivated land, the cultivation of the last Fusly only; that is to say, of the year previous to that in which the survey takes place; for if lands cultivated in former years, but waste last year, or cultivated in the last, but not in the present year, are entered in the survey cultivation, the account will not exhibit a true statement of the cultivation of any one year.
26. You are to measure only such lands, as are allotted to you. If you measure the lands of another surveyor, you will not be paid for them, but fined.
27. When boundaries are disputed, if the lands in dispute are cultivated, and have been annexed to one village since the year Kelah, or the establishment of the Ahkam Nantah, enter them in that village; if the lands are anadi, or old waste, enter them in the village which agrees to walk along the boundary.
28. To prevent the survey from being retarded by indolence, you must measure daily, whether cirkar or enaum land, as follows:

Dry:		5,000 goontas or chains.
If cultivated	- - - - -	- - - - -
If sayeh banjer, or uncultivated land divided into fields	- - - - -	6,500 - - d°.
If anad banjer, or undivided waste or common	- - - - -	25,000 - - d°.

Wet:		1,500 - - d°.
If uncultivated	- - - - -	2,500 - - d°.

29. You will receive at the above rates six pagodas monthly; but your pay being regulated by your measurement, will be increased or diminished in the proportion that your measurement, during the month, may be greater or less than the quantity prescribed. In order to ascertain the amount of your pay, you will send an abstract of your measurement monthly, through the examiner to the treasury, in the following form:

		Goontas.	Acres.
Dry:
Cultivated	{ Cirkar	90,000	2,250
	{ Enaum	5,000	125
		95,000	2,375
Uncultivated	{ Cirkar	45,500	1,137½
	{ Enaum	5,000	125
		50,500	1,262½
Waste Cirkar		75,000	1,875
Total acres dry			5,512½
Wet:
Cultivated	{ Cirkar	4,500	112½
	{ Enaum	750	18¾
		5,250	131¾
Uncultivated	{ Cirkar	2,000	50
	{ Enaum	500	12½
		2,500	62½
Total wet acres			193¾
Grand Total			5,706½

30. In your abstract, it is not necessary to particularize the dates of measurement; the name of the month only is wanted.
31. As the chain is frequently broken, and some of its links lost, you will compare it from time to time, with the standard which you have received for that purpose.
32. If, on trial by the examiner, your measurement is found to be false, you will be dismissed, if it has proceeded from negligence; and punished, if from design.
33. You will inquire into unauthorized new enaums and concealed lands. If you discover any not entered in the accounts of the curnum, you will receive, on proof, one quarter of amount; and the persons through whose information you make the discovery, one quarter of your half.
34. You will be allowed two chain-bearers, and one quarter of a canteray fanam for each, daily. You will pay them, and also the coolies employed in making the boundary marks, daily, in presence of the potail and curnum, and take their receipts.
35. You will receive half a pagoda monthly for oil and stationary.
36. You will let the curnums enter the account of the measurement, and you will compare your abstract with theirs, daily.
37. You

37. You will deliver both your rough and fair accounts of measurement, to the ex-
38. You will pay the bazar price for all articles received in the villages. If you do not pay, or if you receive batta, you will be dismissed.

Enclosure.

(No. 2.)—Instructions to Azmayesh Gomastahs, or Examiners of the Survey.

- As you are appointed to the superintendence of a party of ten surveyors, you will regulate their survey, as follows:
- When a village has eight or ten large mujerahs, you will send two surveyors to each;
but if the mujerahs are small, only one.
- When there is a large mouzah, without any mujerah, you will mark out by flag the portions to be surveyed by each surveyor; and let them compare their account of boundaries with each other, so as to prevent any land from being omitted in their respective limits.
- When a mouzah is small, and you think that the survey will be accelerated, by employing only a part of the surveyors in it, and sending the rest to another mouzah, you will do so.
- If the mujerahs of a mouzah have old boundaries, you will adopt them: if they have no visible boundaries, you will set up stones in order to distinguish them.
- You will take care that no land is omitted between the respective limits of your own surveyors; or between their limits, and those of other parties of surveyors.
- You will take the rough accounts (the kham chitah or) from the surveyors, and make by them, all your comparisons of measurement.
- In your examinations of measurement, you will attend particularly to the fields of potails, curnums, and khoobash inhabitants.
- You will examine by re-measurement daily, as follows:

Dry	-	-	-	500	goontahs or chains.
Or wet	-	-	-	150	Do.
and transmit the account of the examination in the following form, No 1. (Margoza tree field of Rungah Reddy, cirkar land) to the north of Goid Gaurus, yetannace field, measured by Bhun Row viz. East to West	-	-	-	-	4 acres 18 1/2 goontas;
North to South	-	-	-	-	11 1/2 chains
	-	-	-	-	15 1/2
Azmayesh or trial	-	-	-	Total	-
viz. East to West	-	-	-	-	178 1/2 - or 4 - 18 1/2
North to South	-	-	-	-	12 chains.
	-	-	-	-	16 1/2
	-	-	-	Total	-
	-	-	-	-	201 - or 5 - 1

- You will transmit your trials, with the rough accounts, to the cutcherry, and give the fair ones to the accountants (Awuriah Nowis.)
- In examining the measurement, if the excess of the land on trial, is above 12 1/2 per cent. in dry, or 10 per cent. in wet, you will add the difference to the field.
If the deficiency is more than ten per cent. in dry, or 5 per cent. in wet, you will deduct it.
- If in any village you find the measurement of the whole, or the greater part of the fields incorrect, and that a new survey is required, you will state the circumstance, and obtain leave before you begin.
- If any ryot complains that the measurement of his field is not fair, you will measure it again.
- You will inquire into new unauthorized enaums, extra collections, land, and articles of the village taxes suppressed in the accounts; of all such discoveries, you will receive one half as a reward, and one quarter of your half, will be paid to the person from whom you may have received your information.
- As the chains are frequently broken, you will compare them occasionally with the standard measure.
- You will get two chain-bearers from the cotties or tallaries of the village. You will pay them one quarter of a cantaray fanam each daily, in the presence of the potail and curnum, and take their receipt; and you will send a statement of the expense, with your monthly account.
- You will divide all the villages that fall to your share, according to the number of surveyors. Write the different shares on an equal number of paper, and let the surveyors draw lots, and measure the villages which their respective lots contain.
- Your party is to measure only such villages, as may be allotted to it. If in the hope of getting more pay from black land, your surveyors measure the land allotted to another party, they will receive no pay for them, and be fined.
- After finishing the measurement of the villages allotted to your party in any district, if there is any party which has not begun its measurement in that district, you will measure its villages; but if there is no party which has not commenced, you will proceed to the next district.

20. You

- You are not to measure in four or five days the number of acres prescribed to you for the month, but to measure daily, except on those days when you are on your way to another district. The measurement may be more in some days and less in others; but the prescribed quantity for the month must be completed.
- You are not to try the measurement of a part of the surveyors in one month, and that of the rest in another; but you are, in each month, to try the measurement of all the surveyors.

- You are not to remain behind the surveyors, because, unless you are with them, you cannot compare with them the false measurement which you may discover. If you are not always in the same district with them, you will be dismissed.
- With your monthly abstracts, you will send a list of the surveyors and peons, present and absent; you will give your rough accounts of measurement examined to the amildar, who will forward them to the collector's cutcherry, and you will take the amildar's receipts for the accounts.
- You will receive a monthly allowance of 22 1/2 fanams for Sader Wared.
- You will pay for all articles, at the Bazar price.

Principal Collector.

Enclosure.

No 3.—To Assessors or Terrim Muttasaddies.

- You are to class the surveyed by ten surveyors, according to their rate or terrim.
In setting the terrim, you are to assemble the potail, curnum, and ryots of the village, and also the heads of the neighbouring villages, and do it with their advice.
- You are to class the lands of the whole mouza into first, second, third, &c. according to their rates. If the best land is in the cusbah, you will enter it, in the first rate. If the first land of any of the mujerahs is only equal to the second of the cusbah, you will enter it, on the second rate. If on the contrary, the first land of the cusbah is equal only to the second of the mujerah, you will enter it, in the second rate; for the rates are to be for the whole village generally, and not for each mujerah separately.
- In fixing the rates, the ryot who occupies the land must be present; you are to consider the condition of the land, and not of the ryot; for the one is permanent, but the other is not; and you are to be careful not to enter the first rate, as second, or the second, as first, &c.
- You are to mention the colour of the land, in order that in fixing the rent, the class to which it belongs, may be the better known. The colours are as follows:—

Regur:
1	Black mixed with stones.
1	Black mixed with chunam stones.
1	Black - - with white earth.
1	Black - - with sand.
1	Black - - with pebbles (gargatt.)
1	Black mould.
Red:
1	Red mixed with stones.
1	Red - - with sand.
1	Red earth.

- You will inform the ryots, that the whole land of each class, will be assessed at the same rate; and caution them to class the fields, according to the real quality.
- In classing the lands you will proceed, as follows:

The above, is given as an example, for your information; you are not, however, to enter the money rates, but only to take care that the lands are correctly classed. The classes may be as numerous, as the different kinds of land are; but in one mouza you are not to make more than 10 classes of dry; 6 of garden; and 8 of wet.

7. In regulating the proportions of the decrease of rent between each class, you will be guided by the quality of the land; and make it, in some villages, for dry $\frac{1}{2}$ a canteray fanam; and in other villages, where the rent is low, $\frac{1}{4}$ of a canteray fanam;
For garden - 5 and $2\frac{1}{2}$ canteray fanams;
For wet - 5 and $2\frac{1}{2}$ ditto.

If in a village, you find that the difference between any two classes of land should be $\frac{1}{2}$ canteray fanam, you will make the same difference between every other class, and in the same manner: if the difference between any two is $\frac{1}{4}$ canteray fanam, you will continue that difference, through all the other classes; and in garden and wet, if the difference, between two classes in $2\frac{1}{2}$ or 5 canteray fanams, you will make one of these rates, the difference between all the other classes; but you must not have both rates of difference in the same village.

N. B. The rent of dry land in some of the western districts was found to be so low, that the rate of decrease (oottar) could not be restricted to $\frac{1}{4}$ of a canteray fanam without great inconvenience; it was therefore extended to one-eighth of a canteray fanam, or two annas; and the following additional articles were inserted in the instructions:

8. Though you were formerly directed to restrict the rate of decrease (oottar) in dry land to $\frac{1}{4}$ of a canteray fanam; yet, as the accounts must be regulated by the land, and not the land be made to suit the accounts; and as the usual rent is in some places only from $\frac{1}{4}$ to 1 canteray fanam per acre; if there are seven or eight classes rising $\frac{1}{4}$ of a canteray fanam each, it will make the rent too high; you will, therefore, if there are only three or four classes, keep the oottar at $\frac{1}{4}$ fanam; but if there are more, you will make the oottar 2 or 3 annas of a canteray fanam, according to the custom of the village.

Principal Collector of Ceded Districts to the Board of Revenue; dated 26 July 1807: Enclosure.

9. In writing the abstract of the village, you will state, at the head of the columns of Dry, Wet, and Garden, the oottar, or rate of decrease between the different classes: if dry, $\frac{1}{2}$, $\frac{1}{4}$, or $\frac{1}{8}$ canteray fanam; if garden or wet, $2\frac{1}{2}$, or 5 canteray fanams.

10. In classing the land, you will consider both the nature of the soil, and the expense of labour; for instance, if one field is near the village, and another, of the same quality, at a distance from it, the distant field must be rated lower, because it requires more labour to watch, and also to plough it. You will make allowance for the additional expense, and lower the rate accordingly; so that it may be cultivated with the same ease as the land of the same kind near the village. You will also, in garden and wet land, make allowance for the deficiency of water; and where there are nullahs and wells, for the extra labour, and reduce the class.

11. You are to class the land not merely by its intrinsic quality, but also by its actual state of cultivation. Thus, if two adjoining fields, of the same quality with respect to soil, are held, the one by a poor, and the other by a substantial ryot, you will not enter them in the same class; but you will place the field of the poor ryot in such lower one, as its unimproved state may render necessary.

12. If in one field, whether dry, wet, or garden, there are two or three different kinds of soil, you will not class the kinds separately; but take the average of the whole, and make one class.

13. In classing wet and garden, observe the following detail. Divide the lands of tanks and nullahs into one crop and two crop land. In well land, consider whether the well has water for one or two crops, and make the class higher or lower accordingly.

14. In classing betel and cocoa-nut, &c. gardens, you will enter the land in the same class as land of the same kind on which there are no fruit-trees, without making it either higher or lower, on account of the trees.

15. In garden, you will enter as garden, only what is now cultivated; and you are not to add to it any of the neighbouring dry land, on the supposition that there is water enough to convert it hereafter into garden.

16. In garden which is now waste (anadi) you will examine whether, when last cultivated, the crop was a dry or a wet one. If dry, you will class the land, as dry; and if wet, as garden.

17. In classing dry waste (anadi) you will proceed as follows: If it is divided into fields by old boundaries, and has been so measured, you will class each field separately: if there are no old boundaries or land marks, you will class it, by the divisions into which the surveyors may have formed it.

18. In classing the lands, you will take the rough account of the survey, and class according to the order of the numbers in that account; after which you will separate the cirkar and enaum, and the cirkar cultivated, and uncultivated, and waste land; and class the whole according to their respective rates. You will not add up the fields ryotwar, for it is not necessary to show what each ryot occupies; but in enaum lands, you will add up the fields both in their classes, and under the name of the person to whom they belong.

19. You are to class the lands, dry, garden, and wet, as they are distinguished by the surveyors. You are not to alter their classification, but you may note where you think it is wrong.

20. You are to class, monthly, 3,000 canteray pagodas of land cultivated, by the rent of the preceding year, for which you will receive ten star pagodas monthly. If you class a smaller quantity, your pay will be reduced in the same proportion; viz.

For canteray pag ^s 2,750	- - - - -	pay S ^r Pag ^s 9
2,500	- - - - -	8
2,000	- - - - -	6

If you class a smaller quantity than 2,000, you will be dismissed; but you will receive no increase above ten pagodas pay, whatever quantity you may class. If, however, in the course of the year, you class more in one month and less in another, the difference will be allowed, provided it does not on the whole exceed 10 pagodas monthly.

21. You are to examine if fields have been concealed, or articles in the village taxes suppressed; but you are not to inquire into differences of rent, or extra collections.

22. You will not enter the land forming the beds of tanks, and barren or useless purimpoke; but you will inquire how it is cultivated when the tank is dry, and class it accordingly.

23. You are to compare your accounts with the curnum, daily, and let him take them on the spot; you may carry him and the petail to the neighbouring villages, to give their opinion on classing the lands of them, but not to write the accounts of their own village. If you make out your accounts without letting the curnum take a copy, your pay will be stopped every month in which this is done.

24. In making out your abstract of the land in classes, (Kessemwar Goshwarah) you are not to enter as cultivated, the cultivation of two or three years, but only that of the preceding year. If more is entered, you will be dismissed.

25. As the surveyors, in order to get more pay, make out their accounts hastily, and give false additions, you will make your gomastahs compare them, and send a list of all errors monthly to the treasury, showing the dates of measurement, and the differences of the number of acres.

26. The land classed by you, will be examined by the head assessor (Ser Terim) and if any material error is discovered, you will be dismissed.

27. You will make out the accounts of each village according to the forms, and when the district is completed give the whole to the aumildar; you are not to keep the accounts after the district is finished, nor to carry the curnums to another district.
28. You are not to wait for the (Ser Terrim) head assessor, but as soon as you finish one village, proceed to another.
29. You are not to dismiss or employ gomastahs or peons, without reporting and obtaining authority.
30. You are not to beat or confine any of the inhabitants; and you are to pay for all articles, at the bazar rate.

Principal Collector.

1. As you are appointed to superintend and correct the assessment of five (Terrimdars) assessors, you will divide your share of each district into five divisions, and give one to each terrindar, and you will give him at the same time, the survey accounts, which will be delivered to you by the aumildar.
2. You will examine the classification of the lands, and you will fix the rates of assessment, in conjunction with the pottails, curnums, and principal ryots, and if you wish for the assistance of any intelligent persons formerly employed in the revenue, the aumildar will send them to you, on your application.
3. In making the assessment, you must examine all circumstances that may assist in enabling you to form a right judgment. You must consider the Ahkam namah, or assessment of Tippoo Sultan; the present extent of cultivation; the condition of the ryots, and the nature of the soil; you will then fix the rate of assessment of each class of land, in dry, garden, and wet; you will explain it to the ryots, and obtain their consent to it, and you will take care that it is not so high, as to impede cultivation hereafter; you will also examine well the kamil rent of each village, the detail of the ahkam namah, and of the rent of the last twenty years, and enter them in your statements.
4. If you find that any of the terrimdars have classed the lands wrong, whether from ignorance or corrupt motives, you will report, in order that they may be dismissed.
5. Where you find that the terrimdars have entered two or three kinds of land in the same class, you will transfer each kind, to its proper class.
6. As the classing the fallow and waste lands at too low a rate, might induce the ryots to occupy them, and throw up their cultivated lands to the injury of revenue; you will therefore keep in view, that waste lands are to be so classed as not to discourage their cultivation, and at the same time, as not to give them any advantage over the old cultivated lands.
7. As your assessment is regulated by the quality of the land, and its actual state of cultivation, and as the Bramins and other Tyargar or privileged castes, and the cullgoottah-shotrium, and guddad landholders, have always held and must still be permitted, to hold their lands at a reduced rent; and as this remission must be deducted from your assessment, and thereby reduce its amount; you must be careful in comparing your assessment with that of former periods, to deduct the remission previously.
8. You will ascertain whatever has been allowed by the customs of the village as cuttgoottah (low rent to different castes) shotrium enaum, and low rented villages to Bramins, and (Guddad) quit rent for levelling rugged land, and show the amount of each separately in your abstract.
9. You are not to detain the terrimdars until you arrive yourself to examine their assessment; but let them, as soon as they have finished one village, proceed to another.
10. If a part of your terrimdars have finished their divisions, while another part is still behind in a different district, they will also finish the divisions which have not been begun before they proceed to a new district.
11. You will send the pay abstract of terrimdars and peons monthly to the aumildar, who will get the amount from the treasury; and you will issue it, and send a receipt.
12. When the assessment of a district is finished, you will deliver all the accounts to the aumildar, and take his receipt.
13. You will class and assess, monthly, 15,000 canteray pagodas of land cultivated, by the rent of the preceding year; and in case of any deficiency, your pay of fifteen pagodas will be reduced, in the same manner as that of the terrimdars.

Extract from Revenue Dispatch from Fort St. George; dated 21st Oct. 1807; on Survey of Ceded Districts.

Par. 247. THE survey of the Ceded Districts having been completed, the principal collector submitted the statements connected with that work, which are referred to by the Board of Revenue; and we recommend them to the particular attention of your Honourable Court. The mode in which the survey and the assessment of the lands were conducted, with a careful and circumspection which secured the government from fraudulent misstatements of the measured extent of the lands, and provided, in the manner most agreeable to the inhabitants, against excessive assessment. The assessment, it will be observed, rests on the firm basis of the concurring approbation of the persons who pay it.

27th October 1807.

THE honourable the President records the following Minute; with Enclosure.

As the importance of the Ceded Districts to the honourable Company, both in a political light, and as a valuable source of existing public revenue, has frequently drawn the attention of the honourable Court, as well as of this government, to the best mode of management for those extensive possessions, it became a primary duty upon me, on my succession to the government of this presidency, to take into my most mature deliberation, assisted by the best authorities I could consult, the most expedient measures to be pursued upon the resignation of Colonel Munro, that the public might suffer the least possible injury, by the departure of that enlightened officer, and that the principles he had acted upon with so much success, might still continue to be the guide of the revenue administration in that province. Upon this subject I had many conversations with the late president of the council and Colonel Munro, as well as with the present members of the government; and the result of my best and perfectly unbiassed reflection is, that it is my duty to recommend to the council, the adoption of Colonel Munro's suggestions, contained in the memorandum which I have now the honour to submit to the board. I believe it was not the intention of Colonel Munro that this paper should be considered, as a public document; but I trust I shall appear justified in producing it, as I consider it as a testimony too honourable to the merits of the late collector, and too creditable to the gentlemen whom he recommends, to be withheld from the records.

Mr. Thackeray having declined, for reasons which I could not disapprove, the charge of the Ceded Districts, I beg leave to recommend that Messrs. Gahagan, Shaw, and Chaplin, be appointed collectors of the three divisions of the province, as explained in Colonel Munro's memorandum; that the division should be the same, as the three judicial zillahs, with this alteration, that the district of Yarkee should be transferred from the southern to the western, or Bellari division, for the reasons given by the late collector.

The pleasure I have felt in perusing the accompanying paper, so descriptive of present comfort and tranquillity in the country, and so flattering to the hopes of future improvement, induce me to conclude this minute with the following extract:

"If no alteration is attempted, the Ceded Districts will yield, one year with another, about 18 lacks of pagodas; and it will never be necessary to call out a single Sepoy to support the collections. But the importance of the Ceded Districts does not rest merely upon the production of a great revenue. In a political and military view, they are of still higher value; for they are now, what the Carnatic formerly was, the country from which our armies, when employed in the Deccan, must draw all their supplies of cattle and provisions. All these considerations, urge the expediency of keeping the Ceded Districts, as they now are; and of not risking any thing, by a change of men and measures."

Madras,

WILLIAM PETRIE.

THE revenue of the Ceded Districts, when under the Nizam, was declining rapidly every year. An army was constantly in the field, whose expense consumed the collections; and the country was altogether in such a distracted state, that the Nizam seems to have given it up to the Company, because he could not retain it, in subjection. The country is now quiet, and well-affected. No troops are required in it, for the preservation of internal tranquillity; and the revenue is collected, with the greatest ease.

The way most likely to secure these advantages would be, to continue, as nearly as possible, the system of management which has been observed, during the last seven years. This might easily be effected, by appointing Mr. Thackeray principal collector, who, from his general knowledge of revenue, his experience in the Ceded Districts, and his acquaintance with the inhabitants, is the person best qualified for that situation. In the event of his declining it, the next best mode of arrangement would be, to divide the districts into two divisions, each to be under a principal and sub-collector, and the divisions containing respectively the same districts, that were entered in the two zillahs, which I formerly recommended to the board of revenue, to be established. This plan is however objectionable, under present circumstances, because there are not two sub-collectors in the Ceded Districts, who have had sufficient experience to act, as principals, and because the introduction of new men into them, unacquainted with the mode of management, and with the inhabitants and poligars, might be attended with bad consequences, both to the revenue and the peace of the country.

Minute of the President;
relating to the Ceded Districts.
26 Oct. 1807.

Memorandum of
Col. Munro, as to the Ceded Districts.

It would, therefore be advisable, in place of two principals, to have three ordinary collectors; to divide the country into three divisions; and to appoint the present sub-collectors to the management of them.

Mr. Gahagan has been employed in the Ceded Districts between four and five years; and Messrs. Shaw and Chapin, between three and four. The system which now prevails, is familiar to them. They know the disposition of the inhabitants, and the characters of the native servants; and from these, and other causes, they are better calculated than any other set of men, to conduct the affairs of the Ceded Districts successfully.

It is essential to the welfare of that province, that there should not only, be no actual change, but that nothing should be done which might excite a suspicion, that any was intended. The disturbances by which it was formerly agitated, have been too recently settled, to render it either prudent or safe to hazard any experiment of innovation. The appointment of new men, would shake the confidence of the inhabitants in the stability of the present system; would revive the hopes and obsolete pretensions of fugitive poligars; and might throw things into a state of confusion, from which they would not again be easily extricated.

If no alteration is attempted, the Ceded Districts will yield, one year with another, about eighteen lacs of pagodas; and it will never be necessary to call out a single sepoy to support the collections. But the importance of the Ceded Districts does not rest merely upon the production of a great revenue. In a political and military view, they are of still higher value; for they are now, what the Carnatic formerly was, the country from which our armies, when employed in the Deccan, must draw all their supplies of cattle and provisions. All these considerations, urge the expediency of keeping the Ceded Districts, as they now are; and of not risking any thing, by a change of men or measures.

The three divisions should be the same as the three judicial zillahs, with the exception only, that the district of Yarkee should be transferred from the southern to the western or Bellary division, because its nullahs and cultivation on the river Pennah, are intermixed with those of that division. The annual revenue of the western division, would be nearly seven lacs; and of each of the other two, about five and a half lacs of pagodas.

Thomas Munro.

Resolution thereon.

The Board concurring in the recommendation contained in the foregoing Minute, it is ordered, that the appointments be communicated to the gentlemen, and to the Board of Revenue.

Para. 260. Mr. PETRIE reviewed the services of Lieutenant-Colonel Munro in the Ceded Districts, noticed the gradual augmentation which he had produced of the revenue, from 12½ lacs to 18 lacs of S. pag^a per annum; and the general amelioration and improvement of the manners and habits of the inhabitants of the Ceded Districts, which had kept pace with the increase of revenue. From disunited hordes of lawless plunderers and freebooters, they are now stated to be as far advanced in civilization, submission to the laws, and obedience to the magistrates, as any of the subjects under this government. The revenues are collected with facility; every one seems satisfied with his situation; and the regret of the people is universal on the departure of the principal collector.

157. The judicious policy, we remarked, could not be too highly applauded, by which Lieut. Colonel Munro, fixing in the first instance, on a moderate scale of jumma, and increasing it only as the means of the renters, and the capacity of the country, enabled him safely to do, advanced these provinces from the almost ultimate point of declension, to which they had been sunk by a weak and improvident government, to the degree of comparative prosperity and promise, in which they now remain.

158. The example we believe to be unparalleled in the revenue annals of this presidency, of so extensive a tract of territory, with a body of inhabitants little accustomed to passive submission and legitimate obedience to the ruling authority, reduced from confusion to order; and a mass of revenue, amounting to no less a sum than 1,19,90,419 star pag^a being regularly, and at length readily collected, with a remission, on the whole, of only 3,415. 28. 22. pagodas, or 1 faqam 22 cash per cent.

159. Amidst the cares and exertions of conducting and sustaining such an extensive series of collections, Lieut. Colonel Munro, at the same time commenced, prosecuted, and accomplished the arduous duty of surveying, classifying, and assessing, with a moderate, but adequate money-rent, the whole range of these provinces. This survey had cost the Company between eighty and ninety thousand pagodas. The result of it was reported to government, in our letter of 5th September 1807; and we had only further to observe, on this occasion, that it would be of important use, as a guide for a long time to come, not only to collectors, in regulating the operations of revenue detail, but also, to the local judicial authorities, in cases of civil adjudication.

160. From the comparative statement of the revenues of the Ceded Districts for Fuslies 1210 and 1217, as entered in the report above recited, the customs were altogether excluded, because their actual amount for the latter period, could not be ascertained until the expiration of the Fusly, and because the usual substitute for an estimate could not be supplied, the collector of Bellary having omitted to furnish the estimate for his particular division.

Note. The value at which they were ceded was - S. Pag^a 16,51,465.

The first year's jumma was - S. Pag^a 10,06,543.

Inclusive of Kurnoul, Peshcush, and last year's collections.

The sum of S. Pag^a 24,674. 26. 48. in the foregoing statement, for Fusly 1210, composed of remissions made to poligars, in consequence of events which took place before the introduction of the Company's government, and could not be prevented.

The sum of S. Pag^a 8,158. 41. 4. remitted in Fusly 1216, was restored to renters, in consequence of the orders of government, after having been actually collected.

These sums, are therefore deducted from the total of remissions.

619. It was hence observable, that the revenues of Malabar had progressively increased; and that the jumma of the current year exceeded, in a very considerable amount, the jumma of any other year, Fusly 1211 alone excepted, in which year Major Macleod succeeded to the Bombay Commissioners, and effected a sudden rise in the land revenue, by adopting rates of assessment inconsistent with the long established local usage, and from which it was soon after found expedient, to recede.

620. It was moreover to be observed, that the jumma of Fusly 1217, as now submitted, was exclusive of extra revenue, and exclusive of a further sum expected to be realized in the department of customs. It was also to be recollected, that the tax on pepper vines, amounting to pagodas 38,147. 7. 34. was remitted by order of government in Fusly 1216, and that the proposed equivalent, had not as yet been adjusted. The communication recently promised on this subject, we observed, would be submitted so soon as the desired information should be received from the collector.

621. We finally observed, that if allowances were made for these deductions, it would appear that the revenue of the current Fusly was higher even than that of Fusly 1211; and we had the pleasure to state, at the same time, that it had been realized without difficulty or objection, because the increase had been obtained by indirect modes of taxation, bearing equally on the community at large; while the direct tax upon the land affecting one class in particular, had been levied according to established usage, by a scale which is exceedingly moderate.

Appendix, No. 23.

Extracts from REPORTS respecting LAND TENURES and ASSESSMENTS, in MALABAR.

Extract from GENERAL REPORT of Board of Revenue at Fort St. George; dated 31st January 1803.

Para. 178. IN Malabar, with the exception of a few estates forfeited by rebellion, there appear to be no circar or government lands, individual proprietary right generally prevailing throughout the province. The tenures were described to be of two kinds—the jennum, or immediate right of property, resembling the freehold tenure under other feudal systems; and kanum, or usufructuary property acquired by mortgage, which may be compared to copyhold. By the latter, the collector said the greater part of the land was held, and generally without the authority of written documents.

179. We, however, considered the following to be a more correct definition of the several modes of land tenure in Malabar, a precise understanding of which, we deemed to be very necessary.

1st. Jennum, or proprietary right, as above described, not that allodial right (as the native proprietors maintain it to be) which recognizes no superior, renders no service, nor contributes any portion of its profits to the commonwealth. Such a right, can appertain to the sovereign or lord paramount of the soil only; but it is a fee simple or hereditary right of possession, subject to some of those various conditions from which no subject can be exempt.

2. Putum, being single rent or lease, where the land and its products belong entirely to the renter. The rent is annual, or for a definite term; and the conditions specified in writing.

3. Kanum putum, or tenure by mortgage. Here a sum of money is given by the mortgagee, for the occupancy of the land made over by the mortgagor. If the produce exceed the interest of the sum lent, the kanumkar (mortgagee) pays the overplus until it reaches the mortgagee, and vice versa, the mortgagor generally neglects to pay the overplus until it accumulates to an amount which precludes redemption, though this is always in his option. Hence the kanumkar does not improve the land with the same confidence, as if it were his unalienable property.

4. Cuy kanum putum, tenure by labour, usufructuary tenure; by which the jennumkar gives a spot of land to a person who undertakes to fence and plant it with productive trees, for which he is insured in the possession of it, for a specified period (12 years) free from all charges. The trees do not generally produce, for the first six years; but the cuy kanumkar has five or six years enjoyment of the ground, in a productive state. At the expiration of the lease, the jennumkar has the right of resumption, on paying the renter for the buildings and wells, according to appraisement; and for the plantation, at fixed rates. The resumption of this tenure, is seldom enforced; but the cuy kanumkar enjoys the lease, at an easy rent, till re-imbursed. This tenure, can be transferred or mortgaged; the soil to one, the buildings to another, which tends to a deterioration of the estate.

Extracts from Report of Mr. THACKERAY, dated 4th August 1807.

ALMOST the whole of the land in Malabar, cultivated and uncultivated, is private property, and held by jennum right, which conveys full absolute property in the soil. Many conjectures might be formed about the origin of landed property, in these countries. The natives have many fables of God creating, or rather raising Malabar and Canara, out of the sea, and giving it to the Brahmins. Without going so far back into antiquity, it may be only necessary to observe, that we find the land occupied by a set of men, who have had possession, time out of mind; we find that they have enjoyed a landlord's rent, and that they have pledged it for large sums, which they borrowed on the security of the land, and it has been taken as good security; so that at this day, a very large sum is due to creditors, to whom the land is mortgaged. Had the creditors ever doubted the validity of the jennum title, or imagined that government would have called it in question, it is not probable that they would have risked their money on so precarious a security. There are rules established time out of mind, for the transfer, lease, and mortgage of land; and where a regular system of common law has been established and observed time out of mind, and where it appears appears in general reasonable and applicable, it may be inferred that the object for which such a system was formed, must exist. There is obstinate opinion, and general tradition, to confirm the validity and antiquity of the title. The neighbouring countries of Travancore, Bednore, and Canara, have the same institution, and nearly the same rules regarding private property, which seem never to have been called in question. Every public and private authority, except Tippoo, appears to have admitted this right; the British government appears to have recognized it, and the people of Malabar have shown that they are able and willing to defend it, with stronger arguments than words: and, at all events, whether the right existed or not, it would be now impolitic and unjust, to call it in question. So that I think it will be admitted that the Malabar jelmkars do possess the full property in the soil. It is almost certain that the lands originally belonged to the pagodas, and at a very early period, were largely alienated; and from the pagodas, the present jelmkars, or proprietors, derived their title. There is no doubt but that many lands have been usurped since Hyder's invasion. The Mopillahs under the Mysore, the rajahs under the Company's government, have probably possessed themselves of lands to which they had no right; but their individual usurpations, do not affect the general rights of the jelmkars, who consider them just as valid and sacred, as the country gentlemen in England. The jemnum right conveys full absolute property in the land, is not liable to become extinct by laches or desertion. The jelmkar, or proprietor, can dispose of his land, as he pleases; by executing the deeds of transfer, he transfers it to an individual; by treason, he forfeits it to the sovereign. If he dies intestate without heirs, it escheats to the state; but as the jelmkars claim the right of adoption, and the power of devising their lands to whom they please, but chiefly to pagodas, land seldom reverts to the state for want of heirs.

The jelmkar may dispose of his estate, in a variety of ways. By kyvedoodth, he pledges his land, and delivers it over to the mortgagee; in this case, the proprietor receives from the mortgagee two-thirds of the value of the estate, but retains a certain quantity of interest in the land, which may be valued at one-third of the whole value: he must alienate this remaining quantity of interest in the land, before he loses the character of a proprietor. Rules are established for the adjustment of rent and interest between the parties, and for the redemption of the land, on the repayment of the sum received by the proprietor.

Atti is another contract, nearly the same, or rather another term for the same transaction. In both cases, the mortgagee, or tenant in possession, pays the surplus of rent above his interest, to the proprietor.

Atti koolly kanum is nearly the same; if there be a difference, it seems to exist respecting the rules for the redemption of the land. These three contracts appear to be nearly the same. When the proprietor has once dipped his estate in one of these ways, he is often unable to pay off the incumbrance; the same indolence, extravagance, or bad luck, which forced him at first to encumber his estate, will probably oblige him to borrow again. In this case, he executes another contract, termed Atti kempoorum, and receives a further sum from the tenant, the amount of which is regulated on a certain proportion of the whole value; and he resigns a further proportionate quantity of interest in the land. The chief advantage which the tenant appears to derive from this second transaction is, that he keeps the whole rent, without accounting to the proprietor: for the second advance is supposed so great, that the whole rent can go no further than to discharge the interest.

If the necessities of the proprietor require a further advance of cash, he executes the Ner moodut, as it is termed, and receives a further per-centage on the whole value of the estate, and resigns so much more of his interest: which becomes so faint, that there is little chance of redemption. There appears to be some difference, in different places, in the conditions of the ner moodut. In some, the option of redemption seems to reside with the tenant; in some, the original proprietor still seems to have the option of redeeming the land, upon the payment of a fine, in addition to the debt. The koollyma ner seems to be nearly the same, as the ner moodut. Where the option of redemption has been long in the possession of the tenant, the tenure is converted, by pledge, into a kind of freehold.

There seems to be some varieties and niceties in the terms and conditions of these transactions, in different places, which can only be ascertained in the courts. All these deeds, do not seem to be in use every where; nor does the same per-centage appear to be universally paid. There is another deed, termed Jelum Ponnijum, which usually follows the ner moodut, and approaches nearer than any of the others, to actual transfer. On executing this deed, the proprietor receives a farther advance, and parts with almost his whole interest in the land. All these transactions are, in reality, transfers of property; because the tenant acquires a greater interest in the land than the original proprietor; but in order to complete the sale, another transaction follows. The attiper, as it is termed, is executed, which irrevocably and completely transfers the property. The attiper must follow the other deeds; and appears to be invalid, unless they are previously executed: so that in those parts of the country where the three deeds, the atti, atti-kempoorum, and ner moodut, are usual, the two last are so necessary to the absolute transfer of the property by attiper, merely to observe forms: but in some places, it would appear that the execution of the ner moodut is the only necessary preliminary to the absolute transfer of the property by attiper. The attiper seems to be in general use, and known by the same term from Kurwar to Cape Comorin.

In this manner, the proprietor gradually divests himself of his interest in the land, as his necessities oblige him to execute these preliminary acts; until, by the attiper, he loses the character, as he had before lost the most essential attributes, of a land-owner. Originally, the final contract was usually executed with sundry forms and ceremonies, with the consent of the next heir, the knowledge of the prince, and in the presence of a certain number of witnesses.

There are various modes of letting land on lease. Kanum patum is, when the landlord lets his land, receiving a sum in advance from the lessee, which may be considered either as a loan, or as security for the due payment of the rent. The tenant retains so much of the rent as will discharge his claim for interest, and pays the remainder to the proprietor.

Poonjuma patum seems to be nearly the same. It is a lease, where the rent and interest of the sum advanced by the tenant seem security for each other.

Another mode of leasing land is, where the rent of so many years is calculated, and advanced by the tenant, to whom the land is made over, for as many years as will repay him.

Warrumpatum is plain lease: Koori kanum is a lease on favourable terms for the improvement of land; and the rule established for the cultivation of waste, and improvement of cultivated land, seem well adapted.

These may be called leasehold tenures. There are others, or perhaps other terms for the same transactions. Adoni jemnum seems to be, where low people, such as artificers, hold small spots of ground from rajahs and great men. It seems the gentle way for rajahs and great men, to alienate ground. The other terms and tenures I do not understand. The vakeels in the zillah courts will have an ample field in arguing and explaining these tenures, which it would require many years practice to understand thoroughly. The gentlemen who have written on Malabar, especially Major Walker, have amply discussed these tenures. All these transactions, combine the natures of lease and mortgage, which most likely arose from the deficient administration of justice. In former times, when once a man got possession, it was difficult to turn him out again, except by force of arms: the proprietor, therefore, insisted on a sum in advance, by way of security for his rent. The deeds which serve to record these transactions are drawn out in a peculiar character, which may be termed the black letter of Malabar. The rajahs have a peculiar character and rules in their transactions.

The lands are so deeply involved and alienated by those contracts, that in many cases the jelmkar, or original proprietor, only receives a handful of grain, or measure of ghee, as an acknowledgment of his title. In some cases, the jelmkar, in others, the tenant, in others, the cultivator, pays the land tax. The value of land varies; but it is said that land sells for the cultivator, pays the land tax. The value of land varies. If this is the case, land sells for for twenty years purchase, reckoning on the clear rent. If land is capable of improvement, it is more valuable, in proportion to its rent. If the real rent is greater than the ostensible, it will appear to sell for more, in proportion to the ostensible rent. The difficulty of absolute transfer may perhaps injure the interests of agriculture, and the courts may hit upon some method of simplifying the rules and transactions relating to land. The incumbrance on the land, has been considered as a clog upon improvement. The mopillas are the great purchasers and mortgagees; their industry, wealth, and habits of business, seem to give them some advantage over the nairs. However, it is, perhaps, in a great measure, the money of the mopillahs, which gives such value to the lands in Malabar. Government have nothing to do with the kanum, or incumbrance on the landed property, except that the care must be taken to prevent any collusive management by which the collection of the land tax may be impeded. Land seems to be more valuable in the northern, than in the southern districts; because the land tax is higher. In Cotiote, and the northern districts, they are said to pay only 50; in the northern districts 80 per cent. of the rent to government. In both cases, the proportion paid as land tax may be exaggerated; however, they must still pay more to the southward. This inequality, is owing to the nature of the country. The southern districts are more open, where armies can act; and most likely, in a few years, Tippoo would have forced the people there, to have paid the whole rent to the cirkar; they would then have lost their property in the land, and have virtually become farmers, like the ryots in the Ceded Districts. But Cotiote, and the northern districts of Malabar, were never thoroughly subdued by the Mysore government; and it is only now that we are beginning to establish our authority there. The strength of the country along the defend their rent, and remain landlords. Perhaps the strength of the country along the Ghauts, is the true cause of the existence of private property in the soil, which the inhabitants of Bednore, Canara, Malabar, and Travancore, not only claim, but have been generally ready to support by force of arms. It would most likely have existed every where; but in other parts of India, armies of horse could carry into immediate execution the orders of a despot, who never admitted of private property; because his wants excited, and his power enabled him, to draw the whole landlord's rent.

The succession to landed property is guided by the same rules which govern the succession to other real property. In those casts in which the sister's son performs the funeral ceremonies, he succeeds as heir. In those, where the succession follows the common Hindoo law, the sons perform the ceremonies, and succeed to the estate. The same rules seem generally to prevail, except, perhaps with some slight differences respecting the elder brother's portion, in dividing estates among coheirs. In the one cast, the estate is divided among the sons, as it is in other parts of India; in the other, among the sisters, or does it arise particularly from, the institution of private property in the soil. It probably arises from the ancient privileges of the Brahmins to visit the women; for when they established their their hierarchy, they probably wanted soldiers and witnesses. They introduced the Nairs, and they have continued the custom, ever since. The head peons most likely became rajahs, as they have in most other places, and by degrees, got possession of the lands. As the fathers of the children were uncertain, the succession followed the mother, about whom no mistake could arise. This appears to me to be the origin of this extraordinary custom, by the other casts, even by the fanatic Mopillahs, who are followers of the prophet. The Nair is said never to marry like other Hindoos; he forms a temporary connection with any young woman who pleases him, which lasts while she continues faithful. The children, he has nothing to do with; they belong to the family of the lady. This aversion to wedlock, so contrary to the usual customs, ideas, and religion of the Hindoos, has probably given rise to a rule of succession, as contrary to their general customs.

At a very early period, it is probable that Malabar was conquered by a king from above the Ghauts, who established the pagodas; and Malabar was governed by a theocracy. The Nairs may have been established at the same time by the conqueror, or called in by the Brahmins, as a military body, to support the government, in the same manner that the Vellah dhorahs were introduced in the Northern circars. In process of time, they obtained settlements on the land. The head peons probably took advantage of opportunities of aggrandizing themselves, and became rajahs; from a remote period, they continued to govern Malabar like independent princes, but still, as deputies of the gods, who resided in the pagodas, until Hyder's invasion, A. D. 1766. There is no proof that any regular land-tax existed in Malabar, previous to that event; tradition and general opinion seem to deny it. The state of Travancore, where it was said there was no regular land tax, gives probability to this opinion, while the former state of Canara, where there has been a regular land tax for many centuries, renders it somewhat doubtful. The proprietors of land were certainly bound to render military service, and were likely to contribute twenty per cent. in other sources of revenue, from fines, royalties, imposts, personal taxes, and plunder, which were sufficient to support them. There was no army besides the militia, nor any expensive establishments to support; so that there does not seem to have been any necessity for a general land tax; nor had the rajahs power perhaps to collect one. It is only great states that want, or in India can, collect the land revenue easily.

Hyder sent an army into Malabar in 1760, and came himself in 1761. He subdued the country; and according to his custom, drove out most of the rajahs, except those who conciliated him, by immediate submission. During the war of 1768, the rajahs occasioned some disturbance; but in 1771, he came down himself, and re-established his authority. In 1782, Archee Bag Charn was appointed his deputy, who made considerable progress in subduing and settling the country. This settlement of the revenue is said to be the foundation of that of the commissioners; but there are some doubts about his assessment and collections; for as Malabar was never thoroughly subdued and settled, like the countries long subject to the great governments which existed in the Peninsula, there is no regular establishment of village registers. Even the Menezes, who now keep the hobby accounts, are not on the same footing as the hereditary curraums of the other provinces; nor are they so skilful at accounts. In 1787, it is said that things were going on pretty well; but in 1788, Tippoo came down and proposed to the Hindoos the true faith; and not content with empty propositions about religion, he levied a contribution on his infidel subjects, and began the work of conversion, by forcibly circumcising a great many Brahmins, Nairs, and others, whom he thought deserving of paradise. This produced a serious rebellion; but he sent a large force, returned himself next year; and so vigorous was his administration, that in spite of religion, he drove out the rajahs, and re-established his authority. He fairly bullied the chief of Tellicherry, and circumcised all the natives he could get hold of. It is not to be supposed that much revenue could be collected, or financial business arranged, during this scene of confusion.

The war between the English and Tippoo broke out in 1790, when we encouraged the refugee rajahs, who collected followers, sallied into Malabar, and raised contributions in the name of allies of the honourable Company. They received cowle from our officers, which seems afterwards to have puzzled the commissioners who were appointed on the quest of the province, and who did not know whether the rajahs were to be considered as allies or subjects. Some of them, set up lofty pretensions to independent authority; however, at last a settlement was formed with them; and they were put into the management of their districts. It may be safely said, that the rajahs were either too weak to manage their districts, which happened to the southward chiefly, or too strong to submit to one government, which happened to the northward chiefly; and to this cause, most of the subsequent disturbances may be attributed. A scene of confusion, and an accumulation of imbalances ensued, which has only been lately changed for a better order of things: commissioners, superintendants, committees, and collectors, succeeded each other; but however zealous and able they might have been, order was not established in Malabar. The revenue was inadequate, yet not collected; the government was lenient, yet rebellion ensued. The Mopillah rebellion to the southward, the Cottiote rebellion to the northward, were civil wars which distressed the country, and prevented any financial arrangements. This deplorable state of affairs, may be in a great degree attributed, to the installation of the rajahs; for the Mysore government seemed to have managed pretty well when they got rid of the rajahs; and we have only begun to establish our authority, since the rajahs have been shut out from any interference with the revenue.

As

As the principle of assessment recommended in Mr. Richards's letter of the 22d February 1804, has been adopted, and confirmed by your Lordship's minute of the 22d April 1804; the Board of Revenue informed Mr. Warden, the collector, of the resolution of government on the 5th May 1804; and Mr. Warden issued a proclamation in consequence. As the principle of assessment has been fixed, and is, in respect to rice-fields, in every respect just and politic, it only remains to carry it into execution.

The land-tax is to be fixed at 60 per cent. of the land rent, derivable to the owners of rice-fields.

The inhabitants have given in a statement of the rent of their rice-fields, calculated in the following manner:

Suppose the land requires 10 scers to sow, and that it produces 12 fold, the produce will be	120
The seed grain is deducted	10
Remains	110
Amount equal to seed is deducted for charges	10
Remains	100
Of this remainder, the land-owner takes two thirds, the tenant one third, which is	33 1/3
The landlord's clear rent is	66 2/3

Appendix, No. 24.

Extracts from REPORTS respecting LAND TENURES and ASSESSMENTS, in CANARA.

Extracts from REPORT of Principal Collector of CANARA; dated 31st May 1800.

FROM the remotest times of which there is any record, till near the middle of the fourteenth century, all land was assessed in rice at a quantity equal to the quantity of paddy sown; that is to say, a field which required ten bundies of paddy to sow it, paid ten bundies of rice to the circar. The measure then in use was called a katti, which contained forty hams of eighty rupees weight; a katti was therefore equal to three thousand two hundred rupees weight. The rent of three such kattis of land, was three kattis of rice, or one ghetti pagoda of the same value as the behadde now is. The revenue was sometimes collected in kind, and sometimes in money, at the discretion of the circar; and, probably, according as the state of prices rendered the one or the other, most advantageous.

Between the years A. D. 1334 and 1347, Hurrehurr Roy, the rajah of Bijanugger, made a new assessment of Canara upon the principles laid down in the shaster, which suppose the produce to be to the seed as 12 to 1, and which prescribe the proportions into which it is to be divided, between the circar and the cultivator, agreeable to the shaster; therefore he reckoned that 2 1/2 kattis of seed yielded 30 kattis of paddy, which he divided as follows:—

To the landlord	7 1/2
To the cultivator or labourer	15
To the circar	7 1/2

and still following the shaster, he divided the circar share, as follows:

To the circar, one sixth of the gross produce	5
Dewan, one thirtieth	1
Brahmday, or Brahmins, one twentieth	1 1/2

He reckoned the 7 1/2 kattis of paddy equal to half or 3 1/4 kattis of rice, from which he deducted four hams per katti of rice, or one tenth, for beeding it from the paddy. The balance, 3 kattis and 15 hams, he supposed to be the fund from which the circar rent of one ghetti pagoda to 2 1/2 kattis of land was to be paid. Though it is said that in the 7 1/2 parts of the gross produce taken as the circar's share, 2 1/2 are for pagodas and Brahmins, it appears from a statement of enaums, that the share actually allowed to them, was little more than one. This curtailment was made, on the idea of their possessing lands to a large amount, not included in the jumma; and it appears from investigations made in subsequent periods, that those enaums, added to what they held openly, exceeded the 2 1/2 parts, which ought to have on the whole of the jumma, except in what is called the hobby of Mangalore,

Mangalore, which comprizes about one-third of Canara, and which being at that time mostly held by a number of tributary poligars, was only partially subjected to this assessment. Between this period and 1660, the only considerable addition they made to it was by an assessment of cocoa-nut, and other fruit trees, which, under the Bijanugger government, do not seem ever to have paid any rent, exclusive of the land rent. The Bijanugger assessment, with all additions down to this era incorporated with it, has been for more than a century, considered as the rekah, or standard rent of all the lands in the country, cultivated and waste; and it is therefore entered under that denomination, in the 2d column of the statement No. 1. The deductions in the four following columns are made in order to show the amount of the standard rent of the circar lands actually occupied, and paying rent at the end of the Bednore government.

The 3d column contains the total of the enaums; the amount of which, like that of the circar lands, was swelled by the addition of 50 per cent in 1618; but no real increase of which had been concealed during the Bijanugger government, having been in the course of subsequent investigations, discovered and brought to account. The Bednore rajahs, though they made no addition to the enaums, made considerable alterations in them, by transferring S. P. 23,595. 2. 13. from Bramins to the Mutis, and pagodas of Lingumuts, to which cast they themselves belonged.

The deficiencies of rekah or standard rent, in column 4, are composed of uncultivated lands, and reduction of rent. The first of these heads, comprehends all lands overflowed by the sea, or torn up and washed away by rivers and nullas, and ancient waste lands which had been in that state, ever since the Bijanugger government; and which, from their situation among hills and jungles, being deemed unlikely to be ever again cultivated, were withdrawn from the sum of the general assessment of the country.

The second head includes reductions of such parts of the extra assessment of 50 per cent. and of that of cocoa-nut trees, as it was found could not be realized.

The waste lands in column 5, are all supposed to be fit for cultivation, because the whole or the greater part of them had been cultivated at different periods, under the Beddanore government.

It was usual to grant tankahs to the peons of Simogu, and other garrisons above the Ghauts, on the ryots of Canara, for a certain proportion of their pay. These men, being always impatient to get home, were glad, for the sake of prompt payment, to accept of what was much less than their due. By degrees, it became a rule that they were to get no more than sixty per cent. for their tankahs. As this was in fact a remission of rent, the tankahs were generally written upon the poorest villages; but when, in consequence of a reduction of the peons, the tankahs were discontinued, it was found expedient still to continue to the villages the indulgence to which they had been so long accustomed; and the diminution of rent which this occasioned is entered in column 6.

The eighth column contains the net standard rent of all the land occupied at the close of the Beddanore government; which, together with the additions, in the following columns, formed the jumma at that period. The pugdi, or extra assessment of 1711, was imposed by the wife of the rajah, who was also regent during the madness of her husband, on occasion of the marriage of her son Ruwapah Naigue. It was at the rate of one sixteenth of the kist, or standard rent, and was for a few years levied as a nuzzer, but soon came to be considered, as part of the jumma.

The Puti, or extra assessment of 1718, in column 10, was imposed by the rajah of Sondah, for the purpose of discharging the Mogul peshush, at the rate of 30 per cent. on all gardens, and from 24 to 44 per cent. on ricefields. The addition under this head in Buntwah, was made by the Adig poligar, who then rented a part of that district.

The Chukes, or extra assessment of 1720, was imposed in lieu of interest paid to the soucars, who advanced the early kists for the ryots. In Beddanore, 50 per cent. had always been paid, by the middle of October; but only 24 per cent. in Canara. The rajah wished to regulate the kists of Canara, in the same manner; but the inhabitants, from the lateness of the crops, being unable to comply, it was agreed that he should borrow the money, and that they should pay him, as interest, half an anna, or one thirty-second part additional on the kist, or standard rent.

The assessment of 1725 was made by Ruwapah Naigue, at the rate of one tenth of an anna, or one one-hundred and sixteenth part additional rent, in order to erect chutters and feed pilgrims, on account of the murder of his father.

The additions in column 13, consist of extra assessments by petty poligars in the Mangalore Hobly, and those in the next column, of nuzzers formerly made to the rajahs; of betel-nut and pepper, converted into money, and a variety of other trifling articles.

The addition of 1758 was made by the Rani, to discharge the arrears of the Mharatta chout. They had accumulated to so great a sum, that she pretended she could not pay them off, without a nuzzerannah from the inhabitants, equal to one year's rent. To this demand, they utterly refused to submit; and when she attempted to enforce compliance, they rose in a body upon the amildars. The matter was at last accommodated, by their consenting to pay 50 per cent. in four years, at the rate of 124 per cent. each year; but in the fifth year, when it was to have been remitted, Hyder ordered it to be made permanent.

Col. 17. consists of extra assessments, made by petty poligars in the districts which they rented, to supply deficiencies from increase of waste land, &c. Col. 18. contains an increase increase of 2½ per cent. in Sondah, which was the advantage gained on exchange, by substituting the Sarvenoor for the Durwar pagoda. It contains also a small additional rent on sub-pans; the produce of cocoa-nuts, formerly presented to amildars at festivals; and a great variety of other trifling articles.

11. Hyder had no sooner completed the conquest of Canara, than he ordered an investigation to be made into every source of revenue, for the purpose of augmenting it, wherever it could be done. The chief part of the extra assessments made on this account, is entered in column 23. He was informed that a great part of the deductions in columns 4 and 5, made in the three preceding centuries, had been granted in consequence of false statements; he therefore ordered that such a portion of these lands as amounted, which all extra assessments were added to their standard rent, to thirty thousand pagodas, should be added to their jumma; but as it appeared, on inquiry, that no such lands were actually in cultivation, this sum was added to the rent of those that were so. He ordered the extra assessment of 1741 to be imposed on the lands of potails and other head ryots, who had then been excused, and an additional assessment of eighteen thousand pagodas to be laid on the Mangalore Hobly, because it had only been partially subjected to the additional 50 per cent. of 1618.

The additions in column 24, were made between 1700 and 1782, by Shaik Ayaz, commonly called Hyat Sahib by Europeans. He had promised, on being appointed dewan of the provinces of Nuggar and Canara, to raise the revenue a lac and a half of pagodas, without distressing the inhabitants. In order to fulfil his engagement, he again added to the out distressing the inhabitants. He raised the rent of all cocoa-standard rent, the tankahs to peons, remitted in column 6. He raised the rent of all cocoa-nut plantations; he calculated the amount of all ruzooms, services, &c. usually exacted from the ryots by keladars and amildars, and added them to the land rent. These various heads taken together, form the greatest extra assessment, next to that imposed immediately after the conquest by the orders of Hyder himself; as it is also one of the most recent, it is always most complained of; and on this account, Dhoondhia, after taking Nuggar in June last, promised, in the cowle namas which he sent into Canara, to abolish it. Column 25. is an extra assessment, made by the inferior amildars in several districts, of a certain per-centage on the standard rent, by orders from the dewan. Column 26 is the village Saderward, or the disbursements usually made by the potail and shambogues for batta to peons, charity to pandarums, bramins, &c. and allowances to dancing women and straw men, all of which were ordered to be discontinued, and the money supposed to be thus saved, to be added to the jumma. Column 27 contains a great variety of heads; the principal of which is, a sum levied in lieu of repairs of forts and cutcherries; which the inhabitants had formerly been accustomed to perform gratis every year. Column 30 contains the sum which arose from the resumption of the half of all enaums to bramins and pagodas, and the whole of all service enaums to petty zemindars, potails, &c. Column 32 is the profit on grain issued to district. Those who were stationed in Aukalah had, on account of the disturbances in that district, higher pay, than any where else. Hyder wished to reduce it, but he could not alter the nominal amount, without creating discontent. He therefore ordered, that half their pay should be issued in paddy, at double the bazar price; and that the difference should be brought to account, in extra revenue. A small part of it was, however, by some mistake or other, added to the jumma, and the whole was afterwards, in Tippoo's time, called land-rents, though no part of it, was ever collected from the ryots; and though the whole, after the reduction of the peons, always appeared as an outstanding balance. Column 33. The sale of prostitutes, was the chief source of extra revenue under the Bednoor government. It was farmed to the highest bidder, and was an instrument of the greatest oppression; for the farmer had spies about every rich family, by means of whom he exacted heavy fines for concealment, and very frequently where no fault had been committed, by threatening to bring public charges, supported by false evidence. Hyder put an end to all intrusion into private families, and confined the firm to the sale of such women, as had already been expelled from their cast. The treasury bonds in column 34, were bonds given during the Beddanore government, by such landholders as had received loans from the treasury to enable them to discharge their balances. Hyder ordered an account to be taken of the principal and interest still due, and directed that the whole should be discharged in ten years by the different individuals, against whom the demand stood. The increase in column 35. arose chiefly from the assessment of cocoa-nut plantations on the sands near the beach, which had not before been included in the land rent.

13. The greatest addition made to the land rent under Tippoo, was by the total resumption of all enaums. The other heads of actual increase, being similar to those of his father, require no explanation; but there is in column 36. a nominal increase of no less than S. Pag. 2,52,589. 22. 76. no part of which, was ever collected. It is composed of a tax amounting to 7½ per cent. of the land rent, which it was supposed might be raised from shroffs and tobacco, by farming the sale of coins and change of money to particular shroffs, and raising the price of tobacco. This 7½ per cent. imposed in 1794, as well as a nuzzerannah of 30 per cent. in 1782, seem to have been suggested to Tippoo by his advisers, merely with the view of involving his accounts in confusion, that they might with the more safety, embezzle the revenue; for in fact, it was only the land rent that was collected and entered in the village accounts; but which was afterwards, in the cutcherries, classed under the heads of "Nuzzerannah" — "37½ per cent. additional" and "Land-rent;" and the simple balance of land rent, by being divided among these three classes, grew into such a confused mass of balances, as to set all investigation at defiance.

Extracts of Reports respecting Land Tenures and Assessments, in Canara.

Extract Report of Principal Collector, of 31st May 1800.

14. Columns 78, 79, and 80, shew the proportions of the land-rent that were received in kind. The whole are now commuted for money; because rice is not now wanted for garrisons; and because the monopoly of pepper was destroying the very plantations from whence it arose.

The increase of land-rent is divided into extra assessments, and new heads of revenue, because it is the extra assessments alone that add to the burden of the landholders, and exhibit the excess of the modern, above the ancient assessment of the same lands.

This ancient assessment is still written, not only in all general accounts of districts, but in those of every individual landholder. It is alone considered, as the due of government; all subsequent additions are regarded, as oppressive exactions. They are not called rent, but are stigmatised by the names of chout, imposts, fines, &c. and distinguished by the names of the dewans who first levied them. They were always opposed by the inhabitants; and it was therefore necessary in most cases to make them, as general and equal as possible, by an even rate of per-centage.

This forms a remarkable distinction between the land-rent of Canara, and that of Mysore and the neighbouring countries; for there, the rent of every village, and of almost every ryot, fluctuates from year to year, because it is not fixed upon the land, but is regulated by the supposed ability of the cultivator.

The sums entered in columns 8, 44, and 72, exhibit the standard rent of the land in cultivation, under the revenue of Bednore, Hyder, and Tippoo; and had all these lands been actually cultivated, they would likewise show exactly, the comparative rates of assessment of those three periods. But this was not the case; for a small portion of land in occupancy, even under the Ranny, was waste. More of it, was waste under Hyder, particularly in the latter years of his government; and a far greater share, under Tippoo.

It never was the practice under any one of these governments to keep an account of waste lands, unless of such as from the failure of heirs or other accidents, had reverted to the circar. The accounts contained a register of the number of landholders, and the fixed assessment of their respective estates, the total of which formed the jumma; but they took no notice of waste lands, when there was a proprietor in existence. As long as he was present, he was responsible for the full rent, whether he cultivated or not. This was little felt under the Bednore government, when there were very few proprietors, who had not the means of cultivating the whole of their estates; but it became a serious evil under Hyder and Tippoo, when the increase of rent diminished cultivation; and, by being thrown upon a narrower share, pressed with double weight upon the landholders.

Both their assessments, therefore, must be reckoned higher than they appear to be, from the statement. There is no method of ascertaining what, in either of them, was the quantity of waste in those estates which composed the jumma, and which of course was subjected to full rent, in the same manner as if it had been cultivated; but many circumstances render it probable, that during the last five or six years of Tippoo's reign, the land in cultivation did not exceed the amount of that of the present year, entered in column 83.

If this conclusion is just, it would add about one-sixth more to the proportional rate of assessment, and with the increasing embezzlements of his servants, sufficiently accounts for the extraordinary diminution of his receipts in No. 2.

The sum of S. Pag. 1, 50, 940. 4. 36. in column 82, deducted from his assessment in the settlement of the current year, is principally composed of waste lands, of which the proprietors are extinct; and which though they have been in that state for a long time past, had been permitted to swell the jumma at the beginning, and the outstanding balances at the close of the year.

It is also composed of a reduction of a part of the extra assessments on such estates as were running to waste from the inability of their owners to pay the exorbitant rents with which they were loaded.

However much I disapprove of the numerous additions made to the ancient land-rent by Hyder and Tippoo, I did not think myself at liberty to depart widely from the system which I found established; as it is the same as that which exists in all the provinces which the Company have acquired, in the East and farther west. I have made no other reduction in the assessment of Tippoo's share than such as was absolutely necessary, in order to ensure the collection of the rest. I considered myself merely as a collector who was to investigate and report upon the state of the country, but who was to leave it to the board to decide, as to the expediency of lowering the assessment.

Had such an assessment as that introduced by Hyder and Tippoo existed in ancient times, Canara would long ago, have been converted into a desert. In a country so rocky and uneven, where cattle are not only scarce, but even where they are to be had, cannot always be employed; where every spot, before it can be cultivated, must be levelled with great labour, by the hand of man; the expense of the first preparation of waste ground must have been so great that it never could have been attempted, unless the assessment had been extremely moderate; and even after land has been brought into cultivation, if it is neglected for a few years, it is soon broke up by deep gullies formed by the torrents which fall during the monsoon.

Not only these reasons, therefore, but the most positive evidence of accounts, clearly demonstrate that the fourth of the gross produce, said to have been taken as the circar share in the Ryjuggur assessment, was fully as much as was paid by the ryots under that government; for, after the addition made to it by the Bednore land y in 1678, of 50 per

50 per cent. besides many smaller additions, making about 20 per cent. more, it appears to have been little felt by the inhabitants. Indeed it appears that the circar share was reckoned higher than it ought to have been, by adopting the shaster rule of the seed, yielding 12 to 1, as the basis of cultivation; for an ancient estimate of produce, and the expenses of cultivation drawn up at the time of the original assessment, makes the circar's share only one-sixth, which was probably nearer the truth than one fourth. Whatever proportion it might have borne to the gross produce in 1762, at the time of the conquest of Canara by Hyder, it still seems to have been sufficiently moderate to have enabled the country, if not to extend cultivation, at least to preserve it in the same flourishing state in which it had been, in earlier times. Where districts were in a state of decline, it was not caused by the land-rent, but had been the consequence of the diminution of their population, during the frequent revolts of their numerous petty poligars, or it has been occasioned by temporary acts of oppression; for the rajahs of Bednore, though they adhered to the principle of a fixed land-rent, frequently permitted their favourites and dependants, when placed in the management of districts, to ruin many of the principal inhabitants, by the exaction of exorbitant fines under various pretences.

From these and other causes, there were in many parts of the country, tracts of waste land which paid no rent, and which could not be sold, at the rate of from one to eight or ten years purchase of the circar rent. I have met with some instances, in which particular fields had been sold as high as twenty-five and thirty years. Under the Bednore rulers, therefore, those outstanding balances which have since been so common in Canara, were almost unknown. It was thought necessary to keep annual details of the state of cultivation.

It was never enquired what portion of his estates a landlord cultivated, or left waste. It was expected, that in whatever state they were, he was to pay the whole rent. When he failed, however, as was sometimes the case, it was not usual, even where it could be done, to sell the whole or a part of his land, to make good the deficiency. This was looked upon, as a harsh measure, and was seldom resorted to. The usual custom was to grant him time; to assist him with a loan of money, or to remit the debt altogether. The village or district was scarcely ever assessed, for individual failures. On the whole, the revenue was then easily realized, and when there were at times outstanding balances, they seem to have been produced, rather from mismanagement than from the operation of the land-rent.

Canara has, however, now completely fallen from this state of prosperity. The evils which have been continually accumulating upon it, since it became a province of Mysore, have destroyed a great part of its former population; and rendered its remaining inhabitants as poor, as those of the neighbouring countries. Its lands which are now saleable are reduced to a very small portion, and lie chiefly between the Cundapoor and Chundergherry rivers, and within five or six miles of the sea.

It is not to be supposed that the whole of this tract, can be sold; but only that saleable lands are scattered throughout every part of it, thinner in some places, and thicker in others; particularly in the Mangalore district. There is scarcely any saleable land, even on the sea coast, any where to the northward of Cundapoor, or any where inland, from one end of Canara to the other; excepting on the banks of the Mangalore, and some of the other great rivers. In the vicinity of the Ghauts, the lands are not only unsaleable, but the greatest part of them, is waste and overgrown with wood. It is reckoned that the population of the country has been diminished one third within the last forty years; and there can be little doubt but that its property has suffered, a much greater reduction. Gusapah, Ankalah, and Cundapoor, formerly flourishing places, contain now only a few beggarly inhabitants. Honawer, once the second town in trade after Mangalore, has not a single house; and Mangalore itself, is greatly decayed.

It may be said that this change has been brought about, by the invasion of Hyder; by the four wars which have happened since that event; by Tippoo himself destroying many of the principal towns upon the coast, and forcing their inhabitants to remove to alabad, and other unhealthy situations near the hills; by his seizing in one night, all the Christian men, women and children, amounting to above sixty thousand; by the prohibition into captivity to Mysore, from whence one tenth of them never returned; by the disorder of foreign trade, and by the general corruption and disorder of his government in all its departments. These circumstances, certainly accelerated the change; but taken altogether, they probably did not contribute to it so much, as the extraordinary augmentation of the land-rent.

A moderate land-rent carries in itself, such an active principle of prosperity, that it enables a country to resist for a long time, all the evils attending bad government, and also to recover quickly from the calamities of war. When it is fixed, and light, the farmer sees that he will reap the reward of his own industry. The cheerful prospect of improving his situation animates his labours, and enables him to replace, in a short time, the losses he may have sustained from adverse seasons, the devastations of war, and other accidents. But when oppression is added to all the other mischiefs of a tyrannical government, the country, however flourishing it may ever have been, must sink under them at last; and must hasten to ruin, at a more rapid rate, every succeeding year.

Hyder ruined Canara, a highly improved country, filled with industrious inhabitants enjoying a greater proportion of the produce of the soil, and being more comfortable than those of any province, under any native power in India: but instead of observing the wise and temperate conduct which would have secured to it, the enjoyment of these advantages, he regarded regarded it as a fund from which he might draw, without limit, for the expenses of his military operations in other quarters. The whole course of the administration of his deputies seems to have been nothing but a series of experiments, made for the purpose of discovering the utmost extent to which the land-rent could be carried, or how much it was possible to exact from the former, without diminishing cultivation. The savings, accumulated in better times, enabled the country to support, for some years, the pressure of continually increasing demands: but they would not do so for ever. Failing, and out-standing balances, became frequent before his death.

The same demands, and worse management, increased them in the beginning of Tippoo's reign. He was determined to relinquish no part of his father's revenue. He knew no way of making up for failures, but by compelling one part of the ryots to pay for the deficiencies of the other. He made them pay, not only for those which arose upon the cultivation of the current year, but also for those which arose from the waste lands of dead and deserted ryots, which were annually increasing. Severity, and a certain degree of vigilance and control, in the early part of his government, kept the collections for some time, nearly at their former standard:
but it was impossible that they could remain so, long; for the amount of land left unoccupied from the flight or death of its cultivators, became at last so great, that it could not be discharged by the remaining part of the inhabitants; and the collections, before the end of his reign, fell short of the assessment from 10 to 60 per cent. The measure which he adopted for preserving his revenue, was that which most effectually destroyed it. He forced the ryots, who were present, to cultivate the lands of the dead and absent: but as the increased rent of their own lands required all their care and labour, by turning a part of it to these new lands, the produce of their own, was diminished, and they became incapable of paying the rent of either.

The effect of this violent regulation was, to hasten the extinction of the class of ancient proprietors or landlords: for many who might still have contrived to have held that rank, had they been permitted to confine their stock to the cultivation of their own lands; when they were obliged to employ it, in the cultivation of those of other people; and when the consequent decrease of the produce, left no surplus, after paying the rent of government, sunk to the state of labourers.
Nothing can more strongly indicate the poverty of a country, than when its lands, so far from being saleable, must be forced upon the cultivators: but this practice prevails more or less throughout Canara, and is very general every where, to the northward of Cundapoor.

As far as can be gathered from traditions and accounts, it appears that in the fourteenth century, at the time when the Reka or Bijnugger standard rent was paid, the whole of the lands were parcelled out among a prodigious number of landholders paying annual rents, in various gradations, from 5 to 5,000 pagodas. Great estates, however, were not common: and the average was nearer 50 pagodas than any other sum. The demand of the circar was fixed for two centuries and a half, under the Bijnugger government, and may be said to have been fixed under the Beduore rajahs also, during more than a century; for in all that period, the fixed additions to it, hardly amounted to 10 per cent.

The price of land, it has been already observed, was low; but this low nature ought not to be ascribed entirely to the assessment. Some of it, may fairly be laid to the charge of other causes; to the danger of being suspected of being rich, which hindered so much money going to the improvement of land, and so much from being paid for it, as would otherwise have been done; to the total want of manufactures for the internal consumption of grain, from which the revenue chiefly arose; to the difficulty and expense of transporting so bulky a commodity by land, depriving it of the market of the countries above the Ghauts; and to the want of a naval force to protect the coast against pirates, and to secure, at all times, a free export for the surplus produce by sea. But though the price was low, the property itself was guarded by several equitable and humane laws, or rather customs, originating in precautions which mankind naturally take to transmit their possessions to their descendants.

The alienation of land, by sale or otherwise, was unrestrained. Nothing but gift, or sale, or non-payment of rent, could take it from the owner. If he absconded with balances standing against him, it was transferred to another person; but if he or his heir returned, at ever so distant a period, it was restored, on either of them paying a reasonable compensation for the balance, and such extra expenses as might have been incurred on account of improvements. No crime in the proprietor, could extinguish the right of the heir to the succession.
Where proprietors, holding directly of the circar, died without heir, their estates reverted to the circar, which gave them away to a new set of owners, on receiving one, two, or more years rent, as a nuzzeranah, according to the condition in which the lands might have been at the time. It does not appear that the landlords were, by their tenures, bound to the performance of personal service, or any other condition, beyond the simple one of discharging the public rent; and even this, was not always rigorously exacted. Though the estates held immediately of government were so small, that the rent of each did not exceed 50 pagodas, yet the proprietors had under them an infinite number of lesser proprietors, holding their lands of them, with all the same proprietary rights as they held their own, of government. It was usual for the original proprietors to rent, either for a term of years, or for ever, such a portion of their lands as was sufficient to discharge the whole of their public rent, and to keep the rest in their own hands. The tenants for ever, became a second class of proprietors, whom nothing could deprive of their right of possession, unless their own act, of gift or sale. On failure of heirs, their lands reverted to the original superior landlord; but a reversion of the estate of the superior landlord to the circar did not, if that of the inferior could be found.

As

As all land was private property, no man would occupy or cultivate waste, until he had obtained a pottah, either to secure him in the possession, or if turned out, to indemnify him for his expenses: because he was liable, if he neglected this precaution, to be turned out at any time by the owner, without compensation. When a proprietor alienated land for a certain rent for ever, he either received a price for it, or received none, or paid a sum of money to the person to whom the land was transferred. Which of these modes was adopted, depended on the circumstances of the parties, and the nature of the land; but in each of these cases, the tenure was the same, and the tenant was called, tenant by purchase.

When the circar disposed of lands which had reverted to it by failure of heirs, it followed the practice of individuals. It sold them almost always by a nuzzeranah. It sometimes gave them gratis, but it never paid money, and seldom or ever advanced tuccevy to the tenant or owner. The reason why individuals rarely received, and why the circar almost always received, a price for land, is sufficiently obvious. Individuals, in transferring or alienating one part of their estates, always endeavour to do it, at the very highest rent that could be got, in order to free the other, if possible, from taxation. But as the circar took no such advantage, it gave the whole or any portion of the estate, for the whole or fair quota of the standard rent. As all alienations of land in perpetuity were said to be by sale, all proprietors, therefore, while the Beduore government lasted, were said to hold their lands either by purchase, or by immemorial prescription.

The lands of Canara are still to be considered as held under the same conditions, and governed by the same rules of transfer, as they were under the ancient government. The increase of assessment by Hyder and Tippoo Sultan, has, in some places, annihilated the old proprietors; and it has every where diminished the quantity, but not altered the nature of the property. What remains is still as much cherished, and the title to it, as obstinately contested, as it ever was perhaps at any former period. The landlords, who once lived chiefly on their rents, have now hardly any rent at all. Few of them, have sufficient to constitute, of itself, the fund of their subsistence. Many of them, procure a part or the whole of their subsistence, by the management of farms, or even by acting as labourers. The destruction of a part of the property by the heavy demands of the circar, seems rather to have increased than impaired the attachment of the proprietor to the remainder. He never quits the estate of his ancestors, while he can live upon it, as a farmer or a labourer; but if after paying the circar rent, and what is due to himself for his labour, there remains the most trifling surplus, he will almost as soon part with his life, as with his estate. Disputes concerning land, where the property frequently does not amount to ten pagodas, are often carried before every successive amildar for twenty years.

The only land in Canara that can, in any way, come under the description of circar lands, is unclaimed waste; to a great deal of which, it is very likely claimants would appear were it once brought into cultivation. There are also some uncultivated lands, particularly in the Northern districts, which may be reckoned public. There are lands which were originally unproductive, and which from the death or absence of their owners, would have been allowed to run waste, had they not been contiguous to more productive lands, whose owners it was supposed were able, and were therefore compelled, to cultivate them.
But exclusive of this land, cultivated by compulsion, and unclaimed waste, all other is private property.

Extracts from REPORT of principal Collector of CANARA;—dated 9th November 1800.

Extracts from Reports respecting Land Tenures and Assessments
in Canara.

Extracts from Report of Principal Collector of Canara,
9 Nov. 1800.

MANY circumstances have occurred, within these few months, to induce me to judge more favourably than I formerly did, of the condition of the inhabitants of Canara; but none has so much attracted my attention, as their numberless disputes about Landed Property. In the Barahmahl, a dispute about land scarcely came before me, once in six months. In this country, every other cause of litigation or complaint seems to be lost, in that of Land. It alone produces more than nineteen in twenty, of all the complaints that I hear. The accumulated suits of half a century, appear to have broken loose at once: and every moment that I can spare from my ordinary business, has been given to the hearing of them, without having sensibly reduced their number. They formed a principal branch of the emoluments of the circar servants, not only under the Mysore, but also under the Bednore government; for it was the practice of almost every amildar to receive money, to set aside the decisions of his predecessors; which accounts for such a multitude, still remaining unsettled. Both, these claims of long standing, and new ones which arise every day, evince that land, notwithstanding all the subsequent additions to the shist, is still considered as a very valuable property. Claims come chiefly, as may be supposed, from the most flourish-tolerable good criterion for estimating their comparative state of wealth or poverty. We may be sure that where lands are so much the object of contention, that there is no danger of their being unable to discharge the public rent; for men would hardly lose their time, and spend their money, for the sake of acquiring that which was not worth the holding, or which might involve them in loss. Were all estates in Canara worth disputing for, I should not think any absolute necessity existed for reducing any part of the assessment. There is no part of Canara where the ryots of themselves throw up their old lands and occupy new. But there are parts, where though a man will not quit his land, yet when he has been dispossessed by force or intrigue, he does think the object sufficiently important for him, to pay any thing for its recovery; but in by far the greatest part of Canara, the right to land is so obstinately contested, that a man, however just his title may be, is rarely permitted to succeed to his estate, without encountering the opposition of some rival or other, who endeavours to invalidate his claim, and to set up one of his own, supported by false witnesses or forged deeds, which are very common in this country.

The relative degrees of value attached by the natives themselves to land in different parts of the province, could we exactly ascertain it, combined in some degree, with a retrospect to the shist and collections of former times, would afford the best standard for determining the proportions of the assessment which ought to be reduced.

It is scarcely possible to ascertain the produce or value of land from the owners or cultivators. Long experience has taught them, that concealment is their best defence against new exactions; and all of them, however simple in other respects, are continually on their guard, against any questions that tend to lead to any disclosure of their circumstances. A careful survey would, however, yield us a great deal of useful information, which cannot be drawn from them; for by learning the rents paid by tenants to the landlords, and comparing the lands of the tenants to the whole lands of the estate, a tolerably good guess might be made of the net income of the landlords. A survey, however, cannot be made, without a heavy expense, and there is no other mode of acquiring so much knowledge of the state of the country. Next to a survey, the best way of gaining this knowledge would be, by keeping a register for some years, of the rent and produce of all lands that become the subject of litigation. There is always something or other on such occasions, which induces one of the parties to bring forward a statement of the produce. As there is, therefore, no difficulty in discovering it, and as these disputes are so very frequent; a great number of examples might soon be collected from each district; and the average produce of these lands, might be taken as that of the whole district; or, at least, it would not be far from it, after deducting circar lands, which, from not having an owner, are but poorly cultivated.

I have endeavoured, by every means in my power, to ascertain, from such circumstances as have come within my observation, what are the relative proportions of the produce, after deducting all expenses of cultivation, that go to the circar and to the landlord. The evidence of the tenants, were it not most commonly false, would at once determine the point; because all rents of tenants to landlords in Canara are paid either in money or a certain fixed quantity of grain, and never by a share of the crop, or what is called warum. In taking the reports of the landlords themselves, the lowest that any of them have reckoned their average share of the net produce to a district or maganie, is 15 per cent. and the highest 40 per cent. Though I imagine that the highest of the extremes are too low, yet the admission of either of them, on their part, is more than could have been expected; for it proves incontestably the existence of a land rent. The reply of the farmers of the Barahmahl to similar queries, was always, that there was no rent, and seldom any profit, or any thing beyond the mere wages of their labour. In both cases, they represented their situation as much worse, than it really was. According to their own statements, however, there is a wide difference between the condition of the farmer of the Barahmahl, and that of the landlords of Canara.

Among the numerous causes respecting land which have come before me, the landlord's rent was much oftener above than below 50 per cent. of the net produce. In many instances, it was 60, 70, and 80 per cent. The most productive lands, it may be said, are the most liable to become the subject of litigation, and cannot therefore be taken, as a standard for the average of the whole. It does not appear to me, however, that they ought to be regarded garded as a selection, or that they might not form a fair average; for they comprehended every description of land, those of the poorest as well as those of the most substantial landlords. A cause in which most of the native Christian proprietors were concerned, has furnished me with a great number of examples, the result of which is still more in favour of the landlords. In 1784, when they were carried into captivity by Tippoo, their lands were confiscated, and either given away or sold to men of other casts, for a price far below their value. They have now claimed their restoration; and in order to determine what the present holders may be entitled to, as a compensation for purchase money, improvements, &c.; a statement, No. 1, has been drawn up by the parties themselves; and as both have agreed to abide by it, there can be no doubt of its being perfectly correct. The only difference is about the price of the rice, the one party reckoning the average three moras to the pagoda, and the other four. The Hindoos assert that the Christians are the most industrious of all casts, and that therefore they have more rent than any other. The Christians deny this, and say that they have got the name of being industrious, from selling vegetables in Mangalore, and engaging in various occupations; but that the Hindoo landlords, from confining themselves entirely to the cultivation of their lands, render them fully as productive as theirs are; that the Hindoos, though they have more bad land, have also more good, and that the average rent of Hindoo landlords is not, in any one of the five districts contained in the statement, so low as fifty per cent. of the net produce. It was my intention to have procured from every Christian landlord, an account of the produce of every estate which bordered on his own. This would have probably furnished me with the detail of a thousand estates, the average of which might, without any material error, have been taken as that of the districts to which they respectively belonged; but as my removal has prevented me from obtaining this account, I can only attempt to draw a conclusion from such circumstances, tending to throw a light on this subject, as I have hitherto had an opportunity of noticing. From comparing them all, I am inclined to believe that the average rent of landlords is about fifty per cent. of the net produce, in all the districts below the Ghauts, except Mulki, Cundapoor, and Bekul, where it may be from thirty to forty, and Ankalah and part of Honawer, where it is somewhat less.

Any thing like equality of assessment or of produce, can hardly be supposed to exist throughout so extensive a tract of country. The clear rent is in many instances, as low as 15 per cent.; and in many, as high as 80 per cent. of the net produce. The disparities are oftener owing to the different proportions of labour bestowed on the land, than to those of the assessment. Many of those estates which now yield the smallest proportions of rent, were formerly among the most productive. They have fallen into decay from the exactions of nuzzeranahs for the Circar, of fines for pretended or trifling offences, and of presents for an endless succession of asophs and amildars; from the arbitrary and uncertain amount of the different kists; from their frequent anticipations, by which petty land-holders were often compelled to sell or mortgage their estates for the payment of revenue before it was due: from such anticipations being often directed beyond the general rate, against particular landlords, in order to compel them to sell their estates to persons who had bribed the amildars for this purpose; and above all, from the gratuitous services required every year by the Circar. The numerous forts in Canara have each a strong shed running the whole length of the rampart, in order to cover the troops from the weather. These sheds, and all other public buildings, besides the houses of all public servants, having been annually repaired before the setting in of the monsoon, demanded a vast number of labourers, as did likewise the felling of trees among the hills, and transporting them to the beach, for the use of the marine establishment. All these services, were performed by country labourers; and as the more substantial land-holders had usually sufficient influence to get their own exempted, the weight fell wholly upon the lower class, who were often deprived of the cultivation of their lands, at the time they stood in the greatest need of them, for the cultivation of their lands.

As the income of the landlord was affected by these and other temporary causes, the removal of them, will enable it to rise gradually to its former standard; and it is not therefore so necessary that the reduction of what it is likely to be in a few years, present state of income, as by the consideration of the effects of those disorders.

Whether the conclusions I have formed respecting the proportions of income, are just or not, there is one thing certain, that whatever they may be, they do not impede in any way the realization of the revenue; for it has been paid, with a readiness of which I have seen no example. Where balances have appeared in my accounts to stand against particular districts, it was not owing to any failure on the part of the inhabitants, or remitting balances having hindered the revenue servants from carrying on the collections, or what had been collected to the treasury. The regularity of payments is the more remarkable, when it is considered that I have anticipated at least three months, what the period of kists has been, during the last forty years: for the inhabitants, of the Kannee, or of Hyder and Tippee, ever were paid with the old rent, within the year; but the whole was collected separately, in the first three months of the ensuing Fusly. They now make no difficulty in paying both the old rent and additions, before the end of June; not because they are more able than formerly, but because they believe that their readiness in discharging their rents, will not, under the company's government, be regarded as a proof of wealth, or as an argument for laying new impositions upon them.—I am positive not only that the alterations of their kists, has produced no distress; but that their circumstances are improving.—I know it, from having few complaints concerning rent, and more directly, from their own acknowledgment, which ryots very seldom make. I see it, in their cultivating waste lands, and in their taking as provate property, lands which have long been cultivated, on account of the circar. These are lands, which, from having no owners, had been neglected, and which, as the produce had of course decreased, had usually been given at a reduced rent, to different people, for one or more years. The temporary holder could not obtain the proprietary right, without paying a sum of money, which he was unwilling to do: and he could not venture to improve, lest he should be dispossessed in favour of a stranger. As he could gain little, so, on the other hand, he could not lose much; because remissions were granted, on account of bad crops, which was never allowed, in cases where land was private property. When a man agrees to become a proprietor of circar land, he shows, at the same time, a confidence both in the forbearance of government, and in his own means of improvement, because, by the custom of the country, whatever may happen, he has from this moment, no claim to remission. In the district of Cundapoor, circar lands which paid a rent last year of star pagodas 3,071. 15. 8. have this year, been given away in proprietary right, at an annual rent of star pagodas 3,329. 32. 62.; and I have no doubt that all circar lands now in cultivation, may, in the course of two or three years, be disposed of, in the same manner. The facility of collection, and the growing confidence of the landholders, convince me that the settlement of 1209 (1799-1800) might all from failure. But if we aim not merely at the obtaining of a certain sum as revenue, but also at giving a new spirit to agriculture, and raising the country to a pitch of prosperity, beyond what it has ever been in former times, the present assessment must be lowered. Were I certain that in the course of a few years the country would so far recover from the shocks it sustained under the late government, that one half the net produce or landlord's rent would be equivalent to the public revenue, I would propose no reduction, because, from ob- serving the condition of those landlords whom I positively know to be in the possession of half the net produce, and from many conversations with them, I am satisfied that it is fully adequate to every end, not only of present realization, but of future improvement; and that a country moderately improved, the basis of whose assessment should be one-half of the net produce, would, if protected from all other demands, soon pay with one-third, what it had before paid with one-half.

In estimating the rates of reduction, I have thought that many other points were entitled to as much attention as the reka or shist, because I suppose the reka itself to have originally been, like all other assessments, extremely unequal, and that this inequality has been in- creased, in particular districts, by the falsification of accounts. It however deserves consid- eration, as showing what the land-rent formerly has been, as forming a standard to which it may possibly, at some future period, be raised again, and as being regarded by the inhabi- tants, as the only proper foundation of assessment. But, after the many changes that have been wrought by time, it can no longer be implicitly followed as a guide. It is safer to be directed by the present condition of the inhabitants, and of the revenue, with a retrospect to what it has been, for the last twenty years. No guide is so sure as collection. By observing how the land-holders feel under it, many discoveries are made that never would have been suggested by accounts, and which, though they cannot be easily explained by figures, the manager on the spot perceives, have wasted the resources of agriculture, and must have a principal place in his calculation of a permanent revenue.

The only reductions I have made for the present year, are by lowering the land rent $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. and the export customs on rice to 2 bahadry pagodas per corgé, and abolishing the inland duties on grain, cattle, sheep, &c. These are all that are required to serve the end of affording some immediate relief. The remaining reductions of customs may be deferred till the Madras custom regulations are introduced; and of the land rent, till the permanent system is established.

There will be an increase of about 3,000 pagodas to the land rent, from the cultivation of waste, which will diminish in part the reduction of $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent.

My chief reason for remitting the $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. was to convince the landlords that demand is limited; and thereby to encourage them to exert their whole means in improving their estates to the utmost, without any fear of a new assessment. Any further reduction of the export duties on rice, is perhaps unnecessary. It is the only channel through which a com- pensation can be received, for the loss of land-rent; and through which, revenue may rise, in some degree, as the country flourishes: for there is no solid ground to suppose that con- sumption of luxuries, or even of conveniences, will ever yield much revenue in India.

Both the reduction of customs and of land-rent, will eventually benefit the landlord; but they will act, in different ways. A reduction of land-rent will operate, both more directly and more equally, in giving vigour to agriculture, and relieving the poorer class of land- lords, than any reduction of customs could do, because they receive the benefit of it imme- diately, without waiting for the sale of their grain. In this case, too, the benefit is extended equally, in the same proportion to the rich and the poor. But the reduction of the customs is more in favour of the rich than of the poor, because the rich proprietor can always raise a greater quantity of produce on the same extent of land, or in proportion to his rent, than the poor one possibly can do.

Extracts of Report from Collector of NORTHERN DIVISION of CANARA; dated 1st May 1801.

In appropriating the reduction, I have allowed Ankalah the greatest share, because the poverty of its cultivators, and the inferiority of cultivation, compared with Cundapoor or even Honawer, is very conspicuous; and the want of enclosures, so common over all the other parts of Canara, strongly mark its proportion of circar land to private land. Nothing shows the poverty of its cultivators more, than by the number who pay warum for their lands, lands, and by their frequently changing their residence. Owing to the last circumstance, I found some difficulty in procuring renters for villages to become responsible for a money rent, because the cultivation in many villages has hitherto never been the same for two years together. Ankalah certainly possesses a great portion of waste lands, both of that which has been cultivated formerly, and of that which might be brought into cultivation. The latter description, however, appears to me to be of that nature that would require more than ordinary labour and expense to bring it into cultivation. It lies principally at the foot of the hills, which in Ankalah, and a great part of Honawer, do not terminate so abruptly as in the more southerly districts, but spread themselves more out of the bottom. Whilst in that district, I endeavoured to encourage the conversion of circar cultivated lands into private property, rather than the increase of cultivation; for which purpose, at every assembly of ryots, I had the terms fully explained to them, on which they should have their lands as private property, and furnished every shambogue with copies of cowies adapted to their respective moganes.

Though no circar land has been converted into private property, but in Cundapoor, I am hopeful to find many candidates in Ankalah next year, from the pains I took to explain the advantages they would derive from it. I thought this encouragement the more ne- cessary, from observing that the idea of private property in land, did not seem to be regarded by the ryots of that district, with that estimation so common over the rest of Canara. This may have proceeded from the incursions which Ankalah has long been subject to, having tended to destroy all security in land. Major Munro recommends that the con- version of circar into private lands, be not urged on too fast, because the great reduction of the customs, and the security of the company's government, will tend speedily to raise the value of land, and bring forward more candidates, and higher offers, every year. This ob- servation will apply better to the southern than the northern division, because there is so much waste in the latter, that there is little danger of its becoming converted too soon into private property.

The heads of increase exhibited in the different balances of the accompanying state- ment, requires, I believe, no explanation. I wished to have procured the number of ryots in 1209 (1799-1800), but as Major Munro had no time to assemble them, no list was obtained. However, by the reports of the curams, the number of people paying rent to the circar in 1210 (1800-1) are fewer than in 1209. This is not owing to the diminution of the actual number of cultivators, but is caused by the opulence of many landholders taking lands under their own names this year, that were held by their tenants, and of the ease fore. I consider this as a proof of the increasing prosperity of the country, and of the ease with which a permanent settlement may be effected in Canara, from the having so many substantial people as security for its revenue, when the country shall come to be divided into estates. As the point to which the property in Canara is verging, may have an important effect, at the period when the permanent settlement is about to be introduced, I shall notice every year the alterations that may occur among the number of ryots. This partial opu- lence, as it may be termed, of the great landlords, can make no difference to the poorer class, so long as they have it in their option to hold their lands immediately of the circar or of a landlord; and it is evident, by their preferring the latter mode, that it must be the most advantageous to them.

Honawer and Cundapoor are both improving; the decrease in the land-rent of the for- mer is already accounted for. I have not a doubt but the land-rent will rise, in every dis- trict, annually, by an increase of cultivation, because exportation being so much encouraged, by the reduction of the duties upon rice, more of that article will be cultivated and exported. I could perceive, as I went through the country, many little symptoms of improvement, which were not begun the year before; and as the present settlement has been made with so much particularity, I am convinced that there can be but few, who have reason to complain of our assessment.

Extracts of Report from principal Collector of the CANARA; dated 1st July 1801.

