One of these grand divisions, stretching northerly 70 miles horizontal distance, to the forests of Nepal and Morung, at the foot of the lower range of the great Tibetan mountains, is separated from Goruckpoor in the soubah of Oude on the west, by the Gunguck, with a very indistinct line of connection to mark a crooked frontier of sixty miles between that river and the Dewah; and on the east, it is wholly bounded by the district of Purneah in Bengal, which properly, until the year 1732, extended on that side no farther than the river Cossa in its ancient channel, but has been since considerably enlarged in a parallel direction, by annexation of the pergunnahs of Derhempoor, &c. dismembered from the circar of Mongeer, dependent on Behar. The area thus described, being one uninterupted flat, hath always, from the period of complete establishment of the Mogul government under Akber, been subdivided into its present four greater civil divisions of circars; of which, Tirhoot, the most easterly, comprises in square dimensions about two-fifths, and Hajeepoor, Sarun, with Champaran or Beteak, each comprehending near one-fifth more, make up, inclusive of four dissevered pergunnahs of Mongeer, the remainder of the whole northern portion of territory; assessed in all, though containing one half of the arable lands of the soubah, at no more than a third of the entire annual income.

The other grand division, extending south of the Ganges 60 miles to that range of hills, called in sanscrit Bindea-chil, and which here separates the lower plains from the Balagaut, or elevated mountainous region, common to the interior of Hindostan, is divided from the circar of Chunar, in the soubah of Allahabad, on the west by the river Carumnassa; and from Bengal on the east, by a branch of the southern hills, which curving to the north, forms at its extremity near the banks of the Ganges, the boundary pass of Telliagurry, on the confines of the district of Rajemhal. The circar of Behar in the middle, occupies about one half of the whole level area of this great southerly division; the plains of that of Mongeer on the east, take up a sixth more, including in this share only, a fourth part of the dimensions of the district entire, with all its mountainous dependencies; and Rhotas, the southerly and western circar, being the seventh, lying chiefly between the rivers Sane and Carumnassa, anciently completed the number, with the flat extent of all the civil financial subdivisions of the soubah; but more recently, an eighth circar, called Shahabad, hath been formed of that half portion of the latter, comprehending the zemindary of Boujeepoor, and which, situated altogether between the two last-mentioned rivers, stretches northerly quite to the banks of the Ganges. Comparatively, however, this moiety of the assessed arable lands of the whole province, on account of the superiority of its soil and produce, particularly in the rich commercial article of opium, yields near two-thirds of the total annual revenue.

But in addition to both these grand divisions of productive territory, which excludes from the proper area of the three southerly circars, a straggling hilly country little worth, of 8,000 square miles; a third, and elevated adjoining region, still further to the south, forms a part of soubah Behar, no less extensive than either of the former two, as containing near 18,000 square miles, though proportionably of very inconsiderable value. This highland district, including the modern subdivisions of Palamow, Ramgur, and Chutea Nagpoor, bounded on the west by the soubah of Allahabad, on the south, Orissa, and on the east, Bengal, hath, since the age of Ptolemy, been geographically termed, the three Bellads or Cantons, in Arabic, and from which its modern denomination of Velayt, may be only a corruption, if not derived from another root of the same language, modified to express a foreign dependent government.

It is also, sometimes generally, described under the appellation of Kokerah, more commonly called Nagpoor, from the diamond mines of that place, as giving most importance to the whole country, making part of the same mountainous tract of land, barren in almost every thing, except the most precious jewels in the world; and extending in a devious southerly southerly course from Panna in Bundelcund, to Kanjeetah beyond the Kistna, in the Deccan, including the mines of Sumbhepoor and Golconda; yet perhaps this portion of unfruitful territory might still be more interestingly distinguished, by delineating the character of its inhabitants, who are undoubtedly an original savage race, differing extremely in appearance, religion, language and manners, from the Hindoo lowlanders of Hindostan, and whose possessions, altogether being poor, or thinly peopled, have scarcely ever yielded to the state or revenue, exceeding two lacks and a half of rupees.

Generally, the soubah of Behar derives its superiority over most of the other provinces of the Mogul empire, from the great natural advantages of a temperate climate; high and fertile soil, well watered, productive of the drier grain, and all the luxuries required by the more active, warlike inhabitants of the north; with a central situation, having easy communications internally, and serving as an emporium, or by means of the river Ganges, a thoroughfare to facilitate the commercial intercourse between Bengal, as well as foreign maritime countries, and the more interior provinces of Hindostan. These advantages, drew arts and manufactures from abroad; and after the Patna conquest, produced an increased population, in soldiers or emigrants, of that martial agricultural people, who were induced to become settlers, either from local allurements, or the political encouragement of government, in establishing a national feudal militia towards the eastern imperial frontier. The revolution in favour of the royal descendants of Timur, first brought about in 933 hejrah, or A.D. 1527, and finally effected on the accession of Akber in 963 of the former, or 1555 of the latter era, with the regular civil administration established then, and ever since continued in almost its original form, heightened greatly the prosperity of the soubah, under the crown of Delhi; while the independent state of numerous Mussulman jaggeerdars, joined to the refractory spirit of a hardy warlike race of Hindoo landholders and peasantry, differing greatly in bodily temperament, nourished by the heartier food of wheat and barley, from their effeminate neighbours of Bengal, living chiefly on the watery diet of rice, served in some measure, to preserve internal tranquillity, and resist the tyranny of lawless foudjarry usurpers, in time of recent public anarchy.

Accordingly agriculture, manufactures and commerce, have always highly flourished in this favoured province. Opium, which may be considered the peculiar produce and stable commodity of the country, might fairly be estimated to return in gross, under rules of a private or public monopoly of necessary existence every where in India, twenty lacks of rupees for about four thousand chests exported yearly; including a moderate charge of sovereign territorial rent, with full cost of labour, and profit on stock, amounting in value to one-half of the whole quantity produced. Salt Petre, manufactured chiefly in the circars of Hajeeepoor and Sarun, reckoned at two lacks of maunds, might moderately be calculated to yield to the labourer and sovereign, or favoured merchants, ten lacks of rupees. Cotton cloths for exportation on all sides, twenty additional lacks; while the ordinary productions of grain, sugar, indigo, oil, beetleleaf, &c. carried out for sale, returned at least fifteen lacks more, after deducting an equal sum for the annual imports of Bengal, salt being almost the only article required from abroad, for home consumption: thus leaving perhaps on the whole, a clear balance of trade to the south of fifty lacks of rupees, to answer a yearly drain of specie to the like amount, constituting the net tribute to be derived from a gross rental of near a million sterling per annum: besides a profit of ten lacks, accruing from the usual state monopolies of Opium with Salt Petre. And all this, after complete comfortable subsistence, on the most ample equitable scale of political economy in Asia, of a population probably of three millions of souls, exclusive of the civil and military establishments necessary for the internal administration of the province. It may further be observed, that if such were the affluent circumstances of the country under the despotism of the Moguls, its mercantile prosperity forming the basis of actual wealth and revenue, hath surely not diminished within the period of the freer, more lenient government of its present rulers, as might be sufficiently evinced by reference to the custom house accounts of Patna during the term elapsed, exhibiting comparatively a view of great increasing commerce.

But as the views and objects of interior Mussulman policy were almost entirely concentrated in a system of Finance, as the grand palladium of power and conquest; so it is alone to the operations in this great department of Eastern rule, that we direct our present attention, as chiefly influencing the more prosperous condition of the province in question. The general principles of the Mogul constitution, in establishing the nature and sources of revenue with the usual mode of management, have been already discussed in a Political Survey of the Northern Circars; and in like manner, as these were referred to and applied in the Comparative Analysis of the Finances of Bengal, to draw the important practical result in ascertaining the amount of legal necessary dues of the exchequer annually, so also in the present Disquisition, a similar reference and application may answer the same ends, to measure the proper standard rental of Behar, while a detail of actual yearly collections here, seems all that is now requisite to learn, by comparison, the progress of improvement or decline, as well under the influence of the regular Mogul institutions continued to the acquisition of the Dewanny in 1765, as during their perversion from that time forward to the year 1784, through the corruption or misrepresentations of native Hindostanny agents. One fundamental regulation alone, as especially applicable to the latter soubah, seems necessary to be brought to remembrance, for the more perfect understanding of its actual circumstances; that is, the original grand division into jagger and khalsa territory; according to which, at first generally about one-third of all the lands of each province was set apart, under the former denomination, denomination, and assigned for the maintenance of the great officers of state, with the whole feudal provincial establishments of empire; while the remainder only was assessed for rent payable immediately into the royal treasury, to answer the King's proper expenses, civil and military, as well as all the extraordinaries of war; at the same time, that both portions of country were subjected to the same financial rules, in prescribing the nature, form and amount of the yearly collections, ever to be made through the subordinate agency of zemindars, or farming landholders; but with the material difference, that in the one case the superintending management was assigned to jaggeerdars acting in their own immediate behalf, and in the other, vested in amildars appointed solely on account of the crown.

This distinction in personal superintendence, produced necessarily under despotism, very unequal effects in the increase of the public revenue; which became the more remarkable in Behar, as all the Khalsa lands were, in the end, by gradual alienation, and until the general resumption of Cossim Ali in 1760, converted into jaggeers. The holders of these, were individually interested in keeping up or extending the original standard of the crown-rent, on principles of the Mogul constitution, according to the advancement of agriculture and manufactures, whether real, by improvement, or fictitious, by the extraordinary influx of a specie consequent to the discoveries of America and passage round the Cape, which in a certain measure, affected even the interior of Hindostan; and they were also well enabled, for the most part from the smallness of their territorial possessions, with the advantage of a feudal militia, to attend minutely and effectually to their proper concerns. Whereas the superior officers employed in Khalsa division of the country, influenced by private interests totally dissimilar, became either negligent or corrupt, and were often bribed by inferior zemindarry agents, to remit or diminish the established dues of government; instead of increasing them, conformably to an incidental change of local circumstances; which as we have seen in Bengal, forced its rulers, while yet under formal dependence on the Mogul empire, to relieve the public exigencies by the destructive irregular mode of levying proportional abwabs on the changeable divisions of territory, included in the subordinate jurisdictions of zemindars.

Nevertheless, when these effects of different management in the controul of the finances were found to be considerable under an upright vigorous administration, a reform every where took place. The improved jaggeers on removal or death of the occupants, were resumed, and, with their additional rents (technically called towfeer or profitable increase) annexed to the royal exchequer; from whence new grants were made of the same pecuniary value on the Ausil toomary jumma, to replace so much taken from the assigned funds. Hence in process of time, by such repeated operations, more than any similar in the Khalsa department, whether by hustabood investigation, establishment of abwabs, or conquered annexations of territory, the revenue of the whole empire hath been prodigiously increased since the original settlement made by Toorel Mull in the reign of Akber; being in some provinces, more than double, but scarcely any where less than a half, in addition of that antiquated rent-roll; and hence, the more recent assessments consolidated with the standard, at distant periods of time, formed a new permanent jumma, under the same denomination of Ausil toomary, as in like manner founded, on precise ascertained knowledge of the ancient and actual resource of the country. Accordingly, in Bengal it hath been shewn, that four such universal reforms, inclusive of the original assessment,—the 1st in 1582, cessively taken place from the commencement of Mogul government;—the 2d in 1658, producing a total income of one crore and six lacks of rupees, estimated at a sixth more than the preceding rental of the Afghan princes;—the 3d in 1722, to the close of Shah Jehan's reign in the vice-royalty of Sultan Sujah, with near a fourth of the last settlement in addition;—the 4th in 1763, under the administration of Cossim Ali, productive of a revenue of upwards of two crores and a half, though fraudulently reduced two years afterwards on the Company's acquisition of the Dewanny, in the sum of about seventy lacks of rupees. But here it is to be observed, that the last comparatively great augmentation did not proceed quite so much from the resumption of jaggeers with their towfeer (an operation which had not taken place since the days of Akber in many of the districts) as the annexation or complete discovery of the kellyet or profitable increase of the Khalsa lands in a long series of years, throughout two or three large foudjarry jurisdictions, with the zemindarries of Beerhoom and Dinagepoor; all held previously, either by special favour or in a manner independent of the sovereign power.

In like manner, in the soubah of Behar, three such periodical improvements in the standard of assessment, appear to have been made since the Mogul conquest of the province under Akber, from the preceding Mussulman race of Afghan princes;—viz. the 1st and universal one, as common to the whole of proper Hindostan, north of the river Nerbudda, by Toorel Mull, in 1582, is supposed to have been productive of a sixth, in addition to the former jumma;—the 2d in the 27th year of the reign of Aurangzebe, under the administration of Aliverdi Khan and Amildarry of Jankiran, both of whom, had been long intimately acquainted with the state of the soubah, established a new permanent rent-roll called Ausil toomary, with an increase of one eighth on the preceding one, by progressive improvements, of the jagger lands; being then altogether, about ninety-five lacks of rupees annually, raised gradually from forty-two. Moreover, in addition to these three provincial reforms, a fourth a fourth might be stated to have taken place on the acquisition of the Dewanny in 1765, under the auspices of Mahomed Reza Khan, acting in behalf of the Company: But the improvement on this occasion, arose chiefly from annexation of the completely conquered district of Betteah, forming the greater part of the circar of Chumparan; and the other alterations were no more than a specification of the particulars of the former rental, adopted as a future standard; while the comparative virtue of the minister, in this instance, can merit no encomium, considering the large unconstitutional alienations made to himself and dependants, in jageer; and that he was employed only on a temporary mission, the profits of which were to cease, with the first annual settlement of the revenue; or to be participated, with a dangerous more intelligent rival in the person of Setabroy, an artful Hindoo mutseddy, appointed naib for the subsequent management of the finances, under a superior English administration.

The form and result, however, of all these changes, in producing each respectively an increased public income to the state, require separate exhibition, in the nature of a rent-roll, with proper illustrations, to enable a just comparison to be drawn of the propriety and extent of such improvements, as well as establish the ultimate legal standard of assessment on acquisition of the Dewanny, to which reference must always be made to determine the weight or case, equality or difference of succeeding exactions. Accordingly, we shall here present an Abstract of the Revenue of the soubah, in its regular and still existing larger subdivisions of circars, at the period of each reform, chronologically arranged, beginning with the original settlement of Toorel Mull, as set forth in the institutes of Akber.

First.—AUSIL JUMMA TOOMARY RUCKBAH, or the original Rent-roll, by measurement, of the Soubah of Behar, in its subdivisions of Circars, Pergunnahs and Villages (though the number of the latter be unspecified) as settled about the year 1582, in the reign of Akber, under the administration of Toorel Mull, for all the lands of the Province, supposed to be nearly equal in extent to their present estimated dimensions, by Rennel, of British square miles 51,973.

IT is however to be observed, that this Statement includes the whole real and estimated revenue of the Soubah, inclusive of all charges. But properly of the 200 pergunnahs, no more than 138, including all the measured lands, were assessed for rent to government in the sum of 17,26,81,774 dams, or sicca rupees 43,17,044, per annum; from which $\frac{1}{2}$ or twenty per cent. may fairly be deducted for Muscoorat, &c. Mofussil expenses, leaving only rupees 34,53,636 as the net income of the state, assigned in Jageer or received into the Khalsa Shereefa; perhaps originally in the proportion of one to two, whether, in extent of territory or money valuation, of the yearly produce of the soil, shared between the sovereign and peasantry, according to the rebus or division of $\frac{1}{4}$ to the former, and remainder to the latter. All the other unmeasured pergunnahs, in number 61 $\frac{1}{2}$, including the whole circar of Mongeer, with the hilly or jungle countries of the circars of Behar, Rhotes, and Terhoot, appear to have been altogether, or for the most part, unsubdued and probably unexplored, as held by independent or refractory zemindars, though valued by information and entered on the public records of the exchequer, at dams 4,92,37,630, or rupees 12,30,940, agreeable to the ambitious conquering policy of the Moguls; having always in prospect, the entire subversion of the lesser as well as the greater states of Hindostan. The Seyurghal or religious and charitable donations of Ayma, or subsistence of Medded, Mash, &c. to Mahomedans, amounting to rupees 55,803, seem however to make part of the latter estimated portion of the rental of the Soubah; but the memorandum of 11,415 cavalry, 4,40,350 infantry, with 100 boats furnished by the province, means no more than that such an establishment, might be maintained out of the whole of its territorial funds annually.

Second.—JUMMA TOOMARY of Soubah Behar, in 8 circars subdivided into 246 pergunnahs, according to the Dustooral Aumil of Shah Jehan, adopted by Alengger in the 27th year of his reign, answering to 1685, A.D. with only an increase of 2,21,24,138 dams, being in all 39,43,44,532 dams, which at the medium rate of conversion into rupees at that period, or 46 $\frac{1}{2}$ nearly, yielded a gross revenue of 85,15,683 rupees; and after deduction of Mofussil charges, with all the former unproductive though included territorial funds, left a net income to the sovereign, of rupees 55,97,413, of which 51,82,413 were then assigned in Jageer or charitable grants, and the remainder only stated at 4,15,000 reserved to the Khalsa Shereefa, as summarily set forth in the following Abstract.

The difference then, between the first and second permanent rent-roll, appears to be about thirty lacks of rupees increase on the latter, effected in the course of a century after the newly discovered treasure of America were thrown into the general circulation of all parts of the world; and more especially in Behar, by the financial operation of shifting or resumption of Jageers, when these were raised in rent to the standard of an extraordinary influx of specie, through the close interested management of individual temporary proprietors; but the improvement of effective income seems not to have exceeded twenty-one lacks, or nearly three-fifths in addition to the original amount realized. It is further to be observed, that the value of the dam or feloos of copper had greatly changed in the reign of Alengger, being then rated generally at forty-eight instead of forty to a rupee; though the weight having been at the same from 21 to 14 Masheh, diminished the comparative worth of silver at least 25 per cent. The variations however, which occur in the last statement of the revenue, and will be still more conspicuous in the next, in converting dams by valuation into rupees, were not influenced so much by the true rise or fall relatively of the quantity of metal in either coin, as by a fictitious mode, then introduced from the necessities of the state, in an arbitrary increase of the number of dams contained in jageer assignments, to swell the importance of the grant, or gratify the vanity of the possessor in estimating largely the reward of his services, while the real income of the lands in effective money regulated the proper course of exchange, and brought the assessment thus nominally varied in the different circars and pergunnahs of the Soubah, to one general standard of sicca rupees.

Third.—TOOMAR JUMMAH RUCKBAH of the Soubah of Behar, in eight circars, 236 pergunnahs, and 66 Sayer Mehals Jageer or Khalsa; containing altogether 31,940 villages, of which 7,904 were appropriated in Nancar Mulikanah to zemindars, &c. or religious and charitable donations, while the remaining number 24,036, with Ruckbah, measuring 27,53,156 beghas of 3,600 square ells each, or nearly an English acre, were alone assessed in rent to government, as permanently established in 1750, in the reign of Ahmed Shah, under the soubahdarry of Aliverdi and Neabut dewanny of Junki Ram; the whole at the Kamil, or greatest annual receipts, rated for 1,01,79,141 rupees; but on a medium of years, calculated only to yield ninety-five lacks, fifty-six thousand and ninety-eight sicca rupees gross Rental as follows; viz.

This amount, in round numbers ninety five and a half lacks of rupees, is the result of the ultimate reform in the finances of Behar, to ascertain an adequate fixed standard for the sovereign dues of annual rent, and therefore includes the utmost gross income that the province was, or may still be capable of yielding; from which (deducting as usual about twenty per cent. for mofussil charges of collection, such as muscoorat and sebundy, with mockhareje or dismembered pergunnahs if ever properly reduced, or to be more exact according to the settlement of the Fussillee Behar year 1771, the sum of 20,01,495) there remains 75,54,603, as the net bundobust jumma concluded with the zemindars and farmers. So that either in gross or clear revenue, an increase had taken place from the days of Akber, or in the space of a couple of centuries, more than equal the original assessment of Toorel Mull, actually realized; which (considering the inland situation of the soubah, precluded from the benefits of the direct maritime commerce in that period begun and carried on with Europe, or the policy of the Mahomedans in hoarding it for projects of ambition, all being alike detrimental to the accumulation of current specie) may be thought no inconsiderable acquisition of nominal wealth drawn chiefly from the mines of America, and at any rate, must have greatly influenced the value of the necessities of life, as well as the amount of public demands to answer the growing exigencies of government.

But besides these three reforms of the standard assessment, a fourth alteration may be said to have taken place in 1795, on acquisition of the Dewanny; and which, though in fact only exhibiting a view of the Modakhil and Mokhareje annexations or dismemberments of territory, from the period of the last reform, stating the remainder of the soubah at the valuation then fixed, yet seems necessary here to be set forth in the abstract, as serving for the foundation of the Company's first settlement of the revenues of Behar, afterwards to be given in the detail of zemindarry jurisdictions, to form a comparison of the amount of future bundobusts.

ON the particulars of the preceding Abstract, it is to be observed, that Pendach or Palamow, &c. 3 mehals with the velayt of Kokerah, or Nagpore and Ramgur, &c. together 18,553 British square miles, rated ausil 2,23,967 R^s, and excluded from the calculation of assessed territory, as being at that time dismembered, though afterwards re-annexed, make up with the dimensions of land stated, and the portion of hilly country 7,133 square miles, left out in the square measurement of Mongeer and Rhotas the superficial contents of the whole soubah, or 51,973 British square miles. The duty, or royal begah of the exchequer, in the statement of the Ruckbah, is estimated at three Bengal ryotty begahs in modern use; and though this may not be the exact proportion locally between the ancient and actual standard, yet perhaps it is sufficiently so to draw a comparison with the circumstances of the neighbouring province, in ascertaining a general rate of assessment from the toomary jumma, changes in the amount of alienations, assignments, or zemindarry charges, as distributed yearly in the bundobusty settlement, to be deducted from the total revenue of each circar respectively, and that, from a spirit of fraud or concealment of the actual collections, so much favoured in the usual forms of drawing out Hindostanny financial accounts, by taking either the whole, or only a part of the gross receipts, after subtracting more or less of customary deductions, the full proportion of the latter, latter, as applicable to either territorial subdivision, may not be truly stated for the year in question. Yet the totals of the soubah entire are accurately so, and altogether constitute an incumbrance on the original public income of about 30 per cent. annually; particularly it seems probable, that a considerable share of the Mokharije herein stated to the account of circar Behar, may more properly be assignable to those of Rhotas and Shahabad, where great reductions had been made from the inflated bundobust of Cossim Ali; but that on the other hand, the greater part of the jageers passed under the subdivisions of Tirhoot and Hajepoor should, in propriety, have been classed under the former head. It is further to be remarked, that from the net revenue of the soubah, thus ascertained to be in 1773, or from 25th September 1765 to the same day 1766, R^s 64,37,183, a deduction was made of 6,17,500 rupees, on account of the pergunnahs of Banghelpore, &c. held formerly in jageer, by Nujem ul Dowlah, as Nazim, and then stated to have been transferred to that portion of Bengal dependent on the dewanny of Moorshedabad, leaving a clear jumma to Behar only, of rupees 58,19,683, of which the sum of 36,10,259 (inclusive of 3,72,893, the former year's balance) stands accounted for as received or otherwise liquidated, to the end of Bysack, being nearly the proportion of revenue due for the Fussil Khereef, and to the 30th April 1766, at the close of the Company's annual annual books. But it does not appear, that credit has been any where given for the separated income of Bhaugelpoor, &c. either for the first or six succeeding years of Mahomed Reza Khan's management, or until 1773, when the district was formerly dismembered from Behar, and annexed, with its rental, to the dewanny lands of Bengal. In the Abstract Statement, therefore, of the gross and net revenue of the former province now to be exhibited, to shew the progressive decline of income here as well, as hath already been set forth, in treating on the finances of the latter soubah during the first cycle, or 19 years of the Company's administration, an allowance must be made throughout the whole period, for the defalcation of the rents of Baughelpoor.

COMPARATIVE STATEMENT of the Gross and net Actual Receipts of Rent, shewing the yearly Charges of Collection, &c. entered in the Company's Accounts, in the whole Revenue of Soubah Behar, exclusive of Baughelpoor, Ramgur, and Palamow, from the beginning of the Fussille 1173, corresponding with the 21st or 25th September 1765, to the same days 1191, or A.D. 1784, comprehending the first cycle of 19 years of English dewanny administration; extracted from the Records of Parliament to the year 1779, and thence continued from other authentic documents, to the ultimate date specified. But as in the former period, the accounts appear to have been made up annually to the 30th of April, and that in the latter they have been extended to the close of the Behar year; thus anticipating, in the form of annual Collections, the last five months Receipts from May to October, so to ascertain the progressive decline of Income, by fair and regular medium Estimates, excluding the first year's Settlement, and taking it as a standard, the amount stated to have been actually received in part, for the former Seven Months, or from 1st October 1765 to 30th April 1766, is to be struck out of the calculation, in like manner as the Income of the latter Five Months of the same Fussille year, carried forward throughout the cycle, should, in propriety, be deducted from the last year of the Nineteen; thus leaving Eighteen Years complete, to be divided into three equal portions of time; the medium RESULTS of which, in Amount of Revenue, may serve, with a few subjoined Remarks, to make the following COMPARISON of the FINANCES of the Soubah, for three succeeding periods of Six Years each, tolerably exact.

In the preceding Table of the Revenue of Behar, the progressive diminution of annual income, drawn from regular medium calculations throughout the cycle, will appear sufficiently evident on the slightest comparative glance, as making a difference or loss between the net actual receipts of the first and last years, of the whole period of 19, of more than 27 lacks of rupees, being near one half of the original reduced settlement of M. R. Khan in 1173, on the Company's acquisition of the Dewanny; but from the loose irregular mode of constructing the jumma waussil-baky account of the province, especially in the statement of incidental charges, which will always be found deficient as well in particulars as uniformity, it becomes necessary to add a few explanatory observations, where the variations are most remarkable. In the first year a very curious statement of the expense allowed for the collections stands recorded, N° 97, Appendix to the 3d Reports to Parliament in 1773; in the detail of which, the following articles are the heaviest and most of consideration; viz.

Answers or horsemen - - - - -	8,74,169
Barkendazes or matchlockmen - - - - -	1,98,799
Chubdars, khidmutgars, loontabardars, &c. menial servants - - - - -	2,36,648
Meer Mahmud Jeminal, &c. deputed to the presence of the Nabob of Bengal from Patna - - - - -	3,66,697
Serishteh-dewanny, or charges of the exchequer to Arkramut Dowlah defrayed from separate collections - - - - -	1,63,443

Amounting in all, with a variety of other lesser disbursements, to the enormous sum of rupees, sicca and sunat, 21,53,934, besides the expense paid by the Company of 4,32,555 S^aR, and which, with the net receipts brought to credit of the treasury, make up nearly the total of the first seven months collections, being sicca rupees 36,10,259; and thus constituting altogether, an incumbrance of fifty-eight lacks on a gross public revenue of ninety-five in the space of a year. It would indeed have been dangerous, admitting the reality of half such a charge, to withdraw suddenly the means of support from the multitude of troops and servants thus supposed to have been maintained, and therefore some colour of pretence might be given for the extravagance of the following years expenses, though reduced to 16,62,610, except in the dustore of Mahomed Reza Khan and Doola-bram, amounting to 1,71,000 rupees, and which neither precedent, right or custom, in any shape authorized; even the still diminished charges of the five subsequent years brought within the annual medium of seven lacks, exceed greatly the standard afterwards found sufficiently ample under the Company's proper administration, and would leave the doubt unresolved, what became of the large dismissed establishment of revenue servants, if any such had in fact existed. In the last year of the cycle, the article of expense again grows considerable; but a great portion of the amount, particularly in the charge attending the newly instituted committee of revenue, is to be placed to the account of the two preceding years, while the distribution of the whole, of whatever kind, as then defrayed from the accounted actual receipts of the exchequer throughout all the provinces respectively, is stated thus: for Bengal ceded and dewanny lands 59,68,348; for the soulah of Behar 9,50,745; and for Mid-napore in Orissa 2,10,000; making together the sum of 71,29,093 sicca rupees, as the total of financial expenditure paid out of the treasury, exclusive of the nabob's stipends, and allowances of the nazimut.

Some further elucidation may also be necessary to shew the propriety of deducting the amount of the last five months' collections from the aggregate of the third medium estimate of the annual income. On this subject, there are not perhaps sufficient materials on record to evince in what particular year this anticipation of the revenue had been introduced; though it seems incontrovertibly assignable to the ultimate period of six years, from which the deduction hath been made. For, 1st, The forms of all the accounts serving as the basis of those presented to parliament, are apparently taken from the general books, closed the thirtieth of April, and could not therefore have involved any such anticipated receipts. And, 2dly, In a Statement of the remissions and balances of five years settlement, ending in April 1777, as well as of the jumma waussil-baky Account, for the Bengal year 1183, or that of Behar one thousand one hundred and eighty-four; answering to 1776-7 English style, as drawn out by the accountant of the revenue department, in whose general abstracts the varied years collections entire of either province, have usually been included: yet in those accounts also the year is concluded in April, and a note inserted, that "the collections of Soubah Behar do not close till September next; therefore the better part of rupees one million seven hundred and twenty-two thousand six hundred and twenty-four," stated as the balance to be liquidated in course of five succeeding months, "must be expected." Now this is nearly the sum ascertained to have been realized for the same period of the first year's settlement, carried forward and deducted from the last, prolonged to September; but in 1777-8, the year immediately following and terminating the series of six, from which the second medium is taken, the gross annual receipts on the jumma, formally including the afore-mentioned balance, do not exceed three million four hundred and forty-seven thousand six hundred and ninety-three rupees, which can only be accounted for, by considering the balance as part of the third or last medium estimate, as set forth in the Table, the anticipation must inevitably fall on the third or last medium estimate, as set forth in the Table, perhaps by a gradual monthly encroachment on each succeeding year's collections.

Again; on comparison of the four medium totals intended to shew a declining annual rent, it may be perhaps objected to the first or standard Settlement, that though such might have been the net actual amount of the jummaundy, it doth not appear with certainty that the whole was ever realized. In truth, under the Mussulman administration in all parts of Indostan, great defalcations were always admitted of. These in part, were deductions made from the collections by the amildars for

for the maintenance of mootaineh, or scbundy corps, such as still exist in the soubah of Oude, and constituting the only proper military force of all the provinces, before the more recent introduction of standing armies in imitation or by virtue of European policy; but they were chiefly fictitious or unnecessary charges, stated by and passed annually in account with the favoured servants of government, which through the corrupt influence of ruling ministers, sanctified the abuse; or they were collusive remissions to the zemindars and farmers pretended to be expedient, and as such usually granted by a depraved or ignorant sovereign, in effect for the fraudulent emolument in participation of a whole chain of faithless revenue officers. Still generally, there is a sufficient reason to believe from the evidence of former accounts, and actual occurrences of modern states, that the total net demand on the country was some way or other, in the first instance received by the immediate agents of finance; though by them in great part embezzled, excepting a very inconsiderable balance regularly carried forward from the jumma wassil baky statement of one year, to be incorporated with and make up, the eventual deficiencies of the following. The constitution of the Mogul government, if it had otherwise offered an effectual remedy, which in no case would have been rejected, and in fact was often resorted to; zemindars, when largely and improvidently in arrears, were suspended or dismissed from their offices and territorial jurisdictions, the advantages of which were a temptation to others, either monied men, or of sufficient credit with bankers, to become temporary or permanent substitutes, by making themselves responsible for the payment of former balances with the entire current revenue in future, over and above the ordinary fine of investiture; when instead of mal zamin or managing rent securities, they were reinstated as principals, in all the rights and privileges of the dispossessed Indian landholders. Such indeed virtually, though under a different and locally uncom- balances. The eahitimam, or territorial charges of the defaulter, is sold in whole or part, and the purchase money applied to the discharge of his public debts. In Bengal, where the nature and value of the thing thus disposed of, are avowed to be matters wholly indefinite or unknown, as well to the sovereign proprietor as perhaps to the individual purchaser; and above all, where abwabs are levied by variable zemindary jurisdictions, and distributed internally throughout the pergunnahs by no fixed rule, or merely at the discretion of an ignorant farmer general, having a natural propensity to chicanery, and withhold the legal dues; so this latter mode of realizing the full demand on the country is highly irregular in itself, and ruinous in its consequences; but in Behar, where the system of proportional assessments on the aasil hath not been adopted, it is of less importance, and requires only an act of the British legislature, with a local knowledge very easily acquired, to remove every reasonable objection to it. At the same time, it is to be remembered, that no representative power or any other short of the highest sovereignty under forms of the royal seal and signature, could grant a single daum in remission of incurred balances of rent, due from the khalsa portion of territory.

Finally, the loss of about twenty-seven lacks in Behar, exclusive of Baghelpoor, &c. on the original yearly revenue of fifty-eight lacks, as in 1765 compared with the income of 1783, arising by gradual decline, mismanagement, or defalcation in course of the first cycle of the Company's dewanny administration, appears pretty accurately stated. Of this sum however, two lacks are to be fairly accounted for in the deduction of the amount of sayer or duties from the annual receipts of the soubah, and transfer of so much since 1773, under the general head of the Customs, to the rental of Bengal; four lacks more are found by Mr. Shore in 1783, to have been alienated, under the denomination of Aymah, in addition to all the grants of Jageer Altumgha or Mudded Mash, existing and recorded in 1773, at the valued rent of rupees 8,62,643, being somewhat less than the original sum thus appropriated in 1765, as might very reasonably be expected in so long a period of time, from the casual reversion to government of such of its own or native servants' gifts, as were bestowed merely in the nature of life-ten property. But Aymah is the popular general term for all charitable or religious donations made by the sovereign to Mahomedans in Hindostan, and technically in forms of Altumgha or Mudded Mash. It therefore follows inevitably, that all these additional alienations are totally surreptitious and invalid: for it will not be contended, that any power in this country, since the interference of parliament in 1773, was competent, without its and the previous sanction of the Company, so to dispose of the rent of a single begah of the territorial acquisitions of Britain; even the jageer conferred on Rajah Rajibullab the Roj Roj in 1777-8, though virtually in lieu of his stated salary, until then charged on the treasury of Bengal, must be deemed wholly irregular, and unauthorized. In all events, the remainder of the great defalcation in the revenues of Soubah Behar amounting to twenty-one lacks of rupees, until the time, the place, and occasion of admitting it, be specified in all the detail of the Ruckbah or measured land of villages, ought to be considered as entirely groundless or fraudulent, and alone the pernicious effect of that corrupt unsystematic mode of financial management, imposed on the present rulers of the country, as derived from their predecessors in dominion, though in fact recently contrived by Hindostanny craft, the better to conceal the enormous embezzlement of the most depraved, interested, native agency, under the necessary ignorance of new foreign superintendents.

SOUBAH ORISSA, CHUCKLAH MIDNAPORE.

THIS province, when first formerly conquered in 1592, from its native Hindoo princes of the race of Gajepetty, by Mausing the Mogul emperor, Akber's lieutenant in Bengal, to which dominion it was then annexed as a dependent government, extended from Tomooluck, on the bank of the great Ganges of Proper Hindostan, to Rajemundry on the lesser Ganges, or Gungagoadaveri of the Decan, in a maritime border round the north-west quarter of the bay of Bengal, 600 measured miles in length by about 40, on a medium in breadth stretching back to that chain of hills westward, which every where bounds the sea coast of Coromandel, almost in a parallel direction southerly, quite to the extremity of the peninsula at Cape Comorin. It contained the whole nation of Oria or Worians, formed as they still are, of a distinct race of Hindoos, differing in language and manners, with some peculiarities of religion, from the rest of Hindostan; and must have been a very flourishing country in agriculture, manufactures, and commerce, before the Mussulman conquest; as we learn from the accounts of ancient European travellers, fragments of national history, and a few remains of former comparative splendour, now indeed only discernible in the wretched edifices of rustic bridges; excepting the pagoda of Jaggernaut, which is still more famous for its antiquity, or as being the rendezvous of a great yearly pilgrimage, productive of a considerable revenue, than any magnificence in structure. But the most unequivocal proof of former prosperity and actual decline, will be drawn from the state of the finances, which, notwithstanding the great revolution in the relative value of money since the reign of Akber, continuing to this day at nearly the same original standard of and partaking of superior civil advantages except in the dismembered territories annexed to and purchased of superior civil advantages under the government of neighbouring soubahs; a fact only to be accounted for in the behalf of a prodigious depopulation and waste (if adopted by those who have not had ocular demonstration of the present ruin) of numberless towns, the neglect of the richest arable fields before in culture, and the misery of a scanty peasantry with so total a stagnation of foreign trade throughout the whole country, now more properly termed Cuttack, from its capital, subjected to the predatory tyrannical sway of the Marhattahs, that the famous port described in Czar Fredericke's travels, appears of fabulous existence, as no vestige of it is to be found, unless in the pirate state of Coojung, at one of the mouths of the Mahanuddin.

According to the Akbery, Ayen, Orissa, in its greatest original dimensions, when reckoned among the dependencies of Bengal in 1592, being divided into five circars, composed of 99 pergunnahs, was rated as follows, in the general Rent-roll of the Mogul empire; viz.

C I R C A R S.
1. JELASIR, comprising all the actual British possessions in the province lying North and East of the river Soubanuska, which were first subdivided into the four circars, Maljetteah, Gaulparah, Muscoory, and Jelasir, but afterwards, for the most part compounded, as at present, into the two chucklahs of Midnapore and Hejeelee, stood thus:
	Mehals	28	Gross rent 5,00,52,737	Daums 12,51,318
			1,86,87,770	4,67,194
2. Buderuck	both Circars now to the Marhattahs	7	9,14,32,730	converted into 22,85,818
3. Cuttack	now to the Northern Circars Soubah Hydrabad	21	55,60,000	rupees 1,39,000
4. Kalling		27	50,00,000	at 40 each 1,25,000
5. Rajemundry		16
Total - Mehals			99	Daums 17,07,33,237 - Rupees - 42,68,330

Which, united with the other 19 circars of Bengal, make up the whole extent and amount of that Soubah, as stated in the institutions of Akber, being in all 24 circars, Mehals 787, Daums 59,84,59,319, R^e 1,49,61,432; and hence it was, without examination into the particulars of the total jumma herein set forth, including Orissa, compared with that of Sujah Khan in exclusion of the latter, excepting a very small portion still annexed to the former province, that Mr. Francis might have been led into the notable error already mentioned, in asserting that the toomar of 1728 was rather less than that of Toorel Mull, established a century and a half before.

IT does not, however, appear from history, that the Mogul arms ever penetrated beyond the Chilka lake, in the neighbourhood of Ganjam, in those early days of their conquests; and therefore, as may fairly be concluded from the imperfect general estimate in the preceding account of the circars of Kalling or Cicacole and Rajemundry, there is reason to believe that neither of these districts were subdued, or properly valued, though enregistered in the imperial rent-roll. But if otherwise, they were certainly both soon afterwards lopped off, and re-annexed, as they have continued since to be, in form to the dominion of Hydrabad;—and the remaining portion of Orissa, in the reign of Shah Jehan, between 1627 and 1658, if not before, was itself altogether dismembered from Bengal, and erected into a separate soubah, after being more fully explored or rated, as well as newly modelled, according to the following arrangement, in its territorial subdivisions of the three ancient circars into twelve, besides that of the sayer, comprehending the maint belonging to the capital.

The whole province of Orissa, as thus ultimately formed, and now more properly described in its twelve circar divisions, composed of 275 pergunnahs, included an area probably of 15,000 square miles, besides a mountainous unproductive region on the Western frontier, making part of the wilds of Tharcund or Jungly country, towards the velayt of Behar, and the districts of Ruttenpoor, with Sombhulpoor, formerly annexed to the soubah of Allahabad, but latterly considered dependencies on the Marhattah dominion of Nagpoor in Berar, yielding altogether an ascertained standard revenue of Rupees

But from these dimensions and rental in the aumily or fusilee year 1112, corres- ponding with 1706-7 of the christian era, a dismemberment had taken place, for the enlargement of Bengal, by annexation of 40 whole and kissmut per- gunnahs, constituting the districts of Hedjeelee, Tomooluck, Mhesadul, Bugree, Soohent, &c. rated - - - Ausil	-	-	-	4,15,724

Again:

Again: In 1751-2, Alevardi Khan, subahdarry usurper of Bengal, Behar and Orissa, after having, as already related, concluded a peace with the Marhattahs, on agreeing to the shameful condition of paying a chout, &c. of twelve lacks of R^a on account of the three provinces; where and on which pretence, having levied a much more considerable abwab or proportional assessment on the ausil jumma of the crown lands, he yet more prejudicially to the imperial right of dominion, then ostensibly defended by himself collusively connived at a further dismemberment of the latter soubah in favour of his recent enemy Ragoojee, ruler of Nagpoor, in future compensation for the stipulated tribute. This was in fact dissevering the body from the head; as the portion of territory ceded, made by far the greater part of the whole in dimensions, or political importance, including an area of 8,000 square miles, and an extent of 200 miles sea coast from Pipley on the Soobenurecha to Maloud on the frontiers of Ganjam, with an old standard revenue of rupees 25,73,588. Such, however, has been the ruinous effect of a barbarous predatory system of policy under the administration of the Marhattahs, that in the aumily year 1176, or A. D. 1768-9, this fixed original income was reduced to an annual jumma of - - - Sicca Rupees 21,20,415

Though to this statement of the rental of Cuttack, may be added the further sum of three lacks of rupees acquired in 1783, by the total extirpation of Birkissendeo, representative of the royal family of Orissa, and consequent reduction of the poor remains of his inheritance in the dependencies of Khurdah.

So that what remained, after the two before mentioned dismemberments, to the nominal sovereign of the whole province, (ceded partially, with the districts of Burdwan, &c. in the first instance by the nazim of Bengal to the Company in 1760, and confirmed to them as a free perpetual gift under an universal grant of the soubah entire, in terms of the royal firman of 1765,) was altogether comprehended in, and henceforth denominated

The CHUCKLAH of MIDNAPORE,

Bounded on the east and north by the districts of Hejeelee, Burdwan, Bishenpore, and Pacheat, in Bengal; on the south and west partly by the sea of Balasore, but chiefly by the river Soobenucka, which empties itself there near Pepley; and from the western hills separates the whole chucklah in those quarters, from the zemindary of Mohurbunje, dependent entirely on Cuttack, except for an inconsiderable tribute to the Company on account of two or three pergunnahs beyond the described limits. It contains 6,102 B. square miles, in all its dimensions of jungly or cultivated plains, in 56 pergunnahs, composing the remainder of the four subdivided circars of Jelasir, from which the salt districts of Hedjeelee, &c. had already been dissevered; according to the following extract of the jumma toomary of the Soubah:

The Aumily Velayty or Fussillee year of Orissa, as well as of Behar, should begin at the autumnal equinox, now happening on the 25th of September, but the year of account closed the 30th of April, being adopted in all the published statements to be recurred to, for drawing out a comparative view of the gross and net collections of Midnapore, in a cycle of 19 years of the Company's administration; so, in conformity to the general plan hitherto followed, we shall take that period from the 1st of May 1765, to the same day 1784; stating only the medium result for every six years, in exclusion of the first jumma of which is to be considered the original standard of the annual settlement concluded with the zemindary.

From

From the foregoing Statement, it might be supposed that the portion of Orissa now in question, under British rule, have fallen so much short of the standard revenue of 1707, hath been, in common with the Marhattah division, greatly on the decline; but this is far from being the case; as the case of either country is, in fact, a contrast to the other; that of the former, being in the most part apparently well inhabited, in tolerable cultivation, and its manufactures rather in a flourishing state; while the latter, is undoubtedly under circumstances altogether the reverse. The justness, however, of the remark, in terms so general, will always be considered to depend on the degree of credit given to the judgment, accuracy, or fidelity of the observer; and should never be admitted, when any more specific proof is offered, in a detail liable to immediate detection, if erroneous. The Aumeny investigations of 1777/8, carried on throughout the Mofussil entirely by natives, though bringing to light many useful particulars, are allowed to be generally so loose, irregular, imperfect, and incorrect in the execution, that no reliance is to be placed on them. Nevertheless, in the Chucklah of Midnapore, where the Canongoes were somewhat independent of the naib dewan and virtual canongoe of Bengal, under whose auspices the inquiry was conducted, an exception may be made, if the genuine original accounts procured have been faithfully submitted for translation into English. Such as were actually rendered officially, in any detail or language, for this purpose, to the gentlemen superintendents whose integrity and ability are universally acknowledged, have never come within my own observation; but a Persian copy of what is termed the Hustabood Jumma, as then ascertained, of the districts in question, hath fallen accidentally into my hands; and having been found among the papers of a native musuddy or mohirer deceased, on the spot, who had either been employed as deputy in behalf of the principal aumeen, or at least must be supposed to have had an opportunity of inspecting the abstract results of local inquiry; so, at the same time that I rely implicitly on its authenticity myself, I hope to be confirmed in the conjecture of its proving a counterpart of the informations given to the Company's servants appointed to collate and arrange them, as well as an exception to the general risk of condemnation of the whole communicated, in point of accuracy and practical utility. It is therefore that I present the following particulars stated of the actual territorial divisions in Pergah and fort dependences, with their full old or recent assessments, as levied by the zemindarry officers of government, to be altogether accounted for, though only partially done in forms of the annual Jumma bundy, stating the malgoozary or net rental agreed for with the exchequer.

HUSTABOOD, or ancient and actual sources of the Public Revenue of the Chucklah of Midnapore, in Orissa, for the aunily year 1181, as digested originally in Persian, and supposed accordingly to have been rendered by the native aumeens appointed by government in 1184, or A.D. 1777/8, to carry on a local investigation throughout many of the districts of Bengal, &c. Now translated and to be arranged for the sake of comparison of circars, instead of the two-fold divisions, in the original under the heads of Midnapore and Jelasir; the whole rental in Illahy Rupees to be converted into Siccas.

Of Midnapore in Illahy Rupees of ten masheh, being about 6 per cent. worse than Siccas or the current coin of Bengal.

IN the preceding Statement, the Malgoozary or net revenue of government, including the yearly stipulated rent in the ordinary specie of the district, with serf or additional demand to make up the deficiency of these in comparison with siccas, comes so near the musil toomary jumma, of the same territory in 1707, that the total of the one, would seem to have been formed on purpose to correspond with the standard, of the other; though it be certain the assessed lands of the circar of Gualparah have been considerably enlarged and improved, at least in proportion to their distance from the frontier, since the era of British administration. The keyfet on the other hand, is undoubtedly the clandestine profits of the zemindars, levied from the ryots in the nature of abwabs as in Bengal, or surplus rent beyond the original assessment as in Behar, to answer the real or pretended exigencies of the state, in consequence of that extraordinary influx of the signs of wealth from the American mines, which every where destroyed the proportional basis of the first toomary settlement, and being so raised in right of the sovereign, but fraudulently concealed or withheld from the exchequer, have become the great fund of corruption in the hands of the farming landholders, in procuring annual remissions, abatements, allowances, favourable leases, and unconstitutional privileges, by collusive participation of their gain with native individual superintendents, faithless to their public trust.

From the total revenue however of the chucklah of Midnapore, thus ascertained to have been in 1774-5, 11,445,915, supposing it to be the gross rental of the whole territory, ought to be deducted about one-fifth of the musil, for all musfussil charges of collection; but this supposition would be so far from the truth, that the same adneeny investigation which led to a knowledge of what is called the hustabood jumma, forming the aggregate now stated, brought to light here, as well as in the several districts of Bengal, subjected to the same researches, not only large extraneous territorial funds, set apart for defraying such financial expenses, under the denomination of zemeen chackeran, or servants lands, but also still greater, unconstitutional alienations, termed bazee zemeen, including Birmoohter, Deowalter, &c. made or pretended to have been made by zemindars to Bramins for charitable or religious purposes, though in fact, in prejudice of the sovereign's undoubted prerogative and proprietary right, in the fruits with other uses of the soil. Which illegal unauthorized appropriations, though probably begun secretly, in the period of mussulman administration, under the loose indefinite mode of imposing additional assessments in the nature of abwabs, were very inconsiderable, before the acquisition of the Dewanny; when the demands of government kept nearly pace with all the discovered resources of the country, inclusive of the fraudulent emoluments of foudjarry or zemindarry officers; but certainly could only have taken root or be extended to the inconvenient length since acknowledged of absorbing perhaps a third of the malgoozary funds from the original fraud, in reduction of the stipulated dues of the exchequer, or through the continued misrepresentations, corruption, infidelity, abuse of native agents employed in the collections from that time forward, and in no shape or degree would daringly have been avowed under any other administration than the British, of experienced lenity, tender of the civil rights of the subject yet unascertained, or generally, though erroneously measuring them by the standard of English jurisprudence, and presumed to continue still under circumstances of the like ignorance or negligence, which favoured the early deception of Hindostanny craft, on the unsuspecting helpless credulity of new, otherwise necessarily uninformed rulers.

On these grounds, and on principles of the laws and constitution of India, wisely referred to in the late Act of Parliament, as the code of future justice in the most important matters of finance, the zemeen chackeran stated at 1,45,591 beghas, of which 87,661 had been taxed at the rate of about half a rupee each begha, may be supposed an ample compensation for the services of all the sebundy or village peons of the chucklah, numbered at 8,975 persons; considering that these men, however useful they might be to us, and are always found to be under every native government, are at present scarcely known to the Company, wholly neglected, or suffered alone to swell the pageant retinue of the farming landholders. While Baze Zemeen appropriations to the extent of 2,01,863 beghas more, being altogether fraudulent or unauthorized, except inasmuch as may be contained therein, of muscar, muscarat to zemindars, &c. or aymah muddled-mash to individuals of the mussulman faith, will give even a considerable surplus beyond the annual musfussil charges of 20 per cent. calculated on the musil jumma of the whole district. So that in round numbers, nineteen lacks gross but the net yearly revenue, actually collected from the country, and as such, being the lawful property of the sovereign, highly proper to be realized without any deductions to the public exchequer.

Finally, from a consideration of all the circumstances relative to the present state of the soubah of Orissa at large, a grand political question will suggest itself, only to be solved with full intelligence by such a comparative view as hath been here exhibited, supposing it tolerably just; and that is, how far it might be expedient in policy, now, or at any future period, without a violation of the public tranquillity, or acting only in self defence (peace being otherwise broken) for the perpetual dewanny government of the three provinces of Bengal, &c. so constituted by the only still acknowledged power in form of legitimate authority throughout the imperial dominions of Hindostan, to possess itself of that portion of Orissa included in the Firman of 1765, so unjustly acquired thirteen years before, and since so barbarously managed by its present occupants the Marhattas? But in glancing at the several arguments to be used in favour of the measure, as drawn from, or applicable to the particulars of the situation, state and finances of the soubah herein set forth, I hope it will not be imagined that I presume to decide on a question so much above me, or eventually of such great national concern. First, the easy contingency of possession presupposed, by negotiation or necessary defensive operations, tions, the formal right of dominion already acquired, sanctifies in natural reason, honour and justice, such an extension of territorial sway.—Secondly, it might be urged on principles of humanity or general prosperity, to a very inoffensive race of people now groaning in misery under the tyrannical yoke of their barbarous countrymen, as well as powerfully supported, on a comparative view of the actual state of the two districts of Cuttack and Midnapore, with the financial progress of the latter in improvement, while the former hath been and continues rapidly on the decline.—Thirdly, policy seems still more strongly to vindicate, on the first convenient opportunity, the realization of the Company's dewanny claim to the whole of Orissa, in terms of the original royal grant. Continuity of the districts of Bengal with those of the Northern circars, dependent on the government of Madras, together with the accession of intermediate territory, valuable in itself from its improvable revenue and the accessions of intermediate territory, precluding the intrusion of foreign settlers, who might intrigue successfully a war in the counsels of untutored natives, are the principal considerations of political importance usually insisted on. But that which apparently merits most attention has scarcely ever been mentioned, or brought plainly forward to the public view; it is, that in the proposed extension of the British territories by the annexation of Cuttack, these would be made more compact from continuity, and the frontier line of defence on this side towards the interior of Hindostan be positively contracted, at least in the proportion of ninety-nine for every hundred miles of actual boundary. This will appear paradoxical to those who have not a local knowledge of the country; but to such as have or will admit of there being only a few narrow difficult passes of entrance from Berar through uninhabited or savage wilds, mountainous, woody, and unwholesome, in a march of 200 miles in length, while an exposed frontier of greater extent in breadth opens immediately to an enemy, once admitted, into the district in question, meditating the invasion of Bengal, no proposition of Euclid can be more easily demonstrated. Experience too well justify the observation in the fullest extent; for in the very instant that the only speculative argument ever used against the acquisition, was playing off with intent to prove the pacific influence on the Nagpore government, of a dread from the easy conquest of a weak detached member, wholly within the British grasp; its ruler Moodajee Boshah, in 1780, introduced into Cuttack a body of undisciplined troops, in the specious pretext of real friendship under a cloak of enmity, which he pleaded necessity for assuming; but in effect, to extort from the Company, as the price of forbearance in an intended hostile incursion into their provinces, a sum of money exceeding two years' chout, according to that original stipulation of Afiverdi, afterwards cancelled by the virtual cession to the Marhattas of the latter part of the soubah of Orissa; unless from the amount thus compulsively paid, is to be deducted a portion of twelve lacks taken as loan, and which at some future period, may, in justice and policy, be demanded back with interest, or an indemnification sought for, in the seizure of a very important adjacent territory.

SOUBAH ALLAHABAD, ZEMINDARRY BENARES.

THIS province, in its greatest dimensions, in the reign of Alemgeer, in the meridian of 83 degrees east long. from Greenwich, stretched about 400 miles, latitudinal extent, from the northern frontiers of the circar of Townpoor, towards the soubah of Oude, N. lat. 26½ deg. in a direct line southerly across the Ganges, and beyond the sources of the Nerbuddah Soane, &c. to the fork of the Tabe and Mahanuddy rivers at Sonipoor in 20½ degrees; bounded by Behar with a small part of Orissa on the east; the districts of Dioghur and Chandah in the province of Berar, forming part of the Marhattah dominions dependent on Nagpoor, to the south; the soubahs of Malwa and Agra, to the west; with that of Oude singly, on the north; and comprehending altogether an area of perhaps 60,000 B. square miles; of which one half plain or productive country on either side of the Ganges and Jumna, composed from the twelve circars, and 292 perg' contained in the whole province; eleven of the former, or 177 of the latter financial divisions of territory, yielding a standard revenue of 1,00,46,134 rupees; while the other half to the south, on the borders of the Decan, mountainous, woody or barren, included in the circar of Bhattah or Baradhoo produced no more than 6,29,208 rupees, original rental. To be better understood, however, in describing the lesser portion of the soubah now appertaining in full of 115 perg', produced no more than 6,29,208 rupees, original rental. To be better understood, however, in describing the lesser portion of the soubah now appertaining in full of sovereignty to Britain, under the head of the Zemindarry of Benares, it seems necessary to take a more specific, though still a very succinct view of the province at large; show the progress of its improvement and enlargement, by comparative statements of the crown-rent with assessed lands at different periods, from the first settlement of Akber to the last of Mahomed Shah, towards the middle of the present century; and trace the several dismembrments effected since, to their actual modern state, as separate principalities, or in the nature of dependencies on the governments of Bengal and Oude, under the constitutional forms of the Mogul empire.

Soubah Allahabad
Zemindary Benares.

First.—AUSIL TOOMARY JUMMA of Toorel Mull, about the year 1582, in the reign of Akber, for the whole Soubah of Allahabad, as then composed of 10 Circars, containing one hundred and seventy seven Pergunnahs, measured by Ruckbah; of probable extent 35,000 B. sq miles; and regularly assessed according to the Rebba or Butai, as follows:

CIRCARS.		Number of Pergunnahs.	Ruckbah measurement in Beghas of 3,000 sq. ells.	Jumma Toomary, in Daums of 40 to each Rupee.	Gross standard Revenue, in Sica Rupees.
Now in 1784. Independent - to Oude. to Bengal.	1. Allahabad	11	5,73,611	2,28,38,604	5,70,965

	10. Bund-gohrah	39	9,018	72,62,780	1,81,569
Total - - 10 Circars - -		177	39,68,018	21,24,27,119	53,10,358

Of the number of pergunnahs above stated, it is to be observed, that 131 only, were properly explored; and contained the whole Ruckbah measurement assessed for daums 20,29,71,024; the remaining 46, being rated by estimate in money at 94,56,095; but in the aggregate of these sums was included syearghal or mudded-mash alienations, to the amount of daums 1,11,65,417. The total revenue was calculated to maintain 11,375 cavalry, 2,37,870 infantry, 323 elephants, and to furnish 12 lacks paun or beetle. Besides which, it is found that one thousand chests of opium, and a lack of maunds of saltpetre, together valued in the gross at ten lack of rupees, might have been provided under the rule of state monopolies, chiefly in the circars of Ghazipoor, Allahabad, and Korah. The diamond mines of Pannah, in the circar of Kalingar or Bundelcund, may moderately be estimated to have brought into the country eight lacks of rupees additional; while the cotton, sugar, indigo and cloths, now manufactured mostly in Benares for exportation, would probably have returned 20 lacks more; making in all, rupees 38 lacks, annual balance of trade.

Second.—JUMMA TOOMARY of the Soubah of Allahabad, in the 27th year of Alemgeer, or 1685, A.D. as then divided into 12 Circars, containing 265 Pergunnahs; in an extent of about 60,000 B. square miles, annexed to 24,069 Villages, of which 3,192 were appropriated as Jageer or Aymah alienations.

Of this Revenue, only 3,17,45,262 Daums, or 7,11,693 Rs were then reserved to the Khalsa sherefa; the rest, being entirely appropriated in jageer, or otherwise. The Circar of Terhar, on the southern border border of the Jumna near its confluence with the Ganges at Allahabad, had been formed of dis-membered districts from the other adjoining divisions; but that of Bhattah or Baundhoo, south of Kalingar, was considered a new conquest, though long before partially subjected, and being sub-divided into six lesser Circars of Bhattah, Sohajipoor, Chattergur or Rutenpoor, Sumbhilpoor, Gungpoor and Jushpoor, composing anciently part of the Goondwamrah Raj of Gurrah, and con-taining about 25,000 B. square miles, of high mountainous unproductive territory; excepting, how-ever, the diamond mines of Sumbhilpoor, was henceforth thus formally annexed to the Soubah of Allahabad.

Third.—JUMMA TOOMARY of the Soubah Allahabad, as rated A. D. 1747, at the death of the Mogul Emperor Mahomed Shah, in 12 Circars of the same dimensions, 60,000 square miles, as stated in the preceding rent-roll, but now subdivided into 292 Pergunnahs, Mehal and Sayer, as follows:

Of this revenue, 15,90,299 rupees were reserved for the Khalsa sherefa; 2,33,756 Rs appropriated to the special expense of the Emperor; 3,43,233 rupees of rent, with its territory, had been taken from the Circar of Kalingar by the Marhattahs; and the remainder, was altogether assigned in jageer, for the maintenance of the imperial troops and great officers of state. The rate of exchange, in the conversion of daums into rupees, continued in reality as ultimately established by Alemgeer, at 48 of the former, for each of the latter; but there was always some variation on account of deductions, and the fictitious mode of valuing jageers. The Dustery Begah is reduced to ryotty of Bengal for the sake of comparison as before, by threefold multiplication.

It was at the preceding ultimate valuation, that the whole soubah, soon after the death of Mahomed Shah, was virtually dismembered from the empire, and subdivided internally into the five following states, independent of each other, though for the most part held as dependencies on larger neighbouring governments; viz.

1st. CHATEESGUR or Thirty-six forts of Rutenpoor, &c. intervening between Nagpoor-Berar, on the one side, and the districts of Cuttack, with soubah Behar, on the other, included the whole Circar of Bhattah, excepting Sohajipoor, and contained at least 20,000 B. square miles, of a mountainous tract or unprofitable jungles; from the predominancy of which, the whole country acquired the name of Jharcund, being altogether rated for a crown rent scarcely of five lacks of rupees, exclusive of the diamond mines of Sumbhilpoor, when Ragojee Bhosla, in 1752, became the proprietor, succeeded by his younger son Bembajee, the present occupant, in this portion of conquered dominion, still formerly dependent on the greater Marhattah state of Nagpoor.

2d. BUNDELKUND; formed of the whole Circar of Ahmedabad Gorah, with three-fourths of that of Kalingar, stretching north to the southern banks of the Jumna, over an extent of 11,000 B. square miles, in great part a productive plain, rateably assessed for 11,17,974 rupees, without reckoning the choutai, chauntai, or fourth proprietary share of the diamond mines of Pannah, became the property of Hindostani, a descendant of one of the ancient rajahs of the country, under the recent distractions of the Mogul empire; and after great improvement of the revenue, was left a disputed inheritance among three of his sons, who, having called in the assistance of the Marhattas of Poonah, in effect to settle a triple participation, have since become tributary for the whole, to their auxiliary arbitrators.

3d. REWAH; composed of a fourth of the Circar of Kalingar, with Sohajepoor, dismembered from Bhattab, including in all about 9,000 B. square miles, and yielding a toomary jumma of 4,18,207 R^s, fell to Adjed Sing, the actual independent possessor.

4th. Circars of ALLAHABAD, KORAH, CURRAH, TERHAR and MANICKPOOR, with half of Townpoor, dependent on Arungur, in extent about 18,000 B. square miles, of a fertile plain, watered by the Ganges and Jumna; (after deducting the rental of the pergunnahs Bhuddovee and Cantect, annexed to Benares,) yielded Ausil Jumma 60,04,115 rupees: when in 1752 the Vizier Seefdar Jung threw off his allegiance to the empire, and seized, in his own right, on the two provinces of Allahabad and Oude, which he before held as soubahdar, in behalf of the Emperor Ahmed Shah. The Circars of Korah and Currah were however the following year retaken, and conferred on the Marhattas, as a reward for their services in punishing the rebellion of the Vizier, and continued in their possession to the decline of their power in Hindostan, after the battle of Paniput, in 1762, when they were bestowed on Sadullah Khan, son of Ali Mahomed, the famous founder of the Rohilla state; and by him again, for considerations of support in a recently assumed independence of the crown of Delhi, restored to the dominions of Oude, &c. which had devolved to Sujah ul Dowlah, son and successor of Seefdar Jung. But in 1764 both Circars, with those of Allahabad and Terhar or Arey, having been conquered by the British arms, were, on the restoration of the newly acquired districts of Benares, settled on the king for the support to his household, under implied conditions of local residence; which, being infringed by his majesty's removal to Delhi, in 1772, with the aggravating circumstance of a formal transfer of appropriated rights to the Marhattas, the natural enemy of every neighbouring power, the territories thus abdicated, by the great law of nature and of nations in Hindostan, reverted to the English, and were by them finally ceded to Sujah ul Dowlah, for fifty lacks of rupees, payable in three years, being about one-and-a-half year's purchase of their standard original rental; with certain stipulations of subsidy for any military aid required by either party.

Fifth.—Zemindarry of BENARES; being the remaining portion of the soubah of Allahabad now in question, acquired in 1775 by Great Britain in full sovereignty, under the constitutional forms of the Mogul empire, to be observed internally, and on terms of guaranteeing to the new vizier Arofuldowlah, the greater part of the rest of his heretable possessions, of precarious tenure to him, on the death of his father Sujah; contained chiefly in four Circars, of 62 perg^s 12,000 B. sq. miles: Of which, ten thousand, a rich well cultivated flat on either side of the Ganges, were rated in 1747: as follows; viz.

Deduct Kheirgur with the three mehals of Behar; the former, included in the Circars of Allahabad, &c. paying rent to the Vizier; the latter, making no part of the valuation of soubah Allahabad in 1747, and being together rated at - - - 1,60,565

Leaves for the zemindarry portion of the latter province, to be accounted for - 25,36,837

But this revenue of 26,07,402 rupees, there is reason to believe was only the net jumma of the district, as then ascertained, after deducting all infossil charges of sebundy and collection; for although in every dismembered part of the Mogul empire, a large increase on the established crown rent had taken place, not so much by imposing any new assessments on the country, as from resumption of those long since secretly levied, by the provincial superintendents, for their private emolument, and afterwards brought to public account, in proportion as they acted in their proper behalf, or felt their own independence of the declining constituent power of the house of Timoor: Yet in the present instance, the increase as set forth in the following authentic Statement, will appear so great and rapid, or disproportioned to the improvement of neighbouring districts, under similar circumstances, that it is more than probable the Toomary rental stated, is exclusive of the whole, or at least a considerable part of interior zemindarry expenses and aymah donations, which in the abstract accounts of the soubahs, were frequently deducted without specification, from the Hustabood.

HUSTABOOD, or Gross Collections of the zemindarry of Benares, in the fassille year 1184, or from 25th September 1776 to the same day in 1777; which hath or might have served, if faithfully rendered, as a foundation to the first regular settlement of the revenues of the district in 1781, on behalf of the Company, after the expulsion of Cheyt Sing, the late refractory farming landholder.

The

The whole territory as before described, chiefly in four Circars, and now containing 74 pergunnahs, was rated altogether at Sicca Rupees of 10 maseh; viz

Mehal or land rent, as then established, according to the Fucblah and Buttai -	67,06,779
Sayer, mostly duties of 4 per cent. on an average, on merchandize to and from Bengal, as privileged to the zemindar in 1773 -	1,35,000
	68,41,779

Abwab or tax, levied on the country to defray the expense of hoondan or exchange at 4 per cent. on the remittance of tribute to Calcutta, and serfor batta on all the other receipts together, calculated on a medium at 8 per cent. on the whole jumma of the mehal - - - - - Rupees 73,78,321

Total gross Collections of the district in 1184 - - - - - 68,41,779
The amount however of proper fixed revenue, mehal and sayer stood as above 68,41,779
From this sum, is to be deducted the rental of Kheirgur, &c. five methuids - 2,52,207 of the circar of Allahabad, payable to the vizier - 65,89,572

Total Malgoozary due to the sovereign of Benares - 56,89,572 of which was denominated Ausil or original rent, as collected to the death of Bulwant Sing, and in the nature of an ezafa or increase, on pretence of complying with the additional demand of the Vizier, on the accession of Cheyt Sing in 1770, comprized through the powerful political intercession of the English government, for 17 lacks nuzzeranah and 2½ lacks per annum, to be thus amply indemnified by a farther assessment on the crown lands, under the aumildarry management of Oussan Sing of - 9,00,000

But to give some assurance of the accuracy of a statement, so different from all others on the subject of Benares yet exhibited to the public, it may be necessary to enter into greater detail of the territorial divisions and income of the district, now become a dependency on Bengal; and endeavour to show by what degrees it increased to its present zemindarry magnitude, under three successive farming landholders; or on mistaken grounds of right and policy, acquired for a while the unconstitutional dangerous form of a tributary raje.

MONSARAM, the grandfather of Cheyt Sing of the lower or secular order of Bramins, was the first who laid the foundation of the zemindarry of Benares, in its actual state. He possessed originally no more than one half of the village of Gungapoor; but through the favour of Meer Ali Rustum Khan, nabib or deputy of Sadut Khan, soubahdar of the province of Allahabad, and by the usual modes of successful ambition, in the extensive territorial jurisdiction throughout Hindostan, in becoming Malamin or security for the rents of neighbouring landholders, outbidding some at the yearly settlement of their jummaundy, and expelling others perhaps, for forced disobedience or non performance of oppressive engagements, he acquired successively, in 19 years, until his death 1740, during the reign of Mahomed Shah, the zemindarry of eighteen mehals, rated ausil as follows; viz.

Total net annual Revenue forthcoming to the Company, as representative sovereign proprietor of the zemindary of Benares, settled in 1781/2, as a permanent Tannary assessment on all the districts of which it is composed, excepting Kharagar, of which the jumma hath been reserved to the vizier; and after deducting in all for charges of collection, sicca rupees 31,80,273, being about 44 per cent. on the gross, and 8 per cent. on the net revenue

But besides the expense thus incurred, including the maintenance of a Sebundy corps at least of 15,000 men, three or four battalions of regular infantry are kept within the district, in fact required and solely employed for the business of the collections; which the charges of dewanny and foujedarry judicature, usually imposed with bloodless Hindoo jurisdiction on zemindars in terms of their sunnud or charter, are here, with all those of higher provincial superintendence, defrayed from the net income of the public exchequer.

ON the whole, reviewing the rise, progress, extent, or final settlement of the zemindary of Benares, as herein set forth, it may seem strange that there should be two opinions on the relative situations of the principal landholders and sovereign, or that at any one period, the former should be classed under the erroneous designation of a feudal or tributary prince. But in Europe, the mistake was inevitable, when the records of the Company (the only medium of information relied on there) gave title, form, and description, princely prerogatives to the zemindar or expressed hereditary or civil indefinite right, though in opposition to fact, the chartered privileges of merely an officer of the established government, and the invariable legal practice of the empire. Such were the original ideas entertained in India, and promulgated from thence, of that class of natives termed landholders, and found virtually in the exercise of all those functions of proprietary management, which in some states of the western world, still give name and essence to the princely character, without reflecting that under despotism in all parts of Asia, the lowest delegate, however slavishly obedient himself, might be authorized in form, and have assumed in fact, within his proper jurisdiction, all the power, prerogative and privilege, of his sovereign constituent. Consulting only appearances, being little interested at first or finding a difficulty in the discovery of the truth, these ideas thought applicable to the state of things in this country, were readily adopted by the earlier servants of the Company, as most familiar to European knowledge, and were admitted with implicit deference afterwards, by those who having been trained up in the same primitive notions from their youth, under a sentiment of gratitude and respect for authority, succeeded in the common routine of the service to the higher stations of government.

Theory and practice were notoriously, at variance; but the former, was a point of faith, the absurdity of which, seemed to strengthen belief; while the contradiction of the latter, removed all inconvenience from the doctrine, until the year 1776. Soon after, a change in the form of administration, with a consistent system of principle and conduct, was attempted to be introduced in the management of the revenues. Unfortunately, both the one and the other, were in truth mistaken by our reformists; and hence the practice in many cases, from that time forward, hath been made to correspond with a thing no less dangerous than fallacious. A dispute between the civil and judicial authority, gave an air of patriotism in restraining or overturning the power of the supreme court, when it began to extend its influence, in derogation of the most essential rights of sovereignty, whether from a wrong construction of the charter of justice newly granted, or an original flaw in the original institution itself, by confounding exchequer jurisdiction, (necessarily attached in Hindostan under the forms of a peculiar of law, to the superior administration) with the executive powers of ordinary judicature, as established in England. The grand question agitated was, whether a zemindar was to be considered an officer of government, or a proprietor of land, according to European ideas; if the first, he became amenable to the court, subject to English law which he did not understand, and that property of which he was only the guardian (involving his own and sovereign's right) might have been materially affected, if not wholly and be exempted from all those impending inconveniences. The old absurd notion that gave revived, and most powerfully supported, on principles of policy wholly applicable to the state of society in Europe, and universally admitted there, as just in exclusion to all others, though perhaps founded on a very different order of things. Recent practice too, in some instances, might be quoted to confirm an opinion, which, however ill founded, had hitherto passed unquestioned, probably from its speculative insignificance under unsystematic management management of the finances, and had the stamp of time to insure its currency, without further investigation. It is not therefore to be wondered at, if we find so exact and general a conformity in the evidence of the purest intentioned, with the best informed individuals here, and in England, on the point in issue, where early prejudice, a common belief maintained with eloquence, apparent self-constituted and national interests, all seemed united to influence the decision. But it is altogether surprising, that no proofs of document or fact were tendered on the one side, nor required on the other, throughout the whole process of enquiry. If the zemindar was an officer of government, it might have been concluded, as is the case, that he acted by a commission of appointment, under some written form; if a proprietor, by a tenure of grant, prescription, or conviction, which might clearly ascertain his privileges and relative situation in the state. In truth, his sunnud being the necessary indispensable instrument of his civil creation, whether considered as a patent of office or temporary charter of territorial rights, would have determined the question without leaving possible grounds of cavil; while a candid discussion, with reference to any single instance of zemindary holding, must have invalidated at once all presumptive hereditary or other pretensions to the possession of land, besides a conditional permanent farm from the crown, in any part of Hindostan, subject to rules of Mogul legislation.

But it may be urged, that the farming landholder of Benares was virtually a rajah or prince, with acknowledged regal prerogatives, under the sanction of written agreement; and who had the right to create him such, or enter into stipulations with any subject zemindar, subversive of the laws and constitution of India, before the individual thus favoured, could have himself dreamt of establishing even a refractory independence? It was not the vizier of the empire, nor the dewans of a soubahdarry, nor yet the representatives of any power on earth, that unnecessarily could, in violation of the legal forms under which they acted, rightfully erect a principality, or confer immunities, essentially derogatory to the high sovereign authority of their constituents. While the zemindar of Benares owned subject- tion, in the indefinite terms of his sunnud, to the nawab or viceroy of Oude, and extended his territorial jurisdiction with more or less political influence, in inverse proportion to the ability of his superior, throughout an important frontier district, intervening between the British dominions and those of an ambitious, naturally inimical neighbour, it might have been good policy in the rulers of the one state, if possessing the power, to limit the controul of the other, if not effect the entire independence of the intermediate territory. Nevertheless, no such conduct was observed, in prescribing the forms of zemindary grant from Sujah Dowlah to Cheyt Sing in 1770, though the demands of nuzzeranneh and yearly rent, were greatly moderated, through English influence. When relative situations were interchanged, and the stronger power became possessed of the district in question, its policy then might be supposed the reverse of what it had been, under different circumstances. Yet this seems not to have been the case; a clause virtually of inheritance, and fixed invariable tribute in perpetuity, conveying also gratuitously a transfer of the regalities of the mint, foujedarry, and cutwally, was inserted in the Dewanny sunnuds of 1775; and nothing more was wanting to render the whole grant null and void from the beginning, as being altogether informal, diametrically opposite in letter and spirit to the laws and constitution of India; impolitic, and subversive of the conquered or acquired territorial rights of Britain. A rebellion necessarily ensued; and after an unequal conflict, brought things back to their natural state, in reducing the zemindar of Benares to his proper condition of a farming landholder; assessed in form for the full amount of his collections, moderately estimated at forty lacks, after deducting a princely allowance for himself, with all other usual charges of motussil management.

HAVING now completed the design, of exhibiting a Political, Comparative, and historical View of the Finances of the proper British dominions in Hindostan, excepting the Company's Jageer in the Carnatic, the islands of Bombay and Salsette, with the inconsiderable territories adjoining to four or five subordinate factories, dispersed on the coasts of Coromandel and Malabar, I shall here endeavour, in a few words, to give the substance of what hath been set forth; explain the leading motives of enquiry; review the mode pursued, and sum up the result of the whole, in a Table, shewing what the revenues of the different provinces in question were at different periods, from the Mogul conquest, to the present time; distinguishing the imperial crown-rent, as rated at its first and ultimate establishment, with the increased local assessments of the soubahdars, when raised themselves to independence; together making the highest legal income of the exchequer, at the moment of territorial transfer to Britain; then, comparing with that standard, the actual receipts of 1784, under the Company's wanny administration, whether involving an improvement or decline in the Finances, after nineteen years of management every where besides Benares; and finally indicating, the deduction of incurred charges, or the rate to which they ought to be limited, the net amount that might hereafter, in policy and justice, be paid annually into the public treasury.

The corrupt, variable, indefinite, fallacious system of administering the revenue, imposed by the natives of this country on their British rulers, as the lawful established mode of the preceding Mussulman government, was found productive of the most enormous abuses, equally oppressive to the people at large, as injurious to the sovereign rights. A progressive and rapid decline of ordinary supplies was felt and complained of, by the protecting power of the state; while fraudulent alienations of territory, being almost the only source in Hindostan, of public income, with heavy accumulated demands on all the remaining lands, threatened threatened at once, a total extinction of the means of providing for them, as derived from ample funds, and an industrious rated population. These pernicious consequences, were wrongfully ascribed to British agency; and therefore to fix the blame where it ought to remain, was one of the principal motives of the present enquiry.

To heal a disorder, the nature and causes of which were misunderstood, general scientific rules were referred to, but were found of no avail, by wrong application; and became critically dangerous, in strengthening a greater constitutional infirmity. The erroneous doctrine of hereditary or proprietary right in land being vested in the subject, and not the sovereign, when blindly adopted as an unimportant speculative theory, seemed of little consequence; but when a permanent system was to be raised, on a foundation so ruinous; and give way to a different practice, totally irreconcilable to the local state of things, the character of the people, the principles and necessities of the established government; duty impelled a prompt and strenuous resistance to an innovation that might be so prejudicial, by the only means left, in rousing the public attention.

A long expensive war, and want of internal economy, had, with the evils suggested, occasioned a very considerable debt, and great pecuniary distress, in supplying the current exigencies of government; but the immediate inconvenience of these effects, could only have been felt, in wrong intelligence, and mistaking the proper rights, with the natural resources

IN explanation of the foregoing Table, it is to be observed, on the two first columns, containing the original and ultimate Toomary Jumma, that the amount in some of the districts and even provinces, included the entire mofussil expense of collection; as in Behar, where the value of the lands had been completely ascertained; in others, only a small share or compromise, as in Bengal, where a valuation by ruckbah or measurement had never been completed, but the assessment, such as it is stated, accumulated by proportional abwabs on the ausil, having regard to the charges before allowed of, and which were always to be deducted from the standard crown rent, at the close of the year. resources of the state. The country never was in a more flourishing state; money at no time plentier, nor the land rents of the sovereign higher, as first paid into the hands of his zemindarry agents. Nevertheless, through embezzlements, encroachments, or alienations of proprietary right, the actual receipts of the public treasury were unequal to the demand; and if all the wealth of the universe centered in Bengal, no other outlet could be found of general circulation under Hindoo superstitious parsimony, than the issues of the exchequer. The display of such truths, by comparative views of the revenue, at different periods, with applicable remarks, founded on authentic documents, or incontrovertible facts, in opposition to simple opinion, wrong conclusions from mistaken premises, and the gross delusion that would give stationary or increased value to the precious metals, since the discovery of America, involved the plan which gave the motives that occurred effect, in executing this dry, invidious, disagreeable undertaking. The mode pursued was, First, to lay down the general principles of Finance, as actually established in Hindostan, without taking much pains to refute prevalent erroneous opinions, or anticipate possible future objections; though what hath been necessarily said on either score, will undoubtedly be tedious to lukewarm, or self interested enquirers: Then, to apply these principles, with some local modification, to the different countries composing the British dominion in India; and exhibit the result in a figured comparative Statement of the Revenues of each, now abstracted, in one view, in the following TABLE:—

in the moment of territorial acquisition, for the most part in 1765, comprised the whole actual receipts on the annual jumabundy, at that time concluded by the Mussulman government, inclusive of every established expense incident to the management of the revenues, excepting sebundy, which in some instances, however, is partially introduced. Nevertheless, it is not to be imagined that the sum here specified, was brought entirely to the credit of the sovereign. The whole civil and military charges of the province, were also to be deducted. Corruption and the abuse of power in despotic states, ever underrated the public income, and fictitiously swelled the expenditure. Soubahdars, Dewans, and Foujedars, with their their slavish delegates, supported within their respective jurisdictions a considerable armed force, with a degree of state and magnificence unknown in limited monarchies. They united in their own persons, locally, all the executive functions of civil governor, judge, and commander in chief of the troops; collected the revenues, ordered disbursements, framed and settled their public accounts, almost without any control, since the decline of the empire on the death of the great Alemgeer; and yet it is certain from that period forward, for upwards of thirty succeeding years, a net surplus of one crore of rupees, after defraying every expense of provincial government, whether civil, military, financial, or judicial, was annually remitted from the Soubah of Bengal alone, by way of Tribute, to the imperial treasury at Delhi. Authentic accounts lately received from the king's duffer there, entirely confirm this fact, as before stated in the first part of our Analysis, and resting then, merely on the authority of papers found in Calcutta.

In like manner, from the net Revenue of 1784, as actually collected by the Company, or on their behalf in the sovereign's name by zemindars, on the well founded estimate set forth in the ultimate column, the general, civil, and military, disbursements are to be deducted; for under the head of Charges of Management, here introduced, as well in 1765 and 1784, as in the stated allowance of 20 per cent. nothing is included but the proper expense necessarily or usually incurred in the collection of the revenues, and that, not in the total; as schundy, or the extraordinaries of regular troops doing the duty of militia, with jageers, pensions, &c. to some of the civil officers of the financial department, would make a very considerable addition, if reckoned with the ordinary charges of realizing the public income.

In the valuation of the five Northern Circars, the revenue of Guntour, though still in the hands of Nizam Ally Khan, is included. The amount at the jumma kaumil or standard, being the medium between the real collections of the zemindars, and what is annually paid to the public exchequer, is about twelve lacks of rupees; and supposing this to be deducted from the total receipts of the British territories herein specified, yet the produce of that portion yet undescribed, including the Jageer in the Carnatic, islands of Bombay, &c. will more than counterbalance the defalcation.

Mr. Shore's Minute, 18 Sep. 1789.

1st.—MY time, since I had last the honour of attending the board, has been occupied in perusing the replies of the collectors of the Fussully districts, to the references made to them under dates the 11th August 1788, and 20th May 1789, on the subject of the intended permanent settlement; and with a view to assist the deliberations of the board, and to enable them to form decisive resolutions upon this important subject, I have collected all the material information which has occurred, and shall now state it, with my own Observations upon the whole.

2d.—It may be proper to premise, that the minute which I delivered for record, upon the 18th June last, on the revenues of this country, related to the districts of Bengal only, and had no reference to the divisions of this country, which pay their rents according to the Fussully year. I have formerly remarked, that between Bengal and Behar there are many important distinctions, both in principle and practice; and in determining the system of management for regulating and collecting the revenues of these two provinces, these distinctions should not be disregarded: the most material of them, are as follows:—

1st,—In Bengal the zemindaries are very extensive, and that of Burdwan alone is equal in produce, to three-fourths of the rental of Behar, in which province, the zemindaries are comparatively small. The power and influence of the principal zemindars in Bengal is proportionably great; and they have been able to maintain a degree of independence, which the inferior zemindars of the Behar province have lost. The latter also, having been placed under the authority of a provincial administration, from distance as well as comparative inferiority, have been precluded from that information which the zemindars of Bengal, from their vicinity to Calcutta, and their access to the members and officers of government, have been able to obtain: the latter, have acquired ideas of right, and assume principles of conduct, or reasoning, which do not extend to the zemindars of Behar.

2dly,—The proprietors of the soil in Behar, universally claim and possess a right of malikana, which whenever they are dispossessed of the management of their lands, they receive from the aumil, as well as from the tenants of the jagheers and proprietors of atumghas. In Bengal, no such custom has ever been formally established, although there is some affinity between this and the allowance of moshaira.

3dly,—The lands of Behar have from time immemorial, been let to farm, and no general settlement, as far as we can trace, since the acquisition of the Dewanny, has been concluded between the government and the real proprietors of the soil. The collector of Sarun asserts, that this has ever been the usage in the districts under his charge. The aumil or farmer has deemed himself entitled to avail himself of the agency of the zemindars and talookdars, or dispense with it, at his own discretion. This power was formally delegated to the farmers in 1771, by the provincial council at Patna, with the sanction of the superior authority at Calcutta, and the rate of malikana was then settled, for the dispossessed proprietors of the land, at 10 per cent. as the ancient allowance agreeable to the constitution of the country government.

4thly,—The numerous grants of lands in Behar, under various denominations, have had an influence upon the proprietary rights of the zemindars and talookdars, and upon their opinions of those rights. There are few instances of jagheers in Bengal; I cannot recollect more than three or four.

6thly,—The settlement in Behar, whether by the aumil or manager on the part of government, is annually formed upon an estimate of the produce. In Bengal, the mofussil farmers, with some exceptions, collect by different rules.

Mr. Shore's and Lord Cornwallis's Minutes, of September 1789; on Permanent Settlement of Lands.

Mr. Shore's Minute, 18 Sep. 1789.

18. In his letter of the 23d July 1789, the collector details many objections, which I shall hereafter state, to a settlement with the immediate proprietors of the soil; recommends in preference the employment of farmers, contends for the propriety of this system, and proposes the plan of a ten years settlement with 14 farmers for Sarun, and 4 for Champarun; and he gives the following definition of a zemindarry in Sarun.

"That it is a portion of land consisting of sundry farms paying revenue to government, belonging to numberless proprietors managing their lands, either by themselves or their agents, but acting in general under a nominal proprietor, called the zemindar, (with whom they engage for their revenue) having a real property perhaps of a fiftieth part of the zemindarry."

19. Upon these paragraphs I shall observe, that the objections stated against farmers on the 30th May 1788, ought to be as solid now, as they were at that period. The propositions of the collector, on both dates, apply to a ten years settlement; nor can I reconcile the collector's definition of a zemindar, or the fact of a zemindarry settlement as made in September last with 74 proprietors, with the declared refusal of the zemindars to rent each other's lands, combined with the number of zemindars in Sarun.

20. So much as to general objections: with respect to the special, I shall premise that I was not unapprized of the objections which might be made to the first propositions, and expected accordingly that they would be stated, as the mode in which it was conveyed to the collectors of Behar, was the best calculated to bring them forward in their full force.

21. The acting collectors of Bauglepore state, that the Muskoory talookdars are at present dependent upon the zemindars, in the same manner as the latter are upon government: they are liable to dispossession, and in that case, entitled to a rissoom; that to render them independent, would be an infringement of the rights of the zemindars; and the execution of such a plan would be attended with peculiar difficulty, both in ascertaining those who are independent, and in detaching them from the zemindars. That the expectation of such a measure, would excite clamorous claims of independence, in crowds who are quietly and contentedly subsisting under the ancient custom of the country.

22. The board of revenue do not consider the muscooree talookdars, mentioned by the acting collector of Bauglepore, as intended to be included in the independent talookdars with whom the settlement is to be made, of course that the objections of the acting collector, founded on the jurisdiction exercised over them by zemindars, and which they consider as their rights, are obviated: In this opinion, I agree with them.

23. The preceding objections, founded upon the dependence of the Muscoory talookdars, are special with regard to Bauglepore; the remaining objections may be reduced to the following points:

1. The number of zemindars;
2. The endless subdivisions of their tenures, and enmities subsisting between the various proprietors, as well as their individual claims to separate management;
3. The state of the property with respect to mortgages, and the difficulty of ascertaining the actual proprietors;
4. The difficulty of distinguishing the limits and extent of each zemindarry;
5. The impoverished state of the proprietors of the soil, and the insecurity attending engagements made with them;
6. The probability of a deficiency from the inequality of the assessment;
7. The time required for making a settlement with different proprietors;
8. The expense.

24. These objections are stated by the collectors of Sireat Sarun and Tirhoot, who have detailed and amplified them. I have separated them, for the purpose of considering each more particularly, that the difficulties attending the plan may be thoroughly investigated, and the importance of them be duly weighed.

25. First. The number of the zemindars. The multiplication of petty renters beyond certain bounds, is certainly an evil of considerable magnitude, when the form of our government, and the formality of our proceedings are considered; the attention which must be paid to each, whether in forming the settlement, or in collecting the rents, is considerable, and under such circumstances, there is danger that it will be dissipated and ineffective. The board of revenue will find it difficult, properly and effectually to control such a system, still less, will this be in the power of the supreme board.

26. These are objections, which must ever remain, to a settlement with the immediate proprietors of the soil, where the distribution of property is so minute; and if the settlement were to be renewed annually, would be almost insuperable. But on the principle of a permanent settlement with the immediate proprietors of the soil, where the distribution of property is so minute, and if the settlement were to be for a long period, much of the difficulty is removed, as the annual labour of investigating the resources of the renters, and fixing the assessment upon them, is done away.

27. With respect to collecting from a number of petty zemindars, the trouble must be considerable; but I do not see that it is insurmountable. That balances will happen in the intermediate-kists of the years, is to be apprehended from the dissipation, and inattention of the proprietors, and from the difficulty of a close attention to the detail; but ultimately the the lands will prove a security for the recovery of them, and some additional regulations may be made, authorizing the attachment or sale of the lands, whenever the kists shall fall in arrears to a certain degree, during the course of the year. The board of revenue do not deem the number of proprietors a sufficient objection to the general rule.

Second.—The subdivisions of the tenures, and the enmities subsisting between the various proprietors, as well as their individual claims to separate management.

28. The subdivisions of the tenures, as far as they affect the proposed arrangement, may be considered in two points of view: first, where a number of proprietors have a right to a portion of land, which is undivided; and, secondly, where the land stands in the joint names of several, or of one for many, but each proprietor has his separate share in his own possession and management, or in that of an agent for him.

29. In the first case, the settlement must be made with all the proprietors jointly, each answerable for his specific proportion of rent, according to his right; and they must determine amongst themselves in what mode the management is to be made.

30. In the second case, there is no difficulty in determining with whom the settlement shall be made, or from whom the revenues shall be demanded, or whence the balances are to be recovered. The persons in possession, and the lands, are responsible.

31. In the first case, there is a clear rule for the recovery of balances, for where a settlement is made with a number of proprietors jointly, a portion of the land may be separated, and sold, equivalent to the amount: But there are other points of view, in which the subject is to be considered.—The collector of Sarun quotes one instance of a village paying 600 rupees revenue, and having 52 proprietors; supposing the proportions to be four times greater, in this instance, between the property and proprietors, than in others, the difficulty of making a settlement with so many, or of collecting the revenues from them, may be presumed very considerable.

32. These difficulties may occur, on the following grounds:—Either when all the proprietors will not attend; or, will not agree to a manager. In either case, the determination of the majority in attendance, should be binding upon the remainder.

33. This decision will I think obviate all difficulties; for, supposing the proprietors numerous in any degree, and that the property is undivided, it can hardly ever happen that some will not attend; after all, however, every supposed obstacle arising from the refusal of the proprietors to propose a manager, may be obviated by the appointment of a tehsildar to collect the rents from the ryots; after the discharge of the government's rental, to divide the remainder amongst the proprietors, according to their respective shares.

34. That these difficulties exist at present, must be admitted; and they must be overcome, or the collections could not be realized.—The collectors, who have stated the objections, ought to have mentioned how the business, under the circumstances detailed, is carried on, and why they are precluded from adopting the same plan, as is now followed by the zemindars and farmers.

35. Thirdly.—The state of the property, with regard to mortgages, and the difficulty of ascertaining the actual proprietors.

These mortgages, as explained by the collector of Sarun, who urges the objection most pointedly, may be considered in two principal points of view. First, where the mortgagee has obtained possession of the land; and, secondly, where he has not possession; but by the conditions of the mortgage is entitled to it, in case of non-payment of the sum borrowed, after a specific time.

36. In the former case, the settlement is to be made with the mortgagee, and if the zemindar is able to discharge his obligation, he will recover possession from him by a suit, and succeed to his engagements. In the second, the settlement is to be made with the zemindar in possession, and the process above pointed out, must be observed by the mortgagee.

37. There are other objections to this point, stated upon different grounds, which will be considered in their proper place.

38. With respect to the difficulty of ascertaining the proprietors of petty estates; it may perhaps in some instances, be considerable; and yet I should suppose that the Mofussil records would point them out: where the majority of proprietors appear, and admit the mutual claims of each other, part of the difficulty is removed; although there should be others unknown, the rights of the absentees are not superseded, and, when proved, will be admitted: where many appear, and dispute each other's right, the settlement can only be made with those in possession, or a native collector must be appointed, as before observed. If no proprietors come forward, the same mode must be followed, which lands be given in farm. The objection is certainly founded on real difficulties, which cannot be obviated, without great application and attention; but what plan has not its inconveniences and embarrassments.

39. Fourth.—The difficulty of distinguishing the limits and extent of each zemindarry. I do not consider this as material; present possession can be determined, and the limits in general, must be sufficiently ascertained: if any disputes arise concerning them, they may be adjusted in the adawlut. The 85th article of the Revenue Regulations, provides for

Mr. Shore's and Lord Cornwallis's Minutes of September 1789; on Permanent Settlement of Lands.

Mr. Shore's Minute. 28 Sep. 1789.

for the intermediate management during the litigation. If the limits (as the objection to be well founded, supposes) are very indefinite, how have the collections hitherto been made?

40. Fifth.—The impoverished state of the proprietors of the soil, and the insecurity attending engagements to be made with them.

41. The state of the proprietors is thus substantially described by the collector of Sarun:—That they are, in general, involved in great distress, and their lands mortgaged over and over again, both on public and private accounts, to almost their full value; that the proprietors in this situation, have made over their lands, or entrusted them to a superior zemindar, who favours the possession with his indulgence and assistance, by procuring for the proprietors continual and occasional loans.

42. The inconveniences resulting from this state of things, are thus detailed:—That the connection, by the proposed plan of settlement, between the inferior and superior zemindars, will be dissolved, and the former be left without support; consequently, they must fail; that although the sale of the land should indemnify the government from loss, the proprietor will be ruined by the sale of his lands, proceeding from a want of support and assistance.

43. The collector further states, that, from extensive enquiries made by him upon this business, it by no means appears that the proprietors are themselves anxious for the establishment of a system, which they consider as exposing them to trouble and distress, without any adequate advantage.

44. Extravagance and mismanagement are assigned as the causes of the distress of the zemindars; and it may be admitted, that such, as by these means, have reduced themselves to depend upon expedients for support, may want the inclination or resolution to resume the management of their estates, and take upon themselves a responsibility, to the discharge of which they are unequal. Experience in common life is in favour of this reasoning. To face heavy distress, and overcome it, often requires a degree of resolution to which persons in this unfortunate situation are unequal.

45. For where the zemindars are involved in great distress, and are liable to the demands of numerous creditors, they will probably foresee the necessity of parting with some portion of their rents, in order to pacify them; and in all cases of incapacity, a failure may ensue with regard to their public payment, which must be made good by a sale of the lands. But the objection, as far as relates to the personal interest of the zemindars, applies equally to the existing system, by which they must be involved in total ruin; for if they subsist by loans, which they can never discharge, (and, from the collector's account, this appears to be the case) the accumulation of debt must at last, sink them.

46. Their case, as described, seems desperate, under any plan; yet the chance of relief is greater, where they take the management of their own lands, than where they lessen their profits, by resigning them to the management of others; and if their present distress may in any degree, be supposed to originate from the revenue system, as heretofore established in Behar; it is the interest and duty of government to afford them a chance of relief, by a change of management. Those who have capacity for the task, will probably obtain relief; with those who want it, or the means of promoting the cultivation of their estates, or are driven by the distress in which they are involved to unfrugal expedients, their final ruin may be precipitated; but the foundation is already laid in existing evils, to which, and not to the proposed system, their ruin must be imputed.

47. With proprietors of this description, if a settlement be made, neither they nor the state will immediately benefit by it; hereafter, the introduction of more frugal or able, managers will be advantageous to the latter. As property becomes more valuable, the care of managing it will increase.

48. To the concluding remark of the collector of Sarun, it may be sufficient to reply—that in directing him to make a settlement with the immediate proprietors of the soil, they are not compelled to enter into engagements. It is optional with them, to engage or decline; if they do embrace the offer made to them, the risque is their own, and they must stand to the consequence of it; or if they think it will be more advantageous to them, to resign the management to a principal zemindar, I see no objection to the measure.

49. Sixth.—The probability of a deficiency from the inequality of the assessment.

50. This objection is founded on a supposition that, under the present system of combining many petty zemindars under one principal, the deficiency in one, is supplied by the profits of another, and the sum total payable to government made good; whereas by separating them, the deficiency will be unprovided for.

51. The fundamental inequality ought to be corrected by the knowledge and ability of the collector, by reducing the assessment where too heavy, and by increasing it, where it admits: supposing this to be done, the objection no longer remains; and this indeed appears to be effected by the present zemindars, though in a mode less regular.

52. I acknowledge the task to be very difficult, if the greatest precision be required; but the regularity of the Mofussil accounts in Behar, renders an operation easier in that province than it would be in Bengal, where they cannot be procured with the same facility. It is very discouraging to find objections made on this ground, by a collector who ought to be prepared to remove them. Inequality, without ability to ascertain the assets, may produce deficiency.

Mr. Shore's and Lord Cornwallis's Minutes of September 1789; on Permanent Settlement of Lands.

Mr. Shore's Minute. 18 Sep. 1789.

53. Seventh.—The time required for making a settlement with the different proprietors.

54. From the declarations of Messrs. Bathurst and Montgomerie, we cannot entertain hopes that the settlement will be accomplished by them, in one year, and perhaps not in two. Admitting this, the ten years settlement cannot at once be effected, but must be completed gradually, pergunnah by pergunnah, and the old system of a yearly assessment, where the new cannot be introduced, be continued for the present. In those places where the new plan is unattempted, the settlement must be made, upon the general regulations of the 25th April 1788.

55. Eighth.—The expense.

This is stated by the acting collector of Bauglepore at 4,800 rupees; by the collector of Sarun, at 47,880 rupees; and by the collector of Tirhoot, at 92,250 per annum.

56. Why this heavy expense, in the two last instances, should be incurred, I am at a loss to conceive. The charges attending the appointment of tehsildars must be considerable; but considering them in the light of substitutes for farmers, the amount ought not to fall upon government, that is, it ought to be made good, by realizing an amount equal to it. In the same manner as the expenses of the former are provided for, those of government ought to be supplied, or nearly so, allowing all operations to be carried on by government, at a greater charge than an individual would incur.

57. I should therefore hope that, with more particular information and further experience, the collectors of Sarun and Tirhoot will discover the possibility of reducing the expenses, or the means of providing for them. The deduction from the gross payments of the ryots ought to be less under the proposed system, than under the former, as it admits of more economy. The zemindar, who supports with loans or credit the inferior landholders, as maintained by Mr. Montgomerie, is paid in proportion to his risk, which is again to be estimated by the distresses of the borrower; and the malikana and kurcha must be at all events, deducted. The collector of Behar states the expenses of a native collector over a pergunnah yielding two or three lacks of rupees, upon the principle of a village assessment, at 2 per cent.

58. The board must however consider and determine upon the objection of the expense, supposing ultimately a necessity of incurring it, in the degree stated. The question is—whether we are authorized to establish it, at an expense so great as that stated by the collectors of Tirhoot and Sarun; and I think a trial, under the suggestions now pointed out, should be made previous to an absolute decision upon it.

59. I acknowledge that I consider the necessity of introducing tehsildars, or native collectors, which is essential to the proposed plan, as a principal inconvenience attending it. This officer stands between the inferior tenants and the collector, supplying the place of a Sudder farmer. I do not think the substitution, attended with such great advantages as it may apparently have; government can never afford to reward the tehsildars in a degree sufficient to preclude temptation, and must rely upon its coercion over them; but coercion cannot be exercised, without understanding the detail of the duties committed to their management. If it be contended that the tehsildar is liable to dismissal, and that therefore, the principle of coercion is stronger with respect to him, than in the case of a farmer, who cannot be dismissed; on the other hand, it may be observed, that extortion in the latter, may be punished by fine and damages, and that he has in self-interest, under the supposition of a permanent system, a greater motive to restrain him than a native collector. The latter, will regulate his conduct by the estimate which he forms of the abilities of the collector under whose authority he is placed: if he knows him to be vigilant, active, and well-informed, he will be cautious, diligent, and honest: if he supposes him to be otherwise, and that he can misbehave with impunity, he will intrigue with under-renters, or abuse his influence, withhold true knowledge, and impose upon his principal by misinformation. The plan in its detail, by fixing the rents, removes a grand opportunity of abuse in the tehsildar.

60. The objections which I have gone through, may be reduced in great measure, to the detail of the system, and the difficulty of executing and controlling it. The collector of Tirhoot with great candour, acknowledges this; and with a diffidence which is highly to his honour, observes, that many evils must inevitably present themselves under the superintendence of men of an ordinary stamp, in the execution of systems adapted to the genius and comprehension of a favoured few.

61. I most certainly agree with him, that systems of management should be adapted to ordinary capacities; and so far an objection lies against a plan which requires a considerable degree of knowledge, and great exertions; but on the other hand, when the object of the system is considered, the establishing the proprietors of the soil in the management of their lands and rents; the importance and justice of the consideration ought to weigh against arguments founded on convenience alone, and a trial should at least be made, particularly since we find it practicable, in some instances.

62. The collector of Sircar Sarun reckons the number of zemindars, in twelve pergunnahs of his division, at 353; the collector of Tirhoot does not specify their number, under him. The renters in the districts of Behar and Shahabad must be in a much greater proportion than the number above stated. The collectors of these districts do not however object to the plan proposed. Mr. Law has given proofs of his ability to execute it, and Mr. Brooke speaks with a confidence that promises success, the expectation of which, may be reasonably reasonably presumed from his past exertions. Why, it may be asked, is the plan deemed practicable and advantageous by them, when so many difficulties occur to the other collectors of Behar? The difficulties of the execution, can only be in proportion to the detail; and, as far as I can judge, this must be greater in Behar and Shahabad, than in Tirhoot and Sarun.

Mr. Shore's and Lord Cornwallis's Minutes, of September 1789; on Permanent Settlement of Lands.

Mr. Shore's Minute, 18 Sep. 1789.

63. Upon the whole, I do not see sufficient objections to supercede the first proposition, which is the foundation of all the rest. Two points are necessary to be attended to:—

First. That the instructions for the execution, be more detailed and calculated to point out, for the information of the collectors, the mode by which the present difficulties, as far as we can judge of them, may be removed:

Secondly. That the settlement with the proprietors be progressively and partially formed; so that knowledge and experience may be gradually acquired, and the difficulties in one place, be surmounted, before the plan is attempted, in another.

64. I have omitted the consideration of some particular queries and local observations made by some of the collectors. Where these are not answered by the general resolutions; special replies and orders may be communicated.

Resolution IInd.—THAT the settlement be made for a period of ten years certain, with a notification that, if approved by the Court of Directors, it will become permanent, and no further alteration take place, at the expiration of the ten years.

65. Objections to this, are stated by the collectors of Sarun and Baugleapore: those of the former, have been enumerated and considered.

66. The collector of Tirhoot does not specifically object to the resolution, though he does virtually, by proposing another different in principle; viz. That it be declared, a final settlement will be made at the end of the ten years, according to the assets of the country, at that time. The collector of Baugleapore assumes other grounds:—the imperfections and abuses which at present exist, in the system of the Mofussil collections; that the zemindars and farmers making it a rule to collect in whatever manner their predecessors collected, unless there are stipulations to the contrary, every unjust and destructive custom will become in some degree, sanctioned.

67. To this I shall first reply, admitting what I believe to be true, that we are not fully informed of all the abuses which are practised by zemindars, farmers, and their officers, in the detail of the collection, or fully prepared to correct in every instance such as we know or presume to exist, by specific regulations; much may however be done, and many rules may be established for remedying existing evils; and if the country has supplied the resources for so long a period, subject, during it, to the great abuses affirmed to exist, it ought to be in a much better condition at the end of ten years, than it is at present; supposing regulations established and enforced, which is certainly practicable; besides, as many of these abuses have arisen from annual settlements, and the necessity which the renters have thereby been under, of resorting to unthrifty expedients for making good their engagements, the cause being removed, the effect may in some degree, be expected to cease. As to Mr. Bathurst's proposition, I agree with the board of revenue, in deeming it unnecessary and impolitic; unnecessary, because it will be in the power of government to adopt such a principle at the expiration of the ten years, if then judged more advisable than the confirmation of the existing settlement; and impolitic, because the previous declaration might tend to discourage industry and improvement.

68. As to the assurance proposed to be made to the proprietors, that if the settlement be approved by the Court of Directors, it will become permanent, and no further alteration take place at the expiration of the ten years, I entertain some doubts of its propriety.

69. The intention of making it, is to give fuller confidence to the proprietors of the soil than a ten years lease will afford. I am not sure that it will have this effect, in any material degree: to those who have subsisted upon annual expedients, a period of ten years is a term nearly equal in estimate, to perpetuity. The advantages of the last years of this period, must depend upon their exertions during the first, and if these are neglected in the outset, few of these zemindars will be in possession of their lands half the prescribed term. Their own security, without the declaration, requires exertions in the beginning of the lease.

70. Towards the close of it, or after some years have elapsed, when they are become sensible of the advantages of a permanent system, and have acquired a confidence in the assurances of government, and the stability of its measures (and experience alone will teach it) then they will be anxious for the confirmation of a system which they find advantageous. There may be particular instances to the contrary; but, generally, I conceive that the natives would receive such a declaration without much confidence in it, referring their belief to time and experience. If it be admitted, that their confidence in public measures and declarations has been shaken by the fluctuation of system, this reasoning will be just.

71. But it may be asked, what positive objections occur to the declaration? In my opinion, the following:

72. That we cannot answer for the confirmation of it; and if it be not confirmed, the confidence of the natives will be shaken. For if they act upon the declaration, it must be under a conviction that it is well founded; and if this conviction be afterwards done away, they they will suspect all assurances. It is true that nothing certain is promised, but those who rely upon the certainty of the notification, will, if they are disappointed, conclude that it was meant to deceive them. With others, who are not stimulated by it, the declaration is of no importance.

72. But it may be further asked, what reason I have to suppose it will not be confirmed? My answer to this is, that whatever confidence we ourselves have, in the propriety of the measures which we mean to adopt, we cannot pronounce absolutely upon their success, without experience; and before we recommend the perpetual confirmation of a general measure of importance, we ought to have that experience. I am not sure that the plan will be executed with such ability, as to justify a recommendation of its confirmation in perpetuity:—Of this, we can only judge, when we have seen the progress and conclusion of the settlement. This argument holds good, whether the effect of the declaration be greater or less than I suppose, and the letters of the collectors of Sarun and Tirhoot prove the propriety of it, as well as that of the acting collector of Baugleapore, upon different principles.

Resolution IIIrd.—THAT the jumma, which each zemindar is to pay, be fixed by the collector on fair and equitable principles, with the reserve of the approbation of the board of revenue, to whom the collector is to report the grounds of his decision on the jumma, according to the best accounts which he can procure of the value of the lands, without a measurement of them. That if he should deem it eligible, he may call upon the zemindars to deliver in proposals for renting their lands, but that this judgment is in the first instance, to determine the amount.

73. The objections to this resolution, as made by the collector of Sarun, are included in those which have been discussed. The collector of Tirhoot urges the necessity and difficulty of investigating the Mofussil accounts: and those of the acting collector of Baugleapore apply more immediately to the Muscoory talooks, which I think with him, should be continued under the jurisdiction of the zemindars.

74. With respect to the Huzzory mehals of Baugleapore, the acting collector observes that, with such information as stands recorded in the cutcherry, joined with experience and local knowledge, the jumma may be fixed, with sufficient exactness; and the collector of Tirhoot, in stating the mode of fixing the jumma at present, gives a rule for his own conduct, viz.—The jumma of each village is taken for four years, or sometimes more, and the prospect of the current year's produce considered, when the aumil and the malik, or proprietor, agree to the medium jumma.

75. This last, seems a very fair rule; but how the information pointed out can be obtained, without some examination of the Putwarries accounts, and without the discrimination mentioned by Mr. Bathurst, I am at a loss to conjecture.

76. The objections to this rule, will in a great measure be obviated, if time be allowed the collectors for finishing the task prescribed in it; and this must be done.

77. The board should, however, determine what is meant by fair and equitable principles; and I would accordingly propose the following definition:

78. That the average produce of the land for common years, say of three or four, be assumed as the basis of the settlement; and that from this a deduction be made, equal to the malikana and kurtcha. The collectors must of course take care, that the produce be duly ascertained. In any case of great uncertainty, they may be authorized to measure the lands; but this should only be done on the grounds of particular necessity, and a report be made to the board of revenue, whenever it is undertaken. There is some difference between this proposition, and that for the settlement of Bengal. The prevailing system in Behar allows the investigation of the Mofussil accounts in that province, with more facility than in Bengal, where they cannot be procured, without much labour, expense, and delay.