By the statement, it appears that the landlords have very little rent to themselves in Barkoor, after discharging the revenue. Tumbuttoo is the most desolate and hilly district of Barkoor; and it is not unlikely that at the period when it lost the greater part of its popula- tion, the land-holders were forced, by the difficulty of procuring labourers, to rent the greatest part of their estates to under-tenants. But even admitting this to be true, it will hardly account for the very great number of those tenants; and there seems therefore to be reason to suspect, that the landlords may in several instances, have instructed their ser- vants to call themselves tenants. Some parts of Korbull, Buntwall, and Karrup, are as thinly inhabited as Tumbuttoo. Their tenants are also pretty numerous; but they do not bear near so high a proportion to the landlords as in that Maganie. In Mangalore, Kittel, and all the best cultivated districts, by much the greatest share of the land is in the hands of the landlords; and this, I imagine, is the case even in Barkoor, nearer the sea. I think it also probable that the chalie guenies, or tenants at will, have been called mul guenies, or tenants by purchase, that is, for ever, because the landlords may get some additional rent from the former, whenever there is a higher offer: but they can get none from the latter, because their rent can be raised only by government, which was seldom done, except at long intervals in former times, when an additional assessment was imposed after a new valuation.

All the land now in cultivation in Canara, and a great deal more, was cultivated many centuries ago. The stability of the tenants, even though at will, encouraged them to improve every every field as much as they could. The rent fixed by the landlord, was calculated upon the produce of several years, while under his own management. These experiments have, in succeeding times, been often repeated; so that every field is now known to the proprietor, generally, by written accounts, and always, by tradition, to be a field of so many moras produce. The landlord scarcely ever rents it below this rate, unless in particular situations, where the scarcity of labourers leaves him no alternative; he has therefore no ground to look for any additional rent, from an increase of produce. He can only obtain it, either by advancing money to the tenant, or giving him cowls, to enable him to make a plantation of cocoa-nut, or some other kind of trees. He may, likewise, sometimes gain a trifling additional rent, by the tenant levelling a few spots on the side of a hill.

Besides the mul gueny, or tenant by purchase, there is, in some parts of Canara, and particularly in Barkoor, another species of tenants for ever, called the nair gueny. The origin of this tenancy, is, by some, derived from the tenants having held of the nairs, who were, in ancient times, masters of the country: but the more common opinion derives it from agricultural services, which gave the right of ploughing; the word nair signifying a plough: and, in this way, it corresponds, in some degree, to the description, which has sometimes been given of the socage tenure. The nair mul gueny, as it is usually called, is both a more ancient and more secure tenure than the other, properly denominated shud mul gueny, or, tenure by simple purchase. In this last case, when the descent to heirs, is not particularly specified, there are instances of the landlords resuming the farm, on the death of the tenant; but he is never allowed to retain it, unless where he is supported by the revenue servants.

In the Oloor village, there are some few mul guenies, or tenants by purchase, or gift, for ever, but by far the greater, and indeed, nearly the whole in that and the other four villages, which I apprehend are chaly guenies, or tenants at will. It is often difficult to define, which is which. The landlords all declare they are chaly guenies, because they look forward to increasing their rents. The tenants again declare they are mul guenies, because their rents can be raised only by government. Mul gueny tenures have been created after, by purchase; in which case, a deed is always entered into by the parties, often from the landlord's friendship to his relations, and often in cases where tenants have offered to pay a higher rent for a mul gueny tenure. In the latter case, deeds are generally entered into, as also in the second, but oftener not. Under the late government, so many villanies were practised by, forcing title deeds from persons, that those having them, frequently buried them, or laid them by, in some place where time destroyed them. Those only who have deeds, or who can prove their tenure, should be admitted as mul guenies.

From every information I have been able to obtain, the number of mul guenies in Canara, is very small. Indeed, by a statement of the population of the country, I have lately made, the total number of that class is 4,886, of which there are only 219 in the Barkoor talook; while the number in the Bekeil talook, which comprizes a part of ancient Malabar, amounts to 4,436.

Canara is so particularly circumstanced, that a tolerable correct estimate of its gross produce, may be formed from its known population, consumption, and exportation. The first, we know from last year's accounts, on which, I shall calculate; the second may be estimated pretty correctly by the first, and from a knowledge that the lowest class of people in the country, eat rice only; and the latter is accurately recorded.

By the revenue statement, last year, the population, in men, women, and children, was 396,672 resident inhabitants. The general average consumption, from the best informed people, is at least one bany, of 78 rupees weight, per diem per head; at which rate, the consumption per day, would be corg 224. 36. and per annum, 82,072. 36. In consideration, however, of several thousand Bramins leaving the country for a few months every year, to go to the Tripetty pagoda, and other religious places of worship, though the number coming from above the ghants to Wooqui, Soobramany, and other pagodas in Canara, is also great; yet wishing to be rather low in my calculation, I have taken the consumption of one-half of the inhabitants at a bany per day, and the remainder, at half a bany; which reduces the before-mentioned quantity one-fourth, or to per diem 168 corg 27 moras, or, per annum

Average exportation 4,00,000 moras	-	-	-	-	61,554	27
Seed, or per col. 2, in No. 1, and the quantity sown in 2d and 3d crops	-	-	-	-	9,323	34
Consumption for troops, followers, &c. at 3,000 heads, at one bany per day	-	-	-	-	11,438	—
	-	-	-	-	6,207	—
Total corg	-	-	-	-	88,723	19

This quantity is less than that before calculated on by the shist, by 1,870. 31; more than which, I am confident, is consumed by the crews of the many hundred vessels, which touch at the different ports, in the course of the season, and many of which lay there for two and three months together.

Every person must, in a great measure, be guided, in calculations of this sort, by the best obtainable accounts; but there are other circumstances, which the manager on the spot, and he only can judge, from what may justify him in forming a more correct idea of the resources

This has been my case, in the present instance; though obliged to calculate from the best accounts I could obtain, yet I knew, from general observation, and from a serious reflection on the actual state of things, that those accounts were considerably under-rated; and before examining my own idea with any other correspondent data, I calculated the accounts were deficient, in the rates mentioned in paragraph 10; the gross produce in rice, in col. 6, of No. 1, is - 69,522 9 31 1/2 To which, add 25 per cent. deficiency, that is, 17 in the quantity of seed - 19,635 23 18 1/2 sown, or land cultivated, and 8 in the produce per mora - 89,177 33 7 1/2

Total produce, with supposed deficiency - 1,416. 16. 1/2, equal to less than the calculation of produce by the shist.—Consumption, &c. 1,416. 16. 1/2, equal to about 1 per cent. more. Inaccurate as all calculation of gross produce with the shist, in an actual survey and valuation, yet, in comparing the supposed produce with the shist, in the first place, and then with the consumption of, and exportation from, the country, and finding each to correspond so nearly with the other, I feel a confidence in hazarding a belief, that it is thereby as nearly ascertained, as it would have been, supposing it to be so; and the value of the 90,594. 8, the estimated produce at the average rate of the ten talooks in col. 7, of No. 1, would amount to star pagodas 14,88,387. 6; at this rate, the gross circular land tax, including what is collected by enaumdars, would be equal to but 21 per cent. of the gross produce valuation, in rice only, and the ryots would have their garden produce besides.

Another circumstance, affording a correspondent proof of the truth of the conclusions I have drawn, is worthy of mention. Hurry Hur Roy's rekah on every 70 moras of paddy, was only 74 moras, which was supposed to yield one pagoda, and at that rate, was only about 10 per cent. of the gross produce: allowing, therefore, the present land tax to be double the ancient shist, after all deductions from rekah, or to be star pagodas 2,48,489. 32. 76, this equals about 20 per cent. of what was then supposed the gross produce, and nearly correspondent with the per-centage in the foregoing paragraph;—the difference between this sum, and the land tax entered in col. 29, of No. 1, is star pagodas 64,105. 29. 24; this sum, however, is no addition whatever to the shist, but arises from the resumed enaum land-rent by Hyder and Tippoo, as also, from the melwassy that has lately been discovered. The enaums, it must be remembered, were included in the rekah, but deducted from the shist, on which I have made my calculations. Whatever credit may be due to the data here brought forward, we may rest satisfied, from the unequalled punctuality of its payment, from the few people under collection, from their generally improving state in their mode of dress and living; and, above all, from few, or no complaints, I may say, of the heaviness of assessment, that the present land rent is, generally, low enough to afford the inhabitants the means of making every needful improvement in the agricultural and general state of the country.

The advantages they have already received from the mild and liberal principles of the Company's government, would enable its landlords now to pay a tax with ease, which, under the violent restrictions and universal corruption of the last government, they could not do; and the progress of improvement, though they may even increase in extent, frequently decrease in proportion to the produce of land.—Canara, for instance, from the uninterrupted security she now enjoys, from the possession of freedom and the security of property, could better afford to pay the accumulated assessment imposed during the late government, than she could, what was collected under it.—In the first place, the landlords, from the rise in the price of rice, and every other grain or garden produce they cultivate, can pay their rent now from a much smaller portion of their gross produce, while the remainder yields them a larger sum than heretofore, in consequence of the trade being thrown open, are to be had much cheaper than under the two last, or even the Bednore government.—It may, beside the dearth of the greatest necessary of life, necessarily drawn, with its dearth of labour and all other wants, and that consequently the landlord's other expenses may be expected to increase in proportion to his profit from the rise in the price of the gross produce of his land; Canara, however, is so peculiarly situated, that it may be partly owing to this.—Every necessary but cloth, the country produces, and its rice is so way suffer this inconvenience; the wants of the people are certainly so few, that it may be bought after from every quarter, that the inhabitants have no occasion whatever, to be at the trouble of sending it to foreign markets, or seeking custom.—Foreign merchants even come and beg it of them; and these people seldom coming with empty vessels, it happens that much more of the people's cloth than is necessary, is brought into the country, than can be expended, and thence they can buy it frequently at prime cost, or at a very moderate increase thereon.—The natural rise in the nominal price of labour, indeed, caused by that in the price of rice, in few cases, affects the landlords, all of whom have a number of dairds or slaves, by whom they cultivate their lands;—the wages of labour are, in most common cases of husbandry, confined to a full sufficiency for the food and clothing of the labourer:—when it is paid in money, there must of course be a nominal rise, in proportion to that of the quantity, of food or clothing: the labourer can purchase these, with what remains, nearly the same in every change. When the labourer is fed from the produce of the soil, and clothed, as in Canara, by their masters, their real wages are the same, from one generation to another; though the nominal value of what they receive for their sustenance, may be greater one year than another, as some quantities of rice per day, and of cloth per annum, are given to every labourer now, as was customary from the earliest ages; and the landlords have the advantage of being able to purchase cloth now, considerably cheaper than at any former period; they have also more frequent opportunities, from the increasing demand for labour, of letting out such of their slaves as they have not in employ themselves. The instruments of husbandry are so simple in India, that they can scarcely be reckoned on; but cattle are something cheaper than in the Bydgnugger government. To every maganny there are village artificers, barbers, washermen, &c. to whom the landlord pays a certain quantity of grain per annum: this is not now increased to the landlords, though it is, in value, to the workmen; and is as an increase of pay. To them, money is rendered less valuable, in proportion to the smallness of the quantity of the greatest necessary of life, a given sum can command: but no other alteration in its value, has happened since the time of fixing the rekah; a coin, of similar weight to the Bahadry pagoda, was then in use, and of the same value, with respect to the other real or nominal coins of the country, as now.

Nearly all the waste lands of Canara, are lying close under the range of ghauts; which tract has, for more than a century, been continually plundered, and many of its inhabitants carried off, or murdered, by some rebellious chieftain or other, and the remainder reduced to a state of extreme indigence; and I fear it must naturally, therefore, take a considerable time, ere those few can acquire the means and confidence to extend their cultivation, or others can be induced to go and take lands in that quarter. All along the sea coast, as much land as ever was, is now in cultivation with paddy, and much more than ever was before known, converted into gardens. The number of lands, by the present, is greater than by the last general revenue statement, which is a proof how good and secure a property land is now considered. Under the late government, it was customary for persons to purchase and hold lands in the name of some opulent inhabitants, which gave a sort of security, and prevented any wretch, by bribing an asoph, or otherwise, from wresting it from him. Numerous landlords, in this and such like situations, have now come forward and proved their own right of inheritance, which shows they have no small confidence in the government under which they are placed.

I have before observed, that till the conquests by Hyder, land was universally sold at the average of ten years purchase of the net rent, and that any bought for more or less, was considered an invalid transaction. The industry of the people, however, in the course of a number of years, has so much increased the rents of some, and the oppression of government, so reduced those of other estates, that there are many now, not saleable; but those that are, fetch from ten to sixteen years purchase.

From general observation, I am inclined to think that, in the aggregate, the landlords may get about 18 per cent. and the under-tenants, 57 or 58, leaving the remainder, or 24 or 25 per cent. of the gross produce, as the land tax. In Mangalore, Polor, Buatwall, and Vettul talooks, however, I apprehend the landlords enjoy from 60 to 70 per cent. of their net rent, while their under-tenants also enjoy a large proportion of the gross produce. In most of the villages bordering on the range of the ghauts, or more than 20 miles inland, in proportion to its produce, land lets for considerably more than on the sea coast. Its distance from the place of export, may, in some measure, account for this; but it is otherwise to be attributed to an extraordinary indulgence the landlords found it necessary to afford their tenants, to induce them to remain in such jungly and unhealthy situations. In many cases, also, they have found it necessary to grant them moolgucny tenures, i. e. tenants for ever, at a fixed rent. This species of tenure, is nearly as good as a freehold. It descends from father to son, and from uncles to nephews, as the law of the inhabitants may be, from one generation to another. A tenant can in no case be ousted, but for non-payment of rent; and even in this case, not till he has been fully recompensed by his landlord, for every lasting improvement he may have made to the land. A tenant without heirs, may bequeath his tenure to any person he pleases; the general custom, however, where there is no issue, is, to adopt a son, or nephew, as successor, who has every claim the father or uncle had, with the consent of the landlord: he can also sell his property in such lands; and the purchaser stands in every way in the same respect towards the landlord as he did. Some tenures of this sort, are purchased, others are not; in the former case, in the event of the tenant's wishing, at any time, to give up his land, he may do so, and the landlord is bound to reimburse him for every lasting improvement made to the lands; as also, to refund any consideration he may have received at the time of granting tenure. The tenants may also have their under-tenants, or challi guenies, who hold in every way as challi guenies under land-holders. Any failure on the part of a moolgucny (under-tenant), is in no case a plea for keeping his superior landlord in arrear of his rent.

There are challi guenies, or tenants at will, who, by courtesy, have become tenants in perpetuity; these are such, as have held lands of a superior landlord for two generations or more;—in some cases, indeed, it has been extended to those who have held 50 years, and who, with the consent of the superior, have at different times made expensive improvements to their lands, or have levelled, or brought others into cultivation. Such lands are generally supposed to descend from father to son, for ever, at the original rent agreed on. The superior has the right, either to raise his rent, or oust his tenant; but it is universally considered a stretch of power, so unjust and illiberal, that it is seldom or ever resorted to; at any rate, before it can be done, the tenant must be reimbursed in full for all lasting improvements. This custom, indeed, which is also extended by right to all tenants at will for a year, even making improvements with the consent of their landlord, and, by courtesy, to those making them without his knowledge, is the grand fundamental system and prop of the Canara agricultural system, and is well worthy of imitation, either in other parts of India, or Europe. It alone may be said to have been the cause of half the land in Canara being brought into and kept in cultivation. On

On the death of any landlord, his successor is obliged, by usage, to observe all engagements he may have made, either with challi or mool guenies.

The rents of some tenants are paid in money, others, in grain, but at a fixed quantity; the former gain, in proportion as the value of the rice rises, because a smaller quantity of that article, will yield them the amount of their rent than heretofore the latter would gain if the price of rice was to fall lower than it was at the time their rent was fixed; but now they neither gain or lose, though their landlords gain, in proportion as the price of the commodity they pay in rises. These circumstances, also that of the number of challi and mool guenies under each landlord, are matters, which should have their weight in the consideration of any new permanent settlement, which may be ordered; as the rent of mool guenies can in no case be increased, in proportion to the value of rice, or otherwise. When it is paid in money, it follows, that all additional assessments, hitherto made, or to come, have fallen, and must fall, on their landlords alone. This has been the chief cause of every ease they can wish for. Those landlords, however, whose lands are farmed to challi, or tenants at will, have the option of raising their rent, either by commutating a money rent for one in kind, or by raising either, in proportion to the price of rice. I have not been able to ascertain the portions of each species of tion to the price of rice. I have not been able to ascertain the portions of each species of tenants, though I know the tenants at will are three times more numerous than the tenants for ever; all the latter originally held by some written agreement; where it remains, there can be no doubt of the validity of the tenure, which seems to have been granted only in ancient times, or in cases of landlords bringing a large tract of the country into cultivation, when they seem to have thought it necessary to grant such indulgences to new ryots. As, however, it has not been customary to grant new agreements on the decay of old ones, it happens that few ancient deeds can be produced, and the landlords, well aware of the advantage they will derive from converting a mool to a challi gueny, deny the authenticity of any copy they may keep, while the originals have generally been granted too long ago, to be proved. On the other hand, all challi guenies who have held more than a generation, urged long possession, as a proof of their mool gueny tenure; all who have held at one fixed rent for fifty years, might be decided such, and all under that period, as liable to be ousted; there would be no hardship in this, for it is reasonable to suppose that no landlords, especially pressed as they were, under the late government, would allow a tenant at will to cultivate a portion of his land at one certain rent for fifty years together, while his land tax to government was annually increasing.

When the rent of a landlord trenches upon the sum required for the necessary subsistence of the tenants, his failure will soon be equal, not only to the sum which is required to be deducted from that set aside for his maintenance, but to a much greater one; because, as he can now both pay his landlord's rent, and maintain himself only by diminishing the usual and necessary expenses of cultivation, the produce will also lessen and sink, at least to a half or third of its former amount, when his failure becomes irremediable, and the landlord's loss much greater than the original increase of rent. When the government land tax trenches on the landlord's net rent, in the same way, the same consequences must ensue; and to prevent the land tax so doing, the only effectual way is, to define a tenure and rent for the under-tenants of landlords, by which that of government can be regulated. Under-tenants holding in the state of security they do in Canara, carry improvement to the greatest possible extent: they are always able to pay their rent regularly to their superior, which enables him to do so likewise to government; the ensuring also, in this way, the high cultivation of the lands by under-tenants, in the event of a failure on the part of the landlords to government, his estates will always meet a ready and advantageous sale.

Extracts from REPORT of Collector of Northern Division of CANARA; dated 25th April 1802.

CIRCAR Lands, from the want of owners, are never so well cultivated as they would be, were they private; besides, they are, in general, worse situated in Canara for retaining water. A large reduction was therefore made by Major Munro, during his first settlement, to enable their cultivators to bestow more labour upon them; and the sum entered in column 5, is the increase in consequence. In columns 12 and 15, the greatest part of the increase appearing in the Cundapoor district, arises from false accounts having been detected. I have made no decrease column opposite to No. 8. in the increase, because there is no reason for restoring the full amount collected under that head. As much as necessary, only, will be returned; so that it is for the advantage of government to resume all remissions of this nature which, for several years past, has been literally a reduction of land-rent; for the same bank cannot be supposed to burst, or be overflowed, every year successively.

I now perceive I was too sanguine in expecting that the number of landlords, or rather proprietors, would be considerably increased this year. I naturally imagined, that as the ryots became more acquainted with our government, and, finding that their rents were not risen beyond the point they must have expected, that they would endeavour to secure the right of possession to their land, by demanding a sannud of the circar; but it has been proved by enquiries made during the course of the survey, that many of the mool guenies, or tenants for ever, are, in many respects, better off than the landlords: indeed, while rice is dear, as it has lately been, there can be no doubt of their being so. I likewise did not consider that the mool guenies, in order to become proprietors, must necessarily relinquish the lands they have so long cultivated, in order to occupy new, unless their landlords would consent to alienate such portion of their estates as was occupied by tenantry, in consideration of a nuzzeranah, or present: but land is too eagerly coveted in Canara, for us to expect that. The mool guenies are, in every sense, proprietors: but, as they hold their lands of landlords, the circar cannot interfere in their rent. Revenue may lose something, by their being so; but mool gueny has become a proprietor of circar land this year. Some of the circar guenies, or tenants at will, may occasionally desert their landlords, and become proprietors; but I conclude, that the increase of private estates in future, will chiefly arise from the affluence of some landlords enabling them to extend their old estates.

The sum in column 12 is owing to false representations of the ryots being detected: that in column 13 is the total avowed amount of melwassi enjoyed by the bramins of Cundipore for Fusly 1210 (1800-1) which is paid back in the column 23: but that in column 14 is newly discovered melwassi, and for which I am chiefly indebted to the vigilance of the Kham Was-sool and his gomastahs. The sums in the decrease columns, being occasioned by the reverse reasons to those in the increase, require no particular explanation.

This statement, from its intimate connection with the land-rent, has occupied by far the greatest share of my attention. I shall, therefore, defer mentioning the customs till the close of this letter, beginning with the principles on which the current year's settlement has been made.

As it was necessary to determine some point within myself, to which the rent of lands should be raised, that have had a portion of their rent excused lately, from various causes, in order to bring up the value of the depressed estates to the general level, I circulated the following Hukumnama among the aumildars, to serve as a guide in levying an additional assessment on the inhabitants this year; subject, however, to such alterations, as I might deem necessary on reaching the different districts.

1st. All those assessed at the full rent on the shist, with all its additions, to remain fixed, provided their ability is sufficient to discharge that rent punctually.

2d. In increasing rents this year, not to demand more than the rent of Hyder, and three-fourths of the additional assessments.

3d. In assessing lands newly cultivated, not to exact more than three fanams per pagoda this year, three the next, and four the year after.

4th. Lands paying the Bednore rent only, not to have more than one-fourth of the additional assessment laid on them this year.

5th. In assessing lands for which the owner had a cowle, to follow the rules contained in it.

My principal reason for circulating the above rules, was to guard against too sudden a demand of the whole or full rent, wishing to be the judge myself how far the cultivators could afford that rent or not; and the third clause is to prevent checking improvements; for if every field, newly brought into cultivation, was to be taxed according to its produce the very first year, it would discourage the landlords greatly. I hope the propriety of the above few rules will appear obvious; for to burthen those with the rent of Tippoo who never paid it before, and whose low rent, at present, has most probably been counterbalanced by the high nuzzerana, or purchase money, paid in consequence, would not only be incompatible with the permanent system, but would be carrying our rent much higher than government would desire to see it. After having determined the rent of each district, with the consent of the inhabitants, I always allowed a couple of hundred pagodas to be left in reserve, either to be collected or not, as circumstances happened towards the close of the Fusly, and advising the aumildar to be attentive in his collections from those who paid above 7 Rs of the extra assessment. In assessing the maganics situated near the foot of the Ghauts, I was careful not to exact too heavy a rent from the cultivators; and am happy to observe, that a great deal of extra cultivation has been brought to account this Fusly. An easy land-rent, for several years, will be the surest means of increasing the cultivation in those maganics, and counterbalance the inconvenience they must sustain in the disposal of their produce, by their distance from the sea.

Being resolved to ascertain, as correctly as I could, the various rates of rent paid by the inhabitants of the Northern Division, in order to form a standard for every district, deduced from the average rent paid by each, I have shown in the accompanying Statement, the number of people paying all the gradations of rent, from the simple shist to the whole of the additional assessments, by entering the rents under the class to which they approached the nearest, and which I conceive to be sufficiently minute to form a general idea of the land rent of any particular district. This statement is useful to me in many respects, but particularly in showing the ability of the cultivators below the Ghauts; for the Board will perceive that the land-rent is lighter, the further north it goes. Major Munro was so sensible of the difference between the districts of Honawer and Ankalah, and those situated to the southward of the Cundipore river, in point of fertility and population, that in the cowles granted to their inhabitants, the terms vary twice in Honawer, and three times in Ankalah. It also enables me to state with greater confidence, the plan I have in contemplation for assessing my division, the ensuing Fusly.

The rents of every individual having been adjusted this year with the utmost particularity (for they were almost all pronounced by myself) and having every reason to believe that the rents of old estates are not only sufficiently high, but incapable of bearing any addition, addition, without discouraging all improvements, it is my intention, during my next circuit, to demand no increase which does not arise from the following causes, viz. newly-discovered melwassi land, the rents of which may have been concealed from the knowledge of the district cutcherries; circar waste cultivated, and waste upon estates; and in demanding rent from those heads, not to exceed the following standard or proportion of the additional assessments of each district; viz.

Cundipore	-	-	-	-	-	75 per Ct.
Honawer	-	-	-	-	-	50.
Ankalah	-	-	-	-	-	35.
Goobah	-	-	-	-	-	25.
Soondah	-	-	-	-	-	30.
Bunwassee	-	-	-	-	-	30.
Belghi	-	-	-	-	-	30.

And I shall give my reasons for each, in a few words.

The district of Cundipore is evidently much more populous and higher cultivated than either Honawer or Ankalah. Its chief seaport is more frequented than any other in Canara, except Mangalore. It exports the greatest quantity of rice, is situated directly opposite Nuggur ghaut, and commands a portion of the trade to and from Mysore, which may be expected to increase; and it is in Major Munro's opinion, as well as my own, the one of all others, capable of bearing the highest assessment. Honawer is in the next best condition below the Ghauts, and produces, besides rice, a large quantity of pepper and beetle nut; but its chief drawback is a thinness of population. Ankalah is, in the worst condition; contains less inhabitants, more overrun with jungle, and possesses fewer private estates than any district in Canara. In the northern part especially, they have little idea of landed property, except in gardens; and the whole of that district bears a great resemblance to Soondah. Soopa is the most jungly desolate district above the Ghauts, and produces very little pepper and beetle compared to Soondah, Bunwassee, or Belghi, which appear to me to be much the same in capability. Bunwassee is obviously the most open, and the best cultivated with rice lands, but not gardens.

By adopting the standard I have proposed upon those now paying a low rent, there would only be occasion to alter the rent of 4,097 individuals next year, instead of 8,652; the number remaining fixed in each district would then be as follows, and would increase greatly, every year:

	Total No of Cultivators in 1211.	To remain fixed in 1212.	To alter in 1212.
Cundipore	2,372	1,881	491
Honawer	4,065	3,429	636
Ankalah	3,711	2,600	1,021
Soopah	4,087	2,924	1,163
Soondah	1,056	688	368
Bunwassee	1,027	890	137
		15,466	4,097

As the Board, in their proceedings on the settlement of 1210, have observed, "That the revenue will annually improve, not by an enhancement of the assessment, but by giving confidence that it will not be raised," they may probably conceive that I have deviated from the above rule, when I ought not to have done so. The moderate increase in columns 2 and 3 of Statement 2, will, however, take away all blame from me of that nature: for a moderate land-rent has ever been, in my mind, the surest spring of encouragement, and without which, a country can seldom improve. I know the Board would be most pleased to find my annual increase arising from the conversion of circar lands into private estates, and the cultivation of arable waste; but had I added no other increase to my present year's jummahundy, but what arose from those heads, the addition would have been very small indeed, and might have led you to suppose that a very different management obtained, in the northern division. It may safely be concluded, that, before any considerable portion of circar waste land can be brought into cultivation, the northern division must receive either a great addition of inhabitants, or a sensible increase to the wealth of the present number; because I conceive that abundance of waste lands are still to be found upon estates, especially in Honawer and Ankalah.

From the accompanying Survey Statements, it appears that Belghi is the lightest assessed in gardens, and Bunwassee in rice lands; and it is fortunate for the inhabitants of the latter district, that it is so, for a very large proportion of it, is totally unfit for gardens. Major Munro

Munro supposes that the difference of customs being more in Belghi than in Soondah, prevents the cultivators in the former, from demanding so high a price for their produce; consequently to cause the profits in both districts, to be pretty equal; however, I am apt to suppose, notwithstanding the double duty in Belghi, that gardens are more valuable there than in Soondah, because the demand for the whole produce of the country is such (unless in times of disturbances) that I imagine the actual difference of the price is not so great as he conceived it. With regard to assessing Belghi the same as Soondah, it would undoubtedly be wrong to attempt it, because the amount that would be lost, by a diminution of the customs, would far exceed any gain in the land-rent. Even before the survey took place, I foresaw that the rent of rice lands in Belghi was very high, from the number who paid full rent; and I, therefore, added little or nothing to their cultivators this year, that I might make the assessment every where as equal as I could. I shall hereafter furnish your Board with a comparison between the rents of paddy fields and gardens above and below the Ghauts, by forwarding certain queries to Mr. Ravenshaw, to be returned to me. I can draw no comparison at present between the rents of this country and the Baramahl, from the want of correct averages of the latter; however, I believe it is well known that the rents here are much lower.

That they are sufficiently low throughout Soondah and Belghi, I am thoroughly convinced of, since my residence above the Ghauts; were they otherwise, I should certainly have had some convincing proof of it, before now. But of the complainants who came before me, not one in fifty was about their rent; they chiefly relate to debts, and petty transactions among themselves; very few are concerning land, which proves, I think, incontestibly, that the people are contented with the present assessment; and also, that land is not valuable above, as it is below the Ghauts. There are also certain leading points by which the person entrusted with the management of a country can judge of the wealth or poverty of its inhabitants; and the following, as they differ so much from what I have seen, or expected to have met with, deserve to be noticed:—First, the ease with which the settlement of every district is annually effected;—secondly, from their great litigiousness in points concerning land compared to any others, is a sure sign of its value, whatever may be the rent paid for it;—and, thirdly, from frequent indirect acknowledgements of their present comfortable state, corroborated by the opinion of my own cutcherry, who are most of them, natives of Canara;—and lastly, from there being scarcely a single town of any consequence, in which there are not a few new houses, and other signs of improvement, to be met with annually. I, therefore, do not hesitate to assert that the present year's settlement of the land-rent is a moderate one, throughout the Northern division; the amount of which will be realized in a few weeks more, with ease and certainty; and that it is by no means, above the abilities of its inhabitants.

Extracts from Mr. THACKERAY'S Report; dated 4th August 1807.

THE greater part of the lands in Canara are private property. The former, and present state of private property, has been so amply discussed by Major Munro, that it leaves me little to say on the subject. Original inscriptions on stone and copper prove the antiquity of this venerable institution. They consist of grants of ancient princes to pagodas, &c. granting the land-tax derivable from certain lands and villages; thus transferring the land-tax from the treasury, to the individual grantee: but the property in the soil was not granted, because not possessed or claimed by the prince, when he gave the absolute property in the soil; the sunnud expressly mentions the previous purchase of the right.

Although black books, papers, leaves, or even copper-plates, are often forged; yet these inscriptions, so generally found, could not have been forged; yet these are unquestionable evidence to the antiquity and validity of the institution.

The black books, however, are very curious records; and as inscriptions, black books, tradition, annual settlements, and revenue accounts, all concur to show what the ancient land tax was; to show that it was light and fixed, they show that the lands were private property. The sunnuds, and inscriptions on stones and copper, are to be found, in every part of Canara; in every pagoda; they, together with the revenue accounts, the black books, tradition, and the state of the country, afford undeniable proof of the antiquity of the institution. A complete investigation of these ancient inscriptions, would throw great light on the former state of the country, perhaps of the ancient history of India. The different princes of Bednore, Bijjanuggur, and even Mysore, never seem to have questioned the general rights of the people, though an arbitrary assessment, and individual acts of oppression, may have rendered some private estates less valuable.

The power to sell and mortgage lands, all along exercised by the landholders in Canara; the readiness of others to buy or take them, in pledge; show that the people at large, have a good opinion of the validity of the title. This practice prevails, indeed, in those provinces, where the cirkar is proprietor; but it is not so, in general. The culture they have bestowed on the land, shows that they confided that government would respect their rights; indeed this culture, as it has chiefly rendered the lands valuable, gives them a right in them, according to the general principles of natural justice. The attachment which they show to their estates, is a proof of the validity of their titles; and the rules which exist for the sale and mortgage and lease of land, show that it has been long private property. It may be said, that original grants conferring the rights of property to the primitive grantees, should should be produced, that it should be shown what prince originally granted the land to individuals; but it may be answered, that perhaps in no country, at least in no country long settled and civilized, do such original grants or title deeds exist. The sovereign may have granted away escheated estates, or unclaimed lands, and such grants are to be found in Canara, and in Europe; but if the rights of individual proprietors at large, were traced up, or rather if private rights in certain lands were traced up, they would soon be lost in antiquity; and prescription would be found, the general original title. Deeds transferring land are to be found in Canara, and in England; grants conferring cirkar lands are forthcoming, in both countries; but perhaps, in neither country, original grants or deeds conferring or establishing the primitive right in private property in the soil, could be found; for they most likely, never existed. A man cultivated a certain field—mixed his labour with the soil—and in process of time, obtained a title, by prescription, which is the best of all titles. Indeed, no person who has seen Canara, or considered the subject, can doubt the antiquity and validity of the titles of the Canara landlords; and any government that should attempt to overturn it, would act like the French government when it confiscated the private estates of the nobility and church.

The land is frequently pledged; and is, generally speaking, deeply incumbered. One species of mortgage is, when the land is merely pledged, and the deeds and papers relating to it, are put into the hands of the mortgagee. This transaction is termed Torradhi. In this case, the mortgagee merely receives a quantity of rice equal to the interest due on his loan; but has no interference in the management of the estate. When it happens that the proprietor, not only being unable to pay the principal, also fails to pay the interest regularly, he is obliged to make over the land itself to the mortgagee, who takes possession, and becomes a fixed tenant, manages the estate, and pays the land tax; however, on receiving the full amount of his debt, he must deliver up the land. This transaction is termed Bhogyalhi, or pledge in possession; and is the more common kind of mortgage. Rules exist for the redemption of the land, and adjustment of the accounts. The proceeds of the estate, and the improvements which have been made, are usually settled by an arbitration. The general use of pledging land, renders the sale of it, less common; however, notwithstanding the aversion felt at totally alienating their ancient patrimony, there are many instances of actual sale. Land generally sells for from eight to twelve years purchase money, on the clear rent; near Bekul, they said, it only sold for four years purchase; though they admitted that they got about half the rent clear; that is, money laid out in the purchase of land, ought to bring ten or twelve per cent. interest. The inequality of the land-tax, and the distance from great towns, perhaps, makes the value of land, vary; in some places, it is not saleable. In some cases, estates bought ninety or a hundred years ago, for a considerable sum, would not, as the owners say, sell at all now, on account of the extra assessment which has been laid on, since the purchase. The land-tax is heavier than in the northern parts of Malabar, and land is perhaps more commonly mortgaged, which seem to be the causes of the higher price at which it is sold, in Malabar.

Land is leased to tenants at will, or to fixed tenants. The tenants at will usually pay a certain quantity of rice, or sometimes money, upon the quantity of seed supposed to be required to sow the land. The lands are classed into first, second, and third sort; and each field is reckoned and called a field of so many morahs. Though the proprietors have power to turn out or raise the rents of the tenants at will, they seldom do so, but go on content with the customary rent. The rent lies between one-fourth and one-third of the gross produce; but in general, near one-half, I should imagine seldom more than one half, seldom less than one third. Hands and stock are scarce; as the country gets more populous, rents may be raised.

The fixed tenants are a kind of sub-proprietors, and are, in some respects, more independent than the proprietors from whom they hold. Major Munro has described the two tenures of Nair Moolgueni, and Shud Moolgueni; so that I need say little on the subject. These fixed tenants, sometimes again let out their estates, to tenants at will. If the fixed tenants die without heirs, the land reverts to the original proprietor. The landlord and tenant sometimes dispute about the nature of the tenure, the landlord asserting, that he is merely a tenant at will; the tenant contending, that he is a fixed tenant; and the general loss of deeds and written documents renders it a doubtful question. The jealousy which must exist to produce these kind of disputes between landlord and tenant, would afford one way of ascertaining the rent. Few moolguenis, or fixed tenants, have, it is said, been created since the Company's government. This is attributed, by the collector, to their confidence in our government;—this is one cause; and the increasing stock of the landlord, which enables him to cultivate more of his own estate, is perhaps another. The moolguenis, or fixed tenants, have not been obliged to contribute any thing when the proprietor has been extra assessed: however, I should think that they ought to contribute in the same manner, in proportion to the value of their estates. On the whole, the state of landed property is nearly to find its level on the fixed tenants. The property in the soil rests in individuals, or rather in the same, in both these provinces. Transfers, mortgages, and successions to lands, are generally regulated on the same principles, and by similar rules, except where violence may have rendered property less valuable, or the different rules of cast and place, may occasion different customs. Land is valuable valuable in proportion to the clear rent, and loses its value when the land-tax comes to absorb the whole rent. Under the Mysore government, few landlords chose to pay the full extent of their property, and some part was held in the name of a relation. Some private lands are held in the name of pagodas, because church lands are favoured; and some lands were held in the name of one person, who managed for several co-partners; and some lands were held by the revenue servants, under feigned names, to avoid suspicion.

The great difference between the land in these two provinces, and those in other provinces, is, that here, it is vested in individuals;—there, in communities. The villages above the Ghauts are like corporations, communities, municipalities, republics, who are the proprietors of the whole lands of the villages; at least, they and the sarkar share the quantities of property between them. They have cleared and cultivated the village lands, time out of mind; and there is none but the sarkar who can claim any share in the property from them. The village community only wants a fixed land-tax, which shall leave them some part of the rent, to become joint proprietors of the village lands: they are at present, however, only common tenants, because, in most places, the government draws the whole landlord's rent. If the government exacted the whole rent from Canara and Malabar, the present proprietors would not be common, but individual tenants.

From the earliest times to the middle of the fourteenth century, the land was assessed at a quantity of rice equal to the quantity of paddy supposed to be necessary to sow it; so that a field which required 10 kandies of paddy to sow it, paid a land-tax of 10 kandies of rice, which was paid in either money or kind.

Between the years 1324 and 1347, Hurrehur Roy, king of Bijanuggur, made a new assessment, on the principle laid down in the shaster, where the produce is supposed to be to the seed as 12 to 1. Agreeably to this computation, he supposed that $2\frac{1}{2}$ katties of seed yielded thirty katties of paddy, which he divided as follows:

To the landlord	- - - - -	$7\frac{1}{2}$ or 25 per cent.
To the labourer	- - - - -	15. or 50 per cent.
To the sarkar	- - - - -	$7\frac{1}{2}$ or 25 per cent.

and still following the shaster, he divided the sarkar share as follows:

To the sarkar 1-6th of the gross, or	- - - - -	5
To churches 1-30th of the gross	- - - - -	1
To Brahmins 1-20th	- - - - -	$1\frac{1}{2}$
	- - - - -	$7\frac{1}{2}$

This settlement was concluded upon a rough estimate of the quantity of seed usually sown, and it remained without any alteration, till the country was transferred to the Bednore government about the middle of the seventeenth century; the Bednore government had levied an additional 50 per cent., and in 1660 the Bijanuggur and Bednore assessment together, formed the shist or standard, which amounted,

In Canara	- - - - -	2,02,229 29 47
In Soondah	- - - - -	44,393 20 45
Total standard shist	- - - - -	2,46,623 14 12

This remained for near a century, the land-tax of Canara; but in the eighteenth century, the Bednore government laid on additional cesses, and raised the land-tax to

Hyder laid on an extra assessment, and raised the revenue to	- - - - -	3,14,007 4 52
Tippoo, by extra assessment and new heads of revenue, raised it to	- - - - -	5,32,202 4 17
But in the additions never likely to be collected, amounting to	- - - - -	8,68,678 25 16
	- - - - -	2,52,589 22 76

Leaving Tippoo's assessment - 6,16,089 2 20; of this sum, the shist or standard came to 3,59,752. 32 35; the rest consisted of impositions and extra assessment.

This sum was however merely a nominal assessment; for he never collected more than 4,73,550. 3. 12., and of that, about 25,938 arose from the sale of gram, and items not properly of land revenue.

Major

Major Munro took this settlement as the basis of his assessment of Fusly 1209; he added some fresh items and new heads of revenue, but deducted 1,50,940. 4. 30. on account of waste land, heads of revenue lost, and the balance constituted the settlement of Fusly 1209, and amounted to

	- - - - -	2,84,604 28 45
Of this sum the ancient shist was	- - - - -	1,53,458 80 39
Shamul, or extra assessment	- - - - -	16,580 — 67
New heads of revenue	- - - - -	19,595 10 2
Village taxes	- - - - -	4,65,148 33 64

The collectors of Canara have ever since gone on, lowering or raising the rent, according to circumstances. Upon Tippoo's standard, each ryot's payment to government consists of two parts, shist and shamul. The shist is the old land-tax, and is easy: the shamul is the extra assessment, which is sometimes more, sometimes less, than the shist. Few individuals pay the full sum, including shist and shamul; but while the collector keeps the full standard, 6,16,089. 2. 20. in view, the ryots have to look forward to pay it, according to the Kytaghiz, as it is termed. This standard is too high; but the annual settlement is made with a view to it, and the amount is regulated by circumstances.

It may here be proper to observe, that though the standard of Tippoo be too high for the country, yet that the settlement of Fusly 1209, was concluded, and regularly collected, under great disadvantages. Canara had been almost desolated by many years of oppressive government; and latterly, by the confusion which the war with the English had occasioned. Major Munro was appointed collector after the fall of Seringapatam, and did not enter Canara till late in 1799, when the Mysore troops were still in possession of the forts, which they did not give up for some time, until a force had entered and laid siege to the fort of Jumalabad. No sooner had they evacuated the province, than Dhoondia's people took possession of the country above the Ghauts; and several adventurers sprung up in different parts of the country, who occasioned great confusion till the middle of 1800. Some of the adventurers seized and took the strong fort of Jumalabad; others got into other districts; and a general scene of confusion, if not civil war, took place. Notwithstanding all this confusion, and the low state to which former bad governments had reduced the province, the revenue of Fusly 1209 was collected, and the people, so far from murmuring, universally supported the collector, and enabled him to seize or drive out the adventurers who had occasioned so much trouble. The people paid the revenue regularly, and turned out, with arms in their hands, whenever there were intruders or disturbers of the peace, and by their own exertions, restored order.

Major Munro proposed a reduction of 36,164 pagodas from the settlement of Fusly 1209, calculating all the circumstances of each district, so as to reduce the assessment, where it was heavy, and generally equalize it. He thought it difficult to ascertain the landlord's rent, and proposed this mode of reduction, which he considered necessary to give that spirit to agriculture, which former ages never saw. His opinion seems to have been justified by experience: the Fusly 1209 settlement has been, in some measure increased; and though the country has improved, those rapid advances which a reduction might have produced, have perhaps not taken place.

Extracts from REPORTS respecting the LAND TENURES in the CARNATIC and MYSORE TERRITORY.

Extract REPORT of Collector of SOUTHERN POLIGAR PESHCHUH; dated 29th December 1800.

Extract Report of Collector of Southern Poligar Peshchuh; dated 29 Dec. 1800.

IN a former part of this Report, I expressed my intention of offering, for your consideration, some reflections upon the introduction of the Permanent Settlement in these countries. Those observations will have no reference to the system itself, more than to express that respect, which must be universally felt for the enlightened principles upon which it is founded, and especially by collectors, who, with hourly experience of the disorders and embarrassments of the present modes of finance and justice, cannot but anxiously desire and promote a system, which brings relief from these evils, and places the honour, security, and advantage of the Company's government, upon the only solid basis on which it can rest,—the happiness and prosperity of the people.

91. The observations I have to offer, apply exclusively to the opinions entertained, as to the right of property in the lands of the country in general, at the present day: opinions, which claim to be attentively considered, before changes, founded altogether on the faith and force of them, are finally determined on. I understand it to be a fundamental principle to the introduction of the new system, as defined in your instructions, that all lands denominated pollams, are the lands of government; and that all the lands denominated pollams, are the lands of the poligar;—that the proprietary right of government in the havelly lands, is to be sold in perpetuity to any natives who may wish to buy them; and that the proprietary rights of the poligars, are to be confirmed to them, in the most full and solemn manner;—and though reservation is made, that in confirming the rights of zemindars or poligars, the ascertained rights of talookdars or other individuals (for a description of whom, I am referred to an extract from the Bengal Regulations) shall not be violated; yet in the havellics, no such reservation is particularly expressed; and upon reference to the Bengal Regulations, for a description of the nature of those rights, which the zemindars were to respect, the reservation does not appear to me to be intended so far as is necessary in these countries (whether havellics or pollams), to secure the legitimate ends of the system, the confidence of the people, and the maintenance of internal order and peace.

92. As it is, in every point of view, of the highest importance, that the nature of the rights to be ceded to the proprietary land-holders, be thoroughly understood, before the lands are sold, I shall first explain the nature of the tenures under which all the lands in the Tinnevely pollams, in Rammad, and in the Shevagunga district, from mannikums and church lands, may be comprehended.

First, Villages of the agrarah vadiy, or villages of which the absolute proprietary right is chiefly held by Bramins: Secondly, Villages of the pundarah vadiy, or villages of which the absolute proprietary right is chiefly held by soodra inhabitants: Thirdly, Villages which, having gone to perfect waste, soodra inhabitants were invited to occupy and to cultivate them.

93. First, Of the agrarah vadiy:—This tenure usually takes its name from the Bramins, not only from their being inhabitants of the superior cast, but from the village being originally bestowed on them; and because they possess the chief authority among the inhabitants.—It has been acquired in various ways, but chiefly, it is presumed, by rulers, or other personages of rank and opulence, giving them originally as endowments to communities of Bramins; and by buying them from others, for this particular purpose. This property has of course, in the lapse of many years, undergone many changes, and has been invariably transferred, sold, and purchased, at the pleasure of the owners. It is essential to the validity of every transfer, that it be sanctioned and authenticated by every individual concerned in the property of his village.—The property itself, is denominated pung or bangham, literally signifying, share and proportion. Four of these pungs, constitute what is termed a caray, and each village is said to consist of so many pungs, and each individual share, of so many caray, more or less. The right of property, in the proportion of these shares, is ascertained in the village kosham, which is an accurate register of this property, in the same manner as the gyarum account of its lands. The right of caray rarely conveys a right to any proprietor, to any specific spot of land in perpetuity; and whenever this practice prevails, it seems a departure from the original institution. The property of the whole village, is common to the whole number of proprietors:—Every trans- action of revenue; every matter of loss and gain, is common to them all, to the extent of their respective shares; and as they are all jointly, and separately, responsible for the revenue of the village, according to the strict construction of their tenures, so they are all alike equally entitled, to any emolument or advantage which may arise therefrom. So tenacious indeed, are they of this established right, of every village benefit being in common; that a sort of lottery takes place, at stated times, to make a new distribution of village village lands, by which they change owners for a certain period, until the lottery is renewed. By this means, they generally continue to pass from one proprietor to another, so as to exclude effectually indeed the right of any particular spot, but to establish the right of the general body, to the whole village in common.

94. Secondly, Villages of the pundary vadiy. Though the natives invariably make this distinction, it appears, in fact, more a distinction of cast than of tenure, since the difference is characterized by nothing more, than that the influence of Bramins, and their property, predominates in the agrarah vadiy: the former rarely allowing soodras to intermix in their villages, for fear their importance and estimation, as a community of Bramins, may be diminished by a connexion with such inferior parties; and on the other hand, the soodras are carefully and zealously avoiding the admission of Bramins, however small, as their property would draw to them too much consideration, usurp all authority, and invade their rights. This mutual suspicion and jealousy, together with religious distinctions, has therefore occasioned that separation of the sale of transfer lands, was so powerfully served, and has had force to prevent, what the sale of transfer lands, was so powerfully calculated to bring about,—the indiscriminate existence of casts, in the property of villages. For your special consideration, I shall here annex the translate of a bill of sale from one ryot to another, upon the occasion of disposing of one or more shares in a village of the pundary, or agrarah vadiy, and accompanying, you will find translations and copies of similar accounts.—The deed usually commences with a specification of the day of the week, the age of the month, and year of the Malabar andoo, or cycle of sixty years; the year of the sawiyaganah sagaratham; and the calyogum oras; together with the auspicious and happy position of the celestial bodies; and then commonly proceeds, in terms to the following effect:—"I, A. B. of the village of C, containing twenty-eight shares, do hereby execute to D. E. of the same village, this deed of sale; that is to say, having sold to you, in this village, one share of my own six shares therein, I do hereby execute to you this deed of the full and absolute sale thereof; and you having further paid, and I having actually received, one hundred chukkrums, duly shroffed, in full value thereof, you are accordingly, to the extent of the share now transferred and sold to you, fully to possess and enjoy all nunjah, punjah, islands, water, stone, topes, jungles, riches, treasure, and every well which sinks beneath, or every tree that rises above, the earth; with every general benefit, of every sort, from father to son, through every generation, as long as the waters of the Canvery flow, vegetation lasts, or until the end of time; with the fullest liberty, likewise, of alienation by gift, bequest, sale or otherwise; I do hereby may you enjoy all prosperity therewith.—This, with my fullest approbation, I do hereby execute to D. E. this deed of sale, which is written by Pernal Puly, village Conicopoly; and this requires authentication from all the other proprietors of the village.—Signed—A. B."

95. This document contains within itself, the best evidence of the sense, which the natives entertain of the right acquired, or alienated, under its sanction, by the comprehensive and absolute terms in which that right is defined; and nothing remains to be marked, but that while the style is not the style of the present times, so the adoption of such a deed, must have been the consequence of the universal acknowledgment of the right it is meant to convey.

96. Thirdly, The last general division comprizes all those lands, which the inhabitants are not considered as at liberty to sell. They unquestionably form a very large proportion of the country, and are generally occupied by soodra inhabitants. Though frequently confounded with villages of Hindoo prosperity, these villages were in- ferent. Whether in the early periods of Hindoo prosperity, and escheated to the state, on the demise of individual property, like the pundarah vadiy, and escheated to the state, on the demise of all the proprietors; or whether they were barren wastes, before the inhabitants, who now occupy them, were invited to cultivate; it is not possible to ascertain; or, if possible, would any benefit result from it?—It is sufficient for us to know, that the grounds thus occupied, from the time that they were divided among the first settlers, have, in most cases, continued to pass from one generation to another.—That the land of each inhabitant is as well known as his house; and that it has never been customary to disturb his possession, as long as he yielded to the ruler of the country, a certain share of his labours. The distinction of these villages, from those of the genuine pundary and agrarah vadiy, consists in their not being purchased, and in there being no practices prevailing in them, of punge, carays, or rashum, for the lands of the village in general; or any right, indeed, in the inhabitants, to dispose of, or alienate in perpetuity, the lands they occupy, as is possessed by the proprietors of the pundary and agrarah vadiy.

97. From year to year, each ryot cultivates his own land, unless distress come upon him, or the supply of water be partial:—In the one case, he leads or mortgages his right of cultivation to redeem it, when he has again the means; and having determined the extent of land that may be cultivated, from the quantum of water in the tanks, it is apportioned out to each inhabitant, according to the extent of nunjah land possessed by him in the village. When the crops have been cut, every inhabitant again returns to his own lands.

98. In explaining to you the nature of these tenures, I have not sought to avoid detail, assured that your solicitude to be thoroughly informed of every difficulty to be avoided in the permanent settlement of these countries, will prompt a favourable construction of any apparent prolixity in the details transmitted to you of their present actual state.

99. In tracing their past situation, it is not to be discovered, that during the revolutions of many ages, from the reign of their first princes, until the final downfall of the Hindoo authority, any questions ever existed, in any stage of the Hindoo history, as to the right of the people to the lands of the country, excepting villages or lands totally transmitted to them, from the most remote era, down to the present time, without interrupting their universal acknowledgment; and in the repositories of their history and their laws, we find the right of the people, to property in lands, repeatedly acknowledged and preserved.

100. It has been the custom to consider the Hindoo governments of old, despotic, and regulated solely by the arbitrary will of the reigning prince:—theoretically received, they were so; but in practice, they had little of this character: the ordinances of their religion, had generally the force and effect of laws; and in their operation, they were beneficent and just.—Even when the country was, in later times, ravaged by musliman armies, and the adoption of the laws of Mahomed into the Hindoo jurisprudence, created universal confusion, and engendered continual differences in the decrees of justice, no fundamental, material innovations took place in the right to landed property (however grievous the public assessment often proved) such as I have described; and the privilege of tilling the globe which he first broke, and brought into fertility, it has never been the custom to take from the poorest cultivator, as long as he duly yielded the public share. It is true, that infringements of this right occur more frequently in Shevavunga, and in the Tinnevelly poligams, than elsewhere; but the frequency of them, has not altered the general sentiment of their injustice.

101. Reflecting, therefore, upon the past and present circumstances of the country, it appears to me indispensable, if we seek to conciliate the affections of the people to the new system, and to ensure its stability, that the right of property in the pundarah and agrarah vadiky, be fully recognized; and that the ryot, duly yielding that share of his labours which it has been customary for him to cede to the state, be secured in his possession. The adoption of these suggestions, produce two inconveniences: First, considerable detail. Secondly, less inducement to principal landlords to purchase. The detail would arise from the division of the lands of the agrarah and pundarah vadiky amongst the several proprietors of the villages, in order that each man's portion might be made responsible for the jumma assessed upon it; but if the village, and all the proprietors, were declared answerable for the whole jumma, such separation of interest would not be necessary: and this plan has the advantage of assimilating to past usage. It may be urged, that the country has not flourished under these tenures; and that past usage, is the worst guide that can be followed. The reply to this objection, is anticipated in your board's remarks:—want of improvement cannot be attributed to the imperfection of tenures, but to that worst of all evils, a variable assessment, which has and must for ever prevent land from obtaining its due value, and extinguish every incitement to improvement.

102. Secondly, In regard to the diminution of inducement to the natives to purchase. There can be no doubt that they would be more desirous of becoming principal landholders, if they were authorized to allot, appropriate, and to dispose of the cultivated lands at their own pleasure: but (independent of the just claims of the lower tenantry to the fields) policy requires that no such right, should be given to them. The depravity and chicanery of the native character, does not need any illustration: we know that when they can obtain immediate advantage, they will not act, for distant good; and that it is hence indispensable to the success of the new system, that they can reap no benefit, by defeating it. If a native were put in possession of several villages, with the same right as landed proprietors possess in Europe, his first business would be to take all the best lands from the old ryots, sell them to new settlers, receive as much as he could of the produce of the year, and then fail; leaving to the Company, as security for their revenue, villages worse cultivated than when he received them, and inhabited by strangers, instead of the thrifty and judicious peasantry, whose unceasing labour would soon enrich themselves and the state, if they were certain of reaping the fruits of it. But this can never be accomplished, unless the ancient ryot be secured in his right of occupancy and cultivation, subject only to such demands from the principal landlord, as custom authorizes, or to such other written engagements, as he may voluntarily enter into. To this reservation, I can myself see no weighty objection; but I submit it for your consideration. It is true, that whatever tends to discourage the employment of capital, in the improvement of the country, is to be regretted; and this, the limitation of proprietary right may do, in a degree; but the ease and security of the cultivators of the soil, is the paramount consideration of a permanent settlement; and I should think that the expectation of bringing the waste lands into cultivation, of which the proprietary right may be wholly given to the principal landlord, and to the poligar, will be a sufficient inducement to many men of substance to employ their capital in agricultural pursuits.

103. If it should appear to your board, that I have judged unfairly of the rapacious spirit which is likely to govern the conduct of the poligars, and of the principal landholders, towards the inferior ryots, provided they be left at liberty to dispossess them, your observation need only be called to the policy which has long prevailed in the Tinnevelly poligams, and in Shevavunga, where, in every fertile village, will be found melancholy proofs of the spirit itself, and of the pernicious effects which result from it. To seize all the best lands of the country, for their own farms, or the farms of their dependents, and to be utterly indifferent to the desertion of the most useful inhabitants of the country, is an imputation putation from which few can be excepted, and little need be said to prove the miserable state of agriculture in their hands, compared to that conducted by a laborious peasantry, of whose services they have been so little provident. In Shevavunga, the evil still exists in all its inveteracy: but it is gratifying to me to observe, that many of the poligars are endeavouring to repair its consequences, in their pollams, by a greater attention to cultivation. This salutary change in their habits, has been effected by the additional peshcush collected from them in the last year: and I take this occasion of requesting your authority to confirm this disposition, by renewing the same engagements for the present:—more they would be unable to pay.

7. I hereunder describe the stations of the tenantry:—

8. The persons constituting the tenantry are called meerassadars.
9. The station of a meerassadar, is essentially the same as that of an agricultural farmer in Europe: several circumstances, from custom, occasion a difference between them, and are strong and remarkable. I need mention here only three of those circumstances.

10. First, In Tanjore, a meerassadar disposes of his station in any manner he pleases. He disposes of it, too, and quits it, without being bound to give to any one, notice of his transfer and departure. Like him, his successor superintends its cultivation, and pays its revenue. Government know nothing of his relinquishment; and if they knew of it, they would not care about it here, as in Europe. The proprietorship of the land, belongs to the government, or to the landlord; and he who is entrusted with the duty of making it productive, lives upon it, and cultivates it, so long as he pays its revenue, and no longer. But this occupation of it, while the superior is satisfied, has been converted by the meerassadar into a right. They have made the right, a property; and they retain, sell, lend, give or mortgage, according to their inclination, the whole or any part of it.

11. Secondly, almost every where in Tanjore, the labourers under a meerassadar, have a proportioned share in the produce of his land. They are called paragoodies: and that share is therefore called paragoody warum. In some few places, a meerassadar's labourers are slaves, and he allows them, not a proportioned share in his produce, but a daily allowance in money or grain. Therefore the paragoodies are interested in every crop: but the slaves do not care whether it be a good or bad one. The paragoody warum to the paragoodies, and the allowance to the slaves, are granted for the labour of cultivating. In every other work, the paragoodies and slaves are alike, and are considered as coolies. When employed on the circar waramut,* they receive from the circar; and when employed on the codeemaramut,† they receive from the meerassadars, daily hire, at fixed rates. There are some meerassadars, but still fewer even than those engaging slaves, whose land is cultivated by their own labour, and by that of their relations.

12. Thirdly, attention is here required only to those meerassadars, whose labourers are paragoodies, and who are nearly the whole tenantry of the province. In every country, and in every profession, it is usual for the master to find the stock, and for his servants to do the work: but in Tanjore, and in agriculture, the servants do the work, and find the stock too. Therefore, if any calamity fall on the stock, the loss elsewhere, only diminishes the property of the often wealthy master; but it here destroys the whole subsistence, and chattels of the impoverished servants. Every accident stops, and every misfortune kills, their industry. The cultivation which, being the source of general life and property, is made in better conditioned countries, to rest on the capital of an established class of men, depends, in this province, on the rude, broken, and fleeting materials of the lowest of mankind. The cattle, seed, and all implements of husbandry, are purchased and maintained by the paragoodies alone. From this circumstance, it may be supposed that the share enjoyed in the produce by these people, is large. In other parts of India, when its meerassadars supply have been able to obtain, a village is in its ordinary state, when its meerassadars have in it, land stock to their land, and cultivate it, either by the labour of themselves and relations, or by that of slaves: and a village is in an unusual state, when some meerassadars give up their cultivation too extensive for them fully to manage; and when others entirely give up their cultivation, and engage on the spot, or at a distance, in manufactures, commerce, or the service of government. On such occasions, those who have more land than they can cultivate, as the full return of their stock and labour, from what they would from agriculture. Both these descriptions of people, therefore, regard the land they are unable or unwilling to cultivate, as a possession which they have no longer a natural right to hold, and resign it. They call in paragoodies, to whom they deliver it over, with the entire labour, expense, risk, and profit of cultivating it, reserving out of its crops, only a small tondewarum, sufficient as an acknowledgment that they are the owners of it, and may resume it when they please. In Tanjore, the assessment is never more, but often less, than 5 per cent. of the net produce. Under the name of paragoody signifies, indeed, those to whom land is relinquished; but this is the ordinary and settled state of the province: and the meerassadars, instead of being contented with 5 per cent. on the net produce, claim and receive nearly half the codeewarum. The said codeewarum varies between 50 and 60 per cent. and they receive from 23½ to 26½ of it. At present, the codeewarum varies between 50 and 60 per cent. and they receive from 23½ to 26½ of it. Of these meerassadars, nearly all engage in no business, and the few who resort to any manufacturing, commercial, official, or military profession, enjoy not only the income of it, but the said exorbitant portion of the produce of the land, which they have abandoned to the labour of others. However, they have some functions which it is necessary to describe. According to their present situation, to pay for the codemamut, and the field lakes, and to see that the cultivation is properly performed, is their peculiar natural and permanent duty; but instead of performing it, they use their endeavours to prevent its being done by the orders and every assistance of the Circar. This they do, on account of their contentions, vice and indolence, and principally, because, before the establishment of a rent, they wish their land to yield little, so that the future tax on it be low. They too it is, who pay the regulated naustellavoo and batta: but these expenses now are only temporary, and after this Fusly, will cease. It is they also, on whom all exactions fall; but they at present submit to none, which they do not pay out of some fraud on the Circar. Under the Maharatta government, they were heavily oppressed. In their actual state, they may be looked upon, as men between farmers and landlords, who have raised themselves above the labour and expense of cultivation; who are too idle even to superintend it, and too avaricious to pay for its small works; who obstruct it, by their contentions and policy; who are willing instruments to the public servants, for the plunder of the Circar revenue; and who, differently from the custom of every other country, even in India, consume nearly half the subsistence which should go to the strength and population of the most useful class of the people. This peculiar evil arose from the peculiar heaviness in the tyranny of the late Maharatta system. Without relieving themselves from the expense, and taking a large portion of the profit of cultivation, it was impossible for the meerassadars to bear the injustice of government. The evil, as it sprung from a defective system of administration, has diminished, and is likely, of its own accord, to fall, during the progress of an efficient one. Violence appears not necessary. During the period of my service, nothing has been taken from the meerassadars. On the contrary, they have received numerous and material benefits: but I have assigned a large portion of those benefits to the paragodies. These people will thus acquire a sense of the right of stock and labour. The future renters, whoever they may be, will perceive and demand the right of rent. The meerassadars must become either labourers, farmers, or land-holders; and their present station, which entitles them to neither of those names, cannot but experience, in the natural course of events, a gradual dissolution. This peculiarity alone seems sufficient to account for the extraordinary degree of vice in Tanjore. The power of the meerassadars to acquire property, without working for it, evidently gives them leisure to increase it, according to their education, by fraud and violence of every kind.

13. The meerassadars, like other natives of any property, seem to record, with invariable constancy, every thing they receive or issue, whether it be money or a commodity, a gift or a payment, a bribe or an exaction, and an earning or a robbery. Such is their propensity for committing to writing every thing regarding their land, that they provide, in favour of all disbursements made in their villages by government, the same remembrance, from generation to generation.

14. Yet the style of these records is irregular, confused, and, to Europeans, often unintelligible. A meerassadar, when he sells or abandons his possession, often uselessly carries his accounts along with him, and when he dies, they are perhaps no where to be found. To deprive relations of the full share due to them in his estate, and to keep from government a knowledge of the value of his land, and of his thefts, he confines, with the most jealous care, his accounts to his own perusal. He usually has a false set, depreciating his property, and omitting his plunder, ready to show, when called upon to answer a charge of embezzlement.

Extract from general REPORT of Board of Revenue at Fort St. George; dated 1st August 1805.

Para. 279. On the meerassassee tenure, as existing in Tanjore, we had frequent occasion to address your Lordship. The rights of the meerassadars, or ulcudies, and paracudies, in Tanjore especially, were particularly explained by Mr. Harris to the Committee, in his Report of the 9th May 1804, and forwarded to us by your Lordship, under date the 22d Sept. last. The tenures under which the former respectively held their lands, were explained by Mr. Wallace to be, first, yekab'hogum, or individual possession: when the whole lands of a village belong to a single person, who cultivates them, either by himself or servants, or entrusts them to paracudies, by which tenure, 1,807 villages are held in Tanjore, the yekab'hogum proprietor is at liberty to dispose of either the whole, or part of his right of cultivation, by sale or otherwise, at his pleasure. If he dispose of a part only, the tenure becomes palab'hogum, or separate possession.

280. The second description of tenure, refers to lands divided between two or more individuals, who are each answerable to the state, for the amount of revenue derivable from their portion respectively, which they cultivate in such manner as they think proper. Of this description, are 2,202 villages. The palab'hogum proprietor possesses the same rights in his share, as the persons holding under the preceding tenure, do, in whole villages.

281. The third tenure is called sama'dayum, or possession in copartnery, under which the lands of a village are held by many ulcudies, who may cultivate them jointly, may commit them to one of the partners, or, by general consent, may call in paracudies. In either case, the produce is divided among the ulcudies, in proportion to the respective shares they hold: and they are jointly answerable for the public revenue of this description. There are at present, 1,774 villages in the province.

282. The

No. 25.] The Affairs of The EAST INDIA COMPANY.

282. The land proprietors, among whom the villages composing the district, amounting in all to 5,783, are divided, were stated by Mr. Wallace, to be of various casts and description. The Bramins he computed at 17,149. The Shudras, including Hindoos and Christians, 43,442; and the Mahomedans, at 1,457: forming together a proprietary holding, under the several tenures above mentioned, of 62,048. persons. The situation of the sub-tenantry, or paracudies, having been already explained to your Lordship, we deemed it superfluous to mention them further, than to observe, that of the number of villages noticed in this paragraph, 1,898 were cultivated wholly by them, and 1,923 jointly by them and by the ulcudies.

283. The rate of warum, or share of the state and the proprietor respectively, is not affected by the nature of the tenure, but by the cast of the proprietor, the Bramin receiving a higher warum than the rest.

Extract from REPORT of principal Collector of TANJORE and TRICHINOPOLY, of 8th September 1805.

Without entering on the question of who is proprietor of the soil, I will content myself with stating, that immemorial usage has established, both in Tanjore and Trichinopoly, that the occupants, whether distinguished by the names of meerassadar or mahajanams, have the right of selling, bestowing, devising, and bequeathing their lands, in the manner which, to them, is most agreeable. Whether this right was originally granted by the ancient constitution of the country, appears to me not worth considering, at the present day. I think it a fortunate circumstance, that the right does at present exist: whether it originated in encroachment of the sovereign's right, in a wise and formal abrogation of those rights, or in institutions coeval with the remotest antiquity. It is fortunate, that at present when we are consulting on the means of establishing the property and welfare of the numerous people of these provinces, we find the lands of the country in the hands of men, who feel and understand the full rights and advantages of possession; who have enjoyed them, in a degree more or less secure, before the British name was known in India; and who, in consequence of them, have rendered populous and fertile, the extensive provinces of Tanjore and Trichinopoly. The class of proprietors to whom I allude, are not to be considered, as the actual cultivators of the soil: the far greater mass of them, till their lands by means of hired labourers, or by a class of people termed pullers, who are of the lowest, and who may be considered as the slaves of the soil. The landed property of these provinces, is divided and subdivided in every possible degree. There are proprietors of 4,000 acres, of 400 acres, of 40 acres, and of one acre.

2. Without entering on a discussion of the nature of the property held by the inhabitants of Tanjore, or of the tenures by which it is held, the committee will adopt the usual designation of that property; viz. meerassassee, in alluding to the cultivators of this province; and, to be clearly understood, they will here state, that the number of villages in Tanjore, are 5,783; viz.

which exempted certain inhabitants from paying the full assessment, and which may be explained under the four following heads:—

1. The Puttookut ryots, were those, who having an hereditary interest in the village, were considered the owners of the land, and responsible for the payment of the revenue. They paid the highest land tax, under the denomination of cuttoo gootaga, or fixed rent, without reference to the extent of cultivation.
2. Vellaversay ryots, were those next in rank: they had no hereditary claims to the land. The vellaversay paid a lower terwah (money tax) than the puttookuts.
3. Yerwaddies, or non-residentary ryots, who cultivated the land. Their terwah was still lower than that of the vellaversay.
4. Paragoodies, or newly established ryots, paid the lowest rate of tax. If by death, or emigration, any of the puttookut lands should fall to their occupancy, they paid the terwah of the puttookuts.

Extract from REPORT of Mr. HODGSON, on the Revenues, &c. of the Province of TINNEVELLY; dated 24th Sept. 1807.

In this province, land is every where a species of property. The nunjah (wet lands) are a transferrable and saleable property. The durmaseum lands are the most valuable, as being held under the most favourable tenure, that is, giving a less share* of the produce to government, than other lands. Numerous causes of disputed right in land, have been decided by the local authorities, since the cession, and the government of his highness the nabob always acknowledged†, if it did not respect the rights claimed by the inhabitants, in the exclusive enjoyment of their property in land. From what has been said of provinces, the truth of the conclusion, drawn in the following extract from an Introduction to the History of British India, will, it is believed, be no longer disputed:—"In ancient Hindostan, all landed property was held by a grant from the sovereign, who was called Sole Proprietor of the Soil, and Lord of the Universe; but these pompous and empty titles were nothing more than the gaudy colouring with which the vain extravagance of oriental fancy delights to trick out and bedaub royalty. The Hindoo kings were, in fact, merely the nominal proprietors of the soil; and the grants of land which they dispensed to their subjects, were given in perpetuity, without any claim, either expressed or implied, of an absolute paramount right in the property. The landholders, therefore, were in reality, the proprietors of the ground they possessed and cultivated; and the tenure by which they held it, very much resembled our socage tenure in England, at the present day."

The value of the land, as a property, must vary with the demand; and the demand be regulated by the state of the government, the nature of the rent, the extent of the share of the produce, whether in kind or money. It must always have been more valuable where the produce is divided between the proprietor and government, than where it was burdened with the responsibility of a rent settled on arbitrary principles; because, as rents on long leases have never been granted, annual rents must frequently be arbitrary, and often ruinous. A cottah of nunjah land will, however, sell for C. chuckrums 49. 5, which may be estimated at S. pags. 24½ per cawney.

The name by which this property is distinguished, is that of meerass, or meerassce. This word has become familiar to all ranks, since the conquest of the Mahomedans. Swastrium (cultivating casts) who may not have adopted the general term meerass, by those shudras (cultivating casts) who may not have adopted the general term meerass.

There are some circumstances connected with this property, in the arable and waste lands, which I wish to explain, with reference to Regulation XXX; because that Regulation does not, that I am aware of, provide for the case; while a claim to all lands uncultivated, free from every incumbrance or demand on the part of the meerassadars, has been set up, and, I believe, actually exercised by many zemindars or mootahdars. Each swastrium or meerassadar considers himself proprietor (I here use the word proprietor, in a limited sense, to describe the meerassce property) of all the land of his swastrium, whether it be cultivated, or not; that his property in the land, is not lost, because he is unable to cultivate the whole: that for whatever land of his swastrium, another may cultivate, he is entitled to what, in this province, is called his sawmy bogum‡, being a deduction, for himself, of about 13½ per cent. on the gross produce, before it is divided between the pyacarrics cultivator and government. If the meerassadars should be unable, or unwilling, to procure pyacarrics, to cultivate that part of his meerassce which is waste; and the circar, or the circar's representative, a zemindar or mootahdar, should assign the land to be cultivated,

* I conclude that this is the true cause of private estates existing in Canara and Malabar, on a somewhat different footing to what they do in these parts, and of their being more valuable; because it would seem Government derived so small a share, comparatively, that enough remains for the profits of a proprietor, for the profits of a tenant, and for the subsistence of the tenant's slaves or labourers; whereas we have only here the meerassadar or tenant, and his labourers and slaves.

† Translation of a part of a muchulka, given to the Circar of his highness the Nabob, by a renter of Tinnevely, in July 1210 (1800-1).

‡ I will also take proper measures, by my own good conduct, to hold out proper encouragement to the ryots, and

"other inhabitants, for extending the cultivation and increasing the population, and from them, in every respect to their satisfaction; and I shall pay proper attention to the just dues of the ryots, from the cultivation, as well as to the mamool (customary) collection of taxes on punjah (dry grain produce) and topes (plantations), and not oppress them by unwarrantable demands."

§ Meerassadars, to the southward, are called sawmy bogum; in the Carnatic, are called sawmy bogum. Sic in orig.* § Pyacarrics, or Paragoodies, or cultivators coming from a distance, or neighbouring village, to cultivate, or persons residing in the village and cultivating, but possessing no share in the meerassce.—They are known all over India.

vated, to a stranger of his or their procuring, the meerassadar would consider himself proprietor of the land, claim his sawmy bogum, and not consider his title to the land to be invalidated by his temporary inability. By allowing the pyacarry of the circar to cultivate it, subject to the usual small fee, as an acknowledgment of his property in the land, the meerassadar does not preclude either the circar, or the circar's representative, from rendering the land an available resource.

Inability to cultivate, is a very indefinite term, by which to determine a cessation of right. The entire loss of his labourers by contagious disease, or his cattle by a murrain, may produce inability for one year or for two; but it would be a hard case, and an accumulation of misfortunes, if his meerassce was liable to transfer to another under these misfortunes, without his consent. Upon what, are the violent disputes respecting waste lands, founded, if not on some right of the parties disputing, to the occupancy of the ground, or to some kind of property in it? The ground has often no value, at the time of the dispute, to either party, as referring to cultivation; but is of great value, as relates to right in it. It might not always, it is true, be the interest of the zemindar or mootahdar to put in a stranger; but he should not possess the power to do an unjust act, because there are cases where, in a mootah of a single village, the removal of the meerassadars would secure an immediate benefit. If this inference be correct, there cannot exist, more than there does now, two properties in land, as described in a paper sent to the Board of Revenue.

In opposition to this right, long established and enjoyed, not only here, but in other parts of the Carnatic, it has been contended that the zemindar or mootahdar has an exclusive right to all land not under cultivation; and that whatever land the *meerassadar may derive, or be unable to cultivate, the circar, or its representative, the zemindar, may grant the meerassce property of that land to another, as an inducement to him to cultivate, without subjecting the new settler to any demand from the original meerassadar.

As the Regulations do not contain any rule regarding this right, I have been induced to bring it forward, in order that the subject may be discussed, in the event of its being at any time proposed to grant an exclusive right in all uncultivated land, to the zemindar or mootahdar.—As all meerassadars can establish their right by an appeal to custom, which is the foundation of law, they need not have any regulation passed in their favour, because, if they can prove their right in a court of justice, which I have not the smallest doubt of their being able to do, it will be accorded them, unless a zemindar or mootahdar can show a particular law to the contrary—whether the section above specified, contains a law to the contrary, is doubtful. The terms of the pottahs, would form the ground of refusal: and it is only in case of the meerassadar refusing just terms, or all terms, that he is liable to be ousted: at least, this is the construction I should put on that section. Having ousted the meerassadar, the mootahdar would still be liable to prosecution, and be forced to move the previous question, viz. that the terms of the pottah he tendered, were just and legal, that is, according to established custom: for it was not the intention (indeed, the reverse is distinctly stated to be the object) of the permanent rent, and the establishment of the courts, that the rights of the cultivators should be infringed or injured, on introducing what is called the new system of revenue and jurisprudence.

Extract Report of Mr.
Hodgson on Dindigul,
28 March 1808.

Para. 39. In Dindigul, as in all the provinces south of Madras, a property in the land, is invested in the resident inhabitants of each village.

40. Much has been said of the boasted proprietary right of the owners of private estates in Canara and Malabar; and elaborate disquisitions of the superior and inferior rights of the jelmkar gueney, chally gueney, and mool gueney of Canara, have been entered into, to prove that we should do an act of injustice, in selling the proprietary right in the lands in Canara, as we have done elsewhere. When this is argued, proprietary right is understood as an unlimited right: and the analogy between the canatchchedars, ool-koodies and pyakoodies, with jelmkar mool gueney and chally gueney, is disputed.†

When I assert that, in no part of our territories in India, are the lands cultivated by hired labourers paid by government, or by its slaves, I do not fear contradiction. When I assert that by far the largest portion of the territory of India is cultivated either by slaves or hired labourers, I am as little afraid of the position being denied me. If then these slaves and hired labourers who drive the plough, are not in the pay of government, by whom are they paid? They are paid by a description of persons, whose denomination varies with the variation in the local languages, and whom we know, under the general term of cultivator or ryot. In many parts of India, I assert, with as little fear of contradiction, that where a Bramin has the property in the land, which the laws of his religion do not allow of his cultivating with his own hands, these descriptions of persons subsist on the produce of the land.

* Sect. 10, Regulation XXX. 1802. "Whose under-tenants, or ryots, may choose to exchange mutual engagements in writing, with proprietors or farmers of land, defining the terms on which such under-farmer or ryot are to hold their lands, and may persist in such refusal for the space of one month, after the prescribed pottahs may have been offered, in the presence of witnesses, by the proprietors or farmers of land; such proprietors or farmers of land shall have power to grant the lands of the under-farmers or ryots so refusing, to other persons." It is believed, that pyacarrics have demanded these conditions, and that it has been granted in some instances.

† Canatchchedar, possessor or proprietor, and fully answered to jelmkar. Ool pyakoodie is the tenant for ever, residuary cultivator of a village, without property. Pyakoodie, means a stranger, or man engaging for a term, being therefore tenant at will. Where the canatch is mortgaged, there will be, in Canara, a fourth description of persons, answering to (sic in orig.)

Para. 56. It is not the expediency that I mean to discuss: but I venture to affirm, that the right of the people in Canara or Malabar, would not be injured or infringed by the establishment, in those provinces, of the Permanent System, as established in Bengal, and on this side of India; and that, with a difference in value only, private estates exist as much, in every part of India, as they do, in Canara and Malabar.

Extract from Mr. HODGSON'S REPORT on the Revenues of COIMBATOOR; dated Sept. 10th, 1807.

Extract Report of Mr.
Hodgson on Coimbatore,
10 Sept. 1807.

Para. 13. It is here worthy of remark, how small a portion of the land of this extensive district, is capable of being occupied as paddy land. Out of a total cultivation of 1,045,116 cawnies, only 37,807 cawnies are nunjah, being about 3 per cent. of the whole. With the exception of this comparatively small tract of nunjah land, and such land as is capable of being watered by labour from wells or running streams, the annual cultivation of the country, depends on the falling rains. As those rains are scarce or abundant, the crop must be scanty or prolific. It most frequently happened, under the uncertainty of the seasons, particularly of late years, that the ryot must have sown without reaping; while the produce of the crops he did reap, must have varied with every variation of the season. That this circumstance is more or less the case, every where, is true; but it must be, in this province, in a greater degree, is not to be doubted, where the whole of the cultivation of the greater part of the ryots, is nunjah only.

14. In a country where the proportion of arable waste is greater than the land under cultivation, it cannot be expected that land, particularly nunjah, should be valuable property, or transferrable by sale or mortgage. It could never be worth the while of an individual wishing to occupy land, to purchase the field, already occupied, while so many fields were to be had without premium, on application to the officers of government. A favourable rate of assessment on a field obtained by chance, or other means, or improvements made by the digging of wells, could alone give value to nunjah land. It is accordingly found, that lands with wells, called and classed as garden land, are a valuable property, and are transferred by sale, or are mortgaged: that the occupancy of nunjah land, is not a saleable property: yet to deprive the individual of the field he has long cultivated, while he continues to pay the rent, is felt, and complained of, as an act of injustice.

15. The same inhabitants have, however, inhabited the same villages, and ploughed the same fields, time immemorial. The oppressions of the house of Hyder, and particularly the additional assessment made by Tippoo Sultan, may have produced a temporary desertion; but these deserters have returned, from time to time, to their fields. Neither the Hindoo or Mussulman government appear (supposing their right in the soil as proprietors to be indisputable, and proprietary right, to be a right to demand what the proprietor pleases for his land) ever to have exercised the right. What was the assessment, and what was exaction, was well known to the party governing, and those governed. It is true, where, as under Tippoo Sultan's reign, exaction had no limit, landed property could have no value; but where fraud could not counteract oppression, a hope of change for the better, or inability to resist, produced submission, till the load became too heavy to bear, and emigration the only source of relief.

16. The nunjah land having been generally under nunjah, the crop divided between the circar and ryot, and a great portion of it in the occupation of Bramins, and being less liable to a total failure of the crop, than nunjah land, it became a valuable and transferrable property; and has, in consequence, been transferred at various times, through numerous hands. Since the introduction of the survey rents in the southern division, where the rates are lower than in the northern, the value of the property in nunjah land, has considerably increased in that division.

17. It does not appear, on enquiry, that there are in this province any individual farmers who occupy large farms. By farms, are meant, not rents, but land. Rawenachory, a relation of the dewan of Mysore, possesses 3,988 cawnies in the Caroor district, paying an annual revenue of about 20,000 R^s. Some few head inhabitants hold farms of about 2,000 chuckrams annual rent: but the rent of by far the greater number, does not exceed thirty C. chuckrams, and, on an average, may be eight chuckrams, and of many, is as low as one chuckram.

22. Many occupiers of land, have no stock or cattle, but let their lands to other tenants, agreeing to give them one-third of the gross produce, they finding seed, cattle, and labour: the occupiers taking the responsibility of the rent, and chances of the seasons. This is an arrangement favourable to poor ryots, who incur no risk, and are not harassed for rent. It is favourable to those occupiers of lands, who have other means of livelihood, or wish to seek them. They need only attend, or send an agent, at the time of reaping, and provide for the payment of the dues of government. The rest of the year, they can follow their other avocations.

MEMORANDUMS OF POLIGARS OF THE CEDED DISTRICTS;

Enclosed in Report of Principal Collector; dated 20th March 1802.

No. 1.—TIRMUL RAI, of ANNAGOONDAY.

AFTER the conquest of Bijnuggur by the Mussulman princes of the Deccan, the nominal rajahs were allowed to retain Annagoonday, and some other districts, amounting to the kamul rent of cantaroy pagodas 1,78,725. 9. 54. They held this territory in jageer, free of all rent, for several generations. The time when pesheush was first imposed is not ascertained. It appears, however, to have been previous to 1749; for the Mahratta chiefs, Nana and Sudabah, arriving in that year with an army at Bijnuggur, to pay their devotions at the pagoda of Humpi, the rajah, instead of waiting upon them, absconded; for which reason they deprived him of some small districts, and still make him pay, it is said, his old pesheush of cantaroy pagodas 7,000. In 1775, Hyder raised the pesheush to 12,000 pagodas, and also stipulated that the rajah should serve, when called upon, with 1,000 foot and 100 horse, at his own expense, except batta, which was to be paid by the circar. In 1786, Tippoo entered Annagoonday, expelled the rajah, burned his palace, with all his records, and annexed the district to the circar lands. The rajah, on the commencement of the confederate war in 1790, against Tippoo Sultan, again seized the district, but was driven out, in 1792, by Cummur ul Deen Khan. He made himself master of it again in 1799; and did not submit, till he was compelled by the approach of the army. The dewan of Mysore took the management of the country from him, and gave him a monthly allowance of 2,000 rupees, which was reduced to 1,500 rupees, when Annagoonday was given over to the Nizam; and it is now continued at this rate, by order of government.

The rajah is a man of very mean capacity, little removed from idiotism. His son was so ill treated by him, that, thinking his life in danger, he has fled for refuge to one of the Mahratta zemindars, by whom he is supported; for his father allows him nothing.

No. 2.—BUSWAPAH, NAIGUE of HARPONHELLY.

The ancestor of the family was Dadapah, the talliar of two villages in Harponhelly, who, on the dissolution of the Bijnuggur empire, collected a few followers, and seized a part of the neighbouring districts. He was, however, with most of the petty chiefs who started up at that time, obliged to submit to the king of Bejapoor, to whom he paid a pesheush of 350 pag^s, and rendered service with 100 men. His successors appear to have taken advantage of the decline of the Bejapoor power to extend their territory; for, before the conquest of that kingdom by Aurengzebe, instead of 37 villages, they had 460, of which the kamul rent was C. Pag^s 2,70,869, for which they paid a pesheush of only 4,200 C. Pag^s. In the beginning of the last century, the pesheush was raised to C. Pag^s 8,208; and about 50 years afterwards it was raised to C. Pag^s 22,908, which was paid partly to Moraree Row, and partly to the nabob of Sera: but besides the pesheush, the poligars were subjected to frequent exactions by the Mahrattas, of two or three lacks of rupees at a time. They had, however, in the same time, added considerably to their revenue, by the seizure of 92 villages belonging to the zemindar of Jenimulla, another petty chief. The pesheush was fixed by Hyder at C. Pag^s 72,000, and continued, without alteration, till 1786, when Tippoo subdued the province, and sent the poligar Buswapah Nair prisoner to Seringapatam, where he died.

In 1792, after the peace of Seringapatam, when Perseram Bhow was on his march to his own country, the present poligar was presented to him as the heir of the family, and was by him directed to be installed: but the poligar, with his party, was obliged to fly a few days after, by the advance of one of the Sultan's detachments. He again took possession of Harponhelly, on the fall of Seringapatam; but, as he came in to General Harris, with all his followers, upon the first summons, it was thought that his conduct entitled him to particular favour. A jagheer of 20,000 C. Pag^s, which he solicited, was granted by the dewan of Mysore, on the recommendation of the general; and the arrangement was approved by the Governor General in council.

The present poligar does not appear to have had, previous to this transaction, any well-founded claim to the succession. The father of Dadapah, the first poligar, had, by a second wife, four sons, who obtained from Dadapah the village of Nurjenhall in jagheer, for their subsistence. When the direct line failed, it was usual to supply the vacancy by taking one of the descendants of the four sons of the second marriage from this village. Buswapah of the descendants of the four sons of the second marriage, was in this manner adopted in 1767, by the Nair, who died in confinement at Seringapatam, Som Shaker Naig, who had died without issue. The present man is said to be the son of Auyapah, the brother of this Buswapah; which, even if true, would give him no right to the inheritance, because the right of Buswapah was created solely by adoption. The present poligar could have had no title that would not, in a superior degree, have belonged to his father Auyapah; but the father having been set aside, shows that neither of them had any; that the line was extinct; and that the bramins, who had held the principal offices under former poligars, set up a boy, merely for the purpose of retaining the management of affairs in their own hands.

It is by this means that zemindars are every where to the cirkar, because the chief servants, in order to secure their own situations, which are generally here literary, when- ever the line is extinct, take care to bring forward a child from some quarter or other.

No. 3.—JENIMULLA, MULLEK AYUN NAIGUE.

The founder of the family, Pennapah Naigue, for his services in seizing a rebellious chief, was rewarded by Atchet Rayel, of Bijnugger, with a personal jagheer of four sumnats, or maganies, valued at the kamul rent of Mahomed Shahi, pagodas 15,300; and also another jagheer of twelve maganies, of the kamul rent of Mahomed Shahi, pagodas 35,150, for the service of 500 horse, and 300 peons. Four of the maganies were resumed by the Bejapoor kings; and for the remainder, the poligar was to pay a peishcush of 20,000 rupees, and serve with 300 horse, and 2,000 peons. Under Aurengzebe, another maganie was resumed: his service was reduced to 1,000 peons, and his peishcush raised to 50,000 rupees. He made himself master, a few years afterwards, of Sundoor; but Suddajee Gorpuny, in 1728, took from him both Sundoor and Coortani, and forced him to pay eight years' chout. In 1742, the poligars of Chittledroog and Harponhelly stripped him of all his possessions, except the single maganie of Terramulla, for which he paid a peishcush of 2,000 R^s to the Mahrattas. In 1752, he was entirely subjected by the poligar of Chittledroog, who obliged him to serve with 500 peons, and to remit his peishcush through him. In 1767, when Chittledroog became tributary to Hyder, the poligar of Terramulla having complained to him of his having been deprived of his inheritance, was, on that account, put to death by the poligar of Chittledroog. The son fled to Solapoor; but returning, and performing some service to Hyder at the siege of Chittledroog, in 1777, he was re-instated in Terramulla, to pay a peish- in 1780, with 1,000 peons, and 100 horse, which were paid by the cirkar. In 1787, Tippoo resumed the district, and carried the present poligar to Seringapatam, where he appointed him a bukshi, with a monthly allowance of 300 rupees; but, being alarmed by a report of the Sultan's intending to circumcise him, he fled next year to Solapoor. He returned, and seized his district during the campaign of 1791, and paid a peishcush of 20,000 rupees to the Mah- rattas; but was expelled at the peace. He then went to Hyderabad, where, I believe, he received some pension. When Terrimullah was made over to the Nizam, in 1799, he was allowed to rent that district, at its full value; but having fallen into arrears, and being appre- hensive that he would be seized and fined, when the country was about to be transferred to the Company, he took refuge in Mysore. He has since returned, and is now soliciting an allowance for his maintenance.

No. 4.—BELLARI, VEERANA.

The ancestor of the family, Balud Hunma Naigue, held the office of dewan under the ryels of Bijnugger. He had five sons, who afterwards established five different zemindaries—Mullapah Naigue, in Bellari; Muddalingah Ramapah Naigue, in Conduppi and Kunnikal; Dewapah Naigue, in Nundial; Mullah Naigue, in Hundi Anantpoor, who succeeded to the office of dewan; and Ankis Naigue, in Chertpet and Chingleput.

Mullapah Naigue, of Bellari, enjoyed a personal jagheer of 35 villages, and held 75 more, with the employments of sirna gour, and the rissooms attached to it, for the service of 2,000 peons. The Bejapoor princes imposed a peishcush on him of C. Pag^s 1,750; and raised his service peons to 3,000.

His personal jagheer was resumed under Aurengzebe; his peons fixed at 2,500, and his peishcush at C. Pag^s 3,500. In Fusly 1132, the Mahrattas imposed a chout of R^s 5,000. In 1151, the service of peons was resumed, and the peishcush raised to R^s 40,000. In 1775, when Hyder took Bellari, the poligar made his escape. He returned, and levied contributions, in 1791, but was driven out the year following, and is since dead.

He was descended from a distant female branch of the family, and was adopted by his predecessor, who had no children. He also has left no issue; and, though some pretenders have appeared, there is, in fact, no heir in existence. His widow, who was forced to abscond under the Mysore government, has returned. She has an adopted son; but, as he is no relation of the ancient line, he can have no claim to inherit any allowance that may be granted her during life.

No. 5.—KOTCONDAR, CHINNAMAH and TIMAMAH.

Permapah Nair, the ancestor, was talliar of the village of Goncondlah in Cansul. On the fall of the Bijnugger government, he collected 500 men, and went to Gulcondah, where he was employed many years, and afterwards obtained the kaweli of the districts of Adoni, Canoul, Gudwal, Rachore and Mudgul, and served with 500 men. The rate of kaweli was one per cent. on the cirkar revenue, and one crore of grain from each village. One of his descendants, Mudapah Nair, served under Aurungzebe, and procured from him a confirmation of the kaweli, and the districts of Kotcondah and Kapitral, estimated at kamul C. Pag^s 15,443, for a rent of C. Pag^s 13,525, and the service of 500 men. Asoph Jah continued the districts to the poligar on the same terms as before. A partition, at this time, took place between two branches of the family, the one getting Kotcondah, and the other Kapitral. In June 1770, Bassalet Jung, being unable to enforce the payment of their peishcush, called in Hyder, who reduced their forts, and delivered them to him. The poligars escaped; but the two brothers, Madapah and Permapah, of Kotcondah, waited on Hyder in 1773, who gave them some enaums in Gooty, where Mudapah died. Permapah accompanied him to the Carnatic, and was appointed one of the Killadars of Arcot.

Arcot, in which situation he died. His mother, who had remained in Adoni, obtained in 1777, from Bassalet Jung, the cirkar village of Hulgurah in jagheer. It was taken from her in 1788, when Mahabut Jung gave her Kotcondah in rent for cantaroy pagodas 13,000; on her death the following year, the widows of her two sons, Madapah and Pennapah, rented it till 1796, when it was placed under the cirkar aumildars, and Hulgurah was again given to the widows for their maintenance. Its kamul rent is cantaroy pagodas 365. Its present rent is cantaroy pagodas 526; but I have resumed it, and the widows now receive a pension from the rent, of cantaroy pagodas 600. They have also enaums, producing about cantaroy pagodas 78 more.

No. 6.—KAPITRAL, SEETAMAH and CHINAMAH.