Resolution IVth.—THAT the gunges, bazars, hauts, and other sayer collections, be not included in any settlement with any zemindar; but that for the present they remain under the exclusive jurisdiction of an officer appointed by the collector, who is to propose such regulations as he may think best calculated for regulating and collecting the duties.

79. Amongst the objections urged to this proposition, I find one only stated against it, as an invasion of the zemindary rights; and this is very pointedly made by the acting collector of Baugleapore, who observes that, on asking the sentiments of a zemindar upon the separation proposed, he replied with sullen emphasis, "That government if it pleased, might take from him his whole zemindary."

80. If the same objection existed in the other parts of Behar, I conclude it would have been stated. The reason why it is not, may possibly be this, that the system of management adopted in Behar for so many years, having been calculated to destroy all ideas of right in the proprietors of the soil, beyond their admitted claims to a tithe of their proprietary rights, they consider all besides this, at the discretion of government; whereas in Baugleapore, the management has partaken more of the nature of that established in Bengal, and the zemindars will urge their claims with a confidence proportioned to it.

81. If this were not the case, I should conclude that the principle recommended, ought to be extended to the gunges and sayer held and collected by the proprietors and tenants of the atumgha and jaghire lands; for, as far as right is concerned, I see no reason why that of the zemindars should be invaded, whilst men of another description are molested; molested; nor, if public utility only be consulted, why the inconveniences resulting from variable rates in one instance, and the number of managers, should not operate equally to prove the necessity of a reform in another, and the propriety of undertaking it.

Mr. Shore's and Lord Cornwallis's Minutes, of September 1789; on Permanent Settlement of Lands.

Mr. Shore's Minutes, 18 Sep. 1789.

82. In Bengal, I conceive most of the zemindars would argue in the manner pointed out by the acting collector of Bauglepoore; nor do I think the observation of the board of revenue a sufficient reply to it. That, considering the actual practice of the government they were subject to, long before the administration of their present rulers, the adoption of the settlement would leave them no ground of complaint; and that in general, they would agree to relinquish the sayer collections, to obtain a permanent assessment of their lands, is a doubtful opinion—they ought and must submit, but that the submission would be voluntary cannot be affirmed; but a government should consider what is right in itself, and not merely to be influenced by the opinions of its subjects.

83. In the propositions for the settlement of Bengal, I extended the regulations regarding the gunges as far as I could, without a declared violation of proprietary right; but the arguments against the measure in Bengal, are much stronger than in Behar, to which the present discussion applies; and I shall hereafter state them.

84. The distribution of property in the Behar province, obviates an objection, which, from a different state of things, would occur to the measure in Bengal.

85. Admitting therefore, for the present, that the zemindars do not in that province, contend for the right of possession with respect to the gunges, the question goes to the propriety of the measure, and to the extent in which it shall be carried into execution.

86. To the separation of the gunges from the zemindary jurisdiction, I find no objection urged; and the propriety of it, with an exception of the acting collector of Bauglepoore, is admitted by the other collectors of Behar; but the collector of Saru objects to the separation of the haut, bazar, and petty sayer duties; and the collector of Tirhoot, who adds the bazars to the gunges, excludes a number of articles, commonly estimated in the sayer, in all eleven, because they are included by the putwarries of each village in the same accounts with the mahall, or land tax, and considered by them as attached to it, and their separation would bring on endless disputes, and multiply inconveniences instead of diminishing them.

87. If these articles be examined, although they may be denominated sayer, many of them will be found very different from custom-house duties, in which sense the term is often understood; indeed, I have always conceived the sayer to mean articles of revenue distinct from the land tax. Thus, the rent or revenue levied from fisheries, for a right of grazing on cocoa or palm trees, or orchards, and some others, cannot be considered in the native custom-house duties, but much more so as rents.

88. There is a distinction between hauts and bazars; the former, are markets held on certain days only, and resorted to by petty venders and traders: they are often established in open plains, where a flag is erected on the day and at the place of purchase and sale.

89. Bazars are daily markets, though, on particular days, it is not unusual to have in them a haut, where a number of petty venders, besides the established shopkeepers, frequent them.

90. In gunges, the chief commodities sold are grain and necessities of life, and generally wholesale. They often however include bazars and hauts, where the articles are sold in retail, and in greater variety; and this in towns is commonly the case.

91. Independent of the question of right, I am of opinion that neither the collections on account of the sayer generally, nor the hauts, should remain under the charge of the collectors; and that such a measure, would multiply labour and expense, without producing any adequate convenience. With respect to the bazars, the same objections occur in a degree, unless they are of considerable importance: but these, as well as the gunges may, for the purpose of regulation, be placed under their authority.

92. Before a final determination is made upon the general question, whether the gunges, bazars, sayer and hauts, should be separated from the jurisdictions of the zemindars, I would propose some queries to the collectors, as to rights. In the meantime the settlement may be made, with the proprietors of the soil, agreeable to the terms of the second resolution, in order to afford the collectors due means of obtaining more particular information into the nature of the sayer generally; or the gunges and bazars only, may be excluded, and the hauts and sayer be included in the zemindary assessment, under a claim binding the proprietors to submit to such regulations and limitations regarding them, as may be hereafter determined upon. With the information required, before us, we can then determine, whether abuses in the sayer collections are such as cannot be remedied without a declared violation of proprietary right supposing it to exist; and whether they are of such importance to the welfare of the community as to justify an infringement of that right, at a period when we profess to confirm and strengthen the rights of the zemindars.

93. There is also a specific case with respect to gunges and bazars, which merits attention; that is, where a proprietor, not the zemindar, has purchased them, and holds them and no other land. To dispossess him, would be esteemed a very great hardship, since, in other words, it is to take away his whole property from him; and this, in Bengal would excite much much clamour and discontent in the proprietors; nor do I see, in this case, how justice can be done to the proprietor, without an invasion of system, that is, by the government paying him an equivalent for his property and profits, instead of demanding the revenue from him.

94. With respect to Ramghur, the regulation must be special; and I shall state what I have to say upon that district separately.

Resolution Vth.—THAT the jumma of each zemindary being assessed, the amount thereof shall be apportioned upon the different villages in it, if possible, previous to the conclusion of the sudder jumma, either by the zemindar, who is to be required to make the distribution, or collector; or, subsequent thereto, under a clause binding each zemindar to deliver in an account of the assessment on the villages apportioned to the sudder jumma, within three months from the signature of his caboolat; and that it be notified to the zemindars, that a portion of their estates will be sequestered, and sold, to make good any deficiency of the revenue paid by them; and if the government should think proper to alienate the land sold at the amount of the assessment, as delivered by them, they shall not receive any remission, on account of the inaccuracy of their statement.

95. No objection is made to the principle of this resolution; but the collector of Sarun states various reasons why the distribution of the village assessment ought to be performed by the collector, and not by the zemindar. They may all be reduced to this; that with a view to defraud the government, or individuals, the proprietors or possessors of villages will rate them unequally.

96. The different cases which he states are possible; but intentional fraud, when proved, may be punished legally by fine and damages. He supposes a zemindar to have mortgaged a certain number of his villages, and that to prevent the mortgagee obtaining possession, he will overvalue the produce; as the possession of the land will entail an annual loss upon the mortgagee, he will renounce his claim rather than prosecute it. He reverses the case, by supposing the mortgagee in possession; but this can only be possible, where the mortgagee is a principal zemindar possessing many other villages.

97. A general regulation may be formed to correct this practice; but I would leave it to the collectors to distribute the assessment, or demand from the zemindars the distribution, as he may think proper, adopting, in the latter case, such corrections as from information he may be enabled to make.

98. The term of three months I consider too short for preparing this record, in whatever manner it be done, and would extend it at least to the first year of the lease.

Resolution VIth.—THAT if there are villages, of which there are no proprietors, the settlement of them be made with a farmer, for the term of ten years.

99. Upon this resolution, the following queries have been made:—

1. The collector of Behar requires information, whether the farmer's son or heir is to succeed to the lease.—2. The collector of Shahabad states the following questions:—

First, Whether villages, of which there are no proprietors, shall all be let out to one farmer, or in different lots, to different teekadars. Secondly, whether the farmers or teekadars of such villages are to receive a similar assurance to that given to zemindars, of a Mokurery at the end of ten years, or not.

100. The decision of the first query should be left open, I think, to the discretion of government. Where the heirs are capable, I see no objection to confirming them in possession, during the remainder of the lease, if they are willing to undertake it: where they are minors, or females, or where the succession to the property of the deceased farmer is disputed by many, the remainder of the lease may be better disposed of. In a contingency of this nature, the convention ought to be reciprocal between the parties concerned in it. To the queries proposed by the collector of Shahabad, I think the following answer should be given:—

101. That the villages be not all made over to one farmer, but disposed of in lease to several, according to their value and situation, and the character and responsibility of the farmer.

102. To the second, that a promise of Mokurery at the end of the lease be not made, for the reasons which I have assigned under the former resolution, as well as on the suggestion of the board of revenue.

103. It is unnecessary to repeat the arguments of the collector of Bauglepoore, which have been before noticed and replied to.

Resolution VIIth.—That the sudder kistbundy be so regulated, as to afford the zemindars all possible convenience in the discharge of their rents, with a due regard to the security of government; and that the collector report whether any and what inconvenience would ensue, from extending the period of the sudder kistbundy to two months instead of one.

104. I shall quote the observation of the board of revenue, on the remark made by the collector of Behar on this resolution: that it appears to apply only to the first part of the resolution, the regulation of the sudder kistbundy, according to the convenience of the renters.

105. I am

Mr. Shore's and Lord Cornwallis's Minutes, of September 1789; on Permanent Settlement of Lands.

Mr. Shore's Minute, 18 Sep. 1789.

105. I am decidedly of opinion, that the kistbundly ought to be monthly; and that the reasons stated against the extension of it, are solid; the alteration would be attended with risk, which prudence ought to avoid.

Resolution VIIIth.—That, as the number of persons paying revenue immediately to government, may, in consequence of forming a settlement with the zemindars, be greatly increased, the collector report if it will be necessary and advisable to appoint tehsildars to receive the revenue, from a certain number of the landholders; and whether any and what additional expense will be required on this account.

106. My remarks upon this, have been already detailed. With respect to the expense, I see no reason to apprehend that the establishment of teshildars, will diminish the resources either in Shahabad or Behar. In the districts of Tirhoot and Sarun, where the increase of charges are stated enormously high, we shall be better enabled to judge, when some progress is made in the settlement, as this will be progressive; the expense will of course keep with it.

Resolution Xth.—That unless any objections, arising from the insufficiency of the number of Sicca rupees in circulation, should occur, all engagements between government and the zemindars, talookdars, and farmers, be made in Sicca rupees, and that no other species of rupees be received in payment of the revenue; and, if any such objections should occur, that the collectors be required to detail them, and to state their opinion with as much accuracy as they may be able, as to the additional number of Sicca rupees which it would be necessary to introduce into the circulation of their respective districts, to enable the zemindars, talookdars, and farmers, to pay their revenues in that specie.

107. The stated insufficiency of the Sicca rupees in circulation, is an insuperable obstacle to the immediate declaration of this specie alone, being the legal tender of payment; yet the collectors of Shahabad and Behar do not urge this objection.

108. The information given in the last part of this proposition, is not so ample as I could wish: indeed, it may be presumed of difficult attainment. The following, is all that I can collect upon it.

109. In Tirhoot, the Sonaut rupees with respect to Sicca, are stated in the proportion of two to one.

110. In Purneah, the Sicca rupees are said to make no part of the actual circulation, and never amount to a considerable quantity: that, to carry the resolution into effect, the currency must be changed, and a number of Sicca rupees, equal to the whole circulation, be introduced. This is estimated at twenty lacks of rupees. In Sircar Sarun the quantity of siccas required for the circulation, is stated at one year's produce.

111. The objections to the resolution, and the grounds on which they stand, are as follows:

That the ryots pay what they receive for the produce of their goods, which are not siccas; the zemindars, what they collect from them by impelling the zemindars to pay siccas. The compulsion extends through the under-renters to the ryots, upon whom the weight of the shroffage ultimately falls.

112. The resolution would afford an opportunity for the greatest impositions upon the ryots.

113. But although there are objections to compelling the zemindars and renters to make good their payments in Sicca rupees, I agree with the board of revenue, in the propriety of the resolution,—

That all engagements between government and the zemindars and talookdars should be in Sicca rupees; and that further, a clause should be inserted, obliging them to pay the same species of rupees to the collectors, as they receive from their under-tenants.

114. This clause has a reference to the future regulation of the coinage, when, in consequence of the proposed coinage, Sicca rupees become more in quantity. The zemindars and talookdars, without the clause, may protract the progress of the coinage, by an intermediate exchange of the sorts which they received for the Sicca species.

115. I agree with the board of revenue in the propriety of establishing printed forms of pottahs, as suggested by the collector of Behar; but they cannot, I think, be prepared in time, for the new settlement. I wish also to know, if the proposition is meant to extend to the pottahs given by the zemindars to their under-tenants.

116. The collector of Shahabad states also an important query—whether, after the conclusion of the settlement, the zemindars are to be allowed to borrow money, on the credit of their estates; or to dispose, by sale or otherwise, of such estates or any parts thereof, registering such sales or transfers in the collector's cutcherry, for the purpose of ascertaining from whom the revenue of government is demandable.

117. The collector of Behar, in an address to the board of revenue, of the 30th July 1788, which was submitted to the decision of this board, proposed an alteration of the 53^d and 56th Articles of the Revenue Regulations, the former of which, prohibits the conferring of any grants of lands, or authorizing any alienations, sale, mortgage, or other transfer of landed property, without the express sanction of the board of revenue; and the latter, prohibits the sale of lands belonging to any zemindar or other proprietor, without the previous and express press sanction of the board of revenue, which could not be given, without that of the supreme board.

118. I have always proceeded with caution, in recommending alterations of the public regulations. The restriction conveyed in the 53^d article existed long before the date of the regulations referred to, and was suggested originally, I believe, with a view to prevent collusive transfers, and particularly to guard against the influence of the public officers over the zemindars.

119. As it now stands with respect to Behar, considering the great distance of that province from the seat of government, it must operate virtually to the prohibition of all transfers, to the depreciation of real property, and the evident inconvenience and distress of the proprietors, in many cases.

120. I would therefore propose the revocation of the 53^d Regulation with respect to Behar, and that the question of the collector of Shahabad should be answered in the affirmative. A new regulation must of course be substituted in lieu of that annulled, with the necessary cautions and provisions. It is not absolutely necessary that it should form a part of the present instructions. The notification of the permission will be at present sufficient for the renters.

121. With respect to the 56th Regulation, it cannot be rescinded, without a deviation from the orders of the court of directors; nor would I, independent of this, recommend it. The power of distraining, may be delegated to the collectors; this, will be sufficient for them, and the sale be postponed, for the orders of the supreme board, as at present.

122. The resolutions of this board, on the 13th July, in reply to the query stated by the collector of Shahabad in the affirmative, whether the settlement is to be made with the Rajah Bickernajet Sing for his own zemindary, uniting his malikana villages to the khalsa lands, as before the allowance of malikana took place.

123. But the same resolutions direct, that no settlement be made with him, until he shall have discharged the balances due from him, and the claims upon his malikana lands. It becomes a question, therefore, in case the rajah should be unable to make good his arrears, whether the lease of his own zemindary shall be granted for the period of ten years, as this would exclude him from the possession during that time. I think it would be more equitable to limit the period of the leases in this instance, to three years, by which time, the objects of this arrangement may be completed, and the rajah be then restored.

124. In all cases where the zemindars have resigned the management of their lands, retaining possession of the malikana or tythe, it should I think, be established as a general rule, that the whole be re-annexed, and that they be required to enter into engagements for the whole zemindary, including the malikana. The terms of the lease will, in this case, be regulated by the definition of the terms of the third resolution: If they decline, the settlement should be made with others, and the zemindar receive his malikana, in money.

125. All grants of malikana confirmed by the supreme authority, are of course to be excepted from this rule, and should be reported; and we must establish provisions for cases in which the malikana, after authorized separation, may have been mortgaged or sold.

R A M G H U R.

126. I have separated the consideration of Ramghur from the other parts of Behar, as the circumstances of it, are in some respects peculiar to it.

127. It does not appear that the collector makes any general objections to the proposed plan of settlement; but he states some queries and remarks relating to particular districts, which are now to be considered.

128. Currekdeah and Chakye:—The questions regarding these pergunnahs, are two. Whether the objections made by the collector to committing these districts to the charge of the zemindars, are to be deemed valid, or not.

Whether Mokurrery pottahs, which have been granted in these districts by former collectors, are to be held valid; if so, and it should be decided that the zemindars are to have charge of their lands, from what funds are they to keep up an establishment for the collection of their revenues and police of their country, as they will have no right to collect more than the amount of those pottahs.

129. The state of these pergunnahs, is thus described: That they are held by a number of talookdars and gnatwars, all of whom have separate pottahs. The revenue which they now pay has continued so long without alteration, that each man considers his land held at a Mokurrery tenure. The pottahs have continued, from year to year.

130. He gives his firm opinion, that the only way to preserve these two places, in their present quiet state, which is of such great consequence to the low countries, is to confirm the Mokurrery pottahs. That the Rajah of Currekdeah is ignorant, incapable of business, involved in his circumstances, and has no man to manage for him. That the zemindars are, at Chokye declined holding their lands, some years ago; that the two brothers zemindars were variance with each other; and that the talookdars and gnatwars, if the zemindars were restored, would fly the country from their oppressions.

Mr. Shore's and Lord Cornwallis's Minutes, of September 1789; on Permanent Settlement of Lands.

Mr. Shore's Minute, 18 Sep. 1789

131. From this description, it would seem that the object of a permanent settlement with the actual proprietors of the soil, has been already accomplished in these two districts; yet it also appears, by the account settlement, that a small increase was levied upon them last year, and the collector himself, proposed an addition of 10 per cent. in opposition to the idea of a mokurrery tenure.

132. The collector, upon a presumption that the zemindars of these districts, will not be reinstated in the possession of their lands, proposes that the Nankar villages should be appropriated, as at present, to the maintenance of the Currickdeah Rajah, which in that case, would be proper; and further, that the allowance now made to the Chakye zemindars by the Company, may be struck off, and the Mokurredars be obliged to pay their malikana in lieu thereof, which they can very well afford to do.

133. To this last proposition, there is an objection on the face of it, that it is an enhancement of rents already fixed: before it is adopted, the collector should be called upon to reply to this objection, and if such a measure would not be considered by the puttahdars as an infringement of the rights conferred to them by government.

PALAMOW.

134. The settlement of this district is now made in the name of the young rajah, but the whole responsibility rests with his relations and Dewan Sheopershaud Sing. The question regarding it is, whether the rajah's name should be left out of the engagements for ten years. The collector recommends the confirmation of the present mode.

135. The board will observe, that it is rather a deviation in form than in principle, from the resolution excluding minor and female zemindars. In all proceedings regarding the Ramghur districts, caution should be observed; and I would recommend the confirmation of the present system. The manager, unless peculiar objections occur to the measure, should be directed to execute the prescriptions on the fifth resolution for the distribution of the sudder assessment.

NAGPORE.

135. For the reasons and explanations assigned by the collector, in his letter of June the 20th, 1789, I concur in opinion with him, that the regulations should not extend to this district.

136. To save the trouble of reference, I subjoin a quotation from the letter:

"The amount received from this pergunnah, being more in the nature of a tribute, than a revenue proportioned to the produce of the soil, the apportioning the present jumma on the village, will be attended with disadvantage to the Company, in case any of them should be hereafter sold at the assessed rate for a balance, because it is well known the country yields more than is paid by the rajah, consequently his villages must be much under-rated, to bring them within the sum he now pays. I am apprehensive the extending these regulations to this district, will be attended with very bad consequences; and that it will be better if continued on the footing, it now is. For the people, who are jealous and uncivilized, may suppose the taking an account of their villages, and sending a person to collect the sayer duties, is a prelude to some more serious innovations; and may therefore be induced to make a resistance in the first instance, by which a very heavy expense may be incurred, but no advantage reaped."

137. The explanation given by the collector of the sayer duties, deserves attention: he recommends that they be made independent of the zemindar, as it will be of great ease to the merchants.

138. For the collection of these duties he encloses a plan, the principle of which is, that the sayer duties be only levied upon the first sale of the goods, observing upon it, that the amount of them will fall off considerably at first, but that this will be amply made up, when the trade is set free from the various impositions and impediments to which it is now subject.

139. Upon a supposition that this plan be not adopted, he recommends that a darogah be appointed to remain at Chitra, and Naibs to each pergunnah, who will establish chokies at the several gauts, and collect on the goods, agreeable to the present rate, on their entering the country; with this difference only, that goods having paid duty at one gaut, shall not be subject to any other demand in the districts under him: he further observes, that there are scarcely any established gunges in the country, notwithstanding its great extent; but three articles of the proposed regulations have an immediate reference to the duties collected at the gunges on the sale of goods.

140. From this explanation it clearly appears, that great part of the sayer is in fact a rhadary duty, collected upon goods passing and repassing, which, by the public regulations, ought long ago to have ceased. The situation of Ramghur may perhaps have prevented the introduction of them there.

141. Considering this, and that the Company have thought proper to abolish all provincial duties, there cannot, I think, exist a doubt of the propriety of ordering the abolition of all such as fall within this description, and that of course, all chokies, as far as they are established for the purpose of collecting duties, should be withdrawn from the gauts. Nothing seems more likely to contribute to the improvement of Ramghur than to frustrate the intercourse between that district and others, whether belonging to the Company or not. The abolition of the duties will of course occasion a diminution of the public revenue; but the object is of sufficient importance to warrant it. Ramghur, from its situation, and the nature of the soil, rocky and unprofitable, can never be brought into a more populous or cultivated state, unless great encouragement to new inhabitants be held out; great part of the district is mountainous, and overrun with impenetrable woods.

Mr. Shore's and Lord Cornwallis's Minutes, of September 1789; on Permanent Settlement of Lands.

Mr. Shore's Minute, 18 Sep. 1789.

142. If the board concur with me in this determination, the question is then reduced to the collection of duties on the sales of goods at the gunges, bazars, and gauts; and the fourth resolution, with the subsidiary explanations and queries, may be applied to the districts comprising the collectorship of Ramghur.

143. The objections stated to the declaration of the Sicca rupees, as the only legal tenders, are sufficient to prevent the publication of it; and although the collector rather recommends the protraction of the kists to two months, as a relief to the zemindars, I do not think the general rule should be modified to this particular instance.

144. The entire rental of the districts under the Ramghur collectorship, which are regulated, according to the Behar year, amounts to Rs 89,220. 10. 6. 2 only; and, exclusive of the districts already adverted to, there are two only remaining, Ramghur and Kendy. The resolutions regarding this district, if the observations which I have made should be approved, must be special; and I think it must become an exception to the general plan proposed for Behar.

145. I do not observe, in the correspondence of the collector, any specific rules for the security of the ryots. I well know the difficulty of making them, but some must be established. The great point required is, to determine what is and what is not oppression, that justice may be impartially administered, according to fixed rules. In Behar the variations in the demands upon the ryots, are not so great as in Bengal; the system of dividing the produce affords a clear and definite rule, whenever that prevails; and the regulations need not be so minute, as those which I proposed for Bengal.

146. I have taken the liberty to prepare, for the consideration and determination of the board, the propositions which result from the preceding considerations, in the form of resolutions, together with the draft of a letter to the board of revenue upon the subject of the settlement. This mode will facilitate decision, which should be made with as little delay as possible, as the Fusully year is nearly expired: But delay is of small comparative importance to the propriety of the resolutions. I have neither noticed Midnapore nor the Salt Districts; but shall lose no time in submitting to the board my sentiments upon them.

147. It will however be proper to mention in this place, a proposition of the collector of Tirhoot, for resuming the grant of dustoorat to the rajah of that district, and for making him an allowance of 12,000 rupees annually, in compensation for this resumption. The dustoorat, as the collector informs us, was originally granted by Aliverdi Khan, and subsequently confirmed by Cossim Ally; was resumed by this government in 1178, and again restored in 1185;—during the resumption, for seven years, an allowance of 12,000 rupees was given to the rajah in lieu of the dustoorat; and I find by the public accounts, that the annual collections were from 12,000 to 14,500 rupees. The dustoorat comprehends a variety of articles, of which the following is an enumeration, for the Fussily year 1187, taken from an account obtained by me at Patna, from the rajah.

1. Sudderee	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	4,629
2. Erk Anuce	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	14,152
3. Pergunnatee	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	4,000
4. Dustoor Mohurer	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	750
5. Dustoor Mokuddum	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	4,168
6. Malikana	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	10,066
7. Dustoors Tufkao	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	1,507
8. Mokurrery	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	5,059
9. Serf	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	-	4,294

Total without fractions -- Rs 48,628

If Mr. Bathurst's proposal for resuming this allowance be approved, the Company will gain the difference between the above sum, and the allowance which may be granted to him in compensation. From the great disproportion between the actual amount of the dustoorat, and that collected under this head, when it was resumed by government, I am inclined to believe that many additional articles have been annexed to it. Those stated are, I understand, collected indiscriminately from all the pergunnahs under the rajah's jurisdiction, and even from the jaghiredars: whether they are oppressive, or not, can only be determined by knowing the amount of the entire assessment upon those who pay them. The terms of the grant, as far as they relate to the question of resumption, are, "on condition of discharging the revenue and supporting the interest of government." The collector thus interprets the original, and properly, I think; and is of opinion that the terms are conditional, and afford a ground for resuming the dustoorat, and granting a compensation in lieu thereof. But the terms are, I think, too general, to authorize this conclusion. Though I strongly object to the principle and nature of such grants; yet considering the mode in which that in question, as being made, and subsequently confirmed, as well as the increase levied in the last fourteen years from Tirhoot, stated by the collector at 86,867 rupees, I have since doubts of the propriety of adopting the proposition for the resumption of the dustoorat,—the malekana forms a part of it. I would, in the first instance, propose obtaining further information upon this subject; and have accordingly formed resolutions for the purpose, which will explain, without repeating them here, the nature of the information required.

148. Some of the proposed resolutions have been suggested by the letters from the collectors, the subject of which is not particularly adverted to, in this minute. The tendency of

of them will be obvious without a particular explanation; and I have annexed such of the Bengal propositions, as appeared to me applicable.

140. In discussing general regulations, of importance to the welfare of the community, and the interests of the company, I think it a duty to state all the material objections which occur, that I may neither be deceived myself, nor mislead the judgment of those who depend upon me, for information. By this mode, the merit of new plans may be fairly estimated; many difficulties, by being foreseen, are obviated; and the principles of acting, being avowed and displayed, the errors or advantages flowing from them may be discriminated, and success or failure be traced to the principles themselves, or in the conduct of the system established.

150. That objections still exist to the proposed plan of settlement, is as evident, as that none could be adopted free from objections. They are, however, such as may be overcome, by a due exertion of diligence and understanding.

151. These reasons, will apologize to the board for a detail which, to them, in many instances, may be deemed superfluous. I may further add, it is calculated to afford the Court of directors that information which they have required.

18th September 1789.

PROPOSED RESOLUTIONS.

THE Governor General in Council, having taken into mature consideration, the address of the Board of Revenue accompanying the replies of the collector of Behar to the requisitions of the 20th May last, now recorded, together with the Minute of Mr. Shore upon this subject, proceeds to pass his final determination upon the settlement of the Behar district for a period of ten years, to commence with the ensuing Fussily year 1197.

The Resolutions of the 20th May last, containing the Plan of Settlement, the Board will consider them in the form then recorded, and revoke, confirm, or alter them, with such additions and amendments as are suggested by the observations upon them, now under consideration.

RESOLVED, therefore, as follows:

That the First RESOLUTION be confirmed, with the following addition and explanations:

First,—That if from want of sufficient materials or information, or on account of other impediments, the collectors of Behar should not be able to complete the settlement of all the districts under their charge, agreeable to the prescribed plan, within the period of the Fussily year 1197, the settlement of the districts wherein it cannot be adopted, be made for one year only, according to the principles laid down in the existing regulations of the 25th April 1788.

Second,—That in the execution of the fundamental resolution, the collectors proceed with due caution and information, it being expected of them that they be able to furnish, when called upon, clear and satisfactory explanations upon their proceedings, particularly in the article of the amount of the jumma.

Third,—That where more proprietors than one possess an undivided estate, the settlement be made with them jointly, and they be left to determine the mode of management amongst themselves, with an option, in case of disagreement, to obtain a division of their lands at their own expense, and a proportional allotment of the revenue assessed thereon; the determination of the majority of the proprietors, or of the majority of those present, in case of the absence of any, to be binding on the remainder, as to the choice of a manager.

Fourth,—That where a portion of land stands in the joint names of several proprietors, or of one for many, but each proprietor has his separate share in his own possession and management, or in that of an agent for him, the settlement be made for each share, with the person in possession, and his lands be held exclusively responsible for the revenue assessed upon it.

Fifth,—In case of mortgages, if the mortgagee has obtained possession of the land, the settlement is to be made with him, and the proprietor to be declared entitled to succeed to his engagements on recovering possession, either by discharge of his obligation, or by the decision of a court of justice. If the mortgagee has not possession, the settlement is to be made with the proprietor in possession, and the mortgagee in like manner succeed to the lease, in case of possession being subsequently adjudged to him.

Sixth,—If after due enquiries, and a reference to the Mofussil records, the proprietors of any lands cannot be ascertained, the lands pro tempore to be held khas; and the same mode is to be adopted with regard to absentees. In both cases, an advertisement to be issued, requiring the proprietors or absentees to attend within a period of six months; and if they should not be forthcoming at the expiration of that period, a settlement to be made with a farmer for ten years, allowing a preference to the zemindar nearest in situation, or his acquiescence to the jumma, and terms prescribed by the collector.

Seventh,—That where the property of the lands is disputed, the settlement be made with the proprietor in possession, under an express declaration, that he is nevertheless liable to the claims upon the estate, which is transferrable to any other to whom the property may be subsequently subsequently adjudged. If any case should occur, where none of the claimants shall have been previously in possession, they are to be allowed to appoint a manager, until their claims shall have been determined in the dewanny adaulut; but if they should not agree to a manager, that the lands be held khas, and the surplus produce, after discharging the revenue, be kept in deposit until the right of property be adjudged.

Eighth,—That where disputes exist concerning the boundaries of lands, they be left to be adjusted in the dewanny adaulut, and the settlement be made in the meantime, for the lands in possession of the disputing parties respectively.

Ninth,—That if any petty zemindars be desirous of continuing to pay their revenues through a principal zemindar, as at present, in preference to the collector, or tehsildar on his part, they be permitted to do so, and the settlement for their lands is to be made accordingly with such principal zemindar; but that in all such cases, a written declaration must be taken from the petty zemindars, setting forth their request, with the reasons thereof; and the collectors are to be particularly enjoined to be satisfied that such declarations are voluntary.

Ninth.—That it be declared optional with all proprietors to engage or not for the revenue of their lands; and that, in the event of their declining, from objections to the amount of the jumma, the collectors be directed to hold the lands khas, reporting the circumstance to the board of revenue, with the grounds on which they have fixed the amount of the jumma, that the board may confirm the sum, or direct such further inquiry into the objections of the zemindars, as they may think proper. In the event of the jumma being confirmed, the collectors are to require the zemindars to enter into engagements for it, and, upon their declining, are to let the lands in farm for the period of ten years.

Special, for BAUGLEPORE.

That the settlement be not made with the muskoory talookdars of Bauglepoore, described by the collector to be situated within the jurisdiction of the zemindars, and paying their rents to them, but with the zemindars of such districts, as heretofore.

The settlement having been concluded with the zemindar, he shall be required to enter into engagements with talookdars situated within his zemindary, and paying their rents to him, for the same period as his own lease, not liable to any increase or decrease during the term of it. And the zemindar is to be required to deliver, within three months after the conclusion of his own settlement, to the collector, a record of the settlement entered into between him and the talookdars, specifying their names, their talooks, and the jumma payable by each.

In order to prevent undue exactions upon the talookdars in the predicament described, the following rules are to be attended to:—

That no zemindar be authorized to demand any increase from the talookdars under his jurisdiction, upon the jumma of the elapsed year 1196, although he should himself be subject to the payment of an increase in the jumma of the present year, except upon proof to the collector that he is entitled so to do, either by the special custom of his district, or by the conditions under which the talookdar holds his tenure, or that the talookdar, by receiving abatements from his jumma, has subjected himself to a demand for this increase, and that the lands are capable of affording it.

If in any instance, it be proved that a zemindar exacts more from a talookdar than he has a right to do by the terms of the settlement between them, or should be guilty of oppression towards him, the talook shall be separated from his jurisdiction, and the rents thereof in future, be paid to the officers of government.

PURNEAH, special.

That, although the preceding resolutions must be understood as extending to Purneah, Tirhoot, and Shawabad, the board, nevertheless, deem it necessary to take notice of some propositions from the collectors of these districts, in order to prevent any misconstruction of their orders.

First, with regard to Dhurrumpore,—That although the board are sensible of the inconveniences stated by the collector, with regard to the management of this district, they cannot depart from the fundamental resolution, so far as to authorize a settlement to be made with farmers instead of with a zemindar.

That, to correct the stated evils as far as possible, the collector be authorized, in case the proposition should appear to him eligible, to appoint a sezawal at Dhurrumpore, for the general purpose of controlling the conduct of the zemindary agent, and of protecting the ryots against arbitrary demands; and to report all such circumstances relating to their conduct, as may be requisite for his information. The sezawal is not to interfere either in making the settlement, or in collecting it from the Mofussil farmers or ryots, or in any matters of adawlut jurisdiction; but the collector may, if he should think it proper, empower him to receive the revenues when collected from the zemindary agents, and to take care that the stipulations of government are fulfilled previous to the dispatch of any part of the rents to the zemindar of Tirhoot.

With respect to revenue complaints, the sezawal may be authorized to hear them, and decide upon them; and the collector will prescribe such rules for his conduct, in this respect, as he may deem necessary.

In concluding the settlement with the zemindar, considering the capacity of the district, the board expect that a provision be made for the charges of the sezawal, without burthensing government with the expense of his salary and establishment;

Ordered, That the board of revenue, having obtained the necessary information, give their opinion on the propriety of separating the district of Dhurumpore from the collectorship of Purneah, and of annexing it to that of Tirhoot.

NATPORE and GORARIE.

Under the declaration for the exclusion of the zemindar, contained in the ninth resolution, and the authority delegated to the collector in consequence thereof, it appears to the board that the evils resulting from the influence of the zemindar may be obviated, and corrected, without a formal annihilation of her proprietary rights. Her authority over the districts in question, in consequence of the resolution, is entirely to cease.

TIRHOOT, special.

On the plan of settlement proposed by the collector of Tirhoot, the board deem the following observations necessary for his information:

That, by the general resolutions prescribed for his guidance, a settlement is to be made with Mahdoo Sing, for his milkecut lands only, and with the other zemindars and talookdars, for their lands.

That the settlement be made with the rajah, independent of the dustoorat, the board reserving their final resolutions upon the collector's proposition for resuming it, until the receipt of the information now required from him.

First,—The component articles of the dustoorat, and an explanation in what manner the collections on this account are made, and whether any, and what articles have been added to it, since the restitution in 1185.

Secondly,—That the collector give his opinion, whether he deems any of the articles composing it oppressive.

That the collector be authorized to take into his own charge, the collection of the dustoorat, in those pergunnahs which are not included in the milkecut of Rajah Mahdoo Sing, keeping the amount in deposit; and with respect to the dustoorat in his own milkecut, that the rajah be authorized to collect it, until a determination upon it be made, under an obligation to account for the money so collected, if required to do it, and to abide the decision of government:—that the collector immediately require from the rajah, a particular account of his collections on account, of dustoorat, during the two last years; and that to enable him to compare and verify the above account when obtained,—Ordered.

That the accountant of the revenue department do furnish the collector of Tirhoot with copies of the accounts in his office, regarding the dustoorat.

Resolved further, That the collector of Tirhoot be authorized to resume unauthorized Mokurreries, as well as lands alienated without authority, as far as they are resumable by the general regulation for the Bazee Zemin lands; and to require from the zemindar, or zemindars of Tirhoot, a proportionable consideration in the amount of their respective assessments, in consequence of such resumption, which will become a part of the jumma payable by them. With respect to lands farmed to favourites and relations at a reduced jumma, the collector will equalize the assessment as far as possible; so that the whole may be established upon a general footing of equality. The application of this consideration, will of course affect the terms of the settlement with Mahdoo Sing, as well as with the other proprietors with whom engagements are to be concluded.

SHAHABAD.

That the settlement be made with Rajah Bickramjeet Sing, for his own zemindary, agreeably to the resolutions of the 13th July, after he shall have discharged the balances due from him, and the claims upon the malikana lands:—that if the rajah should be unable to make good his arrears and the claims upon the malikana, that no settlement be made with the rajah, but that the lands be let to farm for a period of three years only, including the malikana, or be retained khas, at the discretion of the collector: in either case the malikana is to be appropriated, agreeably to the resolutions of the above date, in discharge of the claims of government and creditors upon the rajah, with a reserve of a proportion thereof for his subsistence.

RAMGHUR.

That, previous to a final decision upon the propositions of the collector, regarding Chakye and Currukdeah, he be required to give information on the following points:

First,—From what period the pottahs were granted to the talookdars, gautwars, and tukadars, and by what authority:

Secondly,—As he considers these pottahs mokurrery, whether the person holding under them would not deem the demand for malikana, proposed to be given to the Chakye zemindars, an infringement of the terms of them:

Thirdly,—Whether all the persons holding these pottahs are talookdars having a property in the soil, or any of them are farmers; and whether the zemindars, before these pottahs were granted, had not milkecut lands, distinct from the talookdarry lands.

PALAMOW

PALAMOW.

That the settlement of this district do continue, as at present, in the name of the rajah, and under the responsible management of Sheopershaud Sing; that it be made for a period of ten years, the manager to be considered, as holding his office only during the pleasure of government; that is, as long as he shall conduct himself properly, or until the minor rajah shall be of age to undertake the management himself.

NAGPORE.

That the regulations do not extend to this district, but that the settlement be continued on the present footing, and be extended to a period of ten years.

RAMGHUR and KINDY.

That the settlement be made with the rajahs of these districts respectively, for a period of ten years. The jumma in all the above districts, is to continue at its present rate, with an exception of such remissions as may be allowed on account of the resolutions following, regarding the sayer.

That the kistbundy be formed, as at present, monthly. The distribution of the kists is left to the collector, who will of course take due care that the periods of demand are adapted to the seasons of produce.

That the collector, unless particular objections should occur, which he is to state, do take engagements from the proprietors and renters for sicca rupees; and that the kistbundy be drawn out in that specie. It is not meant to enforce the payment in this specie. The currency of the district is to be received at its usual batta.

With respect to the sayer,—That all rhadarry duties be abolished, and that the chokeys at the gauts, as far as they are established for the collection of duties, be withdrawn. If any of them should be necessary for other purposes, that the persons stationed at them, be strictly prohibited collecting any rhadarry duties.

With respect to the gunges, &c.—That the four general resolutions, with the subsidiary explanation, be issued to the collector for his guidance.

That the above resolutions be communicated to the collector, in lieu of the ten original resolutions, which, as far as they are not confirmed by the above, are to be considered as revoked.

2d RESOLUTION.

That the first part of this resolution only be confirmed, namely,—“That the settlement be made for a period of ten years certain,” and that the remainder be omitted.

3d RESOLUTION.

That this resolution stand confirmed, and that the collectors, in carrying it into execution, attend to the modes which have hitherto prevailed, in ascertaining the assets, and fixing the jumma between the petty land-holders and principal zemindar or farmer, adopting in all practicable instances, the following general rule:—That the average product of the land for common years, wherever ascertainable, (assuming three or four for the calculation) be taken as the basis of the settlement; and that from this, deductions be made equal to the malikana and kurcha, leaving the remainder, the jumma of government. The board rely upon the accuracy of the collectors, in the application of this rule; and they are authorized, in the event of great uncertainty, to measure the land. This uncertainty, however, is to be reported to the board of revenue, and the measurement not to be undertaken, but on the clearest grounds of the necessity of it.

That no remission upon the sudder jumma of the year 1196, be confirmed without the special sanction of the Governor General in Council.

The zemindar to let the lands of his zemindary, under the prescribed restrictions, in what manner he may think proper; but every engagement contracted by him with under-renters, shall be specific as to the amount and conditions; and all sums received by any zemindar or renter, over and above what is specified in the engagements of the persons paying the same, shall be considered as extorted, and be repaid with a penalty of double the amount.

That no person contracting with the zemindar or talookdar, or employed by him in the management of the collections, above the degree of ryots, shall be authorized to take charge thereof, without an aumulnana or written commission signed by the zemindar or talookdar, and copies of all such commissions to be deposited in the sudder outcherry of the collectorship.

4th RESOLUTION.

That this resolution, as far as regard gunges, bazars, and hants held within them, be confirmed; but that it be not confirmed, with regard to the sayer generally. With respect to these, a declaration is to be made to the proprietors and renters, that the government will prescribe such regulations, as they may deem necessary. With respect to the articles which shall hereafter compose the sayer, and the rates of collection upon them, and in the hants, the proprietors and renters are to be bound by such regulation, without claiming any deduction on account of the abolition of any articles of sayer, or reduction of the rates.

That

That the collector proceed, with as much expedition as possible, to propose a plan for the regulation of the duties and tolls at the gunges, bazars, hauts, and several articles of the sayer; specifying whether any and what part of them are included in the mahal, and what articles they propose to abolish.

The board postpone their final resolution on the following point:—whether the gunges, bazars, hauts, and sayer, shall hereafter be made over to the zemindars or not, until the report on this subject required by the board of revenue, and the information above-mentioned, shall have been received, as well as answers to the following queries, now to be made to the collectors of Behar:—

First,—Whether, in admitting the rights of the zemindars to a property in the soil, they do not consider the gunges and bazars as much a part of that property, as any part of the lands in their possession?

Second,—If they do not, to point out the ground of the distinction.

Third,—To report whether the zemindars claim the gunges and bazars as their property; and whether they make any and what objection, to the separation of them.

Fourth,—To report if there are not gunges, bazars, hauts, and sayer, in the lands held by the proprietors of altumghas, and the tenants of jagheers; and whether persons of this description, would object to the separation of the gunges, &c.; and the grounds of such objections.

Fifth,—As far as right of property is concerned, to discriminate between the rights of zemindars and those of jagheerdars and altumghadars, in case objections on this ground, should arise to the separation of the gunges, &c. from the jurisdiction of the latter.

Sixthly,—Whether the abuses now prevailing in the gunges are of such a nature, as not to be corrected by rules and limitations, without taking them under their own charge?

5th RESOLUTION.

That this resolution be adopted with the following alterations:—That the distribution being made by the zemindar, it be notified to him, that for any considerable wilful partiality in the distribution of the sudder assessment, he will be liable to a fine; and if such inequality with respect to mortgaged lands, should be practised either by the mortgagee or the mortgager, with a view to defraud the other, the person suffering, upon proof thereof, shall be entitled to recover damages in the court of adawlut, in proportion to the injury sustained.

Secondly,—That instead of three months, the first year of the lease be allowed for the preparation of the record required, which is to contain the name of the village, and, if possible, the boundaries thereof, the estimated quantity of land in it, distinguished into malguz-zaree and lakeraje.

Third,—That to correct inequality in the distribution of the sudder assessment, from the improvement of some villages, and the decline of others, a village record is to be annually delivered, within the three first months of each year.

Fourth,—It is not meant by this distribution, to require from the landholders the amount of the actual assessment upon each village, or to prevent them requiring from the village-holders a larger sum than the amount of the sudder jumma apportioned thereon, but to obtain a standard, in case of transfer of land by sale or otherwise.

6th RESOLUTION.

That this resolution be confirmed, with the following additions:—

First,—That in the event of the farmer's death previous to the expiration of his lease, it be at the discretion of government to continue the farm to his heirs or not; and be also at the option of the heirs to decline the continuance of the farm, during the remainder of the lease. No minor or female, is ever to be allowed to succeed; but it is the intention of government to confirm the lease to the heir or successor, if a proper person, upon his agreement, to take it.

Secondly,—That the villages, if numerous, shall not all be let to one farmer, but to several, according to their value and situation, and the responsibility of the farmer.

7th RESOLUTION.

That the first part of this resolution, viz. "That the sudder kistbundy be so regulated as to afford the zemindars all possible convenience in the discharge of their rents, with a due regard to the security of government," be confirmed; and that the kistbundy continue monthly as at present. The distribution of the kistbundy is left to the collectors, who will of course take due care that the periods of demand are adapted to the seasons of produce.

8th RESOLUTION.

That tehsildars be appointed to receive the revenue from a certain number of petty landholders, when judged advisable by the collectors, and that their establishment, &c. be paid by government.

That the collectors report the extent of the jurisdiction, and their necessary establishment, as their appointment may become requisite, in the course of forming the settlement; but in doing doing so, that they be directed to observe all possible economy, consistent with the security of the revenue, and the ease of the landholders.

9th RESOLUTION.

That this resolution be confirmed and adopted, with the following addition:

That zemindaries, the property of minors and females, or others excluded by this regulation, are to be considered khas, but the jumma of such lands shall be fixed in the same manner as for other lands, and the profits beyond that amount, after discharging all charges, shall belong to the proprietor; the expenses of the manager, and of his establishment, are to be paid by the collector, and to be included in his establishment, and the several regulations prescribed for the zemindars are to be executed by the managers.

10th RESOLUTION.

That so much only of this resolution, as directs that "all engagements between government and the zemindars, talookdars and farmers, be made in Sicca rupees," be confirmed; and that instead of the remainder, a clause be inserted in their engagement, obliging them to pay to government, siccas, or the same species of rupees as they receive from their under-tenants, at the established rates of batta, where any are established, or at the Bazar rates of batta, where none are established, until a sufficient number of Sicca rupees can be circulated to make these only, the legal tender. The collectors to insert in their treasury accounts, the rates of batta at which all rupees are received by them from the zemindars and renters.

That in addition to the foregoing resolution, the following also be now adopted:

That printed forms of pottahs and cabooleats be prepared, provided the same can be got ready in time, for the ensuing settlement; and that this be ascertained and reported by the board of revenue, together with their opinion, whether the measure should extend to the leases given by the zemindars to their under-tenants, requiring, if necessary, information on this point from the collector of Behar; that the board of revenue prepare the forms of such pottahs and cabooleats.

That the 53d article of the revenue regulation be rescinded; and after the conclusion of the settlement, the zemindars be allowed to borrow money on the credit of their lands, by sale or otherwise, under certain restrictions to be hereafter determined on; the notification to be now conveyed to them.

That in all practicable cases, where the zemindars have resigned, or have been deprived of the management of their lands, retaining possession of a tythe as malikana, the latter be re-annexed, and the zemindars required to engage for the revenue of their whole zemindary, including, agreeably to the directions in the third resolution, the malikana in money, under the following restrictions:

That where the malikana lands have been sold, or where they have been given possession to a mortgagee, they be not resumed, and reannexed to the jumma, and that no grants for malikana lands be deemed valid, excepting such as may have been made or confirmed by the supreme authority of the country, that is, the Governor General in Council for the time being.

That if any material injury should, in the opinion of the collector, occur to any individual by the above resolution, regarding the malikana, they be directed to report them to the board of revenue.

That whereas from the ignorance, inattention, and oppressions of the zemindars, the greatest abuses have been practised in the collection, and the ryots have been exposed to exactions; the following rules are now prescribed to all zemindars, talookdars, and persons entrusted with the revenues, for their immediate direction and guidance.

That the rents to be paid by the ryots, by whatever rule or custom they may be demanded, shall be specific as to their amount. If by a pottah containing the assul and abwab, the amount of both shall be inserted in it, and the ryot shall not be bound to pay any thing beyond the amount specified, on account of kircha, salamy or any other article.

If by a ticka pottah, the whole amount payable by the ryot, is to be inserted in it. If by any rule or custom, such as the payments of the last and preceding year, the rate of the village pergunnah or any other place, an account is to be drawn out in the beginning of the year, shewing what the ryots are to pay by such rule or rate, and a copy of it be given to them. Where the rents are adjusted upon a measurement of the lands after cultivation, the rates and terms of payment shall be expressed in the pottah.

If by any established and recorded jumabundy, that is to be the rule for demanding the rents.—If the rents are paid in kind, the proportion which the ryot is to pay, shall be specified either in account or written agreement.

In every mofussil cutcherry, the nirkbundy or rates of nirkdee land, shall be publicly recorded, and the zemindar or renter is answerable for enforcing the regulation, under a penalty of being fined for neglect, at the discretion of government.

That a list of the putwarries of the villages, be deposited in the sudder cutcherry of the collectorship, and in the cutcherry of the pergunnah. No farmer or zemindar shall be allowed to remove a putwarree, without the permission of the collector.

No renter shall be empowered to grant pottahs beyond the period of his lease, and no agent to grant them without authority from the zemindar or talookdar, when in possession of the lands, or of the manager, when the zemindar and talookdar are excluded.

472 All existing leases to under-renters and ryots, to remain in force to the period of their expiration, unless proved to have been obtained by collusion, or from persons not authorized to grant the same.

Every collector, renter, or receiver of the rents, throughout every gradation, from the zemindar to the ryot, shall be compelled to give receipts for all sums received by them, and a receipt in full, on the complete discharge of every obligation; and any person complaining that a receipt has been refused him, upon establishing the charge, shall be entitled to double the amount paid by him, as damages from the person who received it.

That in case any village or district should be affected by inundation, or other calamity, causing the ryots to desert, it shall not be lawful for any zemindar, or renter, or collector of the rents, to demand the rents of the ryots who are fled, from those which remain.

That the zemindar or renter be not authorized to impose any abwab or mothote, on any pretence whatever, upon the ryots; and every exaction of this nature to be punished by a penalty, equal to three times the amount imposed.

That no zemindar or farmer be allowed to contract any engagement, or authorize any act, contrary to the letter and meaning of these regulations.

The malicannah of excluded zemindars, is to be settled at 10 per cent. upon the amount of the sudder jumma of their lands.

That it be notified to the zemindars, and become an express condition of the engagements of rent-free lands, not at present constituting any part of the jumma of their zemindaries, shall be made for the benefit of government; and the amount thereof, or such proportion thereof, as the government may determine, shall become an addition to their jumma. The government will determine the mode by which an investigation of the rent-free land shall take place.

That no grants of bazee zameen, or lakkeraje land, under any denomination whatever, be made by any zemindar or talookdar, under a penalty that the lands so given be confiscated to government; and that the grantee possessing the same, be compelled to pay as fine the rents thereof, during the period of their alienation. Any farmer, sezawul, or other person making such grants, without the authority of government, shall be subject to a fine of rupees per begah, and the grantee shall be liable to the fine above-mentioned.

The Governor General delivers in the following Minute:

THE great ability displayed in Mr. Shore's Minute, which introduced the propositions for the settlement; the uncommon knowledge which he has manifested of every part of the revenue system of this country; the liberality and fairness of his arguments, and clearness of his style; give me an opportunity, which my personal esteem and regard for him, and the obligation I owe him as a public man, for his powerful assistance in every branch of the business of this government, must ever render peculiarly gratifying to me, of recording my highest respect for his talents, my warmest sense of his public-spirited principles, which, in an impaired state of health, could alone have supported him in executing a work of such extraordinary labour; and, lastly, my general approbation of the greatest part of his plan.

I am confident, however, that Mr. Shore, from his natural candour, as well as the public at large, will readily admit, that deeply interested as I must feel myself, in the future prosperity of this country, it would be unjustifiable in me to take any step of real importance, upon the suggestion even of the most capable adviser, without seriously weighing it in my own mind, and endeavouring to reconcile the propriety of it to my own conviction.

Impressed with these sentiments, I am called upon by a sense of indispensable duty to declare, that I cannot bring myself to agree with Mr. Shore, in the alteration which he now proposes to make in the 2^d Resolution, of leaving out the notification to the landholders, that if the settlements shall be approved by the court of directors, it will become permanent, and no further alteration of the jumma take place at the expiration of the ten years.

When the court of directors determined to retain in their own hands the right of confirming or annulling the settlement at the expiration of a given term, they undoubtedly acted with becoming wisdom and caution.

The power of making a perpetual and irrevocable settlement of a great empire, without being subject to the revision of the controlling authority at home, would, in my opinion, have been too great to delegate to any distant government. I cannot, however, believe that they would have held out the flattering hopes of a permanent settlement, which alone, in my judgment, can make the country flourish, and secure happiness to the body of inhabitants, unless they had been predetermined to confirm the perpetuity, if they found that their servants here had not failed in their duty, or betrayed the important trust that had been reposed in them. Nothing, I am persuaded, but our expressing doubts and fears can make them hesitate; and as I have a clear conviction in my own mind of the utility of the system, I shall think it a duty I owe to them, to my country, and to humanity, to recommend it most earnestly to the court of directors, to lose no time in declaring the permanency of the settlement, provided they discover no material objection or error; and not to postpone for ten years the commencement of the prosperity and solid improvement of the country.

Mr. Shore has most ably, and, in my opinion, most successfully, in his Minute delivered in June last, argued in favour of the rights of the zemindars to the property of the soil. But if the value of permanency is to be withdrawn from the settlement now in agitation, of what avail will the power of his arguments be to the zemindars, for whose rights he has contended? they are now to have their property in farm for a lease of ten years, provided they will pay as good rent for it, and this property is then to be again assessed, at whatever rent the government of this country may, at that time, think proper to impose. In any part of the world, where the value of property is known, would not such a concession of a right of property in the soil, be called a cruel mockery?

In a country where the landlord has a permanent property in the soil, it will be worth his while to encourage his tenants, who hold his farm in lease, to improve that property; at any rate, he will make such an agreement with them, as will prevent their destroying it. But when the lord of the soil himself, the rightful owner of the land, is only to become a farmer for a lease of ten years, and if he is then to be exposed to the demand of a new rent, which may perhaps be dictated by ignorance or rapacity, what hopes can there be,—I will not say of improvement, but of preventing desolation? will it not be his interest, during the early part of that term, to extract from the estate every possible advantage for himself; and if any future hopes of a permanent settlement are then held out, to exhibit his lands at the end of it, in a state of ruin?

Although, however, I am not only of opinion that the zemindars have the best right, but from being persuaded that nothing could be so ruinous to the public interest, as that the land should be retained as the property of government; I am also convinced, that failing the claim of right of the zemindars, it would be necessary for the public good, to grant a right of property in the soil to them, or to persons of other descriptions. I think it unnecessary to enter into any discussion of the grounds upon which their right appears to be founded.

It is the most effectual mode for promoting the general improvement of the country, which I look upon as the important object for our present consideration.

I may safely assert, that one-third of the company's territory in Hindostan, is now a jungle inhabited only by wild beasts. Will a ten years lease induce any proprietor to clear away that jungle, and encourage the ryots to come and cultivate his lands; when, at the end of that lease, he must either submit to be taxed, ad libitum, for their newly cultivated lands, or lose all hopes of deriving any benefit from his labour, for which perhaps by that time, he will hardly be repaid?

I must own, that it is clear to my mind, that a much more advantageous tenure will be necessary, to incite the inhabitants of this country to make those exertions which can alone effect any substantial improvement.

The habit which the zemindars have fallen into, of subsisting by annual expedients, has originated, not in any constitutional imperfection in the people themselves, but in the fluctuating measures of government; and I cannot therefore admit, that a period of ten years will be considered by the generality of people, as a term nearly equal in estimate to perpetuity.

By the prudent landholders it will not, whatever it may be by proprietors of a contrary description. It would be unwise therefore to deny the former the benefit of a permanent system, because the mismanagement of the latter will not allow them to derive the same advantage from it.

It is for the interest of the state, that the landed property should fall into the hands of the most frugal and thrifty class of people, who will improve their lands and protect the ryots, and thereby promote the general prosperity of the country.

If there are men who will not follow this line of conduct when an opportunity is afforded them, by the enactment of good laws, it surely is not inconsistent with justice, policy, or humanity, to say, that the sooner their bad management obliges them to part with their property to the more industrious, the better for the state.

It is immaterial to government what individual possesses the land, provided he cultivates it, protects the ryots, and pays the public revenue.

The short-sighted policy of having recourse to annual expedients, can only be corrected by allowing those who adopt it, to suffer the consequences of it; leaving to them at the same time the power of obviating them, by pursuing the opposite line of conduct.

Mr. Shore has stated but two positive objections to the latter part of the 2^d Resolution:—The first is, that if after the notification that the settlement is approved by the court of directors, it will be declared permanent, the court of directors should not declare the permanency, the confidence of the natives in general will be shaken, and that those who relied on the confirmation, will be disappointed, and conclude that it was meant to deceive them.

I can only say, in answer to this objection, that I cannot believe any people to be so unreasonable as to accuse government of a breach of faith, and an intention to deceive them, for not doing what government in express terms assure them it is not in their power to promise to do, as it must depend upon the approbation of their superiors.

Mr. Shore's and Lord Cornwallis's Minutes, of September 1789; on Permanent Settlement of Lands.

Governor General's Minute, 18 Sep. 1789.

The only effect of the notification will, in my opinion, be, to encourage the landholder to offer—all that government asks, or wishes for,—a fair rent, lest by endeavouring to withhold what he knows he ought in justice to pay, he should forget that greatest of all blessings, a real property; and to stimulate him to more exertion in his cultivation.

But supposing even for a moment, that the declaration would be received in the sense apprehended; and that the zemindars were to act under a conviction that it was well founded, let us examine the nature of these acts, and whether the consequences of them would be such as to shake the confidence of the natives; or to operate otherwise, in any respect, but advantageously to themselves. The acts alluded to, must of course be such as are calculated to promote the improvement of the country; as, the assisting the Ryots with money, the refraining from exactions, and the foregoing small temporary advantages for future permanent profits: such acts must ultimately redound to the benefit of the zemindars, and ought to be performed by them, were the settlement intended to be concluded for ten years only, or even to be made annually.

But this provident conduct cannot be expected from them so long as they have any grounds for apprehending that their land, when improved, may be committed to the management of the officers of government, or made over to a farmer.

Should the zemindars, therefore, misconstrue the meaning of the declaration, and act in consequence of that misapprehension, they would find themselves enriched by the error; and this result, instead of tending to shake their confidence in government, might teach them an useful lesson, from which they would profit under any system of management. I shall further observe on this argument, that it is founded on a supposition, that when the zemindars are convinced that the demand of government on their lands is fixed, they will adopt measures for the improvement of them, which they will not have recourse to, so long as that demand is liable to occasional variation, and, consequently, strongly points out the expediency of a permanent settlement, and declaring to the landholders as soon as possible, that the conclusion of a permanent settlement with them, is the object of the legislature in England, as soon as it can be effected upon fair and equitable terms.

The second objection is, the doubt of its being expedient that the permanency should be declared.

Mr. Shore says, we cannot pronounce absolutely upon the success of our measures, without experience. I must ask, what are these measures, on the success of which there can be no doubt? or, what is the experience that is wanting; and what, by delaying a permanent settlement for a few years, would probably be improved?

There is nothing new in this plan, except the great advantages which are given to the zemindars, talookdars, and ryots, on one side; and the additional security which the company has against losses by balances from the value of the land, which is to be sold to make them good, being greatly increased, on the other. By what probable, I may even say possible, means is such a plan to fail?

I understand the word permanency, to extend to the jumma only, and not to the details of the settlement; for many regulations will certainly be hereafter necessary, for the further security of the ryots in particular, and even of those talookdars who, to my concern, must still remain in some degree of dependence on the zemindars; but these, can only be made by government occasionally, as abuses occur; and I will venture to assert, that either now, or ten years hence, or at any given period, it is impossible for human wisdom and foresight to form any plan that will not require such attention and regulation; and I must add, that if such a thing was possible, I do not believe that it will be easy to find a man more capable of doing it than Mr. Shore.

I cannot, however, admit that such regulations can in any degree, affect the rights which it is now proposed to confirm to the zemindars, for I never will allow, that in any country, government can be said to invade the rights of a subject, when they only require, for the benefit of the state, that he shall accept of a reasonable equivalent for the surrender of a real or supposed right, which in his hands is detrimental to the general interest of the public; or when they prevent his committing cruel oppressions upon his neighbours, or upon his own dependents.

The court of directors have given us a general idea of the amount of the land revenue from Bengal and Behar, with which they will be satisfied; if we honestly and faithfully make a settlement equal, and even beyond their expectations, in point of revenue, and at the same time calculated in its outlines to promote the prosperity, happiness, and wealth of their subjects, what reason can we have to apprehend that they will not declare it's permanency?

From the constitution of our establishments in this country, it almost amounts to an impossibility, that at any period, the same government, the same boards, or the same collectors should continue for near the space of ten years; upon what grounds then, are the court of directors to look for more knowledge and useful experience at the expiration of that term, and under all contingencies that may be reasonably expected to occur? I cannot avoid declaring my firmest conviction, that if those provinces are let upon lease for that period only, they will find, at the end of it, a ruined and impoverished country, and that more difficulties will be experienced than even this government have had to encounter.

In regard to the 4th resolution, respecting gunges, bazars, &c. &c. as Mr. Shore has proposed, that for the present they shall be placed under the management of the collectors, I will not at this time enter at large upon that question, for I feel very sensible how important it is, that the orders for the Behar settlement should be transmitted to the collectors of that district, without losing a minute's time unnecessarily; and I shall soon have an opportunity of delivering my sentiments fully upon it, when the Bengal settlement comes under our consideration.

I must, however, observe, that of the six references which are proposed to be made to the collectors, I cannot see the smallest use in any of them, except the last, which goes to the expediency of the measure.

As to the question of right, I cannot conceive that any government in their senses would ever have delegated an authorized right to any of their subjects, to impose arbitrary taxes on the internal commerce of the country. It certainly has been an abuse that has crept in, either through the negligence of the Mogul governors, who were careless and ignorant of all matters of trade; or, what is more probable, connivance of the Mussulman Aumil, who tolerated the extortion of the zemindar, that he might again plunder him in his turn.

But be that as it may, the right has been too long established, or tolerated, to allow a just government to take it away, without indemnifying the proprietor from any loss. And I never heard that, in the most free state, if an individual possessed a right that was incompatible with the public welfare, the legislature made any scruple of taking it from him, provided they gave him a fair equivalent. The case of the late Duke of Athol, who, a few years ago, parted very unwillingly with the sovereignty of the Isle of Man, appears to me to be exactly in point.

I agree with Mr. Shore, that there would be a degree of absurdity in government's taking into their own hands the gunges, &c. which are annexed to zemindary rights, and leaving the same abuses existing in those which belong to jaghire and altauigha possessions; but instead of leaving the former on that account, I should most undoubtedly take away the latter, securing to the proprietors a liberal and ample equivalent for all such duties as were not raised, in absolute and direct violation of the orders of government.

There are, however, several articles, in what are called the sayer collections, with which government has no occasion to interfere, and which may very well be left in the hands of the proprietors.

Mr. Shore delivers in the following Minute:

I HAVE perused, with deliberate attention, the Minute of the Governor General, in opposition to two points, in the propositions which I submitted to the board. The question at present between us is, whether a notification shall be made to the proprietors of the soil in Behar, that the settlement, if approved by the court of directors, will become permanent, and no further alteration to take place at the end of the ten years. My opinion is, that it ought not to be made, because the declaration will produce little, if any, advantages, whilst it may be attended with great inconvenience. The Governor General, on the contrary, contends, that great benefit will result from the declaration; that it will be attended with no inconvenience; and that the suppression of it, will be in the highest degree detrimental.

After thanking the Governor General for his approbation of my public conduct, which I value as highly as any that can be bestowed upon it, I shall now support my former opinion, in which I am strongly confirmed, with the same freedom with which I invite discussion.

A declaration of the nature of that in question, is by no means adapted to the habits or modes of thinking of the people to whom it is addressed; and it is from their understandings, and not from our own conceptions, that our conclusions, as to its effects, must be drawn. With men who have seen systems vary with every change of administration, and new plans successively introduced under the same government, I can never expect that a declaration, conditional in its terms, will have that effect which the Governor General supposes, in opposition to the whole experience of their lives; and this too, at a moment of innovation, when we are introducing a system of management different from any that has ever yet subsisted in Behar, since it came under the dominion of the English.

The declaration implies an attempt to reconcile the idea of a dubious perpetuity, with an absolute engagement for a limited time; the zemindars and talookdars will look to the latter only, relying upon it, from year to year, until experience shall have shown that reliance to be well founded.

I do not admit, that by withholding the declaration, the idea of permanency, as far as the proprietary rights of the zemindars are concerned, is withdrawn, or that the acknowledgment of those rights by such a measure, ceases to avail to them; the contrast between annual imposition, and a certainty of ten years, suggests a very different conclusion; great as the difference is in fact, between a permanency of ten years, and a perpetuity yet under the present circumstances of the country, the difference between the former and an annual assessment, will, to the conceptions of the people in general, if they reason at all, appear equally great and beneficial.

I have said, that in the estimate of the people, a period of ten years will be nearly equal to perpetuity; and although the Governor General differs with me in opinion, I still think the position well founded, supposing the possibility of some exceptions; yet the confidence of the natives in the stability of this assessment, will not be immediate, but arise from time and experience; and those who do rely upon it, must, for their own security, exert themselves. I am not inclined to expect any sudden revolution in the habits and opinions of the natives.

Mr. Shore's and Lord Cornwallis's Minutes, of September 1789; on Permanent Settlement of Lands.

Mr. Shore's 2d Minute, 18 Sep. 1789.

Appendix to Vth REPORT from The Select Committee on [No. 5.] natives of this country, but rely upon time and the stability of our arrangements, to produce this change—that they are more influenced by temporary advantages than by a prospect of certain and remote benefit, and that their conduct is regulated by this principle, the current experience of all will allow. We wish to infuse more prudent and economical principles, and we adopt the conduct calculated to produce this effect; but time and self-interest will be required to confirm them. When the zemindar of Nuddea undertook to be answerable for the revenues of that district, in April 1786, it was under conditions that left him without a possible chance of any advantage, under renunciation of a certain subsistence, and subject to a responsibility which was discharged by a sale of a part of his zemindary.

Whether the proportion of jungle is more or less than a third of the Company's territorial possessions in Hindostan, I know not; but with respect to the past, I am, from my own observation, as far as it has extended, authorized to affirm, that since the year 1770, cultivation is progressively increased, under all the disadvantages of variable assessments and personal charges; and, with respect to the future, I have no hesitation in declaring, that those zemindars who, under confirmed engagements, would bring their waste lands into cultivation, will not be deterred by a ten years assessment, from attempting it. If at this moment, the government chose to confer grants of waste land in talookdary tenure, under conditions that no revenue should be paid for them during five years, and that at the end of ten, the assessment should be fixed according to the general rates of land in the districts, where the tenures are situated, they would find no difficulty in procuring persons to engage, even upon less favourable terms. If I mistake not, the grants in Ramghur were precisely upon these principles, which are conformable to the usage of the country. Because the utmost scope of encouragement is not held out by a ten years settlement, it will not follow that none is afforded, or that the country, at the end of ten years, will become desolate. I desire to be understood in this place, that I do not mean to tax industry, in proportion to its improvement.

The Governor General seems to consider the declaration under discussion as equivalent in effect, to an assessment in perpetuity, and his arguments are deduced from this principle, and from the necessity of establishing it. He considers a ten years settlement as a bar to all solid improvement: my opinion and arguments oppose this interpretation of the declaration, and go to show, that improvement, if at all likely to happen, may be expected under a ten years settlement. I do not consider the perpetuity of the assessment as properly forming any part of the present discussion, although it is required that our arrangements be made with a view to this principle. Such I understand to be the orders of the Court of Directors, whose reasoning upon this subject is not very different from my own; for they are of opinion, that the idea of a definite term would be more pleasing to the natives than a dubious perpetuity; and upon this ground, and because they do at the same time, upon a full consideration of the subject, see other reasons for preferring a given term of years at present, they therefore direct that we form the assessment for a period of ten years certain.

But I have, on a former occasion, expressed my doubts whether the company or government in England should bind themselves to fix the assessment of this country, in perpetuity. These doubts were suggested by mature consideration of the various existing abuses, which I have so fully detailed, and very serious reflection upon the consequences of them, and the difficulty of establishing regulations, which shall, in their progressive operation, correct them. They have a reference to the circumstances of the country at this time, independent of the question upon general principles; and I shall deem it my duty, before I leave this country, to point out more particularly the foundation of those doubts, and to declare whether I retain or renounce them. I shall only observe in this place, that although the land is a security to government for its revenues, and although exactions and oppressions may lead to the transfer of it, from bad managers to economical substitutes, yet improvement may be long and effectually obstructed by the abuses practised, without leading to these consequences; if this were not the case, the amount sales of land would be much greater than they are at present.

The governor general asks, what are those measures of which I require experience, before I can pronounce absolutely of their success? To reply to this question as fully as might be necessary, would require a detail beyond what my present time allows. I shall only therefore answer, that before I commit myself to recommend the confirmation of a settlement in perpetuity, I require the experience, that it has been formed with a due attention to the prescribed instructions; considering that two of the five collectors in Behar, taking the result of their objections, have declared the proposed settlement impracticable; and a third officer, the acting collector of Baugleypore, has asserted, that a ten years settlement will confirm all existing abuses, and that these are the agents by whom the settlement is to be formed, the expectation cannot be deemed unreasonable.

But if this were the place for discussing the perpetuity of the assessment, I should suggest another question, Whether we ought not to have some experience, that the regulations which we mean to establish, are found in practice sufficient to correct the various abuses existing, in the detail of the collections? If these regulations are generally necessary, as I suppose them to be, it is very evident that they must be enforced, before we can expect improvement from the labours of the ryots, for whose ease and security they are principally calculated. I am willing to admit, that far greater abuses prevail in the detail of the collections in Bengal, than in Behar; and that in the latter province, the rules for detecting and correcting them, are more easily ascertained; as far therefore, as the argument drawn from from abuses applies, it is stronger, in one case than, in another. In fixing the assessment upon the zemindars for a term of years, we remove one temptation to oppression; but the prosperity of the country must no less depend, upon the energy with which our regulations are enforced; and in forming a judgment from past experience, we may be allowed to entertain very justifiable apprehension, that, from a want of knowing sufficiently existing abuses, we may be under the necessity of correcting them in future by new rules, which may either affect the revenues of government, or the stipulations of the zemindars. It is upon such considerations, that my doubts arise. They have no reference to future inquiries into the value of zemindary estates, which, as far as the amount of the assessment is concerned, I deem in general, sufficiently ascertained.

The confirmation of a perpetual assessment, is a very serious consideration. I am not sure that in authorizing the settlement made by Mr. Law, we have not given sanction to an act of injustice, in perpetuating the exclusion of the proprietors of the soil, for their refusal to agree to the terms of the proposed settlement; but upon this, as well as the whole of this plan, I mean carefully to revise the opinions which I have recorded, and state what further occurs to me upon the subject.

Under the various circumstances which I have detailed, I cannot but adhere to my opinion regarding the declaration; and if it should with any produce effect that, the non-confirmation of it, will be attended with this consequence, that it will shake the confidence of the natives, at the very time when it begins to operate. I cannot agree with the Governor General, that these provinces, if let upon a lease of ten years only, will be found in a depopulated state; or, that more difficulties will then be experienced, than even this government have had to encounter; nor, that this inference can be established upon any other principle, than by proving that a permanency of ten years, to those who have subsisted upon annual expedients, is destructive.

With respect to the early periods of the decennial assessment, as far as the four or five first years, I think every advantage will be gained, which would be derived from a declared mokurrery; and at that period, if a perpetuity is to be established, it may be declared. I do not believe the zemindars would offer more at this time, under one declaration than another; and if so, no advantage would arise to government in this respect. I do not see the utility of the conditional declaration in any sense, and if it be resolved upon, I think it should succeed, not precede, the formation of the settlement, and, under certain limitations, that the zemindars fulfil their engagements, and comply with the regulations prescribed. If it be capable of producing any advantage, it will equally follow from this mode, as from a previous declaration; and if the court of directors should finally determine to confirm the settlement in perpetuity, the fourth or fifth year will be fully time enough, and they will then have before them those documents and illustrations which they require, with the advantage of knowing the progress of the assessment for two or three years.

If the declaration be made at all, either now or subsequent to the formation of the settlement, the court of directors, if they should not approve it, are bound to declare their disapprobation of it.

The remaining part of the Governor General's Minute, relating to the gunges, bazars, &c. requires no observations at present. Whenever the subject comes under discussion, I shall support, or retract opinions, as I think right; at present, I shall only say, that whether the rights of the zemindars to the property of the gunges be denied, or admitted, no inconvenience can arise, as far as I see, from stating the questions which I have proposed.

(Signed) JOHN SHORE.

Extract BENGAL Revenue Consultations, the 21st December 1789.

THE following Minute, delivered in by Mr. SHORE, previous to his departure for Europe, having been read in circulation, is now recorded.—

Para. 1. I have lately recorded my doubts regarding the propriety of declaring the assessment, now to be imposed upon the country, fixed and unalterable; and shall state, as concisely as the subject will admit, the circumstances which have suggested those doubts.

2. In support of the declaration, it is contended, that property is insecure whilst it is exposed to arbitrary demands, and that industry is discouraged by apprehensions; that it will be taxed in proportion to its advance; that until property be fixed upon a solid foundation, the prosperity of a country can never be effectually promoted; and, that it is an abuse of terms, to give the name of property to a tenure, which may be forfeited at the discretion of the ruling power, by the accumulation of exactions which it cannot discharge.

3. To the general principles upon which these arguments are founded, I yield my assent; but the application of them, must be directed by circumstances of time and situation, which ought to be well considered.

4. It will, I believe, be admitted, that equality in taxation is of great importance; and in justice, all the subjects of a state should contribute as nearly as possible, in proportion tion to the income which they enjoy, under its protection. On the other hand, it is allowed that a considerable degree of inequality is a less evil than a very great degree of uncertainty; and that annual assessments of the land tax, give rise to more inconveniences than they pretend to rectify.

Mr. Shore's and Lord Cornwallis's Minutes, of September 1789; on Permanent Settlement of Lands.

5. That the contribution of the zemindars, are disproportioned to their respective incomes, we know with certainty; we also profess to take from them, 9-10ths of their receipts. The proportion paid by the cultivators of the soil, may be reckoned at a half, or it may be nearer perhaps, to three-fifths of the gross produce. Taking this at 100 parts, the claims of government may be estimated at 45. The zemindars and under-renters may be supposed to have 15, and 40 remains with the cultivators of the soil. In the two last classes, some enjoy considerably more than the assigned proportion; others, again, less.

6. Under these circumstances, allowing for the common variations in the state of society, in the improvement and in the decline of agriculture, and admitting the probable alteration in the value of silver, it is certain that the constancy of the assessment may be of great inconvenience, and even ruinous to many of the contributors; and in this case, there will be a necessity of some future alteration, which must always take place, to the disadvantage of government, if the assessment be now declared fixed for ever.

7. But independent of these considerations, there are others peculiar to this country, which for a long series of years, have more or less affected the annual revenue,—I mean drought and inundation, and the consequences attending them—scarcity and distress. Can we declare that no allowance shall be made for calamities of this nature, when they are great and extensive? Mr. Law remarks, that should an earthquake happen, overflowing rivers deposit sand, or mistaken assessment render the village inadequate to bear the land-tax, the proprietor should be at liberty to resign the estate, which may be transferred to another. But the difficulty requires another solution, and under the principle of a fixed assessment, one or other of these consequences may ensue: that the estate of the proprietor may be forfeited, without any fault on his part; or, that the assessment will be subject to diminution, without a sufficient provision for the restoration of it; and I see much difficulty in guarding against them, under the preliminary supposition.

8. If, either from the causes stated, or, from any other, any considerable alteration in the assessment should take place, the permanency of it, becomes ideal only.

9. This is one light in which the subject is to be considered; there are other important circumstances to be attended to.

10. It is allowed that the zemindars are, generally speaking, grossly ignorant of their true interests, and of all that relates to their estates;—that the detail of business with their tenants is irregular and confused, exhibiting an intricate scene of collusion, opposed to exaction, and of unlicensed demand substituted for methodized claims;—that the rules by which the rents are demanded from the ryots, are numerous, arbitrary, and indefinite;—that the officers of government, possessing local control, are imperfectly acquainted with them, whilst their superiors further removed from the detail, have still less information;—that the rights of the talookdars dependent on the zemindars, as well as of the ryots, are imperfectly understood and defined;—that, in common cases, we often want sufficient data and experience, to enable us to decide, with justice and policy, upon claims to exemption from taxes; and that a decision erroneously made, may be followed by one or other of these consequences: a diminution of the revenues of government, or a confirmation of oppressive exaction.

11. To the truth of this detail, there will be no dissenting voice; and it follows from it, that until the variable rules adopted, in adjusting the rent of the ryots, are simplified and rendered more definite, no solid improvement can be expected from their labours, upon which the prosperity of the country depends. The difficulties attending this task are allowed by all who have had experience of it; nor is much required to know, that to make an adjustment between two parties, where one fears, and each suspects the other; in a country too, where every innovation is received with disgust and apprehension, local information, assiduity, and perseverance, are indispensable requisites.

12. No one, I believe, is so sanguine as to expect that the perpetuation of the zemindary assessment will at once provide, a remedy for these evils. Time must be allowed for the growth of confidence, and for the acquisition of knowledge. We know from experience what the zemindars are; and I am not inclined, in opposition to that experience, to suppose that they will at once assume new principles of action, and become economical landlords and prudent trustees of the public interests.

13. The necessity of some interposition between the zemindars and their tenants, is absolute; and government interferes by establishing regulations for the conduct of the zemindars, which they are to execute, and by delegating authority to the collectors, to enforce their execution. If the assessment of the zemindaries were unalterably fixed, and the proprietors were left to make their own arrangements with the ryots, without any restrictions, injunctions, or limitations, which indeed is a result of the fundamental principle, the present confusion would never be adjusted.

14. This interference, though so much modified, is in fact an invasion of proprietary right, and an assumption of the character of landlord, which belongs to the zemindar; for it is equally a contradiction in terms to say that the property in the soil is vested in the zemindar, and that we have a right to regulate the terms by which he is to let his lands to the the ryots, as it is to connect that avowal, with discretionary and arbitrary claims. If the land is the zemindar's, it will only be partially his property, whilst we prescribe the quantum which he is to collect, or the mode by which the adjustment of it, is to take place between the parties concerned.

15. The most cursory observation shows the situation of things in this country, to be singularly confused. The relation of a zemindar to government, and of a ryot to a zemindar, is neither that of a proprietor nor a vassal; but a compound of both. The former, per se, forms acts of authority, unconnected with proprietary right;—the latter, has rights, without real property; and the property of the one, and rights of the other, are, in a great measure, held at discretion. Such was the system which we found, and which we have been under the necessity of adopting. Much time will, I fear, elapse before we can establish a system, perfectly consistent in all its parts; and before we can reduce the compound relation of a zemindar to government, and of a ryot to a zemindar, to the simple principles of landlord and tenant. But substance is more important, than forms. If the propositions of the collectors, for correcting the prevailing abuses, be examined, they will be found defective; and the regulations, which our experience has enabled us to establish, will, when considered, appear indefinite, where they ought to have the utmost precision. Orders, which should be positive, are tempered by cautious conditions; nor am I ashamed to distrust my own knowledge, since I have frequent proofs that new enquiries lead to new information.

16. Notwithstanding repeated prohibitions against the introduction of new taxes, we still find that many have been established of late years. The idea of the imposition of taxes, by a landlord upon his tenant, implies an inconsistency; and the prohibition in spirit, is an encroachment upon proprietary right; for it is saying to the landlord, you shall not raise the rents of your estate. But without expatiating on this part of the argument, I shall only here observe, that with an exception of an arbitrary limitation in favour of the Khode and Khanst Ryots, the regulations for the new settlement virtually confirm all these taxes, without our possessing any records of them, and without knowing, how far they are burthensome or otherwise. In some cases, a knowledge of those impositions has been followed, by the abolition of them; in others, it may be equally necessary; wherever it takes place, there is a risque that the assessment will suffer a proportionate diminution. At present they are in many places so numerous and complicated, that after having obtained an enumeration of the whole, the amount of the assul with the proportionate rates of the several abwabs, it requires an accountant of some ability, to calculate what a Ryot is to pay, and the calculation may be presumed, beyond the ability of most tenants. The pottah rarely expresses the sum total of the rents; and it is difficult to determine what is exaction.

17. The rates at which landed property is transferred by public sale, in liquidation of arrears to be assessed, are also to arise from regulations, now to be established; from the want of fixed data, the transfer is attended with embarrassment and mistakes: of this, the sales of Serempore and Mundulgaut, furnish sufficient proofs. There is one question of great importance connected with this part of the subject, whether a proprietor, by purchase, is, or is not, entitled to collect, what his predecessors had done? At present, he deems himself authorized to collect all the articles existing at the time of his purchase, whether prohibited by old regulations or not; and the amount of the revenues thus collected, is the estimate by which he regulates his purchase.

18. The arguments which I have stated, may be reduced to the following summary:—That with whatever care the assessment may be made, it is certain that there will be a considerable degree of inequality in it, and if in any case, the inequality should be on the side of excess, it must be rectified, by lowering the assessment; since it is unequally low, of it, will be at the hazard and perhaps ruin of the proprietors: where it is unequally high, the proprietors will gain, and the government will suffer; That from circumstances more particularly affecting the country, the establishment of an unalterable assessment seems attended with peculiar difficulties, and the attempt may be followed by a diminution of the public revenue, whilst no probable means of preventing this consequence occur; That if the amount of it, be allowed to depend at all upon contingencies, the chance in every instance, will be against the government.

19. On the other hand, the necessity of prescribing regulations for simplifying the complicated rentals of the ryots, (which ought if possible to be reduced to one sum, for a given quantity of land of a determinate quality and produce) of defining and establishing the rights of the ryots and talookdars with precision, together with the expediency of procuring clear data for the transfer by sale, of public and private property, are admitted.

20. Under all these circumstances, is it not better to introduce a new principle by degrees, than establish it at once, beyond the power of revocation? If we are certain that the assessment now to be established, can be formed with a sufficient degree of equality to be levied at all times, notwithstanding the supposed possible variations: if we are convinced that imitated arrangements are sufficient for this purpose, without affording pleas that shall affect the permanency of the assessment: if the relative rights of the individuals concerned, we can in the sequel, establish regulations for this purpose, without the same consequence from, are now sufficiently determined, or can be determined with respect to the present exactions, any future decisions: if we are sufficiently informed with respect to a rack-rent, or if they are to declare that they may be continued, without establishing the assessment; no objections will be abolished, that the suppression of them, will not diminish the assessment; no objections remain remain to declare it permanent and unalterable. But upon these points, I have my doubts; and they are justified by past experience. The tribute of the Rajah of Benares, has been temporarily reduced, from the causes which I have stated; and the difficulty of a determination upon other points, may be ascertained when the address from the board of revenue of the 30th August, accompanying a representation from the collector of Dinagore, comes under consideration. I presume that many zemindars are nearly in the same predicament with that of Dinagore: the question regarding it is, whether certain taxes shall be consolidated and confirmed, or not; and the determination will, either establish or diminish the present assessment. The collector's proposition refers the final decision to subsequent enquiry; and until that is made, no satisfactory determination can be passed. Those who contend for the permanency of the assessment, must maintain the affirmative of all the dubious propositions which I have stated; and whatever the ultimate resolution may be, it is at least necessary to point out the difficulties attending a decision,—justice to our successors, requires this.

21. Objections to a permanent assessment have been made by others, upon different grounds.

22. It is contended, that the revenue proper to be drawn from these provinces, may be prodigiously increased. I think not; and the agreement has of course, no weight with me; but in considering the question, it ought not to be suppressed. It is of much more importance that the assessment is not too high, when we declare it perpetual.

23. These reflections, have no immediate connection with the plan of a decennial assessment, which is, at all events, to take place. I consider this as a period of experiment and improvement, during which, by a systematical conduct, regularly directed to one object, we are to give confidence to the zemindars, and procure a simplification of the present complicated rental of the Ryots. The foundation of this improvement, is to be laid in regulations to be established, and the proposed reform, depends upon the execution of them; without which, I may venture to predict, no assessment can be permanent. If at the end of the fifth, sixth, or any subsequent year, not exceeding the eighth, of the assessment, it shall be found that the desired improvement has been accomplished, that the relative rights of talookdars, ryots, and zemindars, are rendered definite and precise, and that the country flourishes under the prescribed regulations, and the superintending care of the revenue officers; the settlement may again be extended, to any period of ten or twenty years. The doubts which I have suggested, will then be brought to a test. The question of a perpetual assessment may then be agitated, with more accurate information; and if any errors have been committed in rating the value of the different districts, they may be corrected.

24. It is very obvious that the country at large may be equal to the discharge of the present entire tribute; but that, from the inequality of the assessment, it may be found impracticable to collect it. A due distribution of it, would prevent a diminution which, without it, may ensue. I am by no means inclined to tax industry, by raising the assessment in proportion to improvements; but without attempting any increase upon the total amount, I shall suppose that fixed, and that the government here, is restricted from any augmentation of it, during the ten years. The assessment at all events, is to be unalterable; but if, from experience during the course of it, it should appear to have been imposed with any considerable inequality, or if a necessity should occur for lowering it, in partial instances, I see no objection, in reason or propriety, against a more correct distribution, at the end of the period. If the rules proposed be confirmed, with such improvements as the board may adopt, and be duly executed, the observation of those employed, will furnish clear and sufficient data for the correction of the assessment, which is unconnected with any idea of raising the general land-tax imposed on the country;—it has a tendency only to secure that, which we think may be drawn from it.

25. If the assessment now to be established, instead of being formed upon gross calculations and averages, were regulated by a real knowledge of the sources, whence it is drawn; if, instead of presumptions arising from the supposed collections of the zemindars, we knew what the Ryots paid, and whether that amount, was burthensome or otherwise; and if the assessment of the land-tax were regulated, by a general standard; the arguments founded on inequality, would lose much of their weight: yet a reliance upon the best apparent information is fallible, as our recent experience regarding Midnapore, proves; for if the assessment made by the collector upon documents of the greatest probable authenticity, had been declared permanent, the collection of it, if enforced, would have reduced many of the talookdars to distress, and some to ruin. Are we not as likely, or more so, to err in the distribution of the assessment upon a collectorship, as upon the subdivisions of a particular district?

26. The fatal consequences resulting from variations in system and practice, are so manifest, that it is not without reluctance I record my doubts, regarding the practicability and policy of putting an end to them, by a declaration which, by establishing permanency, strikes at the root of the evil; and I should be happy to see these doubts resolved and refuted. The necessity of giving confidence to our subjects is absolute; and, upon this ground, the establishment of a decennial assessment, whatever partial objections may be made to it, (and some there are,) is expedient and indispensable. I think it probable that its amount will sustain some diminution, during the course of the period; and, at the conclusion of it, be less than in the first year. This probability, if it be admitted, suggests an argument against a permanent assessment. A temporary sacrifice may be made, to inspire confidence; but to consent to a perpetual loss, whilst it can be regained without injury or injustice, is certainly not advisable. To those who have subsisted by annual expedients, who have been left at the mercy of variable discretion, a period of ten years will be in estimate, nearly equal to a perpetuity; perpetuity; and, if the confidence gained during the course of it, be confirmed in due time, little will be lost by the experiment, whilst it leaves room for the perfection of the system, which we mean to establish; much less will then be left to hazard: and I hold it prudent, in establishing great innovations in principle, under an acknowledgment of defective information, to take experience for our guide. Our measures have a view to permanency; but before we declare it, prudence dictates that we should have some certainty, that the government will not suffer by its liberality, and that the benefits of it, will extend to that class whose labours are the riches of the state. I submit my reflections to the discussion of the Governor General in Council, and to the decision of the Court of Directors, by whom it must be made.

27. I shall take this opportunity of recording some remarks upon the plan of settlement proposed, and in part executed, by Mr. Law. My doubts as to a permanent assessment, apply to the fundamental proposition of his whole plan; although I am not sorry that it has been executed. The experiment will give rise to a further experience, which may assist in determining upon the general question. I shall here pass, over such parts of the plan, as have an immediate and necessary dependence upon the principle of it.

28. With respect to the execution, the difference from former practice, consists in this,—that the government, through its own officers, fixes the assessment upon the villages, instead of imposing it upon entire pergunnahs, as formerly, each village-holder being responsible for the quit-rent of his lands. There is an exception in the case of larger zemindaries: the assessment upon them, is fixed upon the whole, and the distribution of that assessment is to be made, upon the component villages. This alteration in practice will, I trust, be attended with sensible advantages.

29. But the perpetuity of assessment is qualified by Mr. Law, by the introduction of a clause, that the proprietors of mokurrery tenures, shall be subject to a proportion of a general addition, when required by the exigencies of government. This qualification is, in fact, a subversion of the fundamental principle; for, the exigencies not being defined, a government may interpret the conditions, according to its own sense of them; and the same reasons which suggest an addition to the assessment, may perpetuate the enhancement. The explanation given by Mr. Law to this objection is, that temporary extraordinary circumstances must have temporary resources, and even the land at home, is liable to a general tax during war; but the land tax in England does not bear a proportion of 9-10ths to the income of the proprietor.

30. Notwithstanding the explanation, I shall consider the qualifying clause as either nugatory or pernicious, and as standing in direct contradiction to the principle of a mokurrery settlement. The very term implies an unalterable assessment; and, if the explanation be founded on necessity, it is decisive against the perpetuity of it.

31. It is certainly a question of some curiosity, as well as of importance, to inquire what ideas the people themselves entertain of this clause, in a deed which professes to confer upon them estates, subject to a fixed land tax. Is it possible to conceive that they understand the consequences of it, and their extent? The zemindars of Bengal would reason very accurately upon them, and conclude that the proposal to fix the assessment upon their estates unalterably, and, at the same time, to connect that proposal, with a clause authorizing enhancement at the discretion of the government, was irreconcilable in its terms, and they would probably indulge suspicions unfavourable to the intentions of Mr. Law, and they would probably conclude, that a reliance upon the personal qualities of Mr. Law, his honour, his probity, and his zeal, so successfully displayed to the advantage of the Company, and for the happiness of those placed under his authority, has disarmed suspicion, and gained consent to a proposition, which has never been well considered or understood? Let this be as it may, I deem the proposition of mokurrery settlement, subject to an increase upon exigency, a solecism; and that permanency must be given up, or the clause be withdrawn.

32. One of Mr. Law's propositions is, that, where there are proprietors of villages, they be confirmed in the possession of them, upon condition of paying the fixed tax; but, if they refuse according to the terms proposed, that they be excluded from all management and right in future, receiving a fixed allowance of 10 per cent. on the jumma, payable to government; and that their lands be conferred on creditable men, subject to this allowance, in addition to the fixed tax.

33. I shall consider the latter part of this proposition only, with an acknowledged regret that I did not view the consequences of it before, in the light in which I now see them; and of course my objections to it, were weaker than they ought to have been.

34. The persons affected by it are those whom we acknowledge to be the proprietors of the soil; and we have consented to take away their property in perpetuity, and bestow it upon others. The act, in my opinion, combines both injustice and impolicy.

35. For, although it is founded upon the refusal of the zemindars to take upon themselves the management of their estates, and although a provision has been stipulated for them, at the rates established by ancient usage; yet, when we consider the condition of the proprietors of the soil in Behar, the penalty appears immoderately severe. In the late instructions, which only profess the establishment of a decennial settlement, no estate is to be assigned to the management of an alien, until the reasons on which the proprietor's refusal is founded, have been submitted to the consideration of the board of revenue. Similar precautions are prescribed, where the proprietors are not forthcoming.

36. That

36. That a man should relinquish his property, when it is offered to him, in terms of security which he never before had, seems difficult to account for, in any satisfactory way. The success of the mokurrery settlement relies upon a different principle; upon the anxiety to acquire, and the incitement, to improve an estate, the claims upon which are fixed; yet experience shows, that the mind may be so far depressed by poverty or by oppression, as to be satisfied with a moderate advantage or income, secured without personal efforts. Whether this be the cause, or whether we assign the refusal to a want of confidence in the measures and professions of government, or whether we attribute it to a consciousness of inability to reap the same advantages by management, which another can acquire; the objection, in every instance, is equally solid, when the justice of it, is considered. The weight of the proposed assessment, can hardly be deemed a well-founded objection; since those who succeed to the estates relinquished, must provide, over and above that amount, subsistence for the dismissed proprietor, at the rate of 10 per cent. But I think the government have gone too far, in authorizing their perpetual dispossession of proprietors; and that this is a power which ought never to be delegated to any collector, without the previous and express sanction of the supreme authority, in every instance.

37. From a cursory inspection of the accounts of Havelly Behar, I find that 70 villages, consisting of 22,452 begas, and assessed at rupees 18,535, have been taken from proprietors, on account of their absence; that forty villages, containing 10,760 begas, and assessed at R^y 773, appear to have been taken from the proprietors, although no refusal is stated. To the greater part of the remainder, no explanation is annexed, whether there be any proprietors, and, if so, whether they declined to engage. I do not desire the board to rely upon this statement as accurate, although I believe it will not be found materially erroneous; but they will probably think it necessary to require a particular explanation, exhibiting a list of the former proprietors in possession; of those who have been dispossessed; and of the causes of such dispossession, in all the districts where the mokurrery settlement has taken place.

38. With respect to absentees, the case is particularly hard; and if, upon their return, they should ask why their estates have been disposed of in perpetuity, I fear it would be difficult to give a satisfactory answer. The exclusion of them, as well as of the others, extends to their heirs; and it establishes, in every instance, a perpetual pension, and consequently a perpetually burthen on the state.

39. It may be asked, what is to be done, where the proprietors refuse, or are absent? The answer is obvious. Let us first be assured, that the requisition made to these present, is just in its terms; and, having decided this point, two modes occur; either that government, as in the case of minors and females, should appoint a manager to the estate, or that it be let to farm for a term of years, with a reserve of subsistence to the proprietor. The objections to either of these modes, I am aware of; but they result from necessity, not from choice; and it is far better, that a system should bend to justice, policy, and humanity, than that those should be violated, to support a system.

40. If my reflections upon two principal parts of the plan are just, they will suggest a very necessary caution, that, in establishing principles, we do not sacrifice justice. I am not ashamed to acknowledge what appears to me an error; and I think no time should be lost in rectifying the resolution which has tended to the perpetual exclusion of absent and recusant proprietors.

41. Another proposition is, that the waste lands remain as crown lands for future allotment, as proposals for them may be tendered.

42. The first question that arises upon this, is—To whom do the waste lands at present belong? Are there no zemindars, proprietors of them? If there are, is government, by usage or law, authorized to take them away, or have the proprietors consented to part with them? These are preliminaries, which ought to be examined and decided.

43. But I shall consider the proposition, in another point of view. The limits of the villages are left undetermined, by any marked boundaries. The quantity of land in each, although stated in begas, is confessedly unascertained. The proprietors, therefore, may extend their possessions, and encroach upon the present waste lands, gradually; and this mode it is most probable they will attempt, instead of undertaking the cultivation of waste lands, under any specific engagement to pay revenue for them. The proposition must, therefore, rely upon a new accession of inhabitants from foreign countries; and, in any other sense, it appears to me almost useless.

44. Notwithstanding the objections stated by Mr. Law, to determining the extent of the villages by ascertained boundaries, I still think this should be done, to guard against the consequences of litigated limits. He observes, that he inserted the words in the pottah or title deed, of "more or less," as applied to the quantity of land, for the reciprocal security of government and landholder; but the term is as likely to give rise to insecurity, when a competition occurs between the two parties. To ascertain the limits of the land by boundaries, it will rarely, I conceive, be necessary to measure it. As they are now disposed of, there is no criterion for determining the quantity; for the term "more or less" precludes any ascertainment with regard to the number of begas, and by what evidence can the extreme boundaries be defined? I think the government ought to know what it gives, and the proprietor what he receives; and, provided limits were marked out, the term "more or less" would be unimportant. The difficulties of the operation are by no means, in my opinion, so great as Mr. Law apprehends. He says, that the boundaries of cultivated villages are well ascertained; if so, let them be marked and recorded.

45. If the plan should, in its progress, be attended with the improvement expected from it, the limits of the estates will then become very important; and some time or other, there will be a necessity for defining them. The objections of Mr. Law go, indeed, to the possibility of such a measure; for, if the proprietors themselves are ignorant and negligent; if they and the collector's assistants are liable to err, who is to undertake it? Or upon what evidence, under these suppositions, (which I take up, from Mr. Law's replies to my queries of 25th January 1789,) are the courts of justice to decide, or what agents are they to employ, to establish the facts on which a judgment should be made? But, if ever necessary to be done, the limits may certainly be marked with more facility at this time, than they can be at any future period.

46. An objection has been made to the plan under discussion, that the revenue payable by each mokurradar, has not been ascertained with sufficient accuracy. I acknowledge Mr. Law's information upon this subject, is not so satisfactory, as I could wish; but, on the other hand, it is to be remembered, that the total amount of the revenues of each pergunnah has been augmented and realized; so that, although government may not have obtained the greatest possible amount, they have at least benefited, in a considerable degree. To minute pre-local examinations, there are objections; but they are less forcible when considered as preparatory to a mokurrery plan, than upon the principle of a temporary assessment. I do not, however, admit that this increase is solely owing to the principle of the assessment, but assign it rather to the ability of the superintending officer.

47. In the general and particular instructions for the Behar province, some propositions in Mr. Law's plan have been modified, and, I hope, improved. The subject would still afford room for ampler discussion; but the most important parts have been adverted to, and some observations, on particular points, will be found in my Minute of September 18th.—It is only necessary further to observe, that the defects in the fundamental principle of the plan, if it be confirmed, must be corrected, by annulling the clause which, in its operation, has a direct tendency to subvert it; and that the government must either submit to rescind what they have approved, or confirm what, to me, appears impolitic and unjust.

Extract BENGAL Revenue Consultations,
10th February, 1790.

The following Minute from the Governor General having been sent in circulation on the 7th instant, and returned, is here recorded.

Minute of Governor
General 3 Feb. 1790.

I HAVE considered Mr. Shore's Minutes on the proposed Settlement of the Revenue, which were recorded on the proceedings of the 18th September, and 21st December last, with all the attention which the importance of the subject deserves, and which is due to the opinions of a man, who is so distinguished for his knowledge of the revenue system of this country, and for whose public-spirited principles, and general character, I have the highest esteem.

After having experienced so much advantage from the able and almost uniform support that I have received from Mr. Shore, during a period of near three years, it would have been particularly gratifying to me, if we could have avoided to record different opinions, at the moment of our separation; but a regard to the due discharge of public duty, must supersede all other considerations; and I have at least the satisfaction to be certain, that no private motives have influence with either of us; and that a sense of our duty alone, has occasioned the few exceptions that have arisen to that general concurrence, which there will appear to have been in our sentiments, on almost all important points relating to the public business.

The interests of the Nation, as well as the Company, and the happiness and prosperity of our subjects in this country, are deeply concerned in the points on which we differ; and as the public good is our only object, I am persuaded, that it is equally our wish, that the final decision may be such, as will most effectually promote it.

Mr. Shore, in his propositions for making the Behar settlement, objected to our notifying to the land-holders the intention of the court of directors, to declare the decennial settlement permanent and unalterable, provided that it meets with their approbation; and, in his two last Minutes, he goes further, and endeavours to prove that a permanent assessment of the lands of these provinces, would at any time, be inadvisable:—He also contends, that the taking into the hands of government, the collection of all internal duties on commerce, and allowing the zemindars and others, by whom these duties have been hitherto levied, a deduction equal to the amount which they now realize from them, will not be productive of the expected advantages to the public at large; and that it is moreover an unjustifiable invasion of private property.

Had I entertained a doubt of the expediency of fixing the demand of government upon the lands, I should certainly have thought it my duty to withhold the notification of the intention of the court of directors which I recommended; but after the most mature and deliberate consideration of Mr. Shore's reasoning, being still firmly persuaded that a fixed and unalterable assessment of the land-rents, was best calculated to promote the substantial interests of the Company, and of the British nation, as well as the happiness and prosperity of the inhabitants of our Indian territories; and being also convinced that such a notification, would render the proprietors of land anxious to have the management of their own estates, and in many instances induce them to come forward with more fair and liberal offers, at the period of making the new settlement; and, at the same time, that even a disappointment of their expectations would be the cause of no real injury to them, or place them in a worse situation than they were before such hopes were held out to them, it became my indispensable duty to propose that the intentions of the court of directors should be published.

The notification has been accordingly made, in the several collectorships of Behar, and in the collectorship of Midnapore in Orissa, the final orders for the settlement of which, have been issued; and the same reasons will induce me to recommend its being published throughout Bengal.

The accompanying extracts from the correspondence of the collector of Shahabad, in the province of Behar, with the board of revenue, will prove that my expectations regarding the effect of this notification, were well founded (Appendix, No. 1.)

I now come to the two remaining points on which I have differed with Mr. Shore, and the final decision regarding which, must rest with the honourable court of directors; viz. the expediency of declaring the decennial settlement permanent, and appointing officers on the part of government, to collect the internal duties on commerce.

The following appears to me to be Mr. Shore's principal objections to a permanent assessment:—That we do not possess a sufficient knowledge of the actual collections made from the several districts, to enable us to distribute the assessment upon them, with the requisite equality:—that the demands of the zemindars upon the talookdars and ryots, are undefined; and even if we did possess a competent knowledge of the above points, there are peculiar circumstances attending this country, which must ever render it bad policy in the government, to fix their demand upon the lands.

I shall now offer such remarks as occur to me on the facts and arguments adduced by Mr. Shore, in support of the above objections:—

Mr. Shore observes, that we profess to take from the zemindars nine-tenths of their receipts; and, under these circumstances, allowing for the common variations in the state of society, in the improvement, and in the decline of agriculture, and admitting the probable alterations in the value of silver, it is certain that the constancy of the assessment may be of great inconvenience, and even ruinous to many of the contributors; and, in this case, that there will be a necessity of some future alteration, which must always take place to the disadvantage of government, if the assessment be now declared fixed for ever.

Were there any grounds for supposing that a system which secures to the land-holder the possession of his lands, and the profits arising from the improvement of them, will occasion a decline in agriculture, then might we apprehend that a permanent assessment would, in a progress of time, bear hard upon the contributors; but reason and experience justify the contrary supposition: in which case, a fixed assessment must be favourable to the contributors, because their resources will gradually increase, whereas the demand of government will continue the same.

Equally favourable to the contributors, is the probable alteration in the value of silver; for there is little doubt, but that it will continue to fall, as it has done for centuries past, in proportion as the quantity drawn from the mines, and thrown into the general circulation, increases. If this be admitted, the assessment will become gradually lighter, because, as the value of silver diminishes, the landholder will be able, upon an average, to procure the quantity which he may engage to pay annually to government, with a proportionably smaller part of the produce of his lands, than he can at present.

The circumstance of the country being occasionally liable to drought and inundation, which Mr. Shore adduces as an argument against a permanent assessment, appears to me strongly in favour of it. The losses arising from drought and inundation are partial and temporary; the crops only are damaged or destroyed; the land is neither swept away by inundation, nor rendered barren by drought, but, in the ensuing year, produces crops as plentiful as those which it would have yielded, had it not been visited by those calamities.

Now, if Mr. Shore's calculation of the proportion which the zemindars in general receive of the produce of their lands, be accurate, it is obvious that every temporary loss must fall upon government; for so long as we profess to leave the zemindars no more than that proportion, and claim a right to appropriate the excess to the public use, from what funds are they to make these losses good? But when the demand of government is fixed, an opportunity is afforded to the landholder of increasing his profits, by the improvement of his lands; and we may reasonably expect that he will provide for occasional losses, from the profits of favourable seasons.

The necessity, therefore, of granting remissions to the landholders, for temporary losses, will diminish in proportion as the produce of the lands increases, and exceeds the demand of government.

But let us suppose that hereafter it should be found necessary to grant remissions in districts which may suffer from drought or inundation, this is no argument against a permanent permanent assessment; for, under the present system of variable assessments, we are frequently obliged to grant considerable deductions on these accounts, and there is no prospect of our being able to discontinue them, so long as the country is assessed at its full value, and no more is left to the landholder than is barely sufficient for his subsistence, and for defraying the charges of collecting the rents from his lands.

There is this further advantage to be expected from a fixed assessment, in a country subject to drought and inundation, that it affords a strong inducement to the landholder to exert himself to repair as speedily as possible the damages which his lands may have sustained from these calamities; for it is to be expected that when the public demand upon his lands is limited to a specific sum, he will employ every means in his power to render them capable of again paying that sum, and as large a surplus as possible, for his own use. His ability to raise money to make these exertions, will be proportionably increased by the additional value which the limitation of the public demand will stamp upon his landed property: the reverse of this is to be expected, when the public assessment is subject to unlimited increase.

I am of opinion therefore, that there is no reason to apprehend a greater deficiency in the public revenues, from drought and inundation, when the assessment is fixed, than we have hitherto sustained, under the system of variable assessments; on the contrary, that we have very sufficient grounds for supposing that the necessity for granting remissions on these accounts, will become gradually less. It further appears to me, that the practice of heaping up the public revenue, by charging occasionally the improved estate of one landholder with deficiencies in the public revenue assessed upon the lands of his neighbour, is both unjust and impolitic; and that until this practice is discontinued, both the landholders and their under-tenants and ryots, will in general remain in a state of impoverishment, and that landed property will continue, at its present depreciated value.

Mr. Shore observes, that the zemindars are ignorant of their true interests, and of all that relates to their estates:—that the detail of business with their tenants is irregular and confused, exhibiting an intricate scene of collusion, opposed to exaction, and of unlicensed demand substituted for methodized claims:—that the rules by which the officers of government, mandated from the ryots, are numerous, arbitrary, and indefinite:—that the officers of government possessing local control, are imperfectly acquainted with them, whilst their superiors, further removed from the detail, have still less information:—that the rights of the talookdars dependent on the zemindars, as well as of the ryots, are imperfectly understood and defined:—that in common cases, we often want sufficient data and experience to enable us to decide, with justice and policy, upon claims to exemption from taxes; and that a decision erroneously made, may be followed by one or other of these consequences:—a diminution of the revenues of government, or a confirmation of oppressive exaction:—that no one is so sanguine as to expect, that the perpetration of the zemindary assessment, will at once provide a remedy for these evils; that time must be allowed for the growth of confidence, and the acquisition of knowledge:—that we know from experience what the zemindars are, and that he is not inclined, in opposition to that experience, to suppose that they will at once assume new principles of action, and become economical landlords and prudent trustees of the public interests.

With regard to the ignorance and incapacity of the zemindars, admitting these defects to exist in that class of people to the extent supposed, I have already given it as my opinion, that they are to be attributed greatly to the system of collecting the public revenue from their lands, which has long prevailed in this country: To keep them in a state of tutelage, and to prohibit them from borrowing money, or disposing of their lands, without the knowledge of government, as we do at present, with a view to prevent them suffering the consequences of their profligacy and incapacity, will perpetuate these defects. If laws are enacted which secure to them the fruits of industry and economy, and at the same time, leave them to experience the consequence of idleness and extravagance; they must either render themselves capable of transacting their own business, or their necessities will oblige them to dispose of their lands to others, who will cultivate and improve them. This I consider to be the only effectual mode which this or any other government could adopt, to render the proprietors of the lands economical landlords, and prudent trustees of the public interests.

I must here observe, however, that the charge of incapacity can be applied only, to the proprietors of the smaller zemindaries. The proprietors of the larger zemindaries, and talooks in general, conduct their own business; and I make no doubt would improve their lands, were they exempted from the authority of the zemindars, and allowed to pay their revenue immediately to the public treasuries of the collectors.