When the district was reduced by Hyder, as mentioned in No. 5, the poligar Chota Madapah, then a boy, escaped; but being brought back by his relations in 1777, Bassalet Jung gave him the two villages of Radahumdeeri and Annuk for his maintenance, and both Katcondah and Kapitral continued under the charge of aumildars till 1788, when Mahabut Jung gave Kapitral in rent to Madapah, for cantaroy pag^s 6,500. Madapah Nair died in 1790, leaving two widows, one of which was with child of Gopaul Nair, who died in 1799. On Madapah's death, the widows were allowed a pension of 100 rupees each; but Kapitral continued to be rented in the name of Gopaul Nair, by his uncle Kishoo Nair, of Pundicondah, till 1796, when it was given over to the cirkar aumildars. In 1798, both Kapitral and Cocondah were rented by Munsoor ul Donlah, to one Sambayah and Lallmunni, poligar of Pundicondah, who withheld his rent in 1799. Kapitral, when he had fortified himself, was taken; but he escaped to Canoul, from whence he returned after getting cowle, and was restored to the management of the districts, on agreeing to pay up all arrears, and a nuzzer of 12,000 rupees; both districts are now placed under aumildars, and the widows receive their old pension of 100 rupees each.

No. 7.—DOODIKONDAR, PERMAUL NAIR.

Under the Bijnugger government, Mullapah Nair was kawelgar of Doodikondah and Pundicondah; he had two sons, to one of whom, Ramah Nair, he left Pundikondah, and to the other, Papah Nair, Doodikondah. Both of them, rented their districts. Papah Nair was rated by the kamul, at cantaroy pag^s 1,127, for which he paid C. Pag^s 325, and served with 200 peons. The service was remitted by Asoph Jah, and the peishcush raised to C. Pag^s 1,024, at which standard it has ever since remained; but as the kaweli is now stopt, and the district yields only cantaroy pagodas 923; a sum of cantaroy pagodas 450, is allotted for the maintenance of the poligar, and he is to pay the balance to government.

No. 8.—PUNDICONDAH, LALL MUNNI.

This poligar, as mentioned above, is the same family as No. 7; his ancestor, Ramah Nair, held this district, kamul cantaroy pagodas 1,035, under the Bijnugger government, for a rent of cantaroy pagodas 162, and the service of 100 peons. The service was remitted, and the peishcush raised, by Asoph Jah, to cantaroy pagodas 300, at which sum it has ever since continued. The poligar now receives cantaroy pagodas 481, from the rent of his district, and pays the rest to the aumildar.

No. 9.—DEWANCONDAR, RAHMAN NAIGUE.

The ancestor served under the Bejapoor government, with 100 peons, and held Dewan- condah for a peishcush of cantaroy pagodas 812. 5. His son, having been engaged in some disturbances under Naser Jung, was taken and circumcised. Three of his villages were resumed, and the remaining three given to him for a peishcush of cantaroy pagodas 812. Basalet Jung restored two of the villages, and fixed the rent of the five at cantaroy pagodas 1,527. 5. He rebelled in 1768, was taken, and kept in prison till 1786, when he was released, and his five villages restored to him, at the old rent, by Mahabut Jung; he died in 1795. The present poligar, Hussen Naigue, is only fourteen years of age; he receives cantaroy pagodas 234, for his maintenance, and the villages are under the management of the potails.

No. 10.—BUSWAPPOOR, NUNDIKESHOO NAIGUE.

Paupah Nair, the ancestor of the poligars of Baswapoor Poolalcherroo and Bolapillee, served under the Bijnugger Rayels, with 450 peons, and obtained the district of Dornal, in jagheer, for this payment, of which the rayel valuation was Madras pagodas 8,779. 11 1/2. On the conquest of the country by the Hyderabad kings, he was allowed to retain his jagheer, on condition of serving with 600 peons. But the kamul, which was then fixed, was only Madras pagodas 6,625. 6., about one fourth below the Bijnugger assessment, which was probably owing to the ravages of the war. In 1700, the service was reduced by Aurungzebe's officers to 300 men, and a peishcush imposed of cantaroy pagodas 2,275. About the year 1712, the pollam was divided among the three different branches of the family, and in 1730, Buswapoor and Botapilly were annexed to Canoul, while Poolalcherroo remained under Cuddapah. The Buswapoor division consisted of six villages, kamul rent cantaroy pag^s 3,861, for which the poligar paid a peishcush of C. pag^s 1,400. The poligar, Rungapah Nair, who died in 1774, left three sons; but the pollam was seized by his brother, Condapah Nair, who soon after removed, and another brother, Ramapah Nair, appointed by the nabob, on his agreeing to raise the peishcush to cantaroy pagodas 2,100; he was, however, driven out in 1784, by Tippoo Sultan, who took and hanged Madapah Nair, one of the sons of Rungapah Nair. Another of the sons, Mundaikishoo Nair, the present poligar, made his escape, but returned, and was restored by the Nizam's officers in 1791, on con- dition his peishch raised to C. Pag* 72,000. Under Asoph Jah he was deprived of some villages, and received others in return; but, as the total rent was less, his peishch was lowered to C. Pag* 60,000. No change took place till 1766, when Hyder, having reduced the soubahship of Sera, and wishing to avail himself of the services of the Rysseroog poligar against the neighbouring zemindars, fixed his peishch at C. Pag* 50,000. In 1783, he was sent by Tippoo in camp, and sent prisoner to Seringapatam, where he died a violent death. His son and heir, Venentaputty Nair, who was confined in Bangalore, was killed in attempting to escape, during the assault of that place, in 1791.

Raj Gopal Nair, the son of the daughter of the late poligar, attempted to excite disturbances in 1799, but was taken, and sent to Hyderabad, from whence he was lately transferred to Gootty, where he is now in confinement. Being descended from the female line, he has no title to the inheritance. The male line is extinct. At the same time that Gopaul Nair was made prisoner, three wives of the old poligar, and the wife of his son, were thrown into confinement at Anuntpoor, where they still remain, with several relations and servants. They must still be kept under restraint; for, if they were set at liberty, their names might be employed to raise commotions in the country. They receive one rupee, and Raj Gopal Nair two rupees a day, which is very inadequate to their maintenance.

No. 22.—NOSUM, NARSIM REDDY.

The ancestors of this family were, under the Bijnuggur government, principal potails of Chenchamalla, and desmooks of Cumbum, and kept up a body of 2,000 peons, for whose subsistence they were allowed 26,000 cantaroy pagodas, in part of which they, had an assignment of 54 villages, valued at kamul rent cantary pagodas 10,530. On the decline of the Bijnuggur power, they seized the assigned villages; but being reduced by the Cootub Shahi princes of Hyderabad, two years after, they were permitted to hold their possessions, at a peishcush of cantary pagodas 7,800. They also continued to serve with 200 peons, which, however, were paid by tankah, and not by an assignment of villages. About the year 1709, the head of the family, Gopaul Reddy, and his brother Kismam Reddy, were deprived of some of their old villages; but as they had rendered some service to Doaul Khan, obtained some additional villages, which, with what remained of the last, amounted to the kamul rent of cantary pagodas 26,706, for which they were to pay peishcush cantary pagodas 12,229, and serve with 2,600 peons; but the elder brother had certain districts in Cumbum, for which he received 10½ per cent. on the sirkar revenue. It was at this period, that he obtained the office of kawilgur; and some accounts say, that his office of desmook was not of an older date.

About the year 1712, the

About the year 1712, the service of peons was remitted, 24 villages were taken from him, and 13 given in return, making a total of 44 villages, kamul rent cantary pgodas 28,343, in his possession, and his peisheush was raised to cantary pagodas 20,750, of which the detail is as follows :

In 1756, the nabob of Cuddapah was obliged to surrender his country to the merchants. He entered this peishcush at only rupees 44,000, for the purpose of undervaluing his own share; but he collected the full amount. In 1776, Hyder took possession of the zemindarry, and sent the widow of the late poligar, by whom it was then engaged, to Seringapatam. He left her vakeel in charge of the district, with an agent of his own to receive the peishcush. She accompanied him to the Carnatic in 1780, and died the year following at Cumbaconum, when the zemindarry was resumed. Comar Venkat Ranna, the son of Narain Reddy of Oopalore, whom she had adopted, died a few years after her. In 1791, he was appointed to the zemindarry by the Nizam's officers, for an annual peishcush of 80,000 rupees; he however pretended, that he could not pay more than 45,000, and during the five years he held the zemindarry, he paid either the one or the other of these sums, according as the military force in his neighbourhood was strong or weak. In 1795 he died, and was succeeded by his son, Narsum Reddy, who was still more irregular; for he never, in any one year, discharged his peishcush without compulsion. In 1207 and 1208, Assud Alli Khan, having a strong detachment under his command, compelled him to pay 75,000 rupees in each year. In 1209, he again withheld his peishcush; but, being reduced by the assistance of a party of troops furnished by Mess Allans, he agreed to pay the following sums:

As Chundoo Loll, the Nizam's nab, saw no hopes of collecting this money but by force, he marched against Narsim Reddy, and was besieging him in November 1800, when an amildar, sent by me, arrived in camp; in consequence of which hostilities ceased, without any part of the balance being discharged. I made no demand on Narsim Reddy for any whatever was collected from him on account of balances, would occasion a corresponding deficiency in his current peshush. His peshush for the Fussy year 1210, was fixed at 45,000 rupees, to be paid in three kists; but as he did not pay the first, till after the last had become due, and as there was not the smallest probability of his paying the rest, it became necessary to deprive him of the management of the district, as the only way of securing a future revenue. He was surprised, and made prisoner, by General Campbell in June last, and now receives 10 per cent. of the net revenues of his district, by order of government.

The family derive their descent from Tim Raj, of Mutle in Gorumcondah, who served under Isol Raj with 200 peons and 300 horse. He rented the pergunnaahs of Siddoub, Chinnoor, Budweyl, and Permamilah. His descendants, for services rendered to the successors of Isol Raj, were raised to the command of 5,000 peons and 700 horse, and were allowed to rent four more pergunnaahs; viz. Door Camilapoor, Hussanapoor, and Denipoor. They paid their establishment of troops from revenues, and remitted the balance to the sirkar. On the conquest of the country by the Hyderabad princes, the eight pergunnaahs were resumed, and the zemindar received Chetweyl in jagheer, as follows:—

The poligar was to serve with 2,830 peons, whose pay was estimated at 24,809. 6. the Mamul of Pootapnour, and the two villages of Gorumcondah; but if no services were to be performed, he was to pay a peishcush of 60,000 rupees, and Poongalour was to revert to the sirkar. He, however, continued to obtain more favourable terms a few years afterwards; for he was permitted to retain the whole district, on condition of maintaining 2,830 peons, and paying a peishcush of 20,000 peons. But the Nabob of Cuddapah in 1712, having obtained the 8 pergunnahs in jaghire, along with their dependencies, he raised the Chetweyl peishcush in 1716, to 30,000 rupees. In 1722, he gave the poligar the village of Multi in Gorumcondah in jaghire, with the havili russooms, and raised the peishcush to 40,000 rupees. In 1720, he raised it to 50,000. In 1756, when Abdul Meyed, the Nabob of Cuddapah, was reported, and killed by the Mahrattas. His successor, Kelem Khan, in the schedule for dividing the country, entered the Chetweyl peishcush at only 40,000 rupees, in order to reduce the apparent amount of his own; but he not only collected 50,000 as before, but, in the same year, added 40,000 rupees to the peishcush, and 17,000 under the head of durbar khirch, making the total 1,07,000 rupees; at which rate it was continued by Hyder after the conquest of Cuddapah. But the soucar who advanced the amount to Hyder, not having been paid, an amildar was sent to Chetweyl, who collected the first year 1,60,000, and the second year 1,75,000 rupees. was carried by Hyder, in 1780, into the Carnatic, where he died in 1782.
After the death of Hyder, Tippoo fixed the peishchush at 1,20,000 rupees; and he wrote to Venkat Ram Raj, the son of the late poligar, who was then in Chitweyel, that he had confirmed him in the management of the district; but at the same time, invited him to join the army. The poligar excused himself, and paid only about 60,000 rupees in the course of two years; but in 1785, Tippoo having returned from his expedition to the Malabar coast, sent a detachment to occupy Chitweyel, and the poligar fled to the Carnatic. He was restored in 1791. By the Nizam's officers, his peishchush was fixed at 90,000 rupees, but he engaged to pay considerable sums, privately, besides. In 1798, he was removed by Assud Ally, on account of irregularity in discharging his lists, and his younger brother, Venkat

Venkat Ragawa Raj, appointed in his room, who was in his turn, soon after displaced by Chundoo Loll, and the elder brother restored; but the younger offering a nuzzer of 10,000 rupees, and to discharge all arrears, was again reinstated. All this happened in the year preceding the transfer of the district to the Company, in which time, the two brothers paid to Chundoo Loll, the Nizam's maib, peishcush 90,000 rupees; balances 63,000; and nuzzer 10,000: Total 1,65,000.

The elder brother having been sent prisoner to Hyderabad, I fixed the peishcush of the younger at one lac of rupees; but being deeply involved in debt, and his revenues almost entirely assigned to his troops, and his creditors, he let the period of his two first kists pass, without paying a single rupee; and, as he was totally incapable of extricating himself, there was no mode left of realizing the revenue but by dispossessing him, which was done in my last. The two brothers now receive 16 per cent of the net revenue of Chetweyl, by order of government.

No. 24.—OWKE, RAM KISHAN RAJ.

The predecessors of the poligar were servants of the Bijnuggur government, from which they obtained a jagher in 1450, of kamul rent cantaroy pagodas 10,514 in the district of Yargui. When the country fell under the dominion of the kings of Hyderabad, the jagher was continued, and an assignment of 33 additional villages was made to the poligar, for the service of 1,800 men. Under Aurungzebe the jagher was resumed, but with other districts, estimated altogether at Madras pagodas 27,682, was rented to the poligars, on account of Pay-mali, at 20,000 rupees; and Owke, rated at Madras pagodas 10,258, was assigned to him for the service of 1,000 peons. In 1712 he went to Delhi, and on paying 50,000 rupees, got his service remitted. In 1719, Yargui was taken from him, and the peishcush of the remaining districts raised to 45,000 rupees. In 1778, the poligar submitted to Hyder, who deprived him of part of his districts, and fixed the peishcush of the remainder at cantaroy pagodas 10,500, which was nearly the full value, at the time. He carried him, in 1780, into the Carnatic, where he died. The peishcush continued, for three years after, to be paid by his vakeel; but the district being resumed by Tippoo, the present poligar Ram Kishan Raj, then a minor, fled to Salapoor. He returned in 1792, and was reinstated in his old districts for a peishcush of rupees 45,000; but was turned out in 1796, for not paying punctually. In 1798 he was again permitted to rent a small district, Mettoor, valued by Tippoo's rental at cantaroy pagodas 5,843, for a peishcush of 2,485 cantaroy pagodas; but as he had considerable influence, and was collecting followers, I have removed him in order that he may be pensioned.

No. 25.—HANNA MUNT & NARSAPUR.

The founder of this family was one Kirnam Reddy, potail of Marsapoor, who, on the decline of the Bijnuggur empire, withheld his rents, and forfeited his village. He submitted to the Hyderabad princes, by whom he was allowed to retain the district he had seized, rated at kamul cantaroy pagodas 13,734. 4. 13½; for peishcush 2,100 cantaroy pagodas; and the service of 500 peons. In 1643, the succession devolving on a minor, the district was resumed, and a pension of 300 rupees monthly, settled on the family. In 1708, Mulla Reddy, the heir, was restored by the Mogul fowzdar Daoud Khan, on condition of paying a peishcush of rupees 13,000, and serving with 500 peons. The Nabob of Cuddapah, a few years afterwards, remitted the service, and raised the peishcush to 25,000 rupees, and in 1756, to cantaroy pagodas 9,625. In 1779, Hyder seized the district, and fixed the peishcush at

Rupees	27,500

He carried the poligar into the Carnatic next year, where he served with 500 men paid by the circar, but dying in 1781, his district was held by his son Boochia Reddy, till 1784, when he was expelled. He died in exile, leaving two widows, who were restored in 1790, by the Nizam's officers, for a peishcush of 24,000 rupees. One of the widows dying in 1794, Narsapoor, her share was resumed, and rented to a Patan, who found it necessary to let Venkatachellaputty Reddy, a distant relation of the poligar, manage under him. The other widow, Alamah, kept possession of Hummuntgoond, her share, till 1796, when she was expelled. In 1799 she returned from Calcutta, to which place she had fled, and rented Hummuntgoond for 10,000 rupees; she also agreed to pay 31,000 for that district and Narsapoor, on condition that the Nizam's officers should drive out Venkatachellaputty; but they were unable to do this, and both districts were completely desolated in the struggle. Venkatachellaputty, having no right to the succession, has been expelled by the Company's troops; and Alamah, the widow, has been deprived of the management of her district, in order that she may be pensioned.

No. 26.—SANGAPUTTAN & KALVADDAH.

This is a branch of the Nosum family, from which it separated in 1644, when Mulla Reddy received 11 villages kamul cantaroy pag' 8,607 to maintain 300 peons. Under Aurungzebe, a peishcush was imposed of cantaroy pag' 2,236, and the service raised to 500 peons. The Nabobs of Cuddapah, in 1719, discontinued the peons, and augmented the peishcush to cantaroy pag' 9,100, at which rate it remained till 1778, when Hyder reduced the poligar, but settled the peishcush as before. He carried him into the Carnatic, where he died in 1781, when the district was resumed. The son was reinstated by the Nizam's officers in 1791, in all his villages but one, for a peishcush of cantaroy pagodas 7,000, which he never paid regularly. I resumed his russooms and enaums, and settled his peishcush last year, at cantaroy pag' 5,400. He paid none of his kists at the stipulated periods; and in July last, after confining two of the amildar's peons, who had been sent to demand payment, he fled, with a balance against him of cantaroy pagodas 1,141, and his district has in consequence been resumed.

No. 27.—BOOYEMENOOR.

The poligars of this village were a branch of the Hummuntgoond family, No. 25. and after their separation from it, about the middle of the 17th century, they held the village rated at kamul rent 27 cantaroy pagodas to maintain 50 peons. Under Aurungzebe, they obtained four additional villages, making with the former, one total kamul rent cantaroy pagodas 4,562 assessed, with a peishcush of cantaroy pagodas 1,337, and the service of 300 peons. The new villages were resumed in 1729 by the Nabob of Cuddapah, and the peishcush of the original one, was fixed cantaroy pagodas 175, which was raised in 1756 to cantaroy pagodas 350. In 1778, Hyder expelled the poligar Yerra Tenirah Reddy, who soon after died, leaving no heirs; his widow, Boochamah, was restored by the Nizam's officers in 1792, and paid a peishcush of 1,200 rupees; but she was deprived of the village in 1795, and received some small enaums in land for her maintenance, which she still enjoys. She has an adopted son, who has, however, no right to the inheritance.

No. 28.—TIPPEREDYPILLI and ANDEREDYPILLI.

The ancestors, Gopal Reddy, and Narasim Reddy, during the Bijnuggur government, rented Siddout from Chitweyl zemindary. They rendered some service to the Mussulman invaders, for which the king of Hyderabad gave them three villages jagher to maintain 300 peons: Aurungzebe reduced the service to 150 peons, and imposed a peishcush of cantaroy pagodas 1,040. The Nabobs of Cuddapah remitted the service, and raised the peishcush to cantaroy pagodas 2,301; but the poligar Nasunnair, not paying his kists, and also committing depredations on the neighbouring districts, they expelled him in 1775: he however continued to commit depredations, and was in the district, when it fell under Hyder, and died the following year. Honooramah, his widow, sent a party of peons, who surprised, and killed, Hyder's amildar in 1792. The fear of sharing the like fate, induced Tippoo's amildar to let her rent the villages privately; but she was taken and put to death by the Nizam's officers in 1795, for constant rebellion. Her adopted son died the following year, and was succeeded by Comar Nasunnair Rencatadu, her nephew, who got Tipperedypilli; and the other villages, Dassareddypilli and Muddoreddypilli, were given to two other relations of the family. The joint rent was fixed at Madras pagodas 1,877 in 1796, but was lowered in 1799 to Madras pagodas 750. They however paid very little of either; and as they not only refused last year to come in and settle their rents, but also sent parties to levy contributions in the neighbouring villages, they were expelled.

No. 29.—MOOTIALPOOR.

Runganair Kawelgar of Mootialpoor, served under the Bijnuggur rajahs with 700 peons, and seized that district, of which the kamul is cantaroy pagodas 4,854, on the fall of the empire, and was permitted to hold it by the kings of Hyderabad, for peishcush of 1,500 rupees, and the service of 200 peons; the district was resumed under Aurungzebe, but the poligar still enjoyed the kaweli russooms. The Nabob of Cuddapah restored it for a peishcush of 2,000 rupees, which was afterwards raised to 3,000 rupees. In 1778 he was expelled by Hyder, but by remaining in the neighbouring Melmal hills, he was enabled to collect the kaweli; and Tippoo's amildars, as the only means of stopping his depredations, allowed him to hold Mootialpoor privately, under them, for 4,000 rupees; he held it openly under the Nizam's officers for peishcush 5,000 rupees: in Fusly 1202 he died, and was succeeded by his son Ragonaut Nair, who dying in 1210 without issue, was succeeded by his uncle Narsim Nair, a man of 60, without children. The rents of the district are now fixed by the amildar; but the poligar receives cantaroy pagodas 800, from the amount.

No. 30.—WHORAPUR, KUGPUT REDDY.

Veswapal Reddy, under the Bijnuggur government, was potail of Racherlah. On the conquest of the country by the Mussulmen, he obtained Whorapur and some other villages in rent, and was allowed a remission in the rent of cantaroy pagodas 2,500 for the pay of 200 peons, who served under the command of his brother. Under Aurungzebe, the pay was reduced to cantaroy pag' 1,554. The Nabobs of Cuddapah remitted the service, and raised the peishcush to C. P. 3,920, but lowered in 1756 to C. Pag' 3,850. A few years before Hyder's invasion, Sonky Reddy, the poligar, had rebelled and been expelled, and returned several times. He was taken by Hyder, and carried off; but released, and returned and lived privately in his own district, where he died in 1782. Having no children, his cousin, Kinah Reddy, seized the district in 1790, and died in 1792: his peishcush was C. Pag' 3,500, but that of his successor was raised to C. Pag' 4,550; I have resumed Racherlah, leaving him only Whorapur, from the rent of which, fixed by the amildar, he receives a pension of C. Pag' 850.

No. 31.—OAPALPOOR, NARSIM REDDY.

The ancestor obtained a village of Oolapoor kamul rent C. Pag' 1,217, from the king of Hyderabad, for the maintenance of 100 peons: It was afterwards resumed about 1,650, but was restored to the family by Aurungzebe, on condition of paying 350 C. pag' peishcush, and maintaining 100 peons. In 1712 the Nabob of Cuddapah remitted the service, and fixed the peishcush at C. Pag' 700. In 1748 the poligar was expelled, and his pollah resumed.

but he was restored again in 1776; he was expelled in 1779 by Hyder: he returned during the war in 1791, and obtained two other villages in addition to his old one. The kamul rent of the whole was C. Pag^{rs} 2,517, for which he paid peshcush C. Pag^{rs} 1,400: I directed the amildar in February 1801, to resume the two new villages, but the poligar refused to give them up, and drove away his peons. He was, however, forced to relinquish them in June following, when the division under general Campbell arrived at Cuddapah. The poligar was permitted to retain his ancient village; but as he refused, in November last, to come in and settle his peshcush, he was seized by a detachment of cavalry, and sent prisoner to Gooty, where he receives an annual allowance of C. Pag^{rs} 250.

No. 32.—TALMURAH KONAM RAI.

The ancestor of the family was related to the Bijnuggur Rajas, and commanded a body of troops, for the payment of which he held several districts of Sawenoor in jagheer; on the fall of Bijnuggur, he obtained three villages in jagheer, from the king of Hyderabad, amounting to kamul rent C. Pag^{rs} 1,781. 1.; under Aurungzebe he held only one village, kamul rent C. Pag^{rs} 1,358, and was obliged to maintain 100 peons. The Nabobs of Cuddapah remitted the service, and imposed a peshcush of C. Pag^{rs} 700, which was raised by Morari Row to 1,050, who afterwards resumed the village. The poligar in consequence, joined Hyder in 1774, who restored him for the former peshcush C. Pag^{rs} 1,050. The Sultan raised the village to the full rent, but afterwards deprived the poligar of the management of it; he however, retained him in his service, with a party of peons, till 1791, when he returned to his village, which he rented under the Nizam's officers at the full value. I have since resumed it, and gave him an allowance in land.

No. 33.—PYAPILLI, KONDAL, NAIR.

The ancestor of the family was raised by the Bijnuggur rajahs, to the command of 10,000 peons, for seizing the Chingleput poligar, who had rebelled. The district of Pyapilli, kamul rent C. Pag^{rs} 23,400, was assigned in lieu of the pay of two months; the rest was disbursed from the Treasury. The Hyderabad kings continued the jagheer for the service of 1,500 peons and 100 horse; Aurungzebe fixed the service at 800 peons, and imposed a peshcush of 20,000 rupees. The Cuddapah Nabob resumed seven villages, leaving the poligar 37, amounting to kamul C. Pag^{rs} 18,453, and in reward for his enabling him to take Gujicottah by treachery, from its poligar Temsan Nair, remitted his service, and lowered his peshcush to 12,000 R^s.

In 1767, the poligar Vencatapur Nair, not complying with some demands made upon him by Morari Row, was removed, and his brother Ringapah Nair appointed; but he also being unable to pay the sums required, was dispossessed; and both brothers fled to Sorapoor. In 1774 Hyder entertained Ringapah Nair, with a party of peons, to garrison Pyapilli; but the poligar dying next year, the district was resumed. His son Vencatapur enjoyed some of 25 pagodas for himself. In 1785, he was carried to Seringapatam by Tippoo, his men disbanded, and himself murdered. In 1791, his son seized the district, but fled again at the peace next year. In 1799 he returned, and rented two villages at their full value, under the Nizam's officers; but he was allowed to collect rissooms, and to enjoy some small enaums in land. I have taken the villages out of his hands, and left his enaums lands for the present.

No. 34.—MUDDIKERAH MULLE, KAYUM, NAIR.

The founder of the family enjoyed three villages of the kamul rent of C. pagodas 2,277, in jagheer under the Bijnuggur government. The jagheer was continued by the kings of Hyderabad, on condition of his maintaining 130 peons. Under Aurungzebe the poligar obtained the 7 villages of Muddikerah, in addition to the former, making a total kamul rent of C. pagodas 17,505. to pay the peshcush of 9,000 rupees, and maintain 300 peons. In 1712 his district was transferred to Adone, and resumed, but 7 of old villages, with the addition of two new ones, were restored in 1719 for a peshcush of 30,000 rupees. In 1766, Morari Row exacted a chout in addition, of 7,000 rupees. In 1774 Hyder resumed the district, and granted the poligar an annual allowance of 500 Cantary pagodas, and some rissooms; but in 1785, Tippoo confined him in Gooty, and hanged him in 1789, because his brother had escaped. The brother seized Muddikera, during the war in 1790, but was expelled at the peace; he returned again in 1799, and was put in possession of Muddikera for a peshcush of Cantary pagodas 6,412. But I have thought it advisable to remove him, in order that he may be pensioned.

No. 35.—KUMMALPOOR, GOORAPAH, NAIR.

The ancestor was a common tallari or kaveligar under the Bijnuggur government, on the overthrow of which he seized his village. He was allowed to retain it, under the Hyderabad kings, on condition of serving with 50 peons. It was resumed by Aurungzebe, but restored by the Cuddapah nabobs for the kamul rent, but it was raised by the Marhattas to cantary pagodas 537, on which terms the kaveligar held it till 1775, when he was expelled by Hyder. He was restored in 1799 by the Nizam's officer, for a peshcush of 47 cantary pagodas. He offered me the same rent, but refused to come, he cutcherry; and has, of course, been expelled.

No. 36.—GHUTTAM, RAGONAUT NAIR.

In 1360 Narsim Nair, for services performed under the Annagoondy rajahs, obtained a jagheer of 10 villages kamul, rental cantary pagodas 19,743, on condition of maintaining at all times 500 peons, and 1000 during war. The jagheer is said to have been held without any material change till 1718, when the Nabob of Cuddapah imposed a peshcush of cantary pagodas 4,000; and he about the same time rented the village of Tippooasmoodeen to the poligar at 10,000 rupees, for three years, which he however continued to him till 1728, when he took it from him. In 1756, when Chaitum was ceded to the poligar, Nabob of Cuddapah, previous to the cession, rented Tippooasmoodeen again to the poligar for the sake of a nuzzer of rupees 1,000; the grandfather and father of Kumer ul deen, who held Gorumcondah in jagheer under the Marhattas, permitted the poligar to retain his villages on the old peshcush. No addition was made to it, when Meer Saib submitted to Hyder in 1766; but the Marhattas, recovering possession of Gorumcondah in 1771, they deprived the poligar of Tippooasmoodeen, and demanded him, on receiving 5,500 rupees in 1774. Hyder, not paying, they expelled him; but restored him, on receiving 5,500 rupees of the province, who having again reduced Gorumcondah, appointed Kabber Beg soobah of the province, who made no alteration in the peshcush; but the country being given in jagheer the year following to Meer Saib, he expelled the poligar, who fled to Venkatgherry, where he died. The present man, his brother, made himself the Ghatt polliam in 1790, but withdrew in 1792, leaving however a party of peons behind, who killed Tippoo's amildar, and continued to make partial collections till 1799, when he returned himself, and obtained from Cumer ul deen his ancient district Chaitum, with the village of Tippooasmoodeen for a peshcush of cantary pagodas 7,500, and nuzzer cantary pagodas 3,150. Total cantary pagodas 10,650.

I have assumed Tippooasmoodeen, as it was not a part of his hereditary possessions, but left him Ghittim on more favourable terms than have been allowed to the other poligars, because he furnished some supplies for the army during the campaigns of 1791 and 1792; and has sunnuds from Lord Cornwallis, and Sir Charles Oakley, promising conditionally, to confirm him in the enjoyment of his former rights. He now rents his district, and receives cantary pagodas 2,000 annually from the produce.

No. 37.—BUTLAPOOR, OR PEDAPOLLAM.

The ancestor of the family, a servant of the Annagoondy rajahs, obtained three villages for the purpose of maintaining 300 peons. The kings of Hyderabad remitted the service, and imposed a peshcush of cantary pagodas 210. No change took place till 1718, when he got the village of Demalcherroo for a rent of rupees 2,000, which he held till 1766, when the Cuddapah Nabob, at the time of giving over his poliam to the Marhattas, granted him four additional villages for a private nuzzer. The whole were estimated at kamul pagodas 5,597, on which the Marhattas fixed a peshcush of cantary pagodas 2,450, and made no abatement in 1770, when they resumed Pungahsamoodeen, the largest of the villages. In 1774, the poligar was expelled by Meer Saib; but he returned, like other poligars, in 1790, and fled again in 1792. In 1799 he seized the 8 villages he enjoyed under the Marhattas, and also an additional one, of which he had taken possession in 1791, and the whole were confirmed to him by Cumer ul deen for a peshcush of cantary pagodas 4,550; and nuzzer 1,750: Total cantary pagodas 6,300. I have resumed the village he seized during the former Mysore war, and also the four which he obtained at the time of the cession of the country to the Marhattas, in 1756, and left him only the four which he held under the Cuddapah Nabobs. He is of the same family with No. 36.

No. 38.—SAMPILLI, MULLAPAH, NAIR.

The family, during the Bijnuggur government, obtained five villages in jagheer of the kamul rent of cantary pagodas 3,250. to maintain 400 peons. A peshcush of cantary pagodas 910, was afterwards imposed by the Hyderabad kings. The villages were resumed by the Marhattas in 1756; but relinquished next year for a peshcush of 1,575 cantary pagodas. The poligar was expelled under Hyder's government, by Meer Saib; and also in 1799, when Cumer ul deen raised his peshcush to cantary pagodas 1,925. He now rents his villages, and receives an allowance of cantary pagodas 420 from the produce.

No. 39.—TOOMALCOONDI, CHINA CONDRIPUTTI.

The ancestor was a common ryot, who, at the request of the pottal and curum of Mundeyum, put to death the kavelgar of that village, for which service they gave him a small village in enaum, and another in rent; the kamul of both, was cantary pagodas 714. At this rate, they were held by the family till about eighty years ago, when they held additional villages in rent from the Nabob of Cuddapah; making, with those they held before, a total kamul rent of Cantary pagodas 748, for a peshcush of cantary pagodas 1,400. In 1756, the Marhattas gave the poligar two more villages in rent, at the full assessment; but he was expelled in 1775, by Meer Saheb, and like the other poligars, returned again during the two last Mysore wars. Cumer ul deen Khan in 1799, confirmed him in the possession of his six villages for peshcush cantary pagodas 1,537, and nuzzer cantary pagodas 1,400. Total cantary pagodas 2,937. I have resumed the two villages given by the Marhattas, and converted the peshcush of the others, into rent.

No. 40.—YELLOOTLAH, VEERAPAH NAIR.

During the Bijnuggur government, the ancestor of this poligar obtained a small tract of jungle in rent for cantary pagodas 16; but as it was found to have been much improved when the country was reduced by the Hyderabad kings, it was assessed at the full kamul cantary pagodas 450, and remained in the family at the same rate, till 1775, when the poligar was expelled by Meer Saheb. But he returned in 1791, and again in 1799, when he continued it to him assessed by Cumer ul deen Khan, at cantary pagodas 375. I have continued it to him in rent.

No. 41.—KULLIPUNDAM, CUDDIPAH, NAIR.

An ancestor of this family, about 1650, under the Golcondah Kings, obtained kullipundam in rent at the full kamul assessment, cantary pagodas 1,400; together with the kaweli russooms of 12 other villages. No change was made in the tenure till 1713, when the Nabob of Cuddapah lowered the peishensh to cantary pagodas 717; probably on account of the decay of cultivation: for even the rental of Tippoo is greatly below the kamul. The Mahrattas, in 1756, raised the peishensh to cantary pagodas 759. In 1775 the poligar was taken, and hanged by Meer Sahib; but his son escaping to Canitoor, recovered possession of his pollam in 1791, and again in 1793; when he also seized three extra villages, of which the kamul, with that of his own, amounted to cantary pagodas 4,326; he engaged to pay Cummur ul deen Khan, a peishensh of cantary pagodas 2,164. I have resumed the new villages, and rented the old one to him.

No. 42.—BOANMULLAH, VENKATAPURI, NAIR.

The ancestor, like several of the petty poligars of Goramcondah, at the time of the kamul survey by the Golcondah Kings, obtained a village in rent, at the full assessment cantary pagodas 70, which was raised by the Cuddapah Nabobs to cantary pagodas 101. The village was resumed by Hyder; but the poligar remained privately in the country. He recovered his village by force in 1791; and after the peace, was permitted by Tippoo's asophs, to rent it, under another name. In 1799, his rent was fixed, at nearly the full produce of the village by Cummur ul deen. He still continues to be assessed at the full rent, after deducting a portion for his subsistence.

No. 43.—KOOTAPOLLEM, NARSIM, NAIR.

The ancestor was a kawelgar, who, under the Golcondah Kings, got a village in rent, at the full kamul assessment cantary pagodas 125, which was afterwards raised by the Cuddapah Nabobs, cantary pagodas 169; and by the Mahrattas, to cantary pagodas 182. The poligar's family were almost all taken and hanged, by Meer Sahib, but he escaped himself to the Carnatic; returned, and seized his villages in 1791—remained privately in the country, as a ryot, after the peace of 1792; but took possession of his pollam again in 1799, and was confirmed by Cummur ul deen for a peishensh of cantary pagodas 700; and who rents it under the Company's amildar.

No. 44.—YERRAGOONTAPOLLEM, CUDDIPUTTI.

The ancestors of this family served under the Bijnugger rayels with 50 peons, at the period of the kamul survey, the service was remitted, and they obtained a village in rent at the full assessment, cantary pagodas 148, with kaweli russooms. No change took place till cultivation, was reduced to cantary pagodas 111. The poligar was, however, expelled a few years afterwards by Meer Sahib, but he recovered his villages in 1791; and was allowed by the Asoph enaum Beg, to hold it after the peace, at a rent of cantary pagodas 253; at which amount it was also confirmed to him by Cummur ul deen. He now rents it, under the amildar.

No. 45.—MADANEYNPOLLEM, MADAH, NAIR.

This is an insignificant poligar, whose family, during the Golcondah government, obtained a village of kamul rent, 5 cantary pagodas in rent, with some kaweli russooms, which they held without increase of rent, till Tippoo raised it to the full assessment. The village is now continued to the poligar, rated at its actual produce, after allowing him a remission of 12 Pag^a annually for his support.

No. 46.—MADDANPILLI, VENKATAPAH, NAIR.

Nagapah Nair, the founder of this family, for assisting Kishen, rayel of Bijnugger to take Gurramcondah, obtained a jagher of 16 villages, kamul rent C. Pag^a 1,025, to maintain 1,000 peons. On making the kamul survey, the Golcondah government resumed 14 of the villages, assessed the remaining two at the full rent C. Pag^a 421, and remitted the service. The Cuddapah nabobs gave the two villages in jagher to their dewan, Sunkarjee Punt; but it is said that the poligar was allowed to rent them under the family of the jagheer, on favourable terms. When Hyder reduced the country, the jagher was resumed, and the poligar remained privately in the district, and took advantage of the hostilities in 1791, to make himself master of the whole 16 villages of his ancient pollam. He at that time, received cowle from government through Captain Read; but at the peace in 1792, the pollam was allowed by Tippoo's servants to remain in the country, and to rent for C. Pag^a 253, the two villages which had formerly been given in jagher to Sunkarjee Punt. In 1799 he took up arms, and again occupied the 16 villages, which Cummur ul deen found it necessary to let him hold, on condition of his paying a peishensh of C. Pag^a 12,250; of this sum, he discharged very little. He revolted, and applied his revenue to the maintenance of a large body of peons; but as he disbanded them, as soon as the country was transferred by the Nizam, and as the Company's cowle, which he received in the former war, gave him some claim to consideration, I have allowed him to rent one of the two villages which he rented between 1792 and 1799, and made a deduction of 450 C. Pag^a from the rent, as an annual pension for him. This is, in fact, little more than half of what he then got by renting the two villages, because he paid only C. Pag^a 253 for them; and, though they did not yield the standard assessment C. Pag^a 1,218, their produce was probably, at least two-thirds of it.

No. 47.—PAPPILLI, PAPPAN, NAIR.

The ancestors of this poligar served under the Bijnugger Rayels with 300 peons, for the pay of which they received annually C. Pag^a 3,000. They also rented a village at the full valuation. After the kamul survey they obtained another village, and the rent of both, C. Pag^a 1,038, was assigned to them to maintain 300 peons. Aurangzebe discontinued the service, resumed the new village, and imposed a rent on the old one, of C. Pag^a 383, which was raised by the Cuddapah nabobs to C. Pag^a 400. The poligar was expelled by Meer Sahib in 1774, but recovered the village in 1791, and after the peace, rented it under a fictitious name for R^a 1,400; when it was confirmed to him by Meer Sahib. The poligar now receives 60 Pag^a from the produce, and the village is rented by a potail.

No. 48.—TUTT, SOORAM, NAIR.

This family were, during the Bijnugger government, dilwars of the Ghuttim poligar. of whom they held these villages, but under the Golcondah Kings, they held it immediately of government: its kamul rent C. Pag^a 2,400, for which they paid peishensh C. Pag^a 700, and maintained 90 peons. Aurangzebe remitted the service, resumed the moza or principal village, of kamul rent C. Pag^a 201 in enaum. In 1712 the Cuddapah nabob gave the village in jagher to Golam ul Deen, one of his own servants, and settled a pension of 600 R^a on the poligar. The pension was stoppt, and the village restored in 1729. It was resumed in 1738, and restored again on the conquest by the Mahrattas. The poligar was expelled by Meer Sahib in 1774, returned in 1791, and seized the inferior village; and after the peace, was permitted to rent it for C. Pag^a 25, which was raised in 1799 to C. Pag^a 60 by Cummur ul Deen. The village is now rented by a potail, and a remission of 48 Pag^a allowed for the poligar.

No. 49.—RAMPICHERLAH, VEERAPAH, NAIR.

The ancestors under the Bijnugger government held a village of kamul rent C. Pag^a 455. The service was discontinued by the Hyderabad Kings, and the full rent imposed. The village was resumed by the Mahrattas in 1772, but restored again for a rent of C. Pag^a 805, which, however, was not a third of Tippoo's assessment. The poligar was expelled by Meer Sahib in 1776, regained possession in 1791, and remained privately in the country after the peace in 1792, and received the profits of his village, which was held by the potail, at a low rent. In 1799 he established himself by force, like the other poligars, and held his village under Cummur ul Deen, at a peishensh of C. Pag^a 1,680, which I have changed to rent.

No. 50.—MULLYAL, VENKATAPETTI, NAIR.

The Bijnugger rajahs gave three villages kamul rent cantary pagodas 2,703 in enaum, to the poligar's ancestor, for his service. He had also kaweli russooms, for which he was to maintain 300 peons. His villages were resumed by the Hyderabad government, but he continued to rent them with an additional village, rated altogether at kamul rent cantary pagodas 2,880, for the full assessment, and the service was remitted. No further change happened under any of the successive governments, till Hyder, when the poligar was expelled by Meer Sahib. Though he had paid the full kamul rent, yet as his pollam, by Tippoo's assessment, appears to have been worth twice as much, and as he had enjoyed a considerable income from kaweli, it was an object of consequence to him to re-establish himself, which he accordingly effected in 1799, and seized his whole inheritance, with two additional villages, of which the total kamul rent was cantary pagodas 3,086, and Tippoo's assessment cantary pagodas 6,150, for which he engaged to pay Cummur ul Deen a peishensh of cantary pagodas 3,850. I have left him his old villages, and the two new ones. The poligar is a minor; but from the abilities of his dilwars, and the amount of his kaweli russooms, he was, after the poligars of Venkiah and Ghuttim, the most powerful in Gurramcondah.

No. 51.—DOODIPILLI, BORI MULL, NAIR.

One of the ancestors of this family having fallen in battle, his son obtained from the Bijnugger rajahs, an enaum of four villages of the kamul rent of 1,011 C. pag^a, to serve with 200 peons; under the Hyderabad government, the service was remitted, and the full rent imposed upon the villages. The Cuddapah nabobs gave the poligar three additional villages, making altogether a kamul rent of cantary Pag^a 3,045, for a peishensh of 805 Pag^a, which was raised by the Mahrattas in 1756 to C. Pag^a 1,140, and continued without alteration till 1776, when Meer Sahib expelled the poligar, who again obtained a peishensh possession in 1791, and established himself in 1799 in his inheritance; on which Cummur ul deen imposed a peishensh of C. pag^a 2,800, for which I have substituted a variable rent.

No. 52.—MUDANCHERROO, BUSWANT, NAIR.

The ancestors of this family, which is a branch of that of Mallyal (No. 10.) Living about the year 1720, attended the nabob of Cuddapah's entcherry, and given some information which was found useful in settling the revenue of Goramcondah, obtained three villages of the kamul rent of C. Pag^a 730, for peishensh of C. Pag^a 105. In 1756, he got two more villages from Gopaul Hurry, the Mahratta manager, making altogether kamul rent cantary pagodas 1,007, for which he was assessed in a peishensh of cantary pagodas 210. No other change occurred till Goramcondah was reduced by Hyder, when Meer Sahib seized the poligar, threw him into prison, and fed him on equal quantities of flour and salt, till he died. His children remained privately in the country, and as they never excited any disturbances, Sieh Sahib, when he got part of Gornumcondah in jagheer, in 1792 restored the three to his hereditary villages at the former peishush, but making him, at the same time, serve him personally with 50 peons. In 1793, he got four additional villages from Cummur ul Deen, which, with those he held before, were rated at kamul rent cantaroy pagodas 2,095, for which he stipulated to pay cantaroy pagodas 1,100. He now retained both the four villages given to him by Cummur ul Deen, and the two he obtained from the Mahrattas, and left him only the three which he held under the government of the Cuddapah Nabob.

No. 53.—KOKIMTI, MULLAPAH, NAIR.

The ancestors of this poligar obtained for their services, during the Bijnuggur government, an engum of ten villages, rated at kamul cantaroy pagodas 18,376, with an other burden than that of maintaining 300 peons, the charge of which was however defrayed chiefly by the kaweli rissooms they had in the neighbouring districts; the service was remitted about the middle of the 17th century by the Hyderabad government, and peishush levied of cantaroy pagodas 2,800, which, about 1720, was raised by the Nabob of Cuddapah, to cantaroy pagodas 3,150. The Mahrattas, in 1756, lowered it to cantaroy pagodas 2,800, but raised it in 1763 to Cantaroy pagodas 3,430, at which it continued till Meer Sahib having got Gornumcondah in jagheer from Hyder, took the poligar prisoner, and threw him into confinement, where he died. His son, who had escaped, regained possession of his pollam in 1790, and though expelled in 1792, he contrived, by means of his peons, to levy annual contributions till 1799, when he recovered the pollam a second time, and likewise seized two additional villages, the whole of which were rated by Tippoos standard assessment, at cantaroy pagodas 6,832, for which he stipulated to pay Cummur ul Deen a peishush of cantaroy pagodas 4,900; but being continually engaged in hostilities against the jagheer of Talpoor, he was unable to fulfil his engagements. He have resumed the two new villages, and left him the ten which anciently belonged to his family. The Kokimti and Sompilli (No. 38.) families are of the same origin.

No. 54.—MARRELLAH, RAMAH, NAIR.

The ancestor of this poligar rented, under the Golcondah kings, a village of kamul cantaroy pagodas 141, for cantaroy Pag^a 56, and served with 50 peons. The rent was raised under Aurungzebe to cantaroy pagodas 86. 5. The Cuddapah Nabobs raised it to cantaroy pagodas 175, and discontinued the service. The poligar was expelled in 1774 by Meer Sahib, but returned, and recovered his village again in 1799, and held it of Cummur ul Deen for cantaroy Pag^a 445. It is now rented by the potail, and the poligar has a small allowance from the amount for his subsistence.

No. 55.—SHILLIWARPOLLEM, BUSWAPAH, NAIR.

The ancestors were kawelgars of Kotkull, under the Bijnuggur government; they afterwards obtained a village of kamul rent cantaroy pagodas 1,004, to pay 75 under the Golcondah princes. Aurungzebe gave them the cowle of their village, and imposed a rent of cantaroy Pag^a 70. The Cuddapah nabobs raised it cantaroy Pag^a 245, and discontinued the service, and in 1720 resumed the village; but it was restored in 1756 by the Mahrattas, for a peishush of cantaroy Pag^a 288. The poligar was expelled in 1774; returned in 1791, and, after the peace, remained privately in the country till 1799, when he again rented his village under Cummur ul Deen for cantaroy pagodas 60 from the produce.

No. 56.—YERRAWARPOLLAM, TIMMAPAH, NAIR.

Under the rayels of Bijnuggur, the ancestors of this poligar were talliars of Yerrawarpollam; they rented it under the Golcondah kings, at the full kamul rent cantaroy Pag^a 1,135, and they served with 75 peons, for whose maintenance they received an annual allowance of cantaroy Pag^a 1,040; Aurungzebe they served with 100 peons, whose annual pay amounted to cantaroy pagodas 1,300, in part of which the village was assigned. In 1712 the nabob of Cuddapah discontinued their service, and imposed a peishush of cantaroy Pag^a 473; but in 1740, being employed with 50 peons by the amildar of Gornumcondah, their peishush was reduced to cantaroy Pag^a 87. They were expelled in 1774, by Meer Sahib; the poligar returned during the two last Mysore wars, and in 1799 held his village of Cummur ul Deen at a rent of cantaroy Pag^a 552. The potail now rents the village, from the produce of which cantaroy pagodas 120 are deducted, for the subsistence of the poligar.

No. 57.—MILACHERROO, CHINNAN, NAIR.

One of the ancestors was delwery of the poligar of Midimalapa. Condah, before Gornumcondah was built, and served with 500 men, and had for himself a jagheer, of which Milacherroo was a part. But both the delwery and his master were taken by Kishen, Rayel of Bijnuggur, and put to death; under the Golcondah kings, a descendant of the delwery served with 100 peons, and Milacherroo, kamul rent pagodas 52, was assigned to him, in part of their pay. Under Aurungzebe, the poligar obtained the village for his personal maintenance, and his peons were paid by the cirkar. The nabob of Cuddapah imposed a peishush of cantaroy Pag^a 35, which was raised by the Mahrattas to cantaroy Pag^a 52. The poligar was expelled in 1774; returned in 1791, and rented his village privately till 1799, when Cummur ul Deen fixed his rent at cantaroy pagodas 160. He now receives cantaroy Pag^a 60 from the amount, and the potail rents the villages.

No. 58.—RUNGENGARPOLLAM, PAPY, NAIR.

The ancestors in the times of the Golcondah government rented a majera, or inferior village, for 20 cantary pagodas; under Aurungzebe, they served with 75 peons, for whom they received an annual allowance of cantary pagodas 210, was assigned to them. moza, or superior village, yielding a rent of cantary pagodas 210, and imposed a peishush of cantary Pag^a 163. The nabob of Cuddapah discontinued the service, and imposed a peishush of cantary Pag^a 141, which in 1756, was raised by the Mahrattas to cantary Pag^a 163. The poligar was expelled in 1774, returned in 1791, and, after the peace, was permitted to hold his village under a fictitious name. In 1790, Cummur ul Deen fixed his rent at cantary pagodas 230. He now receives cantary Pag^a 72 from the produce, and the potail rents the village.

No. 59.—YELLAMUNDAB, MULLAPAH, NAIR.

The ancestors of the present poligar were made kawelgars of Yellamundab, during Aurungzebe's reign, and rented the village at the full kamul cantary pagodas 42. The rent was raised by the Cuddapah nabob to cantary Pag^a 96, and in 1756, by the Mahrattas, to cantary pagodas 148. In 1774 the poligar was expelled by Meer Sahib, but returned in 1791, and, after the peace, continued to hold his village privately, by the connivance of Tippoos servants. Cummur ul Deen, in 1799, fixed his rent at cantary pagodas 600. He now receives cantary Pag^a 72 from the produce, and the potail manages the village.

No. 60.—GANGUICHENTLAH, MOOSEL, NAIR.

This family, during the Bijnuggur government, were kawelgars of the Naugpalla Ghaut under the Golcondah kings; they rented 50 pagodas of land, and served with 22 peons under Aurungzebe; they rented the village of Ganguichentlah kamul cantary pagodas 460, at the full assessment, but paid only cantary pagodas 174, the rest being remitted for the pay of the peons. The Cuddapah nabobs raised the peishush to cantary pagodas 292, and in 1740 they resumed the village, and discontinued the service; but the village was restored by the Mahrattas in 1756, at the old peishush cantary pagodas 292. In the early part of Hyder's government, the rent was lowered, on account of the decline of cultivation, to cantary pagodas 192; The poligar was expelled in 1775, returned in 1791, and continued privately in the country till 1799, when Cummur ul Deen fixed his rent at cantary pagodas 350. He now receives cantary pagodas 50 from the produce, and the potail manages the village.

No. 61.—MADICHERROO, CHINNAPAH, NAIR.

The ancestors of this family were anciently duffaders of peons, in the service of the Viulah poligar, under the Golconda kings; they rented Madicherroo at the full kamul rent cantary pagodas 673, and were appointed kawelgars of the Ghaut, leading from that place to Trippettee. Aurungzebe remitted the rent for the service of 50 men employed in the Ghaut. The Cuddapah nabob imposed a peishush of pagodas 87, which, till 1774, when the poligar was expelled by Meer Sahib, he returned, and seized his village in 1791, and was allowed, after the peace, to hold it privately by Tippoos amildar, but was driven out again in 1799, by Cummur ul Deen. The village is now under the potail, and the poligar receives an allowance of cantary pagodas 72 from the rent.

No. 62.—WOODIAMUNH.

The ancestor of this poligar served under the Rayels of Bijnuggur with 150 peons, for whose pay he was allowed cantary pagodas 1,500 annually; and he held the village of Woodiamunh Rayel, rent cantary pagodas 130 in jagheer. The village was continued by the Hyderabad kings, for the service of 50 peons; it was resumed under Aurungzebe, and raised to the full rent, after allowing a deduction of 100 rupees to the poligar. It was afterwards made over by the nabob of Cuddapah to Chitweyi zemindar, who expelled the poligar; but again restored him for a rent of cantary pagodas 86: he remitted the rest, on account of his being employed in collecting his kaweli rissooms. The rent was raised by the Mahrattas, in 1757, to cantary pagodas 130; and in 1774, the poligar was expelled by Hyder, returned in 1791, and, after the peace, continued to rent the village privately till 1799, when Cummur ul Deen fixed his peishush at cantary pagodas 695. He now receives an abatement from the full rent, of cantary Pag^a 60 for his maintenance.

No. 63.—YAGAWAMARAPANGOOTAH.

The ancestors of this poligar held their village, under the Bijnuggur and Hyderabad government, for the service of 100 peons. Aurungzebe resumed the village, and allowed the poligar cantary pagodas 650, for 50 peons. The nabob of Cuddapah remitted the service, and gave back the village for rent cantary pagodas 320. It was resumed, but again restored by the Mahrattas in 1756. The poligar was expelled by Hyder—he returned in 1791, rented his village under a fictitious name, for nearly the full value, till 1799, when his peishush was fixed by Cummur ul Deen at cantary pagodas 190. He is now allowed a pension of cantary pagodas 40 from the rent.

No. 64.—DIGAWAMARAPANGOOTAH.

One Kishnapah Nair, who served the Bijnuggur rayels with 50 peons, received the produce of this village, and cantary pagodas 390 for their maintenance. The village was resumed under Aurungzebe, but the peons continued. The Cuddapah Nabob remitted the service, and rented the village to the poligar for cantary Pag^a 273. The rent was raised, and and then lowered, by the Mahrattahs; and the poligar was expelled by Heder. He returned in 1791; and now receives an allowance of cantary pagodas 16 yearly from the rent.

No. 65.--TALPOOL.

The ancestor of this poligar, who served under the Hyderabad princes, with 100 peons, resumed Talpool in jagheer, and an allowance of cantaroy pag. 350 for their pay. Aurangzeb Nabob of Cuddapah restored the village; but again resumed, and banished the poligar for robbery in 1729. The village was given up by the Mahrattas to one of his descendants, for a rent of cantaroy pagodas 65; but was resumed, and the poligar expelled by Hydr. He returned in 1791; and now enjoys an allowance of cantaroy pagodas 72 from the rent.

No. 66.—TALPOOL, MOHABUT KHAN.
Abdul Kuddas, the predecessor of the present jagdeedar, obtained Talpool, situated at the karnul rent of cantaroy pagodas 40,559 in jagir in the year 1704, from Aurangzabe for his service. The family held it free of peishensh till 1736, when falling under the dominion of the Marhattahs, it was resumed; but in 1705, Meer Sahib, the father of Cummer ul Deen Khan, having been appointed keladar of Gorumcondah, and the province having been assigned to him by the Marhattas, for the maintenance of a body of troops, he restored the jagdeedar for a peishensh of cantaroy pagodas 2,800. It was again resumed and restored by the Marhattahs in 1770. In 1771 Hyder raised the peishensh to 3,150. In 1773 Meer Sahib expelled the jagdeedar, who fled to his relation, the Nabob of Cuddapah. In 1799 Mahabut Khan, his son, by the wife of a puckally, took possession of Talpool, on the fall of Seringapatam; and as all the poligars of Gorumcondah, had at the same time seized their respective districts, Cummer ul Deen, on his arrival in that province, being unable to reduce them, confirmed them in their possessions, on their agreeing to pay him a peishensh; that of Talpool was fixed at cantaroy pagodas 8,050, very little of which was paid. When the country was transferred to the Company, the jagdeedar was summoned to the cutcherry, but refused to attend. He sent me word that he would pay the old Marhattah peishensh cantaroy pagodas 2,800, and no more. General Campbell, in consequence, marched against him, and surprised him in his fort. He is now a prisoner, and must be kept in confinement for life.

Puerish Khan obtained the jagher of Kudderi, kamul reus cantaroy Pag' 39,228, on the same occasion that Taipool was granted to his relation. The jageer was free till 1756, when it was resumed by the Mahrattas. It was restored in 1764 by Meer Saib, for a peishcush of cantaroy pagodas 2,500; who however resumed it again in 1773. In 1799 Allum Khan, a natural son of the late jageerdar, took possession of Kudderi. Cummer ul Deen fixed his peishcush at 8,050 cantaroy pagodas. He paid nothing to the Company's amildar the following year; and as he would not come to the cantaroy, to settle his rent, a detachment of peons was sent against him. They surprised the fortified pagoda, in which he had taken post; but he escaped in the confusion, and the jagher was resumed. Hashun Khan, the brother of Allum Khan, and legitimate son of his father, obtained two villages from Cummer ul Deen, for a peishcush of cantaroy pagodas 760. I have resumed them, and given him yearly allowance of Cantaroy pagodas 59.7.6. which I hope government will confirm.

Buswapah Nair, the ancestor, served the Pijnuggur rayels with 600 peons, for the payment of which he obtained Vimlah, and 25 other villages of Poojavendra, assessed at kanmul cantaroy pagodas 9,796. The Hyderabad princes imposed a peishcush of cantaroy pagodas 1,050, which was raised by Aurangzebe to 2,800 cantaroy pagodas, and the service reduced to 500 peons. The nabob of Cuddapah in 1712, remitted the service, and increased the peishcush to cantaroy pagodas 3,500. In 1752, the poligar having rebelled, Abdul Mijed, the nabob of Cuddapah, made him prisoner; blew him away from a gun; circumcised his son; and resumed his district. In 1756, Vimlah having fallen under the dominion of the Mahrattahs, the son was restored for a peishcush of cantaroy pagodas 3,850; but not paying regularly, he was expelled by Meer Sahib: in 1766 he died an exile, leaving no children. In 1791, when the district fell into the hands of the Nizam; Buswapah Nair, a relation in the 4th remove from the late poligar, was allowed to establish himself in it, but was driven out the following year. He returned in 1794, and took forcible possession of Vimlah, where he paid nominally a peishcush of cantaroy pagodas 4,550; and was succeeded by his son Gomar Nair in 1796; who dying without issue, in 1799, his servants set up Vencaputty Nair, an old man and distant relation of the family. As he was regarded as a rebel by the Nizam's officers, and, as I was informed, that he was built* and idiotical, and merely a tool in the hands of the head peons, who gave him only a bare subsistence, I sent for him, with a view of giving him a pension, and resuming the district. His servants, dreading that his personal appearance would lay open their own conduct, prevented him from coming near me, under various pretexts of sickness, unlucky days, &c.; and as, after a delay of four months, there was no probability of their either bringing him to the catcherry, or consenting to give up the district, Major General Campbell sent a detachment, which surprized the fort of Medipenlah, in which the poligar was, and made him prisoner. He died lately at Gootty, leaving no family. The poligars of Vimlah, favoured by the natural strength of their country, have always been the most remarkable for their turbulence and depredations of any in the Ceded Districts.

The assessment ten years afterwards to cantaroy pagodas 1,307, and in 1756 by the Mahrattahs, to cantaroy Pag^a 1,476. In 1775 the villages were resumed, and the poligars expelled by Meer Saheb; he received possession in 1791, and continued privately in the district after the peace, receiving part of the profits of the villages, which were rented in the name of patails. In 1799, Cummur ul Deen settled his peishcush at cantaroy pagodas 1,012, which is now converted into rent according to the actual produce.

Soon after the kamul survey, an ancestor of this family obtained one village in rent, and the kawelli of 34 villages; they paid the full kamul cantaroy pagodas 1,485 for the village, and cantaroy pagodas 535 for the kawelli, making their total rent cantaroy pagodas 2,020. In 1729 they obtained an abatement to cantaroy pagodas 843, for their services against the refractory poligar of Reemlah. In 1756 the Mabrattahs raised the peishcush to C. pag^a 928. In 1774 the poligar, with great part of his family, were taken and hanged by Meer Sahib; a son, who escaped, recovered his village during the war in 1791, and after the peace, continued privately in the country. He seized his ancient village again with three others, in 1799, and stipulated to pay Cummer ul Deen for them, a peshcush of C. pag^a 2,254. The new villages have since been resumed, and he now has an allowance from the rent of the old one of canterny pag^a 300.

No. 73.—CHINTELGOONTAH BUNDAH, NARSIM, NAIR.

No. 73.—CHINTELGOONTAH BUNDAB, NARSIE, NARSIE. They obtained their villages in rent, soon after the kamul survey, under the Golcondah kings. The kamul of Chentagoontah-bundab is C. Pag^s 217, and the rent was fixed at C. Pag^s 168, which was raised under the Cuddapah government to C. Pag^s 224, and in 1756, by the Mahrattas to C. pag^s 253. The poligar was expelled by Meer Saheb in 1775, but recovered his village during the war in 1791; was driven out in 1792; returned in 1799, and was assessed by Cummer uldeen at Tippoo's standard rent C. Pag^s 1,776. He now rents the village, from the revenue of which, a deduction is allowed of C. Pag^s 300 for his maintenance. Though Chenlegoondah bundab has usually been reckoned only one poligarship, yet as it has long been divided into two villages, Chinlegoontah-bundab and Sanipay, held by two different branches of the family, I have let them hold their separate shares, as formerly.

MOOSEL NAIR.

No. 74.—YEDAMUNEYNPOLIM, MOOSEL, NAIR.

No. 74.—YEDAMUNEYNPOLIM, MOOSEL, NAIN.

This family is a branch of No. 73, and obtained its village at the same time for the full kamul rent of cantonry pagodas 168, which was raised by the Nabob of Cuddapah to cantonry pagodas 223, and in 1756 by the Mahrattas, to Cant' pag. 261. The poligar was expelled by Mah. Saheb in 1775, returned in 1791, and seized his own village and another; he continued privately in the country after the peace, and rented his village under a fictitious name; in 1799 he seized both villages, which were continued to him by Cummer ul deen, for Cant' pag. 450. He now rents his original village only, in which a small abatement is allowed for his subsistence.

YEDAMUNEYEROLLEM, VENCATPUTTI.

No. 75.—NELLAMUNEPOLLEM, VENCATPUTTI.

No. 75.—NELLAMUNEPOLLEM, VENKATAPUR.

This family is a branch of No. 3, and got its village at the same period, for cantary Pag' 90; the kanul is 94. The rent was raised by the nabob of Cuddapah to cantary Pag' 118. The poligar was killed by Meer Saheb in 1775, but his son escaped, returned, and seized his village in 1791, rented under a fictitious name after the peace of 1792; and in 1799 his peishcud was fixed at cantary Pag' 380 by Cummer ul Deen. He refused to come in last year when I sent for him, because I deprived him, like all the other poligars, of kaweh, and some circar lands, which he had seized and converted into enaums for himself, during the troubles in 1799. He however still attempted to collect the produce, and, as the potails objected to giving it up without authority, he sent a party of peons, who murdered the two potails, and one of the curmums of the villages in which it lay. He fled immediately for refuge to the poligar of Culloor depending on Chittoor, but was surprised and taken by a detachment of peons from Goramcondah, and is now a prisoner in Gotty. His village has of course been resumed.

GOUDAH NAIR

No. 76.—MOTGOOTLAH, SOOBAN, NAIR.

No. 76.—MOTGOOTLAH, SOOBAN, NAIK.
This family is also a branch of No. 73, and obtained his village at the same period, for cantary Pag' 455; the kamul is Cant' Pag' 494. The nabob of Cuddapah, in consequence of of the decrease of cultivation, reduced the rent to cantary Pag² 280, at which rate it continued till Hyder's time, when it was raised to the full standard assessment by Meer Sahab, and was held by the poligar till 1791, when he rebelled; but being forced to conceal himself after the peace next year, he remained privately in the country, and in 1799, recovered his village, and agreed to pay Cummur ul Deen a peishcush of Cant¹ Pag² 639. He now rents it, with a small deduction for his maintenance.

No. 77.—KAPUGOONAPPILLI, DASSI, NAIR.

In 1718 the ancestor of this poligar obtained a village in rent at the full kamul assessment, from the nabob of Cuddapah, with kaweli rissooms. The family were never engaged in any disturbances, and have never been dispossessed; but their rent was raised by Hyder to the full standard. I have continued the village to the poligar, with a small deduction in lieu of the kaweli, and of the abatement which he enjoyed under the Sultaun's government, by the connivance of the revenue servants.

No. 78.—JELLELMUNDAH, LINGUM, NAIR.

The ancestors under the Golcondah government obtained in rent a village, rated by the kamul survey at cantary pagodas 240, for a peishcush of cantary pagodas 165, which was afterwards raised by the nabobs of Cuddapah and the Mahrattas, in 1756, to cantary pagodas 233. The poligar was expelled by Hyder in 1775; returned, and took forcible possession of his village, in 1791; was deprived of it after the peace in 1792, but remained privately in the country till 1799, when he again seized it, and also another, and was allowed to hold both by Cummur ul Deen, for a peishcush of cantary pagodas 1,432. I have resumed the new village, and left him the old one, with a reduction from the rent for his subsistence.

No. 79.—MOODIAMPAUR, BOMI, NAIR.

The ancestors obtained his village soon after the kamul survey, at the full assessment cantary pagodas 168, which was raised by the Nabob of Cuddapah, on granting kaweli to the poligar, to cantary pagodas 210, and afterwards by the Mahrattas to 247. He was expelled by Hyder in 1775; seized his village again in 1791; and was obliged to relinquish it the following year. He took possession a second time in 1799, and at the same time, annexed to it a cirkar village, both of which he held under Cummur ul deen, at a peishcush of cantary pagodas 2,290. The cirkar village is now resumed, and he holds the other with a small abatement of rent for his maintenance.

No. 80.—RUTTENGHEERY, RAYAPAH, NAIR.

Heery Hudeyer, the ancestor of this family, was ~~descent~~ of Tattar Bejapoor, and served the Bijnugger rayels with 1,000 peons, for the maintenance of whom, he obtained twelve villages of Chittledroog in jagher, valued at Soolerooy pagodas 12,000 annual rent. By such records as the family have, and on which I have been obliged to depend for all information respecting their history, till within the last fifty years, it appears that their jagher was afterwards augmented by several adjacent districts, ~~estimated at a rent of one lac of pagodas~~ for which they paid 50,000 pagodas peishcush; and that they built the old fort of Sera in the year of Shalwahan 1442. That on the conquest of the country by the Bejapoor kings, they were deprived of their ancient possessions, and received in exchange for the service of 300 men, and peishcush of cantary pagodas 4,000. That in Fusly 1020, Muddusera was resumed; the service remitted, and the peishcush fixed at rupees 7,500. That in Fusly 1108, Muddesera was restored, the service fixed at 300 men, and peishcush at rupees 15,000; and that Asoph Jah again resumed Muddugsera, remitted the service, and lowered the peishcush to Rs 10,000.

In 1741, Marari Row, having reduced Muddugsera, imposed a chout on the poligar of 8,000 rupees. In 1763, Hyder, having taken possession of the Ruttengherry district, raised the peishcush to 15,000 rupees, exclusive of the 8,000 to Morari Row. But the poligar, Rungapah Nair, failing in his payments, was seized with his five sons in 1776, and sent to Seringapatam; a village of cantary pagodas 300 annual rent, was assigned to him for the support of his women. It was continued after his death, and his eldest son Raypah Nair was appointed a tehsildar of Cundachar, with a monthly allowance of 15 cantary pagodas by Tippoo Sultaun. This son being wounded and taken at the attack of the Sultaun's lines in February 1792, and released, fled to his ancient district of Ruttengherry, of which he obtained a temporary possession; but being driven out at the peace, he retired to Sulapoor, where he died without issue. His brothers were all hanged by the Sultaun, as soon as he heard of his escape. The eldest of them left two sons, who escaped on the fall of Seringapatam, and have since been supported by their relations. The eldest is only about 16 years of age. He did not venture into the country during the Nizam's government; but he has now returned, in hopes of obtaining a pension.

NOTE 1.—In Column No. 6. (page 855) the Kamul Assessment is in general inserted; but as the Bijnugger Rayels, in giving a district in Jagher, usually noticed it at its supposed Rent, this Valuation, where it could be discovered, has been exhibited instead of the Kamul.

NOTE 2.—Wherever the Columns opposite to a Poligar's name are blank from the beginning down to a particular date,—that, for instance, of the Soobahs of the Deccan, (pp. 860-1)—it shows that the Poligar had not previous to that era, obtained any Territory:—But, where the columns of Villages and Revenue, after being filled up under one race of Princes, are left blank under a subsequent one, it denotes that the Pollam had been resumed.

REPORTS respecting PERMANENT SETTLEMENT of the SOUTHERN POLLAMS.

GENTLEMEN,

1. I HAVE NOW the honour to lay before you, the statements upon which I conceive that the permanent assessment for the zemindarry of Ramnad, may be satisfactorily regulated by the Commission. The delay which would inevitably arise, from any endeavour to submit those documents in a more detailed shape, will, I hope, be a sufficient justification of the abstract form in which they now appear before you; and whatever may be additionally required for magauas and villages, shall be furnished with all possible expedition.

Collector's Report
respecting Permanent Settlement of the Southern Polnams; dated 30
Sept. 1802.

2. (No. 1).—The first statement shows the public revenue, under every different head of Nunjuh, Nunjehmel, Punjuh Soornaday-pun, and Chank, and Chaya, from the assumption of the country (exclusive of the first broken months), until the end of the last Fusly. No. 2, is a statement of charges hitherto incurred by the Company, which will cease upon the establishment of the permanent assessment. No. 3, is the proposed permanent jumma and kistbundy. No. 4, an allotment of pergannahs, as pledges for the due payment of several kists.

3. Although the collections of my own management, are much higher than those which preceded, they do not appear to me entirely a proper basis for the assessment now to be established in perpetuity: I shall therefore compare their average, with the receipts to the Company in former Puzies, and add such remarks as appear to me to justify this opinion.

5. From this statement, it will appear to the Commission, that the revenues have progressively increased, during the three years in which I have been charged with the management ment of Ramnad, in the following proportions:—In the first year, 43½ per cent. upon the average of the preceding years; in the second, 46 per cent.; and in the last Fusley, the augmentation, upon the average of former years, rose so high as 74 per cent. making the average increase of my own three years, upon the revenues of former years, more than 54 per cent.

6. As this revenue has been punctually realized, without complaint, it might be presumed that no means had been practised to undermine the growing prosperity of the country; but an evidence, more substantial than this presumption, will be found in the circumstance which I have the satisfaction of stating to you; that the ryots have benefited by the last settlement, in no less a sum than 30,374. 29. 4. star pag^s.

7. In 1799, the season was moderately favourable. In 1810, nearly the same. In 1811, the rain fell in due time, and with unusual abundance: considering, however, the extraordinary uncertainty of seasons in Ramnad, two moderate and one favourable year cannot be deemed a proper foundation for a permanent assessment. I have therefore added to them two of Mr. Powney's, and one of Mr. Jackson's Festies; and I think no circumstance can occur to render a peshcush, fixed, according to the zemindary principle, upon this foundation, either burdensome to the Rannee, or oppressive to the inhabitants, protected as they will be, by the judicial courts, in the enjoyment of those rules and rates of assessment by which the revenues have been collected during the last three years. The detail of these rates, has been given in my previous reports, and they are contained in every talook cut-cherry. In cases, therefore, where specific pecuniary engagements shall not have superseded the necessity of further enquiry, the previous mamool can be at once distinctly ascertained.

8. The permanent peshcush which, upon these grounds, I have suggested for your consideration, amounts to star pagodas 94,733, exactly two-thirds of the gross receipts of the province during the six years, from which the average is taken. It is also within a thousand pagodas of the average net revenue derived by the Company, during their whole management of Ramnad. It is more than the net revenue preceding my management, by 33 per cent.; and it exceeds the peshcush paid by the former zemindar, more than 50 per cent. or in the sum of pagodas 33,875. 15, exclusive of salt and sayer, to be retained in the hands of government, or abolished, according to their pleasure.

9. Such are the terms, which the experience that I have acquired of the resources of Ramnad, suggest to me, as equitable and moderate; and in this consideration, I have attentively weighed the expediency of augmenting the jumma to government, upon the presumption of an increase of revenue, under the system of property and security about to take place; but the enjoyment of advantage, from any improvement in the repair of tanks, &c. is so precarious, in consequence of the extraordinary variation of the seasons in Ramnad, that I should not feel myself justified in recommending any increase upon such uncertain expectations.

10. In Ramnad, there is no class of people possessing any rights of the nature of talook-dars, and therefore, in confirming the proprietary right of the Rannee to the lands (with the exception of those alienated, and not paying public revenue), the right of no other individual will be violated. The ryots will of course be firmly maintained and protected by the judicial court, in their privilege of cultivating the soil, and of receiving their accustomed share.

11. The registers of curnum, are now making out, and shall be immediately forwarded. These are the only revenue officers in Ramnad. Of police, with the exception of cawelgars, there are none; nor indeed any nominal allowance in land, for such an establishment.

12. Notwithstanding the pressure of severe indisposition, and the occurrence of other unavoidable obstructions to my public duties, the opinions now offered to your consideration, might have been submitted at the time I promised; but I waited to have the satisfaction of laying before the Commission, a record of the resources of the country, founded upon actual measurement.—Such a document I am now enabled to submit to them; and I have no doubt it will convey to their minds that conviction, which I myself feel, that the large increase of revenue derived to the Company during the last three years from Ramnad, has been drawn from the fair resources of the country; and that the continuance of the Company's administration in Ramnad, has fully answered the important objects which led to its introduction; namely, relief to the people from the tyranny and cruelty of the poligar; and the establishment of a regular government, equally encouraging to the agriculture, manufactures and commerce of the country.—When the land revenue has been delivered to the possession of the Rannee, I would suggest that the allowance to the poligar and his family, be paid by the Company, so long as they collect the customs; and when the sayer is abolished, the province will receive so much advantage, that the Rannee will be fully able to discharge the allowances from her own resources, through the medium of the collector.

SHEVAGUNGA.

13. I have already had the honour of stating to the Commission, that the impossibility of obtaining a knowledge of the revenues of Shevagunga, whilst it was in the possession of the late usurper, rendered a particular and personal communication with the new zemindar indispensable, before I could venture to mention any time as the probable period of my being enabled to furnish the information required by them for the permanent settlement of that country.

14. In order that I might judge how far reliance might be placed on the success of Woya Taver's endeavours, and in the sincerity of his own inclination, and the disposition.

tion of his servants to bring forth the real accounts of his country, I required from him an estimate of the revenues of the current year, which, by the statement he then delivered, amounted in the whole to no more than 2,65,829 Shoolley chuckrams, or star pag^s 88,600 ½.

13. The general knowledge which I had obtained, through different channels, of the revenue of Shevagunga, left me no reason to believe that this account nearly approached the truth. I therefore stated to Woya Taver my conviction of its errors; and that the old accounts of the country, if faithfully laid before him, would show the average receipts to be considerably more than the amount of this statement.

16. With the final declaration of Woya Taver, at this interview, you are already acquainted, namely, that he was heartily disposed to bring forth the accounts of the country; that he was sensible of the efforts that would be made to counteract him; of the vigilance that would be necessary to give success to any enquiry; and that the collision of two authorities, would defeat the objects of both; that my letter had encouraged him to look to my advice, as the certain means of relieving him in every difficulty, and of establishing him permanently in that enviable situation, which the proclamation of his Lordship's Council, had promised to him: secured from future distress by a peshcush, which it would be easy for him to pay; and maintained, without fear of interruption, in his possessions, by the unalterable regulations of a just government. With these feelings, he did not hesitate to promise his concurrence in whatever arrangements I might recommend to him, and you might approve; and that even to the temporary transfer of the country, he should be satisfied to agree, trusting that it would be done in such a manner as to show, that the Company had not withdrawn their favour from him.

17. Being clearly of opinion, that Woya Taver's means of enquiry were not at that time, adequate to expose to my view a satisfactory account of the real resources of the country, within any reasonable period; but that an investigation, embarrassed by this collision of authorities and interests, would not only prove abortive, but disorder the current management of the country, in every step of its progress; I submitted to the ratification of the Commission, the expediency of the temporary transfer of power in Shevagunga, or the interposition of their authority for the appointment of some person who might be approved by the zemindar, and be duly qualified to promote the objects of the enquiry.

18. My own opinion decidedly inclined to the transfer, as the only measure adequate to remove all present difficulties and future doubts; and if you concurred in the expediency of it, I suggested the propriety of tempering the assignment with the feelings of the zemindar, and with the policy which placed him in possession of the country, by issuing, under his lordship's authority, such proclamation as might leave no doubt upon any mind, in respect to the temporary object of the transfer.

19. The Commission were pleased, in reply to this letter, to express their confidence in the success of my endeavours to obtain information sufficient to enable them to settle the permanent assessment of the zemindary of Shevagunga, on principles of moderation and justice, and relieve them from the necessity of having recourse to a measure, which, though sanctioned by the zemindar's concurrence, might create impressions unfavourable to our government, and to the introduction of the system of permanency and security, about to be established.

20. Aware of the extreme delicacy of every question involving the remotest reference to the public faith; and feeling very forcibly, the flattering confidence thus reposed in me by the Commission; I should be most seriously concerned to disappoint it. Hitherto, the increasing pressure of other duties, and a declining state of health, have absolutely precluded a personal examination of the villages and accounts of Shevagunga; but I have bestowed every leisure moment to the correction of all the general statements and information received at various times, since I became collector; and I shall now briefly explain the opinion which I have formed upon the amount of settlement to be made for this zemindary.

21. The Commission are aware, that the country now called Shevagunga, was originally a part of the Ramnad Raj; that Curta Taver, the Rajah of Ramnad, having divided the whole of his possessions into fifths, gave to Shasavurna Taver two-fifths, reserving three fifths for himself.—The knowledge of this transaction, combined with the accurate information since obtained of the actual value of Ramnad, forms a ground for judging of the resources of Shevagunga. There are, however, other collateral circumstances, which require to be examined. A very general impression prevails in these countries, that Shasavurna Taver (who, in comparison with Curta Taver, was a man of considerable personal address) contrived to practise unfair means for his own advantage, with the sumperdies, who regulated the division: But this design he obtained, for Taver, is understood to have extended to the capability of the portion he obtained, future improvement, not to the actual past value of the raj, which was too well known to Curta Taver and his ministers, to render any collusion practicable. But on the other hand, are to be remembered the many advantages Ramnad has, since that time, received in consequence of its maritime situation, from the progressive increase of its external commerce, and the permanent establishment of a large public investment of cloth, which consuming the whole of its manufactures, maintains a considerable capital circulating in the country. Shevagunga participates but in a small degree, in these advantages, and hence the sale of its produce possesses not the same certainty and advantages, as Ramnad. In judging, also, of the future value of Shevagunga, allowance must be made for material diminution of demand for its grain, in consequence of the greater abundance in the neighbouring villages of Madura, arising from the change of government.

22. Taking

Collector's Report
respecting Permanent Settlement of the Southern Pollams; dated 30
Sept. 1802.

22. Taking therefore into consideration these disadvantages, and maturely considering the statement which I have now the honour to lay before you, of the actual collections and resources of Shevagunga in the last year, as compiled by me from the zemindar's own accounts; I am inclined to recommend the sum of 75,000 star pagodas, as a proper annual jumma for Shevagunga.

23. The Commission will observe, that it considerably exceeds two-thirds of the peshcush I have submitted for Ramnad; and I am inclined to think that an actual investigation and measurement of the lands, might not, after much anxiety and inquietude, be attended with a better result; but if the Commission should judge this information to be too general for a permanent settlement, I would recommend a lease of five or ten years; in which time, there will be ample leisure for enquiry and correction.

24. In the latter case, a proper establishment of servants from the collector, should be in constant attendance at the zemindar's cutcherry, to report to the collector, the progress of cultivation and collection, during this period of experiment. But after attentively weighing all the advantages of a permanent settlement; the motives of intrigue and alarm, and the causes of disorder which it lays at rest; the new springs of general improvement and happiness which it opens; I am inclined to recommend this sum, as a permanent jumma for Shevagunga, liable to no future change. This proposed settlement is 25,000 star pagodas above the annual receipts from Shevagunga, since it came under the Company's management, or an increase in the annual revenue to be derived therefrom, of fifty per cent.

TINNEVELLY POLLAMS.

25. The several reports which I have submitted to his Lordship in Council, through the Board of Revenue, as noted in the margin,* describe so particularly the whole course of that reform, which has been happily effected amongst the poligars of Tinnevelly, that it is now unnecessary to enlarge upon the subject.

26. In my Report to the Board of Revenue of the 31st Jan. 1800, preparatory to an increase of the peshcush of the Tinnevelly poligars, I submitted to them the best accounts which I had been able to procure, of the resources of the pollams. These statements were obtained principally from the canongoes of Tinnevelly, and were corrected by my own enquiries. The suspicion with which I had been accustomed to regard the documents of a canongoe's office, and especially of one, subject to the controul and irregularity of a man government, would have led me, at any period, to place no great reliance on accounts received through such a channel; but at that time, I was the less inclined to put much faith in the statements delivered, knowing that the fozdar of Tinnevelly was latterly averse to the canongoes affording any information from his office; and that I could afterwards obtain none but what appeared confused and mutilated. In submitting the statements previously received from the canongoe, I therefore remarked, that I could not pledge myself for their particular accuracy, although, from the frequent enquiries I had made to amend their errors, I considered them sufficiently correct for regulating the increase of peshcush then to be expected. These statements embraced as well the amount of the cawel privileges of the poligars, then to be assumed, as the resources of their own villages, and an additional column showed in what degree the latter ought, in my judgment, to be then additionally assessed: to these, I annexed such short remarks as the particular circumstances of each poligar seemed to require.

27. The settlement recommended upon these accounts, received the approbation of government. By what means, the principal poligars endeavoured to obtain a diminution of it, and by what arguments, it was attempted to reconcile them to a measure, upon which the hope of that reform, so long desired in their conduct, was principally built, are known to the Commission. That their acceptance, though reluctant, was sincere, will have been demonstrated, by my progressive reports, for nearly three years, and by the circumstance, which I have the satisfaction of stating, that the increased jumma of the two last years, was completely collected in the course of them.

28. Always holding in my remembrance, their former irregular payment of a very inadequate tribute, and the diminution of their means, by the rigid assumption of the desha cawel, I had scarcely hoped for the complete reform I have witnessed: but it is an act of justice due to the Tinnevelly poligars, on this important occasion of fixing in perpetuity the foundations of their future happiness, to bring fully to the notice of the Commission, the principal poligar, since the establishment of the increased assessment, that every his allegiance, and punctual in his public payments: nor can it be justly concluded, that their obedience has arisen solely from the terror of military power; or their punctuality, from any superabounding resources. The period which has elapsed since the commencement of the reform, has not been wanting in temptations to turbulence; whilst the statements I have now the honour of laying before you, convey the best evidence procurable by any other process than that of actual measurement, of the extent of their revenues;—they show that the means of the poligars, were generally computed by the canongoe, with accuracy; and that the result of my former general enquiries, were nearly correct.

29. That the canongoe's information should approach the truth (except in the particular points of error explained in the statements), will appear as extraordinary to the Commission, as it did at first, to me: but the extreme accuracy of his estimate of their cawel privileges, the real extent of which, were ascertained by me, beyond all doubt, together with the result of my enquiries in those pollams, which were surrendered to me for that purpose, show the fact. It may indeed be accounted for, by remembering that the pollams were chiefly usurpations, of no very ancient date, from the circar lands; that the whole of them had come, at different periods, under the management of the fozdars, who knew perfectly well their resources; and that they were disposed rather to exaggerate than to conceal, the extent of their their encroachments and violence, in order to account for failures and disappointment in the circar lands.

30. In some instances, it will accordingly be seen, that the canongoe's estimate exceeded the present actual resources of the pollams, particularly that of Shevagherry, in consequence of a much higher valuation having been placed upon the grain, than it can ever produce. Shevagherry itself, abounds with nunjeh cultivation, and is encompassed with some of the most fertile of the circar lands. The valuation which I put upon the grain of those lands, in my jumma of the last year, was ten fanams, and some part of it, still remains on hand. It is very evident therefore, that if the paddy of Shevagherry were to be valued in perpetuity, at 15 fanams per cottah, the ends of the permanent settlement would be defeated, by the failure of the poligar, and the oppression of the people. In the few instances where this error has been made in the canongoe's statement, I have therefore corrected it; and with those exceptions, as explained particularly in my remarks, I have recommended the present increased jumma, as a permanent assessment of their lands, in the conviction, that it is equitable and moderate.

31. The nature of the permanent settlement, and of the system of law and security, by which it is to be enjoyed by themselves, and handed down to their posterity, has been repeatedly explained to the poligars; and they now await with anxious solicitude, the confirmation of a blessing, which is to soften to them the remembrance of former sacrifices. The local information indispensably necessary to pronounce upon this important question, will, I trust, be found in the accompanying statement; and other details of less importance, shall immediately follow.

32. The foregoing remarks and statement, regard the principal pollams of Etiapoor, Shevagherry, Wootnally, Chokumputty and Peryoor, and the lesser pollams of Talaven-cottah, Cadumboor, Parvally, Gollaputty, Yarlomedday and Alagapoor; it remains for me, therefore, to offer some explanations upon the small pollams surrendered to my own management, by the poligars of Nadavacoorchy, Maniachy, Soorunday, Chennelgoody, Mailmundeh, Autengherry, Sandyoor, Woorcaud, Singumputty, Manarcottah, and Avadeyapoor, in the conviction, which they professed to feel, of being unable to pay the increased peshcush.

33. The natural aversion of every poligar, to the transfer of his estate to other hands, and the readiness of these poligars to submit their pollams to any scrutiny I might desire, certainly suggested, at the time, that their professions of deficient means, had a just foundation. With two or three exceptions, experience has shown this presumption to have been warranted, but not to such an extent as might have been expected. The value of the seven first pollams, according to the estimate forwarded on the 30th January 1800, amounted to 22,700 C. C.: their resources, as taken on the spot, have amounted to 22,171 C. C. There are, however, particular local considerations explained in my remarks upon these several pollams, which induce me to be of opinion, that the aggregate of the permanent settlement of them, should fall very little below the increased peshcush formerly recommended; and I have no doubt that the poligars will be able to pay the jumma proposed, with ease to themselves, and justice to the inhabitants under them.

34. In the remarks annexed to the statements, which accompanied my Report to the Board of Revenue of the 30th January 1800, I mentioned, that by "the assumption of the desha cawel, the resources of the poligars of Woorcaud and Singumputty, were completely taken away." In that estimate of the revenues of these poligars, the two villages of their own names, which they have enjoyed at a certain rent, subject to an indefinite nuzzer, were not included; but in the consideration of their length of possession (about sixty years) and of their total want of other subsistence, since the resumption of the cawel, I have now proposed the acknowledgment of their claims to the enjoyment of these villages, upon the full principle of zemindary assessment. If you should approve of this arrangement, I would recommend that the accounts of the villages, for the time they have been under assumption, be adjusted upon this principle; namely, two-thirds of the gross revenue to the Company, and one to the poligars, by whom the expenses of management must also be borne.

AVADIAPPOOR.

35. When the desha cawel of the pollams was generally assumed in January 1800, two hamlets in the possession of the poligar of Avadiapoor, named Pareyacolum and Ammanacolum, were also assumed as usurpations from the circar. Their ayakut, or reputed measurement in nunjeh, is 50 cottahs verapaud, from which 25 cottahs, and 117 measures and a half of seed ground, were cultivated in 1800,—deduct, for ensams, six cottahs and 27 measures of verapaud, and from the produce of the remainder, 19 cottahs and 90 measures; the mailwarum came to 166 cottahs, and 40 measures, or 249 chu and 3 fanams; add 198 chu for Punjeh and Soornadayam, and the aggregate birez of the two hamlets may be calculated at 447 C. C. 74 fanams.

36. The final resumption of these hamlets, has always been most earnestly deprecated by the poligar, as the ancient possession of his family; and as they have remained in their enjoyment for nearly sixty years, this length of occupancy, added to the unexceptionable character of Pooley Tawer; the smallness of his pollam, consisting of only three villages; the former affluence of his family, and his own present depression; incline me to commend that these two hamlets of Paraykolum and Ammanacolum be confirmed to him.

Collector's Report
respecting Permanent Settlement of the Southern Pollams; dated 30
Sept. 1802.

[No. 7.]

The total jumma of his lands, may then be stated at - star pagodas 2,117 18 10
Deduct ten per cent. therefrom, for expenses of management - 211 31 17

Remaining net jumma

Two-thirds thereof, as a permanent peshcush, would be - 1,905 28 73
The former peshcush, was - 1,270 19 22

37. Thus the application of the zemindary principle of assessment, upon the Teerwa of 1209, Fusly, would augment the peshcush payable by the poligar nearly one hundred per cent.; but in consideration of the great change in the price of grain since that period, and the little capacity of this pollam for improvement, I beg leave to recommend, that the permanent jumma of this pollam be fixed at 1,600 star pagodas, which the poligar will be able to pay with facility.

MANARCOTTAH.

38. The constant irregularity of this poligar in the payment of his peshcush, and the estimates formed of the value of his resources, led to a suspicion that far too great a portion of them had been dissipated in his pleasures. — His early age, (23) — his repeated promises of better conduct, and especially, the examples exhibited to him of the destructive consequences of profligacy and disobedience, called for forbearance in the early part of the reformation; but his continued failure in his payments, and uniform assurances of deficient means, accompanied by the tender of his lands for examination, led to that investigation of the resources of Manarcottah, which I have now the honour of presenting to the Commission.

39. The value of Manarcottah, according to the estimate transmitted on the 31st January 1800, was star pagodas 3,333. 14 fanams. This statement was founded upon the canongoe's accounts, and approached very nearly to the truth: but some of the resources included in this pollam by the canongoe, have been since carried back to the pollam of Colarputty, from whence they were forcibly wrested by the father of the present poligar, some years ago.

40. This deduction being made, and regard being also had to the difference in the price of grain, and the decayed state of the tanks, I cannot now estimate the jumma of Manarcottah, exclusive of enams, at a higher sum than - star pagodas 2,480 30 27

Deducting from this sum, ten per cent. for expenses of management - 248 3 2

Two-thirds of this sum - 2,232 27 25

41. The original peshcush of this pollam, was so high as star pagodas 1,411. 4. 53; and although the variation of seasons, and the delay and difficulty of the poligar in making good this payment, might suggest the expediency of any increase; yet when I compare the capabilities of this pollam with that of Aradipootah, and advert to the large tracts of waste dry grain land, which may be brought into cultivation, by the exertions of the poligar, I feel no disposition to recommend a greater relaxation from the zemindary principle of assessment, than the deduction already made of ten per cent. from the gross jumma.

42. If the Commission shall adopt this proposition, in fixing the permanent settlement, it will be necessary that the poligar be particularly warned against the hope of future indulgence, in order to impress fully upon his mind, that a prudent management of his estate, can alone prevent its ultimate transfer into more prudent hands. — This conviction will, I trust, stimulate his attention, and thereby secure to him the happy possession of his pollam.

SAPATOOR.

43. The Commission are aware that the office of the Board of Revenue, contains a very able report of the resources of this pollam. The estimate which Mr. Harris formed of the value of these lands, was so high as C.O. 14,725; and it was an early object with me, after my appointment, to institute such enquiries as should enable me to pass an opinion upon Mr. Harris's Report, which had been so materially impeached by my predecessor.

44. The inclosed abstract from Mr. Harris's estimate, will show to the Commission, the grounds of that valuation; and of that which I offer, as more applicable to the present actual condition of the pollam, under the complete change of circumstances which has since happened, and which mistake the basis of every estimate formed of the value of any country.

45. In Mr. Harris's estimate of the value of Sapatoor, the extent of ground capable of cultivation, is accurately stated; but allowance does not appear to me to have been made, in sufficient degree, for variation of season, and the inferior condition of men and cattle. The produce of the seed sown, is justly stated; the price of such produce, is formed upon the solid test of the ten years preceding the information of Mr. Harris's estimate; and would be a very proper rate, if the produce continued as it had heretofore been, and the means of sale had remained the same; but both have undergone material alterations, and especially the latter. When the produce of grain increased, the price of a given quantity must fall in proportion to that in the increased cultivation which has since arisen, from the repairs of tanks; but this is a case of reduction in the value of the Sapatoor grain, not entitled to so much consideration, as the complete change of circumstances, which has since taken place, in regard to the means of sale.