Admitting the detail of business between the zemindars and their under-tenants and ryots, to be in the intricate state described by Mr. Shore, does it not prove that the various attempts hitherto made by successive administrations to simplify this intricacy, have been defective in principle, and consequently establish the necessity of having recourse to other measures for that purpose? We have found that the numerous prohibitory orders against the levying of new taxes, accompanied with threats of fine and punishment for the disobedience of them, have proved ineffectual; and, indeed, how could it be expected, that whilst the government were increasing their demands upon the zemindars, that they in their turn would not oppress the ryots; or that a farmer, whose interest extended little farther than to the crops upon the ground, would not endeavour to exact, by every means in his power, as large a sum as possible, over and above the amount of his engagements with the public.

If the officers of government possessing local controul, are imperfectly acquainted with the rules by which the rents are demanded from the ryots, and their superiors further removed from the detail, have still less information of them, at what period are we to hope that government and its officers, will obtain a more perfect knowledge of them? The collectors have now been three years acting under positive instructions, to obtain the necessary information for concluding a permanent settlement. They have transmitted their reports; and if the information contained in them, and the numerous discussions on the same points, recorded on the proceedings of former administrations, are insufficient for us to act upon; at what period, and from whom, are we to expect to procure more perfect materials? Most of the collectors who have furnished the last reports, are now upon the spot, and are the persons best qualified for carrying into execution the system which we may adopt. It is to be supposed that they have communicated all the information which they possessed; and no further lights are therefore to be expected from them. Shall we act upon this information, or shall we wait for other collectors and fresh reports; or shall we calmly sit down discouraged by the difficulties which are supposed to exist, and leave the revenue affairs of this country, in the singular state of confusion in which they are represented to be by Mr. Shore?

In order to simplify the demand of the landholder upon the ryots, or cultivator of the soil, we must begin with fixing the demand of government upon the former; this done, I have little doubt but that the landholders will without difficulty be made to grant pottahs to the ryots upon the principles proposed by Mr. Shore in his propositions for the Bengal settlement. The value of the produce of the land, is well known to the proprietor or his officers, and to the ryot who cultivates it; and is a standard which can always be reverted to by both parties, for fixing equitable rates.

Mr. Shore, in his Minute prefixed to his propositions for the Bengal settlement, has furnished the most satisfactory arguments, to prove the incompetency of the officers of government to enter into this detail, with any prospect of success. He observes, "That it would be endless to attempt the subordinate variations, in the tenures or conditions of the ryots: that it is evident, in a country where discretion has so long been the measure of exaction, where the qualities of the soil and the nature of the produce, suggest the rates of the rents; where the standard of measuring the land varies, and where endless and often contradictory customs exist, in the same district and village; the task must be nearly impossible; that the collector of Rajeshahy observes upon the subject, that the infinite varieties of soil, and the further variations of value, from local circumstances, are absolutely beyond the investigation, or almost comprehension, not merely of a collector, but of any man who has not made it the business of his life."

It is evident therefore, that the only mode of remedying these evils, which is likely to be attended with success, is to establish such rules as shall oblige the proprietors of the soil, and their ryots, who alone possess the requisite information for this purpose, to come to a fair adjustment of the rates to be paid for the different kinds of lands or produce in their respective districts. Mr. Shore's proposition, that the rents of the ryots, by whatever rule or custom they may be demanded, shall be specific as to their amount,—that the land-holders shall be obliged, within a certain time, to grant pottahs or writings to their ryots, in which this amount shall be inserted, and that no ryot shall be liable to pay more than the sum actually specified in his pottah, if duly enforced by the collectors,—will soon obviate the objection to a fixed assessment, founded upon the undefined state of the demands of the land-holders upon the ryots.

When a spirit of improvement is diffused throughout the country, the ryots will find a further security in the competition of the landholders, to add to the number of their tenants.

It is no objection to the perpetuation of the zemindarry assessment, that it will not at once provide a remedy for those evils: it is sufficient if it operates progressively to that end.

Mr. Shore observes, that we have experience of what the zemindars are; but the experience of what they are, or have been, under one system, is by no means the proper criterion to determine what they would be under the influence of another, founded upon very different principles. We have no experience of what the zemindars would be under the system which I recommend to be adopted.

I agree with Mr. Shore, that some interference on the part of government, is undoubtedly necessary for effecting an adjustment of the demands of the zemindars upon the ryots; nor do I conceive that the former will take alarm, at the reservation of this right of interference, when convinced that government can have no interest in exercising it, but for the purposes of public justice. Were the government itself to be a party in the cause, they might have some grounds for apprehending the result of its decisions.

Mr. Shore observes, that this interference is inconsistent with proprietary right; that it is an encroachment upon it, to prohibit a landlord from imposing taxes upon his tenant; for it is saying to him, that he shall not raise the rents of his estates; and that if the land is the zemindar's, it will only be partially his property, whilst we prescribe the quantum which he is to collect, or the mode by which the adjustment is to take place between the parties concerned.

If Mr. Shore means, that after having declared the zemindar proprietor of the soil, in order to be consistent, we have no right to prevent his imposing new abwabs, or taxes, on the lands in cultivation, I must differ with him in opinion, unless we suppose the ryots to be absolute slaves of the zemindars: every begah of land possessed by them, must have been been cultivated under an express or implied agreement, that a certain sum should be paid for each begah of produce, and no more. Every abwab, or tax, imposed by the zemindar over and above that sum, is not only a breach of that agreement, but a direct violation of the established laws of the country. The cultivator therefore, has in such case, an undoubted right to apply to government for the protection of his property; and government is at all times bound to afford him redress. I do not hesitate therefore to give it as my opinion, that the zemindars neither now nor ever, could possess a right to impose taxes or abwabs upon the ryots; and if from the confusions which prevailed towards the close of the Mogul government, or neglect, or want of information, since we have had the possession of the country, new abwabs have been imposed by the zemindars or farmers; that government has an undoubted right to abolish such as are oppressive, and have never been confirmed by a competent authority; and to establish such regulations as may prevent the practice of like abuses, in future.

Neither is the privilege which the ryots in many parts of Bengal enjoy, of holding possession of the spots of land which they cultivate, so long as they pay the revenue assessed upon them, by any means incompatible with the proprietary rights of the zemindars. Whoever cultivates the land, the zemindars can receive no more than the established rent, which in most places is fully equal to what the cultivator can afford to pay. To permit him to dispossess one cultivator, for the sole purpose of giving the land to another, would be vesting him with a power to commit a wanton act of oppression, from which he could derive no benefit. The practice that prevailed under the Mogul government, of uniting many districts into one zemindarry, and thereby subjecting a large body of people to the controul of one principal zemindar, rendered some restriction of this nature absolutely necessary. The zemindar, however, may sell the land; and the cultivators must pay the rent to the purchaser.

Neither is prohibiting the land-holder to impose new abwabs or taxes on the lands in cultivation, tantamount to saying to him, that he shall not raise the rents of his estates. The rents of an estate are not to be raised by the imposition of new abwabs or taxes on every begah of land in cultivation; on the contrary, they will in the end, be lowered by such impositions; for when the rate of assessment becomes so oppressive as not to leave the ryot a sufficient share of the produce for the maintenance of his family, and the expenses of cultivation, he must at length desert the land. No zemindar claims a right to impose new taxes on the land in cultivation; although it is obvious that they have clandestinely levied them, when pressed to answer demands upon themselves; and that these taxes have, from various cases, been perpetuated to the ultimate detriment of the proprietor who imposed them.

The rents of an estate can only be raised, by inducing the ryots to cultivate the more valuable articles of produce, and to clear the extensive tracts of waste land, which are to be found in almost every zemindarry in Bengal. It requires no local knowledge of the revenues of this country, to decide, whether fixing the assessment, or leaving it liable to future increase, at the discretion of government or its officers, will afford the greatest encouragement to the land-holder to have recourse to these means, for the improvement of his estate.

In support of the opinion which I expressed upon a former occasion, respecting the large proportion of waste land in the Company's territories, I have annexed some extracts from the correspondence of the collector in the Dacca Province, &c.; and whoever will take the trouble to consult the public proceedings, will find there are many districts, both in Bengal and Behar, which are not better cultivated than those alluded to in letters of the above-mentioned collectors (Appendix, No. 2.)

It does not appear to me, that the regulations for the new settlement, confirm all existing taxes, if, upon enquiry, they shall appear to be unauthorized, and of recent imposition; nor that the zemindars will be entitled to deductions, upon the abolition of them.

With regard to the rates at which landed property transferred by public sale, in liquidation of arrears, and it may be added, by private sale or gift, are to be assessed; I conceive that the new proprietor has a right to collect no more than what his predecessor was legally entitled to, for the act of transfer certainly gives no sanction, to illegal impositions. I trust, however, that the due enforcement of the regulations for obliging the zemindars to grant pottahs to their ryots, as proposed by Mr. Shore, will soon remove this objection to a permanent settlement. For whoever becomes a proprietor of land after these pottahs have been issued, will succeed to the tenure, under the condition, and with the knowledge, that these pottahs are to be the rules by which the rents are to be collected from the ryots.

With respect to the talookdars, I could have wished that they had been separated entirely from the authority of the zemindars, and that they had been allowed to remit the public revenue assessed upon their lands immediately to the officers of government, instead of paying it through the zemindar, to whose jurisdiction they are subjected. The last clause in the 16th article of Mr. Shore's propositions, which directs that the lands of the talookdars shall be separated from the authority of the zemindars, and their rents be paid immediately to government, in the event of the zemindars being convicted of demanding more from them than they ought to pay, will afford them some security from oppression.

When the demand of government upon the zemindars is fixed, they can have no plea for levying an increase upon the talookdars, for I conceive the talookdars in general, to have the same property in the soil as the zemindars, and that the former, are to be considered as proprietors of lesser portions of land, paying their revenues to government, through the medium of of a larger proprietor, instead of remitting them immediately to the public treasury. The pernicious consequences which must result from affording to one individual, an opportunity of raising the public revenue assessed, upon the lands of another, at his own discretion and for his own advantage, are evident; and on this account, I was desirous that all proprietors of land, whether zemindars, talookdars, or choudries, should pay their rents immediately to the European collector of the district, or other officer of government, and be subject to the same general laws.

The number of names upon the rent-roll will add little to the business of the collector of a district, provided that the sum to be paid by each proprietor of land is fixed.

In support of this opinion, I have annexed some Extracts from the Proceedings of the Committee of Circuit; the members of which must have been well acquainted with the customs and practices of the Mogul government, (Appendix, No. 3.)

These Extracts afford convincing proofs of the proprietary rights of the inferior zemindars and talookdars; and that their being made to pay their rent through the superior zemindar of the district, was solely for the convenience of the government, which found it less difficult to collect the rents from one principal zemindar, than from a number of petty proprietors.

They further prove, that the zemindars who sold their lands to raise money for the liquidation of the public balances, disposed of all the rights which they possessed in them, as individuals; and that whatever authority they might exercise over them, after the sale, must have been virtually delegated to them by the government, and not derived from themselves; and consequently that, in separating such talookdars from the jurisdiction of the zemindars, we should not have infringed the rights of the latter, but only deviated from a practice of the Mogul government, from which that administration itself, frequently departed; and whose conduct, in cases of this nature, should not, I conceive, be made the rule of ours, when found to be inconsistent with the good of the community.

The temporary reduction of the tribute of the Rajah of Benares, adduced by Mr. Shore to prove that the internal arrangements which we may find it necessary to make, after fixing the jumma payable by each zemindar, may hereafter oblige us to grant remissions, and thereby diminish the public revenues, does not appear to me a case in point.

The revenue received from Benares, was at once raised from 22 to 40 lacks of rupees. The rajah being incapable of transacting his own affairs, the management of them was vested in a naib or deputy, whose rapacity and mal-administration, together with that of his officers, occasioned a general decline in the cultivation of the country, and consequently diminished its resources. The late reform of the customs, and internal duties, gave rise to a further temporary diminution of them.

The above, are the principal causes which have occasioned the reduction in the revenues in Benares; but as it is obvious, that similar causes will not exist either in Bengal or Behar, no arguments against fixing the assessment in these provinces, can be founded upon this temporary deficiency in the revenues of Benares.

Still less can any just conclusions be drawn against fixing the demand of government upon the lands, from the instance of the Settlement made last year in Midnapore, by the present collectors. Mr. Shore observes, that if this assessment, formed upon documents of the greatest probable authenticity, had been declared permanent, the collection of it, if enforced, would have reduced many of the talookdars to distress, and some to ruin.—That, are we not as likely, or more so, to err, in the distribution of the assessment upon collectorships, as upon the subdivisions of a particular district?

How far this reasoning is applicable to the Settlement which we are about to conclude in the districts of Bengal, will appear from a reference to our Proceedings regarding Midnapore.

The canongoe of that district delivered in accounts, in which the gross produce of the country was estimated, to be nearly double the amount of the revenue collected from it; on the account of government. The supposed profits of the land-holders, after making allowance for their charges in collecting the rents, were thought larger than what they were entitled to; and measures were taken to appropriate a part of them to the public use.

A considerable increase was accordingly imposed on the country, and the canongoe, through whom the accounts of the produce were obtained, pledged himself to become responsible, should the produce of any district fall short of his estimates.

It appears from the collector's report, referred to in Mr. Shore's Minute of the 25th November last, that the collection of this settlement was made with much difficulty, and that it was attended with great distress, entailing indigence on the renters of Mineehourah, Kookulpour, and Boccamootah; and that in the two last districts, after the mofussil assets had been completely collected, there remained a balance due from those mehals, which, it was pretty well known, was discharged by the sale of effects, and the mortgaging of rent-free lands.

The collector further represented, that the canongoe's estimates had, in many places, proved fallacious,—that the assessment was too high,—and that there was an absolute necessity for lowering it, in the ensuing year; he was accordingly directed to repair to Calcutta; and after the accounts which he brought with him, were carefully examined; we judged it expedient to grant him a general authority to propose such remissions in the assessment, as might appear to him necessary.

I confess

I confess, my expectations were never sanguine, that this settlement would be realized without distress to the numerous zemindars and talookdars, who are proprietors of the lands in Midnapore; and it is my opinion, that every attempt of this nature, to appropriate to the use of government the profits of the land-holders, allowing them only what, upon an arbitrary average estimate, is deemed sufficient for their maintenance and defraying the necessary charges of collecting the rents of their estates, will end in disappointment to government, ruin to the proprietors of the soil, and in the establishment of mutual distrust.

The history of this settlement, may be traced upon the public proceedings; and, I trust, that the state to which it has reduced many of the land-holders, will suggest to the Court of Directors very strong arguments in favour of a permanent assessment, and prove to them the justness of Mr. Shore's own observation:—"That the mere admission of the rights of the zemindars, unless followed by the measures that will give value to it, will operate but little towards the improvement of the country;—that the demands of a foreign dominion, like ours, ought certainly to be more moderate, than the impositions of the native rulers; and that to render the value of what we possess permanent, our demands ought to be fixed:—that, removed from the controul of our own government the distance of half the globe, every practicable restriction should be imposed upon the administration in India, without circumscribing its necessary power; and the property of the inhabitants be secured against the fluctuations of caprice, or the license of unrestrained controul."

The principles which influenced the conclusion of this settlement, I am happy to say, have not found admission among those which are to regulate the formation of the future settlement of the districts in Bengal; and consequently, I trust that we shall not be subjected to the same disappointment which we have experienced in Midnapore.

Mr. Shore admits the general principle of the inexpediency of the total of the public assessment being increased at any future settlement; but the adoption of his proposition to correct periodically the inequalities that may appear in the proportions which are paid by the individual land-holders, would, in my opinion, be attended with almost every disadvantage and mischievous effect that the annual farming system could be supposed to produce.

No previous assurances, however solemn, could convince the zemindars, that government would, at the expiration of their leases, be contented with less than the highest rent that could be exacted from their lands; and even if experience should prove to them, that the intention of laying an additional assessment upon the most wealthy, went no further than to indemnify the public treasury for the losses that had been sustained by deficiencies in the rents of others, it would be vain to expect them to admit the justice of the principle, that the industrious man should be taxed in proportion to the idleness and mismanagement of his neighbours; or, if they admitted it, to persuade them that the shares of those deficiencies had been fairly and impartially distributed; and I must confess, that I do not think that a government, or a set of collectors, will ever exist in this country, that would be qualified, at the end of a ten years lease, to discriminate the acquisitions of fortune, which had arisen from advantageous agreements, from those that had been produced, by the superior economy and industry of other proprietors; and consequently, that to proportion a general assessment upon that principle, would be absolutely impracticable.

Although the zemindars and other land-holders in this country, are in general extremely improvident, and from their having been hitherto harassed with annual assessments, would no doubt receive a ten years settlement with much satisfaction; yet short-sighted as they are, I cannot by any means admit, that they would not clearly see a wide difference between a tenure of short duration and a perpetuity. But should it even happen, in the first moments of their joy, that they could lay aside all apprehensions of meeting with vexations in future settlements, they would infallibly recollect themselves, when their leases approached within three or four years of a conclusion; and as the same pernicious effects would then follow, that are now experienced annually, they would endeavour to give themselves an appearance of poverty, by concealing the wealth that they might have acquired, and to depreciate the value of their lands, by neglecting their cultivation, in hopes of obtaining by those means, more advantageous terms, at an ensuing settlement; and these consequences, by withdrawing the application of certain portions of stock and industry, must operate for a time, to the general detriment of the state.

I trust, however, that it cannot be imagined that I would recommend that the proposed settlement should be made with a blind precipitation; or without our having obtained all the useful information that, in my opinion, can be expected of the real state and value of the different districts.

Twenty years have been employed in collecting information.—In 1769, supervisors were appointed;—in 1772, a committee of circuit was deputed to make the settlement, armed with all the powers of the presidency;—in 1776, aumeens were appointed to make a huzabood of the country;—in 1781, the provincial councils of revenue were abolished, and collectors were sent into the several districts, and the general council and management of the revenues, was lodged in a committee of revenue at Calcutta, under the immediate inspection of government. Like our predecessors, we set out with seeking for new information; and we have now been three years in collecting it. Voluminous reports have been transmitted by the several collectors, on every point which was deemed of importance. The object of these various arrangements has been, to obtain an accurate knowledge of the value of the lands, and of the rules by which the zemindars collect the rents from the ryots.

The

The collectors in Behar, not even excepting the two to whom Mr. Shore alludes as having declared it impracticable to make the proposed settlement, have already, with great appearance of benefit to the Company, and of advantage to the natives, made considerable progress in executing the instructions that they have received for making the ten years settlement, conformable to the orders of the Court of Directors; and in every instance where it has been stated, that further time was necessary to acquire a minute knowledge of the resources of any particular district, the board has readily acquiesced, in allowing a partial delay.

I shall certainly be no less inclined to recommend the observation of the same rule, during the progress of the settlement in Bengal and Orissa; and in those districts that, from long mismanagement, are evidently in a state of decline and disorder, I shall not only willingly agree to postpone the settlement for a twelve-month longer, but also assent to any modifications in it, that may appear to be applicable to their present conditions. But after having adopted those and such other measures as may appear necessary, from the reports and explanations which may be laid before us by the different collectors, whilst they are engaged in the execution of our instructions, I must declare, that I am clearly of opinion, that this government will never be better qualified, at any given period whatever, to make an equitable settlement of the land revenue of these provinces; and that if the want of further information was to be admitted now, or at any other future period, as a ground for delaying the declaration of the permanency of the assessment, the commencement of the happiness of the people and of the prosperity of the country, would be delayed for ever.

The question that has been so much agitated in this country, whether the zemindars and talookdars are the actual proprietors of the soil, or only officers of government, has always appeared to me to be very uninteresting to them; whilst their claim to a certain per-centage upon the rents of their lands, has been admitted, and the right of government to fix the amount of those rents at its own discretion, has never been denied or disputed.

Under the former practice of annual settlement, zemindars who have either refused to agree to pay the rents that have been required, or who have been thought unworthy of being intrusted with the management, have, since our acquisition of the Dewanny, been dispossessed in numberless instances, and their land held khas, or let to a farmer; and when it is recollected that pecuniary allowances have not always been given to dispossessed zemindars in Bengal, I conceive that a more nugatory or delusive species of property could hardly exist.

On the other hand, the grant of these lands at a fixed assessment, will stamp a value upon them hitherto unknown; and, by the facility which it will create of raising money upon them, either by mortgage or sale, will provide a certain fund for the liquidation of public or private demands, or prove an incitement to exertion and industry, by securing the fruits of those qualities in the tenure, to the proprietor's own benefit.

The latter part of Mr. Shore's Minute recorded on the 21st December, commencing from the 27th paragraph, and from thence to the conclusion, relates to a settlement of four or five pergunnahs in the collectorship of Behar Proper, concluded by the collector, and confirmed by this board on the December 1788, from year to year, until the pleasure of the Court of Directors regarding it, shall be known.

I shall hereafter record my sentiments on Mr. Shore's remarks on this settlement. I must observe, however, that they are not applicable to the general question now under discussion. The parts of that settlement which Mr. Shore thinks exceptionable, have not been adopted in the remainder of the collector's districts, nor in the other collectorship in Behar; nor is it proposed to introduce them, in the settlement of Bengal.

I have thought it necessary to say thus much, lest, from the subjects being so much blended in Mr. Shore's Minute, it should be supposed that his objections to the settlement of these pergunnahs in the collectorship of Behar Proper, are equally applicable to the general plan of settlement for the Company's dominions at large.

I readily agree, however, that the collector of Behar be called upon to answer the queries proposed by Mr. Shore; and that his reply be transmitted to the Court of Directors, with such remarks upon it as we may hereafter think necessary.

I now come to the remaining point upon which I have differed with Mr. Shore; viz. the expediency of taking into the hands of government, the collection of the internal duties on commerce; and allowing to the zemindars and others, by whom these duties have been hitherto levied, a deduction adequate to the amount which they now realize from them.

Mr. Shore's propositions for the settlement of Bengal, will point out his sentiments regarding the collection of the internal duties; and I believe it was principally at my instance, that he acquiesced in the resolution for taking the collection of these duties into the hands of government, in Behar, as entered on our proceedings of the 18th September last.

It was by my desire, also, that similar instructions were issued to the collector of Midnapore.

To those who have adopted the idea, that the zemindars have no property in the soil, and that government is the actual landlord, and that the zemindars are officers of government removable at pleasure; the question regarding the right of the zemindars to collect the internal duties on commerce, would appear unnecessary. The committing the charge of the land revenues to one officer, and the collection of the internal duties to another, would would to them appear only a deviation from the practice of the Mogul government, and not an infringement of the rights of individuals; but what I have already said will be sufficient to show, that these are not the grounds upon which I have recommended the adoption of the measure.

I admit the proprietary rights of the zemindars, and that they have hitherto held the collection of the internal duties; but this privilege appears to me, so incompatible with the general prosperity of the country, that however it may be sanctioned by long usage, I conceive there are few who will not think us justifiable in resuming it.

It is almost unnecessary to observe, how much the prosperity of this country depends upon the removal of all obstructions, both to its internal and foreign commerce. It is from these resources only, that it can supply the large proportions of its wealth, which are annually drained from it, both by the Company and by individuals.

The rates by which the internal duties are levied, and the amount of them collected in each zemindarry, have, as far as I have been able to trace, never been ascertained: when the lands of the zemindars have been leased out to farmers, these duties have been collected by them.

It is, I believe, generally allowed, that no individual in a state, can possess an inherent right to levy a duty on goods or merchandize purchased or sold within the limits of his estate, and much less upon goods passing along the public roads which lead through it. This is a privilege which the sovereign power also is entitled to exercise, and no where else can it be lodged with safety. Every unauthorized exaction levied on the goods of a merchant, and every detention of them in their progress through the country, is a great public injury. The importation of foreign commodities, and the exportation of the commodity, for accumulated exactions, by raising the price, diminish the consumption of the commodity, and the merchant is under the necessity either to give up his trade, or to go to other countries, in search of the same goods. It cannot be expected that a zemindar will be influenced by these considerations, and much less a temporary farmer, whose only object can be to exact from the cultivators of the soil, as well as from merchants and traders, as much as he can compel them to pay.

The Court of Directors themselves appear to have been of this opinion, from the following paragraph of their letter of the 10th April, 1771:—

“As we have reason to believe that many bazars are held in the provinces, without the authority of government, and which must be an infringement of its right, a great detriment to the public collection, and a burden and oppression on the inhabitants; you will take care that no bazars or gunges be kept up, but such as particularly belong to the government.—But in such bazars and gunges, the duties are to be rated in such manner as their situations, and the flourishing state of the respective districts will admit.”

And in the same letter, they observe:—“Persuaded as we are, that the internal traffic of Bengal has received further checks from the duties which are levied, and the exactions which are imposed at petty chokies, we positively direct, that no such chokies be suffered to continue, on any pretence whatever, to impede the course of commerce from one part of the province to the other. It is necessary, however, that the nine general chokies which have been established for collecting the duties payable to the circar, should remain, and these only.”

The chokies stationed upon the banks of the rivers to collect duties on boats, on the part of the zemindars, were directed to be abolished, in consequence of the Company's orders, and adequate deductions were granted to the zemindars; but the duties levied at the hauts, gunges, and inland chokies, were ordered to be continued, in the hands of the zemindars as formerly. The zemindars were also prohibited from collecting inland rahdarry duties, that is, duties upon goods not bought or sold within their zemindaries, but only passing through them. Notwithstanding this prohibition has been frequently repeated, our proceedings exhibit numerous instances of these rahdarry duties being levied by zemindars and farmers; and from opportunities which are afforded them, by having the collection of the authorized inland duties in their hand, I have every reason to believe that the practice is but too general. I understand that the collector of Nuddea has lately abolished a very considerable number of chokies, at which unauthorized duties were collected on the internal trade, by the officers of the zemindar, in defiance of the repeated orders of government. If these interruptions to commerce, are found to exist in a district almost in the neighbourhood of Calcutta, and under a vigilant collector, it may be supposed that, in the more inland parts of the country, and under collectors less active, that the evil prevails to a greater extent.

The inefficiency of the power of government to restrain zemindars from these oppressive exactions, whilst they are allowed to possess the right of levying taxes of any kind upon commerce, has been long experienced, in many shapes. It is only by the total resumption of this right, that such abuses can be prevented; and as the general interests of the country, should require that a regular system of taxation upon the internal trade of the country, and that of other nations, be established, we are justified by the constant practice of our own country, and that of other nations, in demanding from individuals, upon granting them a full compensation for their present value, a surrender of privileges which counteract so beneficial a measure.

Further benefits are to be derived from this arrangement, when the amount of the internal duties, the rates by which they are levied, and the articles subject to the payment of them, are ascertained. Some may be increased, and others diminished or struck off, according as they may be judged advisable; and in a course of time, as commerce and wealth increase, such regulations regulations may be made in the duties on the internal trade, and the foreign imports and exports, as will afford a large addition to the income of the public, whenever its necessities may require it, without discouraging trade or manufactures, or imposing any additional rent on the lands.

Having stated such remarks on Mr. Shore's Minute as appeared to me necessary, I shall subjoin the following observations on the Revenue System of this country, which may be found deserving of consideration:—

Although government has an undoubted right to collect a portion of the produce of the lands to supply the public exigencies, it cannot, consistent with the principles of justice and policy, assume to itself a right of making annual or periodical valuations of the lands, and taking the whole produce, except such portion as it may think proper to relinquish to the proprietors for their maintenance, and for defraying the charges of managing their estates.

The supreme power in every state, must possess the right of taxing the subject, agreeably to certain general rules; but the practice which has prevailed in this country for some time past, of making frequent valuations of the lands, and where one person's estate has improved, and another's declined, of appropriating the increased produce of the former, to supply the deficiencies in the latter, is not taxation, but in fact a declaration that the property of the landholder is, at the absolute disposal of government. Every man who is acquainted with the causes which operate to impoverish or enrich a country, must be sensible that our Indian territories must continue to decline, as long as the practice is adhered to.

The maxim that equality in taxation is an object of the greatest importance, and that in justice, all the subjects of a state should contribute as nearly as possible, in proportion to the income which they enjoy under its protection, does not prove the expediency of varying the demand of government upon the lands; on the contrary, we shall find that, in countries in which this maxim is one of the leading principles in the imposition of taxes, the valuation of the land on which they are levied is never varied.

In raising a revenue to answer the public exigencies, we ought to be careful to interfere as little as possible in those sources from which the wealth of the subject is derived.

Agriculture is the principal source of the riches of Bengal; the cultivator of the soil furnishes most of the materials for its numerous manufactures. In proportion as agriculture declines, the quantity of these materials must diminish, and the value of them increase, and consequently the manufactures must become dearer, and the demand for them be gradually lessened. Improvement in agriculture will produce the opposite effects.

The attention of government ought therefore to be directed to render the assessment upon the lands, as little burdensome as possible: this is to be accomplished only, by fixing it. The proprietor will then have some inducement to improve his lands; and as his profits will increase in proportion to his exertions, he will gradually become better able to discharge the public revenue.

By reserving the collection of the internal duties on commerce, government may at all times appropriate to itself, a share of the accumulating wealth of its subjects, without their being sensible of it. The burden will also be more equally distributed; at present, the whole weight rests upon the land-holders and cultivators of the soil.

Whereas the merchants and inhabitants of the cities and towns, the proprietors of rent-free lands, and, in general, all persons not employed in the cultivation of the lands, paying revenue to government, contribute but little, in proportion to their means, to the exigencies of the state. It is evident, therefore, that varying the assessment on the lands, is not the mode of carrying into practice the maxim, that all the subjects of a state ought to contribute to the public exigencies, in proportion to their incomes; and that other means must be employed for effecting this object.

In case of a foreign invasion, it is a matter of the last importance, considering the means by which we keep possession of this country, that the proprietors of the lands should be attached to us, from motives of self-interest. A land-holder, who is secured in the quiet enjoyment of a profitable estate, can have no motive for wishing for a change. On the contrary, if the rents of his lands are raised, in proportion to their improvement,—if he is liable to be dispossessed, should he refuse to pay the increase required of him,—or if threatened with imprisonment or confiscation of his property, on account of balance due to government, upon an assessment which his lands were unequal to pay; he will readily listen to any offers which are likely to bring about a change that cannot place him in a worse situation, but which hold out to him hopes of a better.

Until the assessment on the lands is fixed, the constitution of our internal government in this country, will never take that form which alone can lead to the establishment of good laws, and ensure a due administration of them. For whilst the assessment is liable to frequent variation, a great portion of the time and attention of the supreme board, and the unremitting application of the Company's servants of the first abilities, and most established integrity, will be required, to prevent the land-holders being plundered, and the revenues of government diminished, at every new settlement; and powers and functions, which ought to be lodged in different hands, must continue, as at present, vested in the same persons; and whilst they remain so united, we cannot expect that the laws which may be enacted for the protection of the rights and property of the land-holders, and cultivators of the soil, will ever be duly enforced.

We

We have, by a train of the most fortunate events, obtained the dominion of one of the most fertile countries on the face of the globe, with a population of mild and industrious inhabitants, perhaps equal to, if not exceeding in number, that of all the other British possessions put together.

Its real value to Britain, depends upon the continuance of its ability to furnish a large annual investment to Europe; to give considerable assistance to the treasury at Canton; and to supply the pressing and extensive wants of the other presidencies.

The consequences of the heavy drains of wealth, from the above causes, with the addition of that which has been occasioned by the remittance of the private fortunes, have been for many years past, and are now severely felt, by the great diminution of the current specie, and by the languor which has thereby been thrown upon the cultivation, and the general commerce of the country.

A very material alteration in the principles of our system of management, has therefore become indispensably necessary, in order to restore this country to a state of prosperity, and to enable it to continue to be a solid support to the British interests and power, in this part of the world.

We can only accomplish this desirable object, by devising measures to rouse and increase the industry of the inhabitants; and it would be in vain to hope that any means but those of holding forth prospects of private advantage to themselves, could possibly succeed to animate them to exertion.

I am sorry to be obliged to acknowledge it, but it is a truth too evident to deny, that the land proprietors throughout the whole of the Company's provinces, are in a general state of poverty and depression.

I cannot even except the principal zemindars, from this observation; and it was not without concern, that I saw it verified very lately, in one instance, by the Rajah of Burdwan, who pays a yearly rent of upwards of £.400,000 to government, having allowed some of his most valuable lands to be sold, for the discharge of an inconsiderable balance due to government.

The indolent and debased character of many of the zemindars, must no doubt have contributed to the ruin of their circumstances; and though I am afraid the cases are but few, yet I conceive it to be possible that there may be some instances, in which the poverty that is pleaded, may be only pretended.

Either supposition must, however, reflect some discredit upon our system of management; for it would imply, that we have been deficient in taking proper measures to incite the zemindars to a line of conduct, which would produce advantage to themselves; or, that if they have acquired wealth, their apprehension of our rapacity induces them to conceal it.

We are therefore called upon to endeavour to remedy evils by which the public interests are essentially injured; and by granting perpetual leases of the lands at a fixed assessment, we shall render our subjects the happiest people in India; and we shall have reason to rejoice at the increase of their wealth and prosperity, as it will infallibly add to the strength and resources of the state.

I therefore propose, that the Letter from the Board of Revenue, with the Reports of the collectors in Bengal, respecting the ten years settlement, and Mr. Shore's Minute and Proposition, delivered in for record in June last, be now entered upon the proceedings.

That a copy of Mr. Shore's Propositions (the articles relating to the gunges excepted) with such of the alterations contained in our Resolutions of the 25th November last, for the settlement of Midnapore, as are applicable to the districts in general, be transmitted to the board of revenue; and that they be directed to proceed, without delay, to form the ten years settlement in Bengal, agreeable to the rules and prescriptions therein laid down.

That the board of revenue be directed to notify to the land-holders, that the settlement, if approved by the Court of Directors, will become permanent, and no alteration take place at the expiration of the ten years.

That the board of revenue be further directed to issue the same instructions to the collectors in Bengal, for the separation of the gunges, bazars, and hauts, held within them, as have been transmitted to the collectors of Behar, and the collector of Midnapore.

Copy of a Letter from the Collector of Shahabad, to the Board of Revenue; dated the 20th September 1789.

IT is above a month since my arrival in this pergunnah, in order to prepare for the ten years settlement. The strict attention due to your orders, and no less, my anxiety to see justice done to the several zemindars with whom I am directed to form my settlement, have occasioned great and unavoidable delay, owing to the variety of claims preferred for several, nay for the greater part of the villages, of this pergunnah: so numerous are these claims, that it would be impossible to conclude a settlement, for some months to come, were a legal investigation to take place, previous to the adoption of such measures. The causes of this confusion and variety of claims, will be clearly explained by the following statement.

orders, under date the 3d of April last, I issued a perwannah to all the zemindars, requiring them to report to me without delay, the state of their several zemindariaries, in order to enable me to judge what quantity of their land could be allotted to the purpose intended by the board, with the least injury to them; and I am sorry that (no return having yet been made to my perwannah), I should, after so long a delay, be under the necessity of making my report general, and to found it upon my own knowledge, acquired by a residence of 15 years in various parts of the district.

I believe there is no district in the three provinces of Bengal, Behar, and Orissa, that has more jungle and waste land in it, than the Dacca; but the whole is claimed as the property of individuals, who, though they receive no profit from it, and are too indolent themselves, to make it productive of any, will not suffer others to bring it into a state of cultivation, without some recompence; and so very tenacious are they of it, that even in the suburbs of the city, which for three or four miles is almost an impenetrable jungle, infested by wild ferocious animals, a man cutting down a single tree, will be sued by the proprietor for damages. The board cannot therefore, I apprehend, carry their landable plan, as far as it regards this district, into execution, without creating great dissatisfaction; but as the clearing away the immense tract of jungle, and cultivating the waste land about Dacca, cannot fail of being productive of great advantage, both to government and the proprietors, as well as tend to render the place more healthy, I beg leave to offer it as my opinion, that the prejudice of a few individuals, should be no impediment to the adoption of a plan, which has for its object, the benefit of the community at large; and should the board concur with me in opinion, I will, with their permission, order a survey and measurement to be made of the waste lands; this being the only mode by which the quantity can with any degree of accuracy, be ascertained.

Extract of a Letter from the Collector of Momening, to the Board of Revenue; dated the 19th December, 1789.

"I HAVE just returned from the eight annas share of Atteya, where I have been fully employed, in regulating the collections of that pergunnah, and endeavouring to realize part of the balance of last year. The first, I have effected; and I trust the revenues in future, will be paid with greater punctuality. The mehaul is very extensive, but badly cultivated, though the soil in general is rich, and so variegated, as to be capable of producing every article that grows within the province; at the same time, so destitute of inhabitants, that I do not conceive, from the observations I could make in traversing over various parts of it, and the accounts I gathered from the most intelligent inhabitants, one-fourth was cultivated. I am well convinced, could any method be found of peopling this pergunnah, that it might be made to yield with ease, an annual revenue of sixty thousand rupees, instead of thirty thousand, at which it now stands assessed, including Russulpore."

Extracts from the Proceedings of the Committee of Circuit, held at Cossimbazar, 11th July, 1772.

Mr. Middleton's Minute.

SINCE our meeting of the 7th, I have employed myself in taking the necessary measures for supplying the committee with the several accounts they have required, in the extract delivered to me of their proceedings; but as some obstacles have occurred in the execution of such parts of the resolution as are contained in the 1st and 2d paragraphs, arising from circumstances peculiar to the Huzzoor Zillahs, which I imagine must have escaped the notice of the committee, I think it necessary, before I proceed further, to lay before them the following representation:—

From time immemorial, it has been customary for the zemindars, on falling in arrears in the payment of their rents, to raise a sum of money for that purpose, by disposing of part of their lands, either voluntarily, or by compulsion of the government. These lands, sometimes are entirely alienated, and become dependent only on the khalsah, or they are annexed to the domains of another land-holder, who purchases them; or they are allowed to continue muscoory, that is, under the jurisdiction of their former zemindar, paying only the tuk-seemy revenue, with the rate of taxes imposed on the rest of the province; but in this case, they often afterwards find means, either by complaints, or by the interposition of powerful interest, to procure an order from the government for their dismemberment, authorizing them, at the same time, to remit their rents immediately to the khalsah.

From these several methods of transferring lands, alterations have incessantly taken place in the zemindariaries, which, for want of explicit and accurate records, it would now be difficult to trace back to any particular period, without relying, in a great measure, for our information, on the zemindars and talookdars themselves.

Extensive zemindariaries have, in the course of time, been dismembered into a number of inconsiderable and independent talooks; others, which now rank in the first class, have been formed, uniting together, several small portions of land, obtained from different zemindars.—Silberis affords an instance of the first position—Rokunpoor of the second. Silberis formerly paid a revenue of upwards of a lack and fifty thousand rupees: by successive alterations, it is now reduced to less than 50,000 rupees. If the measure in agitation should take place, and the mehals, which have been separated from the greater zemindariaries, ries, should be re-annexed, Silberis will receive back lands to the amount of about 60,000 rupees, collected from the presence; and as impartiality requires, that if the huzzoor talooks are deprived of the benefit of their purchase, and re-annexed, so those also which are absorbed into zemindariaries, should be restored to their original proprietor. If so, Rokunpoor must not only yield up to Silberis its acquisitions of about 8,000 rupees, but being wholly composed of lands obtained from other zemindars, it must, by this plan of restitution, be totally annihilated.

The khas talooks, comprehend an infinite number of small portions of land, which the nabobs Sujah ul Dowlah, Jaffier Cawn, and Surpaaz Cawn, selected from several zemindariaries, to which they in general still pay the rate of land rent originally settled. These, being under the immediate inspection and care of government, have, by the establishment of gunges and other salutary measures, greatly improved, and now yield a revenue much exceeding what they would have produced, had they continued under the zemindars; and were they now to be re-annexed, in all probability a considerable loss would ensue, in the decrease of their value.

Besides a number of other instances which might be produced, many of the divisions which originally appertained to Bherole, Mehind Coolburreah, and some of the divisions of Cuttubpoor, Babuk Sing Futtypore, &c. which are each separate zemindariaries, have, by purchase, usurpation, or other means, become included in Rajeshahy. The lands, thus separated, being long considered by the possessor in the same light as his own original districts, little care has been taken to mark their respective boundaries, and in many places, it will now be found difficult to distinguish them, at least to effect it, with precision. To ascertain the cause and manner of each dismemberment, and to arrange the accounts afterwards in a new form, will, I am apprehensive, retard too long the important operations of this committee.

[16th July 1772.] The committee, remarking to Mr. Middleton the great disproportion between the several divisions which he has formed for the farms of Rajeshahy, explains it to arise from the re-annexing of the small talooks, and other separations to the pergunnahs, to which they originally belonged, or lay contiguous: these pergunnahs themselves being of different extent and amount of revenue, and the lands annexed to each, varying in the same circumstances as well as numbers, rendered it impossible to avoid an unequal distribution of the lands; and at the same time, to fulfil the intention of the committee, which was, to render the farms entire and unmixed with each other.

[20th July 1772.] The Committee, taking into consideration the subject of the talookdaries and inconsiderable zemindariaries, which compose so large a part of the huzzoor zillahs; and having maturely weighed all arguments, whether in favour of the just claim government has upon these lands for a revenue, adequate to their real value; or if the zemindars and talookdars, in support of their rights and privileges, grounded upon the possession of regular grants, a long series of family succession, and fair purchase: all these arguments considered, there occurs to the committee only the two following modes which can be pursued in making their settlement.

The first is, letting their lands to farm, putting the renters in entire possession and authority over them, and obliging them to pay each zemindar or talookdar, a certain allowance or per-centage, for the subsistence of himself and his family.

The second is, settling with the zemindars and talookdars themselves, on the footing of farmers.

[20th July 1772.] On the whole, when the committee weigh the objections against the first mode, and the arguments in favour of the second, they cannot hesitate to determine that the latter should be pursued.

Resolved, therefore, That the following inferior zemindariaries and talookdaries comprehended in the huzzoor zillahs, be settled on this plan.

EXTRACT Proceedings of the Board of Revenue in Bengal, dated 14th March 1794; and of Revenue Consultations, dated 27th March 1795; on certain Communications from the Collector of Burdwan, respecting the Difficulties experienced by the Zemindars, in realizing their Rents from the Ryots, under the Regulations of Government.

To William Cowper, Esq. President, and Members of the Board of Revenue.

Gentlemen,
I AM honoured with the receipt of your letter under date the 21st instant, wherein you desire, "that I will inform you, if, in consequence of the non-attendance of the defendant Banaressy Ghose, the judge made any application to the Sudder Dewanny adawlut."

Letter from Collector of Burdwan, 31 Jan. 1794.

In answer, I beg leave to inform you, that on a review of the portion which has been furnished me, of the established regulations, it does not appear that I am empowered to obtain the authentic information on the point in question. But from intelligence on which I think I can rely, it should seem, that on finding Banaressy Ghose, an inhabitant of Calcutta, the judge made an application to the Sudder adawlut, a few months ago; in consequence of which, a vacceel has lately appeared at Burdwan, in his stead.

These facts, I beg leave to observe, appear to me to verify the arguments stated in my letter of the 9th instant, on the part of the rajah, and moreover, to exemplify the grievance then complained of, by shewing, that although the rajah is now legally imprisoned as a defaulter to government, the defendant, though a defaulter to him, is legally at large; and further, it should seem, that the whole transaction is irreconcilable with Article I. Regulation XVII. A. D. 1793, wherein it is declared to be "essential to the prosperity of the country, and the punctual collection of the public revenue, that land-holders and farmers of land should have the means of compelling payment from defaulters, without having recourse to the courts of justice;" for a proposition thus expressed in general terms, must be understood to include all particular cases, whereas, in this case, the rajah has had no other means allowed him of redress, than by recourse to the court of justice, which, as yet, has not been able to afford him any redress at all.

It furthermore appears, that the rajah's grievance being "traceable, in the above-mentioned regulation, to its source," is, therefore, a matter of public concern; for instead of providing the means of a zemindar's enforcing payment in all possible cases, as might be expected from the general import of the above quotation made from its preamble, the sequel provides those means in one particular case only, namely, when there is property distrainable, which being by no means a common case, more especially with under-renters, who grow no crops themselves, nor with ryots, when they keep their outer-doors shut and barred.* It follows, that the point which is declared to be essential to the prosperity of the country, and the punctual collection of the public revenue, is but partially accomplished, though a regulation has been expressly framed with the view of attaining it entire. It seems, in fine, like promising help in every case, explaining how help shall be afforded in one particular case, and then concluding (as in Section XXXIII) with a declaration, that in all other cases the party shall be at liberty to help himself.

Were the difference which I conceive to exist, and which I have endeavoured to point out, between the profession in the preamble, and the performance in the sequel of the Regulation alluded to, a mere verbal distinction, I should not have presumed to offer any remark on the subject; but in an office which has close affinity with the punctual collection of the public "revenue," if not, in some measure, with the "prosperity of the country," I trust it will not be thought unbecoming my relative situation, to ask for explanation, whenever a circumstance, declared to be essential to both those particulars, shall, instead of being completely realized, appear to be either extremely ambiguous or extremely defective, whether the ambiguity or defect be imputable to the imperfections of the human understanding, or to the quality of the performance itself. But if, on the contrary, not deeming such discussions expedient, you intimate a disapprobation of my thus applying in plain, though respectful terms, for important information, no imprudent zeal shall urge me to transgress a second time. I am, &c.

To

To William Cowper, Esq. President, and Members of the Board of Revenue.

Gentlemen,

Para. 1. I duly received your letter of the together with the extract of a letter from the Governor General in Council, the contents of which being immediately notified to Ranny, she, the next day, entered into an engagement for the revenue assessed upon the Burdwan part of her son's zemindary, under the same terms as it was before held, and more-over to be answerable for the balance then outstanding against it. The rajah was immedi-ately released from confinement; but agreeably to the public regulations, the attachment, as per inclosed establishment, was continued on the estate, until the balance should be liquidated.

2. The Ranny soon after paid S^r R^s 2,07,000 into the Treasury, and the ameen has re-ceived and remitted from the Sudder mustagers S^r R^s 1,57,111; but there still remains due on the kist of Poose S^r R^s 3,14,641, and the month of Maag being now expired, the total demand at present outstanding is S^r R^s 6,03,215.

3. I have repeatedly written to the Ranny, requiring of her to perform her engagement of paying up the balance, at the same time, reminding her that by Section VI. Regulation XIV. A. D. 1793, she might be adjudged subject to the payment of interest at 12 per cent. upon the arrear; but have as yet obtained no satisfactory answer; and I am now informed that she is withdrawn from business, and retired to her habitation at Ambore.

4. It appears from the report of the ameen, that about S^r R^s 6,82,500 was collected by the rajah during the month of Poose, no part of which can have been paid into this treasury, unless the payment of S^r R^s 2,00,000 made as above mentioned by the Ranny, was part of that sum. It further appears from the ameen's report, that the sum of S^r R^s 3,03,742 is due from the zemindary renters, upon the current year, and the total demand on the part of government to the end of the year, including the balance now outstanding, being S^r R^s 8,95,530. There is an apparent deficiency of S^r R^s 5,04,790, which in my humble opinion, is a circumstance of such consequence as to deserve immediate consideration; and having in this conjuncture, done every thing in my power agreeably to the Regulations, by holding the estate under attachment, I wait for any further instructions that you may deem it necessary to issue on the occasion.

5. As far as the rajah's object can be inferred from his conduct in the late transaction, it appears to have been to embezzle as much as he could of the rents, and leave government to look to the Ranny for the balance which would happen in consequence. This would not subject the Ranny to any inconvenience, for being by her sex exempted from im-prisonment or coercion of any kind, she would remain undisturbed, till the end of the year; while the rajah, no longer subject to restraint, would be at full liberty to try every means he might think conducive to the reduction of the assessment on the district, which appears to me to have been his aim, ever since he entered into his decennial engagement; and should this scheme fail, he might then speculate in regard to any land that might be sold to realize the balance, by repurchasing any meahals offered at an advantageous jumma, leaving the rest to the risk of government, as in the case of Mundulghant, by the exchange of which dis-advantageous meahal for the one he at the same time purchased in Bishenpore, he has undoubtedly gained very considerably. The mode of transferring and recovering possession of land, may, for any thing I know, be perfectly consistent with the public regulations, though it nevertheless appears to me to be an abuse of the inestimable privileges and immunities bestowed on landholders by the British government; the effect of which mode of abuse have already been experienced in loss of revenue in the instance above mentioned, and in the embarrassments to which it has contributed in Bishenpore. Could the jumma be appropriated on land to be sold in the rates prescribed, and with the facility that seems to be supposed in the Regulations (though they no where point out how it is to be done) the danger alluded to, would be in a great measure, avoided; but in an extensive province like this, without ranongoes or hustaboods, as they exist in Behar, and where every glim-mering of light which might lead to a discovery of the actual state of the mofussil, has either been extinguished, or given up to the proprietor, it may be worth the consideration of the board to determine, how, in the event of selling land, the necessary information is to be procured; or whether some better method may not be devised than the one prescribed to me for the same purpose, at the beginning of this year; though if that be still thought ade-quate or sufficient, I shall at any time be ready to enter upon it. All I can at present do, is to give timely notice, by pointing out the apparent designs of the parties concerned, and what will probably be the state of affairs here at the end of the year, and to repeat what I had long ago occasion to observe to the board, namely, that almost all the renters, or sudder mustagers, as well as the kutkenadars, or those who stand in gradation downwards next to the ryots, are either immediate servants or dependents of the late zemindar, and consequently engaged to promote his views and forward his schemes, by fabricating and falsifying accounts, and by every species of finesse formerly practised by the natives on such occasions, and which the benevolent policy of the British government, has not yet, I fear, had the effect of eradicating from the district of Burdwan. If therefore it should become necessary for an hustabood of the country to be taken, or if the collusive views of the Ranny and the rajah should be such as to oblige government to continue the collections by an ameen surburraear, or whatever denomination the Regulations may assign; I would submit it to the consideration of the board, whether it may not at the same time, be expedient to remove the rajah out of the district; a measure which, although not sanctioned by any regulation I have as yet been furnished with, may nevertheless be found essential to the preservation of the revenue, in a state undiminished.

6. Upon the whole, it appears to me advisable, that some prompt and decisive measure should be adopted, which might convince the parties concerned, that no scheme they can have devised to effect a reduction of assessment, will be suffered to succeed; and that in the event of land being sold, the assessment shall be rated with such accuracy as to prevent their recovering possession of it, in the manner they appear to have in view. This might, if any thing could, induce them to pay up the balance outstanding, which I am convinced they want inclination more than ability to perform; and to seek advantage, in attention to their mofussil concerns, rather than in schemes of the nature which have been suggested. The former mode of conduct was recommended to the rajah, though to no purpose, by my predecessor, and has been constantly urged to him, with as little effect, by myself; and I have no longer any expectation of either him or the Ranny, pursuing the path pointed out to zemindars by the Regulations, while they can entertain a hope of advancing their interests, by indirect methods. Though Article VI. Section II. Regulation I. A. D. 1793, does not assume it as a fact, yet it is there introduced as a reasonable trust and dependence, that proprietors of land will now by good management improve their estates, and discharge the revenue regularly; whereas, in regard to the proprietor under consideration, the only management observable on his part, has been in withholding payment of the re-venue, and in endeavours to overset his decennial settlement; showing himself, thereby, either insensible to the great benefits conferred on him by that regulation, or ungrateful, and therefore unworthy of them.

7. In the foregoing observations, I have alluded to the rajah as proprietor of the ze-mindary, under a persuasion that he has still as much interest in the property lately transferred, as he had before the transfer took place; and that the Ranny is no more than an instrument which he uses to cover and promote his designs.

(Extract.)

To William Cowper, Esq. President, and Members of the Board of Revenue.

Gentlemen,

IN the toujee last transmitted, I proposed explaining the balance standing against Bishenpore, by a separate letter, which I have now the honour of addressing to you on that subject.

To convey a clear idea of the case, it may be necessary, first, to describe the relative situations of the two proprietors; which I shall endeavour to do, as briefly as possible.

Bishenpore appears to be one of the most ancient estates in the country; for by an æra peculiar to itself, it must have been held in possession by the present proprietor's family, through a course of 1,099 years.

Some years ago, the head of a junior branch of this family, drove out the senior, and possessed himself of the zemindary; but a military force sent by government, after subduing him, restored the fugitive Choyton Sing to possession, as sole zemindar. The person so subdued, was afterwards, by a decision of the Company's resident at Moor-shedabad, declared entitled to one half of the district; but Choyton Sing, the other party, appealing to the Governor General and Council, had a decree given in his favour, con-firming him in possession as zemindar, and declaring the respondent Damooder Sing entitled only to a maintenance. The decree is said to be dated 1787.

In 1791, a new decision was notified to the collector of Beerbhoom, whereby the ze-mindary was again divided between the contending parties; but Choyton Sing, not ac-quiescing, instituted a suit in the dewanny adawlut of Beerbhoom, which the judge dismissed. The plaintiff, however, persisting in his claim, appealed to the Sudder dewanny adawlut, where the cause at this present time, lies undetermined, or, if determined, without notification thereof having yet been received.

Previous both to the decennial settlement, and to the last order for dividing the zemindary, an investigation was made by special commission, into the assets of the country, whereby, agreeably to the principles of the public regulations, many advantages, enjoyed, it is said, from time immemorial, either as appendages to the state of the ancient rajahs, or con-nived at by the Mahomedan government, were abolished, or resumed as inconsistent with the definition established of proprietary right; and the gross assets of the country being rated at about S^r R^s 4,60,269, the proprietors were adjudged entitled to one-eleventh part only of the net estimated collections. But under the khas collections of that year, the country yielded much less than the estimated produce; viz. only S^r R^s 4,00,000. At this conjuncture, Choyton Sing being called upon to make his decennial settlement, engaged (too hastily, as he wishes to have it understood) for a net jumma of S^r R^s 4,00,000, being fearful that his adversary Damooder Sing might supersede him, with an offer of that amount; but falling in arrears at the end of the year, more than half the zemindary was sold to realize the balance, and thereby his adversary, who in the interim had been declared entitled to half the estate, as before mentioned, was equally involved.

But though neither of these parties can dispute the validity of the engagement for the jumma of S^r R^s 4,00,000, whether imprudently contracted or not, they both assert that cir-cumstances have occurred, extremely injurious to them, and which, if not remedied, must end in their utter ruin.

They

Letter from Collector of Burdwan, 12 Feb. 1794.

They say, that certain assets enjoyed by government, under the khas collection, and making a part of the estimate before mentioned, on the grounds of which estimate their decennial engagement was founded, have been since abolished, without their having received any deduction or consideration for the same, when their lands were sold; and without any deduction or consideration being made for the same, in the balance now in demand against them, on account of the year last expired, for which balance almost all the part remaining of their estate, is now under attachment and orders for sale.

They moreover allege, that the jumma assigned to them after the sale of their land at the khalsa, to liquidate the balance of 1198, was over-rated in the sum of S^r R^s 20,467, and that by consequence this excess enters into every subsequent balance outstanding against them, a circumstance which they explain, by declaring the sale in question, to have been made contrary to justice, and to the rule laid down by government for such cases. For, instead of the assessment upon the lands sold, being proportioned to the actual produce of the whole zemindary in the ratio prescribed, the net produce only of the lands sold was considered, out of which a deduction of malikana was allowed the purchasers, amounting to S^r R^s 20,467, which, as the produce of the whole estate fell short that year of its assessment, became an unequal burthen on the part remaining, and has had the effect of increasing by that amount every subsequent balance.

In addition to the foregoing, they represent it as a hardship, that there are suits to the amount of S^r R^s 14,000, instituted to recover demands of rent on account of last year, still undecided in the adawlut, owing to the delay incident to those courts. The several articles are as follows:

Abkary Mehal	-	-	-	-	-	-	S ^r R ^s 750
Soodran Mehal	-	-	-	-	-	-	1,365
Dehdarry	-	-	-	-	-	-	331
Malikana allowed the purchaser of Buzaha-zary, &c.	-	-	-	-	-	-	20,467
Suits pending in the Adawlut	-	-	-	-	-	-	22,913
							36,913

In regard to the balance stated in the present towjee, the zemindars represent it to be owing partly to the circumstances above recited, and partly to the contumacy of a species of mockurreyders termed gatwalls, and others, who hold lands under fixed jummas, amounting together to about S^r R^s 12,000, hitherto regularly paid, whether under khas management or a zemindary settlement; but being, in consequence of the police arrangements, now put under the direction of the police darogahs. These landholders deny any obligation of service due to the zemindars, and refuse to pay rent; and the local circumstances of the case, being such as to render recovery of the demand, by the rules laid down for distraint, impossible, more especially as they are encouraged in their contumacy by the darogahs, the proprietors have no other resource than an application to the dewanny adawlut, where prompt decision is possible.

Extract BENGAL Revenue Consultations, the 27th March 1795.

No. 28. To the Honourable Sir John Shore, Baronet, Governor General in Council, Fort William.

Honourable Sir,

ENCLOSED we have the honour to transmit to you a copy of a letter, and its enclosure, from the collector of Burdwan, stating the inconvenience which has occurred in the collection of the public revenue in the district in general, and more particularly in the zemindary of Bishenpore, from the delay incident to the decision in the adawlut upon malguzarry suits.

2. As the conclusions which the collector has endeavoured to establish, appear to be the natural result of the circumstances stated in his letter, and as we have no reason to doubt of the truth or accuracy of the facts adduced by him, we think it our duty to express our concurrence in the sentiments delivered by him, considered in their relation to the public revenue; but what appears to us to render the object of his address the more worthy of attention is, that judging from the representations which have at different times come under our consideration from most of the collectors, as well as the principal land-holders, particularly in the Bengal provinces, we are led to apprehend that the same inconvenience is pretty generally felt throughout the country.

3. It is true, that guided in the execution of our official duties by the rules laid down in the Regulations, which would indicate that the recovery of the mofussil rents is a matter of private concern between the land-holders and their tenants; and that any existing disputes between them is not to impede the punctual discharge of the public revenue; we have hitherto given no sort of encouragement to such representations as had for their object a suspension of the public demand, on no other ground than the difficulty stated to exist in enforcing payment of the rents from the ryots and under tenants. Should it however appear, as we think is the case, in the instance at present before us, that great real inconvenience is sustained from the causes above recited, we humbly conceive it to be an object well worthy worthy of attention, to provide against an evil that must in the end, be equally felt by government and the landholders; by government, because of the impediments which it cannot fail to occasion, in the discharge of the public revenue; and by the landholders, inasmuch as they would be subject to have their lands sold, when in fact they had not the means of making good their engagements with government, from the delay incident to the judicial process; for as the collector of Burdwan justly intimates, where the sudden assessment bears so great a proportion to the gross produce of the lands, as it does in this country, it is morally impossible for the landholders to acquit themselves of their engagements to the public, unless they have the means of realizing, with perfect punctuality, their own demands upon their under-tenants.

4. In the foregoing observations, we have confined ourselves to what we conceive to be the effect of the circumstances stated by the collector, considered with respect to the public revenue. In any other relation, however well entitled the collector's remarks may be to the attention of government, we should not have thought it our province to have done more than lay them before you, for your consideration. But as we have thought it incumbent upon us, to submit to you our sentiments upon the existing circumstances, as stated by the collector, from the intimate connection which they have with the public revenue, we in like manner, think it our duty to express our concurrence in his opinion, that the object proposed cannot in any mode be so effectually attained, as by establishing more courts for the dispatch of public business, either with separate and independent jurisdictions, or subordinate to the principal court of the district as at present constituted, with such restrictions against the institution of vexatious and litigious suits, to which we apprehend the present heavy accumulation of business is principally to be ascribed, as may appear to you most advisable.

We have the honour to be, &c.

Revenue Board, the 17th of March 1795.

To William Cowper, Esq. President, and Members of the Board of Revenue, Fort William.

Gentlemen,

1. I HAVE had the honour of receiving your instructions in regard to Bishenpore, which shall be duly attended to, and the requisite statements furnished as soon as possible; in the interim, I beg leave to request your attention to the inclosed translate of a representation which has just been made to me by the surbracaur of that zemindary, who was appointed to the trust by the late collector of Beerbhoom, under your sanction.

2. Independent of the credit due to an intelligent person, as the surbracaur appears to be, who can have no interest in misrepresenting the circumstances stated, I have reason to believe, from my own experience in other parts of the district, and more especially from the part I am now in, that the inconvenience, delays, and obstructions he complains of, in regard to the Mofussil collections, do really exist—that the grievance is increasing, and that unless effectual means be taken to remove or to diminish it, embarrassments must ensue that will eventually involve the public interest in loss of revenue.

3. It will, I believe, on enquiry, be found, that the representation of the surbracaur of Bishenpore, in regard to the pending suits, is strictly true; and I think it extremely probable, that some of the kulkendars, as he further states, have, on observing the delay incident to the judicial process, been induced to withhold the dues of the present year. The disadvantage, in this particular instance, appears to me to fall on government, by the balance of revenue outstanding against the zemindary of Bishenpore being thereby increased, in an amount which cannot be realized until the adawlut shall have decided on the suits pending; and as a decision cannot be soon expected, it is not improbable that most of the balances will on that account, be found irrecoverable, from failures, deaths, and desertion.

4. If it shall appear, from what I have the honour of adducing in this address, or from any other information which it may be thought necessary to procure, that the constitution of the adawlut, in this extensive district, and the mode of proceeding therein, are such as afford no adequate means to zemindars and others, of speedily enforcing payment of their just demands; but, on the contrary, leave it in the power of their under-renters and ryots to withhold their rents, through a term almost indefinite; the board will, I trust, interest itself so far as to bring the grievance under the notice of government, in such a manner, as may be productive of effectual redress. In order to convey a clear conception of the necessity there appears to me to be for such an application, I beg leave to solicit the board's attention to the following circumstances:—I have reason to believe that the whole number of suits now undecided in the adawlut of this district, will be found to be not less in number than thirty thousand, and that half this accumulation of business in arrears, has been taken place, in the course of about nine months. To judge, therefore, from an experience of nine months, of the adequacy of the court to answer the object of its institution, in which the due collection of the rents and the public interest are immediately concerned, or, in other words, to estimate the excess of its business, beyond what, under its present constitution, human powers can perform, a computation may be made on the following grounds:—Let it be admitted that the court can get through ten suits per diem, which, considering that that there is likewise a foudjarry office of constant and very considerable business to be supplied, and that every suit in the dewanny adawlut, whether for a large or a small sum, requires the same formality of procedure, is, I apprehend, the utmost that it can be supposed to perform; and allowing, in the same estimate, that the court sit for the dispatch of business every day in the year, not even Sundays excepted, the period requisite for it to clear off its present load of business, would be no less than between eight and nine years; at the end of which term, admitting the number of plaints filed, or that the business of the court should be equal to what it has proved for nine months past, the load of business, instead of being perfectly gotten rid of, would be found increased, in the number of one hundred and sixty thousand suits still pending, or more than five times what it is at present. It follows, therefore, that a man who at this time files a bill in the dewanny adawlut, and provided his cause be brought to decision in regular rotation, cannot look for redress of his injury to be afforded him, in less than eight years; and that a man who, at the end of that period, should file a bill, could have no very good prospect of its being brought to decision, in the whole term of his life; and, moreover, that the number of plaints pending at the end of every year, would be found still accumulating in a ratio which would ultimately prolong the prospect of decision, beyond any assignable limit, and thereby destroy the purposes of an adawlut altogether.

5th. The board will not, I presume, ascribe the vast accumulation of business now in arrears, and the consequent deplorable state of the inhabitants of this district, in regard to judicial matters, to any want of diligence on the part of the court of adawlut, but to causes which nothing less than the interposition of government itself can remove, by rendering the judicial process in revenue causes more summary and expeditious, by adding many more courts of adawlut to the district, or otherwise, as in its wisdom, may appear expedient; and I trust that the candour of the board will impute to me, for bringing forward the foregoing circumstances to their notice in this earnest manner, no other motive than what is consistent with a just sense of my duty to government, which suggested, that a point of so much importance, both to its own interests, and to the cause of humanity in general, should not be concealed. It is the avowed purpose of the public Regulations, to afford the natives a free and impartial distribution of justice, and in particular, a speedy adjustment of the malguzary disputes; and the latter, is undoubtedly the more necessary, because a landholder is liable to be deprived of his property for the satisfaction of the dues of government, whether his own dues have been satisfied, or not; but from the proportion the land-tax in this country bears to the whole produce of an estate, it is clear, that unless the dues of the landholder be wholly or very nearly satisfied, he must be unable to perform his engagements, unless by loans, which would prove but a temporary expedient; and though it might support his credit for a short time, would, under the circumstances above stated, only make his eventual ruin the more certain.

I have, &c.

THE unprosperous state of the Bishenpore collections, must already be known to you.—Every possible attention, however, has been and still continues to be paid to the mofussil business; and the collections made up to this time, will be found to exceed the amount realized by the same time last year, in the sum of 16,000 rupees, and there are considerable balances due from the renters. But the renters and kutkenadar, in this part of the country, are dishonest; and the mode of managing them is not now the same, as it was formerly.

No other mode of enforcing the just demand of rent, besides what is prescribed in the public Regulations, can now be used; the causes which were instituted in the adawlut for the enforcement of demands of rent last year, and before that time, lie undecided, and the renters of the present year are prepared to avail themselves again of the same delay, by withholding payment of the rents, and thereby compelling me to have recourse to the adawlut; for these people, observing that the demands long standing, which were long since submitted to the adawlut, are not yet enforced, they say to themselves, "Recourse was had to the adawlut in the past years, to make us pay our rents, but nothing has been effected against us, why, therefore, should we fear to withhold the dues of the present year?" We cannot be forced to pay without orders from the adawlut, and have nothing to fear for the present. Having ascertained that such were their intentions, I wished to avoid instituting suits in the adawlut, as I first proposed; and pressed them again for payment of the rent now due, meaning to wait at least till the end of the year, before I applied to the adawlut; but the renters observing this forbearance, and that without instituting suits at law, I was endeavouring to collect the rents, have, under pretence of my collecting money in advance, instituted suits against me. Thus Shrimut Pauza, Lucken Mahty, and others, the securities for the renters of the Bucksey mehal, and other mehals in Terf Bytub, against whom there are balances outstanding to the amount of Sicca rupees 5,000, have, on pretence of my collecting from those mehals, or in advance, procured a summons to be sent for my appearance before the adawlut. On similar occasions, and at the time when this district made a part of the Beerbhoom zillah, a perwannah only used to be sent from the huzoor, requiring me to give a statement of the account between me and the renter, with a requisition, that in case the demand I had against me, the order was, that if I persisted to exact more than was due, I should, upon proof of the fact, be fined in three times the amount: while this mode of adjustment prevailed, it was not in the power of the renters to withhold the just dues under frivolous and false pretences; but, under under the present Regulations, these people have it in their power, not only to withhold the just demand, but to obtain orders for my appearance before the adawlut. From these causes, considerable balances will I fear accumulate in this part of the country, by the close of the present year, and I think it my duty to inform you of my apprehensions.

If a more speedy settlement of malguzary causes be not afforded by the adawlut, it will be difficult to satisfy the dues of government.

Minute of the Board.

No. 30.—1. The address from the board of revenue of the 17th instant, with that from the collector of Burdwan to them, and its enclosure, contain the following assertions, for the consideration of the board:—

2. First,—That the delay incidental to decisions in the adawlut upon malguzarly suits, has produced great inconvenience in the collection of the public revenue throughout the district of Burdwan, and more particularly in the zemindary of Bishenpore.

3. Second,—That, from the representations of most of the collectors, as well as the principal landholders, particularly in the Bengal provinces, the board of revenue have reason to apprehend, that the same inconvenience is pretty generally felt throughout the country.

4. Third,—That the landholders cannot discharge their engagements to the public, unless they have the means of realizing, with perfect punctuality, their own demands upon their under-renters.

5. Fourth,—That the evil noticed in the preceding remarks, must in the end, be equally felt by government and the landholders.

6. To remedy it, they propose the establishment of more courts for the dispatch of business.

7. The following observations occur on the preceding recapitulation:—

8. With respect to the difficulties said to be experienced in the collection of the rents in the part of Bishenpore, to which the collector alludes, and the jumma of which does not exceed a lack and a half of rupees; the proceedings lately submitted by the board of revenue on the subject of this zemindary, evince that, however they may have been enhanced by delay in the decisions of the courts of adawlut, they are ascribable, in the first instance, to the incapacity of the zemindars, and to the dissensions that have prevailed in the family, and which, for many years past, have operated to the prejudice of the zemindary.

9. With regard to the Burdwan zemindary, the Governor General in Council has before him undoubted evidence, that the stated difficulties have not operated to such an extent as to prevent the realizing of the rents of the zemindar, or the payment of the public revenue.

10. This year the collector, greatly to his credit on the part of the zemindar, has not only been enabled to discharge the public revenue from the rents which he has realized from the country, but has always had a considerable surplus in the treasury; and his last toujee account for Poose, the instalment for which month, is the heaviest in the year, exhibits a surplus collection of 1,05,596, after discharging the demands for that month.

11. The Governor General in Council is aware, however, that the jurisdiction of the court of Burdwan, especially since it has been so much enlarged by the late annexations of the populous places and districts on the western banks of the Hooghly and Cossimbazar rivers, recommended by the board of revenue in their letter of the 1st July last, is too extensive, being in a quadruple proportion to most of the other jurisdictions, calculating according to their revenue and population. He is sensible that no effectual provision can be made for the speedy decision of the causes which must necessarily arise in so extensive a jurisdiction; whilst there is only one court of dewanny adawlut established in it. This is an evil which requires immediate correction, by the establishment of another court of dewanny adawlut; and he accordingly now resolves, that it shall take place; the delimitation of its jurisdiction to be hereafter made.

12. That some delay may have arisen in other districts, in the decision of revenue suits, the Governor General in Council conceives to be probable; but that the inconvenience has not operated to an extent to affect materially the collection of the public revenue, will be evinced from the following facts and remarks:—

13. Firstly,—The account submitted, with the letter from the board of revenue of the 10th instant, above recorded, exhibits a balance of rupees 5,58,824 only, on account of the revenues of the provinces for the past year, a considerable part of which, the board make no doubt will be realized.

14. Secondly,—That the revenues of the current year have been as well realized as in former years, the toujee now before the board for Poose (the payments made on account of which month, are always considered as a good criterion for forming a judgment of the punctuality with which the remaining kists are likely to be realized) exhibiting the following balance in each of the provinces, which, from the annexed comparative statement of the balances balances appearing on the Poore tomes in the preceding ten years, will be found to be less than the amount that has been usually outstanding at the same period:—

Bengal	-	-	-	-	-	16,53,265	15	3
Behar	-	-	-	-	-	10,828	2	10--1
Orissa	-	-	-	-	-	1,86,647	12	15
							18,50,741	14 6

15. Thirdly,—That of the balance out-standing in Bengal, about one half is due from two persons only, viz. the zemindars of Beerbhoom and Rajeshahy; and that this failure in their payments, has originated in causes wholly foreign to the administration of justice: the former, having dissipated the public revenue in the most profligate extravagance and debauchery, for which, and at the instance of his own family, process has been instituted to bring him under the regulations of disqualified landholders; and the latter, ascribing his balances to his inability to pay the jumma assessed on his estate, in consequence of the difficulties in which he was involved by the misconduct of the late collector Mr. Henckell, and of government having prohibited him from levying certain articles of revenue from the ryots, that, as he states, formed a part of the assets on which his jumma was computed.

16. Fourthly,—That in the zillah of Burdwan, where the inconveniences stated in the letter from the board of revenue, are asserted to have been experienced to the greatest extent, both the rents of the zemindar of Burdwan, and the revenue of government, have been realized, with unprecedented punctuality; and that where the balances are heaviest, viz. the zemindaries of Beerbhoom and Rajeshahy, the deficiency is acknowledged and established, as above noticed, to be owing to other causes, wholly unconnected with the administration of justice.

17. Fifthly,—That in the provinces of Behar, in which the rents of the zemindars and the revenue of government are collected under the same regulations as in Bengal, the revenues of the past and current years have been discharged, with greater punctuality than in any former year. That had the difficulty, which some of the zemindars in Bengal assert to have experienced in making their payments, originated solely in the causes to which they have assigned, their operation, it is to be presumed, would have been felt in Behar.

18. Sixthly,—That notwithstanding the difficulties said to have been experienced, the collectors have nevertheless been able to realize the revenues of the past and current year, with the same punctuality as formerly, and under the reduced authority vested in them by the Regulations of 1793, and the further limitation of it by the 3d Regulation passed on the 14th March 1794, which prohibits the seizing and confining the persons of proprietors of land, in the summary mode heretofore invariably practised in this country.

19. The preceding facts afford the strongest ground for presuming, that where material difficulties have been experienced in the collection of the rents or revenues, they are to be ascribed chiefly to that mismanagement which has long marked the conduct of many of the principal zemindars in Bengal. This is an evil, the correction of which is to be looked for only from time and the operation of the principles of the Regulations, which, whilst they protect the landholders in their just rights, leave them to suffer the consequences of mismanagement and breach of engagements.

20. The very ground of the complaints alluded to by the board of revenue, evinces that the great body of the people employed in the cultivation of the lands, experience ample protection from the laws; and that they are no longer subject to the arbitrary exactions by which their industry was formerly depressed. To afford them this protection, was one of the primary objects of the Regulations, the attainment of it being indispensable to the future security of the public revenue, and the prosperity of the country at large.

21. The Governor General in Council, however, is aware that it is equally just, as well as essential to the punctual collection of the public revenue, that the proprietors and farmers of land should have the means of enforcing payment of the rents or revenue due to them from their under-farmers, ryots, and dependent talookdars; and that these descriptions of persons should in like manner, be enabled to collect the rents from which their payments to the proprietors and farmers, of whom they held their lands, are to be made good.

22. On the provisions made for this purpose, the Governor General in Council states the following remarks:

23. Regulation XVII. 1793, was enacted with a view to enable individuals of every description, entitled to collect the rents or revenues of land, to enforce payment of arrears that might be due to them, without application to the courts of judicature, as far as they might be realizable from the crops and personal property of the defaulter, leaving him to sue in the courts for redress, in the event of any sums being unjustly exacted from him. This was the leading principle of the Regulation; but to prevent so extensive a power from being abused on the first delegation of it, provisions were made for obliging distrainers to withdraw the attachments on property, in the event of their demands being contested by defaulters, and of their giving security to try the demands within a certain time, and to pay interest on the arrear, in the event of it being decreed to be due with costs. These clauses, however, the Governor General in Council has reason to believe have counteracted the object of the Regulation, by the delay often unavoidable in bringing suits to a conclusion, and the opportunity which they afford to individuals, of protracting the discharge of just demands. He accordingly determines to repeal these clauses.

24. But this distraining Regulation was obviously calculated only for the recovery of rents from the cultivators of the land, or arrears from under-renters, the amount of which might not exceed what could be realized from the sale of crops or personal property. The provisions made for this purpose, although of the most essential importance to the proprietors of land in general, afford but a partial assistance in the great zemindaries, the proprietors of which farm out the rents of considerable tracts of country to under-farmers, who often return arrears to so large an amount, as to render the proprietor himself unable to make good his payments to the public.

25. The recovery of arrears of this description, notwithstanding any further aids that may be afforded to them, must undoubtedly often depend on the expedition with which justice is in general administered.

26. A comparison of the provisions made by the existing Regulations, for the administering of the laws, with those which before existed, will be sufficient to evince how far the former are adequate to their object, or otherwise, and to enable the Governor General in Council to form a satisfactory determination on the suggestion of the board of revenue, for establishing more courts of judicature, as applicable to the districts in general, exclusive of Burdwan.

27. Formerly there was only one court of judicature in each zillah; the judge was likewise the collector of revenue, and the greater part of his time was necessarily appropriated to the business of realizing the collections, which admitted of no protraction; to making the settlements; and to the voluminous correspondence and references incident to this branch of his duty.

28. Under the existing Regulations, Firstly, the judges have no concern with the revenues: the administration of the laws is their sole duty: they have been exonerated from furnishing translates in appealed causes, and their epistolary correspondence has been rendered extremely limited. Secondly, by the 8th Regulation of 1794, an additional court, under the superintendence of the register, has been established in each jurisdiction, for the trial of petty causes; and the judge is empowered to avail himself of the assistance of the collector, for the adjustment of accounts, in causes regarding rent or revenue. Lastly, a third court, for the trial of petty causes, under the superintendence of the cauzy of the station, at which the dewanny adawlut in each zillah is established, is erected by the 40th Regulation of 1793, which likewise provides for the establishment of local tribunals in the different parts of each zillah, for trial of suits not exceeding fifty rupees. These tribunals will at once relieve the courts of at least nine-tenths of the suits now depending (which, from a reference to the registers, will be found to fall short of this sum), and lessen their business proportionably in future, and, consequently, enable them to determine with expedition, the causes of magnitude which may come before them.

The operation, however, of the two last-mentioned Regulations, have not yet been felt, owing to the unavoidable delay in printing and circulating the Regulations, and the translates of them.

29. To these temporary obstacles, incidental to so extensive an arrangement as the establishment of a new form of constitution for the internal government of the country, may be added the arrears of causes of many years, that were found on the files of the courts, and the further accumulation of them, during the first year after the introduction of the arrangements; the greater part of which unavoidably elapsed, before the judges could proceed to their stations and commence the exercise of their functions.

30. With regard to the present forms of judicial procedure, the board observe, that forms are equally essential to the due administration of justice, and to the expeditious determination of suits; and where the forms now prescribed, differ from those heretofore in use, the variation has been made, with a view to render them better adapted to the purposes for which they are established.

31. With these facts before him, the Governor General in Council has no hesitation in declaring, that whatever delay may have arisen in the decision of causes in the present or past year, it is not ascribable to the want of the necessary provisions for expediting the termination of them, but to the ample provisions already made for that purpose, not having yet had time to operate; and as the expeditious determination of suits tends to prevent litigation, in the same proportion as it is encouraged by delay in the administration of the laws, he entertains no doubt but when the different tribunals are established in the full exercise of their powers, that the suits now depending will soon be brought to a determination, and that in future, causes will be decided, with all the expedition necessary to give full effect to the principles of the Regulations. The monthly and half-yearly reports required from the judges, by the 18th Regulation passed in 1793, will afford the most satisfactory evidence, how far these expectations are realized; and that the Governor General in Council may have the fullest information before him, regarding any impediments that may arise in the collection of rents or revenues at the time they occur, and when a judgment may be best formed of the cause and extent of them, he determines that the board of revenue be directed to submit to him any representations of the nature of those alluded to in their letter, which may hereafter be made to them.

32. With a view however to afford to the proprietors and farmers of land, a ready means of of realizing arrears from their under-renters, which may be so considerable as to embarrass them in making good their payments to government, and to render more efficient the powers of distraint vested in persons entitled to collect rents or revenues; the Governor General in Council now determines to pass a Regulation, containing provisions to that effect, conceiving also, that one appeal to the judge, from decisions for money or personal property, passed by the register under the 8th Regulation of 1794, and by the commissioner under the 40th Regulation of 1793, will be sufficient for the purposes of justice, or at all events, that any advantages that could arise from admitting of a further appeal to the provincial courts, would

A. D. 1795. REGULATION XXXV.

A REGULATION for better enabling individuals to recover arrears of rent or revenue due to them.—Passed by the Governor General in Council, on the 27th March 1795; corresponding with the 16th Chyte 1201 Bengal Era; the 21st Chyte 1202 Fussily; the 16th Chyte 1202 Willaity; the 21st Chyte 1852 Sumbut; and the 5th Ramzaan 1209 Higeree.

GOVERNMENT not admitting of any delay in the payment of the public revenue receivable from proprietors and farmers of land, justice requires that they should have the means of levying their rents and revenues with equal punctuality, and that the persons by whom they may be payable, whether under-farmers, dependent talookdars, ryots, or others, should be enabled, in like manner, to realize the rents and revenues from which their engagements with the proprietors or farmers are to be made good. Regulation XVII, 1793, was enacted with a view to enable all of the above-mentioned descriptions of individuals, to enforce payment of arrears of rent or revenue, without application to the courts of judicature, as far as the amount might be realizable from the crops and personal property of the defaulter, leaving him to sue in the courts for redress, in the event of any sums being unjustly exacted from him. This was the leading principle of the regulation; but to prevent so extensive a power being abused, on the first delegation of it, provisions were made for obliging the distrainer to withdraw the attachment on property, in the event of his demand being contested by the defaulter, and of his giving security to try the justness of it, within a specific time in the court of judicature, and to pay interest on the amount, with costs, in case of its being decreed to be due. These provisions, however, have been found to counteract the object of the regulation, by the delay often unavoidable, in bringing suits to a conclusion, and the opportunity which they afford to defaulters, of protracting the discharge of just demands. In large estates, in which extensive tracts of country are underfarmed, the under farmers often fall in arrear to so considerable an amount, as to render the realizing of the deficiency by the distress of their personal property, impracticable. In such cases, the proprietors or farmers are obliged to sue the defaulter, or his surety, in the dewanny adawlut for the recovery of the arrears; but as the persons to whom the arrears may be due, are not allowed any suspension in their payments to the public, whilst the suit is depending, the lands of proprietors are liable to be sold, and the persons and property of farmers are subject would be more than counterbalanced, by the delay in the determination of causes of more importance that would necessarily arise, from the great portion of the time of the zillah and city courts, and the provincial courts of appeal, which would be occupied in making up the records of the proceedings in these petty causes, and in the decision of them. He is therefore of opinion, that the decisions of the judges in appeal, in these petty causes, should be final, and accordingly records the following drafts of Regulations to stand as the 35th, 36th and 37th Regulations of 1795, containing provisions for the above, and the other purposes specified in the preambles to them.

subject to attachment, for deficiencies arising not from their own misconduct or mismanagement, but from breach of engagements on the part of their under-farmers. To obviate the above inconveniences, the following rules have been enacted.

II. Sections IX, and X, Regulation XVII, 1793, by which distrainers are required to withdraw the attachment on distressed property, on the person from whom the arrear is demanded, denying the justness of the demand, and giving security to have it tried in the Dewanny Adawlut within a certain time, and to pay interest to the date of the decree, together costs, in the event of the demand being decreed to be just, are hereby rescinded, together with the following Clause of Section VIII, of that Regulation, viz. "or he shall contest the demand, and procure the attachment to be withdrawn in the manner hereafter specified."

III. In future, distrainers are permitted to affix their signature only to writings for the attachment of property, instead of both their seals and signatures as required by Section VIII, Regulation XVII, 1793.

Upon the receipt of such application, the cauzy shall proceed as follows. He shall fix up, on the outer door of his own house, and at the place at which he may determine to dispose of the property, a list of the property attached, with a notice, which shall specify:—Firstly, the place at which the property is to be sold, which shall be on the spot where it may be lodged by the distrainer, or at the nearest gunge, bazar, or haut, or any place of public resort, where the cauzy may be of opinion it is likely to sell to the best advantage; Secondly, the day day on which it is to be sold, which shall be the fifteenth day, commencing from the day following the day on which the attachment may take place, unless the property shall consist of crops or other ungathered products of the earth, in which case, the sale shall be made on the fifteenth day, calculating from the day following the day on which such crops or products may be stored as directed in Section XIII, Regulation XVII, 1793; and Thirdly, the time of the day when the sale is to be made, which shall be during the hours of business, when the greatest number of people may be supposed to assemble. The cauzy shall nominate two creditable persons, competent by their profession, trade, or occupation, to appraise the property. The persons so appointed, shall appraise the property according to the current price which the several articles may then bear in the country, and shall deliver the particulars of the appraisal in writing, and attest the same with their signatures, and shall certify in writing at the foot of the paper, that they have appraised the property according to the best of their knowledge and judgment. The cauzy shall affix his seal to the paper of appraisal, and cause it to be stuck up on the outer door of his own house, and at the place where the property is to be sold. The property shall be brought to the place of sale on the morning of the day of sale, in order that it may be examined by the persons intending to bid, unless it shall consist of grain or other products of the earth, the removal of which would be attended with considerable expense, in which case, samples only, indiscriminately taken from each article, shall be brought to the place of sale, and exposed for the purpose above mentioned. The property shall be put up to sale in one lot, or in two or more lots, as the cauzy may think advisable. The property shall be disposed of for the highest price that may be offered for it. If the property shall sell for more than the amount of the arrear, the overplus, after deducting the charges attending the attachment and sale of it, shall be returned to the defaulter. If the proceeds of the sale shall be insufficient for the discharge of the arrear, and the expenses attending the attachment and sale, the distraîner shall be at liberty to attach other property belonging to the defaulter, and to cause it to be sold to make good the deficiency. The cauzy is in every case to examine the distraîner's statement of the expenses consequent to the attachment and sale of the property, and to reject any part of it that may appear to him unreasonable. If any person vested with the power of distraint, shall sell or dispose of property which he may have attached for arrears of rent or revenue, in any other mode than that prescribed in this section, he shall forfeit the arrear for which the distress may be levied to the defaulter, and make good to him the value of the property sold or disposed of, with all costs of suit.

VI. Section XXVI, Regulation XVII, 1793, regarding the payment of the purchase money of distrained property, is hereby rescinded, and the rule contained in the following section is enacted in lieu of it.

VII. The property shall be paid for in ready money at the time of the sale, and the purchaser shall not be permitted to carry away any part of the property, which shall not have been paid for. Should the purchaser fail in the payment of the whole or part of the purchase-money, within five days, calculating from the day following the sale, the whole of the property, or the part of it which may be unpaid for, shall be resold by the cauzy, on such day as he shall fix, for the best price that may be offered for it. The defaulting purchaser shall forfeit to the distraîner, ten per cent. on the amount of the price at which he shall have purchased the property so re-sold; and make good to him any loss that may arise, as well as the expenses that may be incurred on the re-sale. If any profit shall accrue on the re-sale, it shall be carried to the credit of the defaulter.

VIII. To facilitate the sale of distrained property, every person having a commission from the judge of the zillah to hear and determine civil suits not exceeding fifty rupees, under Regulation XL, 1793, is authorized and required to dispose of, under the rules prescribed to cauzies in Regulation XVII, 1793, and this regulation, any property that may be distrained in the pergunnah in which he may reside, and for the sale of which, application may be made to him. The cauzies are likewise to continue to exercise the authority vested in them by Regulation XVII, 1793, and this regulation, and where a greater number of persons to be vested with this authority, shall be requisite in any pergunnah, for facilitating the sale of property, the judge is empowered to appoint them. But no person vested with the power of disposing of distrained property, shall sell property that may have been distrained for arrears due to himself. Persons of this description, having occasion to levy arrears by distress, are to apply to some other person duly empowered for the sale of the property.

IX. To enable proprietors of land, and farmers of land holding their farms immediately of government, to recover, more speedily, arrears of rent or revenue, which, from the largeness of the amount, cannot be immediately realized by a levy of distress on the personal property of the defaulter, such proprietors or farmers, who may now have on account of the current or past Bengal, Fussily, or Willaity year, or who may hereafter have on account of the current or any future year of those eras, a demand on any of their dependent talook-dars, under-farmers, or ryots, or their sureties, for an arrear of rent or revenue, exceeding five hundred Sicca rupees, are empowered to proceed for the recovery of the amount in the manner hereafter specified.

X. The proprietor or farmer shall cause to be delivered to the defaulter, or to be stuck up at the outer door of his immediate or usual place of residence, a statement of the arrear claimed, with a notice subjoined to the statement, that if he shall fail to discharge the amount within three days, calculating from the day following the day on which the statement may may be so delivered to him, or fixed up, he will be proceeded against, as authorized in the following sections.

XI. If the defaulter shall fail to discharge the demand by the time limited in the written notice, the proprietor or farmer, is to present in person, or through an authorized vakeel of the court, a petition to the judge of the dewanny adawlut to which the defaulter may be amenable, praying that he will cause the defaulter to be committed to close custody, until he makes good the amount of the arrear claimed, with interest from the date of the delivery or fixing up of the notice, as directed in the preceding section, to the date of the payment of it. The petition shall be accompanied by a copy of the statement of the demand, and of the written notice directed to be subjoined to it, without which, the judge shall not receive the petition.

XII. First, On receipt of the petition, and the statement with the subjoined notice, the judge is immediately to issue a summons to the person from whom the arrear may be claimed, requiring him to appear, without delay, either in person, or by an authorized vakeel of the court, and to deliver in an answer to the demand, with any papers or vouchers he may have to exhibit against the demand, the amount of which is invariably to be specified in the summons.

Second, In cases in which the judge shall have ground to apprehend that the person from whom the arrear may be demanded, will abscond, he is empowered to require him to give personal security for his appearing, and delivering himself up into the custody of the court, in the event of his ordering him to be committed to confinement under the following section, and in default of his giving such security, the judge shall forthwith order him to be committed to custody.

Third, The judges are empowered to proceed on applications for the confinement of defaulters, as authorized in this regulation, out of court, or when the courts may be adjourned, notwithstanding any thing that may be said to the contrary in any regulation passed prior to this date.

XIII. First, On the appearance of the person from whom the arrear may be claimed, or his vakeel, the judge shall peruse his answer to the demand, and cause to be produced the engagements under which the arrear may be demanded, and the vouchers for the payments made under it, which the parties respectively are required to have ready to exhibit, and after a summary examination of them, and any enquiry which he may deem it necessary to make, if it shall appear to him that the amount demanded, or a sum exceeding five hundred Sicca rupees, is due to the party claiming the arrear, he shall commit the defaulter to close custody until he discharges such arrear, or the sum so appearing to be due, with interest at the rate of twelve per cent. per annum, from the date on which the statement and notice was delivered to him, or fixed up as directed in Section X. to the date of payment, or the person claiming the arrear, shall apply for his release, or until by a regular suit to be commenced in the dewanny adawlut under Section XIX, the amount or sum for the discharge of which he may have been committed to custody on the above directed summary enquiry, shall be found on a regular judicial investigation, not to be due from him.

Second, If the person summoned under Section XII, shall not appear as required by the prescribed time, and shall not show satisfactory cause to the judge for not so appearing, the judge shall proceed upon the documents and vouchers of the party claiming the arrear, and make an order against the defaulter for the payment of the sum which may appear due from him on such examination, and cause him to be immediately committed to confinement.

XIV. When a judge shall commit a defaulter to confinement under the preceding section, he shall enter on his proceedings, the sum that may appear to him due from the defaulter, and a list of the papers and documents, on the inspection of which, he may have grounded the order for his confinement.

XV. Proprietors or farmers now having suits depending in any of the zillah or city courts for arrears, being of the description of the arrears specified in Section IX, are declared to be at liberty to withdraw such suits, and to proceed against the person from whom they may claim the arrears, in the manner above authorized.

XVI. On making the summary investigation directed in Section XIII, if the judge shall be of opinion, that the arrear demanded, or a sum not exceeding five hundred Sicca rupees is not due, he shall not confine the person from whom the arrear may be claimed, but shall leave the proprietor or farmer to institute a regular suit in the adawlut for the amount of his demand; and if the person from whom the arrear may have been claimed, shall have appeared in person or by vakeel, the judge shall cause the claimant to the arrear to pay to him in the former case, such sum as may appear adequate to his trouble, or any loss that he may have incurred in consequence of his having been caused to attend in person; and in the latter, the charges of his vakeel, or any other expenses he may have incurred on account of the process instituted against him.

XVII. The confinement of a person under Section XIII, shall not be considered to preclude the proprietor or farmer from distraining the personal property of the defaulter for the recovery of the arrear for which he may have been imprisoned, or for any other arrear.

Proprietor or Farmer to apply by Petition to the Court, to have the Defaulter confined, if he fails to discharge the Arrear. Petition to be accompanied with a Copy of the written Demand, and the Judge not to receive the former without the latter.

Judge to summon the Defaulter to appear in person, or by Vakeel.

Cases in which the Judge may take Security for the Defaulter's delivering himself up to the Court.

Judges may proceed on Applications for the Confinement of Defaulters, out of Court, or when the Court is adjourned.

Judge, on the Appearance of the stated Defaulter, to enter into a summary Enquiry into the Demand, and to confine the Defaulter, if the amount claimed, or a Sum exceeding Five hundred Sicca Rupees, shall appear due from him. When Defaulters so confined shall be entitled to their Discharge.

Judge to proceed ex parte, in the event of the Defaulter not appearing by the prescribed time.

Entries to be made by the Judges on the Proceedings of the Court, on their confining Persons under Section XIII.

Proprietors or Farmers, having Suits now depending in the Zillah or City Courts for Arrears, may proceed for the Recovery of them as above authorized.

Judge how to proceed, if the Arrear, or a Sum not exceeding Five hundred Rupees, shall not appear to him due from the Party summoned.

Proprietors and Farmers may distraim the personal Property of Defaulters whom they may have caused to be confined.

Persons paying Demands to avoid being summoned under Section XII, or Shaws declared due by the Judge to avoid being confined under Section XIII, may sue in the Dewanny Adawlut for the recovery of what they may deem not to have been due from them.

Preceding Rules regarding the recovery of Rents and Revenues due to Proprietors and Farmers, applicable to Managers of Estates, and to Collectors holding Lands in attachment.

Regulations respecting Appeals and Judicial Proceedings.

XX. The rules in the preceding sections, regarding the recovery of arrears of rent or revenue due to proprietors and farmers of land, are to be considered equally applicable to the managers of the estates of disqualified proprietors, and of joint undivided estates, and to collectors holding lands in attachment for the purpose of adjusting the public assessment on them, or for any other purpose.

A Regulation for repealing Section VII, Regulation VIII, 1794, and empowering the Judges of the Zillah and City Courts to hear Appeals from decisions which may be passed by their Registers under that Regulation, and rendering final the decisions of the Judges in all such Appeals where the Suit may be for Money or personal Property; for making final the Decrees of the Judges of the Zillah and City Courts, in Appeals from decisions passed by the Native Commissioners appointed under Regulation XL, 1793; for rendering Serberakars or Managers of joint undivided Estates, eligible to the Office of Commissioner for hearing and deciding Suits under Regulation XL, 1793; for providing against the loss or miscarriage of the proceedings in trials referred by the Judges of Circuit to the Nizamut Adawlut, or the sentences or orders of that Court on such trials; and for establishing another Court of Dewanny Adawlut in the Districts now comprised in the Zillah of Burdwan. Passed by the Governor General in Council on the 27th March 1795; corresponding with the 16th Chyete 1201 Bengal Era; the 21st Chyete 1202 Fussily; the 16th Chyete 1202 Willaity; the 21st Chyete 1852 Sumbut; and the 5th Ramzaan 1209 Higeree.

THE appeal immediately to the provincial courts of appeal, from decisions passed by the registers, allowed by Section VII, Regulation VIII, 1794, interfering considerably with the more important duties of those courts; and the Governor General in Council being of opinion, that from decisions passed by the registers to the zillah and city courts for money or personal property under Regulation VIII, 1794, and from decisions of the native commissioners appointed under Regulation XL, 1793, one appeal to the judge of the zillah or which might be expected to result from allowing of a further appeal to the provincial courts of appeal, from the decisions of the judges of the zillahs and cities, would be more than counterbalanced by the delay in the determination of causes of greater importance that must necessarily arise from the considerable portion of the time of the zillah and city courts, and the provincial courts of appeal, which would be occupied in preparing and transmitting the records of the trials in these petty causes, and in the decision of them; and with a view to render serberakars or managers of joint undivided estates, eligible to the office of commissioner for the decision of suits under Regulation XL, 1793; and to provide against the undue detention of prisoners in confinement, or delay in the execution of sentences or orders of the Nizamut adawlut, by the loss or miscarriage of the proceedings in trials referred to that court, or of the sentences or orders on such trials; and to accelerate the decision of civil suits arising in the districts now comprised in the zillah of Burdwan, which, from the great extent of the zillah, have been found too numerous for one court to determine with sufficient expedition; the following rules have been enacted:

II. Section VII, Regulation VIII, 1794, empowering the provincial courts of appeal to hear appeals from certain decisions passed by the registers, to the zillah and city courts under that regulation, is hereby rescinded.

III. First. From all decisions in suits for real property, and for money or personal property, the amount or value of which shall exceed twenty-five Sicca rupees, that may be passed by the registers to the zillah and city courts, in virtue of the powers vested in them by Regulation VIII, 1794, an appeal shall lie to the judge of the zillah or city court, under similar rules and regulations to those prescribed regarding appeals to the provincial courts of appeal, from decisions passed by the judges, with the qualifications specified in the two following clauses.

An Appeal from the Decisions of the Registrars, excepting for Money or personal Property not exceeding Twenty-five Rupees, to lie to Judges of the Zillahs and Cities

Third. On the judge admitting an appeal from the decision of his register, he shall cause to be endorsed on the back of the petition, the word "admitted" (Munzoor), and shall have the seal of the court affixed thereto, and attest the endorsement with his signature. He shall cause the petition so endorsed to be sent to the register, who shall thereupon submit to the judge all the original proceedings and papers in the cause, with his original decree.

IV. The decrees of the judges of the zillah and city courts in appeals from decisions for money or personal property, passed by the registers under Regulation VIII, 1794, and also from the decisions of the native commissioners appointed to hear and determine suits under Regulation XL, 1793, are declared final, notwithstanding any thing that may be said to the contrary in any regulation enacted previous to this date. VIII. 1794, and from the

V. Serberakars, or managers of joint undivided estates, appointed under Section XXIII, XXIV, XXV, XXVI, Regulation VIII, 1793, are declared eligible to the office of commissioner for hearing and determining suits under Regulation XL 1793, in the zillahs in which the estates they may be appointed to manage, may be situated.

VI. Previous to the commencement of each circuit, the courts of circuit are to examine the lists of trials held on the preceding circuit, which may have been referred by them to the Nizamut Adawlut, and in the event of their not having received the orders or sentence of that court on any trial so referred, they are to report the same to the court; that in the event of the proceedings not having been received by the court, duplicates of such proceedings, or of the sentences or orders passed thereon, which may have miscarried, may be forwarded or issued before the commencement of the ensuing circuit, that the sentence or orders of the Nizamut Adawlut on such trials may be forthwith passed or executed.

VII. The districts now comprised in the zillah of Burdwan, shall be formed into two zillahs; the northern division to be denominated the zillah of Burdwan, and the southern division the zillah of Hoogly. The limits of each zillah are to be determined by the Governor General in Council. A Dewanny Adawlut superintended by one judge, shall be established in each zillah, with the same powers as the other zillah courts of Dewanny Adawlut. The judge of each court shall likewise be vested with the office of magistrate, with the same powers as the magistrates of other zillahs. The court so established in the northern division, shall be denominated, "The Court of Dewanny Adawlut for the Zillah of Burdwan," and the Court in the southern division, "The Court of Dewanny Adawlut for the Zillah of Hoogly." The half-yearly jail delivery directed to take place in the several zillahs by Section XL, Regulation IX, 1793, shall be made at Hoogly by the judge of the court of circuit for the division of Calcutta, who may proceed to the zillahs of Nuddea and Jessore; and the half-yearly jail delivery at Burdwan, by the judge of that Court, who may proceed to Midnapore and Beerbhoom, agreeably to Regulation VII, 1794.

RESOLUTIONS.

No. 34. Ordered, That the judge of Burdwan be informed, that the Governor General in Council has resolved, that the districts now comprized in the zillah of Burdwan, be formed into two zillahs, with a separate judge and collector for each zillah. That the Governor General in Council desires he will report to him the districts which he would recommend to be included in each jurisdiction, and the places at which it may appear to him advisable to establish the two courts, selecting those which, from their situation or other circumstances, may appear to him most convenient for the administration of justice, and best calculated for enabling the magistrate to preserve the peace of the country under his authority. That in proposing the limits to be assigned to each zillah, and fixing on the places at which the courts are to be established, he be informed, he is to avail himself of the local knowledge of the collector, but that his recommendation on these points, is to be guided by the considerations specified in the preceding paragraph.

Extract from Dr. Buchanan's Statistical Survey, Book IV. Chap. 7, on the District of Dinagepore.

"Although it appears evident from the Ayen Ackberry, that in the time of Ackber, there were no hereditary proprietors of land, in this part of the country, all the natives allege, that the office of zemindar has always been hereditary, which may, in some measure, have been the case. They then merely accounted to government for their receipts, and they pretend to say, that they have been injured by the new settlement. They allege, that formerly they were allowed great authority, both in criminal and civil causes, over the people whom they managed, which was a great source of emolument, being of course, venally administered; and although they were often squeezed by the Mogul officers, and, on all occasions, were treated with the utmost contempt, they preferred suffering these evils, to the mode that has been adopted; of selling their lands when they fall in arrears, which is a practice that they cannot endure. Besides, bribery went a great way, on most occasions; and they allege, that bribes included, they did not actually pay one half of what they do now, although nothing can be more moderate than the present assessment, which I am convinced does not amount to a tythe of the produce."

Extract Proceedings of the Board of Revenue in Bengal, dated 21st January 1794, respecting the difficulties experienced by Zemindars, in collecting their Rents from the Ryots, under the Regulations.

To William Cowper, Esq. President, and Members of the Board of Revenue.

Gentlemen,

THE difficulty I found in realizing the last kist of Aughun from the Mahia Rajah, induces me to listen to his earnest request, of representing to you the hardship he sustains from one of his renters, who, destitute of good faith, and availing himself of the delay that necessarily attends the institution of law process, for the recovery of arrears of rent, is encouraged to withhold from him, his just dues. He begs leave to submit it to your consideration, whether or no it can be possible for him to discharge his engagements to government with that punctuality which the Regulations require, unless he be armed with powers as prompt to enforce payment from his renters, as government have been pleased to authorize the use of, in regard to its claims, on him; and he seems to think it must have proceeded from oversight, rather than from any just and avowed principle, that there should be established two methods of judicial process, under the same government; the one summary, and efficient for the satisfaction of its own claims; the other, tardy and uncertain in regard to the satisfaction of claims due to its subjects; more especially in a case like the present, where ability to discharge the one demand, necessarily depends on the other demand, being previously realized.

of Burdwan 9 Jan.

2. How far this representation of circumstances may be strictly correct, I shall be better able to judge when in possession of the Regulations of government entire; but there can be no doubt, as I have informed the rajah, that when completely furnished, they will be found to remove every reasonable cause of complaint of the nature of that under consideration; and I should, therefore, have declined troubling you on the present occasion, were it not that the instance adduced by the rajah, as concerning himself, and in support of the arguments above recited, is of a very grievous nature, as you will, I think, be convinced, from the following relation of the predicament in which he stands, in regard to his renter Banaresse Ghose.

Letter from Collector
1794.

3. I had the honour of addressing you under date the 28th August, on the subject of this person, who resides in Calcutta, and of urging arguments similar to the foregoing, on the part of the rajah, in the hopes of inducing you to cause the defaulter to be apprehended and conveyed either to the adawlut or to the sudder cutcherry of this district, in like manner as a defaulter to government had just before been treated; thinking not only that the process would be as justifiable towards the one, as towards the other, but that it would, moreover, be alike effectual, in recovering an indisputable demand; to which you were pleased to reply, under date 3^d September, that conceiving my arguments by no means incontestable, you did not think it expedient to afford the rajah the relief solicited, though you forbore entering into any discussion in regard to the justness of those arguments, or to furnish me with any train of reasoning, whereby I might have been able to convince him that he sustained no real hardship; contenting yourselves with referring me to the General Regulations, which direct, that to insure the punctual collection of the annual rents payable to zemindars by their farmers and ryots, they must have recourse to the rules of distraining their property, where any property can be found, and to the courts of justice, if they wish to attach their persons. Accordingly, not knowing of any property, and being of opinion that attachment of Banarassey Ghose's person, would be immediately followed by satisfaction of the demand, the rajah lost no time in making application to the dewanny adawlut; but has found, to his great disappointment and distress, that delay, greater than he could have imagined, does indeed, as it will be observed in Section I, Regulation XIV, necessarily attend the constitution of law procedure for the recovery of such demands; for some months are now elapsed, without its having been in the power of the zillah court to afford him the least redress, or without the defendant having been even brought to give answer to the plaint; and he, the defendant, still publicly appears in Calcutta without restraint, and in defiance of all law, civil and moral, continues to withhold from him the just dues, to the amount, at this present time, of Sicca rupees 47,643, as will appear by the enclosed statement; for the want of which sum, he has, more than once already, in the course of the present year, been in imminent danger of confinement in the common jail, and in default of which payment, should this application fail of compelling it (as well as of many others that are withheld under similar circumstances, to a very considerable amount), he verily believes he shall, at the close of the present month, find himself liable to the exercise of those powers, with which it has pleased government to arm the collector, in order to enforce (without suffering in its own case, the delay incident to a law process) the punctual payment of its dues, unless he should, by shutting himself up in his house, or otherwise concealing himself from the peons who may be sent to arrest him, determine to avail himself of the four weeks, which Section I, of Regulation XIV, allow him, of keeping himself from under restraint, to anticipate or embezzle the revenue that may remain uncollected; which, however, much it may eventually prove to be in his power to effect, he has at present, no thoughts of attempting, trusting rather to the reasonableness of his cause, and the justice of government, than to any advantage which might be taken of particular parts of the Regulations, under a persuasion there will not be refused to him the same powerful, prompt, and efficacious means of enforcing payment from his renters, that are used to recover the dues of government from himself, more especially, since the practicability of the latter, necessarily depends on the former being previously performed.

Translate of a Paper received from the Maha Rajah Tezclund Bahadur.

THE arrear of rent on account pergunnah Baley, to the end of Poose 1200 B. S. amounts to S^r R^s 43,743, and the arrear on account of 1109, amounts to S^r R^s 3,900, in all 47,643, now due from Banarassey Ghose, farmer of that pergunnah, who absents himself, and fails in the performance of his engagements: I have many times, represented his conduct to the Huzzoor, and twice, made application to the adawlut; but without obtaining any satisfaction of the demand. I therefore request the case may be represented to the board of revenue, and application made to have the defaulter apprehended, and sent to the cutcherry, to discharge his engagements.

Agreed, That we answer the collector as follows:

Sir,

To Mr. S. Davis, Collector of Burdwan.

WE have received your letter of the 9th instant: as it would appear therefrom, that the Rajah of Burdwan had instituted a suit against Banarassey Ghose, in the dewanny adawlut: we desire that you will inform us, if in consequence of the non-attendance of the defendant, the judge made any application to the sudder dewanny adawlut, or took any other measures to enforce his attendance, or that of his authorized vakeel.

We are, &c.

Secretary to Government, in the Political Department, Cawnpore.

SIR,

Report from Moorshedabad Court of Appeal and Circuit: 26 Jan. 1802.

IN obedience to the commands of the honourable the Vice President in Council, communicated to us, in a letter from Mr. Secretary Dowdeswell, of date the 3d ultimo, we have the honour to transmit to you, copy of Interrogatories sent to us, on the 29th of October, by the Secretary to the Judicial Department; with our Replies annexed to the several points noticed therein;—which we respectfully request may be submitted to his Excellency the Most Noble the Governor General.

The dispersed situation of the members of these courts, on various official business, and the increased duties allotted to us, since we received the Interrogatories, has occasioned some delay in preparing a Report on a subject, which, embracing objects of weighty and serious consideration, required the deliberate attention and collective reflection of our several members; and we trust that this explanatory excuse will be favourably received by his Excellency.

Moorshedabad, }

We have the honour to be, Sir,

Your very obedient servants,

(Signed) T. Pattle.

INTERROGATORIES from Government to the Provincial Court of Appeal and Circuit at Moorshedabad; received in a Letter from the Secretary to the Judicial Department, dated 29th October 1801 :—With the ANSWERS thereto, as submitted by the said Court.

Interr 1.—WHAT is the number of Appeals depending before your court?
 A. 1.—Twenty-six.

Interr 2.—What proportion does the number of Appeals now depending before your court, bear to the number of Appeals usually depending during the several years, commencing from the year 1793, to the present period?