46. The system of monopoly, which had prevailed for many years, in the sale of grain in the sugar villages bordering upon Sapatoor, did not allow Mr. Harris to judge what would be the price, when the market should be completely opened, and the cultivation largely increased, as well in the pollam as in the circumjacent lands. — It was a case which was not required, nor was it possible, for him to investigate; but which led to my lot to form a general arrangement range for renting the whole of the Tinnevely province, this difficulty was immediately forced upon my consideration. Such of the records of the former government, as had then come under my examination, did not afford me any information upon which I could rely, of the relative fertility of the lands; and the system of embargo upon the sale of grain, left me no correct means of judging what would be its price when the market should be opened, and the cultivation increased. To ascertain these essential points to every rent, it became indispensable to reap the ear crop by dumanry, in order that the information thereby obtained of the quality of the lands, and value of their produce, might be applied with just consideration to the condition of the ryots, in forming a rent at a more advanced period of the year. With this knowledge, the price of grain which I fixed upon the produce of the talook of Shevelpattoor, encompassing the pollam of Shatoor, as well as Shevagherry, on every side, was ten fanams per cottah, and some part of it, remains unsold to the present time. It is therefore very evident, that an estimate of the resources of Shatoor, which should value the grain at 12 fanams per cottah, "must, as in the case of Shevagherry, defeat the salutary objects of a permanent settlement, by leading to the ruin of the poligar and the oppression of the people."

47. Adverting, indeed, to the very large proportionate quantity of native produce in Shatoor, beyond the consumption of its own inhabitants; — considering, also, that their means of subsistence are generally drawn from the produce of Shatoor, in the villages of Shavelpattoor, of which I had a personal knowledge, in the last year; I am inclined to make some deduction from the price of grain in Shevelpattoor, in order that something may remain to defray the charges of bullock-hire from Shatoor into the Company's villages. Upon an average, one fanam per cottah appears to me, to be a just deduction; and Mr. Harris's estimate, admitting its accuracy in every other particular, will appear as in the statement.

48. These allowances being made, I would recommend to the Commission, that two-thirds of this estimate, after deducting ten per cent. for expenses, be taken as the permanent settlement for the pollam; in the conviction that it will be found equitable and moderate.

SAPATOOR.

49. In submitting to the Commission, the measures which appear to me most expedient for the permanent settlement of the lands of this pollam, it may be useful to take a short retrospect of its past management.

50. In the Fusly 1205, Mr. Powney represented to the Board of Revenue, the misconduct of Cawnia Naigue, poligar of Sapatoor, for withholding his tribute, and other irregularities; and was instructed to dispossess the poligar of his pollam, and retain it under his own immediate management. In consequence of this resolution, Cawnia Naigue established himself in the neighbouring mountains, and completely intimidating the inhabitants of the pollam and the public servants in charge of it, distracted the management, and participated in its revenues.

51. Such was the state of this country, when I received charge of it, in 1799; and as it was obvious that the surrender or seizure of the pollam, was indispensable to the security of a future revenue from the pollam, and the return of tranquillity to its long-harrassed inhabitants, I took an early occasion of requesting the instructions of government, which of the two I should attempt to accomplish, and by what means. At that period, I had reason to believe that Cawnia Naigue would resign himself to the mercy of government; if he were assured of personal protection, and a small subsistence; but such a compromise after the commission of so many enormities, and after the public resentment had been so frequently declared against him, might I apprehended, shake that opinion of the force and energy of government, which, in these countries, it should ever be the primary object to maintain. Upon this principle, I was of opinion that no overture to a reconciliation with Cawnia Naigue ought to be made, or received, nor any of his family be put in possession; for the restoration of the pollam, after the circumstances which had occurred, would be solely imputed to inability of management.

52. Upon this ground, I recommended the offer of a reward for his person, which was approved; and in July 1800, I had the satisfaction of seeing him. Charges were subsequently given against the prisoner, before the board of officers appointed by his Lordship in Council to try him; and in the month of October 1800, he was condemned, and capitally punished. — From that period, the pollam has remained in tranquillity, and its management has been comparatively advantageous; but many of the principal inhabitants, who fled into other countries during former distractions, from the sequel of the poligar's vengeance, if they did not submit to it, or of public punishment, of being reconciled, it, feel no particular attachment to return, and hence the lands of that poligar cannot expect to regain that high state of cultivation which they enjoyed under Cawnia Naigue's father, whose good qualities were well known, as the sons of the same family. The examples which have been exhibited to the poligars in general, during the last two years, I have no longer that fear which I formerly professed, lest the acknowledgment of any part of the poligar's family, should be imputed to erroneous management; and considering the singular advantages of the lands of that poligar, in a ruinous situation, its peculiar disadvantages for amance management, and the disposition of many of the principal inhabitants, who respect the memory of Cawnia Naigue's father, as they execrate that of the late poligar himself; I am of opinion that the restoration of the pollam upon a zemindary tenure, has become an expedient measure.

54. The father of the late Cawnia Naigue had three wives, by each of whom he had one son; the eldest, Cawnia Naigue, has been executed; the second, Warra Cawnia Naigue,

Appendix to Vth REPORT from The Select Committee on [No. 27.]Collector's Report
respecting Permanent Settlement of the Southern Pollams; dated 30
Sept. 1802.

Naigue, is about twenty years old, and enjoys a pension from the Company; the third, Taddy Cawnia Naigue, is about 18 years old.

55. Warra Cawnia Naigue enjoying the right of primogeniture, and having separated his interest, at an early period, from the late rebel, has the preferable claim to the favour of government; and if the reasons I have stated, shall appear to render his appointment expedient, I would recommend, in consideration of the great extent of uncultivated land in the pollam, that two-thirds of the gross revenues received by the Company during their management of it, a long period of destruction and failure, be assessed as a permanent tribute.

56. The cawel and sayer of this pollam, constituted very near half of its value, as you will observe from the accompanying statements; and as both will remain in the hands of government, the young poligar cannot be misled, by any overgrown resources, to improper thoughts of his dependent condition.

57. The sum which, upon this principle, would be payable by the poligar of Sapatoor, as a permanent jumma, amounts to star pagodas 2,582; and I have no doubt the young poligar, who is likely to succeed in bringing back some of the old inhabitants, would be able to pay it, with facility.

THE SIX SEQUESTERED POLLAMS OF TINNEVELLY.

58. When the Tinnevelly poligars were transferred to the Company, an hope was entertained that, by establishing a moderate peshcush, and by the exercise of just measures towards them, their obedience and services would be secured to the state. The rebellious conduct of some, and the licentious habits of all, soon led to a very different expectation; and in the system adopted, to prevent future insurrection, it was not judged expedient to make any exceptions.

59. The increase of peshcush, the deprivation of cawel, the interdiction against the future use of those implements which had been so long regarded by the poligars with such fond attachment, were extended to all; and the arguments by which it was attempted to reconcile the poligars to these privations, were by none more strenuously combated, than by the poligar of Etiapoor; upon the ground of that fidelity which he had ever testified towards the Company;—but the mortification he suffered, in being treated with the suspicion of a disaffected tributary, had no influence upon his public conduct; for he paid the increase of peshcush with punctuality, and gave no cause for a single complaint against him.

60. Such was the conduct he had observed, prior to the rebellion of Panjalumcouchy and Shevagunga. During the progress of it, he conducted himself with uniform attachment, manifesting, upon every occasion, a sincere desire to aid the efforts of our troops, to the utmost of his power. Besides the assistance derived from this poligar, in the reduction of the rebels, his example had the most happy influence upon the other poligars; and adverting to the justice and policy of rendering the situation of a tributary, who had thus conducted himself, eligible and easy, I proposed to the Board of Revenue, that this poligar should receive some lasting mark of the Company's approbation.

61. I was the more disposed to this opinion, by the pains which had been taken by the rebellious Murdoos, to impress the poligars of these countries, with an apprehension that the assurance I had so repeatedly given them, of the fixed determination of government, to maintain them in all their just rights and privileges, were mere professions, depending upon our convenience and power; and which, in consequence of the large resurreptions that had been made from them during the last two years, they had a temptation to adopt. The reward of those who had conducted themselves with fidelity, would, I observed, counteract this impression, and tend to establish another, more beneficial to the existing state of affairs, and more favourable to the permanent interests of the Company.

62. From these considerations, I took the liberty of submitting the propriety of transferring to the poligar of Etiapoor, upon a reasonable jumma, the lands of Panjalumcouchy immediately bordering upon Etiapoor; and from similar motives, I recommended the grant of the two southern magauns to the poligar of Maniachy, and those of Candulgoody and Colatoor, to the poligar of Mailmundeh.

63. This plan of dividing the lands of the rebellious poligars, amongst those who had manifested attachment and allegiance, during the troubles in the southern provinces, was recommended by the board of revenue, and approved by government. The board, however, were of opinion, that the country would have sufficiently recovered, after a period of three years, to admit of a permanent increase of about one-sixth in the jumma at first proposed to be settled for these lands; and in compliance with these instructions, the magauns were tendered to, and received by, the poligars, upon these terms. I however very soon discovered, that they really regarded the arrangement, not as one of benefit to themselves, in remuneration of the services they had performed, but as a measure of expediency, suited to the convenience of the Company.

64. If I thought that these impressions proceeded from an avaricious disposition in these poligars, or an arrogant estimate of the services they had rendered, no person would be less disposed than myself to countenance them. But I have seen the havoc occasioned by the sword, and by the devastation of contending bodies in arms, throughout these villages; and I know, also, that many of the inhabitants who settled themselves to their satisfaction in the circar lands at that period, are never likely to return to their original villages. Hence a much longer period than three years must elapse, before the lands proposed to be given up to the poligars of Etiapoor, Mailmundeh and Maniachy, can regain their former value.

65. The two principal objects of the transfer I recommended, were, that the poligars in general, might have an instance constantly to refer to, of the disposition of the Company to reward fidelity and service; and that the condition of those who had these claims upon us, might be enviable and happy. The jumma, which in my judgment, will secure these important views, exceeds the peshcush formerly received from the poligars of these pollams, no less than 105 per cent., exclusive of cawel resurreptions; and I beg leave to recommend it to the Commission, for their adoption.

66. In my first plan for the division of the magauns of Panjalumcouchy, I proposed the transfer of Poodiumpotoor to the poligar of Maniachy, and of Careoorchy, to the poligar of Etiapoor: but having ascertained that several of the villages of Carcoorchy are closely intermixed with those of Maniachy, I apprehend that the management of them by the poligar of Etiapoor, might become a source of future discontent and litigation. I beg therefore to suggest, that Carcoorchy be given up in perpetuity, to the poligar of Maniachy, and that Poodiumpotoor, which is mixed with the lands of Etiapoor, be transferred in lieu thereof, to the poligar of that pollam. As the two poligars have no particular objection to this transfer, I have assigned them accordingly, and have made the necessary alterations in the accompanying statement, for the permanent settlement of those lands, which will, I hope, receive the approbation of the Commission.

67. In the three sequestered pollams of Naglepore, Yellarumpunny and Colarputty, the proportion of dry grain lands is very large, and the improvements of which the tanks are capable, not very considerable. The produce and capability of the lands, have been correctly ascertained, during the three years of the Company's management; and the terwa and terbuddy, shown in the accompanying statements in abstract, will afford to the Commission, the detailed information relating thereto.

68. From the gross jumma realized by the Company, I have made a deduction of 25 per cent., and recommended, that the residue be declared the permanent assessment upon these lands. Such a statement will produce to the Company, per cent. above the peshcush formerly paid by the poligars; and it provides for the ease and happiness of the cultivators of the soil, which should be the paramount consideration of a permanent settlement; but in order that this deduction from the gross jumma, may reach those whom it is intended to relieve, I beg particularly to recommend, that the rates of tax upon the dry grain lands, which I originally recommended for Colatoor, in my Report of the 29th December 1800, may be adopted throughout these pollams; namely, for every kire of punjeh land, being a square of 145 yards, of Kershul. Veppul. Puttul. Shewul.

land.	K. F.	K. F.	K. F.
C. 3. 2.	2. 3.	1. 9.	1. 1.

The establishment of these rates, will diffuse comfort through every cottage in those pollams, and will not discourage the principal natives from purchasing the villages, for the expectation of bringing large tracts of excellent, though uncultivated land, into fertility; together with the proposed deduction from the gross jumma, will make these lands, a desirable acquisition to many of the better conditioned inhabitants. In the accompanying statements, I have divided them into such portions, as appear to me to conform with the original instructions for the sale of the havelly lands; and I recommend, that offers for the purchase of these lots be invited accordingly.

COLLUMCONDUM.

69. By the assumption of the cawel, this poligar's means of subsistence were brought within such narrow limits, that it became necessary to relinquish the small tribute previously received from him; and his Lordship was also pleased, in consideration of his poverty and numerous family, to confer upon him four small tanks, and the little spots of nunjeh watered from them, free of rent, as a means of living. A sunnud will, therefore, be necessary for his enjoyment of these lands in perpetuity, and his name is inserted in the list of poligars, for this purpose.

CONCLUSION.

70. In closing my Report upon this important subject, it can scarcely be necessary to urge, as the motive of any apparent prolixity, my anxiety to satisfy the Commission upon every doubtful point. Indeed I now only desist, in the belief, that nothing material for their information has been omitted. The subject is indeed of so much consequence, and so important has been the share allotted to me, in eradicating those accumulated evils which distracted the poligar countries at the time I received charge of them, that the detail of it, might be swelled to any extent. I shall, however, conclude it for the present, by declaring, and I do so with that confidence which an eventful superintendence of the Company's interests in those districts, for nearly four years, is calculated to inspire, that nothing appears to me to be now wanting to consolidate the foundations of internal order and peace, but the establishment of the settlement herein recommended, the abolition of the customs and the regulation of the police. By the energy and justice of government, the rebellious have been subdued; the oppressed have been upheld and exalted; the obedient have been liberally rewarded; and the extinction of a divided authority, has restored the fairest province of the Carnatic, from an acknowledged state of anarchy and confusion, to a state of subordination and prosperity. To this complete revolution of affairs, of which the Company owe the solid and permanent advantages of the settlement now recommended, of which the extent is shown distinctly in the accompanying statement; and I trust that his Lordship in Council may consider them so ample, as not to deny himself the happiness of abolishing the extraordinary contrivances by which the customs are now collected, to the inconceivable distress of the people; and of appropriating the cawel receipts to a vigorous system system of police, upon which all the promised success of a permanent settlement in Tinnevelly must finally depend.

I have the honour to be, with great respect,

Tinnevelly, 30th Sept. 1802.

Gentlemen,
Your most obedient, humble servant,
S. R. LUSHINGTON,
Collector of Tinnevelly and the Marawars.

REPORT from SPECIAL COMMISSION to the Governor in Council, Fort St. George; dated 5 April 1803.

MY LORD,

Special Commission to Government, on Permanent Settlement of the Southern Poligars;
5 April 1803.

Para. 1.—THE extensive enquiries which have been instituted, and the information which has in consequence been submitted to the Honourable Court of Directors, and to your Lordship in Council, relative to the government and condition of the poligar coun-tries, render superfluous the intrusion on your Lordship's time, of any elaborate discussion of the principles of the poligar tenure, or with regard to the most advisable mode of improving that part of the British possessions in the Peninsula.

2. The inconvenience arising to the government of the Carnatic, from the indefinite and oppressive exercise of the power of the nabobs of Arcot over the poligars, and from the occasional resistance opposed by those feudatories to the authority of the state, during periods of public calamity, having rendered the interference of the British government requisite to suppress so fruitful a source of violence and distraction; it was provided by the treaty of 1792, concluded with the late nabob Mahomed Ally, that the poligars dependent on the soubahdarry of Arcot, should be transferred to the exclusive authority of the British government.

3. The terms and conditions under which this arrangement was effected, proved to be incompatible with the objects of the policy on which it was founded. The poligars retained, as it was natural for them to retain, a strong desire to continue the exercise of military and independent power. The substitution of a lenient and equal government, for the irregular and arbitrary violence of the Mahomedan administration, offered a feeble inducement to the poligars to abandon the habits of their feudal institution. The exact adherence to treaty, on the part of the British government, left to the poligars the possession of their principalities, on the conditional payment of a tribute utterly disproportionate to the extent of their resources. The means of a superabundant wealth, which, under the government of the nabobs of Arcot, had enabled the poligars to appease the resentment of the Mahomedan officers, and to expiate rebellion against the state, by satisfying the rapacity of local power, became, under the British administration, the source of personal aggrandizement and ambition to the poligars. The limits of prudence, and the degrees of difference in the change of circumstances, were indistinctly perceived under such flattering encouragement of those inflammatory passions; and the poligars of the south, exhibited a practical example of the insufficient restraint imposed on the appetites of men, by the claims of gratitude, or by the hope of contentment in the enjoyment of limited good. The poligars rebelled against the authority of the Company, as they had rebelled against that of the nabob of Arcot; and the diminution of the appointed force of the provinces, became the signal of revolt, under the moderate demand of the ordinary peshcush, as well as under the capricious enforcement of a claim, regulated by power alone.

4. The general history of the poligars, as far as records go back, has been described to your Lordship in Council by the late collector of poligar peshcush, Mr. Lushington, in his letter of the 20th August 1799, and in our Report of the 12th August 1802. These documents also include the traditional origin of the poligar tenure, and of the nature of the service which they were bound to render to the state. In their Report of the 14th March 1797, the late Board of Revenue described, with great accuracy, the actual condition of the poligars in their relation to the British government under the treaty of 1792; and in a very extensive commentary on that report, the late Right Honourable Governor, Lord Hobart, pointed out to the Honourable Court of Directors, the defects of the engagements contracted with the nabob Mahomed Ally, with respect to the government of the poligar countries. In their dispatches of the 10th June 1795, and 5th June 1799, the Court of Directors have reviewed the principle of those engagements; and have prescribed the means of rendering the poligars useful subjects and obedient tributaries to the British government. For the attainment of these objects, the Honourable Court have uniformly insisted on the absolute suppression of the military power of the poligars; and on the substitution of a pecuniary tribute more proportionate, than the ordinary peshcush, to the resources of the poligar countries, and more adequate to the public demand, for defraying the expenses of general protection and government.

5. The circumstances connected with the rebellion of the poligar of Panjalamecouchy; the general commotion excited in the southern provinces, subsequently to the defection of that chieftain; the punishment of the rebellious chiefs, by the confiscation of their lands; the demolition of the poligar forts; the discontinuance of their military retinues; the consequent augmentation of the public revenue, and the several proclamations published by the authority of your Lordship in Council; are events which serve to mark the progressive approach to that improvement of the administration of poligar affairs, inculcated by the Court of Directors, and enforced by the necessity of providing for the internal tranquillity, and for the efficient exercise of the authority of government over that part of the British territories. We proceed accordingly to submit to your Lordship in Council, the result of our correspondence with the late collector of poligar peshcush, Mr. Lushington, on the subject of of determining the amount of revenue to be permanently assessed on the southern zemindaries and poligars.

Special Commission to Government, on Permanent Settlement of the Southern Poligars;

RAMNAD.

6. The circumstances which led to the rebellion, and to the subsequent deposition of the Rajah of Ramnad, have been the subject of ample discussion on the records of government. The agreement in consequence concluded with his highness the late nabob of Arcot, for the administration of the affairs of Ramnad, by the means of the Company's officers, having been submitted to the Honourable Court of Directors, the Honourable Court have expressed their sentiments on the subject. The sister of the deposed Rajah Mungul Eshwar Nancheyan, having been formally acknowledged, in conformity to the terms of the above-mentioned agreement, to be the proper successor to the zemindarry, the district of Ramnad has, with the permission and approbation of your Lordship in Council, been transferred to the authority of the Rany, under conditional terms, for the permanent settlement of the revenue; and it now remains for us to submit to the consideration of your Lordship in Council, the grounds on which we propose to fix the future revenue of Ramnad, on a permanent zemindarry tenure.

7. The document furnished by the collector, shows the state of the revenue of Ramnad during the seven years of the British administration. This period of time, includes two years of the management of Mr. Jackson, and three years of the management of Mr. Lushington. —Your Lordship in Council will observe, that during the two first years, the revenue amounted to star pagodas 1,32,299 on the average; and that during the three last years, the revenue was low as star pagodas 79,704 on the average; and that during the three last years, the revenue has rapidly increased from star pagodas 65,127. 31. 33½, to star pagodas 1,85,625. 14; making the average revenue of the three last years star pagodas 1,64,374. 4. 4½. —But the collector justly observes, in our opinion, that neither of these periods of time, taken separately, can be considered to afford a proper criterion for the determination of the permanent revenue. For it might be difficult to assign any adequate reason for the extraordinary depression of the revenue, during the third and fourth year of the British administration; while the extraordinary success which has attended the able administration, during the three last years, might lead to dangerous errors, if adopted as the basis of a fixed settlement. —Although the result of actual measurement in the last, which was the most productive year, has satisfied the collector that the difference between the computed quantities, and measurement on which it produced, has left to the inhabitants a surreptitious advantage, to the extent of pagodas 30,374. 25. 4; we yet concur in the prudence of his opinion with respect to the expediency of qualifying the abundant produce of the last years, by including in the calculation of a general average, a portion of the less productive seasons.

8. The average gross collections from Ramnad, during the entire period of the British administration, amounts to star pagodas 1,31,104; from which the average gross disbursement (including the provision of the Rannee) being deducted, the average net revenue has been star pagodas 95,562. —But considering the extraordinary defalcation of the revenue during the third and fourth year, connected with the circumstances now depending in the Supreme Court, we consider the proposition of the collector to be reasonable, for calculating the average revenue on the produce during two years of Mr. Powney's management, during one year of Mr. Jackson's management, and during the three years of Mr. Lushington's management. The result of this calculation, gives a gross average revenue of star pagodas 1,42,101; and we think that the permanent assessment of Ramnad may, on these grounds, be fixed with great safety, according to the usual terms of zemindarry assessment, in the portion of two-thirds of the gross revenue upon the average net revenue received from the years. —This amount, is something less than the average net revenue of the province during the whole management of the Company's officers; and it exceeds the amount peshcush paid by the late zemindar, by the sum of star pagodas 33,875. —We accordingly recommend that the revenue to be permanently assessed on the province of Ramnad be fixed at the sum of star pagodas 94,733.

9. Notwithstanding this proposed augmentation of the peshcush formerly paid by the zemindar, we are of opinion that the accounts now submitted to your Lordship in Council, furnish abundant proofs of the revenues of the province being adequate to the permanent assessment, as the period of time for which the average is calculated, has included frequent transitions of authority, and has partaken, to a certain degree, of the effects of the late commotions in the southern provinces. It is further to be observed, that under the new constitution of the government, the zemindar will be entirely relieved from the expense of military sibbendy; and as the allowance granted for the support of the Rany's household, is included in the account of the gross charges deducted previously to the calculation of the net revenue above stated, we can have no doubt that the residue left at the disposal of the zemindar, will always be found consistent with those principles of moderation and security, on which it is the immediate policy of the British Government to provide for the punctual receipt of the territorial revenue, and for the comfort of those who pay it.

10. The orders of your Lordship in Council, having been carried into effect, we have great pleasure in submitting to your Lordship in Council, the Report of the acting collector, Mr. Parish; and as provision has been made for all the material points of the arrangement, by the written engagement of the Nancheyan, it only remains for us to recommend that the sunnud of permanent property may be furnished to the acting collector, for the purpose of being substituted for the general cowle under which the zemindarry has been transferred to the Rany.

Special Commission to Government, on Permanent Settlement of the Southern Pollams; 5 April 1803.

11. Your Lordship in Council will have the satisfaction to observe, that your instructions have been carried into effect with great prudence and care by Mr. Parish; and that the adjustment arranged by the acting collector, of the balance of the preceding year, as well as of the account current for the present year, is entirely conformable to our intentions and wishes in this respect.

12. The permanent revenue having been settled, exclusively of the salt revenue, and of the customs, it becomes requisite to provide for the separate administration of those branches of revenue; and we beg leave to recommend that the establishment of servants proposed by the collector, amounting monthly to P. N. pagodas 440. 26. 76, may be confirmed by your Lordship in Council.

13. The collector has recommended that the allowances granted for the support of the deposed poligar and his family, should be defrayed by the Company, as long as the customs shall be collected by the British government; but that when the collection of the internal duties shall have been abolished, the expense of supporting the deposed poligar, be transferred to the Ranny, in consideration of the general benefit which the zemindary may be expected to derive from the discontinuance of the customs.

14. That the zemindary will receive the supposed advantage, we have great pleasure in believing to be true; and we should have no hesitation in concurring in the recommendation of the collector, if the question was determinable exclusively by pecuniary considerations; but it is of importance, in our judgment, to refrain from any measure calculated to disturb the idea of permanency, which it is desirable that the Ranny, and the people of Ramnad, should be encouraged to attach to the present arrangement. We therefore recommend that the charge of maintaining the deposed poligar and his family, shall continue to be defrayed by the Honourable Company.

SHEVAGUNGA.

15. The circumstances connected with the province of Shevagunga, having been recently brought under the consideration of your Lordship in Council, by the usurpation, rebellion and death of Chinna Murdoo; it is unnecessary for us to detain your Lordship in Council, further than to observe that Weya Taver, appointed by your Lordship's Proclamation of the 6th July 1801, to be zemindar of Shevagunga, has been instated in the possession of his mindary; and has superintended in his own right, the administration of its affairs, since the suppression of the late commotion. It is sufficiently obvious, that during the time when the province of Shevagunga remained under the controul of the usurper Murdoo, it has not been practicable for the officers of government to obtain that minute information of the revenues and resources, which, in other instances, has enabled us to submit to your Lordship in Council, conclusive grounds of calculation for the permanent settlement of the revenue. Since the establishment of the rightful zemindar Woya Taver, a sufficient period of time has not elapsed, to enable us to compare the accounts of the productive powers of the country, under the effects of different modes of management.

16. Under this impression, the late collector of poligar peshcush was induced to suggest to us, the expediency of negotiating an arrangement with the present zemindar, for the purpose of transferring, during a limited time, the administration of the revenues of Shevagunga to the hands of the Company's officers, with a view to the ascertainment of the value of the province. We have no doubt that the zemindar would have manifested his gratitude and his confidence, by a ready and even by a cheerful acquiescence in such a plan; but we deemed the object to be obtained, utterly disproportionate to the disadvantage which could not fail, in our judgment, to have been produced, by the agitation of the public mind, in the southern provinces, in consequence of the revocation of the zemindar's authority, so formally established, and so recently proclaimed in the province of Shevagunga.

17. The historical points stated by the late collector Mr. Lushington, with respect to the separation of this district from Ramnad, are calculated to throw considerable light on the relative proportion of the value of those provinces. Additional means of comparison may be drawn from the rate of peshcush paid by those zemindaries respectively, at the time when the poligar countries were transferred to the authority of the British government; and if the grounds are accurate on which we have calculated the gross revenues of Ramnad, at star pagodas 1,42,105, on the average produce of six years, much credit appears to be due to the correctness of the accounts furnished by the present zemindar of Shevagunga, for the Fusley year 1211, which state the gross revenue at star pagodas 1,25,626, exclusively of sayer and of the salt revenue.

18. Mr. Lushington "having bestowed every leisure moment to the correction of all the general statements and information received at different times since he became collector; and having maturely considered the statement of the actual resources and collections in Shevagunga during the last year," has recommended that the permanent assessment of Shevagunga should be fixed at the annual sum of star pagodas 75,000.

19. Although the state of the information, which we are enabled to submit to your Lordship in Council, is neither so mature, nor so extensive as we undoubtedly consider to be desirable; yet comparing the inconvenience of further delay, with respect to this zemindary alone, at the time of arranging the permanent assessment of the other southern poligars, we fear that the diffidence and intrigue to be apprehended during the prosecution of further enquiry, are liable to be attended with more inconvenience to the interest of the zemindar and of the Company, than can be compensated by the probable result of further investigation. We concur therefore in the opinion of the late collector, that to protract the settlement of this zemindary, is unadvisable; and we think that abundant reason exists, in the comparative and collateral information stated by Mr. Lushington, for believing that the proposed proposed assessment, while it provides for an augmentation of the public revenue to the extent of 50 per cent. on the former peshcush, is entirely compatible with the revenues of the zemindary. The amount considerably exceeds the proportion of two-thirds of the assessment proposed to be fixed for Ramnad: but the grounds of the disproportion, are satisfactorily explained in the Report of the collector, and confirmed by the relative proportion of the former peshcush; for your Lordship will observe, that the augmentation of the proposed assessment in Ramnad, is from star pagodas 60,857 to star pagodas 94,733, which is in the proportion of 55½ per cent. to the former peshcush; and in Shevagunga, the proposed augmentation is from star pagodas 50,000, to star pagodas 75,000, which is in the proportion of 50 per cent. to the former peshcush.

20. On these grounds, we have the honour to recommend to your Lordship in Council, that the permanent assessment of Shevagunga may be fixed, and that a sunnud of permanent property may accordingly be prepared, for the purpose of fixing the zemindar, without further doubt or suspense, in the possession of his zemindary.

21. The foregoing assessment is, exclusive of the salt and of the sayer, stated by the late collector, at star pagodas 7,610; which being added to the permanent assessment, the future revenue from this zemindary, will amount to star pagodas 82,610, being an augmentation, in the proportion of more than 65 per cent. to the former peshcush.

22. If it should please your Lordship in Council to adopt this recommendation for the permanent assessment of Shevagunga, we shall instruct the acting collector to provide for the separate collection of the customs and salt revenue; and to furnish a kistbundy, for the purpose of being inserted in the sunnud of the zemindar.

TINNEVELLY.

23. The several Reports from Mr. Lushington, the late collector of Poligar Peshcush, submitted to your Lordship in Council (as noted in the margin) described so particularly the whole course of that reform, which has been happily effected among the poligars of Tinnevelly, that it must be superfluous for us to revive the subject.

24. Mr. Lushington's Report of the 31st January 1800, and that which we have now the honour of submitting to your Lordship in Council, with the documents which accompanied them, contain, in our opinion, ample materials for determining the amount of the revenue to be permanently assessed on the pollams of Tinnevelly; and we have the satisfaction of informing your Lordship in Council, that the use of those materials has been considerably improved, and extended, by the personal explanations and suggestions of the collector, since his arrival at the presidency.

25. The statements now furnished by the collector, confirm with sufficient precision, after the experience of three years, the accounts submitted by him in the year 1800, on which the existing settlement of the poligar revenue was founded, with the permission and approbation of your Lordship in Council. On this point, we have particular pleasure in requesting the attention of your Lordship in Council to the sentiments stated in the Report of the collector:—With respect to the terms of that settlement, Mr. Lushington observes, "that the acceptance of them by the poligars, though reluctant, was sincere, and will have been demonstrated by my progressive Reports for nearly three years, and by the circumstance which I have the satisfaction of stating; that the increased jumma of the last two years, was completely collected in the course of them."

"Every principal poligar, since the establishment of the increased assessment, has been faithful to his allegiance, and punctual in his public payments: nor can it be justly concluded that their obedience has arisen solely from the terrors of military power, or their punctuality, from any superabounding resources. The period which has elapsed since the commencement of this reform, has not been wanting in temptations to turbulence; while the statements convey the best evidence procurable by any other process than that of actual measurement, of the extent of their revenues."

26. Under these circumstances, we can entertain no doubt that the southern poligars are in a condition to receive the permanent possession of their lands on zemindary tenure; and Mr. Lushington informs us, "that the nature of the permanent settlement, and of the system of law and security, by which it is to be enjoyed by themselves, and handed down to their posterity, has been repeatedly explained to the poligars; and they now await with anxious solicitude, the confirmation of a blessing, which is to soften to them the remembrance of former sacrifices."

27. It only remains therefore for your Lordship in Council to complete the reformation of the poligar administration in the province of Tinnevelly, by determining the amount of the permanent assessment; and in proposing that amount to your Lordship in Council, we deem it necessary to explain, that our judgment has been governed by the necessity of resuming from the poligars, the means of supporting military establishments, and by the policy of combining, with that privation, the enjoyment of domestic comfort, and the maintenance of public respectability.

28. Without pursuing, in this place, the detailed calculations arising from this principle, we request to refer your Lordship in Council generally to the materials furnished by Mr. Lushington, and, in a particular manner, to the statement which we have prepared, for the purpose of exhibiting at one view, the operation of that principle in the permanent assessment of the pollams of Tinnevelly.

29. The statement shows the valuation of the several pollams, at four different periods of time, with a general average drawn from the whole, which we consider to be a just criterion of the present value of the respective pollams; the amount of the fixed peshcush, as it is stated in the schedule of 1792, appears to have been utterly disproportionate to the computed resources of the poligars: the increase of peshcush, proposed at an early time time by Mr. Powney, compared with the amount actually collected by the late collector and with the amount of the permanent assessment recommended by Mr. Lushington, is elucidated by the centage produced, by those modes of calculation; and the whole forms, in our opinion, a satisfactory foundation for determining the amount which we now propose, with the sanction of your Lordship in Council to establish.

30. The divisions of the general statement, exhibit the several pollams in the different conditions in which they have been placed, during the course of the recent events in the southern provinces. The eleven pollams of Ettiapore, Shevagherry, Wootamally, Chokumputty, Pareyoor, Talavencottah, Cadumboor, Panvaly, Gollaputty, Zailmurreh and Allugapoor, have not been subjected to the immediate management of British officers; the former peshcush paid by those poligars, being compared with their computed resources, appears to have been as low as ten per cent., and in no instance to have exceeded thirty-three per cent. The permanent assessment of those pollams proposed by us, with few exceptions, less than the peshcush settled, or the revenue collected by the collectors in the year 1800. That which we recommended for the large pollams, varies, in its proportion to the computed resources, from 54 to 57 per cent.; and that which we recommend for the smaller pollams (the expense of management being, relatively, less in the large than in the small pollams), varies from 41 to 49 per cent. of the computed resources. According to the mode of calculation adopted by us, the permanent assessment of the land revenue, in the eleven pollams above enumerated, amounts to star pagodas 54,070: the salt revenue and sayer, is computed at star pagodas 3,388. 37. 29, making the future amount of gross resources from these pollams, star pagodas 57,458. 37. 29; which sum exceeds the former peshcush, by star pagodas 32,179. 7. 29.

31. The poligars of Nadavacoorchy, Maniachy, Soorunday, Chiunnelgoody, Mailmundeh, Autungherry, Sundyoor, Woorcaud, Singumputty, Manarcottah and Avadyapoor, having professed to feel a conviction, that the resources of their pollams were unequal to the payment of the increased peshcush, proposed the surrender of their pollams into the hands of the collector, for the purpose of ascertaining the actual condition of these lands. They were accordingly subjected to the immediate management of the Company's officers; and the information on which we are now enabled to propose the permanent assessment of those lands, may be considered to be the result of a fair experiment.

32. On the result of this actual experiment, with respect to the seven first pollams, it appears that the revenue estimated by the collector, in his Report of the 31st January 1800, exceeded the amount actually produced, by the sum of 549 Cully chuckrums; but the local considerations applicable to those several pollams (for which we request to refer your Lordship in Council to the Reports of the collector,) have induced us to concur in his opinion, that these poligars will be able to discharge the proposed jumma, with ease to themselves, and with justice to the people.

33. The statement proposed by us, exhibits the same points of information, with respect to the seven pollams in question, as with regard to the eleven pollams which had not been brought under the immediate management of the Company's officers. The average valuation of those pollams, taken from the valuation of four different periods of time, amounts to star pagodas 14,234. 9. 20; the former peshcush amounted to star pagodas 5,260. 18; and the centage of the peshcush to the average valuation, varied from 23 to 50. The information acquired under the immediate management of Mr. Lushington, has enabled him to propose a more equal rate of assessment; and the permanent revenue which we in consequence recommended to be fixed on those seven pollams, bears the proportion of 60 per cent. to their gross resources respectively. The proposed permanent jumma amounts to star pagodas 7,210, to which the salt revenue and sayer, amounting to star pagodas 271. 37. 62, being added, the future revenue from the seven pollams, will be star pagodas 7,481. 37. 62, which is an increase of the former peshcush, to the extent of star pagodas 2,221. 19. 62.

34. It appears from the accounts furnished by the collector, that the gross revenue of the small pollams of Woorcaud and Singumputty, amounted, under his immediate administration, the former to star pagodas 5,675. 22, and the latter, to star pagodas 3,549. 4. The resources of those poligars having been considerably diminished by the resumption of the cawally, the collector has recommended, that the two villages, which they have possessed during a period of sixty years, subject to a certain rent, and an indefinite nuzzer, should be confirmed to them, on the usual terms of zemindarry tenure. The peshcush of Woorcaud, amounted to star pagodas 169. 12, which was in the proportion of 2 per cent. to the gross revenue. The permanent jumma, which we propose to assess on the pollam of Singumputty, amounts to star pagodas 3,783. 33; and that, we propose to assess on the pollam of Woorcaud, amounts to star pagodas 2,366; the former, being in the proportion of 65 per cent., and the latter, 66 per cent. to the gross revenues of these pollams, and affording a permanent increase of revenue, comparatively with the former peshcush, to the extent of star pagodas 5,906.

35. For the reasons stated in the Report of the collector, we concur in his opinion, and accordingly submit to your Lordship in Council, our recommendation, that the two villages of Pareycollam and Ammanacollam, which were resumed with the cawally lands in the year 1800, but which appear to have long been in the possession of the family of the poligars of Avadiapoor, may be restored to him. In this event, the assessment of his lands on the terms of Fuzly 1209, according to the principle of zemindarry assessment, would amount to star pagodas 1,470. 19. 22; but in consideration of the local circumstances described by the collector, with regard to this small pollam, we recommend that the permanent assessment be fixed at star pagodas 1,000, which sum bears the proportion of

to the gross revenue of the pollam, and affords an augmentation, comparatively with the former peshcush, of star pagodas 320.

36. The lands forcibly wrested from the pollam of Collarputty, by the predecessor of the present poligar of Manarcottah, having been restored to their former possessors, the gross revenue of Manarcottah, has been stated by the collector, on the result of his immediate management, at star pag^a 2,480. 30. 27, of which the peshcush formerly payable by this poligar, amounted to star pag^a 1,411. 4. 53. The mode of assessing the permanent revenue in this pollam, proposed by the collector, appears to us to be entirely reasonable, and we accordingly recommend that an allowance of 10 per cent. being made for the charges of management, the jumma be fixed in the proportion of two-thirds of the remaining gross revenue. According to this plan, the permanent jumma will amount to star pag^a 1,488. 18. 16, which bears the proportion of 60 per cent. to the total gross revenue of the pollam; and affords a small augmentation of resource, comparatively with the former peshcush, of star pag^a 77. 13. 43.

37. It is sufficiently known to your Lordship in Council, that the pollam of Shatoor has afforded at different times, a subject of much interesting enquiry. An able and minute Report by Mr. Harris (the present collector of Tanjore) is on record; and the experience since acquired by Mr. Lushington, in his immediate management of that pollam, has enabled him to state his opinion of the resources, with confidence and accuracy. For the observations of that gentleman on the present state of the pollam, we request to refer your Lordship to the Report.

38. According to Mr. Lushington's present valuation, the gross revenue is stated at star pag^a 5,971; the former peshcush amounted to star pag^a 2,822. 8; the peshcush received during Mr. Lushington's management, amounted to star pag^a 3,333. 14. We think the mode proposed by the collector, for the future assessment of the land, to be entirely reasonable, by allowing ten per cent. of the gross revenue for the charge of management, and by fixing the assessment in the proportion of two-thirds of the remaining resources. According to this principle, the future permanent assessment of the Shatoor pollam, will amount to star pag^a 3,383; and we recommend that rate, may be confirmed by your Lordship in Council. It is in the proportion of 56½ per cent. to the gross revenue, and affords a permanent increase of resource, comparatively with the former peshcush, to the extent of star pag^a 560. 36.

39. The insurrection of Cawnia Naig; the distraction introduced in consequence, into his pollam of Sapatoor; his subsequent apprehension and capital punishment, are matters fully recorded on the proceedings of the time, and are succinctly recited in the Report of the collector, now submitted to your Lordship in Council. For the reasons stated in the Report, we entirely concur in the opinion of the collector, that it is now advisable to establish this pollam, upon the terms of a zemindarry tenure; and we recommend that Warra Cawnia Naig, the second son and surviving heir of the late respected poligar, be constituted zemindar of Sapatoor.—This measure will, in the judgment of the collector, be extremely acceptable to the people of the pollam, who are stated to have held the late rebel poligar, in as great a degree of detestation, as they respected his father.

40. Although this pollam suffered considerable injury during the rebellion of the late poligar, the collector considers it to be capable of extensive improvement, from the quantity of dry grain land at present uncultivated, and from the return of the inhabitants expelled by the violence of the late poligar. The affairs of the pollam during the immediate management of the collector, have been liable to much perturbation; and an estimate of the produce taken during that period of time, may, we think, be justly considered to exclude the apprehension of an excessive valuation. We concur therefore in the opinion of the collector, that the permanent assessment should be fixed, in the proportion of two-thirds of the gross revenue collected during the immediate management of Mr. Lushington. The gross revenue being stated by the collector at star pag^a 3,875; the permanent assessment, on the principle we have proposed, will in future amount to star pag^a 2,584, which we accordingly recommend, may be confirmed by your Lordship in Council. This sum is less than the former peshcush by star pagodas 623; but as the cawally and sayer (which will now remain in the hands of government) formed a large portion of the revenue of the Sapatoor poligar, the amount of the former peshcush was not determinable by the amount of the land revenue.

41. The amount of the sayer and salt revenue to be drawn from the six pollams of Woorcaud, Singumputty, Manarcottah, Avadiapoor, Shatoor, and Sapatoor, amounts to star pagodas 441. 19. 1, which being added to the permanent jumma to be in future assessed on those pollams, the total gross income will amount to star pagodas 15,365. 11. 39, which is an increase, comparatively with the former peshcush, to the extent of star pagodas 8,474. 13.

42. In consequence of the entire resumption of the cawel, the resources of the poligar of Collumcondun were so much curtailed, that it pleased your Lordship in Council to relinquish the small tribute formerly received from him, and to confer on him a small portion of nunjah land, as the means of supporting himself and his family. The former peshcush paid by him, amounted to star pagodas 203. 8; and we recommend that a deed of permanent property may be granted to him, for the possession of his present lands, at a nominal peshcush.

43. In consequence of the rebellion of the poligars, the six pollams of Panjalancourchy, Colatore, Cadulgoody, Yellarumpung, Colurputty, and Naglepore, were sequestered, in conformity to the orders of your Lordship in Council. It further pleased your Lordship in Council to direct that the pollams of Panjalancourchy, Colatore, and Cadulgoody, should be declared to be, for ever forfeited by the families of the late poligars; and that the lands should be divided, for the purpose of conferring a distinguished reward, and a perpetual mark mark of public favour, on the poligars of Etiapoor, Maniachy, and Mailmundeh, for their particularly good conduct, fidelity, and assistance, during the late rebellion. According to that intention, the lands of Panjalumcouchy, with the exception of two magauas, have been transferred to the poligar of Etiapoor, and incorporated with his zemindarry; the two southern magauas of Panjalumcouchy, have been transferred to the poligar of Maniachy, and the lands of Colatore and Cadulgoody, have been incorporated in the zemindarry of Mailmundeh.

44. The poligars in question, received these proofs of the approbation of government, with the demonstrations of respect due to such a concession; but we apprehend, from the present Report of the collector, that the terms on which it was at that time, proposed to establish the tenure of the transferred lands, were more calculated to impress on the minds of the poligars, the expediency of the arrangement, with respect to the management of these pollams, than to excite those sentiments of gratitude, which ought to be produced by a distinguished mark of public approbation.

45. We consider this result, to be totally repugnant to the views and sentiments of your Lordship in Council, with respect to the distribution of the forfeited lands; and are of opinion that it will be highly conducive to the satisfaction of the public mind, in the southern provinces, and to the confidence of the poligars, in the principles of the permanent settlement, that a portion of the pecuniary advantage to be derived from the confiscation of the rebellious pollams, should be converted into a substantial and honourable reward of allegiance.

46. The convulsions in the rebellious pollams, have prevented the collector from completing the information respecting the value of those lands, in the satisfactory mode observed in the other pollams. The valuation of Panjalumcouchy, is stated by Mr. Lushington, for the year 1802, at star pagodas 23,472, of which the former peshcush amounted to star pagodas 6,208. The increased peshcush recommended by Mr. Powney, amounted to star pagodas 14,111; and that which is now recommended by Mr. Lushington, in the actual state of the lands of Panjalumcouchy, amounts to star pagodas 12,185, and bears the proportion of 51 per cent. to the valuation of the gross revenue.

47. The valuation of Colatoor, is stated by the collector for the year 1802, at star pagodas 1,961, of which the former peshcush amounted to star pagodas 564. The increased peshcush recommended by Mr. Lushington, in the actual circumstances of the lands of Colatoor, amounts to star pagodas 1,040, which bears the proportion of 53 per cent. to the valuation of the gross revenues.

48. The valuation of Cadulgoody, for the year 1802, is stated at star pagodas 4,259, by the collector; the increased peshcush recommended by Mr. Powney, amounted to star pagodas 2,257; and the assessment recommended by Mr. Lushington, on the actual condition of that pollam, amounts to star pagodas 2,271, which bears the proportion of 53 per cent. to the gross valuation.

49. The permanent jumma proposed by Mr. Lushington, for the pollams of Panjalumcouchy, Colatoor, and Cadulgoody, will in his judgment, secure the objects intended by the distribution of those lands: but your Lordship in Council will observe, that Mr. Lushington has seen "the havoc occasioned by the sword, and by the devastation of contending bodies in arms throughout those villages; and he knows, also, that many of the inhabitants who settled themselves to their satisfaction in the circar lands at that period, are never likely to return to their original villages."

50. If the object of your Lordship in Council, in distributing the lands of the forfeited pollams, appeared to be limited to the assessment of a reasonable jumma, we should concur in the moderate sum recommended by the collector: but, under the peculiar considerations which attach to the case, we are of opinion, that it is extremely advisable to reduce the assessment to be imposed on the forfeited lands, and to commence the system of permanent revenue in the southern countries, by transmitting to the poligars and to their descendants, a memorable example of public justice, in the punishment of rebellion, contrasted with that of gratuitous generosity, in the reward of fidelity.

51. On these grounds, we recommend that the permanent assessment on the distributed lands of Panjalumcouchy, Colatoor and Cadulgoody, be fixed in the proportion of 30 per cent. to the gross valuation of 1802; and that the assessment of Panjalumcouchy be accordingly settled at star pagodas 7,042; that of Colatoor, at star pagodas 589; and that of Cadulgoody, at star pagodas 1,277.

52. For the reasons stated in the Report of the collector, we recommend, that on the final distribution of the sequestered lands of Panjalumcouchy, the village of Poodiumpatoor be incorporated in the zemindarry of Etiapoor, and the village of Carcoochy, in the zemindarry of Maniachy.

53. If it should please your Lordship in Council to acquiesce in this recommendation, we submit to your judgment, the expediency of announcing to the poligars of Etiapoor, Maniachy, and Mailmundeh, the resolution of your Lordship in Council, to reward their attachment to the British government, in a manner more formal and impressive, than by the ordinary channel of communication through the collector.

54. The salt revenue and sayer derivable from the lands of Panjalumcouchy, Colatoor and Cadulgoody, amount to star pagodas 716. 14. 69, which being added to the proposed permanent assessment of the revenue, the total resources from these lands, will amount to star pagodas 9,624. 14. 69, which is an increase, comparatively with the former peshcush, of

55. In the three sequestered pollams of Naglepoor, Yellarumpunny, and Colarputty, the produce of the lands appears to have been correctly ascertained, during the three years of the collector's immediate management; and we concur in the rate of assessment which Mr. Lushington has proposed to fix on those lands, as the permanent revenue, by deducting 25 per cent. from the gross valuation.

56. According to the detailed accounts furnished by the collector, the gross valuation of Yellarumpunny, is stated at star pagodas 7,194, of which the former peshcush amounted to star pagodas 3,386, the permanent assessment which we propose to fix on the lands, amount to star pagodas 5,396; which is an augmentation of resource, to the extent of star pagodas 2,010, comparatively with the former peshcush.

57. The valuation of Colarputty, states the gross revenue at star pagodas 6,313, of which the former peshcush amounted to star pagodas 4,735, which is an augmentation of public resource, to the extent of star pagodas 1,578, comparatively with the former peshcush.

59. We recommend to your Lordship in Council, that the assessment of revenue on the lands of Yellarumpunny, Colarputty, and Naglepoor, be permanently fixed, at the rates above mentioned; and that the collector be instructed to advertise the lands for sale by public auction.

60. The amount of sayer and of salt revenue, in the pollams of Yellarumpunny, Colarputty, and Naglepoor, is star pagodas 1,152, which being added to the land revenue, the total increase from those lands, will be star pagodas 5,373.

61. Mr. Lushington's general acquaintance with the state of the revenues under this presidency, and his successful experience in the practical administration of them, during the last four years, in the province of Tinnevely, entitle his opinions to the greatest degree of respect; and as we have had the most satisfactory proofs of the zeal with which he has devoted his labour and talents to the public service, we deem it to be our duty to inform your Lordship in Council, that the information submitted to us by that gentleman, has been satisfactorily digested; and that in the opinions which he has suggested for our consideration, he has manifested an intimate knowledge of the principles and operation of the system of permanent revenue.

62. Upon a review of the whole, the measures submitted to your Lordship in Council, we have the honour to observe, that the vigorous measures adopted for the subjugation of the poligars of Tinnevely, Shevagaung, and Ramnad, appear to have been effectual; and that the firmness and perseverance with which those measures have been pursued, have actually produced that change in the state of the provinces, which was indispensably requisite to convert the ferocious and turbulent character of the poligar tenure, into the peaceful and beneficial condition of zemindary. Under the former general government, whilst the maintenance of their armed retainers, instead of contributing to the preservation of internal tranquillity, demanded a constant and vigilant attention to the means of augmenting the regular force stationed in the southern provinces. Under the proposed plan of settling the pollams, the permanent assessment of the lands, which we have proposed, combined with the resumption of the public resources, to the extent of star pagodas 1,76,378 per annum; while the necessary operation of the change, by directing the attention of the zemindars to the improvement of agriculture and the arts of peace, must daily tend to diminish the expense of those armaments, which have been repeatedly charge the government from the exchequer of the public treasury, and with severe loss of its soldiers and subjects. Impressed with these sentiments, it is with peculiar satisfaction that we direct the attention of your Lordship in Council, to the concluding declaration, which the superintendence of the southern provinces, during the eventful period of the last four years, has enabled the collector to pronounce with confidence, "That nothing appears to be wanting, to consolidate the foundations of internal order and peace, but the establishment of the settlement recommended, the abolition of the customs, and the regulation of the police."

"By the energy and justice of government (the collector proceeds to observe), the rebellious, have been subdued; the oppressed, have been upheld and exalted; the obedient have been liberally rewarded; and the extinction of a divided authority, has restored the fairest province of the Carnatic, from an acknowledged state of anarchy and confusion, to a state of subordination and prosperity."

63. The immediate cause of this beneficial change, is the permanent settlement of the revenue, on which we trust your Lordship will signify your determination, at an early period of time; the abolition of the customs, we have no doubt, will be highly advantageous to the interests of the southern countries; but until the advantages of the intended change shall have been attained, and until sufficient security shall have been established against the exaction of the illegal duties in another form, it will be premature, in our judgment, to relinquish so considerable a portion of the public income: And with regard to the establishment of an efficient police, we consider it to be dependent on the institution of the zillah courts, an institution which the southern pollams and zemindaries will, in our judgment, indispensably require, as soon as your Lordship in Council may have fixed the future revenue of those lands on a permanent foundation.

We have the honour to be, with great respect,
My Lord, &c.
Your Lordship's most obedient humble servants,
W. PETRIE.

Extract from REPORTS respecting TALLIARY POLICE.

Extract from REPORT of Collector of SOUTHERN POLIGAR PESHCUSH; dated 1st May 1800.

IN the instructions which I gave to my tehsildars in January last, for the assumption of the desha cawel privileges, I purposely made no allusion to the tallum cawel, having had no opportunity to gain information on which to found any system for its regulation or collection. The relative duties of these two services, the past and present situation of the persons performing them, would, I knew, be ascertained, at a very early period, from the representations on the spot; and as, upon the system to be adopted, greatly depended the future tranquility of the province, there could not be a stronger motive for proceeding with great caution, and with a thorough knowledge of the real situation of the several parties to be affected by it;—But as the disorders of the country will daily increase, until some measures be taken for their suppression, I cannot longer delay submitting, for your consideration, the draft of an advertisement, which I propose to publish, as the foundation of an efficient system of watching service throughout the country.

The power of the poligars has been so completely humbled, that the tallum cawel carrahs have no longer any dread of them; and from their interference, I have no apprehension of any serious obstruction to the well ordering of the watching service; but there are other circumstances, which, if suffered to take their course, would place the province in a greater state of confusion and insecurity of property and life, than it was in the plenitude of the poligar power. I refer to the injuries which the cawel carrahs, no longer protected by, or connected with, the poligars, receive from the circar servants, by the withholding of their russoms, and being made responsible for losses and thefts which have never happened.

Under the pressure of such injuries, it is obvious that men who have arms in their hands; who are well acquainted with all the lurking places in the country; whose line of duty favours nightly excursions, and to whom the hereditary office of protector, as well as their long connection with the poligar, has naturally given a spirit of enterprise and independence, will plunder and rob, rather than starve.

No vigilance, on the part of the Company's servants, exercising the duties of desha cawel, can prevent, nor would the whole military force in the province avail, against such secret and extensive depredation. To disarm them, would not be effectual; for a large bamboo with a piece of iron stuck on the top of it, is all sufficient for the purposes of robbery and plunder.

It would be certainly regular, that whatever measures were adopted to restore the tallum cawel carrahs to their ancient fees and privileges, could be taken in concert with his highness's manager; but the excessive weakness and corruption of the Nabob's administration, compels me to abandon the hope of co-operation. Where the cawel carrah is weak, his just dues (like the just dues of all others in the country, who have not the power of resistance) are taken for the benefit of the circar servants; and where he is strong enough to collect a few vagabonds to plunder the inhabitants, the monigars render his russoms, and participate in the fruits of his depredation.

These and other such acts of tyranny and injustice, have so confounded the proper right and duty of every man, that they are scarcely any longer known even to himself. It is from that reflection, that I have made this advertisement more detailed than may at first appear necessary; but my object has been, to make the people at large understand what duties they have a title to expect from the *cawel*gar, to soften the animosities subsisting between the inhabitants and the *cawel*gars, by showing that the past neglect and perversion of those duties, is not attributable entirely to the *cawel*gars; and to point out to them (for they require every such comfort) the benefits they may expect from the future faithful performance of the watching service.

To effect this object, by restoring the tallum cawel carrah to the intention of its institution, and the enjoyment of the fees and privileges justly due to that service, to the executors of the duty; it appears to me indispensable, that the tallum cawel carrahs should in future receive their russoms immediately from my servants, employed in the collection and service of the desha cawel, and be held accountable exclusively to the Company, for their conduct. If this arrangement receives your sanction, I anticipate the greatest benefits to the country from its adoption; and, on the other hand, no conviction is stronger on my mind, than that, so long as the cawel carrahs are liable to receive injuries (such as stated in this letter and its enclosures) from the circar servants, no peace can be expected in the province.

The silence which I have hitherto observed upon the affairs of the forfeited pollams, will not, I trust, expose me to any suspicion of inattention to this important part of my charge. Indeed I hope the diaries I have lately had the honour to submit, of my proceedings in those countries, will show that I have spared no pains to inspire the inhabitants with a confidence in the justice of government, to break the irregular habits of former sharogars and peons, &c. to render their labours, like those of the people, in general profitable to the Company.

Extract from REPORT of Mr. JOHN HODGSON, on TINNEVELLY; dated 24th Sept. 1807.

THE security of the persons of travellers and traders, which has followed from the assumption of the cawelgy from the poligars, from the punishment of the rebellious, and transfer of the country to the authority of the Company; can only be estimated by those who were witnesses of the previous scenes of insecurity, robbery, plunder, and murder.

Extract from REPORT from principal Collector of the CEDED DISTRICTS; dated 20th March 1802.

THE system of cawelgy, which pretends to make good, stolen property, is a kind of tribute imposed on government by its own feudatories, as the price of forbearing to oppose its authority; for it never fully indemnified losses, unless by the produce of robberies in another quarter. It furnished the cawelgar with the means of maintaining a greater force than he could possibly do from the resources of his own hereditary district; and this renders him more capable of contending against government, when he finds it convenient to revolt. The spreading of his adherents too over the country, to make his own collections of this tribute, impresses the inhabitants with terror, and gives him more sway over them, than the civil power; facilitates his depredations, by procuring him a perfect knowledge of the habitations of the men of property in every village; and enables him to single out for vengeance, whoever is hardy enough to accuse him or his agents.

It seems strange that it should ever have been believed, that any good could result from such an institution. Even if all thefts were made good, which never was the case, the contributions paid by the district to the cawelgar, were always more than the equivalent of this loss, and greatly exceeded any that would probably have been sustained, from ordinary thieves. In districts immediately under cawelgars, or in those adjoining to them, there is always the greatest number of robberies; and in proportion as they are more remote from such proprietors, are less common. The whole of the allowances granted to these men, can be regarded in no other light than as a fund set apart by government for the support of a number of seminaries for training regular thieves.

I resumed all munny and nayel cawelgy, on my first entering the country, on the principle of their having been formerly resumed by the Mysore government, and of the allowance naturally ceasing when the service was no longer required; and its abolition even, would undoubtedly contribute greatly to the security of property. If it is objected that there would be no means of apprehending thieves, or recovering stolen effects, it may be answered, that this would be fully as well executed by the common village tallurs and amildars' peons; because, by the change of system, the number of thieves would be lessened, and their concealment rendered more difficult. At present, it is among the cawelgar's peons, that almost all thieves are sheltered; for it is to that body, that all the most skilful adepts belong, who therefore rob, as it were, under public authority. Though they are always suspected, when a robbery is committed, it is difficult to fix it upon any individual of the gang, not only from the dexterity in eluding discovery, which they have learned from long practice; but also from the dread in which the inhabitants stand of them; for were any person to inform against them, he would most likely be either robbed or murdered. But when the cawelgars and their peons are disbanded, there would be no safe refuge for thieves. They could only be concealed in great cities, of which there are none, in this part of India. The constitution of all villages is such, that no gang of thieves, nor even any single thief, could long remain undiscovered, in any of them. The potail, curnum, and other public servants, know every man residing within the limits of their village; and were any man to take up his abode in it, without any visible means of subsistence, he would attract their attention, and would be seized the instant that any robbery happened. Besides, thieves would then consist not of men who followed the profession by inheritance, and were trained to it, from their infancy; but of men who were driven into it, by want; and as they would be less expert, they would be so much more easily detected. It is not from solitary unconnected thieves, that any serious mischief can ever arise. It is only when they compose a fraternity, too strong for the civil authority, like the cawelgar and his peons, that they become formidable.

It may be urged, that if the institution of cawelgars had been found to be so detrimental, it would never have become so common; and would have been long ago suppressed. But it is to be considered, that cawelgars originally were in general rather self-created, during times of disorder, than appointed by the sovereign; that Indian governments are usually too weak and fluctuating, to give themselves much trouble about rectifying abuses; that the cawelgars, when established, could only be reduced by a military force; and that the foudar and other officers to whom that force was entrusted, being themselves every moment liable to removal, had no permanent interest in the prosperity of the country; and were therefore rather disposed to protect the cawelgars, for a share of their booty, than to expel them.

Many princes have no doubt seen the propriety of getting rid of them: but they probably had not the means of effecting it; for all native governments are little more than an assemblage of poligarships, under a superior chief, who though he has a general control over the whole, possesses very little authority, in the interior management of their several provinces. Hyder Ally was the only Indian sovereign we know of, who ever subdued all his petty feudatories, and was really master of his country. He knew all the advantages to be derived from cawelgars; and he thought it wise to abolish them.

The

The chief argument against such a measure is, that it would be depriving a great number of men of every means of livelihood, and turning them loose to rob the inhabitants; but this might be obviated by leaving the cawelgar a portion of his land, sufficient for his maintenance; and his peons, their lands, either in enaam, or at a low quit rent, either during one or more lives; and dispensing with all service.

Extract from Mr. THACKERAY's Report; dated 4th August 1807.

THE Ceded Districts have improved very much under the Company's government, in spite of bad seasons, in spite of a numerous population of turbulent peons, and in spite of many obstacles. About the great improvement, no doubt can exist; but whether this great improvement, be owing to the ryotwar system, or to the excellent police, or rather the complete establishment of the authority of government, some doubt may arise. It appears to me, that this excellent police, which has secured tranquillity, has been established by the proper administration of the ryotwar system; that all the ability of collector Munro, could not have produced it, under any other system; and that nothing but his ability, could have produced it so soon, under the ryotwar system.

Appendix, No. 29.

Extracts from REPORTS, as to the Difficulty of recovering ARREARS OF REVENUE, by the JUDICIAL PROCESS under RYOTWAR SETTLEMENTS.

Extracts from REPORT of principal Collector of Coimbatore; dated 30th Nov. 1806. THERE is great reason to doubt, whether all the benefits of its resources can be obtained from the Ryotwar Settlement, with a separate court of judicature existing at the same time; or that the collection can be made, with that regularity and promptitude, which might be otherwise expected.

The natives, even when conscious of the justness of their debts, it is well known, are always averse from discharging them, and ever seek delay. The disposition to that delay, which is seen daily in the proprietary zemindars in other districts, must be supposed inherent, in most individuals of the lower class: and when the case is applied to so many thousand ryots now holding pottahs, my apprehensions may not appear extraordinary. To cause a delay in the collections of a whole village, it is only necessary that one ryot proceed to the zillah court, to enter complaints, however frivolous, or engage in suits, to set aside his agreements with the tehsildar and monigar to cultivate. It will be difficult, under the multiplicity of business which must engage a zillah court, that summary decisions can be granted to the parties. The operations of the monigar must, in the interim, be suspended; and it appears a very probable consequence, that the government revenue cannot be regularly collected, in the pause which those suits may occasion.

It may further be expected, that much farther inconvenience will be felt, from the blunders and ignorance of the lower class of revenue servants, in regard to the Regulations; and with which, it will require some time before they can become acquainted. In a country where there exists so great a quantity of waste land as in Coimbatore, land, so far from being an object of request, must be tendered by the circar to the cultivating class, who consider rather that they are conferring, than receiving, a favour, in the acceptance. The Hindoo institution insisted upon the industry of their subjects, in order to add as much to the labour of the community, as the revenues of the state. The Mahomedan disposition left no alternative, for the slothful were obliged to pay, whether they cultivated or not.

Under the British government, every means of encouragement, by way of advances, persuasions, and the endeavours of the native servants, have been used, to the ultimate object of guiding their industrious labours, to the advantage of themselves, and the increase of the public revenue. Such as have been in the habit of seeing the lower class of ryots, must be sensible of the real necessity, of some hand to direct those labours.

The frequent release from their engagements which they have experienced, when they have suffered misfortune; has impressed the ryots with a general idea, that they may always expect it; as soon as it once comes to be considered as a right, every recourse will be had to litigation and delay, to avoid their fulfilment.

From this persuasion of being able to obtain a release from their engagements with our government, under the circumstances mentioned, many more ryots enter into them at the beginning of the season, than would be the case, were they conscious that the government dues would, without exception, be rigorously exacted. Many instances, however, usually occur, where the security is obliged to fulfil engagements entered into under such a persuasion, merely from the subsequent fault on the part of the ryot, whose indolence leaves him, without the means of acquitting himself of them.

If the country be at once disposed of by rent or sale, the farmer, or zemindar, can have no obstacle to the payment of his kists, equal to the difficulty Annany servants will experience in the collection: should the former fail in collecting within the stipulated period, it is generally in his power either to mortgage, or to dispose of such property as may answer the fulfilment of his agreements. It is scarcely necessary to say, that Annany servants have no such opportunity; and that if there be resistance to their demand, and the process served from a separate court, the collection of the amount must be delayed, until the process be be gone through, from the case of a ryot paying five annas, to one paying 500 pagodas per annum.

THE Regulations for enforcing arrears, are too intricate for a native to comprehend: and the smallest deviation from the forms, entails endless disputes and heavy penalties.

XXVII. 1802, must be resorted to; and the same forms be gone through, with the ryot who pays a rent of six fanams, as with him who pays 1,000 pagodas. If the process is not enforced against each defaulter, as soon as he falls in arrear, the evil spreads; and those who are able, and those who are not, equally withhold their rent.

REPORT of BOARD of REVENUE;

And PROCEEDINGS of MADRAS GOVERNMENT, as to the measure of establishing TRIENNIAL VILLAGE LEASES, in the unsettled Countries; dated 25th April and 25th May 1808: and circular Instructions to the Collectors in consequence.

READ the following Letter from the Board of Revenue,—

To the Hon. Sir. G. H. Barlow, Bart. K. B. Governor in Council.

Hon. Sir,

Para. 1.—WE have the honour to, acknowledge the receipt of the orders of government, conveyed in Mr. Secretary Greenway's letters, dated 28th Nov. and 5th Dec. last, enclosing copies of the reports of Mr. Hodgson on Coimbatore and Tinnevely.

2. On some of the subjects discussed in those Reports, and referred for our consideration, we had anticipated the orders of the Honourable the Governor in Council, respecting them; and we adopted the necessary measures to enable us to comply with regard to others.

3. On the same occasion, we were directed to state our sentiments as to the expediency of changing the detailed system of revenue economy, which has now been prosecuted for several years in the new territorial acquisitions of the Company, with a view to the more complete developement of their resources; according to which system, the rents assessed by survey, were collected from each ryot by tahsildars, paid by the collectors of government; and to consult the propriety of substituting a plan of settlement, approximating more nearly to that of estates permanently assessed; of farming out the lands for a term of years, to men who should be interested in preserving and improving the resources of the country.

4. Our sentiments on this point, constitute the subject of this address. The topic, indeed, has been so amply and ably discussed on former occasions, that we now enter upon it with diffidence, and more from the necessity of obeying the commands, and procuring the orders of government, than with the idea of illustrating it, with new observations.

5. The provinces subject to the government of Fort St. George, with the exception of Canara, Malabar, and other districts, in which the traces of private property still existed when they came under our government, exhibited nearly the same system of landed property and revenue policy. The land was the property of the circar and of the ryots; the interest in the soil was divided, between these two; but where the circar share absorbed nearly the whole landlord's rent, the ryots possessed little more interest in the soil than that of hereditary tenancy.

6. The country was divided into villages. A village, geographically, is a tract of country comprising some hundreds or thousands of acres of arable and waste land ;—a village, politically, is a little republic, or rather corporation, having within itself, its municipal officers and corporate artificers : its boundaries are seldom altered ; and though sometimes injured, or even desolated by war, famine, and epidemical disorders, the same name, boundaries, interests, and even families, continue for ages.

7. The circar share, or land-rent, was generally received from paddy land in kind, at rates varying from 40 to 60 per cent. of the gross produce, after deducting certain portions distributed before the threshing commences. The share or tax of the circar from dry grain land, was generally received in cash, either at so much for a fixed measure of land, or so much for the same measure of land, but varying with the produce.

8. We have observed that the circar rent or share generally absorbed the whole net produce or landlord's rent, because, in bad years, a remission became necessary, and the assessment was in many places so heavy, that the circar officers were more fearful of losing what the present occupant paid, than hopeful to get more, from a new ryot.

9. There appears to be three modes of collecting this share of rent, which have existed prior to the introduction of the system of permanent rents.

10. Of the three former modes, the first is the ryotwar kulkar, or individual settlement:— the second is the mouzawar ganganah, or village settlement:— the third is the jjarah, moottah, zemindary, or farms of several villages.

11. Under the ryotwar settlement, the officers of government were supposed to settle and collect the rent from each farmer.

12. Under

12. Under the mouzarwar, the officers of government farmed out the lands of the whole village to an individual, who again sub-rented each field, and settled with each ryot; or to the community of the village, who settled among themselves, the land and rent they were respectively to occupy and to pay.

13. Sometimes, neither individual nor village rents were adopted; the circle farmed out tracts of country containing several villages, to great farmers, who were sometimes strangers, soucaris who had advanced money, or persons who made this kind of farming their profession. Sometimes, they were revenue officers of various descriptions, but generally termed zemindars. Sometimes, before the introduction of the permanent settlement, the ancient hereditary rents were annual, or for the period

14. Previously to the introduction of the permanent settlements, the zemindars were farmers of this description; because their cowles were annual, or for the period of a few years; because government, at its discretion, raised or reduced the amount of the tribute, and because government, when necessary, exercised the power of removing an obnoxious member of the family, or, on just cause, even the whole family, from the management of the zemindarry. These ancient zemindars however, as they were more permanently connected with the land, and less liable to removal, than mere farmers, were less oppressive in their exactions from the cultivators.

15. The government seeing the evils of these temporary settlements, introduced the permanent system of revenue, which was perpetuating the third system on an improved principle, by making the farm hereditary, and limiting the demand on the hereditary farmer of the revenue.

16. Because the zemindars, thus confirmed or created, have, in the new revenue and judicial Code of Regulations, been styled proprietors of their respective lands, some have supposed that the rights of the people, have been thereby impaired. But those rights, on the contrary, as we conceive, have been strengthened, rather than invalidated, by that code.

17. Among numerous papers which have been composed on this subject, we received, and have the honour herewith to submit, a Report from Colonel Munro, written a short period before his departure for Europe, in which he has proposed a new plan for the permanent settlement of the Ceded Districts.* Of this plan, we shall offer a concise account, without discussing all Colonel Munro's arguments for and against the permanent settlement hitherto established.

18. He begins with stating his opinion respecting the property in the soil; and we concur with him in thinking, that the government is virtually the proprietor in the Ceded Districts, and in other provinces where the circar demand has been raised so high as to absorb the whole landlord's rent; in fact, that a low rate of assessment, is the sole cause of actual property in land.

19. The Company, by the present assessment in the Ceded Districts, draw the full landlord's rent, which may be calculated, on an average, at 45 per cent. of the gross produce; but in order to constitute property in the soil, it would be necessary to remit such a portion of rent, as should reduce the demand of government, to about one-third of the gross produce.— This remission, which would amount to about 25 per cent. of the present survey rent, would give the persons constituted proprietors, such an interest in the soil, as might be justly termed landed property; viz.

Total gross produce	100.
Government rent, according to the present assessment, is	45.
Deduct 25 per cent. as the remission proposed	11 $\frac{3}{4}$.
Government share, or land-tax by the proposed assessment	33 $\frac{3}{4}$.
Government share of this plan for a permanent ryotwar settlement of the Ceded Districts, at the rate of assessment, with a still greater remission on the rate of assessment, on the same land, according to the proposed plan	25.

20. The principles of this plan for a permanent ryotwar settlement of the Ceded Districts, are to remit 25 per cent. on the survey rate of assessment, with a still greater remission on lands watered by machinery; to permit the ryot to retain or relinquish land, according to his circumstances; and to consider each ryot the absolute proprietor of the land he occupies, so long as he pays its revenue.

21. No remissions, for bad crops or other accidents, are proposed to be allowed. On ordinary occasions, should failures occur, which cannot be made good from the property of the defaulter, the village in which they happen, shall be liable, for the loss, to the extent of 10 per cent. additional assessment, but no further, on the revenue of the village. The waste land should be retained, as the property of government; and the rent, or, the land tax, of such as might hereafter be occupied, should be made by govern-

22. The waste land should be retained, and added to the public revenue.

23. The repairs of all tanks not rendered private property, should be made by government.—Tuccavi should be gradually discontinued; the village officers to remain, as heretofore, under the collectors; private creditors, who might distrain the property of ryots, should discontinue the public demands against such ryots, and give security for doing so, before they begin the distraint.

24. The plan proposed by Colonel Munro, for the settlement of the Ryots, should be adopted, and a settlement, on these principles, should be made, as soon as possible.

24. This is the outline of the plan proposed by Colonel Munro, for the settlement of the Ceded Districts. He then endeavours to show, by calculation, that a settlement, on these principles, would not only tend incalculably to invigorate the agricultural resources of the country, but would actually afford a greater immediate revenue to government, than the zemindarry system, formed on the principles of that already introduced into other districts. Colonel Munro shows, by a calculation to which we refer your Honour in Council, that a settlement, formed on the principle hitherto observed, in the Ceded Districts, would yield 10,24,050 star pagodas 10,24,050 is at first; whereas the ryotwar would have risen, within that period, about three lacs of pagodas, from the encouragement which the remission would afford to agriculture.

27. It is the high assessment upon the land, which Colonel Munro justly considers the chief check to population. Were it not for the pressure of this heavy rent, population, he thinks, ought to increase even faster than in America; because the climate is more favourable, and there are vast tracts of good land unoccupied, which may be ploughed at once, without the labour and expense of clearing away forests, as there are above three millions of acres of this kind, in the Ceded Districts. He is of opinion, that a great increase of population, and consequently of land revenue, might be expected in the course of twenty-five years, from the operation of the remission. But a remission to a few zemindars, he apprehends, would not remedy the evil, nor remove the weight which at present depresses population.

28. Under the system proposed, Colonel Munro conceives that cultivation and population would increase so much, that in the course of twenty-five years, lands formerly cultivated, amounting to star pagodas 5,55,062, would be retrieved and occupied, together with a considerable portion of waste, never before cultivated. The extension of cultivation, however, would not make the farms larger, and thereby facilitate collection. The enlargement of farms or estates, is at present prevented, by the want of property: hereafter, it would be prevented, by its division.

29. This is the outline of Colonel Munro's plan, which is not less applicable to all the districts as yet unsettled, than to the Ceded Districts; and if the exigencies of government allowed of so great a sacrifice, as a remission on the present standard rents to the extent of 25 per cent or even of 15 per cent, we should consider the measure highly advisable, and calculated to produce great ulterior advantages. Indeed it would be absurd to dispute, that the less we take from the cultivator, of the produce of his labour; the more flourishing must be his condition.

30. But if the exigencies of government do not permit them to make so great a sacrifice;—if they cannot at once confer the boon of private property, they must be content to establish a private interest in the soil, as effectually as they can, under the farming system. If they cannot afford to give up a share of the landlord's rent, they must be indulgent landlords.

31. Under such circumstances, the transition from ryotwar to village-rents, as suggested by Mr. Hodgson, appears to us best adapted to secure the revenue of the state, and the prosperity of the country.

32. Our sentiments on this occasion, will equally apply to the reference made to us on the 30th April 1806, on which our opinions were required, with respect to some objections which had occurred to the establishment of large zemindaries in perpetuity, and with regard to arguments then advanced in favour of making the ryotwar system permanent.

33. In provinces newly subjected to the Company's government, whose resources had not been ascertained, where judicial tribunals had not been established, and where the collectors, unfettered by the restrictions of law, were free to follow their discretion in retrieving the energies of the country, and reforming the manners of the people, no policy could be better calculated, than that of ryotwar rents, for effecting a survey, classification, and assessment of the lands; for detecting alienations of revenue; frustrating the interested federacies of the inhabitants; emancipating the inferior, from the thralldom of superior ryots; developing the capacity of the country; and, by a firm and summary, yet a just and prudent mode of proceeding, remedying the inveterate abuses of the Mahomedan government.

34. This course of proceeding has been accordingly pursued, in all unsettled districts, from the periods of their acquisition, until the present time; and it is hoped that the objects above mentioned, have, by this time, been in a great degree, attained.

35. Whatever room there might be for a difference of opinion, as to the preferable policy of these two modes of revenue economy, anterior to the introduction of the constitution of internal government recently prescribed, as a general system, in these territories, it is unnecessary for us, as we imagine, at this time, to discuss.

36. Very strong reasoning has been advanced, in favour of each; but it occurs to us, that under the new code of revenue and jurisprudence, a plan has been propounded, with which the ryotwar mode of administration could not be brought to assimilate, and from which, it would be inconsistent, if not unsafe and impossible, now to deviate; for the difficulty, if not impossibility, of one collector being able to attend to all the legal formalities prescribed by the new code, on the various occasions, real or fictitious, which would occur for resorting to them, among the numerous inhabitants of an extensive province under ryotwar leases; the danger of delegating authority to uninterested, unfeeling, or perhaps corrupt tehsildars, the general incompetency of individual ryots to pay, in all seasons, the money rents assessed on their fields; the constant change of field occupants, and consequent probable deterioration of agriculture; the expense to the government, the trouble to the courts, the difficulty of collection, the interference with the private concerns of the cultivators, and with the public functions of the officers of government under such a detailed system; would, we apprehend, be found insurmountable embarrassments to a ryotwar mode of administration.

37. The village (Muzawar) system, is at least as old, as the age of Menu. That venerable legislator alludes to the disputes about village boundaries, just as they occur at present; and directs a space of 400 cubits wide, round small villages, and of 1,200 round large ones, to be left for pasture. This could not have been done, had land been exclusively private property; for in that case, the owner would have made the most of his land, and not left left it waste, for the public use of the inhabitants; and boundaries of fields and farms, rather than of villages, would have been disputed.

38. Every village with its twelve ayagandees, as they are denominated, is a petty commonwealth, with the mocuddim, potail, kapoo, reddy, or chief inhabitant, at the head of it; and India is a great assemblage of such commonwealths. The inhabitants, during war, look chiefly to their own head inhabitant: they give themselves no trouble about the breaking up and division of kingdoms. While the village remains entire, they care not to what power it is transferred: on whomsoever it devolves, the internal management remains unaltered; the head inhabitant is still the collector and magistrate and head farmer.

39. From the age of Menu to the present day, the settlements have been made either with or through, the head inhabitant. When the revenue was thought to be high enough, and the head inhabitant agreed to it, he was usually left to settle with the ryots. If it was too low, and the head inhabitant objected to an increase, the aumildar settled with the ryots, in his presence. This system has stood the test of time; and as, under it, whole provinces have often been in a highly cultivated state, it must certainly be well calculated for the great object of promoting agriculture.

40. When the circar was moderate, and satisfied with a reasonable assessment, villages often remained for many years at the same rent; and the ryots knowing that no increase had been demanded by the circar, paid none to the potail; and by enjoying their land at a fixed rent, they were enabled to improve them greatly. In this case, the situation of the ryots was nearly what it would be under a permanent ryotwar settlement; but it had this great disadvantage, that the ryots had never any security for its lasting another year.

41. Under a village system, when once completely established, there could not be the smallest danger of internal disturbances, unless the country were over-assessed; a circumstance which, under any system, would excite discontent. The influence of the head inhabitant among the people, is much greater than that of a zemindar or poligar; and when he is not over-assessed, he will always exert that influence in favour of government, for he is properly one of its officers, and feels that he is of more consequence, and is more secure in the enjoyment of his rights under it, than under a zemindar.

42. A principal objection to village estates is, that the influence of the head inhabitants may be exerted, to the oppression or injury of the common ryots.

43. We trust, however, that the security provided by the law, is quite sufficient to shield the latter, from this danger.

44. We hesitated, whether to recommend a period of three or of five years. A farm for five years would encourage improvement; but a farm for three years, will not depress the spirit of agriculture, while it will admit easily of a transition to a permanent settlement, or to an extended term of lease.

45. The amount payable by each village, should be fixed on the average collections of former years, except in those districts where the survey rent has been completed, and can be depended upon. In such districts, the rent of the village should be fixed, with a reference to the payments under the survey rent.

46. We fully explained to government, on the 15th September last, the principles upon which Colonel Munro had completed the survey of the Ceded Districts. Where a survey has been conducted properly on those principles, it must be the best possible standard for assessment; because all the intellect, all the accounts, all the experience of the country, were drawn out to assist the collector in forming the survey. The rent was not fixed upon the supposed fertility and produce of the land, so much as upon what it had actually paid.

47. The chief advantage which we expect from the plan of village-rent, is facility of collection.

48. In other respects, the plan which we propose, is adapted to the customs of the country, and the constitution of a village, as we have described it.

49. The sum to be paid is fixed; the chief ryot is the renter, and the corporation of the village are left to settle among themselves, the land and rent which they are respectively to occupy and pay. In case of disputes, the collector in the first instance, if he cannot settle them, the court must decide, according to custom and the survey rent.

50. The most striking objections which have been urged against the zemindary system, cannot be made to this village settlement; because the advantages will not be diverted, from the land.

51. The chief cultivators will be the renters; and any advantages (and we hope the terms of the farm will be moderate enough, to allow of advantages) will go to increase agricultural stock.

52. Under a village-rent, we estimate that a considerable reduction of the charges of collections, will be found practicable; but we must also admit, that there will be a diminution of revenue, to a certain extent.—We hope, however, that, on an average of years, the revenue will rise, above the present amount.

53. The protection of the ryots, will be transferred to the Courts of Judicature; and we confide in the zeal of the judges for justifying our recommendation of a system, in which so much must depend upon the prompt and efficient administration of justice.

54. The observations of Government; but, on the whole, we hope that the defects and inconveniences of the judicial system, pointed out by Colonel Munro, may be remedied by the full consideration of Government; and the adoption of good judges, and especially by a liberal construction of the Regulations, and the adoption of an equitable, rather than a strictly legal, or formal rule of enquiry and decision in the civil courts.

55. As far as we may be allowed to speak on the administration of justice, and as every individual, still more a public board, entrusted with the immediate superintendence of the public revenue, has a natural privilege to discuss the question of right and wrong; to blame or to praise the administration of justice; to suggest improvements, and point out errors; we take the liberty to observe, that our system of courts compose one great Court of Equity:—that they are not to be confined, by narrow maxims; but should take an enlarged view, and be allowed a considerable latitude in their proceedings. Under a liberal construction of the Regulations, we think that able and zealous judges would soon find remedies for the inconveniences, and supply the defects pointed out, by Colonel Munro. Under this impression, we recommend a village-rent, because we trust the court will protect the body of the ryots from the oppression of the renters; and that under Section XII, Regulation XXVII, A. D. 1802, the zillah court will be able to give prompt redress.

56. For the foregoing reasons, we shall, with the permission of the Honourable the Governor in Council, exercise our discretion in establishing a lease village-rent, in the several unsettled districts, from the commencement of the ensuing Fussy.

We have the honour to be, Honourable Sir, Your most obedient humble servants, Resolved, to acquaint the Board of Revenue, that as the foregoing letter recommends a considerable change in the system of revenue management, which has been lately observed at this presidency, the board have considered, with particular attention, the opinions which they have submitted on a question of so much importance to the prosperity of the country, and to the financial resources of the government.

From the great ability and success which distinguished the administration of the late principal collector of the Ceded Districts, the board concur with the Board of Revenue, in attaching weight to the observations of that officer, on the subject of this discussion; and as the Report of Lieutenant Colonel Munro appears, on the whole, to contain (according to his conception of the subject) a distinct view of the relative advantages of the two modes of settlement, which he has described in that paper, it is satisfactory to the board to be enabled to proceed to a decision, under a full knowledge of all the arguments which appear applicable to the question.

The board think it probable that a temporary ryotwar settlement, under the vigilant management of Lieutenant Colonel Munro, may have been attended with considerable benefit to the country, and in the advancement of the public revenue. But after the fullest consideration of the opinions stated by that officer, the board feel no difficulty in recording their conviction, that a permanent ryotwar settlement, on the plan proposed by Lieutenant Colonel Munro, would be impracticable, without incurring a sacrifice of revenue, incompatible with the demands of the public service; and even under such a sacrifice, the practicability of effecting a settlement of that nature in perpetuity, appears more than questionable.

The board observe, that the whole system proposed by Lieutenant Colonel Munro, involves a constant exercise of that domiciliary controul on the part of the officers of revenue, which it is a leading object of the permanent settlement to exclude. It is at the same time obvious, that Lieutenant Colonel Munro has not sufficiently appreciated the advantages of a zemindary settlement, which has been attended with great benefit, and to have been free from most of the objections supposed by that officer.

The board are disposed to impute, in a considerable degree, the partiality evinced by Lieutenant Colonel Munro, in favour of a ryotwar settlement, to the effects of long habit, and to the success with which that mode of management was attended, while in his hands; but independently of the immediate diminution of revenue, which a permanent ryotwar settlement would occasion, it is evident that there could be no adequate security for the future payment, even of the reduced revenue; and that the whole collections would probably, for a long period of years, continue subject to continued fluctuation, and to the heavy charges incidental to a detailed system of revenue administration.

The board observe, that considerable weight has been attached by Lieutenant Colonel Munro, to the advantage to be derived from the future improvement of waste lands, under the supposition, that it will form a direct augmentation of the public revenue. It has been however established, on the principles of the permanent settlement, that the government does not look to any advantage of that nature, beyond the general benefit of increasing the amount of the public taxes, in proportion to the increased resources of the country. In this view, the improvement of the waste lands, will be undoubtedly an object of great advantage; but the board are satisfied that the attainment of it, will be best secured under the operation of a permanent settlement, by removing as much as possible, any controul from the exercise of private rights; as the experience of all ages has sufficiently evinced, that the extension of population and agricultural improvement will be generally proportioned, to the degree in which these sources of national strength and wealth, may be freed from public restriction.

Under this view of the subject, the board have no hesitation in deciding, that the attempt to conclude a perpetual ryotwar settlement, would be improper, and probably impracticable; and as the board have great doubts whether even a temporary settlement of that nature, can in most cases be deemed desirable, particularly under the present system of judicature, it appears advisable that it should be entirely abandoned.

The board fully concur in the reasons which the Board of Revenue have stated in favour favour of the measure of concluding a village-rent in the Ceded Districts, as also, in the other districts not permanently settled, for the period of three years. This mode of settlement, appears to accord with the long established usage of the country, to be compatible with its progressive improvement, to be adapted to the established system of internal judicature, and to have the advantage of facilitating the future introduction of the permanent settlement.

Resolved, accordingly, to authorize the Board of Revenue to carry into effect the measure which they have proposed on this subject, so soon as it may be practicable.

Resolved, to desire that the attention of the Board of Revenue may be in the mean time directed, to the preparation of the materials to enable them to propose an arrangement for effecting a permanent settlement at the end of three years, in the districts which may admit of the introduction of that system; and the board are willing to hope, that the system of village-rents now sanctioned, will afford the means of effecting an early considerable reduction in the charges of collection.

With respect to the observations of Lieutenant Colonel Munro, regarding the effects of the new system of judicature, the board trust that actual experience has sufficiently evinced, that the operation of the judicial regulations, is not liable to the most material of the objections which have been pointed out. It may be proper, however, to call on the collectors of the Ceded Districts, to report whether the inconveniences that have been described, have, or have not, been experienced, in that part of the country.

Letter from Government to the Board of Revenue, in answer to their Report on Triennial Village Leases.

Gentlemen,
1. I AM directed by the Honourable the Governor in Council, to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 25th ultimo.

2. As that letter recommends a considerable change in the system of revenue management, which has been lately observed at this presidency, the Governor in Council has considered with particular attention the opinions which you have submitted, on a question of so much importance to the prosperity of the country, and to the financial resources of the government.

will be undoubtedly an object of great advantage; but the Governor in Council is satisfied, that the attainment of it, will be best secured, under the operation of a permanent settlement, by removing as much as possible any controul from the exercise of private rights; as the experience of all ages has sufficiently evinced, that the extension of population and agricultural improvement, will be generally proportioned to the degree in which those sources of national strength and wealth, may be freed from public restriction.

Port St. George,
May 25th, 1808.

I have the honour to be, Gentlemen, Your most obedient servant, (Signed)
G. BUCHAN, Chief Sec. to Government.

Resolved, under the authority conveyed in the foregoing letter, that orders be issued for discontinuing the system of annual settlements with individual ryots, in those districts wherein that system continues to have effect, and for establishing, in its stead, village-rents on lease, for a term of three years.

The collectors having before them, the accounts of the extent of cultivation, of the jumma, and of the actual collections of each village, for a series of years past, will not, it is presumed, experience any difficulty in determining an adequate, moderate and equitable rent; at the same time, in the correct and successful application of these data, much will necessarily depend on the judgment and attention of the local authorities.

The amount of the rents, when determined upon, must be understood to be payable under all circumstances, extraordinary calamities excepted; in which case, remission may be necessary to a certain extent, and will be granted, at the direction of government, but not until after a full and satisfactory enquiry shall have been made, and authority obtained for the purpose.

It may occur, in particular villages, or perhaps in particular talooks, the effects of adverse seasons, or other contingent calamities, may have been experienced, in so extraordinary a degree, that the accounts of former years may not furnish a result sufficiently favourable, to be adopted as the basis of a rent on lease; while the means of the people, under such circumstances, would not be likely to ensure the due discharge of a rent on higher terms, even should they be disposed to accede to it.

The collectors, in such cases, will be permitted, if they should deem it advisable, to make the rent progressive, to defer the lease, to limit the term of their engagements to one year, concluding them either with the ryots of the villages, collectively, or individually, as before, and upon such conditions as may appear to them, to be best calculated to guard against any unnecessary sacrifice of revenue.

After the engagements for the rents on lease shall have been concluded, the execution of all ordinary repairs for the security of the revenue will be left to the renters; but repairs of magnitude, or new works calculated to increase the revenue, will, when found to be necessary, be undertaken at the expense of government, on due consideration of the advantages to be expected from them, and on the condition of a proportionate increase of rent.

It is presumable that the village renters in general, will be readily disposed to enter into agreements of this nature, tending, as they must, to the mutual benefit of themselves and of government; but should they refuse, in any case, to advance their rent, in an equitable proportion to the projected expenditure, and expected advantages, such works must then necessarily be deferred, and others executed in villages, whose renters may be more reasonably disposed.

It is desirable, in the districts where the right denominated merassee right, is understood to exist, that the rents should, in every practicable case, be concluded with all the merassadars of the respective villages, and that they should be, jointly and separately, responsible for the amount; it being at the same time understood, that the personal and real property of individuals defaulting for their proportion of the rent, is in the first instance, liable for the balances.

Resolutions of Board of Revenue, as to the formation of Triennial Vil-

balances, and the difference only (in the event of their property being insufficient to answer the demand) to be made good, by the other merassadars of the same village, under their joint agreement with the circar.

In cases where any of the merassadars may refuse to accede to reasonable terms of rent, the collectors will, at their discretion, enter into engagements with one or more merassadars or should the whole of them refuse, the collectors will, in such case, conclude engagements with any other individual, though he be not a merassadar, who may be willing to undertake the rent, or he will make the rent ryotwar. It should, however, be an object with the collectors to avoid giving occasion to future complaint on the part of any merassadar, of having been refused a share in the rent.

In districts where merassee right is not understood or defined, the collectors will have no difficulty in determining to whom the rent should preferably be granted, such as Potails, Mahajens, Nantumcars, Gours, Kadeem, Kanpours, &c. by whichever of these names the heads of villages, in the various provinces, are distinguished, and even to the common resident inhabitants, in preference to strangers. Pycarries, whether oolcoodie or paracoodie, cannot be considered to have a right to a share in the rent, without the consent of the head inhabitants, as above described; but may be admitted, in all cases where these inhabitants may not object to their admission.

In all cases, with whomsoever the rent may be concluded, pottahs must be issued by the renters to the cultivating ryots, for their mutual security, against loss on the one hand, and oppression on the other.

The system of village-rents, has been recently introduced with advantage in Tanjore, and in the districts of Dindigul and Madura; and as the muchelkas taken from the renters in these districts, may in some degree, serve as a guide to others, it is resolved to circulate them for that purpose; it being fully understood, that it is not the intention of the board to confine the collectors to the observance of these, or any other forms in particular, farther than may be consistent with the general principles prescribed.