A. 2.—On the 15th July 1800, the court of appeal submitted to the sudder dewanny adawlut, a progressive statement in detail, of causes filed and decided from the period of the court's institution in May 1793; continuing which statement to the present time, exhibits the following report, in answer to the 2d article of Interrogatories.

D° - - - - D° -	-	1800 -	-	-	-	12
D° - - - - D° -	-	1801 -	-	-	-	26

From the above, the inference deducible is, that the number now depending bears a very reduced proportion to the balance of causes, usually pending heretofore before this court; and but for contingent and unavoidable circumstances, the trifling number still remaining would have been reduced, at least one-half.

Interr 3. What number of causes was decided in the past year, by your court?
 A. 3. Ninety-one.

Interr 4. What number of causes do you suppose must necessarily be depending before your court; and what is the reason that the number of causes depending before your tribunal, is not reduced as low as you think it might be reduced?

A. 4. We think, on the average of former years, about one hundred and ten causes more than twenty will generally remain on file, not from inability on the part of the court to clear the whole off, but because, from the nature of the routine of the judicial business, all the papers will not be filed in such regular and rapid progression, as to admit of a file being entirely cleared; and as we think, thereby, the number is now, and always will be, reduced as low as it can or ought to be, all circumstances considered, we do not feel ourselves called upon to show cause for non-reduction, under the position assumed in this query.

Interr 5. Are you prepared to suggest the establishment of any rules which (consistently with the due administration of the laws) would expedite the decision of suits? Are you of opinion, that the object would be in any degree promoted, by leaving it optional to the different tribunals to commit the depositions of witnesses, in causes not appealable to a higher tribunal, to writing, or not, as the judges might think proper?

A. 5. We are not prepared to suggest the establishment of any rules, which, consistent with the due administration of the laws, would expedite the decision of suits; and from the state of the files, as exhibited by the half-yearly reports of the several adawluts in the division of the files, it does not appear to us that any such rules are wanted. We are not of opinion that the object would be in any material degree promoted, by leaving it optional to the different tribunals to commit the depositions of witnesses, in causes not appealable to a higher tribunal, to writing, or not, as the judge might think proper. All original causes, except such as should be entertained in a court of appeal, by especial direction of the sudder dewanny adawlut, for an amount not appealable to the sudder dewanny adawlut, are appealable to some higher tribunal.

Interr 6. Are you of opinion that it would be advisable to extend the jurisdiction of the native commissioners, to suits for sums exceeding 50 R^s, and that of the registers, to sums exceeding 200 R^s? What is the amount to which you would recommend the courts of the commissioners, and of the registers, should be extended; and to what degree, would the general administration of justice, in the division subject to your jurisdiction, be expedited by the adoption of this arrangement?

A. 6. We are not of opinion that it would be advisable to extend the jurisdiction of the native commissioners to suits for sums exceeding 50 R^s. The number of causes usually depending before them, appears as great as they can be competent to decide, consistently with the due administration of justice. In some zillahs the number is already so great that the general administration of justice must be impeded, by adding thereto. We think that while the amount appealable to the sudder dewanny adawlut, continues fixed at 5,000 R^s, the jurisdiction of the registers might be advantageously extended to 300 R^s, with appeal to the judge;—not because we conceive that the general administration of justice would in any degree, be expedited, by the adoption of this arrangement; but because it would relieve the claimants to small debts from much personal trouble and vexation, by giving them the benefit of a local appeal to the judge's court, and preventing their being harassed by appeals to a distant tribunal.

Interr 7. Has litigation been checked by the establishment of the fee paid to government on the institution of suits, of the fees paid to the vakeels, of the fees paid on exhibits in the courts of judicature, and of the stamp duties? Do you consider these several charges attending the institution of law suits, to be too considerable, or otherwise?

A. 7. The increased expense of law suits has never been found to check litigiousness. On the contrary, it has been generally observed, that litigiousness is encouraged thereby, in the hope that the certainty of the expense, added to the uncertainty of the result, might deter parties from defending, even just rights. On comparing the half-yearly reports of the several adawluts in this division, it does not appear that the number of suits filed since the establishment of the fee paid to government on the institution of suits, of the fees paid on exhibits in the courts of judicature, and of the stamp duties, differs much from the number filed, in a similar period previous thereto. As the fees paid to the vakeels were established by the same code of regulations as our court, we have no records to show what was the previous state state of litigation. We certainly consider these several charges attending the institutions of law suits, to be sufficiently heavy in all cases; and in small suits, too considerable.

Inter^y 8. Do the fees paid to the licensed vakeels, on suits instituted or defended by them, constitute a sufficient inducement to men of character, and of proper qualifications, to undertake those situations? Are the vakeels attached to your court, persons of the above description; and are they in general, well acquainted with the printed Regulations?

A. 8. From the numerous and earnest applications made to us, on every occasion of a vacancy among the licensed vakeels, we are of opinion, that the fees paid to them on suits instituted or defended by them, constitute a sufficient inducement to men of character and proper qualifications to undertake those situations. The vakeels attached to our court, are persons of the above description, and are in general, well acquainted with the printed Regulations.

Inter^y 9. Has the establishment of licensed vakeels contributed to expedite the decision of suits, by bringing more speedily and accurately before the court, the merits of the suits instituted?

A. 9. The establishment of licensed vakeels can in no manner, expedite the decision of suits in appeal, nor can the vakeels be of any assistance, in bringing before the Court the merits of any suit, either more speedily, or more accurately. Each suit is heard in its numerical order, and its merits come before the court in the record from the original tribunal.

Inter^y 10. Do the vakeels in general, discharge their duty to their clients, with honour and fidelity?

A. 10. The vakeels attached to our court do, in general, appear to us to discharge their duty to their clients, with honour and fidelity.

Inter^y 11. Are the principal inhabitants of your jurisdiction as well acquainted, as individuals in general, can be supposed to be informed of the laws of the country?

A. 11. If by the laws of the country be meant the Koran and Shaster, the principal inhabitants of our jurisdiction, are well acquainted with the codes of their respective religions, as individuals in general, can be supposed to be informed. If the Regulations of government be also meant, we believe that they are known to few, except the vakeels and ministerial officers of the courts, and some principal landholders.

Inter^y 12. Are you prepared to state any alterations in the forms established for the trial of civil suits, which would expedite the decision of the suits, without endangering the due administration of the laws?

A. 12. We are not prepared to state any alterations in the forms established for the trial of civil suits. On a comparison of the date of institution, with the date of decision, in most suits in the several zillahs under our jurisdiction, the decision appears to be, as expeditious as is consistent with the due administration of the laws.

Inter^y 13. Have you in your court-room any place allotted for the bench of the judges, for the public officers, for the parties or their vakeels, for the witnesses, and for all persons who attend your court; and what forms and ceremonies do you observe in opening your court, or sitting in it?

A. 13. We have in our court-room, places regularly allotted for the bench of the judges, on a platform raised considerably; also a seat for the sheristadar, and the Company's vakeels; seats for the pleaders to sit upon, when not concerned in the suit trying, and fixed places allotted for the parties, their vakeels, the witnesses, and officers of court. The whole remaining space of the court-room is open to all persons who attend the court, either from business or curiosity. We observe no particular forms and ceremonies in opening the court, and sitting in it, except the ceremony of taking our seats on the bench, according to our respective ranks, and the form of calling on the business, in its regular rotation.

Inter^y 14. Are there any private schools or seminaries in the division under your jurisdiction, in which the Mahomedan or Hindoo law is taught; and how are those institutions maintained?

A. 14. As we understand this interrogatory has been sent to the zillah judges (who are certainly, from first residence, more competent than we can be, from passing cursorily through the mofussil, to report what private schools and seminaries there may be in their several districts) we have not thought it necessary to require them to report to us for the purpose of forming an answer, but we beg leave to refer to the information they may give in reply.

Inter^y 15. What is your opinion regarding the general moral character of the inhabitants of your division? Has the moral character of the inhabitants in general improved, or otherwise, by the system established by the British government for the administration of the laws, and for the conduct of the internal administration of the country?

A. 15. The general moral character of the inhabitants of our division seems, in our opinion, much the same, as we have always known the moral character of the natives in general. Ignorance, and its concomitant, gross superstition, an implicit faith in the efficacy of prayers, charms and magic, selfishness, low cunning, litigiousness, avarice, revenge, &c. regard to truth, and indolence, are the principal features to be traced. It does not strike us, that the system established by the British government for the administration of the laws, and for the conduct of the internal administration of the country, can have any influence on the moral character of the inhabitants in general, either by way of improvement or otherwise.

Inter^y 16. Are you of opinion, that the inhabitants in general of the division under your jurisdiction, consider their private rights and property to be secured by the present constitution tion of the country, against infringement, either by the executive officers of government, or even by the supreme executive authority itself, or by individuals?

A. 16. From what comes under our observation, we are of opinion, that the inhabitants of this division, consider their private rights and property to be secured, by the present constitution of the country, against all infringement, either by individuals, or by the executive officers of government, and even by the supreme executive authority itself. But a question arises, whether this very security, and the ease with which they can prosecute the first executive officers of government, may not induce a contempt of the government itself. Individuals have now no other mode of encroaching on one another's rights, except by harrasing one another, through the forms of law, in our civil and criminal courts; and of this weapon of revenge, they seem to make a free use.

Inter^y 17. Are you of opinion, that the division under your jurisdiction is in a state of improvement, or otherwise, with respect to its population, cultivation, and commerce, and its buildings, or other works of religious, domestic, or other purposes; and on what grounds do you form your opinion?

A. 17. The face of the country shows much improvement in population and cultivation. We see no trace of increased commerce, nor of improvement in buildings, and other works of religious or domestic or other purposes. Individuals may occasionally build a temple, or dig a tank for public use; but similar endowments of former days are, at the same time, going to decay. Opulence itself seldom tempts to any improvement, in domestic comforts. We form our opinion from what comes within our personal observation during our official circuits, and occasional journeys for business or recreation, and on the conversation of well informed natives.

Inter^y 18. Are you of opinion, that the inhabitants of the division subject to your jurisdiction, are, in general, satisfied with the British government?

A. 18. From what we know of the general character of the natives, we are of opinion, that, however satisfied they must be, from the greater security which they now enjoy in their persons and property, than what they ever enjoyed under the former government, no reciprocal affection (correspondent attachment) is produced in them to the British government, or gratitude for such security; but they would see a revolution with apathy and indifference, and would submit to the tyranny of any future government, with perfect resignation. The dependants of the higher classes of Mussulmans, may be conceived dissatisfied with the government itself, as the cause of their losing all share in the executive administration.

Inter^y 19. Is the present system of police well calculated to ensure the apprehension of offenders?

A. 19. From the great number of offenders brought annually to trial, it would appear that the present system of police is well calculated to ensure the apprehension of offenders. We would at least hope, for the honour of human nature, that when the black catalogue of offenders apprehended is so large, few have escaped apprehension.

Inter^y 20. Are the police establishments, in the division subject to your jurisdiction, adequate to the duties required of them?

A. 20. Considering the prevention of crimes to be one of the objects of police, the police establishments in the division subject to our jurisdiction, are certainly not adequate to all the duties required of them; nor can much, in the line of prevention, be expected from 10 or 15 armed men in a jurisdiction ten cross square in extent, which comprizes upwards of four hundred square miles. In former addresses [A.] to the Nizamut adawlut, and to the committee of police, we have occasionally recommended an increase in these establishments; but no government ever did, or ever can defray the whole charge of police. Much gratuitous assistance is necessary, and is enforced in all governments. By the old constitution of this country, many casts and classes were bound to co-operate with the executive officers of police.

Inter^y 21. Are you of opinion, that the number of crimes committed annually, in the division under your jurisdiction, has increased or diminished, since the year 1793; and to what cause do you ascribe the increase or diminution?

A. 21. The criminal jurisprudence of these provinces, was assumed by the British government in December 1790. The number of persons tried by the original court of circuit from that time, till the institution of our court in May 1793, was 2,181. This list included several persons already in custody, but untied during the Naib Nazim's administration. The following is the annual comparison of the prisoners tried by our court, from the sessions of 1793, to the 1st session of 1801.

One year, including 2d Sessions 1793, and 1st Sessions 1794		1794	1795	1796	1797	1798	1799	1800	1801
D°	-	1794	-	1795	-	1796	-	1797	-
D°	-	1795	-	1796	-	1797	-	1798	-

D°	-	1800	-	1801	-	1802	-	1803	-

The number of crimes committed annually, in the division under our jurisdiction, appears, from this statement, to have increased since the year 1793. The causes to which we ascribe the increase, are the want of a preventive police, and the inefficacy of imprisonment, as a punishment for either reformation or example.

Inter^y 22.—What crimes of enormity are most prevalent in the districts under your authority; what is the cause of the prevalence of such crimes; and what are the means you would recommend to be adopted for their suppression?

A. 22.—Gang robbery is the only crime of enormity, prevalent in the division under our authority. The cause of its prevalence, and the means which we would recommend to be adopted for its suppression, are of too long detail to be introduced here, and may be found at full length, in our joint and separate addresses to government, and to the Nizamut Adawlut, noted in the margin.

Inter^y 23. Do the inhabitants of the division under your jurisdiction, keep arms in their houses? What description of arms do they retain; and for what purposes are the arms retained?

A. 23. Few of the lower classes of natives keep any other arms in their houses than lathies, or long thick bamboo bludgeons: the purpose for which they allege these to be retained, is to defend themselves from wild animals in the fields. The drooms and harrees keep spears of various shapes, for the declared purpose of destroying wild hogs; some of the richer munduls and the village watchmen have swords: these lathies and spears, and the tehenta or fishing, which the fishermen keep, as an implement of their trade, are the usual weapons found on decoits. They seldom use swords or guns; sometimes the decoits arm themselves with only the roybause, a long tapering solid bamboo pointed at one end, and hardened by fire; and every hedge can thus in a moment, furnish a deadly weapon. The middle and higher classes keep swords and daggers, chiefly as an appendage of dress.

Inter^y 24. Are there any brick or mud forts in your division? In what state are the forts, and what is the nature of their construction?

Inter^y 25. What proportion do the Hindoo bear to the Mahomedan inhabitants, in the division subject to your authority; and what do you suppose to be the number of the inhabitants of your division, of all descriptions?

Inter^y 26. What are the names of the peons possessing the highest rank and greatest opulence in the division subject to your jurisdiction? What number of followers, armed or otherwise, are they supposed to maintain in their service; and do they appear abroad with such followers armed?

A. 24, 25, and 26. As we find these interrogatories have been put to the several zillah and city judges, who are the only channel of information to whom we could refer on the points contained therein; we have not deemed it requisite to call upon them to report distinctly to our court, but beg to refer to their answers to government, for the detail called for in these three queries.

Inter^y 27. Are there any persons in the division subject to your authority, who are supposed to be disaffected to the British government? What are their names, and to what means do you resort for superintending their conduct? Have these persons, any influence in the division, and to what extent?

A. 27. We do not know of any persons in this division, who are supposed to be seriously disaffected to the British government. All the Mussulman remains of this former seat of government, are supposed to be more or less dissatisfied with a revolution, which annihilated their influence, and has shut them out from even subsistence; but we are not aware of any particular persons whose conduct requires to be superintended.

Inter^y 28. Are you of opinion, that it would contribute to strengthen the attachment of the natives to the British government in India, were that government to declare itself to be the sole source of honour within its territories; and to confer titles and other marks of distinction on its native subjects?

A. 28. Titles and other marks of distinction have in all governments, been found a cheap and effectual mode of rewarding merit, and of securing the attachment of subjects to their governments. At the early period of British influence in India, a mode was adopted for conferring titles on the natives; and we are unacquainted with the reasons of its discontinuance, or with any objection to its revival. The resident at the Durbar, by orders from the governor, used to obtain the patent of investiture from the nazim, which was afterwards bestowed, with a dress of honour by the governor, on the person to be ennobled. Though the honour was nominally conferred by the nazim, the natives felt and acknowledged, that it in fact came from the sole bounty of the head of the British government. While the natives consider the sovereign at Delhi to be the source of honour, we are not aware of any preferable mode of conferring marks of distinction on them, than through his nominal representative.

Inter^y 29. What is the state of the roads and bridges, or other public works in the division under your authority; and at whose expense are they kept in repair?

A. 29. We conceive that the zillah judges will report fully on the state of the roads, bridges, and other public works in their several districts. The high roads only which we travel on our circuit, can come within our observation. The high road of communication immediately through the city of Moorshedabad, is so completely out of condition, as to be absolutely impassable for carriages of every description, and calls loudly for us to report it, on this occasion; it is entirely cut up and full of holes, and the encroachments of the buildings in all directions, hardly leave room in some places, for the passage of palanquins. Our report of the 5th July 1800, addressed to government through the medium of the secretary in the revenue and judicial departments, is very full on the subject of the present state state of the roads, bridges, &c. within the division under our authority, and treats especially (at considerable length) on the subject of not only the present condition of the roads, but also on that of keeping them in repair, and making new, where most requisite. As it would swell this answer materially, to make extracts here, we take the liberty to refer to the report itself, for our sentiments at large on the subject of roads, bridges, and other public works.

Inter^y 30. How are the convicts usually employed? And is there any manner of employing them, which appears to you preferable to the manner in which they are at present employed?

A. 30. The convicts are at present generally, and with beneficial effect, employed on the public roads. We are of opinion their services might be useful in the business of embankment, where works of that description, are carried on in the immediate vicinity of their jails. Our addresses to the Nizamut Adawlut of the 25th June 1798, and 28th of April 1800, treat in very full and most particular detail, the subject of enquiry in this interrogatory. We take the liberty of referring thereto, for a full and complete answer as to the most appropriate mode of employing convicts, which we trust will be deemed preferable to swelling this report beyond all bounds, by making extracts which must (to embrace the subject sufficiently) be very voluminous.

Inter^y 31. What is the state of the jails in your division?

A. 31. Our second judge (who is at present on circuit, holding the 2d sessions of 1801, and who has in his progress, visited the jails of zillabs Bhaugulpore, Purneah, Dinagepore, and Rungpore) reports, in answer to reference to him, that the state of the jails in all these places, is in every respect satisfactory,—that they are in good repair, kept clean, and generally well attended to; and as Mr. Rooke had not yet reached the Nattore station, the acting magistrate was called upon to report the state of the jail of Zillah Rajeshahy, who states, in consequence, that he considers the building perfectly competent to all requisite purposes; that it at present, wants some trifling repairs, which may be made for about two hundred rupees; and that he has at present, 586 prisoners of various descriptions. The jails of zillah and city Moorshedabad are all that remain further in our division: these, have been very recently visited by the senior judge, who on the 21st January reported fully on their state to the Nizamut Adawlut, describing the former, to be in the cleanest state, and best possible order, and that the prisoners appeared healthy and well governed, under rules and regulations of a salutary tendency, calculated to ensure order and regularity:—that the officers of the city jail were not equally attentive to their duty, or so careful as they might be to the preservation of the health of the prisoners, by due attention to the cleanliness of the jail; but the senior judge had reported, at the same time, that it appeared that the city jail was constructed on a very defective and objectionable plan, and had pointedly demonstrated the necessity that material alteration should immediately take place, and especially that drains to the different wards should be made to carry off filth of various descriptions, and to prevent the contagion of sickness (which had greatly prevailed) extending its baneful consequences. We do not think it necessary to particularize further his report on this jail, which, if it is thought necessary, may be referred to.

Inter^y 32. What is your opinion of the expediency of granting to zemindars, farmers, and other persons of character in your division, commissions empowering them to act as justices of peace? Do you think that such a measure, would contribute to the suppression of crimes, and to facilitate the apprehension of offenders? By what rules, would you regulate the extent of the jurisdiction of such persons? Would you confine it, to the estates or farms of the persons to whom the commissions might be granted, or otherwise?

A. 32. We are decidedly of opinion, that it would be expedient to grant to zemindars, commissions empowering them to act as justices of the peace, and that such a measure, would contribute to the suppression of crimes, and would facilitate the apprehension of offenders, by bringing to the assistance of police, all the zemindary establishments, whose cordial co-operation cannot now be expected under the orders of a tannadar, who at the head of 10 or 15 burkendosses, pretends to an authority paramount to that of the landholder himself, in his own estate: some restrictions will at the same time, be necessary for preventing the zemindars from perverting their magisterial authority to the purposes of revenue. As farmers have no permanent interest in the prosperity of the country, we apprehend that no restrictions would be sufficient for preventing their using such authority, as a weapon of oppression and extortion, to their own temporary benefit. We do not think that natives of even the most respectable characters, are likely to be tempted to give their gratuitous labour, as justices of peace; the jurisdiction of the zemindars should, in our opinion, be limited by the extent of their estates.

Inter^y 33. Are there any new rules or regulations which you would recommend to be adopted, as being calculated in your opinion, for the suppression of crimes in general?

A. 33. After our several addresses above quoted, we have nothing new to recommend as rules and regulations, calculated for the suppression of crimes in general.

Inter^y 34. What has been the operation of the late regulations respecting the tax on spirituous liquors, with regard to the vice of drunkenness? Are you of opinion, that the establishment of the taxes now levied on spirituous liquors, have rendered the vice of drunkenness more prevalent than it was previously to the establishment of these taxes?

A. 34. We cannot conceive how the establishment of a tax on spirituous liquors, should render the vice of drunkenness more prevalent than it was, previously to the establishment of the the tax. At the same time, we have ocular demonstration, that the vice has not decreased. In Bengal, however, this vice is far from general; it is confined almost entirely to a few casts and classes, and to populous towns. The bulk of the labouring poor, never touch liquor.

Interr 35. Do any measures occur to you, the adoption of which, would in your opinion, contribute progressively to the improvement of the moral character of the inhabitants of the division?

A. 35. The moral character of a nation can be improved, by education only. All instruction is unattainable to the labouring poor, whose own necessities require the assistance of the children, as soon as their tender limbs are capable of the smallest labour. With the middle class of tradesmen, artificers and shop-keepers, education ends at ten years of age, and never reaches further than reading, writing (a scarcely legible hand) on a plantain leaf, and the simplest rules of arithmetic. We are not prepared to suggest any measures, the adoption of which, would, in our opinion, contribute progressively to the improvement of a people thus circumstanced.

Interr 36. In your opinion, what has been the effect of the Regulation, which declares persons convicted of the crime of perjury, liable to be marked on the forehead?

A. 36. We do not perceive any effects from the Regulation which declares persons convicted of the crime of perjury, liable to be marked on the forehead. In the course of our judicial duties, we still meet with the same barefaced disregard of truth, which always characterized the natives of India; we are however of opinion, that the terror of this stigma, should be retained in our code.

Interr 37. What has been the operation of the punishment of transportation, introduced by the British government?

A. 37. The punishment of transportation, introduced by the British government, falls chiefly on decoits; and yet the crime of decoity has not decreased, in the division under our authority. To judge therefore, of its operation by this result, it would follow, that the punishment is of no effect, and the terror of it, must daily diminish.

Interr 38. Are you of opinion, that the Mahomedan criminal law, with the alterations of that law, made by the British government, is administered with too much lenity, or too much severity; and what do you suppose to be the consequences produced by the operation of the spirit, in which the criminal law is in your opinion, administered?

A. 38. We are of opinion, that from the discretionary mode in which the Mahomedan criminal law (with the alterations of that law, made by the British government) is administered, the administration of it, admits both of too much lenity and too much severity,—at any rate, of too much uncertainty. An offence, which to one law officer, may appear sufficiently punished by a month's imprisonment, shall from another law officer, incur a sentence of three or more years. Even in the heinous crime of gang robbery, our records will show sometimes a sentence of 14 years transportation, and sometimes a sentence of two years confinement. The consequences which we suppose to be produced by the operation of this spirit, in which the criminal law is in our opinion administered, are contempt of the law itself, and encouragement to offenders. Though every criminal code must leave some discretion of punishment to the courts, particularly in the smaller offences, and breaches of the peace; yet in crimes of enormity, we think that the punishment ought to be specific, at least, hat some limit should be fixed to discretion. The English law fixes it in all cases in smaller offences, by marking the barrier, which the court's severity shall not exceed; in more serious crimes, by specifying the bounds of the court's lenity.

Interr 39. In what period does the judge, who makes the half-yearly jail deliveries, usually complete the circuit?

A. 39. The half-yearly jail deliveries of the out-zillahs, usually occupy four months; but the completion of the circuit, after the judges return to the sudder station, depends upon necessity or otherwise of his giving any of his time to the business of the Court of Appeal.

P. S. The completion of the Answers to the foregoing Interrogatories, has been, from a great pressure of business, the necessity of distant references, and other circumstances, delayed until the period of their date, and of consequence the signatures of only two members of the courts are annexed, as the third judge was on the 10th of December removed from this station; but it is proper and necessary to add, that the Answers generally were prepared whilst Mr. Colebrooke was a member of these courts, and that he contributed full co-operation and active assistance, in preparing them.

TO GEORGE DOWDESWELL, Esq.

Secretary to Government, in the Judicial Department.

SIR,

I HEREWITH transmit, and request you will lay before Government, my Answers to the Interrogatories, received by me with your Letter of the 29th of October last.

I am, Sir, Your most obedient humble servant,

Zillah Midnapore,
30 January 1802.

(Signed) H. Strachey,
Judge, and Magistrate.

Answers from the Judge and Magistrate of Mid-napore, to Interrogatories: 30 Jan. 1802.

ANSWERS to the INTERROGATORIES received by the Judge and Magistrate of Midnapore, from the Secretary to Government in the Judicial and Revenue Department.

Answer to } 1.—THE number of causes depending before the judge register and native
Interrogatory } commissioners, on the 1st January 1802, was as follows:

Before the Judge	-	-	-	197.
the Register	-	-	-	253.
the Native Commissioners	-	-	-	3,317.

Interr 2. The number of causes usually depending before the judge and register, has been gradually diminishing since 1794 or 1795. The number depending before, and decided by, the native commissioners, has been during the same period, gradually increasing.

Interr 3. The number of causes decided in the year 1801, was as follows:

By the Judge	-	-	-	421.
By the Register	-	-	-	370.
By the Native Commissioners	-	-	-	14,559.

Interr 4. I cannot say positively, that as many causes as are now depending, must necessarily be so always; because that, depends on a great variety of circumstances, with some of which I have no concern. But as the business is now very nearly kept up, that is to say, as suits are decided, almost as fast as they can be prepared for decision; I can say in general, that I have no expectation their number will be reduced. I am now deciding suits which were instituted, in the months of August and September last.

2. Many delays occur in delivering answers, replies, and rejoinders, owing to the expense of stamped paper.

Interr 5. I am not prepared to suggest any rules (at least any, which I conjecture would be approved) by which the decision of suits would be expedited, consistently with a due administration of the laws.

2. From my answer to the last question, it will probably be thought no such rules are required here.

3. I doubt whether the object would be promoted, by leaving it optional with the judge, to take down in writing or not, the depositions of witnesses in suits not appealable to a higher tribunal. I think it might be attended with inconvenience, and possibly of dissatisfaction to the parties.

Interr 6. I should not at all object to the plan of empowering the registers and native commissioners to decide causes for sums exceeding 200 R^s and 50 R^s; but not conceiving it necessary for expediting the administration of justice, or rather for clearing the file (the sole view here proposed by Government, I believe); I deem it superfluous to recommend it. I profess myself, on other grounds, a zealous advocate for enlarging the powers of the Munsiffs; and I may embrace some opportunity of attempting to set forth the benefits to be derived, from such an arrangement. Here I will only observe, that the expense of prosecution in the Munsiff courts, bears no proportion to that of the dewanny adawlut; and that it is my opinion, the nearer we approach to the rule of granting to all, speedy justice, without any expense whatever, the nearer we shall in our judicial system, approach perfection.

Interr 7. Litigation may possibly have been checked by the fees and stamp duty; but I confess I consider the charges too high.

2. It will not, I imagine, be denied, that it is desirable the least tedious and least expensive mode of obtaining redress, should be open, where an injury has really been suffered. When a poor man has been oppressed, he should be freed from trouble and expense, and assisted and encouraged as far as possible, in prosecuting his complaint. He is not, in such a situation, a fair object for taxation. It does not become the ruling power, to add to his misfortune, by levying impositions upon him.

3. It is clear, that a ryot, from whom an increase of rent has been exacted, and instituting a suit for the same, must feel the charge of stamps and fees, to be a severe aggravation of his distress; nor can he console himself under the reflection, that the impositions are intended to check litigiousness; or that, for certain reasons of finance, it is expedient he should submit to new exactions.

4. The expense and delay to which ryots are subject in prosecuting their suits, are to my knowledge, excessive. For the truth of this, I would refer to the records of any register in Bengal. The duty of deciding revenue causes for a small amount, under the operation of the present regulations, has fallen chiefly on the registers. The rights of the inferior ryots, are seldom discussed in the superior courts.

Answers from the Judge and Magistrate of Midnapore, to Interrogatories: 30 Jan. 1802.

5. The welfare of those from whom all revenue and even subsistence, must be ultimately derived, who are the poorest, the weakest, and the most numerous, who constitute the bulk of the people, is a matter of importance, and not unworthy the notice of government. I have therefore thought it my duty, to dwell on this subject, with some minuteness.

6. It must, I am sure, constantly happen, that a ryot gives up his prosecution in despair, on finding the expense of continuing it, beyond his power to sustain.

7. Exaction of revenue, is peculiarly difficult of proof. Either no engagements exist, and no accounts can be found, or they are extremely defective and perplexing. It is not the original fee on the institution of the suit, but the subsequent charges on exhibits and on witnesses, that appear to me intolerable. I have often seen a suitor, when stripped of his last rupee, and called upon for the fee on a document, produce in court a silver ring or other trinket, and beg that it might be received as a pledge; and after all, perhaps he was cast for want of money, to bring proof.

8. I confess, I think such scenes in a court of justice, unpleasant to those who are entrusted with the administration of the laws; and not very creditable to government.

9. Formerly in these provinces, and it is still the case almost throughout the east, the cultivators of the soil, when oppressed beyond endurance, were accustomed to assemble in a crowd, with ploughs and other implements, and demand justice with violent and outrageous clamour. They still sometimes resort to this practice; though, with us it can avail them nothing. They are unable to support themselves at the Sudder, during a procedure of two or three months. They cannot return to their houses, without submitting to their oppressor. They must have speedy justice or none. The complaints of these people, are seldom or never litigious. I have seen some false complaints, and some conspiracies supported by false evidence; but suits simply litigious, brought forward merely from the quarrelsome disposition of the prosecutor, are not common; neither, if they were common, would it in my opinion, be proper to take any measure, except that of fining the individual suitor.

10. The fact appears to me, this: When the business of the civil courts became too heavy for the judge, which very soon happened, instead of appointing more judges, it was resolved that, to prevent the accumulation of causes, it was necessary to check the spirit of litigiousness, which was supposed to produce it. Accordingly, heavy taxes have been laid upon prosecution. Out of 100 suits, perhaps five at the utmost, may be fairly pronounced litigious, and those five are probably instituted by men, well able to bear the expense.

11. If what I have understood is true, that suits in the dewanny adawlut are now prevented from accumulating as heretofore, it is not because the litigious only, are deterred from prosecuting; since a man is disabled from sustaining expense, in proportion as he is poor, and not, as he is litigious. Nothing else can be inferred from the fact, than that the charges of prosecution are so exactly calculated, and the fees and stamp duties so judiciously contrived, as to enable the courts to administer justice to all who can afford to pay for it.

12. Half the complainants in the dewanny adawlut of this zilla, appear as paupers, although these find much difficulty in complying with the regulation intended for the relief of paupers. No man can be admitted to prosecute as a pauper, under Regulation XLVI, 1793, till he brings two witnesses to attest his poverty, and two securities for his personal appearance; and no one, can well do this, without at least maintaining them and himself, during their absence from home. But the expense of such maintenance, must exceed that of the fees and stamp paper, for a suit of the nature I allude to; which aggregate sum, if the suitor has it in his power to pay, he is in strictness, no pauper.

Interrogatory 8. The pleaders are very amply paid. The best are always employed most. They are not ill qualified, though few are well acquainted with the Regulations.

2. The establishment of the pleaders, has much facilitated the attainment of justice to individuals.

Interrogatory 9. I think the establishment of licensed vakeels, has contributed greatly to expedite the decision of suits, by bringing more speedily and accurately before the courts, the merits of the suits.

Interrogatory 10. The vakeels in general discharge their duty, with honour and fidelity.—I have seen instances of negligence; but none of treachery to their clients.

Interrogatory 11. The inhabitants at large of Midnapore, are I imagine nearly as well acquainted with the laws, as the inhabitants of other parts of the country, that is to say, their knowledge is extremely limited.

2. None but the public officers, the pleaders, and those who are candidates for office, can be said to possess a general knowledge of the Regulations. The zemindars, talookdars, and farmers, and the merchants, know such regulations as concern them respectively. The one, the revenue laws relating to the collections, attachments, &c. the other, the commercial Regulations respecting duties, rate of interest, &c. and among men of business, this knowledge of the Regulations immediately relating to their particular occupations, is no doubt increasing. But I believe the Regulations are very little studied, out of cutcherry. I never met with, or heard of a native who possessed a full, distinct, comprehensive view of the Regulations, any more than of the civil or political state of the country. No learned man, except a candidate for office, regards our institutions, as a branch of knowledge, which it becomes him to pay attention to. Of the Shaster and Koran, all are equally ignorant, except the Mahomedans of education, whose learning extends to the quotation of a few scraps of the Koran, of little or no practical use. All Hindoos but Pundits, of whom there are not many in Midnapore, are entirely ignorant of the Shaster.

3. I should

3. I should not omit, that it is my opinion, the most profound knowledge in the Koran and Shaster are of little service in the cutcherry.

Interrogatory 12.—I am not prepared to recommend alterations in forms, further than to offer my opinion, that as few as possible should be added, and that any opportunity should be taken, of diminishing those which exist. Fortunately for the natives, they are not many; perhaps not more, than are essential to regularity and expedition.

Interrogatory 13. The judge sits in a chair, and the moolavie, if he attends, which he seldom does, in another. All the rest, stand while in cutcherry; but there are rooms adjoining, where they sit on mats and carpets, according to their usage, converse with their clients, and, I believe, smoke hookas. I have introduced no forms or ceremonies whatever, in opening the court; nor did I ever hear of any such being used, either during the present government, or former governments. When the judge enters the court, all present make their obeisance. A criminal throws himself into a suppliant posture, and frequently a suitor likewise. These are the customs of the country, and happen of course; but no orders are given regarding them, and I know not how they could be settled by regulation. There is necessarily some little parade and constraint, where an European appears; but except in that respect, which is inevitable, I am not aware that we ever depart from the simplicity, so conspicuous, in the administration of justice all over the East.

2. I give myself no trouble respecting the adjustment of ceremonials, except as to maintaining silence, which is easily done, and keeping off the crowd. Any measures to preserve decorum, appear to me superfluous, for a breach of decorum never occurs.

Interrogatory 14. In Midnapore, I cannot discover any schools or seminaries where the Mahomedan or Hindoo laws are taught. There are schools in almost every village for teaching Bengally and accounts to children, in low circumstances. The teachers, though tolerably well qualified for what they undertake, are persons no way respectable. Their rank in life I take to be generally very low, and their emoluments exceedingly scanty; certainly, little superior to those of our lowest domestics. The schools are only day-schools. The children sit in the open air, or under a shed, and learn to read, write, and cast accounts, paying each perhaps one anna or two annas a month. I recollect it happened some time ago in the foudjarry adawlut, that a man, charged with several thefts, when asked his occupation, said, it was the teaching of children; and on sending for some of his scholars, I found he was eminent, in his way. Nor did it seem to excite much surprise, that a man in his situation, should turn out a thief.

2. In opulent families, teachers are retained as servants. The children of respectable natives do not go to school.

3. Persian and Arabic are taught for the most part, by moolavies. Most men of this description, have a few scholars in their houses, whom they support, as well as instruct. Thus Persian and Arabic students, though of respectable families, are considered as living on charity; and they are total strangers to extravagance and dissipation. There was formerly a Mussulman college in Midnapore, even yet the establishment exists; but no law is taught. There are a number of private individuals who teach pupils in the manner I have above described. And the students at the sudder station, living in the families of the amlah or of the pleaders, perhaps occasionally pick up a smattering of the Mahomedan law.

Interrogatory 15. It is not easy to say whether the moral character of the natives has improved, by means of the system established by us. In my opinion, the system has little direct influence on the morals of the people. They are, probably, somewhat more licentious than formerly. Chicanery, subornation, and fraud and perjury, are certainly more common. These, constantly occur among the suitors and witnesses; and the pleaders, through whom, it might be thought, the judge possessed some little power of check and controul, never I think exert themselves to prevent them. Intrigue and corruption in the amlah, so as to affect the actual administration of justice, seldom happen. Oppression, cruelty, violence of all sorts, except that of decoits and choars, are grown much less frequent. The ill-treatment of women, of servants, and slaves, has nearly ceased. The same may be said, of the corporal severities formerly exercised in collecting the revenues. The poor look up to the laws, and not as heretofore, to a patron, for protection. In some respect, therefore, the present mode of administering justice, may be deemed conducive to good morals.

2. Drunkenness, prostitution, indecorum, profligacy of manners, must increase under a system which, although it professes to administer the Mahomedan law, does not punish those immoralities. None of these, however, prevail to an alarming degree, in this district.

3. Midnapore contains no large towns. I beg leave here to offer it as my opinion, that little morality is learnt, in any court of justice. In Calcutta I have reason to believe the morals of the people are worse, in spite of the severity of the police and of the English laws. Nor do I attribute this solely to the size, population, and indiscriminate society of the capital; but, in part, to the supreme court. I scarcely ever knew a native connected with the supreme court, whose morals and manners were not contaminated by that connexion. In mentioning this evil, which I by no means attribute to individuals, I trust it will not be imagined I mean to speak generally with disrespect of the institution of the court itself.

4. The bulk of the inhabitants of Midnapore, appear to me to have very well preserved their original mild simplicity and innocence. They retain the characteristic features of their original mild simplicity and innocence. They are less quarrelsome, and give less trouble than the natives of the neighbouring districts. They are little in the habit of engaging in law-suits; and it appears to me that but a small proportion of them, have opportunities of seeing the practices and learning the vices of the cutcherry.

Interrogatory 16. To answer this 16th interrogatory, is not easy. I cannot readily ascertain the opinion of individuals on these points. I have never observed any symptoms of distrust, and I should imagine the confidence reposed in the judicial officers, to whom the people look up as the safeguards of their persons and property, to be very general. The natives probably know the intention of government's officers to be good; but that their rights and property are not in all instances, effectually secured, the lower orders must see. That the magistrate has always the wish, but very often not the power, to protect their lives and property from choirs and decoits, they must know. The ryots are not, in my opinion, well protected by the revenue laws; nor can they often obtain effectual redress by prosecuting, particularly for exaction and dispossession. The delay and expense attending a lawsuit are intolerable, in cases where the suitor complains, which almost invariably happens, that he has been deprived of all his property. The cancelling of leases, after the sale of an estate for arrears, must frequently operate with extreme harshness and cruelty to the under tenants.

2. One species of distrust in the supreme power, is pretty generally known. The landholders are even yet apprehensive of the increase of their jumma; but this possibly less here, than in some other districts, on account of the lands having been greatly over assessed at the settlement, and since sold for arrears, and the old proprietors, for the most part, ruined. The Lakeraudars are, I am told, but of this I am not sure, in constant dread of impositions; and the best informed commercial people believe new taxes will be levied, whenever they can be, with effect. In short, a general opinion, I presume, prevails, that government, in attending to the welfare of all, is studious of its own interest; and shows an anxiety about the general prosperity, chiefly with a view to increase the available pecuniary resources of the state.

3. There exists, doubtless, an universal impression, that property is not liable to confiscation or gross violation by the supreme authority. It was formerly customary to bury in the ground, treasure and valuable goods; and to conceal the acquisition of wealth. This is still done, but generally from the dread of decoits; never from any apprehension that the officers of government will lay violent hands on private property. I am informed there are hardly any instances of the zemindars or others, or the very few who possess wealth, lending it out to individuals on interest, or vesting it in the Company's funds. They prefer hiding it, as their ancestors have done. This, I conceive, proceeds from ignorance alone, and, certainly, not from any well-grounded distrust in the faith of government. From this remark should be excluded merchants, and all such as have correspondence or commercial transactions with Calcutta. Such persons frequently possess Company's paper, to a considerable amount.

4. It will probably be found on enquiry, that the natives do not ascribe the present wretched state of the old zemindars, to the unexpected difficulty of collecting their revenue under our Regulations, or to other causes of a similar kind, which are unquestionably the true ones. They imagine it, to be the result of a settled premeditated plan of policy in the government, to level and degrade its most powerful subjects.

5. On the whole, I do think the inhabitants of the district subject to my jurisdiction, must consider their property, as it manifestly is, entirely safe from violation by the officers of government, or by the supreme executive authority.

6. There is certainly now little or no dread of arbitrary fines and imprisonment to extort money, nor of cruelties exercised in the collection of the revenue: all of which abuses were as notorious in the old native governments, as they are still among the Marhattas, in the neighbourhood of this district.

7. With respect to rights, in the common acceptance of the word, I do not conceive that the natives ever possessed any. They know, because they feel, when they suffer oppression in their persons or property: but they must likewise perceive, if there are among them, any who possess a share of discernment, that their safety from lawless encroachments, is the result of the humane policy, the mercy and forbearance of their enlightened rulers, who agree to govern according to laws which shall bind even themselves, and not from any power residing in the people, which could enable them to resist such encroachments. Although, therefore, they are, with respect to their persons and property, entirely secure from violation by government and its officers, and though they may actually enjoy as much happiness, or nearly as much, as they ever did, properly speaking, they enjoy no rights and liberties. If they possess happiness and security, it is not because they have a right to them; but because the equity or the policy of their rulers is pleased to confer upon them those blessings, as valuable privileges and immunities.

Interrogatory 17.—I have no doubt Midnapore is rapidly improving in population and cultivation. With respect to commerce, except the internal trade in articles consumed by the inhabitants of the district, which of course increases with the population, I am inclined to think it nearly stationary, but certainly not declining. I must here, however, mention, that the Company's investment has during the war, dwindled away to almost nothing, and that numbers of weavers who depended for subsistence on the advances of the commercial agents, and who are less able than other descriptions of artisans to change their occupations, are reduced to very great distress.

2. I have not heard of any buildings worth mention, erected by the natives, either for religious or domestic purposes; neither are there any works carried on for manufactures. I am not able to discover that in Midnapore any extensive commercial concern requiring costly or substantial buildings or machinery was ever carried on, unless by Europeans; contrivances for abridging labour are here unknown. I do not perceive the least spirit of enterprise among either merchants or farmers.

3. In Midnapore there are no religious buildings of any consequence. The natives are sometimes, from motives of vanity or of piety, induced to dig a tank; and this, though the least ornamental, I conceive to be the most useful, of all public works; but the increasing poverty of the higher orders, and other causes, have contributed to make the digging and cleaning cleaning of tanks very uncommon, except in towns, and a few other places where perhaps they are least wanted. In this district, there are very few new works of this nature; but the remains of old ones, attest the superior opulence of former times; at least, they show that property was more unequally divided among the natives than at present.

4. The private houses of zemindars and other men of note, consist either of forts in ruins, or of wretched huts, generally worse than the stable of an European gentleman.—It does not appear, however, that they were much better off for habitations, when more wealthy.—No vestiges of genius are visible in the ruins of the buildings and forts of Midnapore,—nothing, by which we could be led to suppose that the arts ever flourished.—It may seem surprising that the opulent and respectable natives are so seldom tempted to imitate, as far as their domestic habits permit, the decent and commodious, but not splendid edifices, which we are accustomed to build for our own residences, and that they have acquired no taste whatever for gardening. If the erection of buildings is to be reckoned a sign of prosperity, it is my opinion, that the district does not at all improve, in this instance.—But it is to the climate and manners of the people, rather than to any impression of the insecurity of property, that I attribute their perseverance in constructing for their own accommodation nothing but the slightest and most miserable huts.

5. The bulk of the people of Midnapore, like those of other parts of the country, and I presume of other countries, acquire by their labour what is barely necessary to their existence, and little more. They work,—not with a view to improve their situations, but merely to enable themselves and families to subsist. They scarcely ever think of saving money, or of procuring themselves better food, clothing, or habitations, than they have been accustomed to; yet labour is I think not ill rewarded. A ryot can with ease cultivate 16 beghas of rice; and supposing half the produce to go for rent, the remainder will afford food, for four or five persons. And this is only one crop, the labour required to produce which, cannot occupy half the year.

6. The coolies, or common labourers, frequently earn a rupee, or two rupees, which enable them to be idle for several days. It is usual for those who employ them, to keep them in arrears, because when they receive money, they are idle till it is spent; yet all but those who drink spirits are strangers to luxury and excess of every kind, unless it may be thought proper to except tobacco as a luxury.

7. The situation of the lower orders, is on the whole, somewhat improved by our system of administration; but their nature is not changed. They are always in debt, and borrow at enormous interest: They are not stimulated to any efforts of industry by the security they enjoy, but solely by the calls of hunger.

8. The country is improved by increased population and cultivation. There are in number, more ryots, but they are just what their fathers were; and hardly an instance can be found of a poor labourer becoming rich, by dint of industry and parsimony. To their few wants, the uniformity and extreme simplicity of their habits, their unsocial education, and the heat of the climate,—to these causes, and not to our laws, are in my opinion to be ascribed, the peculiarities of the people.

9. Cultivation is increased by increasing population; for the ryots must work to live. It is very little extended by plans for the improvement of agriculture, or by revenue regulations. Waste and jungle land, if low and fit for rice, may be brought into tillage in one season, and the poorest ryot can undertake it; but a man of substance seldom employs stock in farming, under the expectancy of a distant return.

10. The class of mere labourers who work for hire, is not numerous. Every ryot is a farmer, who tills the land for which he pays rent. Talookdars hold in their own hands little or no part of their own estates to cultivate, by means of servants. The poorest ryots are tenants, and by the custom of the country, they are considered as a sort of proprietors, entitled to a perpetual lease. They are attached in the strongest manner to the soil, never migrate but from necessity; and I think they ought to be recognized, as enjoying a right (they and their posterity) to their tenures.

11. Thus, the lowest class of the people, however wretched in appearance, and depressed in spirit, possess a sort of independence, though perhaps not a beneficial or satisfactory independence. On the failure of a crop of rice, very few are able to get employment; for there is no work to be done. They leave their houses, and being destitute of the means of procuring a livelihood by industry, are driven to subsist by begging, or by robbing.

12. The poor, the sick, and the aged, besides great multitudes of idle religious persons, Bramins, Fakcers, and Pilgrims, always depend on private charity alone. In times of plenty, the resource of begging is perhaps sufficient; for all the natives are impelled, by nature, habit, and religion, to assist each other with food when in distress. But in a famine, the poor soon perish.

13. A famine in this country is, of all calamities to which the earth is liable, the most dreadful. It ought to be considered, as perpetually impending. For that it has not occurred during several years, is not to be ascribed to any measures of ours. The country is perhaps, at present, as populous as it was, previous to the great famine in the year 1770; and if another scarcity, equal to that, should take place now, I do not suppose it would fall less heavy. Individuals in the Mofussil, are less able to assist each other, than they were formerly. Fewer private stores of grain are preserved; and I have been informed, perhaps without foundation, that government have come to doubt the utility of the establishment of the public granaries.

14. The people are, or at least would be, in the event of a famine, less domesticated, and less dependent on each other. It is to be recollected, that during a great famine, dependence, slavery, and captivity, are for the poor (that is for 99 in 100) highly enviable, and accordingly sought after with eagerness. Many hospitable families, where thousands might and would have been collected together and fed, are now entirely ruined. I trust I shall be be pardoned for adding, that I doubt, in spite of all the information that has been got, and all the plans that have been suggested and adopted, whether government are better enabled to apply effectual remedies than they were heretofore.

15. A great deal of rice was destroyed last rains by an inundation; and from the little information I have picked up respecting the neighbouring districts, I cannot help entertaining some suspicion, that distress will be felt before the next harvest.

16. The condition of the ryots is on the whole, I think, better; because their lives and limbs are safe from the zemindars and collectors of revenue. On the other hand, the dread of decoits, the expense of prosecution, and the spirit of prosecuting, the slowness of our legal proceedings, and the doubtfulness of the event of law-suits, on account of perjury and other causes: all these, are evils of the present day.

17. It is true, that every man who is injured, may prosecute; that he is considered as possessing a right to redress; and that justice is intended to be impartially administered: whereas in other states of Hindostan, for instance the neighbouring Mahratta country, there is no pretence of this. But perhaps in a few of the Mahratta estates, which are best taken care of, where no poor man conceives that he possesses any rights whatever, and where all are aware that, without the help of a patron, they have no power to obtain redress for injury, perhaps, I say, in these estates, less injustice is on the whole committed, and less misery felt, than in estates of the same size, under our government. In the Mahratta estate, there may probably occur one or two glaring instances of oppression, outrage, and cruelty, which are silently put up with, because there no inferior attempts to contend with his superior. In the Midnapore estate, a number of poor men may be seen to set up for themselves, and are ruined by ineffectual contests, often about trifles, with rich and powerful individuals.

18. I know not whether it will be thought, that some of these remarks indicate an attempt to undervalue the advantages of an equal and regular administration of justice. This is far from my intention. But it may be permitted me to consider, whether that justice is in reality, equal and regular; whether the poor can obtain it, as well as the rich; whether the state of the country, or the nature of things, will admit it. I am ready to confess my opinion, that many are apt to make up their minds on these points, from hasty and superficial views. It has always appeared to me a very great inconvenience and misfortune, in the constitution of the government of this country, that the rulers have it not in their power to attain a sufficient intimacy with the lower classes of their subjects, to enable them to judge with accuracy, of their condition.

19. Where the cultivator of the earth lives under a dread of becoming the prey of extortioners, he cannot be considered secure of enjoying the fruit of his labour. Nothing can be more desirable than to attain a precise view of the situation of the natives, as connected with the collection of the revenue. On this topic, I could wish to enter at some length, but I am aware of the difficulty attending the investigation, and particularly of my inability to disclaim any intention to pronounce positively, on revenue matters. The sentiments expressed in the following paragraph, will be the result of such views as occur to me, on a general and cursory collection of the subject.

20. In passing the 7th Regulation, 1799, it was I believe the design of government (a very reasonable and liberal design, in my opinion) to enable the zemindars to collect their just demands of rent, with punctuality, and without expense; and I think it would have been just and considerate, at the same time, to have facilitated to the ryots, the means of obtaining redress against extortioners.

21. But the fact is, the ruin of one zemindar, being more conspicuous at the sudder, than that of 10,000 ryots, his interests naturally attract the attention of the legislature first; and as, in the proposal of any plan connected with finance, it is required to set out with the maxim, that the sudder jumma can on no pretence be lowered, there remains no other resource for helping the zemindars, than the restoration of part of the power they possessed of old, to plunder their tenants.

22. Exaction of revenue, is now, I presume, and perhaps always was, the most prevailing crime throughout the country. It is probably an evil necessarily attending the civil state of the ryots. I think it rather unfortunate than otherwise, that it should be less shocking to humanity than some foudary crimes. I know not how it is that extortioners appear to us in any other light, than that of the worst and most pernicious species of robbers.

23. It will be found, I believe, that the condition of husbandmen in eastern countries, is incompatible with security, and that sort of independence which enables men to maintain themselves against oppression and violence. The public revenues, which are in reality the rent of land, are throughout the East, collected by a system of extortion, violence, and barbarity of every kind.

24. In these provinces, we of course endeavoured to put an end to this system, and with the greatest success; but before we had completely gained the object, we concluded the settlement, since made perpetual, forming it on an estimate of the resources of the lands. The resources were probably by the zemindars, when they acceded to the settlement, considered as permanent, and not liable to be affected materially, by further limitations of the authority they possessed over their tenants.

25. But owing to the natural operation of the Regulations, they soon found themselves unable to rob and plunder, as before. In consequence, most of them fell heavily in arrears, and lost the whole or great part of their estates, and many more were hastening to ruin, when Regulation 7th of 1799, was enacted for their relief. It was indeed expedient to do something extraordinary for the zemindars, since it became very probable, at least so I thought, that in proportion as equal justice was administered, many of them were deprived of means to collect from the ryots, sufficient to pay their sudder jumma.

26. The effect of Regulation 7th, 1799, has been, to enable them, by means of attachments and sales, to realize their rents. But the frequency of these attachments and sales in the mofussil, would alone serve to prove, that the revenues are not collected without extreme misery to the ryots. And consideration of the expense, and delay of prosecution, on which subject I have before touched in reply to Interrogatory 7th, satisfies me, that the dewanny adawlut cannot afford the sufferers effectual redress against the abuse of the powers entrusted to the zemindars, by the 7th Regulation of 1799.

27. It is chiefly to be ascribed to the Regulation in question, I conceive, that the public balances are moderate, and that lands at the collector's sales fetch a tolerable price. Yet, as if the mode in which the rents are levied, and the condition of the ryots, were matters not necessary to be noticed, it is frequently pronounced at once as a position, admitting of no doubt, that these favourable sales afford a substantial proof of the lightness of the assessment, and of the flourishing state of the country.

28. Under the Mahomedan government, the revenues may surely be said to have been collected from the zemindars, by a system of boundless violence and rapine. Defaulters were liable to a cruel imprisonment, to be disgraced, scourged, and tortured. But the zemindars exercised the same severities over their tenants, or they could never have collected their rents. We have realized the revenues, by selling the patrimony of defaulters. The zemindars realize their rents, not by corporal severities, but by vexatious attachments and ruinous sales. I suspect that, till the zemindars are deprived of the power of distraining for arrears, the ryots must be liable to exaction. I am not, I confess, clear that it would be possible for zemindars to collect their just rents, without some power of the kind; for their rents are now enormously high. They cannot afford to spare their ryots; for government never spares them. It is generally known, that even the powers the zemindars possessed under Regulation 7th of 1793, were either insufficient or ill understood; and, in fact, they seldom exerted those powers, till they were confirmed and extended by Regulation 7th, 1799.