In the opinion of the board, it is desirable that the process for the recovery of balances, as also all prosecutions which may hereafter arise, with relation to the rent, should be grounded chiefly on voluntary agreements of this nature, preferably to the promulgation of any general regulations; because there is much difficulty in providing, by a general regulation, for the various local peculiarities; while it cannot be doubted, that agreements of the nature adverted to, bearing the signature of the parties, would be received as evidence of their engagements, and be binding upon them; the collectors will also, by these means, be enabled to provide, in separate clauses, for any special conditions which may be required from the inhabitants of any particular village, regarding the distribution of water, partial repairs, and for any other object of the like nature.

The board have only further to remark, that the establishment of village rents on lease, will not preclude the prosecution of the survey, or equalization of the rates of assessment, to a conclusion, in districts where that work may not have been already completed; but lest any obstacles might be opposed by the leaseholders, it may be proper to provide for this object, by a separate clause in all the muchelkas, binding the renters not to exact a higher rate of assessment from the cultivated land, than that fixed by the survey; or where there has been no survey, higher rates of warum or of teerwa, than that taken by the circar in Fusly 1217; but there is no occasion to restrict the renters from reducing the rates of assessment of warum or of teerwa, where they may find it their interest to do so.

The board will furnish the collectors with separate orders respecting the duties to be required from curnums, during the lease. It is desirable that the board should have the means of judging of the equitableness of the rents concluded by collectors. Collectors will accordingly prepare, for transmission to the board, as soon as may be in their power, statements in books, of the actual collections, from each village in each talook, from the date of the acquisition by the Company, of their respective districts.

therefrom, and responsible for the amount rent of each year, you engage to abide by the conditions of this your written mochelka to the Company.
 2. "Your rent consists of the village
 3. "For the above village and hamlets, you bind yourselves and your heirs to pay the circular, the following rent per year, according to kistbundy annexed.

4. To ensure the circular against any loss, by your failure in the afore-mentioned monthly payments, you will engage to pay interest for arrears, at the rate of one per cent. per month; as also, all charges the circular may incur, in realizing the rent from your under-tenants, according to the Regulations provided for the collection of arrears from revenue defaulters.

5. In order that there may be no cause for dispute between you and your ryots, you will engage, according to the Regulations, to issue pottahs and receive razenamahs, either for warum or for teerwah, from each individual paying rent to you. You are aware that unless such agreements exist, your demands for rent are illegal; and that, on reference to the zillah court, your complaints will not be recognizable.

In addition to the penalty prescribed by law, you will bind yourselves to pay a fine to the circular, of 24 star pagodas, in every instance where it can be proved that your rents have been collected, without previously issuing pottahs, and receiving razenamahs from each individual ryot. The fine to be realized from you, the same as an arrear of revenue, as enacted by the Regulations.

6. You will further engage to make no collections from the under ryots, on any account whatever, but the amount specified in the puttion. Should it be proved that you have acted contrary to this your engagement, you will bind yourselves, not only to refund such additional receipts with interest, but also to pay a fine to the circular, of 24 star pagodas, for every offence: for this purpose, the collector will establish an early investigation into the actual collections of the village, and compare them with the puttions given by you to your ryots. The fine to be realized from you, the same as an arrear of revenue, according to the Regulations.

7. The charges on account of warukom and murramut, required in the village and hamlets under your rent, shall be defrayed by you; but as the repairs of all extensive works can only be accomplished by the circular, you will then apply for assistance.

8. As the woolom manum is fixed, you will allow to each enaunder, his enauum, as has been continued and entered in the circular duffers; receive from each a receipt, and employ them in their respective duties. Whenever they act improperly in the circular concerns, you will state the same to the circular, prove their misconduct by two good witnesses, and abide by the orders given: you are not to dismiss any of them, without authority.

9. You will engage to deliver to the naut eurnum, all and every account connected with your village, &c. and to furnish the circular with such accounts as may be required.

10. You will engage to continue the davadayem, brumadayum and chillury manumums, as hitherto, to the present possessors of those enauums, and to receive their receipts. In the event of the death of any enaunder, to whomsoever the circular shall deem proper to grant a sunnud, as rightfully entitled to the enauum of the deceased, you will grant it to such authorized person accordingly.

When an enaunder dies, you will report the same to the circular, within three days: you are not to suppress the report, or either grant the enauum of your own accord to any other person, or secure it to yourselves.

Should you have acted contrary to this engagement, and it be proved, you will not only be answerable to the circular (or to the person rightfully entitled to the enauum in question) for the revenues thereof, with interest due thereon, but also submit to such fine as may be imposed on you, for such violation of your engagement.

11. In the event of failure to discharge the amount of your rent, you will bind yourselves to become liable to all the penalties prescribed by law, for revenue defaulters, under written engagements to the circular. Should an arrear of revenue be due from you at the expiration of the first (or any succeeding) Fusly, it shall be at the option of the circular, to give the rent to another person, and you will bind yourselves to be responsible (under the penalties of the law, for revenue defaulters) to be answerable for the loss, should any occur, between the first and second amount rent.

12. For every payment made by your ryots, you will engage to pass receipts immediately under the hand-writing of the naut eurnum, and countersigned by you; and you are bound to pay your rent to the circular, in no other coins but those fixed under mentioned.
 (Enter the coins, and their relative exchange.)

13. Should a ryot refuse to come to a settlement with you in the proper season, for the occupancy of land, you will obtain a document showing his reasons, attested by four respectable witnesses, and deposit it with the eurnum; and you shall then either make over the land in dispute, to another inhabitant of the village, or retain it, under your immediate cultivation. This circumstance, whenever it occurs, you will report to the teasildar, within three days. The responsibility of this measure rests with you, and you will be answerable to the adawlat, for any infringement of the Regulations. At the same time, you will engage not to demand a higher teerwah for lands under cultivation, than was established by survey; in consideration whereof, you are declared at liberty to make such arrangements with your ryots, for the cultivation of all waste lands, as you may mutually agree on.

14. As

14. As the welfare and prosperity of the ryots placed under your protection by the present engagement, demands a strict observance of every clause of the foregoing mochelka, you will consider the circular to be authorized, by this your agreement, to remove you from the situation of renters, should it be established, to the satisfaction of the collector, that you have wilfully neglected to obey the terms of your mochelka: and you will further bind yourselves to consider the judicial regulations, as the sole guide of your conduct towards your ryots, as well as all other regulations which hereafter may be enacted by government. Should the ryots of your village, fail to pay the demands on them according to kistbundy, after the 30th of the month, you are authorized to cause the property of such ryots to be distrained, according to regulations, and sold by the commissioner for the recovery of the arrears.

Ordered, That the foregoing proceedings of the board, relative to the substitution of village-rents on lease, in lieu of the system of annual settlements with individual ryots, be transmitted to the different collectors.

The board do not deem it to be necessary to enter at length into an exposition of the reasons which induced them to recommend, and government to approve, the change of system proposed. It may be proper, however, to state, that the measure has been greatly influenced by considerations connected with the established system of judicature, to which the ryotwar mode of administration could with difficulty, be brought to assimilate.

The principal objection which has been urged against village-rents, is, that the influence of the head inhabitants may, under that system, be exerted to the oppression or injury of the common ryots; but when the measures are considered, which have been already taken for securing the demands on the ryots; the precautions which will continue to be used for securing them against exaction, by the issue of pottahs; the additional security which the courts afford, and the appointment of commissioners, which the board hope will soon take place, aided by a vigilant superintendence on the part of the local officers of revenue:—All these circumstances considered, the apprehensions of danger from oppression, are, in the opinion of the board, very materially diminished.

Neither is the system of village-rents, as some have supposed, incompatible with the progressive improvement of the country and increase of revenue. On the contrary, the principle of the system, evidently holds out great advantages to the renters, and to the ryots, from the extension of cultivation during the lease: advantages to which government must, in all cases, ultimately partake, and in many cases, immediately, where that effect may be produced, by means of public assistance, in the execution of repairs.

Although in the foregoing proceedings, the principle is laid down, that the public aid, when afforded, should be repaid, with a proportion of the advantage resulting from it, it may possibly be found to be advisable, in certain situations, that the ordinary aid of tuccavy and maramut should not be discontinued altogether, even though unattended with any immediate return. In short, the collectors will observe, that the transition proposed, from ryotwar to village-rents, upon the principles which have been stated, by no means involves a dereliction of the fundamental principles of the former system of management; the change is calculated chiefly to diminish the detail of interference with the private concerns of the cultivators, to give an additional impulse to industry, to approximate, by means of this change, to the formation of estates on permanent rents, and especially to induce a greater facility of collection and consequent reduction of charges, on that account; to which latter object, their particular attention will be directed.

In all practicable cases, it is desirable that the issue of tuccavy should be made with caution; and not without satisfactory evidence of its necessity.

They will observe, from the foregoing proceedings, that a discretionary authority is granted to them, to defer the establishment of a lease, if they should deem it to be advisable; but in the opinion of the board, the exercise of this discretion needs not to be resorted to, unless in very particular cases, because the same end may generally be attained by means of a russud, or progressive increasing jumma, in each year of the lease.

On any point of doubt or difficulty, connected with the introduction of the system of village-rents, they will consult with the board; and it is necessary that the arrangements which they may conclude, shall not be considered final, until they may have received the board's sanction.

Ordered, That the Forms adverted to in the proceedings foregoing, be transmitted to the several collectors.

With reference to the concluding paragraph of the chief secretary's letter, which it is agreed to forward to the collectors in Bellary and Cuddapah: Ordered, that their attention be called to Colonel Munro's Report, dated 15th August 1807; and that they be desired to state whether the inconveniences which are there described, as connected with the operation of the judicial regulations, have, or have not, been experienced; and if they have, to what extent.

The collector in the northern division of Arcot, will understand these orders as extending to the district of Satewaid, in common with the rest of the unsettled districts under his management.

If any offer could be obtained from an unobjectionable person, to take the estate of Cuddalore, at the permanent rent proposed by the board, the board would be disposed to grant it, without the purchase puzzerana; but otherwise, the collector in the southern division of Arcot, will consider the orders for establishing village-rents, as applicable to this part, in common with the rest of the districts under his management.

DOCUMENTS illustrative of the Question,—Whether ZEMINDARY or RYOTWAR SETTLEMENTS are most expedient to be adopted, as a permanent System, in the unsettled Provinces subject to the Presidency of Fort St. George.

Extract from REPORT of Collector of DINDIGUL; dated 31st March 1800.

THE resolution of government to dispose of the proprietary right in the circar lands, by sale, according to the manner and amount specified in para. 58*, I conceive to be generally impracticable, from the poverty of the description of people they expect to become the purchasers; as well as from the objection these very people would have, to purchase a proprietary right, in what prescription had already made their own.

The Nautuncars certainly consider the farm they cultivate, as their own property; and no government, save the Mussulman, appears to have considered the soil its own, or itself at liberty to deprive the inferior subject, at its will. In forming the present benevolent system, this solitary precedent surely will not operate as an example to act upon; but where no written document is found, what has been known, as usage, will be established, as law. This would confirm the prescriptive right of many industrious natives to the lands they have long occupied; and be the certain means of making them comprehend, whence these advantages were derived.

Extract REPORT of Major MUNRO, principal Collector of CANARA; dated 9th November 1800; containing his Sentiments on the PERMANENT SETTLEMENT of that Province.

Para. 17.—After having given my sentiments as to the amount of the assessment that ought to form the basis of the Permanent Settlement, it now only remains to offer a few observations on the mode which it would be most eligible to follow, in dividing the country into estates, so as both to promote improvement, and ensure the collection of the revenue. In countries where private property in land is unknown, because the whole is the property of government; and where the general poverty of the cultivators, disables them from making any improvements; the dividing the land into estates of about five or six thousand pagodas, public rent, and giving them away, or disposing of them for a price to men of property, where such can be found, may possibly have some advantages; but in Canara, where almost all land is private property, derived from gift or purchase, or descent from an antiquity, too remote to be traced; where there are more title deeds; and where the validity of these deeds have probably stood more trials, than all the estates in England; great proprietors cannot be established, without annihilating all the rights of the present landlords; nor do I believe that, by any arrangement for placing a number of small estates under the collection of one head landlord, any facility in collection, or any security for revenue, would be obtained, that may not be obtained, from letting the estates remain, as they now stand.

It may be objected, that the smallness of estates, involving as a consequence, want of property, incapacitates the owners from bestowing upon them the due degree of culture, and subjects the public revenue to frequent failures; but I am convinced that these objections, are groundless. If we wish to introduce a system that shall be permanent, we must consider not only what the state of property now is, but also what it is likely to be hereafter. The benefits expected to result from the formation of large estates, are, no doubt, the saving of detail in accounts; the improvement of the country; and the security of revenue, from the lands being in the possession of a few wealthy owners, instead of a great number of wealthy cultivators. Supposing that the system of great estates, does really produce all these advantages, they can only be temporary; for where there are no entails nor artificial restraints on the transfer of land; where there are no exclusive rights of primogeniture; where the progress of population is urged on, by early marriage and abundance of food; and where it is common to supply, by adoption, the want of children; every great estate must in a short time, be divided into a number of small ones. A widely extended division of property, is the point to which things are of themselves, continually hastening, and to which, they must finally arrive, unless obstructed by violent regulations. Superior industry, several successions concentrating in one person, or other causes, may keep up a few large estates; but such instances will be rare, and will bear no comparison to those of the small ones, which will be continually formed, by the operation of unrestrained transfer, and of division among all the sons of every succeeding generation. Small estates may therefore be considered, as the arrangement of nature. To think of dividing Canara into great estates, would only be attempting to carry it backwards, a century or two; and forcing it from that state to which, it must again inevitably return. The effect of the Bengal system on the provinces of the Coromandel coast, and probably on Bengal itself, will be no more than, after a long course of time, to make the condition of the great body of the inhabitants, that which those of Canara, now is.

With

With respect to the expediency of having great substantial landholders, who may be responsible to government for the revenue, there seems to be no reason to conjecture that it might not be collected, with equal ease and regularity, from small proprietors. A tyrannical government has drained the resources of this country, and left the inhabitants less able than they formerly were, to cultivate their lands; but the same evil, would have taken place, and in a much greater degree, had the lands been divided among great owners of estates, of from five to ten thousand pagodas each; because it would have been much easier to have impoverished the country, by extorting an exorbitant assessment from a few who possessed all its wealth, than it would have been, had it been divided among a multitude of small proprietors. Though there can be no very rich owners where estates are small; yet the aggregate produce of the land may be, and probably always is, greater than when the whole belongs to a few principal landholders; and government have therefore, a greater fund as a security for their revenue.

It may be said, that there must be a certain limit, beyond which, estates cannot be subdivided, without leaving so little surplus a rent, as to be insufficient for the subsistence of the landlord, and that he would then be forced to withhold a part of the public demand, in order to make up the difference. Should such case ever happen, the remedy might always be found, in selling the estate: the very existence of the case, however, supposes a fullness of population, not likely to be soon experienced, and which, if it were, would compensate in a thousand ways, for such accident.

The division of lands in Canara, however it may have affected individuals, does not seem ever to have injured the public revenue. Though it has no doubt sometimes reduced the accendants of independent landlords, to the rank of tenants, and even of labourers: it has most likely, by employing more labour, increased the gross produce of the soil: it has not disabled the owners from providing for every expense which the best cultivation requires. It has diminished their property, but it has also, in the same proportion, diminished the lands which they are to cultivate with that property; and by confining their personal management to a narrower space, it has rendered it more efficacious. The wealth accumulated in the hands of great proprietors, may be supposed to enable them to undertake extensive improvements; and to carry on agriculture with a spirit, beyond the power of petty landholders; but even allowing, what may be doubted, that the wealth of a great landholder is greater than the aggregate wealth of a number of small proprietors, whose estates together are equal in extent to his, it is not likely to be so productive; for it never can be managed with either so much skill or economy. Whatever superiority he may have over them in fortune, is more than counterbalanced, by the deep interest which every one of them feels, in looking after his little spot; and by the unremitting attention which both his attachment to it, and his necessity, impel him to exert, in order to extract from it, its greatest possible produce.

The expenses of Indian, must not be measured by those of European husbandry. Exclusive of tanks, there is hardly any expense which may not be defrayed, by the smallest, as easily as by the greatest proprietors; and even tanks themselves are unnecessary in Canara. The small estates are in general better cultivated than the great ones; and their owners are as regular as the great owners, in discharging their kists. Among the numerous instances which have come before me, of their having been violently dispossessed of their lands, or of their having fled and left them waste, on account of balances under the late government, there is not one, in which these balances can fairly be attributed to the rent alone, nor in which they have not arisen, from fines, anticipations, and other acts of oppression. In whatever way I view the question of great and small proprietors, I am perfectly satisfied that the preference ought to be given to small ones, and that government ought to make its settlements, immediately with them. Under such a system, the gross produce of the country will be greater, and the collection of revenue will be as regular, as under that of great landholders. Men who have been accustomed to see the frequent failures among the lower classes of farmers, in other parts of India, will not readily admit that a mass of small proprietors can be punctual; experience, however, in this province, has demonstrated, that the regularity of payment is not affected, by the smallness of the estate.

Though my own opinion is decidedly in favour of small proprietors; yet as government have determined to introduce every where, the system of Bengal permanent settlement, it becomes my duty to point out in what manner it may be accomplished, in Canara.—It is evident, that as the lands of Canara have for ages been private property, that we are not at liberty to make the same disposition of them, as might be done where they belonged to government. If it is argued that no such difficulty has occurred in Bengal, it may be answered, that the landed property of Bengal is most likely, of a very different nature from that of Canara, which is both more antient and more perfect than that of England; because it is more widely diffused, and less clogged with conditions. If in Bengal, the circar grants of enaums are for lands, and not for money; and if the lands are held by a few great, instead of a multitude of small proprietors; it may with certainty be pronounced, that its landed property is of modern date, and that it is an usurpation of revenue-officers and head inhabitants together. The very circumstance of the existence of such a property, having been doubted, is a strong argument against its being of long standing. No man who has ever been in Canara, can ever entertain any doubt with regard to its land, being private property. As the property must therefore remain as it now is, all that can be done is, to divide the country into a certain number of great estates, formed by the union of several small ones, under one head. The most convenient arrangement would be, the antient one of maganies or grams; and the size of estates ought to be, from one hundred to five thousand pagodas jumma. To break in upon ancient boundaries and landmarks, for the sake of ideal advantages to be derived from squaring estates, estates, would occasion much trouble to the collector, and no small discontent among the inhabitants, because these boundaries, serve not only to divide lands, but also particular tribes or families, who form distinct communities in their respective villages. Where more or more estates; and where they are small, two or three, ought to be divided into two estate. The average ought to be, about one thousand pagodas jumma. It could answer no good purpose, and might produce mischief, to make any estates above five thousand pagodas, because the proprietors might in time, become a kind of petty poligars. All past events in this country show, that great landed property has always had a tendency to excite a turbulent spirit in the possessor, which has been favoured, by the inaccessible nature of the hills and woods among which he resides. An estate of ten thousand pagodas, in most parts of Canara, and in every part of Soonda, would place under the landlord so large a district, furnished with retreats so strong, that were he to become refractory, it would be difficult to reduce him to obedience. Such precautions, may be said to be unnecessary, because gratitude for the benefits he has received from the British government, and the impossibility of his bettering his condition, will preserve him in his allegiance; but the love of distinction and independence, is a much stronger and more universal passion, than gratitude; and though it might be supposed, that the hopelessness of success, and of course his own interest, would deter him from any opposition to authority, yet it is well known that men, on such occasions, do not always maturely weigh distant consequences; and it would therefore be the more prudent plan, not to hazard an arrangement, whose stability is to rest on gratitude.

After dividing the country into great estates, each of these estates, ought to be made over to the potail or principal proprietor of the small estates, of which they are respectively composed, in perpetuity. As he has no property in any of the lands composing the great estates, except those which were before his own, he can only be constituted a kind of lord of the manor; but as he must be responsible for all failures, he ought to be allowed the following advantages, in order to enable him to perform his engagement:—1st. He ought to have an allowance of 2½ per cent. on the jumma, to be included in the reduction which I have already proposed; leaving the remaining per cent. to go as an abatement to the mass of inferior proprietors and farmers.—2d. He ought to be vested with proprietary right of all waste lands, to which there are no owners, on condition of his paying the Bednore assessment, the second year after they are brought into cultivation. 3d. All inferior estates which, on failure of heirs, have heretofore been accustomed to revert to the circar, must now revert to him, and become, in every respect, as much his respective property, as his own original estates.

Though the establishment of these Regulations will, I am convinced, answer the end of ensuring the easy realization of a permanent revenue; yet it is obvious that the influence of the 2½ per cent. in facilitating this operation, must every day diminish: because, if it follow the laws of other property, though it now belongs to one man, it must, on his death, be divided, with his estate, among his children. We shall then have several persons, instead of one, to be responsible for the revenue; and as every succeeding generation will increase the number, we shall at last have almost as much detail with the superior landlords, as if we had made a direct settlement with the inferior proprietors. If, with the view of averting this evil, as it is supposed to be, we confine the 2½ per cent. to the eldest son of some single heir, and make him solely responsible, we lessen the security of revenue, because, as we cannot prevent the division of the lands among all the heirs, we have now only the security of a part, instead of that of the whole of them, together with the 2½ per cent. for its realization. If we restrict the division of lands to the original estate, and determine that all subsequent acquisitions, whether from the reversion of inferior estates, or the cultivation of circar waste lands, shall go with the 2½ per cent. we introduce the law of entail: and even this can hardly be effected at some unknown remote period, in the many estates in which there is no waste. All system of Indian revenue must, I imagine, end, in making a direct settlement with every independent landholder, without the intervention of any superior lord; and in making every one of them, answerable for his own failure of any particular estate therein, by a second assessment.

Supposing, however, that it may be expedient, for the present, to adopt the system of great estates; the Regulations I have recommended will apply to every part of Canara, and to the greater part of Ankalah, Soondah, and Belghy; but in many villages of Belghy and Ankalah, and throughout the whole of the villages in Soondah, running along the Mahatta frontier, the land belongs to the circar, and may therefore be divided into estates, and given away at the pleasure of government. These villages, are in general in such a desolate state, that a permanent settlement of them, would now be made under very great disadvantages. It would, for many reasons, be best to defer the settlement, not only for gain the requisite knowledge of the country, for carrying into execution so important a measure. Time should also be allowed to let the inhabitants become familiarized to their new master, and shake off all distrust and apprehension of change, and to enable them to understand the scope of the system intended to be introduced; and it should also be allowed, in order to let the country recover, after the long series of oppression under which it has suffered. The remissions already granted, have removed every impediment in the way of this desirable end; and in five years, they will work a wonderful improvement in the condition of the inhabitants. Judging from the confidence which they have already assumed in our moderation and good faith, I have little doubt that within that period, the value of land will rise so much, that there will scarcely be a single estate which will not find a purchaser, should it be necessary to sell it to pay a balance.

In disposing of the great estates at the final settlement, no price ought to be demanded for them, because, as they were all before private property, upon which the superior landlord has no claim, there is no new advantage attached to his tenure, except the two and a half per cent. nor any in immediate expectation, which can make it worth any valuable consideration. We have no ground to imagine that there will be any such competition for them, as to raise their price. Seneers, and other men of property, are too cautious to lay out their money in land, on the strength of the duration of a new system, and on the faith of a government, to which they have but lately become subject. In provinces which have been near half a century under the Company's authority, they may consider the property which they vest in land, as secure from danger; but here, they will not readily believe that it can be safe; for nothing but the experience of another power. As we must therefore expect no candidates for estates, except among the landholders themselves; and as, from the minute division of land, very few of them can be supposed to be rich, no considerable sum can be expected from them, for great estates. But though they have not the means of making great advances as purchase money; the realization of the revenue, will not be the less secure. It is the wide diffusion of landed property, by which almost every field has a different owner, who is anxious to increase its produce, and who pays his rent with a regularity strengthened, by the effect of the abatements which have already been made. These, will operate, both in augmenting the gross produce of the land now in cultivation, and in enabling the owner to obtain a better price for it:—they will encourage him to enlarge his cocon-nut plantations, which in a climate so favourable to them, would have been ten times more numerous than they are, had not the dread of additional assessment, restrained their cultivation; and they will furnish him with the means of cultivating completely, the higher and more unproductive lands of his estates, which, in many of the greater estates, have lain waste almost ever since the Mysore conquest. Canara will probably never be a manufacturing country, because it produces none of the raw materials necessary to render it such; and because the heavy rains, which last so great a part of the year, are an insurmountable obstacle to all operations which require to be carried on, under a clear sky, and in the open air; but the same rains which deny it manufactures, give it a succession of never-failing crops of rice, which place its revenue and its future prosperity, on the firmest foundation; for there can be no danger, that the existing demand for its surplus produce will ever diminish. The province of Malabar, Goa, Bombay, and Arabia, can be no where else, so well supplied; and there is every reason to conclude, that their consumption, by the abolition of all regulations in favour of particular countries, and the reduction of duties, will be increased.

Extract REPORT of Mr. RAYNOR, Collector Southern Division of CANARA; dated 30th April 1802; as to the PERMANENT SETTLEMENT of that Division.

IN fixing a permanent land rent in countries that have before been used only to a variable one, as true and equitable as can be devised; being the most just, would certainly be the most eligible plan to follow. Where landed property, however, has been firmly established for ages, and the land tax has been fixed, it is probably the more politic plan, to leave rents nearly in that state, to which the various changes of countries have brought them. As the aggregate here, is certainly low enough for every wished-for purpose, care may be taken, should it, notwithstanding the many objections to the plan, be at last determined to place a number of small estates under one landlord, to make the land tax of the whole, tolerably equal; but to attempt to equalize the rents of the numerous landlords and tenants in the several districts, would cause very great discontent, and might justly be complained of, as an oppressive act. It would in fact, be a tax on industry, by which, chiefly, the gross produce of some, can have increased more than other lands. Besides, any additions now made to those rents which are very low, would fall directly on the present occupants, who may probably have paid a price for the purchase of the estate, equal in proportion to the supposed net produce; and allowing that the estate remains in the hands of the meritorious landlord, who by his own manual labour and the sweat of his own brow, has raised its produce above the level of his neighbours; with what justice can we tax his industry, and at the same time, grant a remission to his neighbour, whose lands, through indolence or other causes, have been and are in so declining a state, as to require it? Some have obtained unimpaired or waste lands, at inferior fixed rents, from some of the preceding governments; others, have had them granted through favour; and, from various other causes, now hold them, at moderate rates: to increase which now, would be to tax the good fortune or conduct of their ancestors.

There is generally as great, or greater irregularity, in the amount net rent derived from landlords from their estates, as in the portion of the gross produce valuation they pay to government as land tax. By the register of lands, which have become the subject of dispute during my late circuit, it appears the landlord's portion of his gross rent varies greatly. This register, however, is by no means to be confided in, that is, as to its statement of the produce of the lands. It seldom becomes necessary, in ascertaining a mere question of right to land, to go into any particular enquiry of the produce, having no time to delay any investigation, merely for that purpose. The register kept by a native, I have found, on comparing with my jumma-bund accounts, very incorrect. Some people, it would appear, even lose by their lands, though in all cases, they must probably have others yielding them a large share of the gross produce: for it is contrary to all reason and common sense, to suppose they would waste their time and money in the hope of gaining, what by their statement, would involve them in loss.

Canara.

Major Munro, in his letter of 9th November 1800, after delivering his sentiments very fully in favour of small estates, in which I perfectly concur, has explained, if not the only, certainly the most eligible mode of forming large estates in Canara, by placing a number of small ones under the collection of one head landlord, who would in fact, be little more than a potail of a village is at present; for, without annihilating all the just rights of the present landholders, which they have enjoyed for centuries, I see no way whatever of conveying a proprietary right to a great landlord, to any small estates placed under his collection; nor do I believe any of the objects government have in view, by forming large estates, would be answered thereby. All the claims such a person would have on the petty holders, would be for the amount of land tax payable from their estates. The only inducement any one would have to take on him such a charge, would be the allowances in money, remission of rent, or other remuneration granted him by government: such allowances, together with the great landlords private estates, would be the only security we should have for the land tax, because the only real property he has in the whole estate; for, so long as the small landlords under him, continue to pay their rent, no power can make them answerable for their superior's defalcation; and, as nothing but the right of collecting from the inferiors, could be disposed of, which people would rather avoid than otherwise, it follows that the whole estate of the superior, together with his allowances, must be sold, in most cases, for any thing more than a trifling defalcation.

The number of landlords at the time of Hurry Hur Roi's settlement, was considerably less than at present, and all estates were from 15 to 50 pagodas land rent per annum. From the natural division of property which has succeeded, the number has now increased to 22,700, and the land tax of estates averages from one fanam to 450 pagodas; there are however now, many more under than above 10 pagodas, yet no inconvenience whatever has ever been complained of, nor does any exist in Canara, from the smallness of estates; and perhaps in no part of India is the revenue realized, with greater punctuality or with less trouble. As, therefore, without annihilating the rights of the present proprietors, large estates cannot be constituted; and as resorting to harsh measures, on the grounds of only ideal advantage, would I am convinced, by no means tend to the improvement of the province, in my humble opinion, it would be better to drop the attempt altogether, and to continue the collection from the present small proprietors. Collecting in such detail, must be attended with far greater difficulty and expense to a large proprietor than to government. The farmers know that the sole business of the circar servants is to collect their rents, and which done, that he has no further claim on them; but there are many reasons why they would rather permit a head landlord, when taught to look up to him as their superior, to impose on them, than any public servant, who is with them only for a time. Any one proprietor of land, or other respectable resident, in every space of country yielding one or two thousand pagodas land rent, might be authorized to collect it, from the inferior landlords within his bounds, with an exact register of what he is to collect, and from whom. With an establishment of a shambogue, and a few peons to every magany, he might do this, with punctuality, and might be recompensed for his trouble by a per-centage on his collections, and by a grant of all the waste land of his collectorate, which however should be liable to forfeiture, in case of his committing any act which might authorize such punishment; otherwise his situation, together with such land, should be hereditary; but the succession confined to such of his heirs as may appear best qualified to hold it. To make larger collections than two or three thousand pagodas at most, would answer no good purpose; and as one person could not so well look to a great charge, it might be attended with many inconveniences. With an establishment of this sort, and two native tehsildars stationed one on either side of the collector's residence, merely to receive the money forthcoming from those quarters, and permit them, I am sure the land tax of my district might be duly realized: All the landlords, within twenty miles on either side the collector's treasury, might pay their money into it.

It has always appeared to me, that the exact plan of the permanent settlement of the revenues adopted in Bengal, was not applicable to these territories. It was apparent to me, that the creation of zemindars, where no zemindaries before existed, was neither calculated to improve the condition of the lower orders of the people, nor politically wise, with reference to the future security of this government. I have thought that the principle of the ryotwar annual settlement, from which such vast advantage has been derived, should form the basis of the permanent settlement. It is a question of vast importance; it demands the greatest consideration.

I have already begun to enter into the enquiry, by correspondence with the collectors, but it is my intention to visit in person every collectorship, for the purpose of carrying on upon the spot, such investigation as will best enable me to satisfy my own mind upon the subject. My time does not permit me to wade through the voluminous revenue records, which must be examined, in order to collect every information that may bear upon this question. I am prevented also, by a want of knowledge of the languages, to make enquiry, separately and independently of the local authorities.

I find that I require the assistance of an intelligent civil officer, who has had experience in revenue management, and is a good linguist.

Mr. William Thackeray is the officer whom I am desirous of selecting as my assistant; and, with the approbation of the Board, I propose that he may receive six months leave of absence from his station, for this duty.

MEMOIR of Mr. THACKERAY, addressed to the Right Honourable Lord William Cavendish Bentinck, in favour of RYOTWAR PERMANENT SETTLEMENTS.

My Lord,

ACCORDING to your lordship's command, I have written down the thoughts which have occurred to my mind, respecting the Permanent Settlement. Inexperience, and want perhaps of perception, of all the parts and relations of each system, has prevented my forming a satisfactory opinion on the grand question,—Whether an immediate settlement with the ryots, or the introduction of zemindars, be best. Indeed, as these thoughts have arisen from what I have seen in the Circars and Ceded districts only, it is impossible for me to give any opinion on so important a subject; however, the ideas which have sprung up in my mind, such as they are, are now written down, according to your lordship's orders.

Objections to Permanent Zemindary:

1. The power of government, will be curtailed.
2. The division of the attributes or qualities of property between proprietary zemindar and occupant ryot, is bad.
3. The remission goes, to the wrong person,—it should go to, the ryot.
4. The ryots will, in some cases, be liable to oppression,—the zemindars, in some cases, to imposition.
5. A ryotwar may be converted into a zemindary, at any time; but a zemindary cannot be so easily altered, if found unsuccessful.
6. The government loses the waste.
7. The selling the land, is bad.
8. The inhabitants would dislike being transferred to zemindars.
9. A ryotwar settlement has succeeded here, and will therefore most likely succeed again, better than any innovation to the prejudice of the ryot.
10. The loss of all revenue knowledge, after the zemindaries are sold.

These are the objections to zemindary, that have occurred to me; and I will discuss them separately.

1. The power of government will be curtailed.—In all countries, it may be good to limit the power of the prince; but here, the government must keep as much power as is consistent with private rights, in its own hands. It will therefore be right to limit the demand on the land; but still to keep up as much communication and connection with the people, as possible. It may be considered an axiom, I think, that all internal government is connected with the revenue; that whosoever the people of India pay, him, they regard as their superior, and is the most important person, in regard to themselves. It may be said, that this will wear away in time; however, I do not see that it will. The circar will be removed from the immediate sight of the ryot, and a certain portion of authority, power of getting information, influence, and command of resources, will be transferred to the zemindar, without a sufficient counterbalancing advantage. This will happen, in regard to the ryots, peons, and inhabitants at large, even though they get pottahs from the zemindars; but much more will the waste, give influence. The waste lands afford a great patronage, and particularly appeal into the husbandman. If a zemindar is appointed, he becomes the patron of every man, without subsistence. The revenue servants, the cutchere peons, the village officers, must always exist. Would it not be better that all these people, should look up to the circar, and in as much as regards the support of our authority, that the influence, information, and assistance which these people can afford, should be at the service of the government?—If the situation of the Ceded Districts and the Circars be compared, the difference will strike one; that one has been 40 years under our government, and has been subject to continual rebellions and deficiencies of revenue, to this day. The Ceded Districts have been five years in our possession, and although full of turbulent zemindars, and peons, and poligars, who have always been in rebellion against their own native circar; peace has been preserved, the authority of government completely established, and a large revenue collected, and gradually augmented, in spite of two bad seasons. The ryotwar settlement has done this, in the Ceded Districts.

The first thing is to govern this country; then, to govern it well. We must try to unite strength and justice, and to keep as much power in our own hands, as is consistent with justice and the happiness of the body of the people. Why then create zemindars, where none existed before? They had zemindars in Bengal, in the Circars, and some other places, and the opposition which they made to the collectors, was one reason for putting them in, perhaps the strongest reason. Nobody will deny, that the less power the government gives up the better, consistent with proprietary right; and nobody will deny, that in making zemindars where none existed before, we do give up a certain degree of power,—means of information, communication with the people, and command of resources.

2. The division of the proprietary right of the zemindar, and occupant right of the ryots, is bad. It is said, that the zemindar is the proprietor, the ryot the occupant; but how undefined, are their respective rights!—Nobody has clearly defined them yet. It is said that the ryot has a right a right to the cultivation of a certain field, while he continues to cultivate it, and pay the usual rent or rate; but this is hard upon the zemindar, who pays the land tax; because his management is encumbered with the rights of the ryot, while he is considered to be the proprietor, and must pay the circar rent regularly. It is not therefore, a real landed property: it is an undivided something. Even in making the pottah regulation, they do not seem to have come to any decision on the subject, because that regulation may be construed in favour of either zemindar or ryot; and no provision is made for setting the merassee right of default-principle that the zemindary is sold for arrears of revenue. This division of the qualities of property, will, I should think, obstruct improvement; and perhaps it would be better to consider zemindars, land-holders in the full extent of the term: their own interest would prevent great oppression, and they would feel the full pride interest and satisfaction which possession will possess the full absolute property in the waste, and will therefore hold it, on a different tenure from land cultivated at present by ryots. All this, will I think produce trouble and confusion, which the zemindar and ryot will both feel. Besides, property of every kind is liable to subdivision, and must dwindle every day. Now in the zemindary system, two kinds of property will go on dividing at the same time; zemindary property and occupancy property. This may in time, create confusion, and produce a breed of starving proprietors, while it keeps down the increase of occupant cultivators, who would otherwise multiply on what has been set aside to feed the zemindars; nor will the 15 per cent. keep the proprietors, and make up for deficiencies in the course of time, after many subdivisions, unless indeed a great deal of rent would have come to them; so that, even supposing the waste will go on keeping the bad; because at the expense of government. What does the zemindar now possess, according to the principle on which the motadary system has been introduced here, but the waste, the 15 per cent. and some sundry advantages? and the waste and the 15 per cent. are just what he should not hold,—the waste, because he holds it for nothing,—the 15 per cent. because it ought to go to the actual cultivators.

3. The remission goes to the wrong person,—it should go to the ryot.—The zemindar is not the cultivator, he does not even superintend cultivation, if the ryot be independent of him; and it is more likely that the remission will be applied to marriages and idle expenses, than if given to the ryots. The husbandman in India is the most industrious, parsimonious creature in the world; a stranger to vice, thinking of nothing but cultivating his field, maintaining his family, and paying the circar rent. Why then shall the remission, the main spring of future industry and improvement, be made to a stranger, perhaps a ferocious poligar—an avaricious speculating soucar, or an intriguing dubash, merely to enable him to grow fat, and pay the revenue, in case a bad year should come? Would it not be better to make the remission to the ryot? It would equally tend to the security of the revenue, or perhaps more so; because it would be more likely to be directly applied to the extension and improvement of cultivation. In case of unforeseen misfortunes, the relations of the ryot would assist him; he could mortgage his land, and go on paying his revenue. The ryot is the man who feels as it were, married to his field. What an effect the sense of a property in the soil would have upon him! As it is, under oppression, he still sticks to his field as long as he can. The people in Canara feel this; and every man builds his house in his own field. It is said, a remission to the zemindar is applied immediately to the land and farming stock of the country; a remission to the zemindar is applied indirectly, through many channels of soucars, secretaries, renters, &c. Besides, we talk a great deal about the happiness of the people; how can we increase the happiness of the bulk of the people so much, as by making their possessive, proprietary right; and giving them all the advantages of property and permanency? It may be said, that the rights of the inferior ryots will be secured, at any rate; but if it is admitted that a remission is necessary to convert the lands they cultivate, into saleable property, it must follow, that we withhold the property from them, until we give up the remission to them. Indeed, it seems to me contrary to the benevolent intentions of the Court of Directors, to give all the advantages of the new system, to a set of men, to be created on purpose to enjoy them; and to place in thralldom; those industrious people who constitute the bulk of the people, and by whose labours our armies are in reality paid, our investments provided, and our whole government supported.

4. The ryots will, in some cases, be liable to oppression; the zemindars, in some cases, to imposition.—Fifty means might be mentioned, in which this might happen, according to the nature of the men and place, even when pottahs have been given. The zemindars will make collusive engagements, and get ryots to do so; bajeh kherck and village expenditure will go on, at a terrible rate, as it does in the Circars; and where, from the little I can learn, and what I can guess, I have no doubt but that there are farmers, and under-farmers, and securities, and all the confusion that arises from them; that pottahs are not given; and that village charges are assessed on the ryot, as formerly.

5. A ryotwar settlement will be easily converted into a zemindary, at any time; but a zemindary cannot so easily be altered, if found unsuccessful.—After the ryotwar settlement is made, the government may easily turn it into a zemindary. If this case, the government have only to take 50,000 pagodas jumma of country, and sell, or give it away. In this case, the government will transfer the right of collecting the land-tax from perhaps 3,000 freeholders, the waste, and sundry interests, such a reversion of lands, without owners or heirs. In this case, the greater the estate the better, because a per-centage on a great sum, will keep a man's family, pay charges, collection, and provide for deficiencies, better than the same per-centage on a smaller sum; and therefore the subdivision of the estate hereafter, by the operation of land and partition, will be rather hurtful, should such a plan even take place.

place. It would also be right to give up to the zemindar the balance of remission not given up originally to the ryots, but withheld, enable the circar to keep up the additional servants required for a ryotwar settlement; this, which will be a small commission on the revenue, the waste, and the chance of reversions, and the consequence of the station, will induce people to become zemindars most likely; and in this case, the lands of the ryots will be liable to sale for arrears, and would constitute the security for the revenue. The tehsilars of the collectors might become the zemindars, on this plan; if such a system should ever be adopted.

6. Government loses the waste.—The loss is considerable; but the loss in actual power is perhaps of more importance. The waste is the means of converting the peons into husbandmen. The government could not give waste to the peons, who swarm all over the country; and if the zemindar did give it to them, and get them to take it, they would be at his service, and look up to him rather than the circar;—but the actual giving away property, without sufficient compensation, is a reason strong enough to prevent giving up the waste in perpetuity, except to actual cultivators, or persons who would take it on speculation, at a rent; more particularly, because other modes of taxation have many objections. Now if the country gets rich, and the wants of government require a greater revenue; they will find it difficult perhaps to invent a tax in any other shape, which will not press harder on the people.

7. The selling the land is bad.—Selling the lands, appear to me like the lottery, and to be encouraging gambling. It may be a proof of confidence in government; and the sale of the lands at Masulipatam, was a proof of confidence in the government; but still it always appeared to me like selling the ryots. The only good I could see in it was, that the purchasers being men of great influence, could contrive to keep out plunderers, better than the collectors and magistrates.

8. The inhabitants would dislike being transferred to zemindars. Now, the inhabitants We profess to make the happiness of the people, our great object. if they held their lands in general would not only feel, but would in reality be more secure, if they held their lands immediately from government. In short, unless the settlement be made with them, and the remission be given up to them, they cannot be the secure tenants, which every body seems desirous of constituting them. I have no doubt but that they would prefer a settlement direct with the circar; and in the course of our tour, your Lordship will be able to discover what their own sentiments are; that is, if it be possible to explain the nature of the proposed settlement to them, and to convince them that the government is sincere in its professions, regarding remission and fixed rent. It would be a very difficult thing to explain the nature of property to men; who have been for years subject to oppression, and versed in consequent fraud; and in many places it would be harder still to convince them, that the government would give up the lands for ever, at a low rent; but when they comprehend the full benefit of the proposed system, they would acquiesce in it, with gratitude.

9. A ryotwar settlement has succeeded here, in Canara, Ceded Districts, Barramah, and every other district, where it has been attempted. A permanent ryotwar system exists and prospers, considering the bad government it has been subject to for many years under Hyder and Tippoo, in Canara; although the remission has not been allowed. There is therefore, every prospect of success in a permanent ryotwar settlement, supported by advantages, which the present ryotwar settlement, has not. It was thought that it could not be effected in Bengal, I have heard; but as it has been done here, and government are resolved at any rate, to make a ryotwar settlement the basis of any system to be adopted, those objections which may be urged, as arising from the difficulty of the task, are entirely removed. It may be said, that the revenue will not be secure, under a ryotwar settlement; however, if the ryots be put on such a footing that their lands are saleable, and that they ought to pay, whether they cultivate or no, the revenue will be secure, and their lands will be the security: no other variations will arise, but from waste being brought into cultivation. It is a practice to give up their old lands, and take waste, because the cultivation of waste under a cowle, is often more favourable to the ryot than the cultivation of their old lands on the full rent; but as the ryot will be obliged to pay his rent, whether he cultivates or no, he never will take waste, till he can afford to cultivate both the old land and the waste. It may be said, that the Board of Revenue cannot exercise controul, over a ryotwar system; but this is no good objection. The government might as well shut up the courts, because they cannot inspect the proceedings of every cause, themselves. The existence of zemindars there,* and the difference between the ryots here, and there, makes so great a difference between Bengal and the Coast, that I think the Court of Directors and the Bengal government, had they known the state of the ryots here, would have settled here, with them. They never, in any minute or order that I have seen, express a desire to introduce a new order of men, or to innovate; they wish to stick to the usage of the country, and therefore settled with the zemindars there, where they were. Here, there are no zemindars, and the Court of Directors, had they known the coast customs, would not have created a new order of men, but have followed old usage, in settling with the ryots;—indeed, I have a belief, that in some parts of Bengal, where no zemindars existed, they actually made a kind of ryotwar settlement, in Sylhet particularly: where I heard or read of this, I forget, but I did hear it. I have then some reason to think, that the creation of mootahdars here, is contrary to the spirit of the Court of Directors and Bengal government, and their meaning in their minute and orders. Inasmuch as it is an innovation here, this is worth investigating, and would be a strong argument for ryotwar here, as far as the intentions of the Court of Directors and Lord Cornwallis could go.

* In Bengal Circars, &c.

Vide Act of Parliament.

10. The loss of revenue knowledge, after the zemindar system takes place.—The collectors, registers, and assistants, will have no opportunity of learning revenue affairs, after the country is thrown into the hands of the new created zemindars.

It may be said, that the lands of proprietors under the charge of the Court of Wards, will give them an opportunity of learning revenue management; however, it will be found, that the native managers will be some men of influence, who will, it is true, send long accounts, and write long letters to the collector and the Court of Wards, but who will take good care, to prevent their interfering in the detail; most likely; the lands will be let out in great farms, to renters, and in the end, it will be found that the collector will have very little more real interference than in zemindary lands. Indeed, considering the sacredness of private property, the less interference (except to prevent great irregularities) the better. In short, we shall lose all communication with the country, knowledge of its resources, agriculture, and internal management. I do not think that any collector in the Circars can give a just account of the state of his district, in any one respect, of cultivation, its increase or decrease of population, of casts, of houses, of grievances, of opinions, of interests, of the coin, or any thing else, except from former documents, or from general conversation, what any individual may take the same advantage of. The collector will generally give himself no further trouble, than his own business obliges him to take: he will not go out of his way to make enquiries; indeed he ought not, under the Regulations. Reg. XXIX, 1802, respecting curnums, shuts out the collector from that channel of information; besides, he must only make himself disliked, by making enquiries. The same with the judge; he would wait for a complaint, and he ought to wait for a complaint,—he ought to see nobody,—know nobody, but in court; and in proportion as he is an active, inquisitive magistrate, may he seem a partial judge. Besides the impropriety of his making investigations, except in court, he has too much business on his hands to attend to any thing else: his register is the same, and therefore there is nobody in the district who can or will keep up information;—moreover, the accounts of the curnums will be fabricated; and if the zemindars have the appointment and controul of curnums, I see no means which there will be, in ten years, of ascertaining any thing relative to the resources or payments of the country.

These appear to me, to be the chief objections to zemindary, and, consequently, advantages of ryotwary. The advantages of zemindary may be said to be,—

1. Security of revenue.
2. The detail of ryotwar would overwhelm the government officers.
3. The fear of indolent, corrupt, or incapable collectors.
4. The indulgence which the zemindar would probably show to his ryots, in time of distress.
5. The fear of remissions becoming necessary.
6. The interest which zemindars would have, in promoting improvement.
7. The difficulty and detail of tuccavi and tank repairs. All these, I will consider separately, in every way that occurs to me.

1. Security of revenue under zemindars. The land is security for the revenue, it is said; but in a ryotwar system, the absolute property in the land, uniting both proprietary and occupancy rights, would be sold to make up for deficiencies of revenue; but in a zemindary, where the occupancy of the tenant is admitted, nothing but 15 per cent. will be sold, together with waste.

It may be said that the ryots are poor; but the zemindars will be sometimes poor also. As far as industry and economy promise success, the chance is, that the ryot will proportionably enrich himself as much, as the zemindar. All depends on the industry of the ryots, in any system. If they all fail, the zemindar must fail at last, though his private wealth may enable him to go on for a year or two; and what security will there be, in a ruined estate? If the ryots all fail in a ryotwar system, the rent must fall, and their lands may not sell; but the chance is, that the full property in their fields, on a low rent, will make the body of ryots, collectively, richer than the 15 per cent. will make the zemindar. This is proved by experience. Take any collectorate where there has been a ryotwar settlement, and it will be found, that the revenues have been more secure, than in other districts. An account of the annual demand, collection and balance in each collectorship, for the last five years, will show whether this is true or false; and yet this comparison between ryotwar collectorates and other collectorates, is partial, because the rents to government are raised higher in ryotwar collectorates than in others. In the Circars, and every where else, where there is no money rent, 10 or 15 per cent., I dare say, is spent in the village, and embezzled by the revenue servants; but in ryotwary countries, very little, not above 3 or 4 per cent. or not so much, is lost; the former peculations and expenditures, have been added to the jumma. If therefore where a higher rent is taken, and greater strictness used in making the settlement, the balances are less than where the circar collections are less, and the rent low, surely the system must be good.

The collection of a land-tax from the actual proprietors, is admitted to be the simplest way; though more hands the revenue pass through, the greater the loss, pillage, and insecurity. Just as the remission will be applied to improvement through zemindars, securities, renters, and sub-renters; so will the rent be paid through the same hands. A little profit will stick to the fingers of each, in the transit; all which profit, given to the ryot, would remain with the land, and contribute to its value, and consequently to the security of the revenue. If the ryot be made independent of the zemindar, he is virtually the proprietor, and the zemindar is merely an intermediate agent, consequently the land-tax will not be collected direct from the proprietor, under a zemindary system. But the zemindar will not be the only intermediate agent there will be, and are now, in the Circars. I know in the other other provinces, I believe most sincerely, farmers, securities, renters, and all that tribe, in almost every zemindary; but the more intermediates of this kind, the less secure is revenue. Again, in the course of time, the zemindars will be subdivided into small estates, most likely, in a greater proportion than waste will be brought into cultivation; so that the wealth of the zemindars will become less, and the security consequently weaker; for, on the zemindary principle, the larger the estate the better. It is like an insurance office, in some measure; a per-centage on a great sum, will cover the expense of living, managing the estate, and providing for bad years, much better than the same per-centage, on a smaller sum.

The household expense will be much the same, and the charges collection of 10,000 pagodas per annum, will be nearly as great, as of 20,000 pagodas. It will be found that great zemindars thrive more, make greater proportionate improvements, and pay more regularly, than small mootakdars. If therefore we must have zemindars, I should wish them to have a very large tract of country. Again, the division of the qualities or attributes of property,—the proprietary right, as it is called, with one man,—the occupancy, as it is called, with another man, is bad, and depreciates its value.—A field, the full absolute property of one individual, would, I should think, have a greater intrinsic value than the aggregate qualities of occupancy and proprietary would have, if divided between two individuals; therefore, would be a greater security for its land-tax; but, à fortiori, would it be better security than where the proprietary right, as it is called, was only saleable?—at all events, full absolute property in one man, is what produces improvement and attachment.

Again, as zemindary right and occupancy right go on dividing, from the effect of the Hindoo law, and other causes; what a variety of tenures, estates, and occupancy rights, there will be! what difficulties and irregularities attend the sub-division,—how much the security of the revenue will depend, on an accurate apportionment of jumma to estates! If the zemindars thrive, this sub-division will go on frequently, and this alone will give nearly as much trouble of detail, as a ryotwar settlement; but the sub-division, or union, of ryotwar estates, would be done at once, by line and measure, and by entering the transfer in the register. Besides, zemindars have often failed, and therefore it is likely that they will fail again: in this case, the estate must be sold; but what difficulty will the new purchaser find in managing the estate, when opposed by the interest of the ejected proprietor!

2. The detail of ryotwar would overwhelm the government officers.—The detail must be carried on by somebody; the question is, therefore, whether it had better be carried on by collectors, or zemindars. The detail will not be very complicated, after the rents have been permanently fixed. The making of the jumma bundy, is the grand source of fraud and trouble and difficulty: when that is done, the collection will go on of itself. The ryot, if moderately assessed, will in a few years grow rich, and pay regularly; if not, their lands will be sold. There is no great detail difficulty in this. There should be general rules in each district for letting out waste, according to the mode of cultivation, the soil, and if their rates were too favourable, it would not signify, and it would be easy to make rules that need not be altered; and as the ryots got rich, they would take waste; the establishment which this detail would require, might be paid by a deduction from the remission; so might any commission which it might be found expedient to be given to the collector. It may be necessary to ascertain exactly, what establishment is necessary to carry on this detail. I would have tehsildars to every 50,000 pagodas; but a sketch of a district should be made out separate, showing the whole system, the court establishment, the collector's establishment, the duties of each, &c.

3. The fear of indolent, corrupt, or incapable collectors.—This is much the same as the other objection, about the detail; but there is no greater chance of their being bad collectors than bad zemindars; and if they are rather weak men, I do not see any very great harm that will ensue. I do not see that it will require any wonderful share of genius, integrity or activity, to sell lands by auction, for arrears, and to collect rent already fixed, and to give waste at certain rents: wherever this is fixed, detail does not much signify, because it is only the business of a few additional writers. The detail of a large army, is in this way; and the pay and concern of each individual is an army of 100,000 men, is easily known and arranged, so that a mistake hardly ever happens; yet it is generally some clerk, and keeps all these things right. As for waste, the ryots will take it as they get rich and advanced, just as soon under the circar as under a zemindar. As for tank watercourses, and all grand works of that kind, the collector must inspect and superintend them; at any rate, the village people and tehsildars will take care of the small tanks. What then requires such extraordinary talent or virtue? But every thing depends on men, every where, in every line—a bad zemindar would do as much harm, as a bad collector.

4. The indulgence which the zemindars would show to the ryot, in times of distress.—This is an uncertain good, because it depends on the goodness of an individual. If the assessment is moderate, there will be no need for such indulgences; besides, if occupancy is admitted, it will be the zemindar's interest not to assist, but to rain the ryot, that he may eject him from his right of occupancy, and put in some one else, on a raised rent: this will often be his interest, as the country thrives, and labour gets cheap.

Besides, it is likely that giving the remission to the ryot, and making him the full absolute proprietor, would put him on such a footing, that he would not want such indulgence. If it is good that zemindars should indulge their ryots, it is still better that government, should at once put the ryot on such a footing, that they need not require it. If the land is rendered saleable property, the ryot will not want such indulgence, unless he be an idle fellow; when his land will be sold to a more industrious man, who has saved enough to buy it.

5. The fear of remissions becoming necessary.—I have a strong belief, as far as I am able to tell, that there is no greater danger of failures and balances in ryotwarry than in zemindary. If, indeed, the country is depopulated by a famine or hostile army, some remission must be made, in proportion to the loss—even all the revenue may be lost. However, the same reason is on, it would be necessary to make to zemindars; however, if after making the lands saleable, and giving up the per-centage, any doubt should still remain respecting the security of the land-tax, a zinger zamin, or several and joint security, may be entered into with the ryots of villages, who may be made responsible for each other, villages for villages, pergunnahs for pergunnahs. This system is termed unjust, and may be thought too complicated for permanency. Respecting the justice of it; if it is absolutely necessary to establish it, in order that the ryots may have the enjoyment of the benefits proposed to be given to them, it is done for their sake, and they ought not to complain, nor would they, when they understood it. It is no hardship to make a man give security, and let him out of prison. In respect to the policy of the zinger zamin, it makes the bulk of the people interested in the skill, exertion, and economy of each individual. They will assist him, to prevent his failing, and to avoid being called on to fulfil their security. If he does fail, they take care that there are no tricks, that his property be discovered, and sold to the best advantage; and they will generally prevent the necessity of an assessment to make up his deficiency. If, however, he has no property, and their ingenuity can discover nothing, and hit on no means of settling the demand without an assessment is laid on fairly, that there are no tricks, and no unequal imposition. But I think that the assessment to make up deficiencies, would hardly ever take place, and I fancy seldom does now. Shame, and fear of being a burthen on his neighbours, make him economise and exert himself. The quick-sightedness of his neighbours, make his pretended losses easily seen through; and if, after all, real loss should have happened, to prevent his paying, his securities will lend him the money, rather than that the sub-assessment of his deficiency, should be actually levied. This would certainly prevent the necessity of remitting, in common cases. In case of drought, invasion, and plague, and such public calamities, Nero and Nader Shaw used to grant remissions. It is practised in all countries; and we must grant remissions.

6. The interest which zemindars would have, in promoting improvement.—This may be supposed to involve the question,—whether small farms or great estates are best. I believe that it is said by authors, that agriculture has been improved and extended in Europe, since cottagers and small farmers were done away; and perhaps those noble times, when every rood of ground maintained its man, have been too highly celebrated. One skilful farmer perhaps, with good tools and cattle, and half a dozen labourers, could do more than a swarm of cottagers on a highland estate. But there is a great difference in agriculture here, and there,—in the husbandmen here, and husbandmen there. We find a set of men here, occupying the land, who have carried agriculture to the requisite degree of improvement, and who could not well be turned out, even if the zemindar had the power; but if occupancy is admitted, it would not be in his power to turn out the occupants, and let his fields to a speculative farmer, who might, by superior skill, industry, or tools, raise more produce: for these causes, the zemindar must go on in the old way, with the ryots; and the improvement of the lands now held by them, will depend upon themselves, not on the zemindar. Besides, improvements in lands now under cultivation, can only arise from the superior management of the occupant, from their setting all their people to work, grubbing up roots, weeding, &c. and performing all those operations of the land, with the greatest care; and I do not see how the zemindar can improve the lands now occupied. The occupants can and will improve their lands to the highest pitch of cultivation; they will manure, dig wells, and carry on smaller improvements themselves, as well as with the aid of a zemindar. Great improvements (if any are made) must take place, in the waste lands; and when the people get rich, and adventurers, government may give up as much waste as may be asked, to any man who has stock and inclination to employ himself in improvements; and waste given up in this way, would constitute a real estate.

In some cases, indeed, a zemindar would seem a very useful man, where three or four villages are watered from one tank or watercourse; a zemindar who had the whole under him, might keep up, improve, or enlarge the water-works, might distribute the flow of water, and carry it where it would produce the greatest advantage, and would take on himself, the trouble and care which such a concern must occasion to the supervisor; he might strike out great improvements, and convert the country into a garden. This is certainly a great advantage in the zemindary system, and almost makes me approve of it. However, in this case, to reap the full benefit of the extended estates, the zemindar ought perhaps to be a landlord, in the full extent of the term; he ought to have power to do what he pleased, unbarrased by any supposed rights of his tenantry, and he ought to be an enlightened, scientific, enterprising landlord, not such as usually become the zemindars. If the ryots are to have their occupancy, and the zemindar to be merely an hereditary tehsildar, I do not see any scope for improvement, farther than what the ryots may themselves execute; but after all, I must confess that I see great advantage in having villages watered by one tank or watercourse, placed under the superintendence of one zemindar. In dry lands and well lands, the ryots may carry on cultivation to the highest pitch of improvement themselves; but uniting all the lands watered by one channel or tank, under one zemindar, has certainly advantages which require discussion. After all, the government must superintend all grand works of this kind; and where two or three estates are watered by one channel or tank, there will be disputes, which will prevent, instead of encouraging improvement; and if zemindaries are constituted, such divisions will take place, and eternal disputes, not to be ever settled in courts of justice, will ensue. This appears to me the only advantage of introducing zemindars,—to arrange, improve, and direct tanks, channels, and the lands watered by them; but whether this advantage is not counterbalanced by the other disadvantages of zemindars; and whether whether the nature of the people likely to become zemindars, the subdivision of estates, and the abuses that will take place under zemindaries, may not obstruct these advantages, is very doubtful. On the whole, it seems to me that improvement must take place in waste, if any where, that is, grand improvements; that it will take place under a ryotwar system, as fast as it can, when the stock and spirit of the country enables the people to make improvements. I hardly think that any of the new zemindars have or will apply other capital, which before was employed in different ways, to the improvement of the lands. Improvement must, I should conceive, arise from the stock and spirit of the cultivating inhabitants.

7. The difficulty and detail attending tuccavie and tank repairs.—Respecting tuccavie, it may seem inconsistent with permanency, to issue tuccavie; however, I do not see any objection to continue these indulgences, for a few years. It has hitherto been allowed; and the same people who have hitherto issued it, and collected it again, will be able to carry on the details respecting it for a few years, if it be found absolutely necessary. It seems to me the details respecting it for the purpose of replacing and repairing the loss of this impossible to make a remission for the purpose of replacing and repairing the loss of this advantage equally, and accurately; because the remission must be general, must be made to all, on the same principles, whereas only a few ryots in a district, require tuccavie; for instance, one ryot pays 10 pagodas on a surveyed land, and wants tuccavie; another ryot pays 10 pagodas on a surveyed land, does not want tuccavie. In this instance, a remission to both, in lieu of tuccavie, would be an indulgence to the man that wanted, but a very great indulgence to the man, that did not want it.

The necessity of advancing tuccavie, arises from the poverty of the people, and their want of credit, from having no property;—remove the cause, and the effect ceases,—give up the remissions to the ryots, and make their lands, saleable property, and they could always borrow on them, and will not require tuccavie until the lands are saleable. Tuccavie may sometimes be useful, and may be given for a short time,—however, there are great abuses, and but few benefits, from the issues of tuccavie. Tessildars, ryots and all, are fond of getting tuccavie, because they all like to get hold of a little ready money; but I suspect that very little is applied to cultivation. It goes to pay debts, to loans to others, sometimes; and most commonly, to pay the last kista. I do not believe that more than three per cent. of the jumma is issued, where, in poor countries, and a little property on which to borrow, would soon enable the poorest ryot to do without tuccavie; until then, what objection to the issue of tuccavie? even if the poorer ryots are obliged to act as labourers, in consequence of a want of the assistance of tuccavie, no great harm will arise. The rent being low, all the seed, bullocks, and hands that the country possesses, will some way or other, be brought into play. I suppose that the survey is in progress, that the just rent of each field will be ascertained under the orders now in force, and that the warum has been converted into money rent; all this being, I should think, the first step to improvement under any system. I have now, according to your lordship's orders, written all the thoughts which occurred to me about Permanent Settlements; and only hope to have an opportunity of getting such knowledge as shall enable me to ascertain and fix my own judgment, whether ryotwarry or zemindary, be best.

I am, my Lord,

Your Lordship's most obedient and faithful Servant,
W. THACKERAY.

The President delivers the following Minute:

I HAVE the honour to lay before the board, a paper drawn out by Mr. Thackeray, under my own inspection, containing some of the principal objections to the settlement of the lands in perpetuity, according to the present system; as well as a refutation of the arguments which may be adduced, against the plan of making permanent the ryotwar settlement.

The more I consider this important question, the stronger my conviction is, that the present system, is not the best which might be adopted. I am satisfied that the creation of zemindars is a measure, incompatible with the true interests of the government, and of the community at large. When I differ in opinion with persons of the greatest experience and ability, I do so, with feelings of great diffidence, but without reluctance to pursue the dictates of my own judgment. I am not at all at variance with the principles of the permanent settlement, which I admire, and which I believe to be applicable to this, and to every part of the world. The principle of that settlement, was a limitation of the demands of the Circar. I venture to differ only, as to the detail operations of the system, which has been founded on these principles. So little do I differ with the original founders of it, that I fully concur in the application of the system, to the existing circumstances of Bengal. I regret that such circumstances, did require such an arrangement: but I feel that they could not have been set aside without a great violation of justice. Here, the same circumstances do not exist, and therefore the same objections do not occur to a departure from the same rules. I however do not wish at present, to enter into the discussion. I am anxious previously to be in possession of every possible objection and difficulty that can be offered, to the plan proposed to be substituted for the present system. I wish to have the opportunity of ascertaining upon the spot, the truth of my own ideas, and the reality of the objections suggested by others. It is with this view, and for the purpose of provoking discussion, that the paper now presented has been drawn up.

It is my wish that this document should be transmitted to the Board of Revenue, with the request and directions of government, that each member may record his individual sentiments upon the opinions which it contains. I wish the subject to be thoroughly considered, in all its views. I have no object in view, but truth and the public good; my imagination and judgment judgment may be deceived, but I fancy, and am fully persuaded, that the happiness of millions depends upon the decision of this question. (Signed) W. BENTINCK.

Fort St. George, 29th April 1806.

The Board concurring in the recommendation of the President, it is Resolved, that a letter, conformable to the following draft, be dispatched to the Board of Revenue:

To the President, &c. Members of the Board of Revenue.

Gentlemen,

Para. 1. I am directed by the Right honourable the Governor in Council, to transmit to you the enclosed copy of a paper on the settlement of the revenues in perpetuity, containing the principal objections to the establishment of large zemindaries, and arguments in favour of making the ryotwar system permanent.

2. The Governor in Council considers the decision of this question to be of the utmost importance; and is therefore desirous that it should receive the amplest discussion. His Lordship in Council has accordingly directed me to communicate his Lordship's desire, that each member of the board will state his individual sentiments upon the opinions, which the enclosed paper contains.

EXTRACT Fort St. George Revenue Consultations, the 28th November 1806.

THE Right honourable the President records the following Minute:

The state of public affairs will necessarily oblige me to relinquish the intention of visiting some of the distant provinces. I regret this necessity, both as it prevents me from benefiting by that best of information, which is obtained by personal communication with the local authorities, and also, from the belief that the occasional presence of persons in authority, is calculated to have a salutary influence over the conduct of subordinate officers. I feel this disappointment the more particularly upon the present occasion, when the object in view was, the satisfaction of my mind upon a point of great national importance,—the best system for a permanent settlement of the revenues.

Though prevented from undertaking in person, the investigation I had proposed, I trust the Board will concur in the request I am about to submit; the object of which is, to enable me to obtain the information required through a different and perhaps a more efficient channel. I have to recommend that Mr. Thackeray be deputed for this purpose.

The route I had proposed for myself, was Malabar, the Ceded Districts, and Canara. The latter province was to form the first object of investigation. From the first transfer of Canara to the British authority, it has continued a solitary example, I believe, of tranquillity; of an easy and regular realization of the revenue, and of general prosperity. The causes of such happy effects, are, in my opinion, to be found in the tenure of landed property, peculiar to that province; and in the moderation with which the rights of the circar to a proportion of the land revenue, have been exercised. The local situation of Canara is no doubt favourable to the advantageous disposal of its produce, and a strong secondary cause of its state of agricultural improvement. But the two first circumstances I conceive to be the primary causes of the prosperity of Canara. These causes, appear to me to contain the certain principles of prosperity, wherever they may be introduced.

I had been very early impressed with the great advantages of the ryotwar settlement, as an annual settlement. Those advantages, consisted in the equal distribution and the defined amount of the land tax, and upon the security afforded the poor against extra assessments from head inhabitants. Every man knew his exact obligations to the Circar, and was assured of the quiet enjoyment of the surplus produce of his labour. Hence arose, the true encouragement to industry; and from this principle has flowed increased cultivation; and, contrasted with former times, the easy realization of the public revenue.

From an attentive consideration of these effects, it appeared to me, that if an annual settlement with the ryots, founded upon fixed principles, the essential part of which, was to secure to the ryot, for a year, the fruits of his industry, had actually been productive of such decided advantages; a permanent settlement, founded upon the same principles, but carried to a greater extent in regard to the benefit of the ryot, would produce the same effects, in an increased ratio. It is not my intention at present to argue these positions; but to pre-empt the progress of my own ideas upon this particular question. I had been struck with this opinion, before I became acquainted with the exact nature of the tenures of land in Canara; with the average extent of separate estates; and with the rate of the circar assessment. When these circumstances were made known to me, I was astonished with the close resemblance between the actual state of property in Canara, and the proposed permanency of the ryotwar settlement. Among other peculiarities, the greater part of the estates, though fully assessed, pay less than ten pagodas per annum to the circar. I shall not enter into further details; I shall only state my satisfaction in finding theory reduced to practice, and speculation proved by the test of the most successful experiments. Canara thus became the great land-mark by which I hoped to trace out those principles and regulations which might be applicable to the unsettled districts, where permanent tenures are to be introduced. I have reason to believe, though I cannot speak with any positive certainty, that the same tenures as in Canara, existed originally throughout every part of the peninsula. In other parts of the boundaries, individual rights have been trodden down by the oppression and avarice of despotic authority; but still there exists, almost in every village, the distinction of merassee inhabitants, or hereditary cultivators; now the hereditary right to cultivate certain lands, and to reap the benefit of that cultivation, seems to be nearly one and the same thing, with the right in the land, called property.

Between

Lord W. Bentinck's
Minute, dated 25 Nov.

Between man and man, these rights have an equal value and security. But before the sovereign, who assesses and taxes at will; neither one or the other right is good for much. To what circumstance Canara may owe the preservation of its original tenures, handed down through many ages, I cannot at present say; but that they still exist, is certain; and it therefore naturally became a primary object of enquiry, how far these permanent tenures in Canara, have been conducive to the prosperity of the country; how far the existing conditions of property, may afford the means of ascertaining and restoring elsewhere, the original constitution of landed property; and how far the same constitution, if not originally belonging to other parts of India, may be suitable to the unsettled provinces.

From Canara, I proposed to have gone to Malabar, no less remarkable for its landed tenures, and more so, from the peculiar customs of its inhabitants. This province cannot be held out, as an example of tranquillity or happiness; but I have always been of opinion, that under a just administration of its affairs, order and content would be permanently restored. As far as we have had an opportunity of judging, these expected effects have been realized. Independent of the curiosity excited, in the arrangement of a system of permanency, a personal communication with the public servants, all strangers to this government, was anxiously wished for by me. I hoped to have derived much knowledge of the state of affairs, from the various sources of information to be found upon the spot; and to have enabled myself to decide hereafter more easily, between the various and contradictory opinions that have contributed so much to the change of Malabar affairs.

The information and advice of Lieutenant Colonel Munro, was considered by me to be essential and indispensable to the trial and ultimate adoption of any opinion, which the result of all my enquiries might have led me to form.

I would recommend, therefore that Mr. Thackeray be directed to follow the same route; and that instructions, according to the following general purport, be given to him.

First, To ascertain the present state of the country; the sources of revenue, especially land revenue; the principle on which the assessment on the lands is formed; the quantum of produce payable by the landholders; the security taken for the due collection, and the mode of collecting the land revenue; the nature of landed tenures; the right of the landholders; the state of agriculture; the state of the police, and of the administration of justice, as far as it affects revenue; the defects of the present revenue management; the state of commerce, as it affects revenue; the control which the government and board of revenue possess over their officers; the condition, opinions, and wants of the ryot; the present state of the country, in respect to the comfort of the people; authority of government, and amount of revenue, compared with other times and governments.

Secondly, These enquiries should produce an opinion on the best mode of administering the revenues in future, especially of introducing the permanent settlement: this opinion must be stated, with every opinion for, and objection to, particular systems.

That Mr. Thackeray be directed to discuss fully every part of this subject, with the collectors and revenue servants; to have free communication with the people: and when it may appear expedient, to enter into an investigation of village accounts.

Mr. Thackeray will consider himself under the orders of the government, and will correspond with government, through the Governor immediately. Mr. Thackeray, as a member of the Board of Revenue, will communicate to his colleagues such information as it may be important to them to receive, and will attend to such suggestions as he may receive from the Revenue Board.

I recommend that he may be permitted to draw the tent allowances, at the same rate as collectors; and to entertain such establishment of native servants, as the object of his enquiry may render necessary.

It will be necessary that a copy of his instructions may be sent to every collector and magistrate; and that they may be required to pay the greatest attention to his suggestions; and to assist him, by every means in their power, in the execution of these orders.

(Signed) W. BENTINCK.
Fort St. George, 25 November 1806.

Mr. PETRIE records the following Minute:

I beg leave to record my entire approbation of the motives and intentions of the Right Honourable the President, in recommending the enquiry so fully explained in his Lordship's Minute; and also my concurrence in the favourable opinion entertained by the Right Honourable the President, of the merits and attainments of Mr. Thackeray.

With those sentiments, it is with much regret that I add my conviction, that the talents of any one individual, however great his abilities, will be found inadequate to embrace all the points of an investigation, which is intended to comprehend every subject of importance, in the interior administration of government.

The Board concurring with the Right Honourable the President, in the recommendation contained in his Minute above recorded, the following letters are ordered to be copied and dispatched to Mr. W. Thackeray, and to the Board of Revenue.

To W. THACKERAY, Esq.

Sir,
CIRCUMSTANCES having rendered it necessary for the Right Honourable the Governor to relinquish his intention of personally inspecting the state of the provinces under this Presidency, his Lordship in Council has judged it expedient to entrust to an individual, whose experience and acquirements appear to qualify him for the task, the investigation of those points, connected with the internal administration of the provinces, on which his Lordship in Council has deemed correct information to be particularly desirable, with a view to the ultimate ultimate establishment in permanency of that system which may be decidedly best calculated to promote the prosperity of the country.

2. The Governor in Council has been pleased to select you for this duty; and I am directed to acquaint you, that it is the intention of his Lordship in Council, that you shall proceed, in the first instance, to the province of Canara; and having completed the enquiry entrusted to you in that province, you will prosecute similar researches in the neighbouring province of Malabar; from whence you will visit the Ceded Districts, for the purpose of perfecting your investigation.

3. The objects of your research in these provinces, will be,—to ascertain the present state of each province; the sources of its revenues, especially the land revenue; the principle on which the assessment on the lands is formed; the quantum of produce payable by the landholders; the security taken for the due collection; and the mode of collecting the land revenue; the nature of landed tenures; the right of landholders; the state of agriculture; the state of the police, and of the administration of justice, as far as it affects the revenue; the defects (if any) of the present revenue management; the state of commerce, as it affects the revenue; the controul which the government and the Board of Revenue possess over their officers; the condition, opinions, and wants of the ryot; the present state of the country, in respect to the comfort of the people; the authority of government; and amount and security of the revenue, compared with other times and governments.

4. To the result of these enquiries, you will add your opinion on the best mode of administering the revenues in future, and on the mode of introducing the permanent settlement in particular; and you will accompany your opinion with every argument which may be stated in favour of, or in objection to, particular systems.

5. You will discuss fully every part of this subject with the local revenue servants; and you will communicate freely with the people; and where it may appear expedient, you will enter into an investigation of village accounts.

6. You will consider yourself under the immediate orders of government; and your correspondence with them will be conducted through the channel of the Governor; but you will communicate to the Board of Revenue such information as may appear to you, in the progress of your deputation, important for them to know; and you will attend to such suggestions as you may receive from them.

7. You are authorized to draw the same rate of tent-allowance during your deputation, as is received by collectors; and to entertain such establishment of native servants, as the objects of your enquiry may render necessary.

8. The objects of your investigation have been communicated to the several magistrates and collectors in the provinces included in your prescribed tour, with instructions to pay strict attention to your suggestions, and to assist you, by every means in their power, in the execution of the duties confided to you.

I have the honour to be, Sir,

Your most obedient humble servant,

Secretary to Government.

Fort St. George,
29th November 1806.

MEMOIR of Mr. HODGSON, on the ADVANTAGES of a PERMANENT ZEMINDARRY SETTLEMENT, 1806.

PART FIRST:

Being an examination of the relative Rights of Zemindar and Ryot; and of the Law, as it relates to those Rights.

Mr. Hodgson's Memoir.

Para. 1. THE question which I have been desired to discuss, is,—“What are the objections to a ryotwar permanent settlement? This subject is of much importance, and the consideration of it, appears to embrace the further question of,—What has led to the opinion, that a change is expedient in the system hitherto followed, in settling permanently the revenues of this presidency? It must be presumed, either that experience has shown that one system has defects, from which the other, is free; or, that superior advantages have been demonstrated to exist, in that proposed to be established. What are the supposed defects of the one system, and what the supposed advantages of the other, will therefore be here investigated.

2. Previously to entering on the question immediately under consideration, a few preliminary observations will be stated, in the hope that they will facilitate the investigation.

3. Two descriptions of persons appear to be immediately connected with the subject.
The first is the zemindar: the second, the ryot. With the former, I must be permitted to class all persons receiving the rent of government from the ryots, and paying it to government, whether placed in that situation by inheritance, by purchase, or by gift.
With the latter,* all persons cultivating land, whether by their own labour, or by means of hired servants or of slaves; all talookdars, shotrimdars, and jageerdars of one or more entire villages, may, without great impropriety, be classed in the first description: and all enamdars and occupiers of small portions of land, in the latter. By this arrangement, the subject is simplified, and transition may be permitted to an examination of the relative situation

* Bramins, and the richer part of the ryots, merely superintend the cultivation of their land. Persons of this description, if my information be correct, have been created and called zemindars, in Bengal, as also the poorer sort of ryots, and even artificers paying quit-rent. The want of a distinction between such opposite extremes, as a zemindar paying three lacs of rupees jumma, and a zemindar paying a jumma of less than the eighth of a rupee, will, I think, be admitted.

situation of these two descriptions of persons. Their relative rights need not here have names assigned them; it would lead to an unnecessary discussion of the terms “proprietary,” “right,” “incumbent right,” “and right of occupancy,” in the length and intricacy of which, the sight would be lost, of the question under examination. It is not very material, what name the rights of each party bears, provided the extent and value of their relative rights be explained, and be proved to be defined. But that an explanation is necessary, will be admitted, when it has been stated, and the opinion has been recently supported (A), that “if the zemindars are “restricted from raising the assessment fixed by government, and at the same time liable “to all losses, they have not the free management of their estates, and hardly deserve the “name of owners (B).” Colonel Munro having drawn a conclusion from this supposition, unfavourable to the permanent system as now established, and much of his argument, in support of a ryotwar settlement, appearing to arise, out of the supposed power vested in a zemindar to raise his rents, and oust the ryots; I shall proceed to show that the supposition is contrary to the declared and recognized principles of the permanent settlement, and at variance with the existing law.

4. It will be assumed here, that the revenue economy of all Hindoostan is the same.
The assumption is justified by the detailed information contained in the Minutes of Sir John Shore,—the work called the Husbandry of Bengal; and the following extract from the letter of the Governor General in Council, of the 19th July 1804, para. 10:—“According to “the ancient usages * of India, the government is entitled to a share of the produce of the “lands. The share varies in its proportion, and may be levied in money or kind, ac“cording to local custom; and the government is entitled to realize its share of the produce, “through the agency of its officers, from the immediate cultivator of the soil; or to farm
“it for a sum of money annually, or for a term of years; or in perpetuity to the zemindar;
“or other description of landholder; or where there are no landholders, or where land“holders in possession, will not agree to pay the sum, which it may deem adequate to “the value of its share of the produce, to any person whatever.”

5. Having justified the assumption of the foregoing position, I may now be permitted to bring under observation, all that passed on the conclusion drawn by Colonel Munro.
If the quotations which it is necessary to introduce, should render the paper voluminous, it will be excused, under the necessity which appears to exist, that all that is brought forward, should be attentively considered. The long discussions which the subject, now revived, has undergone at various times, may not have been read by all who are interested in the question, or may have been obliterated from the memory of others. The subject is of that importance, that assertions should not be admitted as argument; and arguments, however specious or plausible, if not supported by facts, should not be looked upon, as conclusive.

6. Sir John Shore, in his Minute of 21st December 1789, stated, para. 13, That “the “necessity of some interposition between the zemindars and their tenants, is absolute;
“and government interferes, by establishing regulations for the conduct of the zemindars, “which they are to execute, and by delegating authority to the collectors, to enforce the “execution: if the assessment of the zemindaries were unalterably fixed, and the pro“prietors were left to make their own arrangements with the ryots, without any re“strictions, injunctions or limitations, which indeed is a result of the fundamental prin“ciple, the present confusion would never be adjusted.”

“This interference, though so much modified, is in fact an invasion of proprietary right, “and an assumption of the character of landlord, which belongs to the zemindar; for it is “equally a contradiction in terms, to say that the property in the soil is vested in the ze“mindar, and that we have a right to regulate the terms, by which he is to let his lands, as “it is to connect that avowal, with discretionary and arbitrary terms. If the land is the ze-“mindar's, it will only be partially, his property, whilst we prescribe the quantum he is to “collect, or the mode by which the adjustment of it, is to take place between the parties “concerned.”

7. The reasoning of Colonel Munro being the same as that of Sir John Shore, the arguments of Marquis Cornwallis, in refutation of Sir John Shore's opinion, will apply with equal weight, to those of Colonel Munro,—they are as follows:

“I agree with Mr. Shore, that some interference on the part of government, is undoubtedly “necessary for effecting an adjustment of the demands of the zemindars upon the ryots; nor “do I conceive that the former, will take alarm at the reservation of this right of interference;
“when convinced that government can have no interest in exercising it, but for the purposes “of public justice. Were the government itself to be a party in the cause, they might have “some grounds for apprehending the result of its decisions.
“Mr. Shore observes, that this interference is inconsistent with proprietary right; that it “is an encroachment upon it, to prohibit a landlord from imposing taxes upon his tenant; for “it is saying to him, that he shall not raise the rents of his estates; and that if the land
“is the zemindar's, it will only be partially his property, whilst we prescribe the quantum “which he is to collect, or the mode by which the adjustment is to take place between the “parties concerned.

“If Mr. Shore means, that after having declared the zemindar proprietor of the soil, in “order to be consistent, we have no right to prevent his imposing new abwaubs or taxes on “the

"the lands in cultivation, I must differ with him in opinion. Unless we suppose the ryots to be the absolute slaves of the zemindars, every begah of land possessed by them, must have been cultivated, under an express or implied agreement, that a certain sum should be paid for each begah of produce, and no more. Every abwaub or tax imposed by the zemindar, over and above that sum, is not only a breach of that agreement, but a direct violation of the established laws of the country. The cultivator, therefore, has in such a case, an undoubted right to apply to government for the protection of his property, and government is at all times bound, to afford him redress. I do not hesitate, therefore, to give it as my opinion, that the zemindars neither now, nor ever could, possess a right to impose taxes or abwaubs upon the ryots; and if, from the confusion which prevailed towards the close of the Mogul government, or neglect, or want of information, since we have had possession of the country, new taxes have been imposed by the zemindars or farmers, that government has an undoubted right to abolish such as are oppressive, and have never been confirmed by a competent authority; and to establish such regulations, as may prevent the practice of like abuses, in future.

"Neither is the privilege, which the ryots in many parts of Bengal enjoy, of holding possession of the spots of land which they cultivate, so long as they pay the revenue assessed upon them, by any means incompatible with the proprietary rights of the zemindar. Who, in most places, is fully equal to what the cultivator can afford to pay. To permit him to dispossess one cultivator, for the sole purpose of giving the land to another, would be vesting him with a power to commit a wanton act of oppression, from which he could derive no benefit. The practice that prevailed during the Mogul government, of uniting many districts into one zemindary, and thereby subjecting a large body of people to the control of one principal zemindar, rendered some restrictions of this nature, absolutely necessary. The zemindar, however, may sell the land, and the cultivators must pay the rent to the purchaser.

"Neither is prohibiting the landholder to impose new abwaubs or taxes on the lands in cultivation, tantamount to saying to him, that he shall not raise the rents of his estate. The rents of an estate, are not to be raised by the imposition of new abwaubs or taxes on every begah of land in cultivation; on the contrary, they will in the end be lowered, by such impositions; for when the rate of assessment becomes so oppressive as not to leave the ryot a sufficient share of the produce for the maintenance of his family, and the expenses of cultivation, he must at length desert the land. No zemindar claims a right to impose new taxes on the land in cultivation, although it is obvious that they have clandestinely levied them, when pressed to answer demands upon themselves; and that these taxes have, from various causes, been perpetuated to the ultimate detriment of the proprietors who imposed them.

"The rents of an estate can only be raised, by inducing the ryots to cultivate the more valuable articles of produce, and to clear the extensive tracts of waste land, which are to be found in almost every zemindary in Bengal. It requires no local knowledge of the revenues of this country, to decide whether fixing the assessment, or leaving it liable to future increase, at the discretion of government or its officers, will afford the greatest encouragement to the landholder to have recourse to these means, for the improvement of his estate."

8. The foregoing were the sentiments of Marquis Cornwallis; and the following is the law of Bengal:

BENGAL CODE.

EXTRACT from Regulation VII. A. D. 1793, for re-enacting, with modifications and amendments, the rules for the Decennial Settlements of the public revenue payable from the lands of the Zemindars, independent Talookdars, and other actual Proprietors of land in Bengal, Behar, and Orissa.

"LII.—The zemindar or other actual proprietor of land, is to let the remaining lands of his zemindary or estate, under the prescribed restriction, in whatever manner he may think proper; but every engagement contracted with under-farmers, shall be specific as to the amount and conditions of it; and all sums received by any actual proprietor of land, or any farmer of land, of whatever description, over and above what is specified in the engagements of the persons paying the same, shall be considered as extorted, and be repaid with a penalty of double the amount. The restrictions prescribed, and referred to in this section, are the following:

"LIII.—No person contracting with a zemindar, independent talookdar, or other actual proprietor, or employed by him in the management of the collections, shall be authorized to take charge of the lands or collections, without an asmilnamah, or written commission, signed by such zemindar, independent talookdar, or other actual proprietor.

"LIV.—The impositions upon the ryots, under the denomination of abwaub, mahatoot, and other appellations, from their number and uncertainty, having become intricate to adjust, and a source of oppression to the ryots, all proprietors of land and dependent talookdars shall revise the same in concert with the ryots, and consolidate the whole of the asset into one specific sum. In large zemindaries or estates, the proprietors are to commence this simplification of the rents of their ryots, in the pergunnah where the impositions are most numerous, and to proceed in it gradually, till completed, but so, that it be effected for the whole of the lands by the end of the Bengal year 1198, in the Bengal districts; and of the Fussely and Wellaity year 1198, in the Behar and Orissa districts: these being the periods fixed for the delivery of pottahs, as hereafter specified.

LV.—No

"LV.—No actual proprietor of land, or dependent talookdar, or farmer of land, of whatever description, shall impose any new abwaub or mahatoot upon the ryots, under any pretence whatever. Every exaction of this nature, shall be punished by a penalty equal to three times the amount imposed; and if at any future period, it be discovered that new abwaubs or mahatoots have been imposed, the person imposing the same, shall be liable to this penalty for the entire period of such imposition."

"LVI.—It is expected that in time the proprietor of land, and the ryot, will find it for their mutual advantage to enter into agreements, in every instance, for a specific sum, for a certain quantity of land, leaving to the option of the latter to cultivate whatever species of produce may appear to them likely to yield the largest profit: where, however, it is the established custom to vary the pottah for lands according to the articles produced thereon, and while the actual proprietors of land, dependent talookdars, or farmers of land, and ryots in such places, shall prefer an adherence to this custom, the engagements entered into between them, are to specify the quantity of land, species of produce, rate of rent, and amount thereof, with the term of the lease, and a stipulation that in the event of the species of produce being changed, a new engagement shall be executed for the remaining term of the lease, or for a longer period, if agreed on; and in the event of any new species being cultivated, a new engagement, with the like specification and clause, is to be executed accordingly.

LVII. (First).—The rents to be paid by the ryots, by whatever rule or custom they may be regulated, shall be specifically stated in the pottah; which, in every possible case, shall contain the exact sum to be paid by them.

LVII. (Second).—In cases where the rate only, can be specified, such as where the rents are adjusted upon a measurement of the lands after cultivation, or on a survey of the crop, or where they are made payable in kind, the rate and terms of payment, and proportion of the crop to be delivered, with every condition, shall be clearly specified."

BENARES LOCAL.

EXTRACT from Regulation LI. A. D. 1795, entitled, a Regulation respecting Ryotty Pottahs; and being, as the preamble states,—“To prevent undue demands being made on the Ryots, or Cultivators of the Soil, by the Aumils, Zemindars, Farmers, or others entitled to levy from them the Hakmee, or government proportion of the produce.”

Sect. IX. “If a dispute shall arise between the ryots, and the persons from whom they may be entitled to demand pottahs, regarding the rates of the pottahs (whether the rent be payable in money or kind) it shall be determined in the dewanee adawlut of the city or zillah, in the jurisdiction of which the lands may be situated, according to the rules established in the pergunnah, or tuppah, or talooka, for lands of the same description and quality, and for the same cast of cultivators, as those respecting which the dispute may arise.

X. “The rules in the preceding Section, are to be considered applicable not only to the pottahs, which the ryots are entitled to demand in the first instance, but also to the renewal of pottahs, which may expire or become cancelled; and it is declared that no proprietor or farmer of land, nor any other person, shall require ryots, whose pottahs may expire or become cancelled, to take out new pottahs at higher rates than the established rates of the pergunnah for lands of the same quality and description, due consideration being had, as far as may be required by the custom of the district, to the alteration of the species of culture, and the cast of the cultivator. Under this rule khodkasht or Chupperbund ryots, will be entitled to have their pottahs renewed at the established rates, upon making application for that purpose, to the person by whom the pottahs are to be granted, as are also paykasht ryots, provided the proprietor or farmer chooses to permit them to continue to cultivate the land, which they have the option to do or not, as they may think proper, on the expiration of the paykasht leases, whereas khodkasht ryots cannot be dispossessed, as long as they continue to pay the stipulated rent.”

MADRAS CODE.

EXTRACT from Regulation XXX. A. D. 1802, entitled, A Regulation prescribing Pottahs to be used between Landholders, their Under-farmers, Tenants, and Ryots.

Sect. II. “Proprietors and farmers of land shall enter into agreements with the inhabitants and cultivators of land, on the terms on which they respectively occupy such lands; and the contracting parties shall be mutually bound to exchange their agreements in writing; the engagements of the proprietor being denominated pottah, and the engagement of the ryot being denominated inuchelka.

VII. “Proprietors, or farmers of land, shall not levy any new assessment or tax on the ryots, under any name, or under any pretence. Exactions, other than those consolidated in the pottah, or otherwise authorized by the government, shall, upon proof, subject the proprietor or farmer to a penalty equal to three times the amount of each exaction.

VII. “Under-farmers and cultivators of land they may respectively occupy; and farmers of land, pottahs for the descriptions of land may refuse or delay to execute, or cause to be executed, pottahs so demanded, such proprietors or farmers of land shall, after the expiration of six months, calculating from the settlement of the permanent land revenue, on their estates, be liable to prosecution in the courts; and shall, on proof of such refusal or delay, be also liable to pay such damages, as the court shall adjudge to be equal to the trouble and expense incurred by the under-farmers or cultivators, in consequence of such refusal or delay.

IX. "Where disputes may arise respecting rates of assessment in money, or of division in kind, the rates shall be determined, according to the rates prevailing in the cultivated lands in the year preceding the assessment of the permanent jumma on such lands; or where those rates may not be ascertainable, according to the rates established for lands of the same description and quality, as those respecting which the dispute may arise."

g. Having quoted the opinion of the first founders of the permanent system; having stated what the law is, in Bengal, and what it is, on the Coast; the following conclusion will, it is expected, be conceded:

10. That the right granted to a zemindar, does not include the power to demand what rent he pleases from the land under cultivation in his zemindary, because he is not at liberty to impose "new abwabs, or mhatool, or to levy any new tax or assessment;" and that therefore, where a new tax is not permitted to be levied, there must have existed an old and a known tax; and because all the Regulations which have been quoted, contain internal evidence of a right having been confirmed to the ryots, to pay their revenue according to their pottabs; while the law, at the same time, defines how the terms of the pottab shall be regulated, and how accommodated, to local usages and customs.

11. If this conclusion be correct, it may suggest the propriety of attentively considering this part of the subject; and of enquiring whether the ryots of Canara, whether the ryots of proprietors, and a permanent settlement immediately with them has been proposed; whether, I say, those ryots, can claim more, or wish for more. They are by law, confirmed in the possession of their land; the rent of the land is fixed; and no increase can be demanded from them, under any pretext.

12. It is of no moment to the ryot, whether his ancestors acquired their rights, by purchase or by gift; whether the right be, only a prescriptive right, or whether it be, a right lately granted. It is unimportant whether the ryots be called proprietors* or tenants, jeenkars or meerassadars, provided the law has preserved to them what they have always possessed.—A subject in England has only the usufruct, and not the absolute property in the soil; or, as Sir Edward Coke expresses it, he hath "dominium utile, but not dominium directum"; and if the strongest and highest estate that any subject can have in England, "is no more than the usufruct,"—(Blackstone)—the ryot of India may rest contented, with an usufructuary right.

"According to the ideas which prevailed among the natives of India, as we are informed by the first Europeans who visited their country, the sovereign is considered as the sole universal proprietor of all the land in his dominions; and from him, is derived every species of tenure by which his subjects can hold it. These lands, were let out to the farmers who cultivated them, at a stipulated rent, amounting usually to a fourth part of their annual produce, paid in kind. In a country where the price of work is extremely low, and where the labour of cultivation is very inconsiderable, the earth yielding its productions almost spontaneously, where subsistence is amazingly cheap, where few clothes are needed, and houses built and furnished at little expense, this rate cannot be deemed exorbitant or oppressive. As long as the husbandman continued to pay the established rent, he retained possession of the farm, which descended, like property, from father to son. These accounts, given by ancient authors, of the condition and tenure of the renters of land in India, agree so perfectly with what now takes place, that it may be considered almost as a description of the present state of its cultivation. In every part of India, where the native Hindoo princes retain dominion, the ryots, the modern name by which the renters of land are distinguished, hold their possessions by a lease, which may be considered as perpetual, and at a rate fixed by ancient surveys and valuations. This arrangement has been so long established, and accords so well with the ideas of the natives, concerning the distinctions of casts, and the functions allotted to each, that it has been inviolably maintained in all the provinces subject either to Mahomedans or Europeans; and, to both, it serves as the basis on which their whole system of finance is founded. In a more remote period, before the original institutions of India were subverted by foreign invaders, the industry of the husbandman, on which every member of the community depended for subsistence, was as secure as the tenure by which he held his lands was equitable."

13. The collector of the Ceded Districts does not believe take any notice of the numerous poligars in his district, who, according to the declared principles of the permanent system,

* "That there be a separation or distinction of possessions, and that this separation be steady and constant: this is absolutely required by the interests of society, and hence the origin of justice and property.—What possessions are assigned to particular persons; this is, generally speaking, pretty indifferent; and is often determined by very frivolous views and considerations. We shall mention a few particulars.
"Were a society formed among several independent Members, the most obvious rule which could be agreed on, would be to annex property to present possession, and leave every one a right to what he at present enjoys; the relation of possession which takes place between the person and the object, naturally draws on the relation of property.
"For a like reason, occupation, or first possession, becomes the foundation of property.
"Where a man bestows labour and industry upon any object which before belonged to nobody, as in cutting down "or shaping a tree, in cultivating a field, &c. the alterations which he produces, causes a relation between him and the objects, and naturally engages him to annex it to himself, by the new relations of property. This cause, here connected with the public utility, which consists in the encouragement given to industry and labour.

"Perhaps, to, private humanity towards the possessor, concurs, in this instance, with the other motives, and engages to leave with him what he has acquired by his sweat and labour, and what he has bestowed himself with the constant enjoyment of. For though private humanity can by no means be the origin of justice, since the latter virtue so often contradicts the former; yet when the rule of separate and constant possession is once formed by the indispensable necessities of society, private humanity, and the aversion to doing a hardship to another, may, in a particular instance, give rise to a particular rule of property."—Hume's Essays.

tem, would be made zemindars; his proposed settlement would then be wholly ryotwar, to the exclusion of the poligars; if not, it would be only, partially ryotwar.

14. The collector of Tanjore and Trichinopoly proposes a permanent ryotwar settlement of Tanjore, and of a part of Trichinopoly, and contemplates the reinstatement of the poligars of Warriore, Terriore, and Arialore, in the latter district, as zemindars, and on zemindary tenure.

15. It must appear a strange inconsistency, with reference to measures of permanent and uniform government, to deprive the poligars of the Ceded Districts, of that which has been given to those of Tinnevely, Rammad, Dindigul, &c. and to make a permanent settlement given to those of Warriore, Terriore, and Arialore, with the ryots; and at the same moment, to place the ryots of Warriore, Terriore, and Arialore pollams, under zemindars, while the ryots of the neighbouring, and even intermixed villages of those pollams, are to have a permanent settlement concluded with them.

16. Neither Colonel Munro, Mr. Wallace, nor any other person, will argue that the rights of the ryots of one part of Trichinopoly, and of the other part of the Ceded Districts, ought to be different.

17. The situation of the ryots of Malabar and Canara, and their rights, have long been supposed to differ essentially, from those of other ryots in other provinces. Before, however, a permanent system, differing from that established elsewhere, is introduced into either of these provinces; before a particular constitution or law is framed for these provinces; it may be highly expedient to analyse this supposed difference, to enquire how the existing law would affect the rights of the ryots there; and whether the principles of the permanent system, as now established, would, if introduced, infringe any of those rights.

18. I shall here assume, because, if the assumption is doubted, it can be established by the public records, that the rights of the ryots of Canara, of Malabar, and of Coorg, are similar. Private estates, as they are called, exist in all these countries, and the public revenue is of the same nature. Any shade of difference that may exist, is not material in the present state of the question.—I mean only here to draw attention to the following principal facts.

1st. That the ryots of Malabar were long under rajahs, and paid the rents of their private estates to those rajahs; that the collector of Malabar has stated the practicability (laying aside the ancient rajahs, now pensioners) of creating new zemindars, as a medium of collecting a temporary or a permanent revenue.

2d. That the ryots of Canara did at one period† of time, either throughout the district, or in a part of it (which is sufficient for my purpose), pay their rents through rajahs, zemindars, or poligars.

3d. That we have transferred to the rajah of Coorg, from Canara, a portion of private estates, which yielded an annual revenue to government of about 20,000 star pagodas, whereby the proprietors, as the ryots of Canara are called, now pay their revenue, not direct to government, but to a rajah or zemindar. It does not alter the case, that I am informed, the rajah of Coorg pays no revenue to government. He gives an elephant annually; and whether his tribute is an elephant, or two-thirds of the government rent of the estates made over to him, is of no consequence. The difference between the two-thirds and the value of the elephant, is what government have conceded, under considerations of a political nature.

19. Having stated the law, and adduced facts, I would argue as follows:—
1st. That all the rights claimed for the ryots of Malabar and of Canara, are confirmed to them by the law, as it now stands.

2d. That the same rights are guaranteed to all ryots§ under the presidency of Fort St. George.

3. That forming a permanent settlement with existing zemindars, or with zemindars to be created, will not infringe those rights in Malabar, Canara, or in any other province under this government.

4. That the act of creating zemindars to collect the rents of the ryots, is not repugnant to the prejudices of the ryots; because the ryots have for ages paid their rents through a medium agency, established by the sovereign.

20. Whether the agent was a permanent officer, a temporary officer, a sonbahdar, zemindar, poligar, tehsildar, or whether a jaghiredar, enaumdar or shotriumdar, or any other description of person, is of little consequence, as it in no respect affects, the rights enjoyed by the ryots.

21. From

* Compare para. 23 of Colonel Munro's Report from Canara, dated 31st May 1800, with Major Walker's Letter on the Tenures of Land in Malabar, dated 20th July 1801, and the Report of the Commissioners in Malabar, dated 28th July 1801.

† "While engaged in this business, I received letters from the poligars of Bilghy, Soondah, Vitteel, and Comlah, all to the same purport; congratulating me on the success of our arms, and expressing their confidence that they would be reinstated in their ancient domains. I knew that there were pretenders, either open or concealed, to almost every district in Canara."—Major Munro to the Board of Revenue, 31st May 1800, para. 3.

‡ The Beddanore family made no additions till 1618, when they imposed an additional assessment of 50 per cent. on the whole of the jumma, except in what is called the Hobly of Mangalore, which comprises about one-third of Canara, and which being at that time mostly held by tributary poligars, was only partially subjected to this assessment."—Ibid. para. 9.

§ "The patti, or extra assessment, of 1712, in column 10, was imposed by the Rajah of Soondah, for the purpose of discharging the Mogul Peshcush, at the rate of 50 per cent. on all gardens; and from 24 to 12½ per cent. on rice fields. The addition under this head, in Beitwal, was made by the Adgil poligars, who then rented part of that district."—Ibid.

¶ Two-thirds is the proportion of the government rents of ryots lands, generally paid by zemindars; or, in other words, the zemindars pay to Government two-thirds of their gross collections from the ryots.

§ It will be seen, in a subsequent part of this paper, that the same rights were claimed by many collectors, many years ago, for the ryots of this side of the peninsula.

21. From the foregoing discussion, it appears that the rights are the same, in all the provinces under this government (I firmly believe over all India); that these rights, are defined by law, and unalterable, by any intermediate agency of any description which may be employed to realize the dues of government. That the revenue must be collected through the medium of some agency, will not be denied; as it is not to be supposed that any person will contend for advantages conferred on a ryot, by a system which would compel him several times in a year, to quit the immediate concerns of his farm and family, and travel fifty or a hundred miles, for the purpose of paying every kist into the treasury of the collector. The expenses of such journeys, independent of the consideration of the detail of such a system, would perhaps more than equal the amount of the public assessment on the individual. An agency must therefore be resorted to; and it remains for investigation, whether it would be most politic to employ zemindars, who have a direct interest in the prosperity of their under-tenants, or hiring servants of government, entirely divested of such interest. I shall therefore proceed to the arguments which have been stated on the subject of zemindarry agency; and to examine, whether it unites the greatest advantages both for the government and ryot.

PART THE SECOND:

Being on the Advantages of the Zemindarry Agency, with reference to Government; and on its Advantages, with reference to the Ryot.

22. THE proposition for making a permanent settlement with the ryots, is not new. The subject was investigated and discussed in the years 1789, 1790, 1791 and 1792, by Marquis Cornwallis and Sir John Shore. The plan was rejected; and the rejection of it, approved by the Court of Directors.*

23. The proposition was again revived by the members of the Board of Revenue at this Presidency, in the years 1798 and 1799; and all that had passed to that period, on the subject, was again brought forward. The subject was referred to Bengal, where the plan of making a permanent settlement immediately with the ryots, was again rejected. The rejection was pointed; for under the experience† which had been derived in Bengal, during a period of ten years, the Bengal government authorized and directed the demesne or havelly lands to be formed into estates; and a Regulation was made, that no estate should be a separate estate, "unless (Sect. 10, Reg. XXV. 1802) the public assessment thereon amounted to 500 pagodas or upwards."

24. The instructions furnished to collectors on the 15th October 1799, for the purpose of preparing materials for forming a permanent settlement of the revenue, were framed from the Report of the Board of Revenue, and the orders of the Governor General in Council. They stated, that "government has come to the resolution of transferring to native landholders, in all practicable cases, the property which they now hold in the havelly lands; and, with this view, it is their intention to parcel it out into lots, competent to bear a fixed annual jumma of from one to ten thousand pagodas, and to put them up to public sale."

25. Major Macleod, then collector of Salem, and Mr. Hurdis, then collector of Dindigul, in replying to these general instructions‡, proposed a permanent ryotwar settlement, and stated the ryots to be as much proprietors of the land, as those intended to be created. It may be here not unimportant to request attention to the remark, that two collectors on this side of India, claimed for their ryots, what was, at the same period, claimed by Colonel Munro for the ryots of Canara; that Mr. Wallace has since preferred similar claims for all the ryots of Tanjore, and for a part of the ryots of Trichinopoly; and that Colonel Munro, without discussing the rights of the ryots of the Ceded Districts, has nevertheless recommended a settlement immediately with them. What rights were to be confirmed to the ryots, were not

* See Letters from the Court, dated 19 September 1792, and 11 February 1801.—"The leading principles of the measure have already received our sanction, in our Letter to the Bengal Government, of the 19th September, 1792, when the business, with the luminous information which attended it, were fully before us, and materially considered by us, 11th February 1801."

† See Proceedings of the Board of Revenue, of the 3d September 1799, para. 363. It is evident, from the foregoing, that the detail and minutiae alluded to, were considered a cause of great perplexity; and the Board observe, by Regulation XVIII, passed in Bengal in 1797, that very serious inconvenience is experienced from a multitude of inconsiderable landholders, viz.—"Landed property, in the district of Chittagong, is, for the most part, distributed into very small portions among the numerous proprietors, of which, and their tenants, so many disputes continually rise, regarding the property or boundaries of their respective tenures, that the unremitting assiduity of the Zillah Judge, and his register, has been found insufficient to bring them to an early trial and decision, whereby one of the primary objects of the existing Judicial Regulations, the speedy administration of justice, has been materially obstructed in the above district; and the injured party, despairing of timely redress by due course of law, has, in some instances, had recourse to violence and other illegal means, to redress himself. To remedy these evils, so incompatible with the security of property and good order of society, established in other parts of the Company's provinces, and which is equally the desire of Government to establish universally; the Vice President in Council has thought proper to enact the following Rules, for the more speedy administration of justice, in the cases referred to, which are to be considered in force in the Zillah of Chittagong only, from the date of their receipt by the Judge of that district."

¶ Para. 5.—"Your Board will observe, from what has been said in the preceding paragraph, that every farmer is already a sort of proprietor of the lands he may possess; and that he is secured, by the potta he receives, against any unfair demands being made from him."—Major Macleod to Board of Revenue, 11th Nov. 1800.

"The Resolution of Government, to dispose of the proprietary right in the Circar lands by sale, according to the manner and amount specified in paragraph 38, I conceive to be, generally, very impracticable, from the poverty of the people they expect will become the purchasers, as well as from the objection, that those very people, would have to purchase a proprietary right in what prescription had already made their own."—Mr. Hurdis to the Board of Revenue, 16 March 1800.

not then thoroughly known; they appear still to be imperfectly understood. The subject of creating zemindars, was new to these gentlemen; they appear to have connected the establishment of an intermediate class of people between government and the ryot, with the subversion of the established rights of the latter; and actuated by a praiseworthy regard for the welfare of the inhabitants, in the districts under their charge, they supported the priority of their claims to the new rights which they believed it to be a contemplation to bestow on the zemindars. The error of this conclusion has been sufficiently exposed: it may perhaps be accounted for, by the various interpretations which have been applied to the term "proprietary right;" but a further discussion of the subject, is not now necessary.

26. Colonel Munro has stated, and the opinion will be generally concurred in, that the complete abolition of an ancient revenue system, can never be advisable, until it has been fully proved that that which is intended to supplant it, is better. In order to decide whether the new is preferable to the old, it should first be ascertained whether it is practicable; whether it will be liked by the inhabitants; and whether it will ultimately augment the revenue of the country, and the resources of government. He proceeds to add, that a judgment cannot easily be formed upon these points, without previously considering the actual state of the country, and of the people by whom it is cultivated. From the state of the country, and of the people, Colonel Munro argues that the settlement ought to be ryotwar.

27. It will be my endeavour to show, that the permanent settlement ought to be made with zemindars, where zemindars exist; and that zemindars ought to be created, where none are found. Because I have already shown, that an intermediate agency has always existed between the government and the ryots; and that the establishing of a permanent one, is not a complete abolition of the ancient revenue system, not even an encroachment on it, but a confirmation of it; and because, in great estates, the proprietors have a deeper interest than revenue officers, in the improvement of their lands: that being better judges both of the nature of the soil, and of the circumstances of the ryots, they will be more likely to regulate their rent fairly, so as to enable the better sort of ryots to thrive, and the poorer sort to avoid the distresses and failures, which are so often the consequence of over-assessment: that if they are wealthy, their own interest will urge them to employ more stock in cultivation, than can be expected under the present system: that if they are not wealthy, they will soon become so, from the accumulation of the remission of rent; and the result will be the same; that a degree of mutual confidence will arise between the landlord and tenant, which can never take place between the ryot and the revenue servant; and that from this source, the private dealings among the inhabitants, will be increased and facilitated, greatly to the advantage of the country. That the ryot will have a greater certainty of holding his land at a moderate rent, because the proprietors will be restrained from over-assessing him, by the fear of his throwing up his farm, and going off to another estate; while the revenue officer is in a great measure exempted from this check, for he can follow the fugitive ryot, and assess him wherever he ploughs a field. That the ryot will be less likely to suffer oppression, under a landholder, than under a revenue officer; because, although the law may be supposed to protect him as effectually in the one case, as the other; yet he will be more influenced by his fears and his ignorance, when he is a tenant of government, than when he is that of an individual, to submit in silence. That the raising up of a respectable body of land-owners, will introduce that just gradation of rank, which is so essential to the existence and prosperity of every well-ordered society. And, finally, that the inhabitants will be relieved from the constant and vexatious interference of revenue officers in all their transactions; and government, of a great part of the expense of maintaining them.

28. The foregoing are benefits of great magnitude. They comprize almost all that can be said in favour of the zemindarry agency; and are, in abstract, what Marquis Cornwallis and Sir John Shore* urged, would be the result of that system:—they are not my words, but verbatim the words of Colonel Munro. I shall now give the Colonel's reasons for doubting that these effects, would naturally flow from great estates. "If such benefits should flow, there can be little doubt, he adds, as to the expediency of its adoption: But there are many reasons to induce the belief that the consequences of that system, would not be so beneficial, as might at first sight be expected. The potails of villages, and the principal cultivators, who are the only description of people likely to become owners of estates, have never heard of private landed property, or of any landlord but the circar. It would be almost impossible to persuade them, that government has transferred its right in the soil to them. Nothing but the experience of a great number of years would convince them that they themselves were actually its proprietors; they would therefore, as long as they entertained doubts of the stability of their tenures, act as if they were in daily expectation of a change. They would endeavour to make the most of their estates while in their possession; they would press heavy on the ryots, and they would not employ much stock, even if they had it, in improvements; and the objects of speedy improvement, would hence be lost. As they are in general as poor as the common cultivators, they could make no advances from their own

* Para. 17. "The humane and liberal sentiments, which dictated the instructions upon which the present plan is founded, will prompt you to receive the highest gratification, if my hopes of its producing wealth and happiness to the intelligent and industrious part of the individuals of this country, shall be realized: and, independent of the utmost importance for promoting the solid interests of the Company, that the principal landholders and traders, in the interior parts of the country, should be restored to such circumstances as to enable them to support their families with decency, and to give a liberal education to their children, according to the customs of their respective casts and religions; that a regular gradation of ranks may be supported, which is no where more necessary than in this country, for preserving order in civil society."—Marquis Cornwallis to the Court of Directors, 2d August 1789.

"own funds. Neither is it probable that they would make any from the remission which government might deem it advisable to make, in order to secure the permanency of the settlements. They would employ a part of this fund, in making good deficiencies; and looking forward to the supposed danger of losing their tenures, they would hoard up the rest for their private use, and bestow no part of it, on the promotion of agriculture. They would no doubt at last, when they became persuaded of the stability of their tenures, appropriate their savings to the cultivation of their estates; but it would be long before this change could take place in their opinions; and they would certainly, in the mean time, have reduced the ryots to a much worse state than that in which they found them. I make this conclusion, upon the supposition that they are to be at liberty to raise their rents, like land owners in other countries; for if they are restricted from raising the assessment fixed by government, and are at the same time, liable for all losses, they have not the free management of their estates, and hardly deserve the name of owners."

29. It has been already shown, that this description is incompatible with the existing laws, and therefore, while they remain in force, the conclusion drawn from it, must be without foundation; and the advantages which Colonel Munro stated, in an opposite description of a permanent settlement concluded with individuals, for a considerable extent of landed property, would appear to be ensured.

30. It has further been shown, that the constitution established in 1802, for the internal government of the provinces subject to this Presidency, confirms, instead of infringing, the rights and usages which have been enjoyed and observed by the inhabitants. Where there already existed an higher class of society, who received the rents of the ryots, and paid a consideration for the aggregate collection to government, the confirmation of that class, in the situation in which they were found, has followed as a matter of justice. It is only where such persons do not exist, that the policy of creating them, can come under discussion. Perhaps the arguments which have been urged against the measure, tend in a great degree, to support it. The necessity of gradations in society, is too generally admitted, to render it necessary that it should be particularly insisted on here. Apprehensions for the stability of the gradations already established, form a strong feature of the objections above quoted, to a zemindary agency, and of the reasoning on which a preference has been given, to a ryot-war system: but when it has been shown, that the zemindary agency does not involve the destruction of the "rank, influence and privileges" claimed for the ryots, but that it is not only connected with their preservation, but extends and enlarges the relations of society; may it not with reason be asked,—whether this additional link in the chain of society, does not tend, in a material degree, to unite the great body of the people more strongly to the government?

"Next in dignity to the laird, is the tacksman, a large taker or leaseholder of land, of which he keeps part as a domain in his own hand, and lets part to under-tenants. The tacksman is necessarily a man capable of securing to the laird the whole rent, and is commonly a collateral relation. These tacks or subordinate possessions, were long considered as hereditary; and the occupant was distinguished by the name of the place at which he resided. He held a middle station, by which the highest and the lowest orders were connected. He paid rent and revenue to the laird, and received them from the tenants. This tenure still subsists with its original operation, but not with the primitive stability."

"I have found, in the higher parts of Scotland, men not defective in judgment or general experience, who consider the tacksman as a useless burden on the ground, as a drone who lives upon the product of an estate, without the right of property, or the merit of labour, and who impoverishes at once, the landlord and the tenant. The land, say they, is let to the tacksman at sixpence an acre, and by him to the tenant, at ten-pence. Let the owner be the immediate landlord to all the tenants,—if he lets the ground at eight-pence, he will increase his revenue by a fourth part, and the tenants' burden will be diminished by a fifth. Those who pursue this train of reasoning, seem not sufficiently to enquire whether it will lead them, nor to know, that it will equally show the propriety of suppressing all whole-sale trade, of shutting up the shops of every man who sells what he does not make, and of excluding all whose agency and profit intervene between the manufacturer and the consumer. They may, by stretching their understandings a little wider, comprehend, that all those who by undertaking large quantities of manufacture, and affording employment to many labourers, make themselves considered as benefactors to the public, have only been robbing their workmen with one hand, and their customers with the other."

"According to these schemes, universal plenty is to begin and end in universal misery. Hope and emulation will be utterly extinguished; and as all must obey the call of immediate necessity, nothing that requires extensive views, or provides for distant consequences, will ever be performed."

31. "Rank, influence and privileges," it has been observed, "are valuable possessions in all countries, and in none more so, than this." The purchase of a zemindary right, confers all three: the two first, need not any explanation; the third, consists in the difference between the remission of government and what the zemindar can collect, according to law, from his estate; and in the progressive increase of that difference, from an extended occupation of land, and from the improvement of the land now cultivated, by all the ways and means which self-interest will suggest. That these are not imaginary rights, but rights of considerable value, we have had abundant evidence of, not only from the anxious desire of all who have acquired such property, whether by confirmation, by gift or by purchase, to retain possession under all the disadvantages of a succession of unfavourable seasons,

32. These circumstances are incontrovertible evidence of a positive good, which, it has been shown, has been obtained without infringing any of those rights proposed to be conferred on the cultivators by a permanent ryotwar settlement.

"The greatest misfortune of a country, is an indigent tenantry. Whatever be the native advantages of the soil, or even the skill and industry of the occupier, the want of a sufficient capital, confines every plan, as well as cripples and weakens every operation,—bandry. This evil is felt, where agriculture is accounted a servile or mean employment,—where farms are extremely subdivided, and badly furnished with habitations,—where leases are unknown, or of short or precarious duration. With respect to the encouragement of husbandry, in this as in every other employment, the true reward of industry is in the price and sale of the produce. The exclusive right to the produce, is the only incitement which acts constantly and universally—the only spring which keeps human labour in motion; all therefore that the laws can do, is to secure this right to the occupier of the ground, that is, to constitute such a system of tenure, that the full and entire advantage of every improvement, go to the benefit of the improver—that every man work for himself, and not for another; and that no one share in the profit, who does not assist in the production. By the occupier, I here mean, not so much the person who performs the work, as him who procures the labour, and directs the management; and I consider the whole profit as received by the occupier, when the occupier is benefited by the whole value of what is produced; which is the case with the tenant, who pays a fixed rent for the use of land, no less than with the proprietor, who holds it as his own. The one, has the same interest in the produce, and in the advantage of every improvement, as the other. Likewise the proprietor, though he grant out his estate to farm, may be considered as the occupier of his tenants; regulates the occupation, by the choice, superintendence, and accommodation of his tenants; by the disposition of his lands, by erecting buildings, providing accommodations, by prescribing conditions, or supplying implements and materials of improvement; and is entitled, by the rule of public expediency above-mentioned, to receive, in the advance of his rent, a share of the benefit which arises from the increased produce of his estate. The violation of this fundamental maxim of agrarian policy, constitutes the chief objection to the holding of lands by the state, by the king, by corporate bodies, by private persons, in right of their offices or benefices. The inconvenience to the public, arises, not so much from the alienable quality of lands, thus holden in perpetuity, as from hence,—that proprietors of this description, seldom contribute much either of attention or expense, to the cultivation of their estates, yet claim, by rent, a share in the profit of every improvement that is made upon them. This complaint can only be obviated by long leases, at a fixed rent, which convey a large portion of the interest to those who actually conduct the cultivation. The same objection, is applicable to the holding of land by foreign proprietors, and, in some degree, to estates of too great extent being placed in the same hands."

Now the principal expedient by which such a purpose, namely, increasing the number of the people, can be promoted, is, to adjust the laws of property, as nearly as possible to the following rules:—First, "To give the occupiers, &c. the property over the soil which is necessary for its perfect cultivation." Secondly, "To assign the whole profit of every improvement, to the persons by whose activity it is carried on. What we call property in land, as hath been observed above, is power over it: now it is indifferent to the public, in whose hands this power resides, if it be rightly used. It matters not to whom the land belongs, if it be well cultivated."

33. I must now be permitted to refer to the experience gained in Bengal, where the ryots have the same privileges as those of the peninsula, as appears proved by the authorities which I have quoted. Under this experience, the Governor General in Council, on the 31st December 1799, being a period of nearly ten years subsequent to the establishment of the permanent settlement under that government, informs the Governor in Council of Fort St. George, that "government has always been under the necessity of employing its own officers, or of having recourse to farmers for the management of these lands. These agents and farmers, having no permanent interest in the improvement of the lands, often found a temporary advantage in committing frauds and abuses; and it was invariably found, that the lands belonging to the government, although very advantageously situated, were worse cultivated than the contiguous lands of individuals."

"It was on these grounds, as well as in consideration of the injustice committed against the original zemindars, in the grant of these lands to the Company, that we restored to the zemindars the twenty-four pergunnahs or districts, commonly called the Company's Lands, which surround Calcutta; the zemindary right in which, was granted to the Company (to the exclusion of the former proprietors) by Jaffer Ali Khan. No consideration could with justice have been demanded by the Company, from those zemindars for the restoration of rights, of which they were originally deprived, by an act of injustice."

"With regard to the havelly lands under your presidency, as detailed in the 321st, 322d, and 323d paragraphs of the Report of your Board of Revenue, we entirely concur in opinion with that board, that these lands should be parcelled out into estates, and that they should be disposed of gradually, as may be found practicable, and converted into zemindary tenures, subject to the payment of a definite and perpetual revenue."

"If no purchasers for these lands should appear, we are satisfied that it will be for the interests of the Company, of the occupants and inhabitants of those lands, and of the country at large, that the lands should be granted to individuals of acknowledged property, who would take them, as zemindaries, subject to the payment of a fixed revenue to government in perpetuity."

Mr. Hodgson's Memoir.

"It is also our desire, that these orders, with regard to the disposal of the havelly lands, and the conversion of them into zemindaries at a fixed revenue, should be extended to the countries lately conquered from Tippoo Sultan, as soon as a satisfactory statement shall have been obtained of the resources of those conquests."

34. At a much later period, the foregoing orders have been repeated by the Governor General in Council, in a letter of the 19th July 1804, as follows:

"The instructions of the Governor General in Council, under date the 31st December 1799, and the order of his Excellency in Council of the 18th June 1801, respecting the annexation of the provinces of Malabar and Canara to Fort St. George, state the principles, conformably to which, the settlement of the land revenue of the districts, in which no settlement has been formed, must be regulated. Where the necessary enquiries for forming a permanent settlement, have not been completed, the settlement should be made for such term of years as local circumstances may render advisable. In all cases, it is desirable that the settlements should be formed with the zemindars, or other description of landholders. Where no such descriptions of persons exist, it would be proper to form the lands into estates, and to dispose of them to persons who will attend to their cultivation. These persons, as well as all other landholders, should be permitted freely to transfer their estates by sale, gift, or in any other manner. It can never be desirable that the government itself should act as the proprietor of the lands, and should collect the rents from the immediate cultivators of the soil. The rates of rent payable for the different descriptions of produce, must vary in every district, and often in every village. Where any proprietors may be found, they will generally collect those rents, agreeably to the specific engagements which they may conclude with their tenants, or according to the established usage of the country. If any differences should arise between the landholders and tenants regarding those engagements or usages, the courts of judicature will form the proper tribunals for deciding such differences. These questions, are of private right, in which the executive authority cannot interfere, consistently with justice, policy, or its own interests. The difficulties experienced in Malabar, in regulating the assessment on the pepper vines, and other articles of produce, and the evils which have resulted from the measures adopted for that purpose, afford most convincing proof of the bad policy of a system of revenue which requires the executive authority of the government to assume every where the character of a proprietor of land, and to interfere in details, which cannot be conducted in a manner favourable to the interests of the cultivator of the soil, and to the extension of agriculture, excepting by the proprietors of the lands."

"The cultivation of the country must depend, on the exertions of the land-holders. In order to encourage them to employ those exertions, and to conduct themselves with moderation and justice towards the immediate cultivators of the soil, the annual payments of the land-holders to government, should be fixed upon a scale of equity and moderation, regulated, with reference to the receipts of government, from the lands or estates of the different land-holders, for a period of years; and all the authorities, of every description employed in the collection of the revenue, including the executive authority of the government itself, should be rendered amenable for their acts, to the controul of the laws, according to the rules already established in those parts of the country to which the new constitution has been completely extended. The early extension of these principles to the unsettled districts, will combine the interests of the state, as connected with its revenues, with the welfare of every class of its subjects concerned in the cultivation of the lands. It will rest with your Lordship in Council to apply these principles to local circumstances in Malabar, and other districts in which a permanent settlement, has not yet been concluded."

35. Thus, then, repeated orders have been received to convert all the havelly or demesne lands under this government, into estates, and dispose of them to zemindars to be created: which orders have been given, under the experience afforded, during ten and fifteen years in Bengal, of the benefits of the zemindary system, and of the inconveniences of a more detailed system of management. The zemindary system is, then, a system ascertained by experience, to be a good system. The supposed advantages of a ryotwar permanent rent, have not undergone this test.

36. Proofs should be adduced, in support of every assumed position; and as I possess proof of the success of the zemindary system in Bengal, I shall introduce it here, without apology. It was procured for me, by a member of the Special Commission, of which I was secretary, and who may be supposed to have had an interest in satisfying himself that the measures recommended by the Commission, were calculated to secure the benefits which their appointment was intended to produce.

"The documents which I have sent to you, contain, I am willing to believe, abundant proof of the great advantages which have resulted from the establishment of a permanent settlement of the revenue of the provinces under the presidency of Bengal, where, from all the information I have been able to collect from gentlemen in the civil and military service, and from gentlemen out of the service, the improvements are most extensive. Wastes have in every direction, been converted into fields of grain. The spirit of improvement has, however, been much more actively employed, since the expiration of the term of the decennial settlement; and the people have had proof, that the declaration of an unalterable jumma, was not a deception. Marquis Wellesley found the idea of change so prevalent, owing partly to the evil reports of the worst classes of natives, that he found it necessary to counteract it by a Proclamation, which produced a re-establishment of confidence:—but to the proofs. Those who have always viewed the subject through the same

Documents relative to Zemindary and Ryotwar Settlements.

Mr. Hodgson's Memoir.

"Your Lordship in Council will perceive, that this statement is a continuation of that prepared by our late accountant to the end of 1798-9, and forwarded with our letter of the 27th May last; but the present statement is more complete, as including the year 1799-1800, and consequently the entire period of the decennial settlement."

"By this statement it appears, that the collections of the last ten years, on account of the ordinary land and sayer revenue of the four provinces, and the customs included in the jumma of Benares, exceed the collections on the same accounts, during the preceding ten years, in the sum of Sicca Rupees 1,38,28,720. 3. 10. 2; or deducting from this amount, the estimated proportion arising from the Benares revenue, not being included in the former period prior to October 1781, namely, Rupees 51,99,612. 4, the net excess collected in the last ten years is 5^a R^s 86,29,108. 3. 62."

"The comparison may be further exhibited as follows:

1st. Total collections from 1780-1, or 1187-8, to 1789-90,	29,01,30,433	3	19

3d. Excess of the last ten years in the total collections, as above	5 ^a R ^s 86,29,108	3	6

"We have great satisfaction in submitting this comparative statement to your Lordship in Council, as it proves that notwithstanding the abolition of the greater part of the sayer in the year 1790, the first year of the decennial settlement, the actual collections during that settlement, have considerably exceeded those of preceding years."

"The above, is a comparison of actual collections of ten years preceding, and of ten years subsequent to the decennial settlement; the actual receipts of the latter period exceed by Sicca Rupees 86,29,108, those of the preceding period, being upwards of eight lacs per annum. When the settlement took place, the country was reduced to the lowest ebb, absolutely going to ruin, and overrun with sayer or inland chokies. What is the picture now?—It more resembles a garden; abundance is diffused among the people; no apprehensions of famine are entertained; while several of the seasons have been such since the decennial settlement, as would, under former circumstances, have produced this dreadful calamity."

"The annexed statement (No. 2.) bears ample testimony to the regularity with which the revenue is realized. The amount of the balances of revenue outstanding on the 30th April 1802, is only in the proportion of 2 $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent to the gross jumma; and at the close of the Fusly year, which here ends on the 30th of September, the aggregate balance is only 2 $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent to the jumma, while it was expected that the whole, with the exception of the amount due from the lands under aumani, would be realized. Greater regularity does not exist in the collection of the revenue of any state; nor can greater regularity, be expected."

"The statement (No. 3.) exhibits the proportion that the charge of collection, in the provinces of Bengal, Behar, Orissa and Benares, bears to the gross jumma.—The nature of the permanent settlement in Benares, is similar to what it would be with us, if the merassadars had been constituted proprietors of their respective meerassces; a tehsildar is appointed to collect the revenue from these numerous zemindars, and to superintend the police, with a contract allowance of 10 per cent on the jumma, for being answerable for the due realization of the revenue, and the restoration of all property plundered or stolen. This per-centage allowed to the tehsildars, is deducted from the gross revenue, before entering the jumma; so that while the charges only stand in the revenue books at 11 $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent, they are actually 21 $\frac{1}{2}$, including allowance to the Rajah, and pensions. The tehsildar, under this arrangement, receives the same income as a proprietor would do, while he has no interest in the soil, nor any inducement to perform any other duty than that specified in his contract; the profit he gets by the contract, is most likely carried off to another quarter of the world."

"No. 4. is an extract from the register of estates in Tirhoot, where it will be observed that there are subdivisions of estates so low, as a jumma of sicca rupees 40. Separate estates of even a rupee annual jumma, have existence. This minute subdivision of property, has been attended with much inconvenience, and was a great error in the system, as introduced at first,—originating in too great a desire to divide and diminish the size of great zemindaries; By two great an attention to the accomplishment of this object, the the evils that would arise from too many small estates, on the other hand, were overlooked. The consequences have been, much collusion in the sale and transfer of estates. Some few estates are not now to be found. The zemindars procured the separation of a portion of their flocks, in the name of a person who appeared; the parties agreed to an assessment on their separate estates, which were registered as separate zemindaries, and no more was said or done. For a few years, the agent of the zemindar (thus become an artificial proprietor) paid his jumma regularly, and then disappeared, or was reported dead; the jumma of the estate fell into arrear; but when ordered to be attached and sold, no estate could be found corresponding with the registry. By this trick, the zemindar had got the jumma of his portion reduced, in proportion to the amount of the jumma assessed on the estate, returned non est inventus; or if the estate actually existed, in the proportion that the jumma assessed thereon, exceeded its actual resources: This abuse was remedied in the year 1799. No separation can now be made for a jumma less than 500 rupees."

37. The period which has elapsed since the establishment of the permanent settlement in such part of the territory * of Port St. George as was acquired previously to, and in the year 1792, does not admit of reference to the experience derived under this government, of the benefits of the zemindary system. It may, however, be satisfactory to state,

First, That up to this period, no zemindary, or part of a zemindary, in existence at the time the permanent settlement was made, has been sold for an arrear of revenue.

Secondly, That comparatively few, out of the number of estates disposed of on zemindary tenure, have been sold for an arrear of revenue.

Thirdly, That the revenue has consequently been collected to this time, with the facility and punctuality expected from the new system; and in the southern and western countries, under the particular disadvantages of a succession of unfavourable seasons.

Fourthly, That nearly the sum of seven lacs of pagodas, (7,00,000,) has been received by government for the zemindary right of the small portion of demesne or havelly lands which have hitherto been sold.

38. It has been urged against the zemindary system, that many of the existing zemindars are improvident landholders, and some, rebellious subjects. The question is not here, what a few zemindars may be; but whether the system of measures, as now established, be calculated to provide against the evil consequences which may be supposed to result from the improvidence, or any other bad quality, of the existing zemindars. Whatever may be the good or bad qualities of the existing zemindars, they have not resulted from the permanent system,—they are effects from pre-existing causes.

"With regard to the ignorance and incapacity of the zemindars, admitting these defects to exist in that class of people to the extent supposed, I have already given it as my opinion, that they are to be attributed greatly to the system of collecting the public revenue from their lands, which has long prevailed in this country. To keep them in a state of tutelage, and to prohibit them from borrowing money, or disposing of their lands without the knowledge of government, as we do at present, with a view to prevent their suffering the consequences of their profligacy and incapacity, will perpetuate these defects. If laws are enacted which secure to them the fruits of industry and economy, and at the same time leave them to experience the consequences of idleness and extravagance, they must either render themselves capable of transacting their own business, or their necessities will oblige them to dispose of their lands to others, who will cultivate and improve them. This I conceive to be the only effectual mode which this or any other government could adopt, to render the proprietors of the land, economical landlords, and prudent trustees of the public interests.

"It has sometimes been objected to these arguments, that the revenue of the sovereign, was sacrificed to the comfort and prosperity of the subject:—this is perhaps impossible. The interests of both, are too closely and inseparably connected. The security of the subject will always enrich him, and his wealth will always overflow into the coffers of the sovereign. But if the objection were just in point of policy; it would be the highest tribute to the virtue of the government. To sacrifice revenue to the well-being of a people, is a blame of which Marcus Aurelius would have been proud."

PART THE THIRD:

Being on the Disadvantages which must result to Government from a Ryotwar Settlement as a measure of Permanency; and particularly on the Disadvantages of it, as regards the Ryots.

39. IN the first part of this paper, it was my object to demonstrate, that the rights of the ryots had been confirmed to them, by law; that the placing any person between them and the government, to receive their rents, would not infringe those rights; and that the rents they paid, not being liable to increase, they have all the benefits intended to be granted to them, by the proposition of making a permanent settlement with each individual, as far as regards a permanent rent. That a remission of fifteen or twenty per cent. of their present rent would not be a further benefit, is not meant to be disputed; but that the object of a permanent manent rent would be secured to government by that remission, has not even been attempted to be proved. Colonel Munro does not propose a ryotwar rent, as a permanent rent*.

40. In the second place, I have endeavoured to show the benefits which have resulted from the zemindary permanent settlement, and the expediency of that system. I shall now proceed to explain the objections as they regard the interests of government and the ryots, against a system of collecting in permanency the rents of the government immediately from the cultivators of the soil.

41. Although the rent to be paid by the ryots, has long been, fixed, as regards them, it is not possible that a system providing for the collection of detailed fixed rents from each field of each ryot, by the immediate officers of government, can ever secure a fixed unalterable revenue to government.

42. That the rent will in some cases increase, from an extended occupation of waste land, I do not dispute; but it may also decrease, as I shall show. When the rent of government is liable to increase or decrease, the revenue is no longer permanent. The quantum of increase or decrease, must depend on individual character. A system which rests its success on individual character, will not, experience has shown, answer as a permanent system.

"The fluctuation in the members of government, as well as in the officers employed in the subordinate departments, renderst he establishment of principles, indispensably necessary; for as experience cannot be transmitted with offices, the discretion of the agents will never cease to operate in the expectation of real or fancied improvement, unless it be restrained by rule. The characters of individuals, even where the same system is pursued, must have a considerable influence, upon the success of it; but where no system is established, the evils will far exceed the partial benefits resulting from the talents, knowledge, and zeal of a few.

"The skill and success which the natives display, in applying to the defects of our personal characters, and in rendering them subservient to their own views and interests, are well known: what one man refuses, another is disposed to grant; the system rejected to day, is again brought forward with new arguments in support of it, at another period. What has been once tried, and found to fail, is again revived, under plausible reasons assigned for its failure. They study our dispositions, inclinations, aversions, enmities, and friendships, and with the cool caution so familiar to them, seize the favourable opportunity to introduce propositions for new systems and measures, or for reviving those which have been exploded. With the most upright intentions, our caution and experience are liable to be misled; but experience is not the lot of all, and the judgment will often yield to the suggester or adviser, where it ought to be guided only, by the propriety of the measure suggested or proposed. In the stability of system alone, we must look for a remedy against evils which can never be thoroughly eradicated or corrected; and this consideration is of the greatest importance."

43. In the Northern circars, for instance, the ryots there, have paid a fixed revenue for ages; that is, they have given fifty per cent. or more or less of their produce, according to local circumstances, either in money or in kind. Could government, by its immediate officers, have collected a permanent revenue during the three years of famine †, from 1790 to 1793; or of superabundant produce, from 1796 to 1799? In one case, the total want of rain, and death of thousands of ryots, annihilated the very source of revenue; in the other case, the want of a market for the superabundant produce of the earth, rendered that produce of no value. In either of these cases, a ryotwar rent, if exacted, would have ruined the greater part of the ryots; but if it had been a permanent ‡ ryotwar rent, and had been exacted, the exaction of it, would have been still more ruinous. If a rent §, under such circumstances, be not exacted, there is no permanency in it; because the severity of the famine, the extent of the superabundance of produce, the quantity of remission, the person to receive the remission; are all points to be ascertained by individuals, and individuals not certainly so deeply interested in the result, as a zemindar and a landholder: If all ryots are to be exempt, the exemption would be ruinous to government; if only a part, to whom is the scrutiny into such details to be entrusted; or who is to pay, and who not to be trusted? To native officers of government? By collectors, it cannot be executed,—they can only superintend and direct; and the degree of vigilance or ability exerted in the superintendence, must depend on the character of the individual. Does experience tend to convince, that such scrutinies will be conducted always with justice towards government, and justice towards the people? Has experience shown us, that confidence can always be placed in the

* "It is the system which has always been followed, and is therefore that which is best adapted to the manners and prejudices of the inhabitants. It is well suited to the narrowness of their circumstances, because it does not insist on the same amount of revenue being paid every year; but regulates it by the extent of cultivation, which increases or diminishes as the seasons are favourable or otherwise. It seldom injures the revenue by any considerable failures; because the failures are only those of individual ryots, who soon recover their losses by cultivating smaller farms, and being allowed to hold them for two or three years below the standard rent."

† Ver. 19. "Wherefore shall we die before thine eyes, both we and our land? buy us and our land for bread, and we and our land will be servants unto Pharaoh: and give us seed, that we may live, and not die, that the land be not desolate."

Ver. 20. "And Joseph bought all the land of Egypt for Pharaoh; for the Egyptians sold every man his field, because the famine prevailed over them: so the land became Pharaoh's."—Gen. chap. xlvii.

‡ There is a great difference between a ryotwar rent, and a permanent ryotwar rent. Under the first, only land actually cultivated is paid for; under the second, a specific engagement must be entered into to pay a specific sum of money for a specific quantity of land, and in all seasons.

§ Sec. 6. Reg. XXV. A. D. 1802.—"The landholder shall regularly pay, in all seasons, in the current coin of their respective provinces, the amount of the permanent assessment fixed on their lands; the remission of revenue, which has occasionally been granted, according to the custom of the country, on account of drought or other calamity of the season, shall cease, and never be revived."

the integrity, or even in the ability of native officers? * Is there then no difference in such cases, between a scrutiny conducted by a man into the state of his own affairs and property, and that made by an uninterested native individual, or rather by an individual whose interest is greater to be a rogue than to be honest? The servants of the most careless prince, says the celebrated author of the Wealth of Nations, than those of the most careful

44. It is very well known, that since the permanent settlement of Salem was made, the seasons have been uniformly bad: that in that zillah where the estates are of the smallest extent of any hitherto sold, several failures have taken place. A reduction of fifteen or twenty per cent. on the permanent rent of Salem, would not have covered the deficiency of produce, in numerous cases; and the exaction of even that reduced revenue, immediately from the ryots, must have caused partial emigration. Tehsildary agency, would in this case have produced partial, perhaps considerable distress. The establishment of zemindars, has produced an opposite and happy consequence: attention to the situation of the ryots, whether excited by self-interest or by any other motives, has induced the zemindars to lower the rates of the pottahs, and preserve the ryots in possession of their lands.

45. It may be doubted whether the present ryotwar rents in Canara, although the most moderate of any under this government, can be confirmed in permanency. They are paid now with great facility, owing to the operation of two causes,—the low land rent, and high price of grain. From the demand for exportation, the exportation has considerably diminished, in the last year: it may cease; the land rent may then, in time approach nearer to the proportion, which the rents paid by ryots on this side of India, bears to the value of the produce of their lands. If the produce of Canara, and of the neighbouring districts, should increase without an increased demand, it might prove difficult to collect even a permanent ryotwar rent from Canara.

46. It may, I think, be likewise argued, that a permanent ryotwar settlement, will in its operation, prove injurious to ryots, not generally perhaps, but certainly proportionately to the inequalities which may exist, at the time the rent is declared permanent; and in proportion as the present moderate rents become, through various causes, unequal. It will not be denied, that inequalities must exist in arrangements embracing such detail. A diminution of fifteen or twenty per cent. on the present ryotwar rent, would, as I have admitted, be a great immediate benefit to all ryots; but it would be a much more extensive benefit to those ryots who are under-assessed, than it would be to those who are over-assessed. It might enable the first class to pay, in some instances, for land held by them, and not cultivated; but not, for all the land held by them, if all the land should remain uncultivated. The reduction of fifteen or twenty per cent. which, in the other instances only, reduced the rent of over-assessed land, would not enable the holders of that land to pay for any part, much less for the whole of their unproductive land.

"A land-tax assessed according to a general survey and valuation, how equal soever it may be at first, must, in the course of a very moderate period of time, become unequal. To prevent it becoming so, would require the continual and painful attention of government to all the variations in the state and produce of every different farm in the country. The governments of Prussia, of Bohemia, of Sardinia, and of the Duchy of Milan, actually exert an attention of this kind,—an attention so unsuitable to the nature of government, that it is not likely to be of long continuance; and which, if it is continued, will probably, in the long run, occasion much more trouble and vexation, than it can possibly bring relief to the cultivator.

"In 1666, the generality of Montauban was assessed to the real or predial taille, according, it is said, to a very exact survey and valuation. By 1727, this assessment had become altogether unequal. In order to remedy this inconvenience, government has found no better expedient than to impose upon the whole generality, an additional tax of a hundred and twenty thousand livres. This additional tax is rated upon all the different districts subject to the taille, according to the whole assessment. But it is levied only upon those, which, in the actual state of things, are by that assessment, under-taxed; and it is applied to the relief of those, which, by the same assessment, are over-taxed. Two districts, for example, one of which ought, in the actual state of things, to be taxed at nine hundred, the other at eleven hundred livres, are, by the old assessment, both taxed at a thousand livres. Both these districts are, by the additional tax, rated at eleven hundred livres each. But this additional tax is levied only upon the district under-charged, and it is applied altogether to the relief of that overcharged, which consequently pays only nine hundred livres. The government neither gains nor loses by the additional tax, which is applied altogether to remedy the inequalities arising from the old assessment. The application is pretty much regulated according to the discretion

"I acknowledge, that I consider the necessity of introducing zemindars, or native collectors, which is essential to the proposed plan, as a principal inconvenience attending it. This officer stands between the inferior tenants and the collector, supplying the place of a sadder farmer. I do not think the substitution attended with the great advantages, it may apparently have.—Government can never afford to reward the zemindars in a degree sufficient to preclude temptation, and must rely upon its coercion over them. But coercion cannot be exercised, without understanding the detail of the duties committed to their management. If it be contended, that the zemindar is liable to dismissal, and that therefore the principle of coercion is stronger with respect to him, than in the case of a farmer, "who cannot be dismissed; on the other hand, it may be observed, that extortion, in the latter, may be punished by fine and damages; and that he has, in self-interest, under the supposition of a permanent system, a greater motive to restrain him, than a native collector. The latter, will regulate his conduct by the estimate which he forms of the abilities of the collector under whose authority he is placed; if he knows him to be vigilant, active, and well-informed, he will be cautious, diligent, and honest: if he supposes him to be otherwise, and that he can misbehave with impunity, he will intrigue with under-renters, abuse his influence, withhold true knowledge, and impose upon his principal, by misinformation."—Sir John Shore's Minute.

47. The interest of the native tehsildar of government, and of all the officers of government, (for it has been shown there must be officers of government to collect so detailed a rent as a permanent ryotwar rent) is, to compel the ryot to pay his entire rent, whatever may be his circumstances, whether the payment would ruin him or not. The ruin of ten, or of a thousand ryots, produces no ruin to the officers of government, although it does to government, but the ruin of ten ryots, or of a thousand ryots, would be productive of serious loss to a zemindar: they are his stock, his productive labours: it is as much his interest to cherish and preserve them, as it is the interest of the ryots to cherish and preserve the bullocks of their plough. "What is any man's interest, he will not mistake." Either native officers of government, or zemindars, are, then, necessary to collect the revenue of government immediately from the ryots. Can they be put in opposition to each other, where a system of permanent measures, and not of temporary expedient, is under discussion?

"The attention of the sovereign can be at best but a very general, vague consideration of what is likely to contribute to the better cultivation of the greater part of his dominions. The attention of the landlord is a particular and minute consideration of what is likely to be the most advantageous application of every inch of ground upon his estate. The principal attention of the sovereign ought to be to encourage, by every means in his power, the attention both of the landlord and of the farmer, by allowing both to pursue their interest in their own way, and according to their own judgment; by giving to both the most perfect security, that they shall enjoy the full recompense of their own industry."

48. It is not by tehsildars, that we are to expect improvements will be made in the appearance of the country. They will not build substantial houses, plant gardens and topes, make roads, erect choultries and bridges, or build pagodas. Whenever we observe such improvements, they will generally be found to have been made by that middling class of people, standing in society between the manufacturer and cultivator, that is, by merchants, land-holders, and men of property. That the disposition of the natives of India is favourable to this mode of disposing of their superabundant wealth, is abundantly evident. To perpetuate their names, by acts of general benefit, of the nature above described, is the first wish of all. By the creation of zemindars, therefore, we raise up those intermediate gradations in society, the want of which, form such well-grounded complaints. These zemindars will acquire property, and spend a part of it, in improvements of general benefit. The ryot will, under the zemindar, also acquire property; and when protected in the possession of it, and not afraid to display it, will lay it out, first,—in bettering his condition;—secondly,—in personal comforts;—and lastly,—in local improvements, of the nature above described.

49. The Court of Directors have declared, that "the nature of our dominion in India, renders it expedient, that our revenue system should be simple in its principles, and uniform in its operations;"—and have remarked, that "(such) frequent changes must necessarily be productive of disquiet to the inhabitants of any country, still more to an indolent submissive people."

50. The sentiments of Sir John Shore, on the impolicy of frequent changes, are so much in point, that I must beg permission to introduce them. "Our administration," he observes, "has heretofore been fluctuating and uncertain. An idea of improvement has been hastily adopted, unsteadily pursued, and afterwards abandoned, from a supposed defect in principle; new measures have been substituted, followed and relinquished with the same facility; and the natives, from these variations, with every succession of men, expect a change of system. Measures in the detail, must be always subject to variation from local circumstances and contingencies, which no foresight can provide against; but principles should be fixed, if possible."

51. With these sentiments I shall conclude, and leave for decision, whether the objections to a zemindary permanent rent, and the supposed advantages of a ryotwar permanent rent, outweigh, in so great a degree, the benefits of the present system, as to warrant, under the progress which has been made, a change in the principle of settling the revenue permanently in the territories subject to the Presidency of Fort St. George. (Signed) JN. HODGSON.

* When Peter the First thought proper to follow the custom of Germany, and to demand his taxes in money, he made a very prudent regulation, which is still followed in Russia: the gentleman levies the tax on the peasants, and pays it to the czar. If the number of peasants diminishes, he pays all the same; if it increases, he pays no more; so that it is his interest not to worry or oppress his vassals.—M. Page 130. Vol. I.

Zemindary and Ryot-war Settlements.

Plan of principal Collector of Ceded Districts, for a Permanent ryotwar Settlement;
5 August 1807.

EXTRACT from Report of Principal Collector of the Ceded Districts; dated 15th August 1807; proposing a Plan for permanently settling those Districts on the Ryotwar principle; and on the Advantages of that mode of Settlement, compared with Zemindary Assessments.

THE survey of the Ceded Districts having been completed, it now only remains to consider how they are to be permanently settled: what remission will be required for that purpose; and whether the immediate tenants of government ought to be the ryots or zemindars.

The assessment of Akbar is estimated by Abul Fazel at one-third, and by other authorities, at one-fourth of the gross produce; but it was undoubtedly higher than either of these rates, for had it not been so, enough would have remained to the ryot, after defraying all expenses, to render the land private property; and as this did not take place, we may be certain that the nominal one-fourth or one-third, was nearly one-half. This seems to have been the opinion of Aurungzebe, for he directs that not more than one-half of the crop shall be taken from the ryot: that where the crop has suffered injury, such remission shall be made, as may leave him one-half of what the crop might have been; and that where one ryot dies, and another occupies his land, the rent should be reduced, if more than one-half of the produce, and raised, if less than a third. It is evident, therefore, that Aurungzebe thought that one-half was in general enough for the ryot, and that he ought in no case to have above two-thirds. The mode of assessment in the Ceded Districts, and the Deccan, still limits the share of the ryot to those proportions, but makes it commonly much nearer to one-half than two-thirds of the produce. If by fixing the government rent at one-third, he were allowed to enjoy the remainder, and all such future increase as might arise from his industry, he would never relinquish his farm; and all cultivated land would soon become private property. If more than one-third is demanded as rent, there can be no private landed property, for it is found that when land, which has formerly been enaum, is assessed, that as long as the rate is not more than one-third of the produce, the land is regarded as a private estate, and can generally be sold; but that whenever the rate exceeds one-third, the land is scarcely ever saleable,—is no longer reckoned private property, and is often abandoned. It is also found by experience, that one-third of the produce is the rate of assessment at which persons, who are not themselves cultivators, can rent land from government without loss; for it enables them after paying the public demand, and being reimbursed for all expenses and stock employed, to obtain a small portion of land-rent. As one-third of the produce is therefore the highest point to which assessment can in general be carried, without destroying private landed property; and as it is also the point to which it must be lowered, before persons who are not cultivators can occupy circar land without loss; it is obvious that unless the assessment is reduced to this rate, land can neither be occupied by all classes of the inhabitants, nor ever become private property; nor can any permanent settlement be made, calculated to improve the condition of the ryots, or of the public revenue. I am therefore of opinion, that in a permanent settlement of the Ceded Districts, the rent of government should be about one-third of the gross produce. The present assessment is about 45 per cent. To bring it to the proposed level, would require a remission of 25 per cent., as may be seen from the following example:

Supposing that this remission is allowed, its being granted to zemindars or to ryots, would make a very material difference to the country. I have stated fully, in former letters, what appeared to me to be the respective advantages and disadvantages of the zemindary, or mootadary and ryotwar systems; and all that I have now to offer on the subject, is little more than a recapitulation of arguments, already adduced at different times. It may be said, in favour of the zemindar or mootadar, that he becomes at once a great proprietor, and relieves government from the trouble of making settlements with the ryots; that having a deeper interest in the cultivation of the country than the revenue officer, he is better qualified to direct it; that being more intimately acquainted with the circumstances of the ryots, and having greater inducement to prevent their failure or desertion, he is more likely to grant them such remissions as may occasionally be necessary; that he will grow rich himself; and by granting favourable terms to his tenants, will gradually raise up a body of substantial land-owners; that he will require no remissions in his rent to government, as he will be able to make up for his loss in one place, by his gain in another: that he will stand between government and the cultivator; and finally, that by conducting most of the details formerly entrusted to the revenue officer, he will greatly lessen the number of accounts and the charges of collection.

Against the zemindary system, it may be urged, that the mootahdar will endeavour to secure all advantages to himself, by giving only short leases, and making the ryots pay the full rent, according to custom; that if he fails in this, and is obliged to lower their rents to induce them to remain in his estate, he lessens his own means of discharging the public dues; dues; and if he is constrained to give up the whole advantage usually allowed to himself by government, or 15 per cent. remission to them, his estate becomes in fact ryotwar; that by being restricted from raising his rents, he loses one essential quality of ownership; and by being hindered from alienating his estate in smaller portions than 500 pagodas rent, he loses another; that if he cannot raise the rent, or turn out ryots, he has not the advantage which is sometimes ascribed to the adoption of large farms, for he will not even if he has the means, attempt to improve where he cannot raise the rent; that the great zemindar defies all authority, and will keep the ryots as poor as they have always been, and the small one, or mootahdar, will endeavour to imitate him in his state and armed followers; that though most of the mootahs will finally resolve into ryotwar farms, many of the greater ones, will assume the character of zemindaries or poligars; that the country will be filled with petty armed chiefs, who may hereafter combine to disturb the public tranquillity; and that the system is, on the whole, detrimental to the country and dangerous to government.

In favour of the ryotwar system, it may be observed, that it is the system which has always prevailed in India,—that no other can be permanent; and that however different any new one may be, it must resolve itself into it, at last, because the duration of great property in any family, is opposed by early and universal marriage, by the equal division among all the sons, and by adoption, where there are none; that it is more simple than the mootadary plan, because it requires no artificial restraints contrary to custom, and the laws of inheritance, to prevent the division of estates; because it admits of all gradations of large and small farms, as there are ryots who pay from one, to one thousand pagodas; because the owner of the land where he has tenants, may raise or lower the rent at pleasure, which cannot be done by the mootadar; that it is better adapted to preserve simplicity of manner and good order; because every ryot will on his own estate, be at once proprietor, farmer, and labourer; because the division of property, by engaging men in labour for their maintenance, is favourable to quiet; because a great body of small proprietors, instead of a few zemindars or mootadars, will be interested in supporting government; and because it facilitates the establishment of the authority of the courts of justice, which can seldom reach zemindars, particularly armed ones. It may be also said, that it is better calculated to promote industry, and to augment the produce of the country; because it makes more proprietors and farmers, and fewer common labourers, than the zemindary or mootadary scheme; because the ryot would be more likely to improve his land, as a proprietor than as the tenant of a zemindar; and as he would enjoy the whole remission, instead of a small part, or perhaps none, he would be more able to do it; and because the small proprietor, being a better manager and farmer, and more immediately interested than the great one, in the cultivation of his land, would bestow more pains upon it, and make it yield a more abundant crop; that supposing the amount of property to be the same, it would be better that it should be in the hands of forty or fifty thousand small proprietors, than of four or five hundred great ones; that by the mission going at once to the ryots, it would improve the circumstances of the class of men from whom the revenue is principally drawn, and would enable them to raise a greater quantity of food, and thus to favour the increase of population; that by allowing the revenue to increase or diminish, according to the extent of land in cultivation, it eases the farmer, without occasioning, on an average of years, any loss to government: that this fluctuation would lessen every day, as the ryots became more wealthy, and would at last, be confined to uncultivated lands; and that the ryotwar system, by retaining in the hands of government all uncultivated land, gives it the power of gradually augmenting the revenue, without imposing any fresh burden upon the ryots, as long as there is an acre of waste in the country.

The chief arguments against the ryotwar system, are, the great detail of accounts, and the consequent difficulty of management; the interference of revenue officers in cultivation; the expense of collection; and the fluctuation in the annual amount of the public revenue. But there seems to be nothing very serious, in these objections. When a country is surveyed, and the rent of every field fixed, the accounts become perfectly simple: they are nothing more than a list of ryots and fields; and if the ryots do not next year, take new or throw up old land, the same register will serve again; and as curnums must always be kept, there is no more difficulty in getting from them an account of a hundred ryots, than of one mootadar. The accounts of the customs, which yield so small a portion of revenue, are infinitely more intricate and troublesome, than those of the land-rent. If such a remission is granted as will leave the ryots a private rent, after discharging the public one, the interference of revenue servants will be unnecessary. Their own interest will stimulate them to cultivate; as in Canara, where no revenue officer ever thinks of calling upon the owner to plough or sow his fields. The additional expense of collection in the ryotwar settlement, would be gradually compensated, by the rent of waste lands brought into cultivation; and the fluctuation in the annual amount of the revenue, would be gradually lessened, as the ryots become attached to their farms, by the benefits of a low assessment, and retaining them as a lasting possession, instead of changing them, partly or wholly, almost every year.

The only matters of real importance, in a comparison of the ryotwar and zemindary systems, are the amount of the remission to be granted, and the mode of its distribution. If the sum is in both cases equal, the direct loss to revenue, is also the same; but in the one case, the whole remission goes immediately to the ryots, by whom all land-rent is produced, while in the other, it may never reach them. The zemindars will keep it from them for ever, and the mootadars for a long period of years. In the one case, the whole of it, will be immediately ately applied to the improvement of the country. In the other, either none, or only a small portion will be allotted to that purpose. It seems extraordinary, that it should ever have been conceived, that a country could be as much benefited by giving up a share of the public rent to a small class of zemindars or mootadars, who do not yet actually exist, as by giving it to the ryots, from whom all rent is derived. When the settlement of a great province is in view, the prosperity of the body of the people should be the grand object to which every thing else should be made to yield; and as it is plain that the ryots must reap infinitely more advantage from a remission granted to themselves, than from a similar one to zemindars and mootadars, the ryotwar system, with all its supposed inconveniences, ought undoubtedly to be adopted, in preference to every other. The zemindar is a kind of contractor, who undertakes to get a greater fixed rent for government from the ryots, than can be done, in any other way. He engages for 15 or 20 per cent. to make the ryots always pay what they now do. He can remit nothing to them without loss to himself; and he will therefore keep their rents as high as ever, as long as he can. The advantages of this system may be comprehended in a few words. The zemindar undertakes to pay, every year, exactly the same amount of revenue, to relieve the public servants from the fatigue of thinking about it; and to settle with the ryots in such a manner, that government shall never hear any thing about them.

It has been objected to the ryotwar system, that it leaves no person between the cultivator and the revenue officer; but this objection is made, from not understanding the condition of Indian husbandmen; for in this country, the landlord and cultivator can never be permanently separated, as in England. The minute division of property will always render them the same person, with very few exceptions. The landlord must always cultivate his own fields; and hence the collections must always be made directly from the cultivator in his quality of landlord, and hence there can be no person between the cultivator and the revenue officer, without a creation of zemindars, who must themselves in time become, either petty princes, or cultivators. If the whole system of English and of India collection is examined, it will perhaps appear that the interference of revenue officers is greater, and more vexatious in England, than in this country. The land-tax of England is so light, and is so small a portion of the public revenue, that the landlord cannot be supposed to suffer any vexation from its collection; but then, there is the excise, for which every house is entered; and the property of every person subjected to as much inspection and interference, as the land of the Indian ryot. Were there no excise in England, it would be necessary to draw a greater revenue from the land; and to investigate its produce more narrowly. Land-rent is to Indian, what the excise and customs are to English revenue; and hence it becomes necessary to give particular attention to it, and to employ a large establishment of servants, to secure every part of it, that is justly due to government.

The annual fluctuation in the amount of revenue, has likewise been brought as an argument, against the ryotwar system. But this fluctuation will never be so great, as to cause any serious inconvenience. It would never in any one year, exceed ten per cent. in an aggregate of six or eight collectorates, though it might be more in a single one. It would gradually diminish as the ryots became proprietors; and would, in ten or twelve years, scarcely ever be above five per cent. As the inequality too would arise, as often from an increase as a decrease of revenue, government would lose nothing by it, and the deficiency, when it occurred, might always be provided for, either by reserving the surplus of former years, or by a loan.

I shall now proceed to state the manner in which I think a permanent ryotwar settlement in the Ceded Districts may be made. I shall then endeavour to show, that it will yield as much revenue, on an average of years, as the zemindary system; and that, as it will also be more beneficial to the great body of the inhabitants, it ought to be adopted. The following articles contain the principles on which the settlement should be formed:

- 1st. The settlement shall be ryotwar.
- 2d. The amount of the settlement shall increase and decrease annually, according to the extent of land in cultivation.
- 3d. A reduction of 25 per cent. on all land shall be made, in the survey rate of assessment.
- 4th. An additional reduction in the assessment of eight per cent. or 33 per cent. in all, shall be allowed, on all lands watered by wells, or by water raised by machinery from rivers and nullas; provided the cultivators keep the wells or embankments, (dirroas) in repair at their own expense. A similar reduction shall be allowed on the lands watered by small tanks, wherever the cultivators agree to bear the expense of repairs.
- 5th. Every ryot shall be at liberty, at the end of every year, either to throw up a part of his land, or to occupy more, according to his circumstances; but whether he throw up or occupy, shall not be permitted to select, but shall take or reject, proportional shares of the good and bad together.
- 6th. Every ryot, as long as he pays the rent of his land, shall be considered as the complete owner of the soil, and shall be at liberty to let it to a tenant, without any limitation as to rent; and to sell it as he pleases.
- 7th. No remission shall be made, on ordinary occasions, for bad crops or other accidents. Should failure occur, which cannot be made good from the property or land of the defaulters, the the village in which they happen, shall be liable for them, to the extent of ten per cent. additional on the rent of the remaining ryots, but no farther.

8th. All unoccupied land shall remain in the hands of government, and the rent of whatever part of it, may be hereafter cultivated, shall be added to the public revenue.

9th. All taxes on houses, shops, and professions; all duties, licenses, &c. shall belong exclusively to government. The ryot on whose land, houses or shops may be built, shall not be entitled to receive a higher rent from them, than the equivalent of the survey rent of the ground which they occupy.

10th. The repairs of all tanks which are not rendered private property by an extra remission or desivundum enaum, shall be made at the expense of government.

11th. Tuccavie shall be gradually discontinued.

12th. Potails, curnums, and all other village servants, shall remain, as heretofore, under the collector.

13th. Private creditors who may distrain the property of ryots, shall discharge the rent which may be due from such ryots to government, and shall give security for it, before they begin the distraint.

It may appear at first sight, that a reduction of 25 per cent. will occasion a heavy loss of revenue, but I imagine that it will not be greater, than what has been suffered in all districts where a permanent settlement has been effected. It is to be considered, that the decrease of revenue will not be proportionate to the reduction of 25 per cent. because that reduction is not to be made on the average of former collections, but on the survey assessment, which never has been, nor ever can be completely realized, as long as there are bad crops and poor ryots. In the board's letter of the 27th December 1804, the average profit to the owners of estates in settled districts, is estimated at 15½ per cent. but it is not explained whether this profit is upon the land-rent only, or upon the land-rent and village-taxes. I shall suppose, however, that it is restricted to the land-rent, and calculated upon an average of preceding years, and examine whether the reduction of 25 per cent. upon the survey assessment, will cause a greater diminution of revenue, than a remission of 15½ per cent. upon the average of former collections. The collections of land-rent for the last seven years, amount (per Statement No. 1.) to

A reduction of 25 per cent. on the land, will afford so much immediate relief to the ryots, that they will easily be able to keep up the cultivation of Fusly 1215, except when the tanks are not filled. I shall therefore consider the collections of that year, after making an adequate allowance for the loss from the tanks, as the average amount of the settlements that may be expected in the early part of the ryotwar system.—The collections of land-rent in 1215, are the highest that have been realized, either under the Company's or the Mysore government, and amount to - star pagodas	3,73,647	1	35

This sum of star pagodas 10,35,608. 4- 15, is what remains after making the proposed remissions in the survey assessment, and a full allowance for the loss on tank lands, from the failure of rain. But as it will not be necessary, after remitting 25 per cent. to make any deductions for bad crops to poor ryots, bramins, peons, &c. who cannot pay the full rent, the remissions usually allowed under these heads, must now be added to the settlement. They amount to -

But from this sum, the excess of charges collection under the ryotwar, above those of the mootadar system, must be deducted. As wells, and some of the smaller tanks and nullas, will in future be repaired by the ryots; and as many of the greater tanks must, under any system whatever, be repaid by government; the expense that will be incurred for tank repairs, by the ryotwar system exclusively, will not exceed star pagodas
To this sum must also be added, the difference of the mo- yen zabtahs, or charges collection in favour of the mootadar system. These charges, under the ryotwar settlement, would be	10,000 — —

This is the amount that would probably be in favour of the ryotwar system, during the first two or three years; from the third to the fifth year, the increase, from new cultivation, and low-rented lands, would be a lac of pagodas; from the fifth to the seventh year, it would be a lac more; and by the tenth, it would have amounted in all, to about three lacs. It may be said that such calculations, are uncertain. I am confident, however, that the estimate is not too high; because, as the cultivation increased nearly one-half, from 1210 to 1215, notwithstanding the gradual raising of the rent by the survey, there can be no doubt that when the rent is lowered 25 per cent. that cultivation will still continue to ex- tend rapidly, though perhaps, from the inadequacy of the population, not in the same degree as before: because there are now actually in cultivation, lands lately taken from the waste, paying sixty thousand pagodas less than the fixed assessment, which sum will be added to the jumra in the course of four or five years, but could not without the pro- posed remission; as in that case the ryots would, whenever the new land came to the full rent, throw up an equal quantity of the old, from want of the means of paying for both; and because the reduction of rent would facilitate the employment of many additional lands in agriculture. If a permanent zemindary or mootadar settlement of the land-rent is now made, it will amount, as has already been stated, to - - - star pagodas 10,24,030.

If a ryotwar one is made, by remitting 25 per cent. it will amount to - - - 11,15,608.

If it is even allowed that the net revenue from both these sums, will be nearly the same, in consequence of the superior expense of the ryotwar system, yet the zemindary rent will be no more ten years hence, than it is now, while the ryotwar will, in that time, have arisen about three lacs of pagodas; and there will be a difference in its favour, equal to nearly a third of the whole land-rent. As the object is great, and as no mischief can arise from making the experiment, it ought certainly to be tried. The result would most likely show that one-fourth or one-third more land-rent might have been derived from all the districts permanently settled; and that a similar increase, may be expected from all those which are yet unsettled. This increase would take place with the present population; but it would of course become still greater, as the population augmented. The highness of the land-rent is, in this country, the chief obstacle to the increase of population. A remission of rent in favour of a few zemindars or mootadars, would be no remedy for the evil; but a re- mission to the ryots, by enabling them to extend their cultivation, and augment the pro- duce of food for their families, would, in a great measure, do it away. Were it not for the pressure of the land-rent, population ought to advance more rapidly in India, than in America; because the climate is more favourable, and because there are every where great tracts of good land uncultivated, which may be ploughed at once, without the labour and expense of clearing away forests. As there are above three millions of acres of this de- scription in the Ceded Districts, it cannot be doubted that a very considerable addition will be made in twenty or twenty-five years, to the population, and also to the land-rent, beyond the highest estimate which has been made of it.

The profit to the land-owners in the Salem Districts, is 16½ per cent. which is 1½ per cent. more than I have deducted from the average collections of the Ceded Districts. As the assessment is perhaps higher in them, than even in Salem, I might, in the preceding comparison, have deducted 16½, in place of 15 per cent. from the average of ryotwar. This difference may however be left to counterbalance any error into which I may have fallen, in estimating the charges collection of settled districts, from not having any state- ment of them for my guidance.

Though the revenue at first should be the same, or should be even greater under the mootadary, it has this disadvantage, that the revenue is limited at once, and cannot grow with the resources of the country; whereas in the ryotwar, it keeps exact pace with them, rising or falling, as there is more or less cultivation. It is no loss, on the whole, to government, and and must be much easier for the ryots, while they have so little property, that this fluc- tuation should continue; for they cultivate most when the season is favourable; and go- vernment thus draws from the country the greatest revenue, in those years when the gross produce is the greatest; and the land-rent of India may be said to resemble, in this respect, the principal sources of British revenue,—the excise and customs,—which increase or diminish yearly with the commerce of the nation, the fund from which they are derived. The public ought certainly to be regulated, in some degree, by the private revenue of the coun- try; but nothing can be more contrary to this principle, than the mootadar system; for it fixes the public demand now, which must remain the same thirty or forty years hence, whatever the public demand may have been made to private property in that time. It does not accommodate itself to the circumstances of the country; and because it cannot raise the revenue here- after, it makes it too high at first, as in the Baramahl and other districts, whose whole resources have been brought to light by survey; and in order to realize this revenue, it is obliged to authorize the mootadars or middle-men to exact the former high rents from the ryots. On the other hand, the ryotwar system enables the public, to advance with the private revenue, as long as there is any waste land in the country; and in doing this, it adapts itself perfectly to the means of the inhabitants; for there can be no juster measure of their means, than the decrease or increase of cultivation. It also, by making the remis- sion upon the assessment of the land, gives the whole of it, at once to the ryots; and by enabling them to raise more food for the maintenance of their families, facilitates the in- crease of population, the occupancy of waste for its subsistence, and the augmentation of revenue. The assessment of lands formerly cultivated, and waste never cultivated, amounts to star pagodas 10,10,842. It would be idle to imagine that the whole can ever be brought into cultivation; but I am persuaded that nearly all the land formerly culti- vated, amounting to star pagodas 5,55,962, together with a considerable portion of the waste, will be occupied, in the course of twenty-five years.

The increase of cultivation will, however, have no sensible effect in augmenting the size of farms, and thereby lessening the detail of collection. The farms will probably always remain as at present, comprehending all sizes, from five acres to fifteen hundred; and paying from one to a thousand pagodas. Their enlargement is prevented at present, by the want of property, and will be hereafter prevented, by its division. In the Ceded Districts, and throughout the Deccan, the ryot has little or no property in land,—he has no possessory right; he does not even claim it. He is so far from asserting either a proprietary or a possessory right, that he is always ready to relinquish his land, and take some other, which he supposes is lighter assessed. All land is supposed to revert to government at the end of every year, to be distributed as it may think proper; and land is accordingly sometimes taken from one ryot and given to another, who is willing to pay a higher rent. If this power is exercised with caution, it is not from the fear of violating any possessory right, but of losing revenue; for the assessment is generally so high, that if the ryot is dispossessed, the same rent can seldom be got, from a new one. The only assessed land that is not annually at the disposal of government, is that which pays a quit-rent, and is either enaums that were formerly free, or ground belonging to tanks and wells, constructed at the expense of individuals, who are on that account, allowed a remission from one-fifth to one-half of the rent. Even in this case, however, private property in land, has always been viewed with so much jealousy, that instead of a permanent quit-rent, it has been much more usual to allow the person who digs the tank or well, to hold the land rent-free, until he is reimbursed for all his ex- penses and labour, and then to regard it as government land, and assess it at the full rate. The ryot of India unites in his own person the characters of labourer, farmer, and land- lord:—he receives the wages of the labourer, the profit of the farmer on his stock, and a small surplus from one to twenty per cent. of the gross produce as rent, but on an average, not more than 5 or 6 per cent. The smallness of this surplus prevents him from letting his land to an under-tenant, because the rent would not be equal to his sub- sistence; and also, because no tenant would give him even this rent, for as there is every where plenty of good land lying uncultivated, which any person may occupy, on paying the sircar rent, it is evident that no ryot will hold land of another, and pay an addition of 5 or 6 per cent. upon the sircar rent, when he may get land of the same kind without paying any such increase. As long therefore as government have uncultivated land of a tolerably good quality to dispose of, ryots can have no tenants, and hence there never has been in India, with the exception of a very few districts, any class of land-owners receiving their rents from tenants. The tendency of the Indian system of casts and laws of inhe- rance, always has been, and must be, to keep land divided into small portions among the ryots, and to make the same person labourer, farmer, and landlord. Why, then, attempt to subvert an antient system, which places the great body of the ryots above want, renders them industrious, frugal, and comfortable, and preserves the simplicity of their manners, and their respect for public authority;—but it has been said that there can be no proper subordination, without just gradations of rank in society; and that zemindars are required, in Indian society, to accomplish this desirable end: but this opinion is completely contra- dicted by experience; for there is no people on earth among whom there is greater sub- ordination, than among the Hindoos, who never saw proprietary zemindars, until they were created by the Company's government.

The plan which I have proposed for forming a permanent ryotwar settlement, is so plain, that it can require no further elucidation, except with regard to house-rent, which ought un- doubtedly to remain under the immediate direction of the collector, as a source of increasing revenue. The tax which is generally denominated house-rent, is more properly a tax upon income.

income. In the case of labourers, and other poorer orders of the inhabitants, where it does not exceed one or two rupees, it may be called house-rent; but even here, it is rather a tax upon income, equal to the produce of a certain number of days labour; for the house or hut itself is probably not worth more than five or ten rupees. In the case of weavers and other tradesmen, it is usually termed a professional tax; but as the weaver is rated according to the estimate produce of his loom, and the number that he employs, the tax is evidently upon his income; and in the case of merchants, who often pay a tax of fifty pagodas for a house, which would not sell for so much, the tax is clearly an income one, and is so considered by themselves. There is no difficulty in fixing the amount of the tax with regard to labourers and tradesmen; but it is not so easy to ascertain it, with respect to merchants, who, though they are supposed to be assessed, in some places, at 15 or 20 per cent. of their income, in others, pay little or nothing. Under the native governments, there were many reasons for this indulgence. The merchants usually supplied, without payment, the demands of the revenue servants for cloths and other articles; they were also obliged to furnish at a low rate, whatever articles were required for the public service, and to take the circular share of the crops, damaged stores, &c. at 10 per cent. above the market price; and also, in times of exigency, to pay occasional contributions. These demands having ceased under the Company's government, there can be no reason for the merchants being more favoured, in one place than another, or for their not being every where assessed, in the same proportion as the other classes of the inhabitants. It would be vexatious to attempt to discover the income of individuals, but a tolerable estimate of the aggregate income of the merchants of a district, may be made from accounts of the exports and imports, the population, the produce and consumption, and the usual profits of trades; and 15 per cent. upon the sum resulting from these calculations, might be imposed upon the merchants, leaving them to distribute it in detail, according to the income of the several individuals. In the district of Rydroog, where the house-tax is higher than in other parts of the Ceded provinces, and where it is supposed to be about fifteen per cent. upon income, a new distribution was made last year by the merchants and shopkeepers themselves. The total sum was not increased, because it was already sufficiently high; but the shares of many individuals were reduced one half, and those of others, doubled and quadrupled. A few of the principal merchants from all the chief trading towns of the Ceded provinces, were at the same time assembled. They were informed that the house or income-tax would be raised, and were directed to state, not what their income was, but what the rate of the tax upon it was, in their respective districts, compared to ment, to which they all agreed, as containing the fair rates of their districts. The Rydroog merchants who were present, took care to see that the neighbouring districts were rated as high as their own, in order to prevent any additional assessment from falling, upon themselves. The tax might, by the same process, be extended to every place where it is not yet established, and make a considerable addition to the public revenue. An idea of this increase may be formed, from comparing the house-rent of the Ceded provinces, with that of the richer provinces below the ghauts.

Where merchants are exempted from this income-tax, they contribute little more to revenue than common labourers: they pay no direct taxes; and those which they pay indirectly on betel, tobacco, cloth, &c. are very trifling. It is contrary to every just principle of taxation, that the richer should be more lightly assessed, than the poorer classes of the people; and as no additional demand can be made upon them, if the house-tax is permanently included in the land-rent, it ought certainly to be kept separate, in order that it may yield an increasing revenue, as the circumstances of the country improve.

I have proposed that villages shall, in ordinary cases of failure, be liable to an extra assessment of 10 per cent. This will, I am convinced, on all common occasions, be sufficient. There is also, in many places, another source from which deficiencies may be made up. In many villages, the enaums of the potails and curums are equal to a fifth, a fourth, and even to a third of the circular revenue. By far the greater part of these enaums has unquestionably never been authorized; for where there are sunnuds, the enaum scarcely ever exceeds five per cent.; and where it is more, it was always, under the native government, made liable for deficiencies in the village. I would recommend that the same principle shall still be adopted, to a certain extent; that in villages not exceeding 250 pagodas rent, the enaums of the potail and curum respectively, shall be free as far as ten per cent. of the village-rent; and that the whole of their excess above this rate, shall be liable for deficiencies: that in villages from 250 to 500 pagodas rent, the enaums shall be free as far as 7½ per cent., and their excess above this rate, be liable for failures; and that in villages above 500 pagodas, the enaums shall be free as far as 5 per cent, and the excess liable for losses. Though the revenue under a ryotwar system, must annually fluctuate with the extent of cultivation, yet it is not necessary that any abatement should be allowed for losses upon upon the actual cultivation; for all such losses easily may, and ought to be made good, in the first instance, by the excess in the potails and curums enaums above the usual standard; and where this excess does not exist, by an extra assessment upon the ryots. This extra assessment is limited to 10 per cent., but it will scarcely ever amount to half so much; and it will seldom be requisite to have recourse to it, at all.

If the survey assessment is reduced 25 per cent. and the ryotwar system introduced, the following is the average amount of revenue, from every source that might be expected, during the first two or three years:—

	Sr P

At the end of four years, the land-rent would have risen at least a lac of pagodas, and the revenue would then be 15,50,000; and at the end of 10 or 15 years, the land-rent would probably have increased to such a degree, as to make up for the original remission; and the revenue would then be from 17½ to 18 lacs of pagodas. It is one advantage of the ryotwar system, that it leaves room for the land-rent to increase with the population and wealth of the country; and it is another, that by making the remission every where equal, it will fix the ryots to their several farms as proprietors, instead of keeping them, as hitherto, for ever unsettled; without attachment to their lands; without any wish to improve them; and wandering from one zemindari or mootah to another, in quest of more favourable terms. As long as the public exigencies require a higher revenue, the present assessment may be released, after making the usual allowances for bad seasons, &c. When government is in a situation to relinquish a part of its demand, the proposed remission is that which would place the Ceded districts, on an equality with those provinces where the permanent settlement has already been established. It would, in the mean time, however, be advisable to grant the remission, without delay, to wells, in order to induce the ryots to repair them; for it is chiefly by the cultivation of well-lands, that the country is secured against scarcity.

Extract REPORT from the Committee at TANJORE; dated 22d February 1807.

PAR. 12. A PERMANENT system, with reference to the cultivators, may, in a few words, be defined to be a fixed mode of management, under which the cultivators, whatever be their denomination, shall be declared entitled, either to an invariable share of the produce, or to pay a fixed sum for that produce, in lieu of dividing it with the government. That these rates, being declared permanent, shall continue to be the character of the cultivators, and in which the courts of justice shall by the laws, be bound to protect them. This mode admits a variation in the extent of the payment; but fixes the rate.

13. A permanent system, as regards the government, has hitherto been considered a mode of management, under which government, for the advantages of a defined rent payable in all seasons, deprived itself of the power of increasing its share of the produce, whether rendered in kind or commuted; defined the amount of its revenue, and transferred the immediate collection of that share from its officers to an individual, who either purchased, or had this right, with other advantages, conceded to him. The rent of government is thus a fixed rent, and the same in all seasons.

14. Such has been, we believe, the mode hitherto adopted in settling, permanently, the revenue of the government; but, as the committee observe, permission must be received from the Court of Directors before such a mode of settlement can be adopted in this province; the recommendations which may arise out of their investigation must be confined to the adoption of such an arrangement, as shall, for the present, secure the revenues, and facilitate the ultimate introduction, should it be deemed necessary, of the permanent settlement on the plan before alluded to.

15. The members of the committee are not ignorant that it has lately been a question, under the consideration of the Governor in council, whether it be not desirable, that, in particular cases, the intermediate agent should be excluded, and the cultivators become answerable individually for a fixed rent, in all seasons, for the whole of their lands, or for such part as might be cultivated? It will therefore be proper to consider the expediency of this mode of settlement for the province of Tanjore.

16. Under what has been above stated, the committee will proceed to consider how many modes of management, introductory to a settlement in permanency of the revenue of government, can be adopted in Tanjore, and to offer such observations on each mode, as have occurred to them.

A Ryotwar Rent.—First. A settlement may be made with each meeraffadar, at a fixed rate, for the land he may annually bring under cultivation, or for all his land.

Village Rent.—Secondly. A rent may be settled with all the meeraffadars of each village jointly, for a fixed sum of money for a period of years.

A Mootah, or Zemindary Rent.—Thirdly. A rent may be settled with individuals for a number of villages to be united in one rent, for a fixed sum, for a period of years.

Two other modes of collecting the revenue have been known in Tanjore; viz.

A Grain Rent.—A grain rent on the meeraffadars, agreeing for a given quantity of grain, and contracting to take the share of government, at a given price; and Aumany, or a Division on the Field of the Produce.—Aumany; a division of the produce with the cultivators; who, taking their share, enter into no engagements with government.

17. The committee have considered themselves at liberty to exclude from consideration the two last stated modes; because they have been pronounced, by the first authorities, to be radically bad.

18. The two first modes may at any time, by an adequate reduction, be made fixed rents, payable in all seasons.

19. The third mode may also at any time, and perhaps without a reduction, be made a fixed rent, payable in all seasons.

20. The consideration of the first mode of settlement, will lead particularly to an examination of the average standard produce, and commutation price, assumed in the settlement of Fully 1215; but the consideration of either must have reference to the warum, or share. These are the three principal points referred to the committee for investigation; they will commence with the share.

RYOTWAR RENT.

115. The objects of a ryotwar rent appear principally to be, to secure the inferior ryots from the oppression of the head ryots; to stimulate industry, by not imposing such a tax on improvement, as a division of the produce is supposed to be; and to relieve the industrious from the burthen of paying the tax of the indolent, which is supposed to result from a vil- lage rent. The committee will not here go into a consideration of the policy or practicality of the measure, of making a permanent ryotwar rent. They consider their investiga- tion to be confined to a recommendation of a mode of management introductory either to that mode, or to a permanent rent with mootahdars, should that measure be deemed ad- visable for the future period, proper. A ryotwar rent is much more easily established than a permanent ryot- war rent. In the first case, the ryot only pays for the land he actually cultivates; and not always for that, if it should prove unproductive. In the second case, he must pay a fixed sum in all seasons, for all the land he occupies, either in his meeraffec or other right.

116. The

116. The success of a ryotwar rent depends on the moderation of the land-tax: the ryot must be able, in all seasons, to replace his seed, to pay his labourers, and to defray the expense of his cattle; if from unfavourable seasons, or a season affording only a $\frac{1}{2}$, $\frac{1}{3}$, or $\frac{1}{4}$ crop, or other proportions under a full crop, the payment of the land-tax absorbs all his produce, he must be ruined; if it falls less severe, his means of cultivating in the next year, will be proportion- ably reduced. Capital cannot be acquired by a ryot, in the first year of the ryotwar rent; the inequality of a land-tax on each field in India, must always be great; it must be fixed by a reference to the varieties in the seasons, to the different degrees of productive power in the soil, and its means of irrigation; to the variation of produce, and to the fluctuations in price, arising out of the seasons. This is a combination of circumstances which must render the attainment of accuracy, very doubtful. The land-tax will, in the first instance, be unequal; and the longer it continues, the greater will be its inequality. In districts where there is more land, than can always be brought under cultivation in the year; and in districts where land is not watered from tanks and rivers, but dependant on falling rains for water, the ryots may exercise their own discretion, in selecting land which is most moderately assessed: land over- assessed will be waste; and its assessment will in consequence, some time or other, be reduced; but where land is every year nearly all under cultivation; where it is valuable and transfer- able property, an over assessment must ruin a portion of the ryots; and an under assessment productive of loss of revenue to government. In the one case, government cannot par- ticipate in the profits of the ryots; while, on the other, it must bear the loss, on the over- assessed land. The land-tax is meant to secure government, from the thefts, frauds, and loss of amanees; and the ryots, from the interference, persecution, and oppression, of native revenue officers, and from being taxed according to their produce: but if the land- tax is founded on erroneous principles, which, if reference be had to the persons who must form it, it is more likely to be, than on correct ones, the evils will exceed the benefits.

1st. Because, to establish a ryotwar rent, a considerable reduction must be made to enable a ryot to pay the loss of $\frac{1}{2}$, $\frac{1}{3}$, or $\frac{1}{4}$ crops when they occur, which they will do often, either on the whole of his land, or on a part; and entirely barren only is resorted to him.

2ndly. Because this deduction will unavoidably be, unequally distributed; and government will have to make up, at one time or another, the inequality of reduction, by a further remis- sion of rent on over-assessed land.

3dly. Because where there is no waste land, or but a small proportion of waste land to be occupied, as is particularly the case in Tanjore, government cannot recover in the occupa- tion of waste land, the first remission to the ryot, while it must bear all the loss of droughts, inundations, or other calamity, which may diminish the quantity of the annual culti- vation.

117. Although the best writers on revenue economy have declared, that for government to divide the produce with the cultivator is to tax improvement, yet it may be a question for discussion, whether the reasoning applies to the farmer of India. If the season be more un- certain in India than in Europe; if the articles of produce be more confined; and if the actual produce be more uncertain, and its price extremely variable, it seems not so injurious in a country where $\frac{1}{4}$ ths of the revenue of the state are from the land, that the government and the cultivator should participate in the risks produced by the foregoing circumstances. If the cultivator's share be liberal, his profit in good seasons, will be considerable; in bad sea- sons, his loss comparatively trifling. If government farms out its share, but leaves the ryot to receive his share in kind, the situation of the ryot is not altered.

118. If reference be had to the system of taxation in India before the Mahomedan con- quest, there is abundant reason to conclude that it was determined by those considerations which have regulated the taxes of other governments. A land-tax was known in many parts, but in most, it was confined to dry grain land, not fixed on the soil, but varying with the nature of the produce; why? because the productive power of the soil is of inferior con- sideration, where much more depends on the season, and the expected supply of water. It is not, in India, in the option of the cultivator to adopt the European system of a rotation of crops; his lands may one year yield him a produce of the value of 100, and lose none of its fertile powers; yet in the next, yield him not more than 20, because he is compelled, by the season, to change the article of culture. Where a land-tax is found, it is determined on this principle; but no where in India, the committee believes, is a land-tax on each field col- lected in all seasons, good or bad, whether the land is cultivated or not.

119. Unless in countries where a fixed demand exists for almost all the produce, a division of the nunjah produce will be found the practice; or, if a rent, it will have been regulated late in the year, and have been determined by the actual circumstances of the year: a division of the nunjah produce appears, therefore, to have been applicable to the circumstances of the climate, and to the nature of the government of India. How far it is at this period, applica- ble to this part of India, will be enquired into hereafter.

VILLAGE RENT.

120. A village rent on lease for a certain number of years, which is the next remove from a ryotwar rent, is so far favourable to the ryot, that the loss and the profit are equally partici- pated by the other partners of the village; that the chances of his being treated with mode- ration are more in his favour than in a ryotwar rent; that there is less apprehension from an over-assessment, because the rent may probably be determined by the offers of the villagers themselves, or by what they have paid for a continuance. The loss, one year with another, cannot be great; and, unless oppression is exercised, the loss of the inferior ryots can only be proportionate, and therefore not ruinous. Land in India is seldom a separate farm. All land belongs belongs to some village or another, whether it be cultivated or waste. This property, particularly in nunjah land, is watered by a common stream. In the water, in the pasture, and interests: lots are drawn in many villages for the annual, triennial, or decennial occupation of land; all disbursements for the repair of tanks, and water-courses leading from these tanks; all labour for village works of general utility; all contribution for religious ceremonies; all the pay and labour of the village artizans and officers, are regulated by this communion of interest. A ryotwar rent may separate the villager's flock from that usually clubbed for public pasture, and waste land, from his contribution to village charges, which, while moderate, it is a source of his happiness to make.

121. The advantages to government from a village rent on lease are, as follows:
 - 1st. The government is relieved from the loss, corruption, and fraud of an amanie management.
 - 2nd. It is secured from all the loss which may arise, from the establishment of an unequal land-tax.
 - 3rd. The annual rent will not depend on the correct ascertainment of the cultivation and produce; and, therefore, be not annually exposed to deterioration by the corruption or incapacity of native revenue officers.
 - 4th. A village rent will be much easier changed into a zemindary rent, than a ryotwar rent, and at a less loss of revenue to government.
 - 5th. The charges of collection will be considerably reduced.

122. It has been argued against this mode of settlement, that the obligation for the whole rent among the inhabitants of the same village is unjust, because the neglect of one partner may be wanton, or resistance to fulfil his share of the general engagement, willful. A few such cases may occur; but the frequency of them must, where they result from a neglect of individual interest, be limited. Villages will generally settle among themselves the best way of paying the rent of government, and will either engage for specific shares of the rent, or for the clubbing of the circular share of the produce. To many ryots, an exemption from a constant demand for rent which the union of the circular share affords, and the time thereby left them to follow their agricultural or other pursuits in their own way, are of more value to them, than a separate assessment on their lands, which compels them to become the retail or wholesale sellers of their own grain, and to give constant attendance on the officers of government.

123. A village rent supports that connection and unity of interests which exist among the meerasadars of the same village, and which, for reasons already given, it is more desirable to preserve than to destroy.

124. A rent of a certain number of villages to an individual, on a lease, has the following advantages:

- 1st. It lays the foundation for a permanent rent, at an early period.
- 2nd. It diminishes the expenses of cultivation.
- 3rd. It leaves the cultivator to pursue his own interest, in his own way, and at liberty either to rent, or divide the produce, as may be agreed on between him and the mootadar.
- 4th. It determines the revenue of government by competition; and affords the best chance of recovering all suppression of cultivation or produce.
- 5th. It relieves the officers of government from all details in a greater degree, than the village rent, which, since the establishment of courts of justice, may be considered an object of some importance.

125. Such a mode of rent, under laws competent to protect the people from manifest injustice, ought not to be oppressive to any person. The meerasadar would either take his share, and render in kind to the mootadar, the government share, or engage to commute it. His right would be his codewarum, his continuation of it, the act of his free-will. In a political point of view, such a rent may be liable to objection, because it may remove the people from under the immediate authority of the government officers, and place them too much under the influence of the mootadar. In a moral point of view, it may be objectionable, as leaving to the people the choice of dividing the produce, and placing before them temptations to the practice of fraud and corruption. Under a mootadar, the people might be harassed, but could not be openly oppressed, incurring no risk unless by choice. Their prosperity must gradually increase; their profit, never excessive; their loss, never great.

126. The committee have heard the danger of a monopoly of grain urged against such a system, but, provided the mootahs are not too extensive, and a free transit for grain, as at present, is preserved throughout the country, this apprehension would prove not well founded. If the country were rented out for a certain number of years to a few individuals, and an amany division allowed to the meerasadars, the temptation to a combination among the mootahdars, to keep up their grain, might be too strong to be resisted.

127. Another objection is urged against the introduction of mootahdars into Tanjore. It is, that the possession of land is so desirable, and sought after by all ranks with such avidity, that the mootahdar would have great temptation to take advantage of his situation, to get possession of a great portion of the meerasadar's right in his mootah. He would try to effect this, not by any open act of violence and injustice, but by practising every kind of vexation on the poorer meerasadars, which his influence would afford him an opportunity of doing, and which the interposition of public authority, might find it difficult to prevent.

128. The

128. The committee having given the foregoing explanation on the different modes of rent which have occurred to them, will now state the materials which exist for the formation of a rent, on either of the modes which have been stated.

RYOTWAR RENT.

129. A field rent, and a village rent, having been unknown in Tanjore previously to the cession of the provinces to the Company, there is no record before that period, of the relative fertility of the different fields, nor any particular account of the actual produce of the whole land of each village. The actual produce then, of Fussy 1210-11, 12, and 1213, being four years of aumany, with the estimated and actual produce for Fussy 1214, are the only materials for a ryotwar rent.

VILLAGE RENT.

130. This mode of rent never having been practised before Fussy 1214, there is no account on record of the produce of each village since the introduction of the puttuckdars, in 1782. A few scattered accounts of the estimated or caboolat produce of villages might probably be obtained for one or more of the years from 1776, to that period: but the result could not be satisfactory. The puttuckdars either have not, or would not, give true accounts of their collection from each village. The aumany management furnishes accounts, it is true, of the actual produce of each village, but no account exists of the value or sale price of the grain; no particular account of the sales of the grain of each village, from two causes, the grain was sold at depots. The price of grain must vary in each village, from two causes, the situation of the village, and the quality of the grain. A calculation might, no doubt, be made of the revenue of each village, but it would be liable to much error, from the fictitious price which must be assumed for the grain. The rent in Fussy 1214, having been a village rent, the accounts of that year, show the actual collections from each village. In Fussy 1215, although the rent is the result of the standard produce, and has no relation to the actual produce of the year, the accounts will nevertheless exhibit the actual collection from each village. In Fussy 1216, the rent is a village rent, and the accounts at the end of the year will show the actual collections from each village. There will then be three years of actual collections by which to regulate a village rent, and the actual produce of four years, to apply the selling price to, if more years are required, of the value in money of the revenues of each village.

MOOTAH RENTS.

131. In this mode of rent, it is of course understood, that proposals will be invited, and if reference be had to the information of the collective revenue of the province, which the committee have entered in different parts of their reports, there appears abundant materials by which to estimate the fairness of the proposals which may be received.

132. In the examination of the detailed accounts, of which abstracts are inserted in this report, the committee were early led to adopt an opinion, that the ryotwar rent in Tanjore presented no benefit to government, or to the ryot, proportionate to the risk of loss, because the great fluctuations in the extent of cultivation, in the produce, and in the market price of the produce, rendered it extremely difficult to adopt a standard for assessment; because the reduction which must be made, to enable the ryot to undertake the risk of the market, and of bad and indifferent crops, would cause a very considerable diminution in the revenue, without a positive security being obtained for the payment of the residue; because the extent of waste land is so insignificant, that the reduction on the present revenue, necessary to form a ryotwar rent, would not be counterbalanced by any proportionate increase from extended cultivation; so that a ryotwar rent in Tanjore would entail a permanent loss of revenue.

133. It may be argued, that in a district where land is so valuable as to sell at a high price, security would always exist in the land, for the revenue; but when once land is over assessed, it loses its value, and is no longer saleable. In Tanjore, the changes which are liable to occur in the channels of the rivers, and the loss of water by the breaking of banks, must occasionally produce great deficiency. A village rent may support that loss, a single ryot could not.

134. It has been stated, that the government can, where the land-tax has been fixed, recover, by the means of duties on the articles of produce, what may have been remitted to form a land-tax; but if references be had to what the articles of culture chiefly are, no very great addition of revenue can be expected from this mode of taxation, without recurring to the oppressive mode of levying internal duties.

135. It ought perhaps to be urged, that the very extensive remission of warum, and of extra assessments, which, as noticed in para. 70, have been made in favour of the inhabitants, would go a considerable way, towards enabling them to pay a land-tax for all the land they cultivated, whatever might be the proportion of the crops, below a full crop; but the committee think they have furnished evidence, that the fluctuation is greater than an individual ryot can undertake to be responsible for, while the chances of inequality in the assessment are greatly against government.

136. Under the foregoing circumstances the Committee were at an early stage of their proceedings disposed to recommend the immediate establishment, for a certain number of years, either of a mootah rent, or of a village rent, according as circumstances might, during their investigations, induce a preference to one or the other mode.

137. The committee will here remark, that very extensive property in land is held by the meerasadars. Many possess from three to four thousand acres, not always a separate and distinct property in whole villages, but in various proportions of the meerasadee of different villages.

villages. But the property of a much greater number, is very small; many of those whose property is extensive were formerly puttuckdars, and are said to have acquired the property, by means not always justifiable.

138. On a subject so interesting to the future welfare of the inhabitants of the province of Tanjore, the committee did not fail to consult the wishes of the people on the mode of rent best suited to their interests, customs and prejudices, giving them to understand, however, that a division of the produce with government would never again be resorted to, for reasons which they were not ignorant of, and have not forgot. The nature of the mootah rent, village rent, and of the ryotwar rent, were accordingly explained to a large body of meeraffadars, and an unreferred communication of their sentiments invited.

139. The result of this conversation was, that the meeraffadars had no objection to a mootah rent, provided they were left in the enjoyment of their present advantages, and one village not compelled to pay the losses of another, or each village assessed separately and arbitrarily, for sabbendry or other expenses of management. They seemed not free from suspicion that the mootahdar would evince a desire to possess himself of their property, in the manner the puttuckdar had done; and it was only on a full explanation, that they would be left at liberty to rent, or not, as best suited their interest, that they admitted a mootah rent would be so far free from objection.

140. The meeraffadars, who had been formerly puttuckdars, seemed rather unwilling to be placed under the control of a mootahdar; but the prospect of a division of the produce got the better of their disinclinations, so that they did not urge far this objection. The preference given to a village rent on lease was, however, unanimous, and a period of five years was fixed on, as the most eligible for the duration of the lease.

141. Under the foregoing circumstances, combined with those stated by the committee in their observation on each mode of rent, they have no hesitation in recommending the immediate establishment of a village rent on lease, in the province of Tanjore, wherever such a rent can be introduced on equitable terms to the government and to the people.

142. If there should exist any reason for doubting the correctness of the accounts of Fusly 1212, or for supposing that those of Fusly 1210 and 1211 are on the aggregate too high, it might be expedient to invite proposals from the meeraffadars of each village; or where the meeraffadar may decline proposing, to form the villages into mootahs, and invite proposals for the rent of each mootah. As there can exist no doubt that the meeraffadars would prefer a division of the produce to any rent whatever; so it is necessary to be prepared for the endeavours they will make to obtain this mode of management. If the country be divided into mootahs of from 4,000 star pagodas to 10,000 star pagodas annual value, and proposals are invited for the mootahs, as well as for each village, the meeraffadars, where they may prefer renting their own villages, will most probably make offers adequate to the just expectations of government, which, without such competition, cannot be calculated on, under the known disposition of the people of Tanjore to combine in their opposition to any measure not exactly conformable to their wishes. Such a measure, will facilitate the early establishment of the rent, and will probably bring to light a part of those undue gains, which there is some reason to think the meeraffadars have enjoyed, from the suppression and concealment of the frauds committed in Fusly 1212. Strangers and adventurers may be excluded from giving proposals, and only persons of known landed property be admitted to hold a mootah.

143. Recurring to the subject of warum, the committee are of opinion that the advantage enjoyed by the meeraffadars under this head, are so considerable, that unless a system of rent is introduced, which involves them in a certain risk, the committee would be disposed to recommend a general reduction of warum, permitting the meeraffadars, however, to enjoy a portion of those benefits which have been bestowed on them by the bounty of the British government, leaving their warum at a higher rate than that which existed on the cession of the province; but they recommend the continuance of the present rates, where the meeraffadars may undertake the risk of a village rent. And they beg leave to submit, how far it might be expedient, under what has been stated, to reduce the rates of warum, in instances where the meeraffadars may decline every invitation to rent, in the hope of receiving their full share, by a division of the produce from a mootahdar. Such a proposal may, in the first instance, appear unjust; but when the immoral practices are considered, to which a division of the produce opens the door of temptation, an incitement to relinquish such a mode, from motives of personal interest, is perhaps a duty of the government. The meeraffadars would still be left in the enjoyment of very considerable advantages, as may be seen on reference to para. 70, while at the same time, a certain degree of incitement to rent their villages, is held out to them. In all measures of this kind, the recommendation must arise out of a knowledge of the character of the people, and under this knowledge, the committee beg leave to recommend that this proposition be adopted.

144. Whether the rent to be established be eventually a village rent, or a mootah rent, the fluctuations which have existed in the demand of the circar from punjah, toornadayum, or bangayut and topeland, during the last six years, renders it expedient that the demand should now be fixed once for ever, not only as a measure of justice, but in order that each meeraffadar under a village rent, may know what he has to pay for his land of either of the above descriptions, and that the mootahdar or meeraffadar, or meeraffadars collectively, may know how to regulate their proposals.

Extract FORT ST. GEORGE Revenue Consultations, the 27th November 1807.

Extract Mr. Hodgson's Report on the Province of COIMBATORE;

dated 10th September 1807.

74. The principal collector having submitted to the Board of Revenue an arrangement for dividing the Northern division into estates, and for settling the revenue permanently, or on lease, it may be expected that I should state such opinions on the subject, as local inquiry may have enabled me to form. I shall accordingly venture to communicate a few observations on the proposed arrangement.

75. If there be any truth in the observation, that "the attention of the sovereign can be at best but a very general and vague consideration of what is likely to contribute to the better cultivation of the greater part of his dominions;" and if the reasoning on which a permanent settlement of the revenue of India was recommended to the Court of Directors, and approved by them, be not erroneous, it would seem to be at once a settled axiom of revenue management, that, as soon as the resources of a country have been ascertained, and the rights of the cultivator and of government defined; government ought to withdraw from the immediate and detailed management of its revenues, and introduce the agency of landlords, intermediate between them and the cultivator; because the attention* of a landlord is a particular and minute consideration of what is likely to be the most advantageous application of every inch of ground upon his estate.

76. Applying this train of reasoning to the province of Coimbatore generally, but at present more particularly to the Northern division, it will have been seen that the resources of that division have been ascertained by a survey of all the land cultivated, arable, and waste; that the rights of the government, and of the cultivators, have been defined and fixed by the assessment of a rent, in money, on all the gradations of soil; that by the interchange of muchelkas and pottahs, the cultivator has been familiarized to a limit of demand, and to the practice of securing himself from exaction, by the possession of a written voucher†.

77. This practice, and this fixed rent on land, has continued in the Northern division for several years; during which the revenue has risen, or fallen, according as the seasons have been favourable or otherwise. The rate of assessment has not varied.

78. Now, it is an important question for discussion, whether it is politic or expedient to continue any longer this mode of management, or whether any other mode, better calculated to promote the prosperity of the country, can be introduced? because the establishment of courts of justice, while it has introduced forms inimical to detailed management, holds out to the ryot, security against the oppression of landlords or head inhabitants, which may render detail on the part of government, which was one of the chief objects of it, no longer necessary.

79. By the mode of management now existing, it is necessary to the circar, or sovereign power, to ascertain, annually, the extent of land occupied, and the gradation of soil under occupation by each individual. The register of gradations and of assessments on each field, are in the custody of the curnum; it is he who registers the occupation of land, and informs the cultivators of the assessment on it.

80. On the honesty, therefore, of the curnums it depends, whether the land of the ryot be classed in its proper class, or rated to its proper assessment. He may place the land in a lower scale, rate it to a lower assessment, or omit a part of the cultivation altogether: that curnums will do such things† there exist abundant proofs, in the detection which the examiners, annually employed to discover suppressed cultivation, make. It is much easier, however, to detect an erroneous return of the quantity of land cultivated, than it is to find out whether the true rate of assessment has been fixed on the land, or the land properly classed. The whole interest of the village is against the circar in a ryotwar rent, and the curnum runs generally less risk in defrauding government, than in disobliging a head ryot.

81. The necessity of annually sending out examiners, should be moderated by a render as true accounts, is another evil arising out of a ryotwar rent. These examiners, from an excess of zeal, or with a view that their severity of examination should be moderated by a douceur, harrass the ryots, and torment the revenue officers; they often return an exaggerated account of suppressed cultivation, or are accused of bribery: both acts, lead to long and vexatious investigations; and which, under the establishment of courts of justice, must be referred to them, and to a distant period for adjudication.

82. These lenities, and these annual exposures to fraud, are necessary consequences of a ryotwar rent, under the immediate superintendence of the officers of government.

83. If a ryot fails to pay his rent, the whole process of distraint laid down in regulation XXVIII. 1802. must be resorted to, and the same forms be gone through with the ryot who

* Extract of a letter from the Governor General in council, dated 19th July 1804.

Para. 31. In all cases it is desirable that the settlement should be formed with the zemindars, or other descriptions of landholders; where no such descriptions of persons exist, it would be proper to form the lands into estates, and to dispose of them to persons who will attend to their cultivation; these persons, as well as all other landholders, should be permitted freely to transfer their estates by sale, gift, or any other manner. It can never be desirable that the government itself should act as the proprietor of lands, and should collect the rents from the immediate cultivators of the soil; the rates of rents payable for the different descriptions of produce, must vary in every district, and often in every village; where any proprietors may be found, they will generally collect these rents agreeable to the specific engagements which they may conclude with their tenants, or according to the established usage of the country. If any difference should arise between landholders and the tenants regarding these engagements or usages, the courts of judicature will form the proper tribunals for deciding such differences. Those questions are of private right, in which the executive authority cannot interfere consistent with justice, policy, or its own interests.

pays a rent of 6 fanams, as with him, who pays a rent of 1,000 pagodas: the number of ryots holding pottahs in Coimbatore cannot be less than sixty or seventy thousand; the number of pottahs issued has been stated at 117,877.

84. If the process of Regulation XXVIII. is not enforced against each defaulter as soon as he falls in arrear, the evil spreads; and those who are able, and those who are not, equally withhold their rent.

85. By a rule belonging to this mode of management, it is considered, that, when land is once occupied, the rent must be paid on, whether it is cultivated or not.

* Para. 16. Collector's Report, 30th September 1805:

The causes are, the contraction of farms from the badness of the seasons, and the remission of rent to the ryots in instances where the crops had failed, after ploughing and sowing the lands engaged for. It would have been useless, as well as impolitic, to have called for the fulfilment of sums which was prevented by the seasons alone, and not by the indifferency of the ryots.

mode of management, ultimately increase, although liable to fluctuation according to the collector to ascertain the growing prosperity of the country. The question is, however, whether it is desirable to continue this detail; and whether it is calculated to promote the real welfare of the people, and the true prosperity of the country?

88. That the future prosperity of the country, depends on the correctness of the survey rates of assessment, if a ryotwar rent is to continue, will not be denied; because, wherever they are too high, the land will be abandoned, or the ryot must be ruined. The combination of cal-

† The assessments in Salem are of three kinds, in the three divisions into which it was divided under Col. Read.

The 1st division high; the 2d division lower; the 3d different, but not ascertained: one division is higher assessed than both north and south Coimbatore, as they stood before the assessment in the latter was reduced. These countries are only divided by the river Cavery.

89. That a cultivator must often, or sometimes, lose by this mode of management, will not be denied by the greatest advocates for the system; because such is the fluctuation in the seasons, and in the prices of grain, that a departure from what is, I believe, called the true system, is frequently resorted to: remission for lands occupied, but not cultivated, and even for parts of fields which have been sown, but have not proved productive, are occasionally made, and annual advances of tuccavy are required.

90. The examination into the extent of land occupied; the correct application of the survey rates of assessment to such land; the investigation into the circumstances of individuals claiming remission, and the determination of the quantum of remission;—all these details must be gone into annually under a ryotwar rent, by the native revenue officers of the circar. As these officers cannot be very deeply interested † in the result, unless by corruption made parties: it may happen that the examination and investigation may not be favourable to the cultivator, or, if favourable to him, greatly disadvantageous to the circar.

§ Extract of a letter from the Judge of Tirhoot in Bengal, to the question whether "the country under his jurisdiction was in a state of improvement?"

As it is upwards of ten years since I was first appointed to this district, I can confidently assert, that the improvement with respect to population, cultivation, and commerce is very great. I have frequently travelled over many parts of the district, and the increase in the cultivation is astonishing, and has frequently surprised me: I verily believe that it has increased, since I have been in the district, in the proportion of one-third, and the zemindars are yearly bringing into cultivation large tracts of jungle and waste lands; and I consider this to be chiefly, if not entirely, owing to the confidence they have in the assurances of government, respecting the decennial settlement.

92. Without questioning the correctness of the survey of the Salem country, it is an ascertained fact, that the mootahdars of the estates in that district, have found it to their advantage to alter the survey rates of assessment; and in many villages, of which I had an opportunity of examining, both the curnums and the proprietors of the estate, the alteration had extended to various proportions of the land under cultivation, to some as far as to half. These alterations, were all in favour of the cultivator; because the proprietor has not the power of raising the survey rates of assessment, and in the cases alluded to, had no disposition to do so. Here, then, is a proof at least that a survey rate of assessment cannot reach all the minute circumstances of detail, which individual interest can.

93. On examining the register of complaints filed in the court at Salem, few have been found preferred, against mootahdars by ryots. It will not be said that the ryots there, are afraid to complain, when it is known that in that country, they had been in the habit of laying their grievances before the European authority, long before the establishment of courts of justice. It may therefore be concluded that the mootah system has not proved injurious to the ryot: on the contrary, that he has experienced great relief under that system in the Salem country, during the severity of the late seasons.

94. Moderate, as the rates of assessment in the Northern division of Coimbatore are admitted to be, there is such abundance of waste arable land, that the reduction of them still lower would not probably, in the first year, diminish the revenue, and might ultimately augment it; but such a revision by government, after the rates have been so long established, would be very impolitic, for obvious reasons: but the fact, if admitted, will point out how individual interest may be exerted in the improvement of the country.

95. There is one remark, however, to which it is necessary to attract attention, as particularly applicable to a district in which the rent is fixed on the fields, viz. that an extensive cultivation may, unless the demand for grain be co-extensive, be productive of great inconvenience to ryots, under a ryotwar rent, if not of ultimate loss. The price of paddy has been known to fluctuate 50 or 60 and 100 per cent; of other grains, proportionately. The price of paddy must always fall considerably below the general average, whenever the punjah produce shall be greatly augmented, and from favourable seasons, no markets should be found for it in the eastern provinces. A suspension of the investment at Salem, a diminution of the number of troops, are also circumstances which contract very materially, the demand for grain. On this subject, I propose saying a few words hereafter; but at present, with only to observe, that in such years, it is in the power of a mootahdar, by taking part of the produce in commutation of his rent, to afford seasonable and sensible relief to his ryot, with a prospect of advantage to himself; because he can most probably afford to wait for a market, which not one in ten thousand ryots, could do.

96. The proportion of punjah land has been explained to be small, in this province; the waste in punjah is not considerable. The extent of punjah land is extensive, and the arable waste, much more. The punjah cultivation depends on the falling rain. The waste is in a great degree, free from jungle. It is only therefore an augmentation of capital and stock that is required, to enable the cultivators to increase considerably their farms, and a circulation of specie, and an increase of population, to consume the increased supply.

97. Under the conviction arising out of the foregoing investigation, I concur in opinion with the collector, that it is a most desirable measure that the estates into which the Northern division has been formed, should be at an early period, transferred to the management of individual persons, and that as soon as practicable after the alteration of the teerwas in of individual persons, the same system be extended to that division.

98. In the present state of these districts, where so much waste arable land exists, it may not be necessary to settle at this period, the revenue permanently; and it would be inexpedient to sell the estates. The purchase-money would, where the means of the individuals likely to become proprietors, are small, deprive them of those resources which would enable them to improve their estates, and meet the contingencies of adverse seasons. The assessment of an equitable permanent revenue would also be much facilitated by the experience which would be gained of the result of the management of the renters during their lease, and under the courts of justice.

99. There are exceptions to the foregoing statement, with regard to the property of individuals; for some of the gours of the province, particularly in the Southern division, are possessed of considerable wealth, obtained by improper means, during the anarchy*, which prevailed at various periods while the province was under the dominion of the house of Hyder. By adopting a system of rent on lease, a portion of this ill-begotten wealth will, in all probability, be appropriated to purposes of agricultural utility, particularly if good behaviour, and punctuality in the payment of the rent, during the lease, shall be declared to be a positive claim to the estate on a permanent rent, whenever it may be resolved to fix, for ever, the land revenue of the country. It will have the effect, very probably, of identifying the interest of those hitherto restless and turbulent gours with that of government, and give them a pre-eminence which they have frequently held, and have ceased to hold, with regret. This pre-eminence, when connected with a property, which a renewable and transferable lease would be, could not, it is presumed, under the establishment of courts of justice, prove detrimental to the tranquillity of the country.

100. Whether or not the rent shall be progressive at the expiration of the first lease, and what should be the period of the lease, may be considered subordinate parts of the plan; as also, the best means of ascertaining the gradual improvement which the country may undergo, if at the expiration of the first lease, an increase of rent should be deemed advisable.

101. During the lease, such improvements as the country is still capable of, may be carrying on, and such provision made for an increase of revenue from those improvements, as the renters and collectors agree upon.

102. If the propositions for renting the estates into which the Northern division has been divided, be adopted, and the same plan afterwards extended to the Southern division, a reduction dated 24th September 1807.

25. The cultivation of nunjah is considered much more certain and regular, than the cultivation of punjah; it has every where, therefore, been more attended to than the punjah, by the ruling power, or its representatives. The labour of the cultivator, and his feed, is not so often lost, as in punjah. It is accordingly found, that, with few exceptions, the Brahmans are the owners of the greater part of the nunjah land. The revenue from it, being more certain, the attentions of the circle to it, is naturally greater: the grain is cut at one season, or two, at most; it is of one kind, or of two, and can be stored, watched, and sold, with much greater facility, than the other kinds of grain. The variations in the produce, and the circumstances of occasional droughts in surrounding countries, which cause great fluctuations in the price, hold out temptations of an increased revenue, by that means which the short-sighted policy of the native governments have never been able to forego. These are the reasons which have, it is supposed, made the practice of dividing the nunjah* produce with the cultivators, so general. The practice is, no doubt, under an arbitrary government, favourable to the cultivators; because it relieves them from all responsibility, and secures them better against exactions, by furnishing them with the means of counteracting by fraud, what violence may attempt to extort. But the practice would not have continued for so many ages, where the power of the sovereign had no limit but his own will, if it had not been considered more profitable than any other.

26. The share of the produce of punjah land, which custom has established, as the revenue of government from this description of land, was uniformly rendered in money. It has no where that I have been able to ascertain, a few instances excepted, been paid in kind. The mode of payment varies, in almost every province; in some, it is paid according to the kind of grain grown; in others, according to the soil; and in some, the whole punjah land of a village is given up for a fixed sum. This last practice was pretty general in the province of Tinnevely.

27. The kinds of punjah grain cultivated, are extremely numerous, sown at various periods, according as the season is favourable; the produce is very uncertain, depending on the quantity of rain which may fall. Those kinds which carry the grain in ears, are reaped at one season, and those that bear the grain in pods, at another season. The punjah land is often at a great distance from the village; it would require a great expense in sowing, under a system of share or warum, to estimate the produce, to attend the reaping of the crop, and the beating of it out, as well as to secure the circular share, whether it be housed or stacked on the field. Some kinds of grain are extremely difficult to estimate; several kinds are often sown, in the same field, each kind ripening at a different period: cotton, when the plant is arrived at full growth, requires to be gathered daily. These causes seem sufficient, to account for the practice of the circular relinquishing, every where, all interference with the produce of dry grain lands, and for the favourable rates of the cultivator's share, compared with those in nunjah, in districts where the extent of nunjah lands is great.

28. To establish a ryotwar rent, in a district of which the land is all punjah, or nearly so, is then only methodizing and ameliorating the ancient practice, or fixing the rent on the land where it may have been determined, on the kind of grain sown; it is not a fundamental alteration or innovation on ancient custom. To establish a money rent on each field of neglected land, is an innovation, and is attended with much greater difficulty, most productive of loss of revenue to government, and be therefore, in all the provinces of the Carnatic, of that right of metairie feudal tenure, or conventio, from lands cultivated by rent, to the same tenure, as the other; thereby annihilating the present distinction of ranks; but as I propose returning this subject to the future, I only wish to impress a remembrance of the fact, that where ryotwar has been supposed to succeed best, viz. in Madras, Coimbatore, Dindigul, and the Ceded Countries, there is, comparatively speaking, a very small portion of nunjah land.

29. Previously to discussing the modes of management, which appear practicable to be established in this province, and the merits of each, the state of the annual cultivation and revenue will be shown, as necessary to exemplify the observations which will be proper to make, on the past and future management.

30. The following Abstract of the cultivation of Nunjah, since the acquisition of the province, will show the fluctuation, during a period of six years:—

* Garden land.

31. The difference between the greatest extent of nunjah land cultivated during the above six years, and the least extent, is about 24 p' C'. The difference between the greatest extent of punjah land cultivated, and the least, is about 19 p' C'. These fluctuations are not, perhaps, considerable; but it will be remembered, that the produce does not always correspond with the extent of cultivation. The cultivation may be greater, than in any former year; while the produce may prove, much less.

32. The following Statement of cultivation and produce will exemplify the foregoing observation:—

NUNJAH.

Average Produce	—	26,840	202 7	122 4

33. The average produce per cawny given above, is low, compared with the average produce, in other districts. The first sort of lands in the Durmasanum talooks will produce about 167½ mercials per cawny; the second sort, about 146 mercials; and the third sort, about 120½ mercials.

34. It is the averaging of the whole cultivation on all the land cultivated, part of which is only partially productive, which causes the average produce to appear so low, when reduced to a general average per cawny. The nunjah lands of this province do not, however, appear to yield so great a produce on an average, as they do, in other provinces: the reason is said to be, that the tillage of the land is but indifferently attended to.

35. As the produce of punjah land is never divided, the following Abstract of the annual cultivation and revenue will shew the fluctuation during six years, and average tax on the land:—

36. It must here be remarked, that the assessment on nunjah land has undergone frequent alterations, since the acquisition of the province. It is not, therefore, possible to draw any conclusion, from the fluctuations in the revenue, as exhibited above: the nature of these changes will be noticed hereafter.

37. Nunjah Mail Punjah is a species of punjah cultivation carried on, in the stubble of paddy land, or on paddy land for which there is not sufficient water, to enable the occupier to sow that grain; but on which, availing himself of the moisture remaining in the ground, or of the water that may be at hand, which can be drawn by picotahs to the fields, he is able to sow the best of the kinds of dry grain.

38. The extent and value of this kind of cultivation is shown hereunder:—

40. Vanpyer land is the toteal, or garden cultivation in backyards, or select spots cultivated with plantains, sugar cane, tobacco, chillies, &c. The extent is not great, but the assessment has recently been increased, and requires modification.

41. The soornadayem, or what is called the ready money collections, are independent of the land, but are always classed under land revenue; they need not be separately stated. The following Statement exhibits the Revenue from Soornadayem and all the foregoing heads, from the province, for each year:—

42. In the assessments under the head of Soornadayem, alterations have been made since the cession of the province to the Company; and in the last two years, an increase of the tax has taken place, which has given rise to a great number of complaints.

43. The following Statement will shew the actual collections from the province of Tinnevelly, for a long series of years. The remarks will explain the changes which, during that period, have occurred in the assessment by warum, by rent, or by extra taxes on the nunjah land; to which, being the principal object of investigation, it is confined:—

1148	1738	Not known.	Not known.	In the government of the Hindoos, it was not the custom to measure the land of the grofs produce of every cottah. From four to five cottahs were paid to the circar in kind; and in some villages from 40 C ^{ts} , 45 C ^{ts} , and 50 C ^{ts} per cottah of land, was collected in addition in money. This assessment, compared with the average produce, must have been very low.
1149	1739.	Budha Sahab.		The land was measured with a rod of 6½ cubits, instead of 7 cubits, and 7 cottahs of grain were required for every cottah of land watered by the Tamtrapany river, or under never failing watercourses; for lands watered by tanks, half the above, or 3½ cottahs for every cottah, was required. In some villages, the grain was commuted for money; in others, not.

44. An attempt has been made to explain the reason why the produce of the nunjah land has been found to have been so generally divided. It will now be observed, from the foregoing explanations, that the practice has not been often changed in this province, previously to the cession in July 1801. During the Hindoo government, which showed so much favour to the Bramins, the possessors of grants in the Darmasenum lands were only required to render a given quantity of grain, and to pay a small sum of money for each cottah of land. This portion of grain, or the amount of the payment, may, perhaps, have been not much more than is paid by the proprietors of estates in Canara and Malabar, or it may have been less. The revenue of government from this province, tradition says, amounted, at one time, to only one-sixth of the gross produce. In the first years of the Mahomedan conquest, the grain proportion was 8 cottahs, and an extra tax in money, likewise was demanded. During the period of Mahomed Ifoof's management, and for a few years subsequent thereto, the grain rent was commuted for money, according to the market price; but this can hardly be called a rent; it was little more than making over the circar grain, as it was cut, to the inhabitants to sell, and collecting the amount of the sales, from them. During part of the time Ifoof Khan was in charge of the province, the price of grain was high, and a large body of troops was in the country; the revenues are therefore, unusually high, in his management. Various changes in the warum and share, and in the extra demands, took place during a succession of Mahomedan managers from 1730 to 1780, till at length about the year 1781, the warum became fixed at 50 per cent. (with the exceptions of the period of the Company's assumption in 1790) for all the Darmasenum lands. The extra demands in money, continued variable, sometimes being increased, and at others diminished. During the assumption of the Carnatic in the year A.D. 1783, when Mr. Irwin was collector, the country was rented, not by villages, but by mootahs. The same plan was adopted, during the assumption in 1790, when Mr. Torin was collector; none of the inhabitants subrented from the mootahdars, during the period of these rents.

45. In later periods, from 1793 to 1799 inclusive, the country has been under aumane, and the nunjah crops been divided with the inhabitants. From Fully 1210 to Fully 1212 inclusive, out the districts to 7 mootahdars for three years, from Fully 1216 inclusive, the from Fully 1211, the first year of the Company's government, to Fully 1216 inclusive, the same share, as allowed the inhabitants for the nunjah produce during the latter period of the nabob's management, has been continued; but the additional tax in money, has been nominally from an increased measurement of the land. During this period, the country has been nominally nally rented by villagers; I say nominally, because, in the first place, the car harvest has always been divided by the inhabitants, such part only as remained unfold at the time of forming the dowie, being added to the rent: in the next place, because the car has always taken, in kind, about 1/3 of the car share in the peshanum crop. The rents have never been con- eluded, before the end of February, and have sometimes not been finished, before the end of May; so that there has always been an aumanie management, for seven months; in one case, for nine months; and in two instances, for nearly eleven months; and although there has been a rent, gibbently have annually been employed to superintend and estimate the peshanum crops, before permission has been granted to the cultivators to reap it.

46. It is not necessary to detail what must be the vexation, the trouble, and the loss, under such a system. The produce of the car harvest may be estimated, on an average, at cottahs 2,64,260. The harvest begins in the beginning of September, and continues, till the middle of December. During this period, it must happen, from the nature of the management, that the peshanum grain of the former year, has not been disposed of. The peshanum harvest begins about the latter end of January, and ends about the beginning of June. The time required to make the estimate of the car crop, and to send the accounts; the time required to examine those accounts, and to determine the price at which the car grain shall be sold, precludes the possibility of carrying on the sales, expeditiously.

47. At the time of forming the dowie accounts, in order to conclude the rent, there is then the whole of the peshanum crops, and much of the car, on hand. For example, the following Memorandum will show the amount of grain on hand, at the periods mentioned.

YEAR.	DATE.	CAR.	PECHANUM.
Fusly 1211	- - - -	- - - -	- - - -

	30th April	13,732 9 6	2,07,042 1 -

48. When it is considered, that so large a quantity of grain, is thrown at once into the market, it will not create surprise that the revenue cannot be collected, within the Fusly, or that superabundance, and partial scarcities, should exist in one and the same year. Accordingly, it appears by the accounts, that the collections have been made in arrears, as follows:

	S. P.	F. C.

49. From the foregoing circumstances, it must be evident that the mode of management in the province of Tinnevelly, has been very little better than aumanie; that therefore, an immediate change, for a system of greater permanency, and of less annual vexation to the officers of government and to the people, is highly expedient.

50. Although the average produce of each nunjah village for a series of years, is procurable, if a field rent on nunjah land be deemed expedient, no account of the average produce of each field, can be obtained; the inhabitants must be left to assess the fields among themselves, or the assessments must be regulated by native revenue officers. In both cases, there is much injustice to one party, or to the other, to be apprehended, from partiality on the part of the head inhabitants, or corruption, or an excess of zeal on the part of the native revenue officers. These acts of injustice are difficult to remedy, even when discovered; and, if field rents should by chance have been fixed, with tolerable correctness, that part of aumanie management, which requires the annual extent of cultivation to be ascertained, still remains, with the further detail of ascertaining the sorts of land of which the cultivation of each individual is composed. For the detail of the inconveniences attending this annual scrutiny, I beg leave to refer to my report on Coimbatore.

51. It is not necessary that I should go into any detail on the subject of the assessment of the punjah land. The variations in the assessment have been very numerous, and do not, as yet, appear to have been revised, for the purpose of fixing them. In four districts, an assessment by fields had been begun; but further experience has shown the necessity of a modification, before declaring them fixed. During the latter part of the nabob's government, the whole punjah land of a village, was generally given up for a fixed sum called kulgoottawa, which sum the inhabitants divided among themselves on the lands they proposed to cultivate, or had cultivated. Under such an indefinite mode, various irregularities must have existed; these irregularities are only partially corrected. But, as the collector has found it expedient to make an immediate reference to the board of revenue on the subject, it is not necessary for me to give give any detail of the changes the punjah assessment, has undergone. It will, I hope, be thought sufficient, if I state that frequent personal communication and investigations have produced an union of opinion on the subject; and that I concur in the recommendation made by the collector to the board of revenue.

52. The foornadayem taxes, and the taxes on trees, have also been investigated, and the nature of the reform to be submitted for the determination of the board of revenue, and of government, will be stated by the collector to the board of revenue. The amount * of these taxes will, on reference to para. 41, be found to have been very considerable. They certainly partake, at present, of the nature of a professional tax; but may be easily modified to a definite quit rent, which may be made light, in comparison with the former tax. The people of Tinnevelly have, already experienced the relief of an abolition of the customs and town duties, amounting to between thirty and fifty thousand star pagodas; and a proportion of them, will experience still further relief, by the proposed reduction of the punjah teerwa; and if that reduction produces an increase of cultivation, as is anticipated, the price of the dry grain will fall, and be a great relief to the manufacturing and labouring class of the community.

53. By an order of government dated it was directed, that all weavers working for the Company, should be exempted from the payment of loom tax or house tax, by which it was understood, that this relief should not extend to other weavers, not so employed. In the Salem district, all loom tax was, I believe, abolished, and a stamp duty on cloth, levied in lieu of it. In this district, in the present contracted state of the investment, those weavers who have no longer employment from the company, and little from others, are, by the foregoing interpretation, assessed with the loom tax as now existing in this district, because they are not working for the company. It seems desirable either that all should pay a defined quit rent, like other classes of inhabitants, or that all should be exempt. There are more weavers in this province, than the company are ever likely to find employment for, at one period. The demand will, therefore, always exist for employment, and no exemption is necessary to secure workmen for the company. Under the nabob's government, such an indulgence might have had a favourable effect.

54. It is now necessary to consider, whether the present mode of realizing the public revenue in this province, shall be continued; if not, what mode shall be established.

55. Under the explanations which have been given in the statement, showing the revenue for a succession of years, it will have been observed, that, in addition to the large share of the produce received in the first instance by government, various taxes have been levied, either in money or grain, from the inhabitants, on the nunjah produce; viz.

- Yawanah in grain,
- D* - in money,
- Peiskar's yawanah,
- Channel marah, and
- Nuzzer.

56. Of these taxes, the yawanah in money, and in grain, still continue. The yawanah in money was levied upon each cottah of land cultivated; the size of the cottah differed, according to the size of the rod with which it was usual to measure the land. The demand still continues on the cottah; but as the number of cottahs has increased in account, by the uniform rod which was used in surveying the land in Fusly 1212, the tax has increased, without any increase of benefit to the people, and forms an increased assessment, founded on no rule or principle, and which causes great complaints. It is desirable that this tax should be modified; and if government would, at the same time, grant the further indulgence of commuting the whole of the yawanah, which has, at all times, formed an unpopular impost on the people for a cursum and tank marah, there is reason to be confident that the arrangement would prove of considerable relief to the people, and of great ultimate benefit to them and to government.

57. In this province, an aumanie management, a rent by villages, and a mootah rent, have all obtained, for a shorter or a longer period. The mootah rent under the management of Messrs. Irwin and Torin, although undertaken in a country just assumed for a temporary period, and during actual war in the Northern provinces, does not show an unfavourable appearance, compared with the revenue, at any other time. The village rent under Ifoof Khan's management, and subsequent thereto, certainly exhibits a higher revenue than at any other period; but whether this is to be attributed to a more prosperous state of things, to Ifoof Khan's energy, to extortion, or to the mode of rent, it is difficult to determine at this distance of time.

58. It is said, however, to have originated from the high price which grain bore, and to the number of troops at that time, in the province.

59. I have already remarked, that a considerable diminution of revenue must result, from the establishment of a ryotwar rent on nunjah land; that under aumanie, every advantage of a high produce and low price, and low produce and high price, is turned to the account of government. Where individuals are to undertake these risks, much, must be given to all; and a reduction be made on each field, adequate to the securing the occupier from loss, under all the circumstances of variations in the produce and price. It is true that, as there is more waste nunjah land in this province, than in Tanjore, there is a prospect that an extended cultivation might result from a low fixed rent in money on each nunjah field, which would counterbalance the first loss; but if the necessary repairs be made to secure an abundant supply of water, which it is in the contemplation of the collector immediately to undertake, little difficulty will exist of getting the land, now waste, cultivated under the terms of the present warum.

Mr. Hodgson's Report on the Province of Tinnevely; 24 Sept. 1807.

* Report on Coimbatour.

66. A survey is merely a measurement of the land; a measurement has been made in this province, of both the nujah and punjah land; the survey is, therefore, complete. The produce of the nujah has been divided with the inhabitants, for more than half a century, or the accounts of the gross produce preserved for that period; the value of the nujah revenue is, therefore, as well known now, as an assessment by fixed rents on fields, can determine it. The punjah land has been classed as well as measured, and if the propositions submitted to the Board of Revenue by the collector, for modifying the rates of money rent on each class, be adopted, all the knowledge of the revenue of the country which can be obtained, will have been procured, and the only questions remaining for discussion will be,

- 1st. Is it desirable to continue any longer, the detail of collecting the punjah rent from each ryot, through the agency of native revenue officers?
- 2nd. Is it desirable to change the system of dividing the nujah produce with the ryot, now obtaining, and which has obtained for so long a period, in order to establish a rent in money on each nujah field?

67. It is necessary, first, to premise, that it does not follow that a field rent in money, must be introduced, to avoid the detail and mischiefs of ambanic management, or the encumbrance on the field the produce with the cultivators. It has been shown in a former report* that rents by villages, or rents by mootahs, are calculated, effectually, to prevent the necessity of recurring to that system.

68. It is presumed that great detail, as in ryotwar rents, must have some object; that it cannot be intended, for a permanent system. If the revenue of the country, with all its resources, has been ascertained by a detailed management for six successive years, the object of detail may be said, to have been effectually accomplished.

69. If the process laid down in Regulation XXVIII. A.D. 1802, for the collection of the revenue from the cultivators, and the forms required be referred to, and the severity of the law, when all the forms are gone through, be taken into consideration, they will demonstrate that the necessity of recurring to that law for the enforcement of payment, cannot, consistent with the permanent prosperity of the country, be entrusted to uninterested native revenue officers. A renter under a renewable lease, or a village renter, (I speak not of speculators in tory, will not exert them, to persecute the unfortunate. A cultivator, against whom the rigours of the Regulation have been enforced, in the distraint of his property, and confinement of his person, is a productive labourer lost to the estate, or to the village. The satisfaction obtained to the proprietor of an estate in India, or to a village farmer, who has a valuable and transferable lease.

70. Regulation XXVIII. A.D. 1802, does not appear to have been compiled under the idea that the officers of government would, at any time, be in the situation in which proprietors or farmers are placed in, by that Regulation. Regulation XXVII. of the same year, is the Regulation by which the officers of government are supposed to collect the revenue, and in that regulation, it is contemplated, that the revenue will be received, either from proprietors, or farmers.

71. It is true, that although this Regulation is taken from the Bengal code, there does exist a species of ryotwar rent in two districts in Bengal, viz. in Sylhet and Chittagong. Such information as I possess of the state of those districts, and the difficulties the collectors experience in realizing the revenue, are here inserted.

Extract of a Letter from the Collector of Sylhet.

Para. 7.—“Lastly, with regard to the petty talooks, the jummas of which do not exceed cawns † 10 per annum, the greatest part of which have proved untaleable; it is necessary to explain, that these estates in general, are no more than bheets, or elevated spots by nature or art, upon which barrees, or habitations, have been erected by individuals following some mechanical profession, who go out to service, and are not constant residents of the place: such as artificers, bearers, boatmen, (dandees, mungees, &c.) These bheets, some of which have a trifling quantity of land attached to them, were allotted, and formed into separate talooks, at the time of the decennial settlement; as long as these talookdars, ‡ or, as they are termed, khothbashaan, continue on the spot, the revenues are punctually paid; but when they emigrate, to follow their different occupations, and are dispersed, their talooks fall into arrears, which cannot be well recovered by attachment, since there are no rents to be collected, and which, when exposed for sale, few or no individuals appear inclined to purchase; since every person, almost, has his own barree, or home, and may not find it convenient to alter his place of abode, without necessity, or some particular view. In the mean time an empty hut upon it; the proceeds of which, if separately sold, would scarcely pay for the deputation of a peon.

“In my address § above alluded to, I find that I had omitted to state one principal cause of the ruin of many petty estates, in this district; viz. the irreconcilable disputes of the mootah copartners. A talook, which probably pays a jumma of cawns, || 100 per annum, and often less, is registered in my books, in the name of a single proprietor, whilst in the mootah ¶ there are no less, perhaps, than 50 parthees shurrecks, or copartners, by right of confessions of lands. They usually collect the rents from the ryots of their respective ruffads, or portions of lands. They usually collect the rents from the ryots of their own lands, and pay their revenue, in the established proportion, to the ostensible proprietor aforesaid, who discharges the same to, and receives a receipt in the name of, the talook, as publicly registered, “from

“from the tehsildar. It often occurs, that these copartners quarrel amongst themselves, when some of them, are alternately dispossessed by each other; the payment of their respective quota is immediately suspended, and, if the arrears be not recovered in time by attachment, the estate is brought to a sale, if not reduced at last to ruin: for no ryots feel inclined to settle upon, or cultivate the lands of a talook, which is so warmly disputed by the occupants. The first act on such occasions, on the part of the person who has signed the settlement, is to seize the ryots of his copartners, and to demand the rent on the grounds of the estate being registered, in his name; the farmer, having given no engagements to him, thinks proper to decline, and at last absconds. When estates in this predicament, are attached, some of the copartners, or their ryots, frequently prefer vexatious complaints, as in a recent instance in the soujedarry adawlut, and cause the tehsildar, kooruskdar, to be summoned, to the great detriment of the public service, and their individual annoyance. In such cases, I think it my duty immediately to instruct the tehsildar to attach the lands, by which measures, although the dues of government are generally realized, the evil is not remedied, nor is the estate benefited.”

72. The collector of Chittagong states, “The Regulations, in my opinion, are not calculated to realize the public demand, with promptitude and facility, from the petty zemindars of this district. The minute subdivisions of the landed property in this province, arising from the prescriptive right which the occupants have enjoyed, since the formation of the first jumma by Mr. Verelst, of transmitting their lands by inheritance, mortgage, or sale, and from the recognition of that right in the practice of the dewanny adawlut, has fixed a value on real property here, which is not attached to it in other parts of Bengal, and has given existence to a numerous body of landholders, unknown elsewhere; they feel themselves confirmed by custom, and a series of precedents of the civil courts, as the actual proprietors of the soil; of even the smallest portion into which land can be divided. Secure in their possession, and independent, they despise control; and in general, only pay their revenue, when convenient to themselves; if recourse be had to attachment, the concomitant expense is excessive, in proportion to the arrear and value of the estate; and it has been found ineffectual to adopt the system of distraint of their personal property, as it is only productive of causing the elopement of the defaulters and concealment of their effects; all deputations, therefore, made with a view to the distraint and sale of personal property, tend only to harass the incumbents, without any real advantage to government. As these zemindars in general, follow their own ploughs, and are the immediate cultivators of the soil, they differ only in name, from inferior tenantry, and therefore might be rendered subservient to the same rules; and it would contribute much to the punctual collection of the revenue, if the collector of this district was authorized, without any previous application to the dewanny adawlut, to proceed against defaulting proprietors, whose annual revenue may be under 50 rupees, in the same manner as he is authorized, by section 25* of Regulation VII. 1799, to proceed against the under-tenants of an estate that may become subject to a khas collection on the part of government.

“The proprietors of land in this province complain, that the rule of attachment and sale is severer than personal restraint, upon a principle, that temporary coercion is less oppressive than inevitable ruin; and I am of opinion, that there should be some gradation of punishment; for although the arrears are, in most instances, ascribable to want of good faith on the part of the landholders, immediate attachment, which is generally accompanied with ruin, is a punishment disproportioned to the crime.”

73. That any consideration of commiseration, arising from self interest, can ever enter the breast of a native revenue officer, is hopeless. That a collector can enter, although more alive than a native officer to the distress of individuals, into the particular misfortune of each, in an unfavourable season, in an extensive district, is a vain expectation. Those who know the native character, know well, that all who complain, have not always injuries to complain of; that a readiness to listen to complaints, produces an accumulation of representations of imaginary grievances.

74. To discriminate, therefore, between those who ought to come under the penalties of Regulation XXVIII. and those who ought not, would be impracticable on the part of the collector; and could not, with safety or justice to the individuals, be entrusted to a native revenue officer.

75. Under a rent of the nature above described, or in a village rent, the individual cultivator would be secured, by the courts of justice, from the oppression of his equals; which oppression has been one of the principal arguments, in favour of field rents. He has the interest of the rest of the community in a village rent, or of the renter of a mootah, against being driven to the extremity of distress, even if the ties of relationship, or of fellowship, should obtain no claims on the humanity of the head villagers.

76. The situation of a cultivator, therefore, in seasons of calamity, or in instances of individual distress, must be better under a village rent, or under a mootah rent, than under a ryotwar rent. Of this there is strong proof in the last unfavourable season, in every province where either of those modes of rent have prevailed.

77. Without quoting the authority of the best-informed and most celebrated authorities, to show that intermediate agents are productive of no mischief, but of much good, in all the transactions of life, whether in revenue or commerce; they are known to exist in every country which can be said to be in a state of prosperity in its manufactures, commerce, and agriculture.

* I know of no other ground of apprehension, or of any inducement that a proprietor of an estate can have, to resist the authority of government.

78. If by creating proprietors of landed estates, an apprehension be entertained that we shall rear a race of poligars, who will rebel against the government; the apprehension must be accompanied by a belief, that the government have appointed courts of justice, which will not be able to enforce their decrees, or to punish crimes; that the weakness of the government will always be equal to the weakness* of the native governments which produced poligar independence and revolt. Does not the history of this country, as well as that of every other, show, that the subject, whether a baron, a poligar, or the head of a banditti, or any terms of similar import, were only lawless, when the government was weak? It will not be said that the persons who will become renters, or mootahdars, have been bred up like imaginary bravery excited to seek martial fame, by the exaggerated, but constantly recited deeds of valour, of their ancestors.

79. That we have had rebellious poligars, and turbulent zemindars, is true; but it does not appear to me a natural conclusion, that, by creating mootahdars or proprietors, we are adding to the number of this description of persons. Till very lately, the poligars of many of the smallest tracts of country exercised not only civil but criminal jurisdiction within their pollans. The services, as well as the lives of their subjects (as they may be called) were at their disposal; the punishment of rebellion or murder never fell on the agent, seldom on the principal. Now, both are liable to punishment, and the experience of every day must convince them, that the period of crimes going unpunished is past. So far then from the poligar giving waste lands for peons on service tenure, he is much more likely to give waste land, like the mootahdar, for revenue, and to commute his service land for a payment in money, because he has no longer any service, for his peons to perform. It is not, therefore, in my humble opinion, at all probable, that the creation of mootahdars will rear a new race of poligars; on the contrary, there is every reason to think that the present poligars will become peaceful subjects and frugal landholders, through the force of transactions with individuals.

† A man who had his hand and foot cut off for thieving, or suspicion of theft, by the Wootacettah poligar, about 10 years ago, came lately to represent a civil complaint of a depredation of his office of cawelgar to the collector. This is only one of many instances.

80. The inhabitants in every district would, no doubt, prefer an aumatic division of the produce; but it is admitted that such a system cannot, with safety, be adopted for any length of time. They can, however, under Regulation XXX. obtain their share in kind from a mootahdar, if unwilling to rent. In a village rent, the community will most probably club the share of government for the payment of the public revenue; they will, therefore, under that system of rent, have their full share, more than their share, or less than their usual share, according as the circumstances of the rent, or the season, or the price of grain, may operate to diminish, or increase, the extent and value of the share of the grain they have contracted to rent.

81. It has been before remarked, that in field rents, a ryot must sell his grain almost as soon as he reaps it, in order to procure money to pay his rent; that he cannot afford to wait for a market. This must also be the case with a village rent, to a certain extent. In some villages, they may have the means of advancing the kilns, and of keeping their grain for a better market; a mootahdar, whether he manages his estate by aumatic, or by subrents, will always find it to his advantage to advance the rent from his own resources, to secure himself leisure to dispose of his grain, or to collect his rent from his subrenters.

82. The chief objection which the inhabitants of this province would probably urge to taking their villages in rent, would be, the difficulty they would experience in disposing of their produce, for money. The observations which have been made in para. 48. on the present mode of management, and its effects on the grain market, will show, that it is difficult to determine whether the objection would be well founded or not.

83. That the grain market has never been free for many years, is certain; the circar has always had grain of its own in store, and constrained the markets: the system of a village rent on dowie, has also impeded the regular supply of the market, or overstocked it. The collector finds it difficult, at this period, to sell the remaining grain of the peshnam crop. The new kar crop is now cutting. The price of the grain is fixed at the time of forming the dowie; it must be difficult at that period to fix, for several months, what is liable to fluctuate in every week.

84. The result of my inquiries have proved, that a very small proportion of the produce of this district is exported, either by sea or by land; on the contrary, that, in unfavourable seasons of produce, rice is sometimes brought from Travancore. The price of paddy, in ordinary seasons, may be stated at 28 star pagodas per garce, which is, deducting expense of beating it into rice, between 60 or 70 star pagodas per Madras garce for rice; in the present season, even supposing boats could have been procured, which was not practicable, the grain of this province, could not have been imported into Madras, at the rate allowed by government: it would have cost, when landed at Madras, from 110 to 120 star pagodas per garce, without making any allowance for wastage.

85. From the foregoing circumstances it is clear, that the produce in grain of this province, is all consumed on the spot; but whether a village rent, or a mootah rent, is calculated to reduce the price of grain, or to increase it, it is difficult to decide. It is probable that there would be, under a village rent, an increased number of sellers, at all times in the market, ket, which would decrease the price of grain; but, supposing this result to be admitted, and that an allowance should become necessary to village renters, in consequence of their representation on this head, still a village rent on lease, with this deduction, appears to me likely to be more productive; because the loss by wastage, theft, and neglect, while the grain remains under charge of the native officers of government, must be considerable, and would be so much saved to the village renters; while a diminution of charge, would result to government under such a rent, equivalent, or nearly so, to any reduction which it might be necessary to make, for a reduced price of grain.

86. In this province, there is not the same cause for rejecting mootahdars, as exist in Tanjore; the same inducements to deprive individual ryots of their right of occupancy does not prevail; land is not so desirable a property here, as in Tanjore; the same security has not existed; the acts of violence and plunder of the southern poligars are not yet forgotten. There can be no danger of a monopoly either, if there be no interference on the part of the government in fixing the price of grain, and a free transit is allowed into, and from, all the surrounding countries. If the inhabitants be willing to rent their village, there is no great objection to a village rent. I certainly give a preference to a mootah rent, but am not so zealous an advocate for that system, as to wish to see it introduced, contrary to the wishes of the people; but I feel a conviction which I have stated, and which has been confirmed by observation, that the true interest of the people, and of government, is best secured and provided for, by this mode of management. Under any opinion of the superior merits of either of these modes of rent, a general concurrence and resources of a country have been ascertained, a detailed ryotwar rent, where the revenue and resources of a country have been ascertained, and where courts of justice have been established for the protection of all ranks of people from oppression and injustice, cannot be longer expedient or necessary.

87. Under the impression of the foregoing sentiments, I beg leave to recommend, that the collector of the province of Tinnevely may receive authority to enter into engagements with the inhabitants for the rent of their villages, on a lease for a period of years, or, in the event of their declining to undertake the responsibility of a rent, with mootahdars. The lease should not fall short of three, but had better be for five years. There is no want of accounts in this province, on which to regulate the terms of the lease.

88. If the proposition of letting out the country to mootahdars be thought preferable, I should recommend that the estates be not of less value than 5,000, not higher than 15,000, according as local circumstances may appear advisable; the lease to be transferable, and renewable, at the expiration of the first lease; the term to be not less than five years: three years, is too short a period for the mootahdars to make arrangement with the inhabitants, to settle their accounts, to sell their grain, and to collect their balances.

89. It is absolutely necessary that a system of village rents, or of mootah rents, should be resorted to, previously to the introduction of a permanent system immediately following a ryotwar rent. The moderation, or otherwise, of a field assessment in all seasons, cannot otherwise be determined. A ryot cannot, under a ryotwar rent, seek for a low assessment in a neighbouring village, if that in his own village should be high; because the same principle of rent has extended over the whole district, and the native officers assist each other, in sending back emigrants. The introduction of mootahdars induces a consideration of the best means of improving his estate; and a reduction of the circar teerwa often presents a ready resource. All mootahdars must do the same, to a certain extent, or a part of their ryots will leave them, and resort to the low-assessed mootahs. Under mootahdars, therefore, there is a demand for ryots. This demand must be favourable to them, and not injurious, in the end, to the mootahdars; because a great increase of cultivation may result, from the increased energy given to the labours of the people by this reduction.

90. Under a ryotwar rent* there is no demand, no competition for the labour of a ryot; he cultivates only what he pleases, and the inducement for him to extend his cultivation must depend, on the success of the past year. The rent is naturally, under a ryotwar rent, collected with less attention to the situation of individuals, for reasons already given, than it is, under a mootah rent. The average, therefore, of collections from a ryotwar rent for a period of years, is not such of satisfactory data by which to determine a permanent rent, as the result of the experience of what mootahdars have paid, compared with what has been collected under a ryotwar rent. More estates have been advertised for sale in Salem, Dindigul, and the Bar-ramahl, all districts on a ryotwar rent, before they were permanently settled, than have been advertised in the Jageer Mugletore Havelly, Vizagapatam Havelly, Ganjam Havelly, and Masulipatam Havelly, where rents by mootahs, or by villages, had been customary, and where ryotwar rents had not been known.

* Ryotwar rents have, as yet, been introduced only in countries yielding dry grain, and having much waste land. In a country where there exists so great a quantity of waste land, so far from being an object of request, it must be tendered by the circar to the cultivating class, who consider rather that they are conferring a favour, in the acceptance, than receiving a favour, in the acceptance. From collector of Coimbatore, dated 30th November 1808.

Extract FORT ST. GEORGE Revenue Consultations,

Extract Mr. HODGSON'S REPORT on the Province of DINDIGUL; dated 28th March 1808.

Para. 5. THE whole lands of a province in India, whether cultivated, arable, waste, jungle or hills, have been from time immemorial apportioned to a particular village; so that all lands are within the known boundary of some village. The total boundary of all the villages of a province, forms the whole landed surface of that particular province.

6. The villages in Dindigul are distinguished by the terms "Circar village," and "Poliaput;" the former, denoting that no other intermediate agency existed for the receipt of the circar share of the produce or revenue, than the immediate officers of the circar; the latter, denoting an alienation of the revenues of entire villages, and the transfer of their revenue jurisdiction to individuals, styled poligars, either for a feudatory or cawel* service, or a tribute called peshkash, this tribute being less than the circar share of the produce in proportion to the service to be rendered by the feudatory poligar, or the cawelgar. Independent of the pollams, the poligars frequently held cawelly maniams in the circar villages. These poligars had, at the time of the transfer of the villages, no property or occupancy in the land, and seldom assumed any; the most cultivated villages, and the most jungly or frontier situations, were frequently assigned to poligars for cawelly service. They sometimes had a kummatum† of their own, either to increase their resources, or for the purpose of rearing a superior kind of grain for domestic use. They sometimes had the power to compel the inhabitants of the circar villages to cultivate their maniams, in preference to the circar lands. This happened, when the government was weak; and poligar power strong. The peons, they were under their tenure obliged to maintain, either for purposes of external war, or internal police, had land assigned to them, for a proportion of their pay. An assignment of land, when the desolate state of most of the pollams is considered, the poligar could easily make, without ejecting any of the original cultivators; if ejection by force, was ever practised, it was always considered an act of injustice. It follows then, that the transfer of villages to form a pollam‡, was no more than the assignment of a certain portion of the government revenue of those villages to an individual, for particular purposes, in preference to giving monthly pay. The practice of assigning the revenue of land for the payment of service, was universal in India. It was practised, as well for the maintenance of fighting men, for the endowment of religious establishments, in provision of the expense of the kitchen, as for the payment of the betel bag carrier; as well in reward of civil and military services, as for the support of concubines.

7. The number of villages in Dindigul, are as follows:

	Circar Villages.	Pollam D ^o .
Mouza - - - Muzrahs - - -
Total - - -

8. In the villages of Dindigul, the same internal policy is found, as in other provinces. A certain portion of the inhabitants holding the title of Nautemar gours§, or muhajers, are in the enjoyment of a portion of the land rent free, and are the hereditary occupiers of the remainder, certain principal officers, such as the curnum (or register accountant of the revenue affairs of the village) ironsmith, carpenter, barber, washerman, village watcher, potmaker,

Note.—That the inhabited place where the servile class is numerous, and where many husbandmen reside, is named grama, or village, and it is situated in the midst of fields and grazed lands. Thus, on all sides of the villages, there should be pasture, and round this again, should be the fields. The residence of priests, soldiers, and merchants, is best in cities and towns, and that is intimated in a preceding chapter.—Digest Hindoo Law, vol. 2. p. 351.

* Cawel means watching and protection from thieves and petty plunderers.

† Kummatum is the name used to designate the farming stock of an individual, such as his ploughs, bullocks, slaves

‡ So the Ramoud Polam or Zemindary was granted to the ancestors of the present family, with the title of Sethaputis, for the defence of the road, and protection of pilgrims resorting to the sacred pagoda at Ramaswarum; and to most of the southern poligars, for keeping up a certain body of men for the defence of Madura, and for the havenly of certain tracts of country. So, the western zemindars of Venicatagherry, Calastry, and Bommarauze, at no distant period, were made mansubdars of the Mogul empire, and established in the countries they now hold, on the condition of performing military service, and having a body of troops always ready to attend the summons of the emperor.

potmaker, dancing girls, nurguaty, or distributor of water, &c. Sometimes all, and more than those enumerated, are found in each village; sometimes, only a portion of them. They have the circar produce of a portion of the land assigned them for their livelihood, but no claim to cultivate the land; from the occupation in life of many of the incumbents, it may be imagined they seldom had the wish: a portion of the produce is given to them in addition, both from the grain in ear, and from the heaps when thrashed. It is after these deductions, variously denominated, but existing in each province, that the produce of paddy land is divided with the circar, or the cultivator is allowed to remove the harvest from dry grain land.

9. These deductions, generally denominated sotuntrums, are stated to have been prior to our acquisition of Dindigul, 64 in every 100 of the gross produce, leaving 36 to be divided between the circar and cultivator. In 1794, these deductions were estimated at 40 in the 100, leaving only 60 to be divided*: This would give the circar - - - 30

Ryots - - - - -	30
Sotuntrum - - - - -	40
Total Ryot share - - - - -	70

10. But in latter years, they were regulated at about 12 in the 100; leaving 88 per cent of the gross produce, for division, share and share.

11. In Dindigul, the produce of paddy was always, before our acquisition of the province, divided after deducting the allowances in kind above referred to, between the cultivator and the circar in equal portions, and received by the circar in kind. I have found the practice of dividing the produce of paddy land, to have been general in all the districts† I have visited, prior to the introduction of the system of ryotwarrent, or a fixed field rent in money. This practice continued in Dindigul till the establishment of the survey, and introduction of field rents in Fusly 1210, or A.D. 1800.

12. The circar of Hyder and Tippoo generally took the whole circar share from the paddy land, in kind, and seldom made it over for a money payment to the villages. Under the company's government, since the conquest in 1792, to the establishment of field rents in 1799-1800, the villagers were generally contracted with, to take the circar share, or a portion thereof, for money, and the rest was received into store. At one time, the district was rented by divisions, composed of several villages, to one man. When this mode of realizing the circar share was adopted, the villagers were at liberty to take their share in kind, or to contract with the renter to take the whole produce, paying him a value agreed on, for the circar share. This system is favourable to the cultivator, when redress from exaction is obtainable; because it leaves him, without risk or responsibility.

13. The share of the circar, or the produce of dry grain land in Dindigul, was, before our acquisition of the province, received always in money, at so much for a given quantity of land of a given quality; the rates of assessment to the quality of the land, and the extent of the land measure differed in each village, or if not in all, in a very large proportion of them; the nominal extent of the land was generally exceeded by the actual extent; and although the denomination of the rod used to measure the land, might be the same in each village, the number of inches to the foot or feet to the rod, and size of the foot, differed in many. It was by this intricacy, and by these indulgencies, that the arbitrary imposts of despotic rulers were evaded, or rendered less oppressive. An order might be issued to increase the assessment, and the revenue officer might obey, to outward appearance; but if he was sensible the increase would not be collected, or was bribed to betray his trust, he allowed a favourable rate of measurement. This once granted, became mamool, and would always be claimed as a right.

14. It is not I imagine possible, otherwise to account for the increase in Dindigul of the assessment on certain dry grain lands, called ghitty, during Syd Sahab's management, from 6 ³³/₆₄ cully fanams per cooley, to 16 ¹/₂ cully fanams; being at once more than 100 per cent.

15. The mode of collecting the revenue from dry grain land, thus described, continued till the introduction of the survey; and where the villages were rented to the villagers, was productive of no inconvenience; they knew what each ought to pay, and settled the portion of rent among themselves. When the villages were consolidated, and several, given to a renter in farm, he might experience difficulty, in ascertaining his right, and in collecting his rents, from this intricacy of assessment; but the circar, suffered none. The survey and assessment, established a uniform land measure, and an uniform rent, varying with the variations in the soil, to the extent of a given number of sorts. This was no great change on the dry grain land, on former custom; it was still collecting the tax in ready money, in lieu of taking a share of the produce of those lands. This change, provided the new rates of rent, bore to the old land measure, bore the same proportion to each other that the old rates of rent, ryot: if they did not bear the same proportion, there must have been, either an over assessment, ment, or an under assessment; an increase or decrease on the former rates of assessment. In most cases, it was intended the ryot should, on an average, be more favourably assessed under the survey, than he had been, prior to its adoption.

* I am inclined to think this must have been an error, or if not, it was evidently a fraud.

16. But the introduction of the survey field rents, on nunjah or paddy land, was a positive innovation on ancient custom. It changed the nature of the land-tax from what it was, in kind, to one, in money: it changed what had existed for ages; it separated the interests of a corporation united for ages; and if it did not leave, under all seasons and all circumstances, the same proportion to the cultivator he enjoyed before, viz. half the produce, it would be an over assessment; or if it gave him more, an under assessment: but still it was an innovation in the mode of payment, and introduced a responsibility, hitherto unknown.

17. An under assessment would, no doubt, compensate, in a great degree, for this innovation; because it might, at first view, leave the cultivator a greater portion of the produce than he enjoyed, under a division of it: for example:

Total produce of a cawney, or acre, say -	100
Deduct, allowance made for various purposes, before division, say -	10
Remainder -	90
To the cultivator $\frac{1}{2}$ -	45
To the cirar $\frac{1}{2}$ -	45

18. The foregoing mode of receiving the dues of government from paddy, under share and share, obtained, whether the produce of the acre was 100, or only 30 or less; the government and cultivator would divide the produce, whether great or small; but where a money rent is introduced, and the practice of share and share annulled, the result may be, as follows:—

Total produce -	100
Deduction -	10
Cultivator's money rent reduced to a fixed payment, on an average of price and produce; say $\frac{1}{3}$ -	33
Government share, say -	0

19. The question is then reduced to what is a fair equivalent, for the safety and security of a division of the produce; and whether $\frac{1}{3}$ or any other proportion of the produce, when allowed, will enable the cultivator to pay this settled portion in money, in all seasons, and under all circumstances, and by whom this equivalent is to be determined?

20. It is maintained, that taking a share of the produce is, like tythes, a discouragement to agriculture. This may be true; but the question in India, must have reference to the quantity of produce, taken as revenue. If the government of India can afford to take only a sixth in money, instead of half the produce; there can exist no doubt, that the cultivators would acquire capital, and that land would, in many places, become as valuable as in Canara, where a twentieth only is supposed to be taken.

21. There can exist no doubt, that a money rent on paddy land, would cause a sacrifice of a very considerable portion of the present revenues of a district, classed as a nunjah district. This sacrifice, in dry grain districts, where the portion of nunjah land is small, must also, be small; still, it will be proportionate, and I am much inclined to estimate it, at a high per-centage on the former averaged revenue. But in such districts, the reduction was not so apparent; because the leading branch of revenue being dry grain, or punja rent, the loss on nunja would not be great. I mention this circumstance, to show, that, although field rents have been introduced on the paddy land of a few districts, classed as dry grain districts, where the quantity of paddy land is inconsiderable; it is not yet satisfactorily ascertained* that it would be desirable to extend the practice to districts, classed as wet land districts.

22. That the practice of dividing the produce of paddy land has been general, has been proved; but I have not been so successful in tracing the cause of this established custom. In the 24th paragraph of my Report on Tinnevely, I attempted to account for it.

32. In Dindigul, as in all the provinces south of Madras, a property in the land is invested in the resident inhabitants of each village.

33. So long ago as the 31st March 1800, Mr. Hurdie stated, that the Nautumcars† of South Coimbatore considered that they already held a proprietary right in the soil, and would be little disposed to purchase that right of government; and remarked that, "The resolution of government, to dispose of the proprietary right in the cirar lands by sale, according to the manner and amount specified in para. 58, I conceive to be generally very impracticable, from the poverty of the description of people they expect will become the purchasers, as well as from the objection these very people " would

* Note.—The government decided on the report of the Committee on the province of Tanjore, that it was not desirable; and I have recommended that it be not adopted, in Tinnevely.

† Note.—Nautumcar: Mahajans; Gours; Potails; Muddals; Moolchuddams; Metasaddars; Canneatch Kars; Cawpans; Naidons; Ooloodies;—appear to be all terms in use in different parts of the country, to describe those inhabitants of a village who hold the property, or, at any rate, have the right of cultivating the lands, in preference to other persons.

" would have, to purchase a proprietary right, in what prescription had already made their own."

" The Nautumcars certainly consider the farm they cultivate, as their own property; and no government, save the Mussulman, appears to have considered the soil, its own, or itself, at liberty to deprive the inferior subject at its will. In forming the present benevolent system, this solitary precedent, surely, will not operate as an example to act upon; but where no written document is found, what has been known as usage, will be established as law: this would confirm the prescriptive right of many industrious natives to the lands they have long occupied, and be the certain means of making them comprehend, whence their advantages were derived."

34. The foregoing reasoning is equally applicable to the Nautumcars and Gours of Dindigul, or rather to the Pattookat ryots, as they were denominated prior to the survey.

35. It was not at that period known, and I regret much to say, is not now generally admitted, that two rights could, under the words "proprietary right," in the Regulations, exist; that the cultivators could possess, one right, and the zemindars, another; yet both be distinct rights. It was argued, that the words "proprietary right," so frequently used in the Regulations, and so formally confirmed by Saunad Mulkuistemrar on all zemindars, hereditary or by purchase, was an unlimited right; that is, an undefined power, or a power to be exercised, according to the direction of the proprietor, over all the land of the zemindary or estate. It is declared to be inconsistent with "proprietary right," that the proprietor should be guided by any other rule than his own will, in demanding his rent; and emigration, under this interpretation, is admitted to be the only relief from an excessive rent. This mode of reasoning would not, perhaps, have gained so much ground, if it had been within the means of all, to have obtained the perusal of the interesting discussions on the subject, between the Right honourable Marquis Cornwallis and Sir John Shore, the Bengal Regulations, and the proceedings of the board of at Madras, on proposing the introduction of the permanent system. If general access to these documents could have been obtained, or means had been taken to circulate them, or at least the part which bears on this subject; it would have been distinctly seen, that the first principle of the permanent system was, to confirm and secure the rights of the cultivators of the soil. To confirm and secure, are the terms which must be used, because no new rights were granted, or any doubt entertained upon the following leading features of their right; viz. 1st. That no zemindar, proprietor (or whatever name be given to those persons) was entitled by law, custom, or usage, to make his demands for rent, according to his convenience; or in other words,

2^d. That the cultivators of the soil had the solid right, from time immemorial, of paying a defined rent, and no more, for the land they cultivated.

36. This right is inherent, in all the cultivators; from the most northern parts of India, to Cape Comorin. I shall have occasion hereafter to show, how the right came to be of more or less value in different parts of the Indian empire.

37. The "proprietary right" of zemindars, in the Regulations, is therefore no more than the right to collect from the cultivators, that rent which custom has established, as the right of government; and the benefit arising from this right is confined, first, to an extension of the amount, not of the rate of the customary rent by an increase of cultivation;—secondly, to a profit in dealings in grain, where the rent may be rendered in kind;—thirdly, to a change from an inferior to a superior kind of culture, arising out of a mutual understanding of their interest, between the cultivator and proprietor.

38. Such is my interpretation of zemindary proprietary right; and such it stands proved to be, in all the documents I have referred to.

39. Paley, in his Philosophy, defines property in land, to be a power to use it, and to exclude others from it.

40. Much has been said of the boasted proprietary right of the owners of private estates in Canara, and in Malabar, and elaborate disquisitions of the superior and inferior rights of the jelmkar, chalie gueny and mool gueny of Canara, have been entered into to prove, that we should do an act of injustice, in selling the proprietary right in the lands of Canara, as we have done elsewhere. When this is argued, proprietary right is understood as an unlimited right, and the analogy between our canneatchkar & oolkoodies, ool pya koodies, with jelmkar, mool gueny and chalie gueny is disputed.

41. When

* Note.—The Pattookat ryots were considered the hereditary owners of the land, and responsible for the revenue. There were other descriptions of Ryots in each village called Tellals, Yeroodus, and Poodoooodies.

† Note.—By the ancient system of India, the situation of a ryot was much superior to that of a tenant at will; nor was he subject to arbitrary exactions at the pleasure of the zemindar, while he continued to pay the rent, and fulfil the conditions to which, by the custom of his village, he was bound. He could not legally be dispossessed; and if taxes unauthorized by the government or by the usage of the district, were demanded, the Courts of the capital, as well as those of the province, were open to his complaints; for the protection of the cultivators of the soil was described as the first duty, and often became the first subject of the magistracy.

Even in the views of this system, traces of its principles are easily discerned; for among the numerous assessments that now burthen the lands of the ryots, a tax, which is called the original rent, invariably takes the lead, and has the semblance of governing the rates by which the other branches of the land-tax are determined.—State of Bengal 1786.

‡ Note.—Gueny - - - - - tenant.
Mool Gueny - - - - - tenant for ever.

§ Note.—Canneatchkar, or possessor, proprietor, and Oolkoodie - - - - - fully answers to jelmkar. Ool Pyakoodies - - - - - is the tenant for ever, or residuary cultivator of a village, and without property.

Pyakoodie - - - - - means a stranger, or man engaging for a term; being therefore a tenant at will.

Where the Canneatch is mortgaged, there will be in Canara, a fourth description of persons answering to.

41. When I assert, that in no part of our territories in India, are the lands cultivated by hired labourers paid by the government, or by its slaves, I do not fear contradiction; when I assert, that by far the largest portion of the territory of India is cultivated, either by slaves or hired labourers, I am as little afraid of the position being denied me. If then, these slaves and hired labourers who drive the plough, are not in the pay of the government, by whom are they paid? They are paid by a description of persons, whose denomination varies with the variation in the local language, and whom we know, under the general term of cultivator, or ryot. In many parts of India besides Canara, I assert, with as little fear of contradiction, that where a Bramin has the property in the land, which the laws of his religion do not allow of his cultivating with his own hands, three descriptions of persons subsist on the produce of land:

- 1st. The Bramin*.
- 2^d. The shudra, who undertakes to cultivate the Bramin's property, and to pay him for it a rent in kind.
- 3^d. The slave, or hired labourer, who assists the shudra.

42. Again: the government in India no where finds the seeds, the implements of husbandry, or cattle for the plough. The government has never been in the practice of granting leases for rent†; leases for rent, and leases for land, are, in India‡ distinct subjects. The collection of the rent of a village, of a number of villages, of a talook, or of a province, has usually been granted on lease; but we no where find that the cultivators, each and all, ever held leases for their particular fields. In most instances, the land is not even a separate property of each individual§, but the joint property of the society of the village, and held in shares; the occupation of the lands being changed, by casting of lots at stated periods, but always in the fixed shares.

43. It must then, I think, be admitted, that the circle of government, or the representatives of government, the zemindars, never could have been the absolute proprietors of the soil.

44. The property in land, of those who cultivate the soil in Canara, or the proprietors of the private estates, as they are frequently called, is represented to be of the most valuable kind; because the land pays a fixed rent, and because it can be sold and mortgaged.

45. It appears from the records of the Board of Revenue, previously to the conquest of the province of Canara by Hyder Ally Khan, it was divided into small estates, considered the actual property of the holders, assessed at a fixed and moderate rate; that on his taking possession, Canara was an highly improved country, filled with industrious inhabitants who enjoyed greater advantages than their neighbours, above the Ghauts; but that the system of management, subsequently introduced, had impoverished it, and greatly reduced the population.

46. Now I would ask, if this description will not apply to every part of India, and whether the system of management introduced at one period or another, by Hindoo or Mussulman rulers, has not impoverished, at one period or another, more or less, every province of India? If this be admitted, I deduce the following conclusions; viz. that land will be, and is, more or less valuable; first, where arable land is scarce or abundant; secondly, where the assessment is high or low.

47. In Canara the standard assessment (for every province in India has its standard) was at one period, very low; an addition was however made to this standard, during the government of the Hindoo rajahs and rajah of Byjuenger and Bednore; a further addition was made by Hyder Ally Khan; and a still further by Tippoo Sultan: so that when the British government gained possession of the province, the rent, as established by the antecedent rulers, was nearly double the reka, or standard rent.

48. "Had such an assessment," observes Colonel Munro, "as that introduced by Hyder and Tippoo, existed in ancient times, Canara would long ago, have been converted into a desert; in a country so rocky and uneven, where cattle are not only scarce, but even where they are to be had, cannot always be employed; where every spot, before it can be cultivated, must be levelled, with great labour by the hand of man; the expense of the first preparation of waste ground, must have been so great, that it never could have been attempted, unless the assessment had been extremely moderate; and even after land had been brought into cultivation, if it is neglected for a few years, it is soon broken up by deep gullies formed by the torrents which fall during the monsoon."

49. It is, I think, demonstrated from the foregoing extract, that the two causes above stated, viz. a scarcity of arable land, and a low assessment, constitute the value of private estates in Canara. Contrast with this, the state of things in the provinces of Coimbatore, in the Ceded Districts, in Salem, or any of the countries which I have classed, as dry grain districts, in

* Note.—The Bramin share in kind, varies from 50 to 60 per cent. of the gross produce, after deducting 500 annas the shudra, for 30 out of 60 will undertake to plough the land, find the seed, and reap the produce; the difference is the property of the Bramins, and is the landholder's rent.

† Note.—Zemindars, Rajahs, Poligars, Jagreelars, are representatives of the government, to whom the collection of the government rent has been transferred, not the absolute property in the land, and right to demand any rent.

‡ Note.—Leases for waste land, or for encouraging the growth of any particular produce, are exceptions which prove the rule.

§ Note.—Leases to individuals, where they exist, are reductions of the standard rent, granted on covele to favoured individuals, rather than leases of land. The issuing of individual potahs is a new practice, introduced under the new system of Ryotwar Rents.

in all those provinces, the arable land is more than quadruple, the land under cultivation. The expense of preparing this waste arable land is inconsiderable; hence there is no scarcity of land; quite the reverse, there is a superabundance;—and the collector of Coimbatore candidly observes, that the cultivators consider that they are conferring a favour on government, not receiving one, by occupying land. In all these districts, we have, with very little variation, continued the assessments of former governments, and to those assessments have superadded a strictness of collection, and of scrutiny into accounts, hitherto unknown. In these provinces, then, there is neither scarcity of land, or low assessment, to give value to landed property. But, as in dry grain provinces, water, because a scarce article, must be of some value; so, paddy land is often, and fields with wells are always, a valuable and transferable property. In the sale of the latter property, the sort and productive powers of the well determine the price, not the extent of the field; because such a part of the field as cannot be watered from the well, is of no more value comparatively, than in any other field.

50. I make the following inductions, from the foregoing reasoning:

- 1st. That the cultivators have a right every where, without the exception of a single district or province, to pay a fixed tax for the land they occupy.
- 2^d. That they have the right, universally, to occupy this land, so long as they pay the standard rent.
- 3^d. That they have the right, the standard rent being the only right of government, to sell or transfer by deed, gift, or otherwise, the land they occupy, subject always to the condition of paying the standard rent.
- 4th. That they exercise the right stated in the 3^d position, wherever the standard rent has not been increased, so as to absorb all the profit on cultivation, or arable land is sufficiently scarce to be of value in the acquisition.

51. Had the state, of things, described by Colonel Munro continued in Canara, the owners of private estates, or the private property in estates, would have been of no more value than the land in other provinces; in fact it was not of equal value, for Colonel Munro observes, "Canara has, however, now completely fallen from this state of prosperity. The evils which have been continually accumulating upon it, since it became a province of Mysore, have destroyed a great part of its former population, and rendered its remaining inhabitants, as poor as those of the neighbouring countries. Its lands which are now saleable, are reduced to a very small portion, and lie chiefly between the Gundapore and Chandergherry rivers, and within five or six miles of the sea. It is not to be supposed, that the whole of this tract, can be sold; but only that saleable lands are scattered over every part of it, thinner in some places, and thicker in others, particularly in the Mangalore district. There is scarcely any saleable land even upon the sea coast, any where to the northward of Gundapore, or any where inland, from one end of Canara to the other, excepting upon the banks of the Mangalore, and some of the other great rivers. In the vicinity of the Ghauts, the lands are not only unsaleable; but the greatest part of them is waste, and overgrown with wood. It is reckoned that the population of the country has been diminished one-third within the last forty years, and there can be little doubt but its property has suffered a much greater reduction; Gesova, Ankala, and Gundapore, formerly flourishing places, contain now only a few beggarly inhabitants. Honawer, once the second town in trade, after Mangalore, has not a single house, and Mangalore itself is greatly decayed. It may be said, that this change has been brought about by the incursion of Hyder, by the four wars which have happened since that event, by Tippoo himself destroying many of the principal towns upon the coast, and forcing their inhabitants to remove to Jumlabad and other unhealthy situations near the hills; by his seizing in one night all the christians, men, women, and children, amounting to above sixty thousand, and sending them into captivity to Mysore, from whence one-tenth of them never returned; by the prohibition of foreign trade, and by the general corruption and disorder of his government, in all its departments: these circumstances certainly accelerated the change; but, taken altogether, they probably did not contribute to it so much as the extraordinary augmentation of the land-rent."

52. At the period alluded to by Colonel Munro, when so large a portion of the private estates, or private property in land in Canara, was of no value at all, the whole landed surface of the province of Tanjore, and a great deal of land in other provinces, was, to the cultivators, a highly valuable, saleable, and transferable property, and sales of that property were at that period, going on. The Board of Revenue, at an early period of its establishment, prior to the introduction of local collectors, have been frequently required, as the then only court of justice, to decide on disputes between cultivators, respecting landed property, or the right of occupancy, or whatever may be the proper name; i. e. to decide to whom belonged the valuable right which has been attempted to be defined; and in their proceedings, on the proposed plan of a permanent settlement for the territories under this government, they fully acknowledged these rights.

53. Colonel

* Note.—In Coimbatore the wet cultivation is little more than three in every 100 of the total cultivation. In Salem it was about six; and in Ceded Districts it is not seven in the 100; while in Tanjore, the dry grain cultivation does not amount to 50 in the 100.

† Note.—By means of Ryotwar rents, or taking an account of the cultivation of each individual, and giving each individual a potah for that cultivation, defining the rent on each field.

§ See the voluminous proceedings respecting the merassee of the village of Sanyermadur, and of many other villages.

53. Colonel Munro has stated, that he knew there were pretenders, either open or concealed, to almost every district in Canara, and he received letters from the poligars of Bilghi, Soonda, Vettil, and Coomlab. Here then is an admission at once, that the owners of private estates in Canara did, at no distant period, pay the rent of their estates to zemindars, rajahs, or poligars; persons placed between them and the government. They now pay their rent to a tehsildar, and not direct to the collector.

54. Provided the property in private estates, that is, the standard rent, and no more, be paid by these owners of private estates, I hold it to be a matter of very secondary importance to them, whether the rent is demanded of them, by the ancient rajahs or poligars, the officers of Byruggur or Beduore government, the rajah Coorg, the tehsildars of the Company, or the, to be created zemindars of the Company.

55. It is well known, that in Malabar, where there is also a private property in land, and owners of estates, that the ancient zemindars or rajahs were set aside, and pensioned. I believe the rebellion in that province, was never attributed to the injustice of making the owners of these estates pay their rent to officers of the government, when they had heretofore always paid it, to rajahs; but the intrigues of the rajahs to get back the collection of the rent, or the quantum of rent demanded, or mode of collecting the rent by the officers of government, may, or may not, have been partly the cause of rebellion.

56. It is not the question of expediency that I mean to discuss; but I venture to affirm, that the right of the people in Canara or Malabar would not be injured or infringed by the establishment in those provinces, of the permanent system as established in Bengal, and on this side of India; and that, with a difference in value only, private property* and private estates, exist as much in every part of India, as they do in Canara or Malabar.

Extract, FORT ST. GEORGE, Judicial Consultations, the 20th December 1805.

Extract REPORT of Mr. JOHN HODGSON, on PEBDAPORE, in Northern Circars; dated 23d November 1805.

Para. 23. AT some former period, but when, cannot now be ascertained, the whole land of the zemindary was either surveyed, or its extent estimated, and a tax fixed on each field, according to its size, and the fertility of the soil. Where this mode of settling the revenue obtains, it is called vissabuddy vissam, being a land measure equal to about 1½ cawnies. In the progress of time, as alterations took place in the extent of population, value of money, or price of grain, the sist† became either disproportionate to the means of the ryots, and a reduction in the amount resulted, or in other cases, the profit derived under the original sist, was such as to attract the attention of the renters; consequently, having in one instance been compelled to allow a reduction in the sist, from want of resources in the ryots, they considered themselves equally entitled to participate in an augmentation of those resources, and to raise the sist, or rather make an additional assessment; for the actual sist of each village is always preserved. The remission, or addition, follows in all adjustments of rents between the ryots and renters: the additions, it may be supposed, were more frequent than the reductions: the former is termed malacerty, and the latter moojra.

24. It is this fluctuation in the land rent, which renders a permanent settlement with the immediate cultivators, if not impracticable, at least impolitic, because no increase can be made, under defined laws, to the fixed rents; while a reduction must be given to all ryots unable, from various causes which time would produce, to occupy their fields, or to pay the full rent thereof. Thus the security derived from creating intermediate proprietors would be lost, and the annual settlements, the investigation of claims to remissions, and the collection of so detailed a revenue, immediately by the officers of government, would leave the mode of management liable to all the inconveniences of temporary settlements; while the first features of the permanent settlement are, to combine, as far as possible, individual with the public interest; to limit the duties of revenue officers, and leave them to be discharged, under defined regulations. In the zemindary of Piddapore, for instance, where the period when the land rent was fixed is not known; where the population is abundant, dant, and the revenue nearly stationary, the difference between the original sist and the present rent is, in many instances, considerable; so that if a law was published, declaring the sist to be what the ryot ought only to pay, the zemindar might be a great sufferer*.

25. With the present mode of adjustment, all parties seem content; the sist is the basis of the adjustment, and circumstances of season, determine whether it shall be receded from, or added to, and how. It has been established by law, that a written agreement shall be exchanged between proprietors or renters, and the ryots; the latter, have every security they either wish or expect.

26. I have subjoined, in the Appendix, a complete detail of the internal revenue economy of two villages, to elucidate what has been stated above.

27. From these details of village accounts, referred to in the Appendix, and on a perusal of the examinations of the curnums of the cusbah of Piddapore and of Cuttanoor, it will be observed, that the occupancy of the land of particular villages in the zemindary of Piddapore, is a right vested in the ryots of those villages; it partakes more, however, of what is termed in the Southern Provinces the pashangary tenure, in which no sale of the right of occupancy is customary, than of the ardacarry tenure, under which the right of occupancy is considered a property transferable, subject to the obligations annexed to the possession of it.

Extracts from REPORT of Mr. THACKERAY on MALABAR, CANARA, and the CEDED DISTRICTS; dated 4th August 1807, as far as relates to the comparative advantages and disadvantages of Ryotwar and Zemindary Settlements as a permanent System.

WHEN the permanent land tax on each estate has been fixed, it is possible to introduce the mootahdary system with some modifications, nearly in the mode suggested in Major Munro's letter of the 9th November 1800. In this case, the government would do to the mootahdars, what the former sovereigns of Canara did to the enaumdars; assign to them the land tax payable from such and such lands, without giving them any interference with the landholders. A commission of 6 per cent. would, perhaps, be sufficient to cover the risk and expense of the mootahdar. Where one magany is large enough to constitute a mootah, it might be made over to the chief man in the magany. Where the maganies were small, two or three might be united; so as to make the mootahs run, from four to five thousand pagodas annual jumma. However, the larger the mootah, the greater the security of the land tax; just as the man who ensures a great many houses or ships, will care less for petty losses, and be less likely to fail; so the great, will be less likely to fail than the small mootahdar. Major Munro's plan appears, in every respect, well adapted to the purpose, except that the commission of 2½ per cent. seems hardly enough. The mootahdar must keep peons, and accountants, and a shroff; he must collect and remit the money to the cutcherry; he must stand all losses, and defray contingent expenses. Six per cent. would be necessary, at least, to enable him to do all this easily. It seems also contrary to the plan which has been introduced elsewhere, to oblige him to pay any increase upon the extension of cultivation. With these exceptions, a mootahdary settlement might be introduced into Canara and Malabar. It would be a financial operation, something like the mortgage or sale of the land tax, and attended with all the advantages and disadvantages of the farming system; except, however, that as the farmers are to be hereditary, they will not be so oppressive as temporary farmers usually are, and who always ruin a country. The chief advantages would be, that the Board of Revenue and the collector, would be relieved from a good deal of trouble, which the detail now occasions; that the collector will be less liable to be sued in court by the landlords, whose property he may distrain, or whose persons he may confine for arrears; that collectors will not be so skilful, nor take so much pains as mootahdars, in the management of the revenues; that all men of talents and experience will look to judicial situations; and that as none, perhaps, but young men, will be found to take collectorships, attended with so much risk and trouble, the business will, perhaps, not be so well conducted; and that suits, and arrears and confusion, will ensue, which the mootahdars would have prevented: that the vexatious interference of circar servants will be precluded; that the people will have greater confidence in the permanency of the tax; that the mootahdars will exert themselves to get the waste land cultivated; that a good deal of the capital of the towns, which is in the hands of soucars and rich merchants, will flow into the country, and produce improvement; that the land tax on each estate having been previously fixed, no interference nor danger can result to the landlords; that the sovereigns of Canara have often assigned the land tax of certain estates or villages to enaumdars, and that they have had rajahs in Malabar, Soondah, and in the southern part of Canara; and that, therefore, the mootahdar system is not entirely inconsistent with former usages; and finally, that it would assimilate the revenue administration of Canara and Malabar, to that of the other provinces.

These are advantages, certainly, which demand attention. However, it may be right to state the disadvantages of such a system. It is impolitic to limit the land revenue of a great great province, especially of one in which there is much waste land; though it may be absolutely necessary to limit the demand on individual estates. It may be expected that a good deal of land may be brought under cultivation in 50 years of our mild government, and be liable to pay a land tax, like those estates now assessed. In the event of war, of the public necessities increasing, the government, under the mootah system, will be prevented from levying an additional and equal land tax. If, in such a case, they lay on two annas in the rupee, as they laid on two shillings in the pound in England, it will fall very heavy on the lands now under cultivation; but be nothing comparatively on those which may hereafter be brought under culture. Government will be forced to double the burthen of those who now pay, to make up for the deficiency on those lands which do not pay the old land tax. This objection, however, applies to the whole country, and has therefore been considered, and refuted. However, I must confess that I see no easy way of raising an additional land revenue from the provinces already settled, in Mootadarry.

Another objection to the mootadarry system, is, the influence and patronage which it gives to the mootahdar, to the diminution of the interest and authority of government. Both Malabar and Canara are very strong wild countries, which have frequently been the theatres of dreadful civil wars and rebellions; and the traveller passing through the country wonders how they are kept in subjection. This objection has been already amply discussed; but it applies with such peculiar force to those two provinces, that I cannot help mentioning how it operates on my mind. Another objection is, that the revenue would not be so secure. The land which pays a light fixed land tax, is the surest pledge for its realization; but when the land tax is transferred to a farmer, the security is weakened; because the pledge is put into his hands, and the money passes through an additional channel. The whole value of the whole lands of a mootah will be a more valuable pledge, than the real, personal, and constructive property, of the mootahdar. Besides, as the situation of the mootahdar is rather an office than a solid estate, the division of it among his sons, according to the Hindoo law, would cramp the efficiency, and weaken the security which government originally expected from the office. This is an argument, generally applicable to mootahdars; but in Canara and Malabar, where the mootahdar would so especially be a farmer of revenue, an hereditary tehsildar, it is particularly applicable to these provinces. This objection has been fully stated before.

The argument in favour of mootahs, that the stock of the towns will flow into the country by the speculations of soucars, is not strong. When a land tax is once fixed, and the people are sure that only a certain known light share of the rent will be taken by government, every man who has spirit and means to speculate in agriculture, will do so. He will not consider whether he (if he improves himself) or the ryot to whom he lends (if he does not mean to improve land himself) pay the land tax direct to government, or through a mootahdar; he will only consider the expense, and the probable profit, and will accordingly turn his attention and his capital, to agriculture or other pursuits, as they may promise advantages. The soucars now lend money upon the security of the lands; even though the land tax be not absolutely fixed. No mootahdar can give them greater security; nor will they be more inclined to lend, nor the ryots more able to borrow, because government have farmed the land tax.

In respect to the objection, that men of abilities will get into the judicial line; I think that good salaries will secure the services of men, sufficiently able to carry on the business of a collectorship.

Respecting the vexation occasioned by the interference of circar servants; it may be easily believed that the heartburning and jealousies which would arise between the mootahdar and his former equals, over whom he would probably show his importance, and disgust, by the insolence of office, would more than counterbalance the vexation occasioned by circar servants.

The easiest, but not the best way of settling these provinces, would be to divide them into mootahs at once; to take an average of the collections of former years, and fixing the jumma on that average, sell the mootahs, without any more ado; as we have done, in the Circars and Baramahl: but in this case, if the land tax were not previously fixed, we should, in reality, give the mootahdar legislative powers, if not confer upon him the actual property in the lands of those who are now, independent proprietors. Such a measure, would be, I should imagine, as unjust as it would be impolitic; indeed, it would be impossible, unless we at least established a rate at which the lands were to be assessed. But even where a rate was fixed, and it were left to the mootahdar to carry it into effect, no body can suppose that he would do it, impartially. The mootahdars, if they were left to assess the land tax, would favour their own friends; relieve the greater part of the burthen on the lower proprietors, and manage in such a way, that their own lands, and those of their friends, should go tax free.

A scene of iniquity, and at all events of altercation, would ensue, which could never be so well settled in court, as it would be prevented in the cutcherry of the collector. If the collector cannot, in the first instance, fairly settle the tax on each estate; there is little hope of its ever being done in court, after every thing has been thrown into confusion, by the altercation of the parties.

As I have sat a long time in a Zillah Court, I may be supposed to know, how difficult it is; what delays ensue, in settling revenue causes. As a collector, a man may settle more, in one day; than as a judge, in a month perhaps. The forms and appeals, occasion a great delay: the simpler and poorer sort would be ruined; the richer and cunning would shield themselves.

selves behind the ample target of a rejoinder. There is at present no standard, in either Malabar or Canara, which could be prescribed to the mootahdar, as a rule for him to make his sub-assessment. If government fixed his jumma at an average of former years collections, it would be fair that he should be guided by the same rule, in subdividing it among the proprietors; but this latitude would give him an arbitrary power, which government, alone, should exercise. The present proprietors would most likely consider the mootahdars as men put over them, eventually to engross their rights. The settlement of Malabar is not yet made; and there would be ample scope for the arbitrary proceedings of a mootahdar. The settlement of Canara is made annually upon an imaginary settlement of Tippoo, which is at least one lack of pagodas more than the country can pay; and as the collector annually raises or lowers the assessment, according to circumstances, and to the means of the ryots, upon this inadequate standard, his settlement is as arbitrary, as if there was no standard. The assessment is also very unequal in the whole, and in the parts of which it is composed; so that whether the shist with a per-centage of the shahrul, or the old standard, be taken as a general rule, the inequality will still exist. The only rule which could be prescribed to the mootahdar would be, a per-centage of the rent or gueni; and if government think that the mootahdar could settle the land tax on this principle, better than the collector, I think that they ought to adopt mootahdary in these provinces immediately; but in my humble opinion, the land tax ought to be formed, direct with the landlords, it may be not to cut this gordian knot. If government are resolved to have mootahdars, it may be done hereafter; but to do it at once, would, I should imagine, strike at the root of private property. But if government wish the collector to settle the land tax direct; if they wish to have a just and equal assessment levied; they ought, I think, to encourage and support the collectors, as much as possible. The courts of justice ought not to interfere, until the land tax is fixed, and declared permanent by government. If the collector is checked, or discouraged, his caution will degenerate into timidity. While personal responsibility, and the fear of the courts hang over him, he will, it is true, go on, or alarmed by prosecution, his zeal will damp; but no vigorous exertions, without which the best way he can, so as to avoid being removed; can be expected from him. The poor will pay this kind of land tax cannot be introduced, can be expected from him. The poor will pay more; the rich less, than their share. The cunning will escape; the simple will pay. The chicanery, delay and multiplicity of causes, will prevent the courts from being useful, while they will act in terror, to prevent the collector venturing on measures, which may be highly equitable and expedient. The collector has an immediate interest in protecting the ryots, and there is little danger of his oppressing them; and if he cannot prevent the temporary oppression of the native servants, it is not likely that the courts, will be able. For these reasons, I think that the courts ought to have no interference, ought to take no cognizance of revenue affairs, until the permanent land tax is confirmed: then, indeed, they will be abolutely necessary to defend the rights of the proprietors. There are many such, relating to land, business, in deciding causes between individuals. There are many such, relating to land, which are objects properly cognizable by them; but for the collector to be interrupted in the middle of an intricate settlement, such as I have described, will not only be very inconvenient, but will defeat the plan. The courts have a great deal of business, which even the zeal and industry of the judges cannot entirely keep down; because private property in the soil is not so readily admitted, nor well established, in other zillahs. Indeed the people complain generally of the delay, which seems an unavoidable attendant on the courts of justice. However, every thing ought to be done, to settle the civil suits.

The people of Soondah, Bilghi and Wynaad, complain of the hardship of going below the Ghauts. I should think, that the courts might benefit agriculture, by gradually adopting rules which may facilitate the alienation of land. The registry of all deeds, leases and mortgages would also be proper, for the reasons I have already stated. The Regulation 1802, does this in some measure, it is true; but it may not be sufficiently rigorous. I would have all such deeds invalid, unless registered in some public office. A merchant has a plea for complaint if he is forced to register his transactions; but not, one would think, a landlord, whose property is seen, known, palpable: no one can be mistaken respecting his income; the general value of his estate, and the amount which may be safely advanced upon it. Secrecy does not seem necessary, unless the landlord means to deceive, by a secret alienation, or double mortgage. The courts might also simplify the various deeds, conditions, and gradations of mortgage, lease and sale; and establish certain forms, which would facilitate decisions, and render transactions more certain. The gentlemen in Malabar can do this, the more easily; since they are so well acquainted with the language, customs, agriculture and laws of the country.

The atrocious deeds which were formerly so frequent in Malabar and Canara, are said to be less common. The rebellions of Malabar were not objects of police, but civil wars; which burnt with a raging or smothered flame, ever since the Company got that province: Mr. Baber cannot be too highly commended or rewarded, in my humble opinion, for his zeal, activity; and success, in suppressing the Pyche rebellion, which has cost the lives of a great number of brave officers and troops, and enormous sums of money; all which loss and destruction, must have continued, had not Mr. Baber finished the rebellion by surprising the Rajah.

The Moplah rebellion was suppressed by the patriotism, talents, and activity, of Captain Watson and his Kolkar corps, which has suffered more, and merited more, than perhaps some regular corps. Indeed, considering the strength of the country, the dreadful effects of the climate, and the long impunity; I may say, which the rebels enjoyed; I think that the present tranquil tranquil state of the country reflects the highest credit on every person connected with the administration of Malabar. Canara is like Malabar; and has been the scene of frequent rebellion and civil war. It has been quiet since the first year of the Company's government; because Major Munro took proper measures to secure tranquillity when the province was first subdued. Had he not acted, in so prompt and prudent a manner, it would have been the scene of the same confusion which has distracted Malabar, since it came under the Company's government.

The police of Canara has therefore been excellent, as well as that of the Ceded Districts; although travellers may sometimes have waited half an hour for their eggs and milk; and even then, have got stale ones. Considering the former state of these countries, the property and persons of the people are secure. No person, who has conversed with the people of these provinces, can have failed to observe their general opinion on this subject. This good policy arises from the rigorous prosecution of offenders, and from the co-operation of the body of the people, who have been brought to support the civil magistrate. The collectors ought, as has been already proposed, to superintend the police; but, I should think, ought not to be too much burthened, with minute ordinances. If they are distracted with minute regulations, they cannot attend to the more important parts of their duty. The judges would then, be relieved from the vexatious and tedious duty of the criminal department; and would have more time, and a more collected mind, to attend to the decision of civil suits, which is certainly more difficult, and perhaps more important, than enquiring into thefts and robberies. If the decision of civil suits is delayed; property becomes less valuable, and the collection of the revenue, may be impeded*.

The courts in the Ceded Districts have but few causes; which is partly owing to the poverty of the people, and partly to the attention which has been paid by Colonel Munro to the decision of suits. The courts ought to postpone the consideration of causes in which the ryots are concerned, during those months in which they cannot leave their fields, without loss.

So much has been said on the subject of police, that it seems unnecessary to say any thing more on the subject, except to observe, that as far as I could see, the police of Malabar, Canara, and the Ceded Districts, is very well managed; that, considering the former state of the country, that persons and property are secure; and that this happy state of security is owing to the wise arrangements of government, and to the talents and exertions of the gentlemen who now manage those provinces. The few persons with whom I had an opportunity of talking, and the observations I was able to make, convinced me that the people are very well pleased with the administration, although in the Ceded Districts they complain about the bad seasons. If they murmur any where, it arises from ill humour, occasioned by idleness and security. A fine rain would give them employment and good spirits.

On the whole, the situation of the provinces which I have visited, has appeared such as to give me great satisfaction, although I did not stay long enough, nor perhaps take the proper means, to acquire minute information.

It will be found that these provinces, when settled in the way proposed, will be in that situation, which the soundest authors, the greatest political economists, and wisest statesmen, have ever thought best suited to produce general happiness, and the greatest agricultural improvement†. They will be divided among a yeomanry, or great number of small proprietors. I shall not attempt to quote, because those who take the trouble to read my paper have, I dare say, read more, and remember better than I do. However, I cannot help observing, that ancient Egypt, China, and India, under its native princes, Italy, under the ancient system, have been most celebrated for agriculture and great population; and that all these countries, while they flourished, were cultivated by a number of small proprietors, or by small farmers, who paid so light a rent, that they were nearly on the same footing, as proprietors; because their favourable tenures were secured by custom. Italy, which, when conquered by the Romans, was full of people; and cultivation fell off when great citizens engrossed great estates; when rivers, which had formerly divided independent states, became the boundaries of private estates. The Roman is said to have supported his family, on the produce of an acre; two jugera was the allotment to early settlers.

Europe, which was so fertile under the Roman government, became a wilderness, when shared out among the northern chiefs, who conquered the provinces on the fall of the empire. This may be attributed, in some measure, to the destruction of men and stock, during the invasion of the barbarians; but Adam Smith attributes the continued discouragement of agriculture, from the fall of the empire to very late times, to the law of primogeniture and entails, which kept great estates united. The wisest politicians have condemned all laws which tend to fetter the free alienation, and check the division of land. The grandeur of England is in a great degree, to be attributed to the wisdom of Henry VII. whose whole reign was employed in depressing the very great, and raising the very low. The

* There is no immediate necessity for deciding civil suits; and they are sometimes put off, on this account; but the Courts of Circuit come round, and keep the zillah judge so alert about the criminal department, that the zillah judge is apt to become a secondary business. Indeed, it seems as if every thing was to be sacrificed to the execution of the laws respecting thieves and robbers.

ners and institutions, the arguments and instances produced by Arthur Young in favour of large farms, in his comparison of French with English husbandry, do not, I think, weaken the force of these, my observations; because I shall show it is a general want of stock, and general poverty, which keeps farms small at present; and the Hindoo institutions will always have a tendency to keep them small, even after stock has accumulated.

The law of ejectment; the evasion of entails; the invention of long leases; the conversion of sub-tenants into sub-proprietors; the emancipation of the smaller landholders from feudal services, which all seem to have been effected between the times of Henry VII. and Charles II. are supposed to be the chief causes of the prosperity of England.

The agriculture of France, and other continental countries, has been confessedly checked, by the laws which enabled the great to keep together vast estates. Where estates are very large, they must be managed, either through the agency of rapacious bailiffs, or leases to farmers. The great landlord is usually a proud noble, an expensive trifler, or an idle esquire; and they are full as likely to be so (and where they exist, are as much so), in India, as in Europe. If such a landlord manages any part of his estate himself, he generally does it badly, and consequently occasions a loss both to himself and to the public; because, the better a farm is managed, the greater the produce, and greater the rent. The farming of gentlemen is a losing concern. In England, indeed, some noblemen and gentlemen of great estates, are not only skillful farmers, but philosophic improvers, who have brought down all the secrets of chemistry to assist mother earth, in performing her task. Where there are such landlords, no doubt the argument does not hold good; but in general, few such men will be found, in great estates, especially in India. They in general, either farm badly through the agency of bailiffs, or they let their land to farmers. Farmers are not so anxious to improve the land, as proprietors. Even long leases do not give a man such an interest in the soil, as actual property. If long leases are allowed to be a great source of improvement, how greatly must actual property excite industry? When a man knows that the land is his own; that his son will succeed to it; that he has no lord, no superior, none to share in the fruits of his industry; that he and his posterity, are to reap the full harvest of his labours; his exertions must be greater than those of the farmer, whose lease expires, in a few years. In India especially, where professions, and that of husbandry, are hereditary; when a man's first duty is to get a son to succeed to his place in society; the hereditary possession of a small estate has every charm that human passions, and Indian prejudices, can inspire. In other provinces (i.e. except in Malabar and Canara) the only landholders are enaumdars, who show the greatest attachment to their enaum lands. The laws and customs which keep great estates together, originated in pride and fear. They were only suited to, and admitted into countries, where the sovereign power was weak. The great improvements in the police, as well as agriculture, of Europe, have chiefly resulted from breaking up those overgrown estates. It may be said, that great estates never existed in India; but the same kind of policy which kept them united so long in Europe, produced poligars, rajahs, and zemindars. Force, official convenience, and defence under weak governments, seem to have produced these monsters in civil society; but as they were all officers of government, or pensioners, or petty princes, they seem neither to have claimed nor exercised the rights of property in the government, nor did they interfere further than to receive the circar rents from the ryots; they affected, and still affect, the style of princes. Where such people existed, it was very proper to keep them quiet, and convert a dangerous chieftain, if possible, into a country gentleman of large estate; but it was in itself, inconsistent with prospects of agricultural improvement. It might be state policy; but it was not of itself, immediately adapted to increase the produce of the land, or the general opulence. To make a petty prince, a great military or police officer, the landlord of an immense tract of country, including towns, and rivers, and forests, and mountains, and roads, might have been prudent, just as war, as expense, as sacrifices of territory, or increase the general prosperity, except indirectly, by securing the state from the opposition, and even rebellion, which those chieftains might have excited. It indeed produced advantage to the country, by limiting the demand of government; but demand may be limited, without creating great landlords, or rather great farmers, of revenue. To convert an hereditary office, a jurisdiction, or military district (an office which, at most could be considered a kind of incorporeal property) into a parcel of land, into absolute partible property in the soil, appears to be doing what the policy of Europe has been labouring for ages, to undo.

It would be equally contrary to that policy, to introduce mootahdars into these provinces with a view to condense property, to unite small and create great estates; except that the policy, which may have justified the measure in the Circars, where those chiefs existed, directly opposes it, in these districts; and that no great advantage, but very great disadvantages, would probably result from so unjust an operation.

Unless the rights of the present proprietors are secured, by a fixed land tax, assessed by government itself, they must fall into vassalage. They will become mere tenants, instead of proprietors; instead of cultivating their own, they will cultivate their masters lands, and according to the usual course of things, will cultivate worse.

Some people may imagine, that mootahdars are better than small proprietors; because large farms are supposed, by some writers and farmers in Europe, to be better than small. But the slightest attention to the subject, convinces one, that this great question, which has employed the pens of theorists, and the ploughs of practical speculators in Europe, is not connected with the subject of mootahdary and ryotwarry*.

of Mr. Thackeray; 4th

Whether there are mootahdars or not, the same cultivators who have cultivated the earth hitherto, must go on cultivating it, hereafter. The mootahdar is a farmer of revenue; not a farmer of land. He may have some bullocks, and be a ryot himself, too; but as a mootahdar, he can never cultivate, and hardly ever superintend, even the cultivation of his own mootah. He must, and will, let out his land to the present occupants; even though he were not, generally speaking, cultivate with so much success. Therefore, even though he could, and were, to turn them all out, and undertake the cultivation with his own bullocks, slaves, and labourers, had he stock to do it; he would most likely be ruined.

Agriculture has been extended and improved in Europe, since cottagers were turned out of their small farms. I believe, that one good and skilful farmer, with good implements and cattle, and half a dozen able labourers, could do more than an hundred families of idle highland cottagers could do formerly; but this is, because the cottagers in ancient Europe, and now, in some parts of it, were idle, ignorant people, whose farming was bad. They did not make the land produce half what it could, and has since produced, by better management; yet they consumed more, than a few better farmers would require. But the improvement did not result from the mere union of small farms. It arose from turning out ten people, who could produce but little; and putting in one good farmer, whose skill and industry, and stock, enabled him to raise more produce than all the ten could do before, at so much less expense, and therefore to pay so much more rent. These cottagers, were originally slaves, and retainers of the great landlord, and were a very ignorant, idle, turbulent set of people, from whom no great exertions could ever be expected; but the ryots of India are a very different set of men, who have reclaimed waste, and practised husbandry with skill and success, from the most remote period. The mootahdar could not pretend to teach them their business, and instruct them in that noble art, which is their patrimony. The hereditary profession of husbandry, and occupation of certain lands, gives them an hereditary knowledge of the soil and seasons, and proper mode of culture, which no stranger could possess. The mootahdar has no more skill than any of them; and could not, therefore, improve the husbandry by superior knowledge.

Another advantage, usually attributed to great farms; is the scope which a great capital affords. The great farmer may keep certain fields under particular crops and management; he may have fallows and routines of crops; he may reserve his grain, for a good price; he may make every thing turn to account. The great farmer no doubt, in India, as well as in Europe, has great advantages; and is enabled to make a greater profit in proportion to his rent, than the small farmer. About 400 acres in the upper country of India, as well as in Europe, seems the best size.

A farmer for instance, in the Ceded Districts, who pays 200 pagodas per annum, makes a greater profit, and raises a greater produce in proportion to that rent, than the poor farmer who only pays 100 pagodas. However, in this case, the profit of the great farmer will not be more, than the interest of his capital employed in his farm. The poor farmer has no stock of value employed, at least none to signify; while the great farmer has a great many bullocks, a great deal of stock, a good deal of ready money to pay his expenses; all which constitute his stock, and which must be replaced, with a profit. His original stock must be renewed, his annual expenses repaid with interest; so that were the accounts of the great and small farmer fairly balanced, it would most likely be found, that in proportion to the stock, skill, and labour employed, the great farmer had not raised more produce, nor derived a greater profit, than the small farmer. If a farmer has stock sufficient for the field he occupies, his produce and profit will be, in the same proportion, whether his farm be small or great. The earth generally produces, in proportion to the labour and expenses bestowed upon it. The division of labour, so important an advantage in manufactures, has little effect on agriculture. If this is the case in Europe (and the best authors, especially Adam Smith, seem to think so) great capitals can do little in Indian husbandry, by promoting the division of labour; even in Indian manufactures, circumstances render the division of labour almost unnecessary; at least there are few manufactures, in which the division of labour is carried far. If therefore, the division of labour, which does so great things in the manufactures of Europe, is in a great degree unnecessary in the manufactures of India; and if the division of labour does so little in the agriculture of Europe, how shall we expect any great advantage from it, in the husbandry of India? It seems evident indeed, that in Europe, great farmers have improved the breed of cattle, have gone to great expense in manures and improvements. They may do so here too, as they get gradually and naturally be like the great farmers of England, who are like great ship-owners. The one, have in what part, they find employment. It is the same to both, in what parish or take care of it; but to such farmers and ship-owners, the sea and earth are alike indifferent. Perhaps it is farmers of this kind, that are the greatest improvers and breeders of cattle. Their stock and spirit incite them to improve. Here, stock and spirit are in general depressed, by a heavy rent or tax; improvement is therefore slow.

But even did great capitals, lodged with a few, promote improvement, more than the same capital shared among many small farmers; it would not signify, in respect to Canara and Malabar, where they are proprietors, not farmers. I will admit, that had I a large estate, I would rather let it out to a few rich, than to many poor farmers; not so much, because I thought that they could raise a great produce, and pay more rent, as because because my rent might be more secure. But the question is, whether great proprietors are better than small? and I think it evident, that a number of small proprietors, are better, in every respect, than the same land and capital, in the hands of a few great landlords.

Where a great noble or a great rajah draws the rent, or even great part of it, from a large extent, it enables them to live in leisure and affluence, and to employ many idle servants, and consume many foolish articles of luxury. The whole rent which they draw, goes to feed the idle and unproductive; for, footmen and peons, opera girls, and dancing girls, giving great dinners to country parties, and giving treats to Brahmins, are expenses which bring back nothing. They are all their consumption, and in waste. So it is, if they are consumed, in a great degree, upon worthless domestics, and no reproduction; and their rent is spent in trifling articles of luxury, because they feed those artists, the manufacturers of those trifling articles which they delight in so much; but it were better that such artists received no encouragement, for if they did not, they would be forced to betake themselves to other more useful occupations. Thus, rent enjoyed by great nobles, and great rajahs, is spent on menials and ministers of luxury and ostentation, and the country is doubly impoverished. It is impoverished, by being obliged to support this swarm of drones; it is impoverished, by having so many hands withdrawn from useful labours. Keeping 5,000 of these idle hands, is as great a burthen as keeping 5,000 soldiers. Many of our provinces groan under this burthen. The landlords rent in the Northern circars is divided between the government and the zemindars. The government expends a great part of this rent in supporting the judicial, revenue, and military establishments; but besides, the country supports an host of rajahs, with all their dependant relations, Brahmins, peons, elephants, chobdars, and servants. They are supposed to render an equivalent, by their skilful management, and clever arrangements respecting the landed property of which they are termed proprietors; but did their share of the rent, be it great or small; did the sums which are idly expended or hoarded by them, go at once to the tribe of husbandmen, the ryots; how great an increase of general comfort, agricultural stock, and improvement, would ensue. I do not imagine that it can ever go to them, now. It will enable the rajah to keep an elephant, perhaps, if he had none before; or half a dozen, where he had but one before; but it will not go to increase the stock of the ryots. The rajah will, that end of the chapter, get as much from them as ever. It must be always kept in mind, that remissions granted to ryots, are like money lent out, at interest; they must come back, with a profit. Where the rent goes to a small proprietor, it is immediately added to the agricultural stock; applied to the improvement of the land; to the support of productive industry. It is the great advantage of small estates, (by small, I mean such as can be managed, by their owners) that the rent is not diverted from the land. I have attempted to trace the expenditure of the rent drawn by great landlords. I will try to show, how it will most probably be disposed of, by a small proprietor.

The farmer pays his rent, the net produce of the land, to the great landlord from whom he rents, and begins his next year's cultivation with the same, or at least with but a small increase, of stock. The rent would be spent by the landlord, and would not in general be added to the agricultural stock, not, at least, until the ostentatious or frivolous wants of the great landlord had been supplied. But the proprietor (were this farmer converted into a proprietor of the same land for instance) would keep the rent himself, and dispose of it according to his disposition. Frugality and moderation are, in general, among a set of men who have been celebrated in all ages and nations for them, than among the great, who are notorious for the contrary vices.

If a small proprietor is very frugal, he will save the whole landlord's rent, not spend one farthing on his personal expenses, but invest it in that kind of stock which he considers most profitable and secure; and his situation, agricultural stock will be the most obvious. He will, therefore, apply the landlord's rent to the purchase of more bullocks, if he wants them; he will plant a few trees; he will give his land a better manuring, or clear a field of waste; knowing the certain profits which must arise from his secure possession of the land, he will most likely expend all the rent upon his land, as far as it is susceptible of improvement. If he has saved more than he can readily and probably employ, in increasing his stock, or improving his estate, he will lend it to some others, to employ in the same way; for a man of his turn will not lend to a spendthrift.

If the proprietor should not be quite so frugal, or rather so penurious, as the one I have described, he will expend part of the landlord's rent, in wearing a good cloth, in purchasing toys for his children; he will marry his daughter, and thus get rid of half his stock, in a way which tends to general advantage; because, the wants and enjoyments of a man of his moderate circumstances, are not luxurious nor ostentatious; he encourages and employs manufacturers of articles of necessity. The half of the rent which such a man may save, will be vested in agricultural stock, or in the improvement of land; or if his estate and stock are not susceptible of improvement, will be lent out to some other, who may want it. The generality of small proprietors will be of this way of thinking, and will most likely act in this way.

If the small proprietor be idle and extravagant, he will no doubt spend the whole rent in personal gratification; and this habit will at last ruin him; and force him to sell his land to some thrifty proprietor, such as I at first described, who will take better care of it. But

But among small proprietors whose moderate circumstances oblige them to habitual economy, such spendthrifts will seldom be found. Circumstances form habits; and small estates, would form frugal swains.

Here are three probable results from the different dispositions of three small proprietors, whose estates were just large enough to employ their skill and stock; and the farmers' profit and wages of labour on which, would be sufficient to support them, as tenants.

If the estate be much larger than the small proprietor can manage, from want of stock, he will let part, and apply the rent to the accumulation of stock, which will soon enable him to cultivate the whole himself; or if it be too large to be managed by one person, he must continue to let part, until the Hindoo law of succession, or other event, may cause a division and diminution of it.

If the estate be very small (so much so, that the wages of labour, profit of stock and reward of skill, be not sufficient to support the proprietor) he must, whether he be prodigal or frugal, break in upon the rent, and endeavour, by great frugality and industry, to improve his land and his condition.

If he has bad luck, and can go on no longer, he must, like poor proprietors, poor tradesmen and poor farmers in all countries, sell his land and stock, and turn labourer; but while a man has a spot of his own, to labour upon, nothing but very great imprudence, or unusual misfortune, can reduce him so low. The climate in Malabar and Canara will generally secure him from the misfortunes which usually ruin farmers, in other parts of India, bad seasons; and it may be expected that his habits of frugality and prudence, which all small proprietors, and especially Indian proprietors have, will generally preserve him from the bad effects of folly and extravagance. Although the ryots are liberal, if not profuse; they care little about money; because, accustomed to pay the circar, and because an industrious ryot can always borrow; he can always pledge his labours, mortgage his skill in husbandry, and borrow money. His industry is a stock which seldom fails; he has therefore credit. But this is no reason for drawing a heavy rent from him. His charity is great, and in most parts of the country, a certain proportion of his profit is supposed to be expended in charity; and an allowance is accordingly made: but charity begins at home, and he will take care of himself; and not to expend his whole profit, when he has the means and the incitement to increase his stock, and add to his own comforts.

If great landlords are better than small, on account of the capital, government must be the best of all; because no individual, however wealthy, can vie with government in point of capital, nor will any individual be more inclined, or better able, to promote extensive plans of improvement. But it is confessed on all sides, that any thing is better than to have government, the landlord; and by the same reasoning, it would appear, that as a great landlord is better than the greater sovereign; so the small proprietor is better than the great landlord. The economy, attention, and intimate knowledge of the soil, its capability, the proper mode of culture, are much greater advantages in husbandry, especially Indian husbandry, than a great capital. Where there are tanks, indeed, a capital is necessary; but government must superintend great tanks at all times. But in Canara and Malabar the small proprietor will pick up every stone, root out every weed which can stand in the way of, or draw nourishment from, a plant; he will cut away the sides of hills; he will dig manure, turn the soil, plant a cocoa nut here, a pepper vine or pumpkin there, as petty convenience may suggest; he will bestow on his little spot, all that minute labour and attention which is so important in Indian husbandry, and especially in Malabar and Canara. Each man lives on his estate; and the enclosures, the neatness of the culture of each small spot, show the attention with which the proprietor improves, I may say embellishes, his little ground. In the vicinity of great towns on the Malabar coast, where there is a good market, and property is secure, the estate of each proprietor is enclosed with high banks formed at a great expense; and all within this mud boundary, shows that every inch has experienced the care of its master. I never saw so much neatness, attention, and enclosure, in the neighbourhood of our largest towns, on this side the peninsula. I have, indeed, sometimes seen fields enclosed with brigs, as the crops were rising; and in the Cedet Districts, particularly, the remains of milk hedge enclosures, for a long way round the village, showing former prosperity. These enclosures, however, generally surround the enaum lands of the village officers, and are consequently private property; but I never went far, without seeing spaces overrun with grass between the field and the road; sometimes, great clumps of bushes and long grass, in the middle of a field; sometimes, a solitary field, overrun with bushes, although as fit for cultivation, as the cultivated fields which surrounded it; all these marks of slovenly husbandry, show that it is circar land, not private property; that the land is cultivated by poor farmers, not by proprietors.

But to return to the question of great and small farmers, or great and small estates: for the next argument I shall use, will apply to both. It will be found, that all over India, it is want of stock, not want of land, that keeps down improvement. Indeed, it appears so absurd to discuss the question of great and small farms, in a country where farms must be small, because farmers are poor, that I do it merely to convince people who may suppose that it applies to India.

It neither applies to Indian husbandry, nor to zemindars and mootahdars; for, though I have indulged myself in arguing against great landlords, yet zemindars are never, either great landlords or great farmers. Few zemindars in India, have ten bullocks employed in cultivation. I beg every man who takes the trouble to read my paper, will remember this all through—the Zemindar is merely a farmer of Revenue; not of Land.

In Canara, the proprietors have not capital to manage their estates, small as they are; they are obliged to let out part, though they admit, what is evident, that it would be more profitable to keep them, in their own hands. They now keep as much as they can, and if they had stock, they would keep more; so that, it would seem, that the estates, small as they are, are already too great, in some instances; and that a further division and diminution, rather than an union of estates, would promote improvement. It is the general want of stock, rather than an improper distribution of the little there is, which keeps down the improvement. A light land tax in Canara and Malabar, is the only thing to increase the stock of the country; to make those who are now thriving proprietors, opulent; and those who are now poor, thriving. In other provinces, a light assessment, which shall leave to the farmers a share of landlord's rent, will have the same effects. But collecting the rent through the medium of an hereditary bailiff, such as the mootahdar, who seldom has half a dozen bullocks of his own; who is a mere farmer of revenue, can do no good to the country, by increasing agricultural stock. If indeed, the sunnud of permanent possession, Milkuit Istimrar, had a magic operation; if it at once doubled the agricultural stock of the country, it would be far superior to the philosopher's stone; and I should acquiesce in its immediate and general introduction into these provinces; but no person will mistake so far as to believe, that we can create property, by a stroke of the pen; without making some sacrifice. We must either give up a share of the advantages now drawn by government, or we must transfer individual rights, to do any material benefit to the mootahdar. If we set up a mootahdar, he must be raised either, at the expense of government, or of the ryots. If it be done at the expense of government, the capital of the country will be increased, in proportion to the sacrifice made by government. If it be done, at the expense of the ryots, the general stock and property may be in some measure transferred, but not generally increased.

In Malabar and Canara, where there are no tanks, I do not see how great capitals could be employed, even though we could make them. Some expense is incurred by damming up rivers to prevent their flooding, or to preserve their water for cultivation. This expense should be considered, and deducted from the rental of the estates in which it is usually incurred. The land tax will consequently be lighter. Stock may be expended, in planting gardens in particular situations; but of all kinds of husbandry, gardening is best managed by a small proprietor. The minute attention, local knowledge, and petty hand work, which a garden requires, can be given much better by a small proprietor, than by any other person. The same cause which makes the labour of hired labourers cheaper and more efficient than that of slaves, makes the exertions of the farmer still more efficient than those of the labourer, and the proprietor's labours again more efficient than those of the farmer. The more their interest is concerned, the harder they work; and with the greater effect is their labour applied, whether it be that of the head or of the hand.

The issue of tuccavy in Malabar is not usual, though it is in Canara and the other provinces. But there it would become unnecessary, if the proprietors were not in some cases over-burthened with the land tax. But if the old custom of receiving tuccavy should still make the people expect it, I see no good reason why government should not assist its poorer subjects, with an occasional loan. The issue of tuccavy does not prove that great farms are necessary, that mootahs are great farms on great estates, and therefore better than small. It only proves that there is but little stock in the country; that poor men have no money, and must either borrow or beg; that the assessment is too high; for if the land tax or rent of a poor ryot, who is forced to take tuccavy, was lowered, his private rent, which he himself keeps, would be increased, so that he could do without tuccavy. It cannot be said of such a man, that he would spend any remission of rent in extravagant pleasure, not save it to carry on his cultivation; for the collector is satisfied with his industry and frugality, before he trusts him with an advance of tuccavy; and the same honesty and frugality which gives him credit to borrow of the circar, would make him apply his increased share of the rent, to the accumulation of stock. Where the land is private property, and the proprietor draws a good share of the rent, the issue of tuccavy is not absolutely necessary, because he could always borrow of an individual on the security of his land, as a great many landholders and ryots now do; but even though he can borrow of an individual, he will sooner apply for tuccavy, because there is no interest to pay. As government are interested about the ease of the people, and always have a few thousand pagodas lying idle in the cash chest; and as they must have collectors and accountants, whether they advance it or no; and as such collectors and accountants have hitherto safely transacted the business relating to tuccavy; I see no reason why government should refuse a loan to its poor subjects, when they have money lying idle in their cash chest. I fancy, that some of the petty princes, and even the great king of Prussia, did not think this piece of policy beneath them in Europe.

I have said a good deal about great and small farms and estates, not because it relates to the question of ryotwar and mootawar, but because, from the inaccuracy of the English language, the term, farm, applies to farmers of revenue, and farmers of land. One of our chief faults in India, is the considering things according to their English terms, which are indeed ambiguous, as applied to English affairs; but when applied to Indian concerns, are sometimes unintelligible. A farm in some of our regulations, seems to be judged of by the same rules, whether it be a farm of land, or a farm of revenue. The arguments applicable to a farm of land, are used in respect to a farm of revenue; those applicable to

As we generally see Indian affairs with English eyes; and carry European notions into Indian practice; it may be necessary to say a little respecting the gradation of ranks, or in other words, the inequality of condition, which is supposed by some to be necessary in a well-ordered society, and may be urged as an argument against the general distribution of land, among a great number of small proprietors. Our veneration for wealth is very proper, perhaps, because it tends to the security of property; but sometimes we seem to carry it so far, as to imagine that opulent men enrich society, instead of society enriching them. When a man has acquired wealth by superior industry, or talents, or good fortune, or when his ancestors have acquired it, his wealth entitles him to respect. It is the great end of civil compact, to secure it to him. Were it not secure, industry would not only be damped; but a general confusion would take place. This is all evident; but for us, to set about a scheme to make a certain set rich, at the expense of the public, with a view to public benefit, is to commit injustice, without obtaining any equivalent advantage; and the least evil it will occasion, will be the hastening perhaps the chief evil of opulence, the inequality of conditions; for though the rich and great, especially in the East, sometimes imagine that their wealth and grandeur promote the public prosperity, yet it will be found, without a very close enquiry, that this inequality of condition is an evil, although a very necessary evil, which always accompanies, and is therefore by superficial observers thought to be the cause of national prosperity: but although it be like some other evils, the constant companion of opulence, it is still an evil both in India and Europe. If one rich man engrosses many of the good things of life, many poor must go, without them. One fat rajah supposes fifty-two ryots. These inequalities are the consequence of opulence, and are on the whole, evils, which will follow of themselves, as far as the customs of the Hindoos allow them. We need not hasten them. If any of the landed proprietors of Canara, or Malabar, and the rest of the Peninsula (if we make them all landlords) should by industry and good fortune increase their estates, so much the better. I heartily wish they may. I should never propose an Agrarian law. I would never interfere with their estates, acquired in this natural and gradual manner; but when we are settling a country, we must not try to introduce inequalities, by positive regulations; we must let them all start fair; and leave the rest to fortune, and their own industry. If any become rich, buy land, and raise a great estate, it will probably be divided at their decease, and as many more estates as there are heirs, will spring up from the ashes of the rich old man; but the generality will remain more nearly on an equality, than in most other countries; because the climate of Malabar and Canara yield a surer harvest than in other countries, and because their industry and parsimony are nearly the same.

This equality of condition, in respect to wealth in land; this general distribution of the soil among a yeomanry, therefore, if it be not most adapted to agricultural improvement, is best adapted to attain improvement, in the state of property, manners and institutions, which prevail in India; and it will be found still more adapted to the situation of the country, governed by a few strangers, where pride, high ideas, and ambitious thoughts, must be stifled. It is very proper, that in England, a good share of the produce of the earth should be appropriated to support certain families in affluence, to produce senators, sages, and heroes for the service and defence of the state, or, in other words, that great part of the rent should go to an opulent nobility and gentry, who are to serve their country in parliament, in the army and navy, in the departments of science and liberal professions. The leisure, independence, and high ideas, which the enjoyment of this rent affords, has enabled them to raise Britain to the pinnacle of glory. Long may they enjoy it;—but in India, that haughty spirit, independence, and deep thought, which the possession of great wealth sometimes gives, ought to be suppressed. They are directly adverse to our power and interest. The nature of things, the past experience of all governments, renders it unnecessary to enlarge on this subject. We do not want generals, statesmen, and legislators; we want industrious husbandmen. If we wanted rank, restless and ambitious spirits, there are enough of them in Malabar, to supply the whole peninsula; but these people, are at least an incumbrance, if nothing worse; they can never do good, and at all events, consume a good deal, without rendering any equivalent service to the public. We must therefore avoid the creation of more; though we submit to the necessity of supporting those who now are.

Considered politically therefore, the small proprietors, who are the main support of the British empire, are the main support of the British empire, and because their industry

Considered politically therefore, the general distribution of land, among a number of small proprietors, who cannot easily combine against government, is an object of importance. The power and patronage, and receipt of the circular rent, will always render zemindars formidable, but more or less so, according to the military strength and reputation of the government. It is difficult to foresee, what may happen in the course of a few years; and it is our interest to retain in our own hands, as much power and influence as is consistent with the preservation of the rights of the people. By retaining the administration of the revenues in our own hands, we maintain our communication and immediate connection with the people at large. We keep in our own hands, the means of obtaining information, the knowledge on which alone the resources of the country can be drawn out; the policy administered with effect; and perhaps the body of the proprietors secured in their possessions.

Our

Our first object is to govern India; and then, to govern it well;—and in these provinces, it would seem that both these objects, a strong government, and the security of private rights, would be attained, by a settlement such as I have proposed.

The general distribution of land among a great number of small proprietors, will also contribute to the general happiness of the people. I say happiness, because it is our duty to consider the happiness of the mild, industrious race, which Providence has placed under the British government, before revenue or any other objects. The domestic happiness, the independence, and pleasure of a country life, which the distribution of landed property alone can confer on the multitude, makes this far superior to any system. It may be considered an Utopia by some; however, I think that government can and ought to extend this happy system to these provinces. The people of this country are peculiarly adapted to thrive, as small proprietors. All their customs, opinions and virtues, are suited to this sort of life, and adapted to make them succeed in it. No people are fonder of a house, ground, and place of their own, of their families, of fame among their equals, of their hereditary occupations, and of the profession of agriculture, than the Hindoos. Had they a field for a display of the industry which these feelings would excite, this great country would have a different appearance.

The ryots are laborious, and in some respects, parsimonious, inherit their skill and attachment to husbandry. We sometimes, especially those among us who know least of them, affect a contempt for the natives; they are indeed, objects of pity, if our contempt for their character, suggests ideas of arbitrary government; but considered as husbandmen, for the character, suggests ideas of arbitrary government; but considered as husbandmen, who have understood and carried to perfection that primeval business of man (the cultivation of the earth) for thousands of years, they are very respectable. A few centuries ago, the peasantry of England, and even now, the peasantry in many parts of Europe, are considered as inferior beings by their proud masters, the great landholders, (the zemindars) who urged their idleness, ignorance, and brutality, as a reason for keeping them in vassalage. Some great philosophers have affected to attribute to them indolence, not to be excited by any inducement; want of mental and bodily strength, which fitted them only for slavery to the people of hot climates.

They attributed to climate, what is rather owing to the nature of the country, open and subject to invasion, than to the natural character of the people. It would be impertinent to show that the people of hot countries have been conquerors, sages, and statesmen, merely to prove that the ryots are capable of becoming independent proprietors; but I cannot do this without observing, that Europe, now so industrious, when abused by petty tyrants, distracted by civil wars, and invaded by barbarians, was worse cultivated than this country perhaps ever was, since the days of Menu, who is said to be Minos; and that is carrying their cultivation far enough into antiquity.—The farmers of Europe seem to have been far less skilful, industrious, and respectable, for many centuries, than those who have survived the calamities which have now for so many years, been heaped upon these provinces. The people of India cannot be accused of neglecting their own interest; we see instances of industry and parsimony, which Jews might boast of. The people of the towns in which property is secured by courts of justice, take as much pains, run as great risks, and succeed as well as any people in the world, in acquiring property. It would be monstrous in us to lay it down as a rule, that they must be stimulated to industry by an heavy assessment; driven like slaves, not led like men by a sense of interest; that they are incapable of acquiring property, and must be urged by a heavy rent, and then justify our rule, by a quotation from Montesquieu or Aristotle, that the natives of hot countries are only fitted for slavery. Several wise statesmen and fine scholars have thought otherwise, when they knew their language, works, and qualities. Their superstition may be lamented; but it is the superstition of government, not of the people, that ruins or depresses national prosperity; the same desire of gain, the same self-interest, which urges Jews, and Turks, and Christians, will stimulate their industry. The Moors of Spain were, and the Moplas of Malabar are, a most industrious people; the Turks of Europe, the Moormen of the Carnatic, are a most lazy people;—yet they are of the same religion. The Hindoos, who formerly embellished, were a different set from those who now vegetate in many parts of this country; whether they worship domestic devils, as they do in Camara, or big-bellied gods, like Guenies, or monkey-gods, as Hanoomar, they will attend to their own interest, as soon as security and property are bestowed upon them. The innocent polytheism of the vulgar Hindoo, the sublime metaphysical system of the Bramins, encourage morality, marriage, and the domestic virtues, which produce population and opulence. The same kind of superstition promoted the agriculture and population of ancient Egypt, and China and India. Those sages, whose works are read in our schools, whose books, in a great measure, form the minds of our statesmen, learnt their wisdom from India and Egypt. We judge of the high-spirited rajah, the ferocious poligar, the metaphysical Achari, the long-headed Nizam Shahi accountant, the industrious ryot, and ingenious artificer, from those wretches who are introduced to our first acquaintance, at Madras. The natives have clear heads, powers of application and perseverance, in a greater degree than Europeans relaxed in India; and those are qualities peculiarly suited to business, and calculated to produce individual and general opulence. Our superiority is more acquired, than natural. When they were a polished people, we, in Britain, were savages. The Romans would have thought the people on the banks of the Ganges far superior to those on the Thames: those golden days may return, if we take the proper measures; and we may derive the ultimate advantages. I have been led to this digression on the Hindoos, from observing observing how common it is for us to undervalue their virtues, and exaggerate their vices.

In whatever way it be done, the settlement ought to be moderate; as long as the people are not oppressed with a heavy land-tax, it little signifies how it be collected. Whether a light land revenue be collected through the medium of collectors, or mootahdars, the country will thrive; but no systems, no cookery, can make a heavy land revenue easy; and under any system, a light land revenue will produce improvement and prosperity. This is a truth, which every enquiry I could make, only serves to confirm.

Having now, I think, said enough respecting these sister provinces, Canara and Malabar, I shall proceed to the Ceded Districts, and begin with some general observations on the revenue systems, which have hitherto prevailed in this peninsula.

So much has already been written respecting the provinces of Malabar and Canara, by people of greater abilities, and more local experience, than myself, that I am loth to treat a subject, already so much better discussed than I can possibly do it; I have gleaned what little they seem to have left, and have compared and considered their opinions wherever I found it convenient.

All this Peninsula, it may be said, except, perhaps, only Canara, Malabar, and a few other provinces, has exhibited, from time immemorial, but one system of land revenue. The land has been considered the property of the circar and the ryots; the interest in the soil has been divided between these two, but the ryots have possessed little more interest than that of being hereditary tenants. If any persons have a claim to participate with government in the property in the soil, it is the ryots; the men who originally reclaimed and cultivated the lands. The country is divided into villages; a village, geographically, is a tract of country, comprizing some thousand acres of waste and arable lands. Considered politically, it is a little republic, or rather corporation, having its municipal officers, and corporate artificers; its boundaries are hardly ever altered. There it stands for centuries, and though occasionally injured, or even desolated, by war or famine, the same name, boundaries, intestes, and perhaps even families, remain the hereditary tenants of the land for centuries.

The government collects the rent of the village from the farmers who cultivate it. Some of these farmers, have a thousand, but generally less, often under a hundred acres. There seem to have been, at all times, three temporary modes in which government collected its rent, and one permanent one, which we have introduced. Of the three temporary modes, the first is the ryotwar-kulwar, or individual settlement; the second is the mouzarwar-gangana, or village settlement; the third, the ijurah, or farm of several villages. These are temporary. The fourth, is the mootahdarry, or permanent settlement, introduced by us.

Under the ryotwar settlement, where government is supposed to settle and collect the rent from each farmer, the ryots usually, under native governments, pay a rack-rent; at least so heavy a rent, that at the end of the year, they are little better, if not worse, than they were at the beginning. Under the Company's government, the whole landlord's rent, that is, the whole net produce, is usually paid by the ryots. In the zemindarry countries, the ryots did not pay so much perhaps to the circar; but they paid a great deal in gram-kirch, or village expenditure. This is considered by some persons to be usually an indulgence; but it has every where been carried such lengths, that it in reality became a fraud on government, by a deduction or an oppression on the ryot, by an addition to the rent.

In districts under the immediate management of able collectors, this expenditure took place, in a smaller degree; not more, than 5 or 6 per cent. perhaps. In the Circars and other unsurveyed districts it might, and perhaps now exceeds 10 per cent. In Polaveram, I remember, the private expenditure exceeded the public rent. In the Ceded Districts, there is, probably, but little private expenditure: but whether it was brought to account in revenue, or privately expended, it was all the same to the ryot; since the revenue and village servants, took care at any rate, to get full rent out of him. The government however, suffers by this clandestine expenditure, not so much perhaps on account of the actual loss sustained, as because, as it is kept in ignorance of the real resources and expenses of the state; it is supposed that the revenues are collected in one province much cheaper than in another, and government is sometimes apt to blame the most frugal collector as extravagant, because he has been more vigilant or candid than others, in having every thing publicly brought to account. I formerly thought, that by a proper investigation into unauthorized collections and disbursements, that a considerable sum, which is now spent in this way, might be partly added to circar rent, partly remitted to the ryots in the Northern circars; but that is now impossible. When the revenue administration is vigorous, sometimes enormous, as I have said; when it is weak, they are heavy and frequent, private assessments are instanced in the case of Polaveram. This is one strong reason to wish that the courts had no interference till the permanent settlement was made, and that the courts had the controul of the collector. Any regulations checking collectors in this respect, seem means of stopping private collections, unless the curnums be kept under the collector.—To return from this digression, to the rent of the ryot; it is evident that in a country, where stock and population are at a low ebb, a greater share of the produce should go to the ryot, to encourage agriculture. In some parts of the Company's country, he may perhaps keep ten or even twenty per cent. of the landlord's rent*; but very seldom so much of the rent sticks to the land; and if bad seasons, during which the ryot can raise no produce at all, be taken into the account, it will perhaps be generally found, that he pays the full landlord's rent. Even though the rent of bad seasons be remitted, the ryot still loses by them, because he must subsist himself and his stock in idleness, upon the profits of former years.

In many places, the trouble and difficulty of settling with each farmer, induced the officers of government to let out the lands of the whole village in a lump to a farmer, who again subletted each field, and settled with each ryot; or to the community of the village, who settled among themselves the amount of their respective rent. The farmer might be partial in distributing the rent of the whole village among the ryots; but they generally settled it among themselves, pretty fairly.

This custom, for the village community to farm the whole village for a certain sum, is common in the Circars; and seems the best mode of management they have there. The zemindars frequently let whole villages in this manner, to the village community, and now sometimes for a term of years. This is the system upon which our permanent settlement should be founded. We ought to make a permanent settlement with the whole inhabitants, for the whole lands of the village.

In some cases, neither individual nor village settlements were resorted to. The circar or zemindar, farmed out tracts, comprizing several villages, for one or more years, to great farmers, frequently unconnected with the land; they were often soucars, who had advanced money to the circar, or persons whose profession it was to live by concerns of this kind, and who were like revenue servants, except that their services were compensated by the profits of a farm, instead of wages. The zemindars themselves, were farmers of this description; for their leases were generally annual, and the rent was liable to increase, at the renewal of the cowl.

They were generally more attentive indeed to the interests of the country, than mere farmers; because, as government generally continued them, or were unable to remove them from their situations, they considered themselves more interested in the prosperity of the country. Under the great zemindars this practice will always continue, perhaps because the cheapest way of managing large tracts of country, in size, and other circumstances, more like principalities than private estates. Such zemindars, if they do not farm out in this mode, usually have tehsildars, on the footing of those in the Company's own districts. In some cases, the men who were tehsildars under the collector, remained in the same situation, when the country was made over to the zemindar.

On such large estates, therefore, it would seem improbable that the ryot will derive any benefit from the permanent settlement, any further than that as he is free to remove his stock, and labour to another zemindar, he will probably do so, unless he is well treated. The court is a check also to exactions of the amildars and farmers.

These three, seem to be the only systems which have ever been adopted, previous to the permanent settlement; and under none of them, did the country rapidly improve. This slow advance to improvement was owing to two causes, high rent, and annual settlements. These are the real causes of the general depression of agriculture; and while they exist, no great improvement can be expected. The government, seeing the evils of these temporary settlements, with a view to remedy them, introduced the permanent, or mootahdary settlement, which, in case of zemindars, who were in actual possession at the time of the settlement, seems to admit of little objection: but when the country was divided into mootahs and sold, it may be urged against this system, that it was an ingenious attempt to confer advantages without making sacrifices; that it was an attempt to create property, without rent. It is said by the enemies of this system, that it did not constitute private property in the soil; for that government merely farmed out the landlord's rent to certain contractors, who undertook to collect and pay it regularly, for a certain commission; that the government share of the produce derivable from the waste lands and some sundry advantages, were, it is true, ceded to the mootahdar; but that government were determined to get a compensation for these advantages, which they transferred; so they sold the mootahs; that the price at which they were sold, might be considered high to the farmer who bought, but low in respect to government which sold; because the waste, the chief advantage disposed of, is like bales in the company's godown, when there is no demand in the market. In such a case, it may happen that no private merchant can afford to give the Company's price; but still it may not be worth their while to sell for less, because they have perhaps better means of keeping and disposing of them, than any individual. The sum was therefore inadequate to the Company, but very heavy to the purchaser, and must, at all events, have diminished his means of improving his new purchase. Some sensible natives who have had concern in mootahs, seem situations under our and under native governments, and have had concern in mootahs, seem at a loss to understand the policy of selling the mootahs, which they say gives rise to such a scene of gambling that ruins many individuals, and must occasion a loss to agriculture. Low people, shopkeepers, gomastahs and others, often borrow, clubbing their credit together and pledging the future profits of the mootahs, for the security of the loan: this money so borrowed, they pay to government, as muzzerranah, or purchase money, and are obliged to strain every nerve to repay their creditors. The natives are at a loss to guess what we would be at. Government used formerly, to find it their interest to issue tuckavy, but now on a sudden, without any apparent increase of stock, they not only refuse tuckavy, but (say the natives) by a gambling scheme, drain great part of the ready money, out of the hands of those very persons, to whom they had entrusted the lands, in order to improve them, by increased industry and capital.

Whatever system is adopted, let us not sell the mootahs. This bargain we termed, the permanent settlement; but it was in reality, a contract, an insurance, a farm; it was like a young landlord (say the opposers to this system) who to save trouble, or ease himself of a burthen which he could not support, exchanged the solid property in his estate, for a sum of money paid down, and a rent charge, or annuity secured upon the land. In such a case, the new purchaser might manage better than the first proprietor, and the estate might be improved; so far the public, and even the first proprietor too might benefit; because as he was untried, he had to manage his estate himself, his rent might have been less secure, than his annuity, but every one would condemn the laziness which prompted, or the inefficiency which made such a bargain advantageous to the landlord.

The necessities of government, it would appear, obliged them to reserve the whole landlord's rent; their supposed incapacity to manage, made them exchange their solid property for a rent charge secured on the land, that is, on the rent payable by the ryots. But the government did not transfer the actual property in the soil to the mootahdars, and at once make them landlords; because they kept as much rent as they could, and only remitted so much, as seemed absolutely necessary to ensure the realization of it. The price at which the mootahs were sold, shows that the property disposed of, was not valuable: the Salem mootahs originally sold for 19 per cent. on the annual jumma. What kind of an estate is that which sells for 19 per cent. of the land tax, for one year. In England, where the rental is £.2,000. the land-tax at 4 shillings in the pound is £.400.: what would be said to a man who sold such an estate for £.76.; which is 19 per cent. on £.400. But the land-tax of England, in many cases is not in reality sixpence in the pound; so that the estate in England is a very different thing from the mootah in India; as different as a farm is from an estate*.

The per-centage drawn by the mootahdar, is a commission to ensure him against losses, and to compensate for his trouble and skill of superintendence. Until the net produce of the mootah is nearly doubled, there will be no landlord's rent for the mootahdar. When it is doubled, the mootahdar will pay half to government, and keep half himself, as rent. This increase, may not take place these fifty years, and until it takes place, the mootahdar cannot be a landlord, properly speaking, because he will not enjoy half the rent, but the net produce; the rent must be trebled before the ryots can possibly become small proprietors, and draw a share of the rent. The first increase, must certainly go to the mootahdars, to give them a rent; and even though the net produce be trebled, it is not likely that the second increase will go to the ryots, to give them a landlord's rent.

The mootahdar cannot alienate land, he cannot even legally let land for a term of years at less than the customary rent; because, did the law allow him to do so, he might clandestinely transfer the pledge which government must always keep, as security for the due performance of his engagements to them. The rents of the lands are the security for the government demand; and they cannot be alienated. The ryot has, therefore, no chance of ever becoming a small proprietor, in the way in which free tenants and villagers became their present dependent state under mootahdars, and render their situation very different from that of the tenants in Europe, who have become freeholders. They become freeholders or copyholders in Europe, by encroachments upon the landlords, or by improving their lands to such a degree, that the old service or fee, or rent, which still continued the same, became trifling in comparison to the net produce raised on the land, and which became the copyholder's rent, and gave him so great an interest in the land, that he became the actual proprietor. But here, the government, by drawing the rent which is now the full landlord's rent, will prevent the ryot from raising a rent for himself by improvement, and will oblige him to interfere by laws, to prevent the alienation of rent from the mootahdar, who is answerable for his rent. The government must oblige the mootahdar to keep the rent, even against his own consent; for he being but an hereditary farmer, his mootah being security for his rent to government, he can never, ought never, to be permitted to alienate land, or, what is the same thing, remit rent. He may indeed do it, for a time. He may do it, as long as he holds the mootah, but as the favoured lessee will be always liable to the full rent, he can never consider himself fixed on his land, as a proprietor. Thus the mootahdary system (say its enemies) clinches the farming system, and crushes the hope of ever making the body of the people small proprietors, and fixing them on estates, such as those in Canara and Malabar; and as it stands at present, it certainly is a farming system, in this way, are termed mootahs; the larger, zemindaries. There is no other difference, but in respect to their extent. The mootahs must, by the operation of the Hindoo law, divide; and in time, would dwindle to small freeholds, did not the Regulations prevent the division. Mootahs would in time, come down to ryotwar estates, were it not for this arbitrary

* Many estates will not sell, at all. Our system of landed property is in a great measure unsalable. We set out with declaring in the preamble to Reg. XXV. the Mootahdars and Zemindars, proprietors; we say, They are the proprietors; but by the decisions of the courts, and general sentiments held on the subject, it appears that they are merely hereditary farmers of revenue; that the qualities of property, at least on the valuable part of the estates, are divided, and that the mootahdar, who is held out in the Regulations as the proprietor, has but a very limited interest in the land.

arbitrary law. If the Regulations did not interfere, a mootahdar who had four sons, and a mootah paying 1,000 pagodas annual jumma, would divide it among them, and each would, according to the law, take a portion from which 250 pagodas were payable to government. But the Regulations prevent the existence of any independent estate, paying less than 500 pagodas annual jumma. This arbitrary law, (say those natives who disapprove of the system and consider the mootahdars, actual proprietors) tends to fetter the division and alienation of land. It is true, that it will not prevent entirely the division of estates, because it will be done under hand; but it has that tendency. The four brothers will in spite of the law, divide the estate, and two of them will club together, enter their estate under one name, and pay the 500 pagodas rent conjointly; but, say the objectors to the system, the estate will be less valuable which is subject to the difficulties, disputes, and intricacies, which a law imposing such a forced co-partnership, must produce.

Indeed, the objections urged against the limitation of 500 pagodas annual rent, seem pretty well founded. If the mootahdar be considered a proprietor, not an hereditary collector of revenue, it acts apparently like those feudal laws, like entails and other institutions destructive of improvement, which the wisdom of England has been gradually abolishing.

Indeed this law, seems dictated by principles very different from those which suggested every popular law, in support of the yeomanry of England. What would be said in Parliament, if it were proposed to have no independent landed estates, paying a less land tax than £.200. per annum?—All the endeavours of the popular party in Parliament, since Edward III.'s time, seem to have tended to remove the obstacles to the free transfer of land; and in this country, where the landed property must be divided, as fast as the multiplication of mankind; where prosperity must produce the general distribution of property, as it produces families of children; in this country, a law which limits, or even tends to limit, the division and transfer of land, is contrary to the nature of things. It is to make the immutable nature of things, give way to supposed official convenience. It is trying to make things fit themselves to laws; instead of trying to make laws, adapted to circumstances. Such a regulation might answer, perhaps, in Poland, where none but a great nobility holds vast estates; but in this country, the interests of agriculture and population must, one would imagine, be injured, by so arbitrary a regulation. By thus fixing a maximum, or rather minimum, of 500 pagodas annual government rent, we prevent many of the better sort of ryots, from becoming government tenants. They would often take 1,000 acres at once from government in perpetuity, but that this regulation restrains them, and throws the mootah into the hands of an adventurer*.

The mootahdary system, as it stands at present, comprises an unnatural mixture of corporeal and incorporeal, of occupant and proprietary rights, as they are termed; or rather it is a division of the substance, a separation of the attributes of property (which its enemies say) must produce confusion, law suits, and a progeny of tenures, more intricate than those which sprung up in Europe, from the absurdities of the feudal system. Why, it may be said, must we introduce a bastard kind of feudal law, when we have so simple a system as that which has at all times existed in this Peninsula?—As government still remains the landlord, the mootahdar, for many years at least, will be nothing more than a fixed farmer. Real substantial ownership in the soil, cannot therefore exist. A farmer can never bestow proprietary rights. The ryots therefore do, and will, consider themselves as much tenants as ever; they will wander about perhaps more than ever. The advantages which they derive from the system, seems to arise from the market, which the competition among the mootahdars opens for their labour; for the ryots, now, can remove from one mootah where they think that bad terms are offered them, to one, where they get better; they can carry their labour and stock to a fair market, which they could not do, under any native, not, perhaps, under the Company's government, in some places. But it seems to be the general protection which the husbandman, in common with the other subjects of the Company, derive from the justice of government, that secures them this fair market for their stock and labour. In the Barahmah, the ryots have this way, extorted better terms from the necessitous mootahdars. Those who were rich, indeed, and could afford to lose a year's revenue, it is said would not remit a dab from the customary rent; but those who were poor, were obliged to offer good terms, and the ryots consequently may be said to have derived advantage from the system. But still it seems doubtful whether this frequent removal, this migration from farm to farm, may not, on the long run, do as much harm, as good terms to the ryots, may produce advantages; because temporary farmers can never raise so much produce from the same land as fixed tenants, still less than small proprietors.

From all my enquiries, this seems the chief advantage resulting from the system to the bulk of the ryots. It secures them, the free full enjoyment of their limits, their skill in husbandry; they have a fair market for their labour and stock. This is a great advantage, it is true; and has tended to increase cultivation, in the mootahdaree districts; but this free market may be secured, without farming the land revenue. A fixed rent, and liberty to throw up or cultivate what land they please, would secure it; but this is not enough to give them that spirit which I am anxious to see diffused among them. They must have increased means of supporting their families, and augmenting their stock. If humanity, to which we pretend so much, be the spring of our actions; if policy, which we equally boast of, direct our measures, let us remit to the ryot, such a portion of rent, as shall fix him at once to his field; as shall put him above the uncertain indulgence of a mootahdar. It is admitted, that a remission, if not absolutely necessary to the existence of the ryots, would increase their comforts, and augment their stock: why then shall we refuse it to them, and grant it to a set of men, to be created on purpose to enjoy it, in the hope of their turning up a little of it, to the ryots? Let us do it, direct. Why must we take the roundabout, hereditary farmers, not only the public revenue, but the public subsistence, depend; why then must we refuse to them, what we gave up so freely to the mootahdar, in the hope of its reaching them, by that roundabout course?—Under the mootahdary system, the remission will perhaps filter through mootahdars, renters, and sub-renters; and a little of it, may reach the ryots; but had we not better pour it upon their heads, at once. The ryot pays 25 per cent. of the produce in the Ceded Districts, give him up 12 or 15 per cent. more, and he will become a proprietor; at least, his interests in the land, his situation will make him more like, what we usually call a proprietor, than the mootahdar. He will then buy another bullock, then dig a well, and apply the share of the rent, which he draws, to the increase of his stock, and improvement of his land; for he feels, fixed in it, he feels, a property in it. The remission is applied immediately to increase and encourage his stock and industry. It is vested in the soil; it is made direct. If therefore, we pretend to be guided by humanity, there is no disputing the advantage of this system. Of its policy, to my mind, there seems little doubt, except as to the immediate diminution of revenue.

In regard to the cheapness and facility of collection; the mootahdary system is, no doubt, a little cheaper than even a fixed ryotwar settlement; but still say its adversaries we could suggest, a cheaper and simpler still; suppose for instance, government divide the Ceded Districts, or any other large province, into great farms, of two or three lies of pagodas each, and advertise for sealed proposals, promising to give these farms, to the highest bidder, many adventurers would come forward, and would not only offer, but would perhaps actually collect and pay the revenue, at a much less expense than it could be collected, under any other system. Such a plan would also (say the friends of the ryotwar) be attended with many other advantages, attributed to the mootahdary system. Accounts would be simplified. The board of revenue, and the collectors, would not be plagued, with the settlements, with the troublesome details of tuccavy and tank repairs. If the mootahdary system is good, because simple; this plan is still better, because more simple still. If good, because cheap; this is better, because cheaper still. That a ryotwar system, is attended with some detail, and that the revenue officers must think and act a little, to carry it on well, is true; but all governments, all human affairs, are attended with some difficulty and trouble; and the more pains that are bestowed upon them, the better are they in general conducted. However (continue the advocates for ryotwar) a fixed ryotwar system will not, on the whole, be more difficult or intricate than the mootahdary system, when estates begin to diminish, by the operation of the Hindoo law of succession. The various intricate tenures, law suits, the distribution of government rent, upon divided portions of mootahs, will at least produce as much trouble, in one shape as another; to one person or another, as the ryotwar. If the collectors are a little relieved, the courts of justice will be overwhelmed; and law suits and delays will tend to lower the value of land. There indeed, seems to be some justice in this objection to mootahs, and in the representations of the advocates for ryotwar, who say, that when the rent of each field is fixed at so low a rate, that the ryot becomes a fixed farmer, and in time, a proprietor, the register of a collector will in time, be like the roll of an army; he will collect, as easily from 20,000 small land-owners, as the paymaster pays to pay, and easiness of getting them to receive, their proper quota of money. In England the land-tax is light, and fixed, and I believe, does not involve much detail or difficulty: but the window-tax, the excise, the customs, must be full as intricate; must require as many accounts, must involve as much trouble, as a ryotwar settlement. Even here, the customs in any frontier district, require more attention to accounts, and more intricate details, than the whole ryotwar detail of land revenue. It appears extraordinary to many people, and among others, to me, that under a government like ours, where there are so many boards, secretaries, collectors and civilians; so many gentlemen of the pen, well paid and well qualified to conduct this formidable detail; men who have conducted it successfully for some years; that the trouble should be urged, as an argument in favour of mootahs.

I have often heard men, very able (and with proper encouragement and support) willing to conduct any detailed settlement, object to the ryotwar settlement on this very account; but the commander in chief might as well order family chits, monthly abstracts, or any other useful documents to be discontinued on account of the detail; as for a civil government, so well furnished with officers, and with such means of making those officers zealous and able, to object to a system, because it involves a good deal of trouble and detail.

Our government ought to be a more enlightened, civilized government, than that of the natives; and therefore more able to carry on the details, by which alone any taxes can be equally and correctly assessed and collected. A Gothic chieftain, on the conquest of a province, might have objected to the forms of a Roman prefecture, and might have ordered the revenues to be collected, without any accounts at all; but the Tartars, who conquered India, barbarous as we may term them, were more politic than to do so. They were were very particular about accounts; established wise regulations and checks upon the different revenue officers; and it is their system, which now exists in most parts of this peninsula, as well as in almost every part of Asia. A man, it might be said, might as well object to any curious piece of machinery in a great manufacture, that it was liable to get out of order, that it was very intricate, and that it would therefore be better to break it to pieces, and carry on the work without it. In every department in war, in trade, in revenue, there must be accounts and details. The Company might as well burn their books, on account of the detail and trouble attending the keeping them, as order a mootahdary system, because their servants cannot manage the detail. The sales of tea at the India-houses; I dare say, involve more difficulty respecting accounts, than all the details of the land revenue of the ryotwar collectorates on the coast. Government have only to give their revenue servants good salaries, to turn out those who are idle or incapable, to support and encourage those who are clever and industrious; and men will easily be found to manage this formidable detail. Annual settlements, it is true, are very troublesome; but when each ryot has a fixed and light rent, there will be but little difficulty. The expense after all, is nearly the same in both cases. We must either keep revenue servants of our own, or must make an allowance to the mootahdar to keep them. In respect to the trouble, I own that every person has an interest in introducing the mootahdary system, because it saves every body a great deal of trouble. I consider that I need not have made this long journey, nor written this long paper, had not your Lordship suggested the possibility of making a permanent settlement, direct with the ryots; but I am sure, that with the generality of my brother civilians, the trouble will not be a reason for opposing any system.

It is supposed, by some considerate persons, that government ought not to collect its rent at once from the actual cultivators: that some one, should stand between the mighty sovereign and lowly cultivator; and they are therefore led to approve of some middle man, some go-between. In this peninsula, however, the ryots appear to have been always the tenants of government. Whether government collected its rents through the medium of the officers of different descriptions (but all classed under the term of zemindars) or hereditary officers of different descriptions (but all classed under the term of tanahdars, the ryots were still government tenants; and therefore the system, from being general, and from having produced general prosperity, seems to be well adapted to the country. In this peninsula, the ryot is both landholder and farmer; the poor ryot is labourer too: in some districts, general poverty, occasioned by bad government and exactions, have reduced the great body of ryots to this threefold condition. However, the division of property among all the sons in a family, will always perhaps keep the bulk of the ryots, either small farmers, or small proprietors. Any set of men introduced between them and the government, which receives their rent, must be a description of bailiffs, stewards, contractors, by whatever name they be called, or under whatever conditions, permanent or temporary, they may act. It signifies little, either to the government, or to the ryot, whether the rent is paid direct to a collector, or through a zemindar to a collector, so long as the proper rent, and to neither more or less, be paid. That mode of payment, which promises most security to government and to the ryot, is the best; but all middle men, farmers, contractors, and other intermediate agents, must get a profit, and generally a very great one, either openly or clandestinely; and the more of them there are, the greater sum must be divided among them. But in India particularly, they are hardly ever content with their legitimate profit; they will always keep a little of the money that passes through their hands. In the same way that the benefit of the permanent settlement must filter through many intermediate objects, before they reach the ryots; so must the public revenue pass through many channels, before it reaches the public treasury. The more channels, the more hands, through which it passes, the greater is the danger; the less the security of revenue. In the same way that they intercept the benefits of the remission; so may these intermediate farmers intercept the public revenue. The lands are no security for the public revenue, unless they are occupied by ryots, with industry and stock to cultivate them. There is land enough to afford ten times our present revenue perhaps; but ryots and stock are wanting, and the security of revenue must depend, on their prosperous condition. The mootahdar, I have observed, is seldom a ryot; if he is a ryot, has stock, and cultivates, he is neither more nor less a ryot; he has neither more nor less stock; he neither increases nor diminishes the stock of others, by his becoming a mootahdar: but, properly speaking, a mootahdar is a man to manage settlements and collections*; he is a revenue officer; he cannot, therefore, introduce more stock than there was before. The system appears to affect agriculture no further than, as a financial measure. It is not even imagined by any person, however inattentive to these matters, that the mootahdar, on purchasing a mootah, comes down, a team, a dozen labourers, and a thousand pounds, to improve his farm, like a great Norfolk farmer, to take possession of a large farm which he has rented. No; perhaps he may think his dignity, now that he has become a mootahdar, requires an equipage; if, therefore, he formerly walked a-foot, he may take possession in state, mounted on a pariah horse, set down in the choultry of the village, and settle the rents with the ryots, just in the same way, that the circar officers settled them before. Perhaps (for this is sometimes the case) he was a gomastah, or circar officer, before, on five or ten pagodas monthly monthly pay, and settled the rents and managed the collections of the mootah, before; and thus, being acquainted with its resources, had been induced to purchase it. Revenue cannot be secured, by the intermediate agency of such a man, as this. The land, it is said, offer no collateral security; he must go to jail if the mootah has been so impoverished during his management, that it will not sell for enough to pay his arrears to the circle. If he, by bad management, drives away the ryots, who will buy the ruined mootah? It is the stock on the mootah, that makes it so valuable. This stock belongs to the ryots, very seldom to the mootahdar. It is only when a great ryot becomes a mootahdar, that he has stock and land of his own; but, as it has been already observed, the law which keeps mootahs above 500 pagodas annual rent, prevents the ryots from taking mootahs, because so great a concern as a farm above 500 pagodas, is considered a revenue farm, a darbar concern, and attended with greater risk and management, than an individual ryot can incur. The greatest zemindar offers no better security than the rents of the zemindari, or private fortune, derived from those very rents, which will generally be out of reach. How are the arrears against the zemindars, who have not paid regularly, to be recovered, but from the zemindari lands? but lands were there before, and the ryots, who tender them valuable. Before, nobody but the ryot could fail; now, not only the ryot, but the mootahdar, may fail: the rent may stop between the ryot and the cash chest. If the mootahdar fails, it may be said that the security consists of the incorporeal property of 15 per cent. of the rent clogged with the service of collection, and the risque of the farm, and of the property in waste. This property has not been clearly defined, nor is as yet clearly understood; but whatever it may be, it is put up to auction, and sold for the recovery of arrears; but it would seem, that the remission ought, if possible, to go to the ryots, to be applied to the land in such a way, that each farm might, as nearly as possible, be gradually converted into a little estate. It ought to go in retail, to the ryots; not in wholesale, to the mootahdar. In such case, the land of each ryot would in time, become saleable, and the mootahdar's interest in the same lands, with the same remission. Under a mootah, as now constituted, two hundred little estates, the actual property of two hundred small proprietors, who enjoyed the solid property, the full rights, privileges, and powers, which constitute absolute property, even though it consisted only of 15 per cent. of the landlord's rent, would be more valuable than two hundred such plots of land, where the qualities of property are divided between government, the mootahdar, and the ryot, and where (say the adversaries of the system) government is forced, by an unnatural farming system, to impose arbitrary restrictions upon the transactions relating to land. Supposing the lands to be equally valuable, the full absolute property, in the one case, would render them more valuable than the divided property, in the other. But the great point is, to fix the ryot to his farm, to marry him, as it were, to a certain field; to give him such an interest in it, as to improve it to the utmost. The two hundred small proprietors would improve their land much more, it may be supposed, than the temporary farmers under the mootahdars, would improve theirs. The estates of the small proprietors would therefore be more valuable, and afford greater security to the revenue. It must, I should imagine, be always kept in view, that this peninsula is almost depopulated; that under our government a great increase of population may be expected in this mild climate, among a people with whom marriage is a religious duty; that, luckily for the government of the country, the great body of the people are husbandmen by profession, I may almost say, by instinct; men who consider agriculture their only business, the only thing they came into the world to perform.

These men, will always extend and improve the cultivation if properly encouraged; and therefore a great revenue may be expected from the waste lands, when the stock and population of the country has increased to such a degree, as to occupy them. Government, by keeping this waste in their own hands, may manage the market of lands, just as the Dutch are said to have done that of spices; by refusing waste, they will raise the value of occupied land; by giving it up, they will keep down the value of occupied land. They may manage this way, until the improvements which, it may be supposed, will take place under our government, have given certain lands an intrinsic value; for if the ryots once find that they are settled on certain fields by a light fixed rent, they will set about improvements; digging wells will be the chief improvement; wells on the high and dry parts of the country are the chief objects of husbandry; for they not only increase the usual rent, but in time of drought they, in a great degree, alleviate the distress of scarcity. At all events, and as times are very bad indeed, they avert the danger of famine. Suppose a ryot, who has a field, for which he now pays 40 pagodas annual rent, gets the perpetual lease of it, for 34 pagodas, he gets 15 per cent. of the landlord's rent. Supposing that he paid the full rent of which it is susceptible, in its present shape. He will next set about improving the land itself, where the situation allows of it; digging wells will be the most obvious way. When his wells are dug, he fears bad seasons but little; they must be bad indeed, to exhaust his wells. He will most likely raise produce enough to pay his land-tax to government, to feed himself and cattle; for though he raises less in a bad season, he gets a better price. It may be supposed that the mootahdar will do so, too; however, it will be found most likely, that neither he nor his tenants have so palpable an interest in improvement, as the small proprietor would have. The tenants would not, and though the mootahdar might feel as much anxiety for the general improvement of his mootah, as any small proprietor proprietor could do for that of his estate; yet he is but one man; he could not oversee every thing, do every thing, know or apply his judgment to every thing. He and his ryots might be quarrelling about the rent, while the independent proprietors, or rather the whole body of them, would be silently and seriously setting all their wits, their labour, and their stock, to the grand work of improvement; because each man would be tied down to a certain spot, in which he would possess and feel the full ownership. In short, to divide the qualities of property in the soil, between the government, the mootahdar, and the ryot, in the way proposed by this system, is treating mother earth like a Nair lady, and giving her half-a-dozen husbands to neglect her, while one good man would cherish her with affection.

However, notwithstanding all these objections, which may perhaps be justly urged against the mootahdar system, there is no doubt, but that it will produce improvement, by fixing the demand, and giving individuals a greater interest in the land, than they had before. The limitation of the demand of government is so great a blessing, that it compensates for the faults of the system: however, it would seem, that government might fix the demand direct, without the intermediate agency of mootahdars. The fixing the demand is independent of the farming principle of the system; and, therefore, does not prove it altogether a good system, any more than some very good institutions, prove the Mahomedan law an excellent system of jurisprudence.

Another advantage of the mootahdary system, is the cheapness of it. It might be necessary to allow the farmers a greater remission to constitute them small proprietors, than to enable the mootahdars to carry on their mootahs successfully: if we give 15 per cent. to the mootahdars, it may be necessary to give perhaps 20, or even more, to the bulk of the ryots, with the view of making them small proprietors, to pay regularly. It will therefore, be right to weigh well, whether or not the loss, which this difference will occasion, will be compensated by any equivalent advantages. The chief pecuniary advantage, which will arise from a ryotwar system, would be the increased revenue derivable from waste, as the stock and population increased in consequence of the light rent.

After the lands at present occupied, are completely cultivated, the ryots will turn their superfluous stock to the improvement of waste; perhaps for eight or ten years, their present lands may afford sufficient occupation for all the labour and stock of the country; but, after that period, it is likely that the public revenue will be rapidly augmented, by the occupation of waste. Revenue increased, from those genuine sources of stock and population, is more to be depended on, than that raised from the lottery-like resource of mootahs: but the revenue may in time be augmented from other sources, perhaps; and it seems politic to throw the burthen from the land, as much as possible. The 32 millions annually raised in England, would ruin the country if levied directly upon the land, or even that part which is indirectly paid by the land.

Our conduct in regard to the (I may take them at) six millions of persons, who are concerned in the decision of this question, will show our principles. There are perhaps six millions of persons engaged in agriculture, who will be affected by the settlement which is made with them. These persons must live by agriculture; their instinctive application to husbandry, I may say, is what supports the scheme of government. Without it, this country had long ago been reduced to a desert, by war, bad seasons, and bad government. These husbandmen pay our armies, support our costly establishments, provide our investments, and, under good management, could support a British army in Germany to fight the battles of the state. Shall we leave these men to struggle under a heavy, in some cases, a rack rent? Shall we transfer them with this burthen on their shoulders to the mootahdar, like so many cattle? Or shall we excite their industry, and increase their stock, by giving them a share of the rent, and look for a compensation, in an increased revenue derived from augmented stock, population, and industry? This may be said to be all theory, not to be put in practice; but it is practicable. The result will follow the cause, as certainly as any other moral effects result from their causes. It is a perfect syllogism—as light rent increases the comforts and stock of the farmer; comforts and stock increase population and cultivation; population and cultivation increase the public revenue: nobody will deny this: but there always seems some difficulty attending the practice. We have instituted courts of judicature at a great expense, to protect private rights; but where is there so great a cause to be settled as this—between government and the great mass of cultivators? It signifies either to government, or to the body of the people, whether Vinkoo or Mootoo, have their cause rightly decided; but it signifies very much, whether a light or a heavy rent is paid, whether a light and equal assessment is made, to the immediate benefit of the people and the ultimate benefit of government, or whether a high unequal rent is exacted by the necessities of the state,

A remission might be thrown away on the idle and extravagant; but it would benefit the generality. The idle and extravagant would not retain their lands, and most probably the land in which there was a property of 15 per cent. of landlord's rent, would ultimately fall into the hands of the industrious. It is said by some, that a high rent stimulates industry, and in the Ceded Districts where the rent, if not very high, is the full landlord's rent, the people are exceedingly industrious. The women especially are constantly at the spinning wheel; but I think that these industrious habits would not be weakened, by giving them a share of the rent.

state, or imposed by a careless, rigid, or a too cautious collector. The sources of prosperity are immediately affected, by the conduct of the collector; the effects of the court, are slow and circuitous. The one, like a copious blood-letting: the other, like the local application of a leech; that is, where too high an assessment, or an unjust decision occurs. The courts indeed, are perhaps at present, a source of trouble to the ryots; they are generally the debtors; the baidians, and townsmen, the creditors. The townsmen talk about and know about the courts, and bring forward their old bonds; but the ryot, who lives in a distant village, never thinks about justice, till he is served with a summons.

This operation of the courts, will, perhaps, in some degree, impede the collection of the revenue; and all I fear is, that the remission, if granted, may for some years, go to the creditors, rather than benefit the ryots. In the end, however, this will not much signify, because it will still increase the general agricultural stock, whether it be borrowed and employed, or employed and enjoyed by the ryots themselves. As the remission or rather share of the landlord's rent will stick to the land under all transfers, it will be valuable property, and will, in the end, fall into the hands of some industrious person.

Courts however, are not only beneficial, but actually necessary. However, I maintain, that a light rent in the present state of the country, is still more necessary; that government ought to try to lighten the burthen as much as possible; that 10 or 15, or even 20 per cent. is no object, in competition to the improvement of the country. We must adopt that system, which tends to promote general comfort and population, to raise the greatest produce from the earth. If we flatter ourselves that we in reality increase the resources, invigorate the agricultural stamina of the country, by creating a set of farmers to collect this heavy rent; that we thereby benefit in any great degree, the bulk of the people, inasmuch as we grant a remission to the mootahdars to ensure the payment of their rent, and compensate for their risque and trouble of collection; we are certainly deceived. It may be said, that things go on well, that the mootahdars pay, that the country improves; but under our honourable government, defended by our army; a country so fertile; a people so industrious, will thrive, in spite even of a bad system, just, as a stout child grows and becomes a sturdy youth, in the midst of rags and poverty. I do not mean to say the system is bad. I only mean to say, that in spite of its faults, the country will improve; because for many thousand years, it has been a rich populous country, whenever 30 or 40 years of peace allowed it to rise into its natural state. But if the country thrives, it is from other causes; not because the government, has farmed the land revenue. Our government is so strong, so just, so wise, in comparison to native governments, that almost under any system, the country will, in a certain degree, prosper. Under the harshest tyranny, the ryots seem never to have totally relinquished the labours of husbandry: they consider themselves born to plough, and they labour in this their vacation, until their strength fails. The people in the Ceded Districts continued to cultivate, though exposed not only to the most arbitrary exactions of their own government, but also of banditti. Men might be seen holding the plough with black stumps of fingers, burnt off by the officers of their own government. Shall we then take the same advantage of this instinct, which the petty tyrants, who have for 50 years usurped the government of the country, did? Shall we exact the same high rent, which they exacted, on their principles? For they always considered it enough, if the ryots had sufficient left them, just to live and keep up their stock; they exacted every dub besides. Their wants and uncertain existence, I may say, made them careless of future advantages. Shall we continue this system, or endeavour by economy, by management, by time, to better the condition and nurse the ryots, into small proprietors?

We have every reason to believe, that the great Hindoo and Mahomedan empires, under which agriculture was raised to so flourishing a state, were very moderate in their assessments.

On the decline of these great empires, the petty chiefs, who usurped the sovereign power, were forced by their wants to exact as much as they possibly could, without directly exhausting the means of cultivation; and consequently agriculture declined with the great states, under which it was protected.

Rack rents have contributed more to ruin the peninsula, than all the wars and tumults which have occurred. Many countries have continued in high culture, though exposed to constant wars; and others, have become desert, in the midst of peace. The open violence of armies has done less injury to the peninsula, perhaps, than the fines, fees, exactions and contributions, which have been imposed by the tyranny, or permitted by the weakness of the state. The great empires encouraged husbandry, by a light assessment; the petty tyrants who usurped authority on their decline have discouraged, in some places ruined it, by heavy exactions. The buildings, tanks, channels, even ridges, which separated former fields, the ruined villages, general tradition, books, accounts, and sumuds, and inscriptions; all combine to give us a high idea of the former cultivation, and opulence of this peninsula.

The great Hindoo princes did not, in fact, want a very great revenue: they had no extensive establishments to keep up: their simplicity of manners required but little. The soldiers were supported, by the grant of lands: the prince and nobility eat finer rice and more ghee than ploughmen. Religious ceremonies were, perhaps, the chief expense of the state; but a fifth, and even only a sixth, were the shares of the produce usually taken by the prince. The Ray Rekab of Canara was one-sixth. The people of the Ceded Districts paid more to the Byjuugger government; but those rajahs were only a kind of lord paramount poligars, engaged in perpetual wars with the Mahomedans, who at last overthrew their government. These

These wars, made it necessary to exact; and the plunders and massacres, which the Mahomedans exercised, perhaps made the body of the people willing to pay, a heavy rent, to keep out those fanatic invaders; but on the whole, I believe the land-rent was lighter, and certainly it was expended, in a manner more congenial and beneficial to the people, than our land-rent. It seems to have been this light rent, that enabled the countries to rise to such a pitch of improvement.

One advantage has been attributed to the mootahdarry system, in respect to government, that I must confess I do not see: that is, that the revenue will be fixed. It may look well in the accounts, to have the same certain sum always as the demand, and may save some trouble; however, I should imagine ours to be the first government in the world, that ever considered it a material object to collect the very same sum each year, if it does consider it so. The revenue of most countries, of England for instance, fluctuates according to the exigencies of the state. Deficiencies are made up by new taxes; surplus collections are accounted for: but among all the schemes for improving the revenue, I never heard of a statesman recommending any financial measure, merely because it promised to bring the very same sum in each year. On the contrary, they in general boast of a probable increase. At all events, the revenue is made to suit the exigency. If 30 millions are wanted, they are raised. They may, perhaps, farm or fix the amount of any particular tax, because it may be expedient to dispose of that one tax, in that way; but as they have many other means of raising supplies, that signifies little.

In India, the Land is the chief source of revenue; very little else goes to supply our Indian budget. In England, the land-tax is only 1-16th of the whole revenue; here it is 1-5th of the whole revenue. The bad policy, therefore, of shutting up our only great source of supply is manifest. Although it be highly expedient, nay, absolutely necessary, to limit the demand on private estates; yet for government to bind itself down to a certain sum for the whole country, appears impolitic. As far as I can comprehend the Permanent Settlement, as hitherto introduced, government can neither ascertain, whether their subjects can pay more revenue, nor can they, without breaking through their engagements, raise more land revenue. In the Northern circars, for instance, it will be impossible to tell, 10 years hence, whether the country can bear four or five lacs more, because government have transferred the cumums to the zemindars, and apparently seem to have pledged themselves not to country might easily bear it, because government seem to have pledged themselves not to levy more land revenue.*—The zemindars, at least, consider the subject in this way, and expect to engross the profits, the rent, which the natural increase of stock and population, under our mild government in those fine provinces, will produce. It would seem, that neither the state, nor the ryots, can share those advantages; the state and the ryots, those objects of attention to the indolent Hindoos and barbarous Tartars, who preceded us, and under whom India flourished, in such a way, as to astonish the world, and become proverbial for its industry, fertility, and population.

However urgent the necessities of the State may be, it would seem that we can raise no more in the shape of land revenue from the Circars. The indulgences granted then by the permanent settlement to the zemindars, must therefore be compensated for by burthens laid on the industrious subjects of the other provinces. This is a cause of inequality and hardship, and is one reason for the general extension of the Permanent Settlement. But and hardship, and is one reason for the general extension of the Permanent Settlement. But though the mootadary system is better perhaps than a high uncertain rent; yet it seems easy to fix the demand, without recurring to that system. In whatever way the country be settled, the qualities of property, the Ashta Bhog or eight attributes, privileges and powers which are necessary to constitute the full ownership in the land, must, as much as possible, be vested in the same person. Whether the estates be large or small, will depend on circumstances. If one great ryot undertook for a whole village, he ought to have it on all, unless others were injured, by being rendered dependant upon him; where two, three, all, unless others were injured, by being rendered dependant upon him; where two, three, or a dozen ryots, engaged for a village, they ought to have it; whenever good men offered to take land in perpetuity, they ought to have it; but there should be no restrictions, no rules calculated for official convenience, rather than for general improvement; no estates should be sold; no adventurers admitted. There seems no necessity for a hasty settlement; but the sooner the remission in those provinces, where the rent is heavy, be granted, the speedier will be the increase of stock, and the quicker will be the effects of the encouragements to industry, which the remission will produce.

WE ought to remit as much as possible, to the ryots of the Ceded Districts and other surveyed provinces; whether we consider the climate or the present assessment, rather than to the sub-alpine proprietors of Canara and Malabar. The Ryots of the Ceded Districts are a very industrious race, and are perhaps, the best men in the world, for the cultivation of the earth: they are husbandmen by cast. In Europe, if a man has four sons, two or three may become sailors, soldiers, or tradesmen: but here, they must all follow their hereditary profession of husbandry. They have continued to pay their landlord's rent, and have prospered as farmers, under the able management of collector Munro; but it requires a share of the rent to enable them to become small proprietors, and extend cultivation to the utmost.

* We must therefore have recourse to other means of raising the public revenue. From a late decision, however, it would seem, that government are precluded from utmost. A remission of 10 per cent. might perhaps not make up to them, the loss which they must feel when a collector is set over them*. It may be said, that the Ceded Districts have improved so much under the Company's government, that a remission of rent seems unnecessary; however, they might improve still more, under a management equally efficient, and under a land revenue, which should leave to the ryots, a share of the landlord's rent.

Respecting the future system to be adopted for the management of the Ceded Districts; I am heartily of opinion, that the introduction of the mootahdarry, would be prejudicial to the Ryots, and to the Company, for the reasons which have been so often stated. I think, that when the government can afford it, a remission ought to be granted to the ryots, to give them a share of the landlord's rent. A small remission would tend to make them thriving farmers; a greater remission, would tend to make them, proprietors. I think, that it must be the object of government, to nurse, them into thriving farmers, if the exigencies of the state will not allow it to constitute them proprietors: but this is not to be done, by farming the land-rent, and giving a remission to the mootahdars.

I HAVE written so long a paper on the subject; and collector Munro has discussed it in so ample and able a way, that it seems unnecessary, if not presumptuous in me, to say any thing more on the subject. I shall only observe, that the Permanent Settlement is meant to benefit the Government, and the Ryots; that in respect to the ryots, it is admitted, it is necessary to grant them a remission, to give them an increase of stock and spirit; if not to make them comfortable. Shall we then refuse it to them, and grant it to a set of Farmers, to be created on purpose to enjoy it? In respect to Government, it is admitted, that the revenue depends on the stock and spirit of the cultivators, under any system: Shall we then encrease their stock, and excite their spirit, by a direct remission, or shall we leave them to struggle with bad seasons, under their present high rent, and give the remission to a set of Farmers, to ensure them against losses, which our own, I may say, harsh and inpolitic conduct, towards the ryots, most probably occasion?

* I consider it unnecessary to argue on the advantages of a light rent, as it regards the country; because it appears as clear as any moral conclusion can, that industry, stock, and population, must be increased by a light rent.