29. I think it would be worth while to make the experiment of prohibiting distraint, unless preceded by a legal judgment. A summary enquiry might, by means of mofussil cauzies and munsifs, be made of every demand; then, the zemindars would be necessitated to adduce some evidence of their claim, before they proceeded to enforce it, and would cease to be judges in their own cause.

30. The collector of this district, has entered into minute and laborious inquiries on this interesting subject, which falls more immediately within his province, and will speedily submit the result to government. I content myself with observing, that to the best of my knowledge, the laws regarding attachments are greatly abused, and are productive of extreme oppression.

31. I have ascertained the immense population of the district, by an actual enumeration of a great part of it. It amounts to at least one million and a half. I have been enabled to compare it, with one taken about 13 or 14 years ago, in a few pergunnahs. Two years after that enumeration, a famine destroyed many thousands in this zilla; and if I have not found the present number, when compared to the old one, to be very great, there can be no doubt whatever, that the cause is the famine alone. Increasing cultivation necessarily follows population, and is every where visible. To those who are tolerably acquainted with the internal state of the country, it is known that the population, unless checked by some great calamity, constantly increases very fast. It will be found that it is not the want of courts of justice, nor of a regular system of police, that prevents the prosperity of the provinces subject to the Mahrattas. Where no battles are fought, where the ryots remain unmolested by military exactions, where the zemindar or his agent are seldom changed, the lands of the Mahrattas in the neighbourhood of this district, are in a high state of cultivation, and the population is equal, frequently superior to ours. I say frequently superior to ours; not that the natural increase of population is by us, in the least obstructed, but because, in a well superintended Mahratta estate, there are, in addition to the natural increase, constant accessions to the numbers, by emigrants from the neighbouring country.

32. It is the interest of the proprietor of an estate, to take as much care of his ryots as a farmer does of his cattle; and that care, is sufficient to promote their increase.—The ryots of the Company's provinces enjoy that degree of security which is essential to their increase. This is not the case, with the far greater part of the Mahratta country: vast tracts of the Mahratta country are desolated, partial famines are frequent, and as population does not increase in those provinces, I conclude that the misery is extreme. Population can here, be very materially affected only, by war and famine.

33. Famine proceeds from drought or inundation, and sometimes from war. From the circumstance of increasing population alone, we cannot, as many pretend, draw an inference of very high prosperity and good government. England is certainly a country enjoying a good government, and great internal prosperity; but the population of the cultivated parts of Bengal surpasses that of England, and this population increases in Bengal, in a far greater proportion than in England, though I imagine the government of Bengal will be admitted to be inferior to that of England. The situation of almost all orders of people here, is highly favourable to the propagation of the species.

34. Every body marries; an unmarried man of 25, or an unmarried girl of 15, are hardly to be found. As soon as girls become marriageable, generally before, husbands are without difficulty provided for them; marriage is a thing which happens, of course—a necessary part of life.

35. The people live a regular, sober, domestic life, and seldom leave their houses, not being liable to be called upon for the performance of military service or public labour, or servitude, so common in most countries. Very few marriages are unproductive: the women becoming becoming prematurely debilitated and decrepid, do not perhaps bear so many children as those who marry at a riper age; but barrenness is extremely rare. Polygamy, prostitution, religious austerity, and the circumstance of young widows seldom marrying a second time, are the only obstacles I am at present able to recollect, to the increase of population; and all these, though in themselves evils of considerable magnitude, being productive of individual suffering and inconvenience, I do not consider, in their general effect upon the population of the country, as very important.—Among the causes of increase, are to be reckoned, the extreme facility of rearing children. Here, no infants perish of cold, of diseases proceeding from dirt and bad accommodation, nor, except in famines, of unwholesome food.—The small-pox sometimes carries off multitudes of children.—Inoculation, though it has been known for ages, is by no means universally practised; sickness, however, is very uncommon among children. As soon as a child is weaned, it lives on rice; like its parents, goes naked for two or three years; and requires no care whatever.—In years of plenty, poverty scarcely ever prevents a man, from rearing a family of children.

36. The political security afforded to this district, from the ravages of the Mahrattas, is the greatest blessing the natives could enjoy; but to imagine that the population has increased, solely in consequence of our system of internal administration, appears to me most erroneous. Under the native government, the population had reached its utmost height, or very near it. Thirty years ago, nearly half the people were swept away, by the greatest famine recorded in history. Ever since that period, except in 1700, when a partial famine happened, the numbers have been gradually increasing. I do not know that the increase has been more rapid, during the last ten years, than during the 20 preceding; although most of the abuses of the native governments, and many new abuses of our government, prevailed throughout the greater part of the last-mentioned period. Supposing the country to enjoy peace, I cannot easily conceive internal mismanagement so excessive, as to stop the increase of population.

Interr 18. I have had no opportunity of hearing discontents and murmurs, if any exist. It is evident, the natives in general, have reason to be satisfied; because, compared with the old native governments, the English government is a good one, inasmuch as it secures the country from invasion, and on the whole, very well preserves the lower orders; that is to say, the main body of the community, from the tyranny of the higher orders.

2. It is scarcely possible that much real attachment and loyalty to the ruling power, can subsist among the higher classes. I do not however imagine that in Midnapore there is much disaffection. There are scarcely any Moguls in the district. The total want of energy and spirit, the poverty and ignorance of the people, compose, in my opinion, the strength of our government.

3. The natives have, I think, great personal confidence in the Company's servants.—They know it can only be, under the sanction of a law, that new impositions or oppression of any kind, can take place. Respecting the nature of the government, and of our external interests, they are all totally in the dark. In Calcutta, a degree of curiosity may sometimes be observed among a few natives, and a desire to converse on state affairs; but on such occasions, the best informed natives always betray an extreme ignorance: the most learned and intelligent have no knowledge of the law of nations.—I do not believe they suppose the political measures of the supreme power to be founded in equity and moderation.

Interr 19. The present system of police cannot be said to be well calculated to ensure the apprehension of offenders, since of 100 decoits, hardly ten are taken, and perhaps not two convicted.

2. Two years ago a considerable part of this district, almost the whole of the jungle Mehal, was overrun by choors, who plundered and burnt several entire pergunnahs, and committed murders daily.—These choors, must have amounted in number to some thousands; and I do not recollect that half a dozen of them, were brought to justice.—The means taken to restore tranquillity were very simple, and I am confident the only ones which could have succeeded:—they were, merely investing the jungle zemindars with regular authority, to preserve the peace in their respective estates; and it is certain that the choors are for the most part, at present in the service of the zemindars, and execute their trust of guards, with fidelity and effect.

3. A short time ago I heard of an incursion of two or three hundred choors, who committed several outrages, and then retired to a distant part of the jungle: none of them were taken, and there is little probability of a single man being ever apprehended:—nor does this happen in the jungles only. If a darogah reports a decoity having taken place within his jurisdiction, although the gangs are in general numerous, amounting from 20 to 200, the chances are perhaps, against one being seized. If decoits are taken, it is either by mere chance, or by the help of goyendass, who are themselves almost always accomplices:—they are seldom or never taken in the fact, or pursued with success afterwards. Having long ago observed this, and conceiving that, to prevent the crime of decoity (the greatest evil in my opinion, existing in the country) it is highly advisable that the people should learn to defend themselves; I have frequently endeavoured to encourage the ryots to keep arms in their houses, and to learn to assemble on the slightest alarm of decoits, and assist each other.

4. In the district of Benares, there is, I have heard, little or no decoity; not, I conceive, on account of the police being in the hands of amils, but because the people, or a large proportion of them, carry arms, and are able to defend themselves. There, the ryots would assist each other, in the event of an attack. They do not, like the helpless inhabitants of this this part of the country, trust entirely to chokedars, who so very frequently join the decoits, and sometimes head them.

5. In case it should be thought that the prevalence of the crime of decoity, or gang robbery, and the difficulty of apprehending and convicting the perpetrators, are here exaggerated, I shall take this opportunity of mentioning, that it is not from convictions before the court of circuit, far less from the cases referred to the Nizamut Adawlut, that this point can be ascertained. Let the number and the nature of the acquittals be observed; and not only them, but the reports of every decoity received from the police officers or others; then some judgment may be formed of the truth or fallacy of my opinion, when I say, that of 100 decoits, if 10 are apprehended and 2 convicted, it is a larger proportion than I should expect.

6. I presume to say, that those who are not aware of the enormous evil of decoity throughout Bengal, are those only, who have not happened to enquire deeply into, and meditate on the subject. It is literally true, that the lives and property of the ryots are insecure, and, according to the common expression among the natives, that they do not sleep in tranquillity.

7. In Midnapore the foudjarry business is, comparatively speaking, not very heavy. The convicts are very few, and the calendar seldom I believe contains so many trials, or crimes of such enormity, as those of the other districts in this division. Yet are these remarks regarding decoits, in my opinion, applicable to Midnapore; though less so, than to other parts of the country of which I have happened to acquire some information.

Interr 20.—From my answer to the last Interrogatory, it may be inferred that I am of opinion, the police establishments are inefficient. But I do not mean to say they are inferior in Midnapore to those of other districts. When I say the police throughout Bengal appears to me bad, I rather speak in comparison with civilized European countries, than with any system known to exist in India. It is my opinion, too, that several of the defects, which I shall presently endeavour to point out, are inevitable, from the nature of our government, which is unlike all other governments.

Interr 21.—Since the year 1793, crimes of all kinds are increased; and I think most crimes are still increasing. The present increase of crimes may perhaps be doubtful; but no one I think can deny, that immediately after 1793, during five or six years, it was most manifest and rapid, and that no considerable diminution has taken place.

2. Great population and poverty produce misery and crimes, particularly in a country where there is no public, and consequently no certain and regular provision for the poor; where there are, I may almost say, more poor than in any country; and where the ability and the disposition of private individuals to support them, are continually diminishing. Moreover, the detection and conviction of offenders, grow every day more difficult.

3. I ought to note here, that my experience does not reach, beyond the period alluded to in the question put to me. But as far as I have learnt of the state of the country previous to 1793, I conceive fewer crimes were committed; and it is certain that the foudjarry business in general was much lighter than at present.

4. The large gangs of decoits were formerly perhaps more common, and the sirdars more daring than now; but they did not rob so often. There are still large gangs of robbers who do not, except in the jungles, maintain themselves in a body: they disperse, mix in society, and appear at large. The darogah's system has, I think, contributed to break these numerous bodies, to prevent the formation of more, and to apprehend the sirdars, who were frequently supported by the connivance of zemindars or other persons who possessed authority. The darogahs are seldom or never in the pay of decoits, though they take ruzzers and petty bribes, and harass the poor in a variety of modes.

5. Decoits do not now often assemble in large bodies, and set the magistrate at defiance. They lie concealed, come about the court, intrigue with the lower officers, or with the jailor, ascertain the probability of detection, conviction and punishment, what sort of evidence may be requisite to disprove facts, and so on. In short, the country is infested with robbers and villains, who know how to elude the law.

6. That crimes have not increased, still more, is owing to the providential concurrence of a number of years of plenty. In any calamity of season, I have no doubt crimes would increase, to a most alarming degree. The ryots are now, though more independent, much worse protected from distress, than heretofore. They once looked up to their talookdars, who could assist them, and who did to the utmost of their power; for it was their interest. The ryots now, have no protector but the Regulations; and the Regulations, though they may serve to defend them in some measure from violence and barbarity, will not feed them.

7. Although antecedent to the year 1793, crimes were less numerous, as to constitute an evil perhaps greater, certainly more repugnant to our feelings, than the present increase of crimes. Some of the abuses I allude to, are these:—Rich and powerful individuals were accustomed to take justice into their own hands: innocent men were very frequently punished on suspicion: confessions were extorted by force and intimidation, even by the regular officers: trials were conducted without much regard to fairness: the record of the trial was not kept, or made up completely: the prisoner was unable to make a defence.—In all these ways, and more might be pointed out, great injustice was done; but at the same time, the punishment of offenders, was less uncertain than it is at present.

8. I may here take the liberty to mention a few circumstances which have fallen under my observation, as operating to obstruct the conviction of delinquents, under the present system.

9. I think

9. I think the delay which occurs between the apprehension and the trial, is too great.
10. The accused, have time and opportunity to fabricate a defence; and very little money will procure false witnesses to support it.
11. The extreme length and intricacy of trials, render the full and complete investigation of every case, impossible. I think the duty of a circuit judge in this division, especially in the hot weather, too laborious for one man to execute.
12. The objection of almost every Hindoo of credit and respectability, to swear by the Ganges' water, which is insisted upon in the criminal courts, prevents their appearing as prosecutors or witnesses; and forms another impediment to the conviction of offenders.
13. Another impediment, though of a very different nature from those I have mentioned, and much more difficult to remove, is to me, too palpable to be overlooked,—I mean that arising from Europeans, in our situation, being necessarily ill-qualified, in many points, to perform the duties required of us, as judges and magistrates. Nothing is more common, even after a minute and laborious examination of evidence on both sides, for the judge to be left in utter doubt, respecting the points at issue.
14. This proceeds chiefly, from our very imperfect connexion with the natives, and our scanty knowledge, after all our study, of their manners, customs, and languages. Within these few years, too, the natives have attained a sort of legal knowledge, as it is called, that is to say, a skill in the arts of collusion, intrigue, perjury, and subornation, which enables them to perplex and baffle us, with infinite facility.
15. Some apology may be necessary for general remarks of this nature, yet I cannot forbear offering one more observation, which has often struck me forcibly.
16. It appears to me, that we are extremely apt, owing perhaps to our being aware of the prevalence of deceit and perjury, to form unfavourable opinions of the veracity of the natives, while taking their evidence. We perhaps judge too much, by rule—we imagine things to be incredible, because they have not before fallen, within our experience. We constantly mistake extreme simplicity, for cunning; and we are, to the last degree, suspicious of our omrah. We make not sufficient allowance for the loose, vague, and inaccurate mode in which the natives tell a story, for their not comprehending, us, and our not comprehending, them. We hurry, terrify, and confound them, with our eagerness and impatience.
17. The judge of circuit, and even his omrah, are strangers, and quite unacquainted with the characters of the persons examined, and the credit due to them; and always, on that account, less competent to discover truth among volumes of contradictory evidence.
18. A rich man can seldom be convicted of a crime, at a gaol delivery. If committed on the strongest positive testimony before the magistrate, he, without difficulty, brings 20 witnesses on his trial, to swear an alibi, or any thing else that may suit his case: or he can bribe the prosecutor, or his material witnesses. He has, besides, a very good chance of escaping, by the mere contradictions of the witnesses against him, particularly if what they have to depose to, is long or intricate, or happened at a distant period, or was seen and heard by many witnesses of different descriptions and characters; or if many facts, names, and dates, are to be recollected. No falsehood is too extravagant or audacious to be advanced before the court of circuit.—No case, at least, so rich man's case, is too desperate for a defence, supported by counter evidence; and if once doubts are raised, no matter of what kind, the object of the accused is gained, and he is secure.
19. Perjury is extremely common; and though it occurs much more frequently on the part of the accused, than of the prosecutor; yet I have known several instances of conspiracies and false complaints supported by perjury. The judge who has once had experience of a case of this kind, is soon plunged into doubt and perplexity, continually awake to the possibility of the witnesses against the accused, being forsworn; and as he of course leans to the favourable side, the consequence must be, that the guilty frequently escape.
20. Instances have occurred, of goyendas and witnesses being murdered by decoits, for appearing against them in a court of justice; and this has inspired a very general terror, which operates to prevent prosecutors and witnesses from coming forward. Sometimes I have reason to think false evidence is brought, to support a true story; lest the prisoner should escape, for want of the legal number of witnesses.
21. For my further sentiments on this head, I beg leave to refer to my reply to Interrogatory 38, relative to the administration of the criminal laws.
- Inter 22. I am not aware of any particular crime of enormity peculiar to this district, except that of plundering, committed by the inhabitants of the jungles, and of the Mahratta country. I have, on former occasions, as my duty required, stated to government the measures which appeared to me advisable to adopt, for the improvement of the police in this respect. This crime does not at present prevail, to very great extent.
2. The situation of Midnapore renders it liable to suffer from Mahratta robbers, who occasionally make expeditions for plunder, and immediately afterwards retire with their party, out of our territory. I last year stated to government, that several of the Mahratta zemindars on the frontier, kept robbers in their pay, or were robbers themselves. I mentioned, too, that if I could be authorized to pursue them into their own territory, I should probably be able to apprehend them, or put a stop to their depredations. I further informed government, that knowing no other expedient, I had endeavoured to persuade some of the zemindars of this district, to arm and assemble their ryots, in case of any attack from the Mahrattas.
3. These Mahratta depredations, as well as those of the Midnapore jungles, called Choaree, are committed for the most part, by Pikes, that is to say, men whose province it is to guard the estates of different zemindars. When the pay and subsistence of these Pikes, become scanty and and precarious, they betake themselves to robbery, and if, instead of being checked, they are encouraged by their chiefs, they become extremely formidable. If the situation of the Mahratta Pikes could be rendered as easy as that of the Pikes of the Midnapore jungles, they would probably remain quiet.

4. But the zemindars whom they serve, are under no controul, being themselves magistrates with unlimited power; and at the same time, as I have before mentioned, very frequently robbers.

Inter 23. Except in the jungles, where the zemindars maintain large bodies of men, few of the natives keep arms of any description. It would, in my opinion, be fortunate, if they did. The jungle Pikes are armed with bows and arrows, swords, spears, and sometimes matchlocks.

Inter 24. There are several forts in Midnapore of stone and mud; but they are gone to decay. They were all, I believe, except the fort at the station, built long ago, and were well calculated to defend the inhabitants of the district from the incursions of Mahratta horse, but were otherwise useless. One contained lately, about 20 pieces of artillery of different sizes. The name of this fort is Bataw. It is situated in the jungle mehal of Bugree, formerly much infested by choars. I thought it best to remove the guns, lest they should fall into the hands of banditti, who, on my first arrival at Midnapore, were very numerous in pergunnah Bugree. The guns are accordingly brought hither, but they appear to be unserviceable.

2. The slightest rumour of the likelihood of a Mahratta war, produces much alarm among the natives of this district. They have now no forts to retire to, capable of affording them shelter, and they justly dread the ravages of cavalry.

Inter 25. The number of the inhabitants of this district, I compute at 1,500,000: about one-seventh may be Mahomedans; the rest are Hindoos.

Inter 26. The names of the persons of greatest rank and opulence, are as follows: Durpnarain Roy, late conongoe of Midnapore. Chundersekur Ghose, a considerable talookdar, formerly dewan of Mr. Peirce, judge and collector of the district.

Luckechum Sutputtee, talookdar.
Conni Podar, a merchant in the town of Midnapore.
Chiton Podar, a merchant in the town of Midnapore.
Durpnarain Bose, a merchant residing at Baminboom.
Kishen Sing, a merchant at Baminboom.
Anund Lall, zemindar of Midnapore and Narajole.
Kishenbulub, zemindar of Narah Gur.
Ruggonant Chowdry, zemindar of Amersee.
Anundnerain, zemindar of Tumlook.
Rannee Jankee, zemindar of Misadul.
Numerain, zemindar of Hedgellee.
Gopal Linder, zemindar of Soojamoota.
Beerpeshaud Chowdry, zemindar of Kurucpoor and Bulrampoor.
Juggunnaut Dole, zemindar of Gutsela.
Lutchmineroin, zemindar of Chutna.
Bidehaut Chowdry, a considerable merchant and zemindar of Coracpore.
None of these, entertain armed followers, except perhaps ten or a dozen Peons for state; but some of them, have Pikes in considerable numbers, to keep the peace in their estates. These Pikes, are under the magistrate's orders.

Inter 27. I am not able to name any persons in the district as disaffected to the British government, having seen no symptoms of disaffection. There are a few zemindars on the borders connected by marriage and consanguinity with their neighbours the Mahrattas; and I think it possible these zemindars would prefer the Mahrattas, as rulers. The jungle zemindars I look upon, as lawless, turbulent, quarrelsome chiefs; but not as wishing for a change in the government. The disaffected throughout the country, I imagine, consist for the most part, of ruined Mussulman families, residing chiefly in the large towns.

2. There is here, as elsewhere, a very numerous class of the lower orders, ready to serve under any standard, where they can get subsistence. These, have no idea of loyalty, or disloyalty, except to their masters who support them: They would readily enlist with a foreign power; but I do not call them disaffected, because custom and necessity lead them to hire themselves, to any master who may be able to maintain them. I here allude to the description of men commonly employed as Peons. They will not often enlist as Sepoys, on account of the constraint attending the European discipline, and in some instances, from religious scruples.

I think the natives in general do not look upon the crime of treason against the state, in the light we do. In fidelity and attachment to a master or a chief, whoever he may be, they are not surpassed by any people: but those who stand in the mere relation of subjects, without being in the service or pay of the supreme power, do not feel themselves bound by any very strong tie of allegiance.

Inter 28. If government declares itself the sole source of honour, the natives will not, I think, comprehend the declaration, and therefore it can have little effect in strengthening their attachment. An institution or measure of government, founded merely on European customs, must be useless and unintelligible.

Answers from the Judge and Magistrate of Midnapore, to Interrogatories: 30 Jan. 1802.

2. Our government, if I may presume to offer my opinion on the subject, appears to me very strong, and secure from serious internal commotion, although the natives can stand more independent of public opinion. I never knew one native, who had even a remote idea of the political state of the country. And can it possibly for a moment be supposed, that the people of Bengal dream of subverting the government? They are in this respect, the most ignorant of all people, and the most helpless, having no power to combine or enter into a league for their own interests. I am persuaded, no oppression exercised by the ruling power, supposing it the greatest possible,—for instance, general arbitrary requisitions made on the property of the inhabitants,—would in Midnapore produce any resistance. At all events, no mob could collect, sufficiently formidable to resist a company of Sepoys. I have no idea that the natives here ever consult or converse on political subjects.

3. The army is powerful, and certainly to be depended upon, as long as it is paid.—The Sepoys are, like the rest of the natives, entirely uninstructed as to the form of the government, of the policy of their rulers, and of the justice of their wars. It is in this ignorance and apathy, that our strength consists. Nor do any precautions appear to me necessary for our security, against factions and cabals. I see no tendency whatsoever to improvement among the natives, except their increasing knowledge of the Regulations, which, in speaking of the progress of political philosophy, is scarcely worth mentioning.

4. With respect to the eligibility of conferring titles and honours on the natives, it might possibly, if practicable, be of use. It might serve to attach them to the government, and to hold themselves in estimation. But how such an arrangement is to be brought about, I have no conception. Between our ideas of honour and those of the natives, there is no principle of assimilation. In the European world, and even in those countries of Europe, where a despotism prevails, there still subsists between the sovereign and those who may be distinguished with honours, a perfect uniformity of sentiment: they possess faults and virtues, in common: their ideas run, in one current, and a sort of equality is preserved, in spite of the distinction of ranks.—But here, this is not the case. The spirit of a gentleman, in our sense, is unknown among the natives. They possess no feeling in common with the hakim. They move in a sphere, which a thousand moral and physical causes, prevent our coming in contact with.

5. On whom, I beg leave to ask, can titles be conferred, when none are placed in a situation, where it is possible to render themselves eminent or conspicuous? How can their merits be known, when their rulers have no connexion with them,—when there is no intermediate class between the sovereign power and the common people? Surely it will be recollected, that the distance between us and the natives is infinite. The greatest zemindar in this district, though possibly a proud man, would not refuse, for the promotion of his interest, to court the friendship of the lowest dependent of an European: And how is it possible to prevent this? We find it so, and may lament, but cannot help it. There is scarcely a native in this district, who thinks of sitting down, in the presence of an English gentleman.

6. The men of opulence now are the Hindoo Mahajens and Banyans of Calcutta, and they are all, men of yesterday,—what can they perform, to acquire titles? and if they had them, would not government probably make them ridiculous, instead of ennobling them?

7. The greatest men formerly were the Mussulman rulers, whose places we have taken, and the Hindoo zemindars:—These two classes are now ruined and destroyed.—The natives mostly looked up to, are our omrah and our domestics: these, are courted and respected: they necessarily must be the channel, through which every suitor and every candidate looks up for redress and preferment:—It is not, I imagine, proposed to ennoble them!

8. No native can greatly distinguish himself as a soldier, for he can never rise beyond the rank of a soubadar; and I understand it has rather been the policy to depress, than to raise them: that they are taught to humble themselves before Europeans, and, in short, that they have no opportunity of acquiring titles.

9. Men in the learned professions have, if possible, still less opportunity of recommending themselves to us; and if they had, could not, I conceive, be rewarded with titles. To bestow a title on a learned moolavy, or an able vakeel, would appear strange. Moreover, according to Oriental ideas of honours confirmed by the sovereign power, there must be a jageer and generally a military command to accompany the title, which in itself, is mere y an appellation, of course attached to the acquisition of emolument or power;—no man can be made a rajah or munsabdar, without being invested with the profit or power attending the office.

10. It will not, I think, be easy to impress the minds of the natives, open, as they may be supposed, to every vain, absurd, and fantastical notion, with the value of a mere name. Their ideas are more simple and natural, than ours. If an unfit person received a patent for the title of an ameer or a rajah, he would not, I imagine, be able to retain it; for when a man has nothing left of his dignity but the name, it soon wears away. On the other hand, if a Hindoo should emerge from poverty and obscurity, and come to attain great wealth or celebrity, he would, I dare say, if he wished it, without a formal investiture, be saluted rajah. He would be considered as having acquired a claim to a title, in the same manner as other persons, by learning, acquire the appellation of moolavy and pundit, which becomes inseparably attached to their names.

Answers from the Judge and Magistrate of Midnapore, to Interrogatories: 30 Jan. 1802.

11. The only cases in which titles can be given, are perhaps when zemindars or other natives of wealth or consideration embrace opportunities, in case of invasion or conspiracy, of evincing loyalty to government. But even then, pensions or jagheers, should accompany the titles.

12. It may be proper to add, that my remarks on the general character of the natives, are the result of my own local enquiry and experience, which are confined to a small part of Bengal and Midnapore only. Of the character of the inhabitants of more distant parts of these provinces, I can pretend only to that general hearsay information, which is necessarily very imperfect.

Interr 29. Respecting such roads and bridges as require repair, separate reports have been made, either by the collector or the magistrate. They have been hitherto kept in repair, at the expense of government.

Interr 30. The convicts are very properly and advantageously employed in clearing the jungle in the vicinity of the station, and occasionally repairing roads, digging or cleaning tanks, and other labour of a similar kind, but chiefly in clearing jungle. The clearing of jungle, I look upon as a public benefit, not much with a view to cultivation, but to improve the salubrity of the air.

2. If the convicts were as numerous here, as at some other stations, I might perhaps propose a plan for attempting, by means of their labour, to extend cultivation. More than two thirds of this very extensive zillah, consists of a jungle, swarming with noxious animals, and exceedingly unhealthy; though the land is for the most part rich and fertile.

Interr 31. Half the fort of Midnapore is used as a jail, and answers the purpose perfectly well. It is large and secure, but it wants repair; great part of the roof, which is not arched, and built of masonry, but flat, with beams, being damaged. The dewanny jail and hospital are thatched buildings, at a distance from the fort. The prisoners of all descriptions may be said to be well accommodated, according to the native ideas of accommodation.

Interr 32. It is, my opinion, as I once before had occasion to mention to government, that the procuring the assistance of the men of property and influence in preserving the peace throughout the country, would lead to a system of police, the most efficient, the most economical, the most suitable to the habits and opinions of the people, and in all respects, the best calculated for their comfort and security.

2. My opinion has been confirmed on this head, by observing the good effect of the regulations of the police, which I was empowered last year to carry into execution, in the jungle meahs of this district.

3. At the same time, I should remark, that this arrangement could not well be adopted universally, but only in estates of a certain extent. I by no means recommend investing men of inconsiderable rank, or small estate, with magisterial power. But all might perhaps, without danger, be empowered to seize offenders on their own estates.

4. The lands are now divided into a number of small portions. More estates are superintended by agents than formerly; and the agents are frequently changed, and little respected by the ryots. I do not think it at this time, advisable, or practicable, at once to throw the whole duties of the darogahs, by a general regulation, into the hands of the landholders.

5. It is extremely difficult, I may I believe say it is not possible, to arrange an effectual plan of association and co-operation among the higher orders for purposes of police, or for any other purpose. We have few large towns, no societies exercising, or capable of exercising municipal authority. There are no gentlemen, in whose honour and probity, in whose spirit and activity, government can repose confidence. There exists not between the common people and the rulers, a middle order, who feel a common interest in the prosperity of the state, who love their countrymen, who respect their rulers, or are by them, respected; who either could, or even if they could, would even in a case of the greatest exigency, exert themselves heartily and effectually, each in his own sphere, for the public good. Such a set of men in the society, is here unknown. Government is unable to direct, or in any way to make the use of the power of the individuals, composing the community. Hence our extreme ignorance of all that passes, our complete inability to detect and apprehend offenders, to explain to the public what we wish should be known, and persuade them what should be done. Hence the long continuance of enormous abuses, without its being possible for government, or for the magistrate, to prevent or to discover them.

6. To apply effectual remedies to radical evils of this sort, is hardly to be hoped for. It will not, I imagine, be expected from me, that I should suggest projects to this end. I do not forget that such evils are political, with which a magistrate has no concern; nor shall I be surprised if they are denied, to exist altogether. I content myself with observing, that any measure which would secure to government the services of a considerable number of the most respectable members of the community, must prove in many points of view, beneficial.

7. The zemindars, it will be recollected, possessed under the native governments a degree of power nearly proportionate to their property. Although that power was perhaps not formerly recognized, nor regularly executed; still they did possess a considerable degree of military, civil, and fiscal power. They kept their dependants in a state of union, and were by that means, enabled to protect them, and maintain themselves. At present, such as have survived the almost universal destruction of zemindars, are, in conformity to our notions, reduced to the same condition, and placed at an equal distance from us, with their lowest ryots. Any measure that has a tendency towards the restoration of this power (though I confess I have no distinct conception of the mode, in which it can be accom-lished) must, I think, advance a step towards the creation of a body of gentry, who, though they should never be actuated by the same motives as ourselves, nor possess any feeling in common with us; may yet perform great services to the public. Such a measure, would, in my opinion, bring the lower orders more distinctly under the eye of the magistrate. It might enable us, in some slight degree, to excite awe, to impose restraint, to awaken national ardour, and love for the government. Our moral impotence to produce any effect of this nature on the minds of the people, which is at present sufficiently apparent, might be, I think, if not removed, at least gradually diminished.

8. To the propriety of any plan that would invest the higher orders with a liberal authority that would encourage and enable them to act without fear, in concurrence with government's officers, for the public good, I beg leave to subscribe my humble opinion.

9. Among the natives there appears to prevail a general notion, that the Regulations are calculated to restrict the powers, and embarrass the operations of police officers, as well as of individuals, in their exertions for the detection and apprehension of offenders. This notion, whether founded in experience, or ignorance and error, can hardly fail to produce pernicious consequences.

Interr 33. It is my opinion, and I wish to express it on every opportunity, that we are not able to protect the ryots from decoits; that there is little prospect of our being able to do it; and that it is, in justice, humanity and policy, incumbent on us to exhort them to arm and assemble, when occasion requires; to the end that they may possess, as far as possible, the means of defending themselves.

2. For the more effectually suppressing of crimes, and improvement of the police, I would recommend increasing the power, the emolument, the respectability of the police officers.

3. The darogahs, I believe, it is generally confessed, do not perform the duty that was expected: they are clearly either unable or unwilling: they do not appear to be often guilty of gross criminal malversation, such as harbouring or conniving at, aiding and abetting decoits, receiving stolen goods, or releasing prisoners. Their insufficiency consists, I think, in a general neglect of duty, in petty rogueries, in a want of respectability, in being destitute of that energy and activity, and that delicate sensibility to character, which ought to characterize a police officer. A man whose entire duty consists in maintaining personal authority, should be conscious of his own importance, and competent to convince others of it.

4. In the duties of his office, a darogah is hardly occupied half an hour in a day; and he often becomes negligent, indolent, and in the end, corrupt. His dishonesty consists in taking bribes from poor people who have petty foudarry suits, in conniving at the absconding of persons summoned through him, in harrassing ryots with threats or pretended complaints, creating vexatious delays in settling disputes, or preventing their being settled by razeenamah; and chiefly, in deceiving the poor and ignorant, with whom he has to deal.

5. The avowed allowances of a police darogah, are not sufficiently liberal to render the office worthy the acceptance of men, who are fit to perform the duty. It would be easy to make every darogah, a munsif within the limits of his tanna; and it strikes me that such an institution would be advantageous, in many respects. Some are of opinion that the more power the natives have, the more they abuse it—that they are utterly unfit for any, but the lowest employments; and that, however great their salaries, moderation and disinterestedness can never be expected from them. This appears to me a mere fallacy. A few objections may suggest themselves to my proposition of investing the darogahs with authority to decide civil suits; but no solid ones occur to me. If I thought the hint likely to be approved, I might attempt to discuss it at further length.

6. After all, the grand defect is, the want of that anxious solicitude, which a police darogah ought to feel in the discharge of his duty, particularly as he is almost invariably a stranger, possessing no personal interest in preserving the peace of his tanna. This is one of the situations which require something more than a mere methodical attention to official routine. A police darogah should feel himself a magistrate, should be ready at all times, night and day, to go from place to place, to seek information, to pursue offenders, to oppose force to force, if necessary; and, in short, to exert himself in a thousand ways, wherein he might do good; but without which, he may obtain his object, viz. that of keeping out of scrapes, and maintaining a tolerable character.

Interr 34. No alteration, as to drunkenness or sobriety, has been remarked by me, since the establishment of the last tax on spirituous liquors. Probably drunkenness increases, not in consequence of the tax, but from the general cause of increasing population. Besides, the lower casts, who are almost the only drinkers of spirits, are, I think, getting rather more licentious in their manners, and less scrupulous on the score of religion. Among the higher casts, it is still held disgraceful; and though some are addicted to the vice, it is very rare, and always kept as secret as possible. There are many reasons for wishing, if it were practicable, which I hardly think it is, to abolish entirely the sale and manufacture of spirits. They are exceedingly injurious to the health of the lower orders of the community. They afford no comfort, as in other climates; all who drink, do it to excess, and scarcely ever leave it off.

2. One objection only occurs to me, which, though it may appear somewhat overstrained, and perhaps imaginary, I will, nevertheless, mention; because, if well founded, I consider it of the last importance.

3. The distillation of spirits occasions a large consumption of rice. Any diminution of quantity, in the regular annual demand for rice, I conceive to be pernicious to the country.

Answers from the Judge and Magistrate of Midnapore, to Interrogatories: 30 Jan. 1802.

The more is required for any purpose, the more will be produced. The chief means of alleviating the horrors of a famine, will be to increase the quantity of rice appropriated for food. By stopping the distilleries during a season of scarcity, which might be done by an exertion of the magistrate's authority, there would be found a very considerable resource. A quantity of the first necessary of life, instead of being converted into the vilest and most unwholesome liquor, might thus, with ease, be brought into the market for the sustenance of the people. But if these distilleries, were abolished altogether, it strikes me that the demand for rice would immediately diminish; and that, in consequence, to the manifest detriment of the country, less would be produced.

Interr 35. To attempt any material improvement or alteration in the moral character of the natives, by the intervention of legislative measures, I look upon as vain.

2. They no longer consider the laws, as a part of their religion. I do not even see that with us, law and morality have much connexion. It is the province of the magistrate to quell disorders and preserve peace; but as to good morals, I am not aware that, either by precept or example, we are capable of producing any effect whatever. The vices and the crimes of the people, proceed from their poverty and ignorance; and I do not conceive they are likely to grow much richer or wiser, while the present state of things exists.

3. This assertion, however, that the vices and crimes of the people proceed from their poverty and ignorance, I would wish to be understood, with limitations. Where considerable numbers are collected and associate together, especially if there happens to be much inequality of rank and fortune, the morals of the people are worst, though compared to the inhabitants of other parts of the same country, they may be said to be neither indigent nor uninformed; but in such situations, they are liable to fall into bad company, and to acquire new habits and new wants. The same may be observed, respecting such persons as have occasion to attend our cutcherries: they get into bad habits. It is not always, therefore, that the people are worse where they are the poorest and most ignorant. Nevertheless, the assertion is, in my opinion, generally speaking, true. It is certain that where labour is amply rewarded, where all can easily get employment, and where the poor are provided for, the people lead industrious and virtuous lives; and it will be observed, that in remote parts of the mofussil, where debauchery and dissipation are little known, very few resort to depredations on the public, except from necessity.

4. Most but not all decoits, begin their evil practices from necessity. A ryot finding some difficulty to subsist, either from his imprudence or ill fortune—a peon or other servant losing his place, and unable to procure another—a Cooly finding no employment:—Such persons, of which in this populous country there are always many thousands, often take to stealing, are corrupted by vicious companions, drink spirits, and are gradually led on, from impunity and habits of idleness, to become decoits, and depend on robbery alone for subsistence.

5. The people are, I presume, little different from what they were 1,000 years ago. The Mahomedan government had hardly any effect on the national character, and our government must have still less, because we do not, like the Mahomedans, coalesce with the body of the people. We cannot mix in their society,—we have made no attempts to introduce European science and learning among them. They appear to me as far from adopting our customs, as we are from adopting theirs.

6. The power of the Bengal government appears to me, of all governments, the most unquestionably despotic over its subjects. The submission of the natives is perfect and unqualified; so complete, as to preclude the necessity of coercion or intimidation of any kind. All appearance of military interference in the police is or may be, kept out of sight. It is the principle of ignorance, and not of fear, that at present preserves us; and I should imagine it will be only when European laws, religion, and literature, come to be disseminated in this country, that it will be necessary to draw the reins tighter, and to show, what we certainly at present possess, power irresistible to command obedience.

7. But this sort of power, the result of policy and force on the one hand, and utter ignorance and wretchedness on the other, does not suppose any influence whatever over the hearts of the natives. In fact, if any change has been introduced in their habits and tastes since they became subject to our dominion, such change may very well be termed accidental; but I am not myself sensible of any very material change.

8. It is in Calcutta alone, that the effect of the intercourse between Europeans and natives is, in any degree visible. There and there alone, an indistinct sort of link may be discerned, between the rulers and the people: but how extremely faint and imperfect this link is, must be well known. The lowest and poorest Europeans and the native-born Christians and Portuguese, between whom and us, it is scarcely necessary to say, there subsists little connexion or similarity of pursuit, do in some slight degree, mix with the natives in their ordinary concerns and their amusements, just sufficient to produce an inconsiderable change in their manners and character. The circumstance of the jurisdiction of the supreme court, too, and the intercourse between the natives and the lowest officers of that court, must be considered, as another cause of the same nature. But I ask, whether the morals of the people are in any respect improved, by these causes?—whether they have not learnt all the low arts of chicanery, imposture, and litigiousness peculiar to an English court of justice, without a particle of plain dealing, firmness, independence of spirit, or useful knowledge of any kind?—whether they do not reap all the evil, and none of the good?—whether they do not imbibe those principles of the European character which tend only to impair the mildness and simplicity of their own?—To pronounce upon these questions is, I fear, not very difficult.

5. The most material change effected by us, is not in the punishments fixed for particular crimes. It is less, I think, in the laws themselves, than in the mode of executing them. It is a common saying with the natives, that the gentleman requires so much evidence, that it is scarcely possible to convict a decoit. The old way was very different. The accused almost always confessed, whereas none now confess, but the most simple and uninformed I have seen several old records of trials, and I observed, that almost the whole of those convicted

13. When a suit is filed in a munsif's court, it is taken up immediately, — there is no time or opportunity, for the fabrication of a defence, or subornation of perjury. The munsif is, as it were, in the society of the parties, and they cannot easily deceive him. But if that cause comes before the zillah judge, besides the inevitable delay and expense at the outset, the case is probably entirely changed; intrigue and counter complaints occur, the most imprudent falsehoods are advanced with impunity, and in the end perhaps, an erroneous decision is passed.

14. Should it here occur, that very few, if any natives are qualified, from habit and education, to pronounce a decision, or to comprehend a complicated judicial case; that the range of their ideas is too narrow,—that their minds are cramped, and that they possess not that vigour and perseverance, and those enlarged views, which would enable them to perform the duty of judges:—if there is any one of this opinion, I would take the liberty to ask, how it is possible the natives in general should, in the miserably subordinate and servile employments to which they are confined, have qualified themselves better? I would observe, how very easily they all acquire the requisite qualifications for the duties which we are pleased to entrust to them.—I would ask, who can doubt that they would very shortly, if not depressed and dispirited, become at least equal to the functions they performed, before we came among them?

15. In considering the mental qualifications of such of the natives as are not wholly illiterate, though their education must be admitted to be deplorably imperfect, though they are the victims of gross prejudice, superstition and ignorance; yet I by no means, look upon them, as incompetent to perform the duty of judges.

16. They very frequently pay implicit credit to events in themselves, improbable. When they read or hear a story, they seem to believe it, as a matter of course; and the more extraordinary the facts, perhaps the less inclination do they feel to doubt or disbelieve them. But this excessive credulity, and this apparent incapacity to judge of truth and falsehood, does not I think, prevent their distinguishing, with considerable sagacity, between the probable and improbable, in the common affairs of life, where prodigies and miracles have no place.

17. I confess it is my wish, though possibly I may be blamed for expressing it, not only to have the authority of the natives as judges extended, but to see them, if possible, enjoy important and confidential situations, in other departments of the state.

18. Though my reply to this interrogatory, like several of my other replies, has swelled to an immoderate length, I am well aware of its being by no means, complete and satisfactory. A thorough discussion of the subject, would require more leisure and consideration than I have been able to bestow, and a great deal of Mahomedan law learning; a branch of knowledge, in which I can pretend to no proficiency.

Interrogatory 39. There are no Europeans out of the service, constantly residing in this district.—A few indigo manufacturers and cloth merchants, have or rather had, considerable dealings in Midnapore, and occasionally come to look after their concerns.—The cloth and indigo trade have very much fallen off, within these few years.

Interrogatory 40. The condition of the weavers commercially connected with the Company, or with European traders, is here, as every where, I should imagine, greatly ameliorated.

2. The system with regard to them, has by degrees, almost totally changed. They are now treated with fairness and liberality; and oppression, which prevailed formerly to a great extent, is no more. I know not one instance in which the advantages of the present system are more conspicuous, than this,—the stop which has been put to the abuses which used to prevail in the commercial department.

3. It does not appear to me that the officers of government, or even individual Europeans, have any reason to complain.—I have indeed frequently heard complaints; but I always thought them groundless.

4. Europeans have still advantages, and ever must have. When a native fails to perform his engagements, I think it will generally be found to proceed from inability. Individual Europeans have no regular means of compelling him, without resorting to a court of justice. But the commercial and salt agents possess some effectual means of coercion; and such powers being in themselves, rather unfair, and hardly compatible with that equality which ought to subsist in commercial concerns, must necessarily sometimes produce discontent.

5. No European can be sued by a native for a greater sum than 500 rupees, in the dewanny adawlut; whereas a native is liable to be sued, to any amount by the European.

6. I know not any good reason for this; and there ought I conceive, to be a very good reason to justify such an inequality. No instance however of inconvenience, or hardship resulting from this inequitable law, has fallen within my knowledge in this district.

I here close my Replies.

Some of the Interrogatories appear to me to involve discussions of a general and political nature, not immediately connected with my duty, as judge and magistrate of this district. On all such, I could for several reasons, have wished to be silent. Finding myself called upon, however, on this occasion, to deliver opinions, and to furnish such information as I might possess on a variety of subjects, which it cannot be supposed I should be master of. I have attempted it accordingly; and have in some instances, been induced to enter upon certain topics, more amply than is perhaps expected.

I beg leave to offer an apology for trespassing on the patience of government, with discussions so much more prolix, than the subjects may be thought to demand.

Having

Having been led to advance certain opinions on the state of the country, and the conditions of the natives, which opinions I became fearful might appear extravagant, and sometimes unintelligible, I have endeavoured to explain and illustrate them, without very strictly applying my answers to the terms of the interrogatories.

If in my eyes, these matters have chanced to bear a different aspect from those of many other people, it should not excite surprise. Infinite diversity of opinions on these subjects is to be expected, because we are all liable to false impressions,—because the circumstances to be taken into consideration, are too numerous and complicated for any one mind to perceive or comprehend them all,—because we necessarily infer and in fact guess a hundred things, for one thing which we see or come to the actual knowledge of.

A conviction of the uncertainty, to which discussions of this nature are for ever liable, while it serves as a caution against too readily lending an ear to plausible speculations, may teach us to consider with attention and willingness, every new attempt at investigation; to listen, without scorn and prejudice, to what at first may strike us as singular or improbable, and never to reject opinions solely on account of their novelty.

I have not been deterred by the apprehension of falling into error, which I know to be inevitable, nor of having my principles and intentions mistaken, from delivering with freedom such opinions as my understanding teaches me to be just, after the best attention I am able to bestow, and this even on political subjects, which are to me purely speculative. In so doing, I trust I have not deviated from the wishes of government.

I have now only to express my hope, that nothing I have said will give offence; and that as my sentiments are offered with diffidence, they will obtain a candid and indulgent reception.

(Signed) H. STRACHEY, Judge and Magistrate.

ANSWERS of the Judge and Magistrate of Zillah Burdwan, dated 9th March 1802, to the INTERROGATORIES of Government, of 29th October 1801.

Interrogatory 1. WHAT is the number of causes now depending before you, before your register, and before the native commissioners?

Answer 1. The causes now depending before each of these tribunals, stand in number as follows:—

Before the Judge	191
the Register	1,303
the N. Commissioners	7,605
Total	9,099

Interrogatory 2. What proportion does the number of causes now depending before the three tribunals of the judge, the register, and native commissioners, bear to the number of causes usually depending during the several years commencing from the year 1799, to the present period?

Ans. 2. Previous to the year 1797, the causes depending before these tribunals in this zillah, appear to have been so numerous, that it was found impracticable to keep any regular register of them; but since that period, they have annually decreased; in the two first, the number now depending in the judge's court, bearing a proportion of one in six of the average number depending, in the four preceding years; and in the register's, the number has been reduced in the proportion of one half, on the same average calculation. In the courts of the native commissioners there appears an increase; but this is merely temporary, arising from the numerous revenue suits recently instituted in the present season of the heavy collections; nor can the number now depending before them be deemed great, when the number of these courts (thirty-two), the description of the suits, and the average number decided in them monthly, is taken into consideration.

Interrogatory 3. What number of causes was decided in the past year by you, by your register, and by your native commissioners.

Ans. 3. As follows:	588.
By the Judge	2,086.
Register	10,351.
Native Commissioners

Interrogatory 4. What number of causes do you suppose must necessarily be depending before your court, and that of your register, and before the native commissioners; and what is the reason that the number of causes depending before those tribunals respectively, is not reduced as low as you think it might be reduced.

Ans. 4. From the answer given to the 2d interrogatory, it is seen that the number of causes depending, compared with preceding years, has been reduced in a very considerable proportion, both in the judge's and the register's court; and I have no doubt, that a further considerable reduction will be made, and that in the course of a very short time, they will not exceed, if they now do, the number depending before the same tribunals, in other zillahs, though I believe it will be admitted that, in extent and population, this exceeds the generality of them.

It is less, however, to the extent and population, that any excess is to be ascribed, than to local evils, which, by prolonging investigation, retard decision: and these, I shall beg leave to explain.

Answers from the Judge and Magistrate of Midnapore, to Interrogatories: 30 Jan. 1802.

Answers of the Judge and Magistrate of Burdwan, of 9 March 1802.

The generality of the suits brought before these tribunals in this zillah, may be comprized under two classes :

1st. Suits instituted for the resumption of lands, alleged to have been fraudulently alienated, subsequent to the decennial settlement, and held under antedated grants ; and those of the same description, instituted by holders of grants for illegal resumptions, under Section 10th of Regulation XIX. of 1793.

2d. Suits instituted by farmers, for the recovery of arrears of rent ; and those against them for alleged exactions.

The suits of the 1st class are numerous, and it is not to be doubted, that the fraud has been committed to a very considerable extent, and that it continues to prevail, every farmer making himself a rent-free land-holder during the period of his farm ; but the fraud is not easily detected, where there is no record either in the zemindarry or in the offices of government, whereby it can be ascertained, what grants did exist, prior to the period stated. The zemindarry accounts produced by the succeeding farmer, to prove the alienation posterior, are not to be depended upon ; as little, are those produced by his predecessor, or the defendant, to prove the anterior alienation, for each has fabricated them, to answer his own purpose, and thus is the court left without any other guide for its decision, than the evidence of numerous witnesses, brought on both sides, to prove opposite and contradictory assertions ; and this, I am sorry to say, in many instances, is as doubtful and unsatisfactory, as the documents and vouchers, being procured with the same ease, as the latter are fabricated for the purpose.

The above observations are equally applicable to the suits included in the same class for illegal resumptions, and those of the 2d class are not less numerous, nor less intricate.

The interchange of engagements between the parties, with few exceptions, extends no farther than to the zemindar's farmer, who is here termed the sudder farmer, and to those amongst whom he subdivides his farm, in portions. An engagement between the latter and the cultivator, or heads of a village, is scarcely known, except the general one, mutually understood to receive and pay, agreeably to past and preceding years ; and for ascertaining this, the accounts of the farm are no guide.

The zemindar himself, seeing that no confidence is to be placed in the accounts rendered him of the rent roll of the farm, from the practice which has so long prevailed, of fabrications and rendering false accounts, never attempts to call for them, at the expiration of the lease ; and instead of applying a corrective to the evil, increases it, by farming out the lands literally by auction ; and the same mode is adopted, in almost every subdivision of the farm.

The consequences of such a system, must be obvious ; needy rapacious farmers and fraudulent tenants become friends, and collusively agree, at the expiration of the lease, to defraud the succeeding farmer. A trifling douceur from the ryot, or the ryots of a whole village, is sufficient to procure a fabrication of the accounts, and a receipt to correspond with them, for a sum much below that actually paid on the revenue demand for the year ; and these are the valid and incontrovertible vouchers, held out to the successor in the farm, for his guide.

The practice is, however, too universal, and too well known to deceive him ; but he is without an alternative, and acts his predecessor's part, in the repetition of it ; for if honestly disposed (which is rarely the case) he has not time to have recourse to a measurement for ascertaining the quantity and quality of lands in the occupancy of the cultivator, with a view to a fair and equitable assessment ; and the ryots finding their benefit in the confusion, and despairing of honest dealing towards them whilst the present system exists, would oppose it, so as to make him a sufferer for the attempt.

These are local evils, originating in the great extent of the zemindarry, and the bad management of the proprietor ; and are less worthy of notice, as they affect the speedy decision of suits, than in their effects upon the public revenue, which cannot fail ultimately to suffer from the abuses I have mentioned.

It will, however, be evident, that they must occasion considerable delay in passing decisions ; but notwithstanding these difficulties which the courts of this zillah labour under, and the great portion of time necessarily given both by myself and the register to the foudjarry department ; I trust it will not be found that the number of causes depending, greatly exceeds the number depending before the same tribunals, in other zillahs ; and I can pledge our exertions to reduce them, as low as may be found practicable.

In the courts of the native commissioners, the number will ever be great ; and I have always been averse to the institution of these courts on the present system, from a real belief that they are hurtful to the country ; and sure I am, that the purposes of their institution would better be answered, in this zillah, I will add, in all Bengal, by the establishment of a few courts at the sudder station, immediately under the eye of the judge, for the cognizance of the suits now cognizable by these native commissioners. It is universally admitted, that the natives of Bengal are litigious ; and the number of the courts dispersed throughout the country, opens a wide field to them, to indulge this disposition ; nor is it to be doubted that the commissioners themselves, with their train of vakeels and peons, encourage it, for their own interest. The majority of the suits instituted in them, are vexatious ; and I am persuaded, that the administration of justice would not be affected by their abolition, and the establishment of those above suggested in lieu.

The jurisdiction of the new courts suggested, might also be extended to all suits not exceeding in amount one hundred rupees, whereby a relief would be afforded to the register's, that it much requires ; and all should be assessed with a charge at least equivalent to defray the expense of the establishments, which should be fixed, and payable from the treasury of government.

Inter 5.

Inter 5. Are you prepared to suggest the establishment of any rules, which, consistently with a due administration of the laws, would expedite the decision of suits ? Are you of opinion that this object would be in any degree promoted, by leaving it optional in the different tribunals to commit the depositions of witnesses in causes not appealable, to a higher tribunal ?

Ans. 5. An accurate record of the rent-free grants, and of the revenue lands, and the execution of regular engagements by the farmers and under renters, would do much towards the object proposed, in this interrogatory ; and little more would be found requisite. I am not of opinion that it would be promoted in any great degree, or that any expedition would be obtained, by the omission suggested ; nor do I think it advisable, as it would be productive of complaints to the superior courts ; and the intention of it, would, in my opinion, better be answered, by the attachment of a few officers to the court, whose duty it should be to tally the evidence of the witnesses in the presence of the parties, or their vakeels, to the points contained in their pleadings. These officers, might also be very usefully employed to inspect the pleadings when filed, to see that they are conformable to the Regulations, and that there is no delay in the delivery of them,—an assistance the courts of this zillah, stand much in need of ; and I see not why the pleadings may not be limited to plaint, and answer for the need of ; and others, if conformable to the Regulations, are of little use, but they are now generally, not the principal, made the longest. The vouchers referred to, as also lists of witnesses, might be filed with them ; and the whole be prepared, so as to enable the court to pass judgment on the suit, at one sitting. At present, frequent adjournments are unavoidable for the filing of these necessary vouchers, in the delivery of which, there is always considerable delay ; and the court is in doubt, whether the vakeels or their clients, are blameable for it.—There is certainly a mutual want of confidence, or an indifference on the part of the vakeels, with respect to the issue of the suit, that proves a great interruption to the dispatch of business, for neither will trust, the other ;—the client, his vakeel, with the vouchers and the fees payable on the filing of them ; nor the latter, the former, with making an advance for him ; and from this want of confidence between the employer and the employed, together with the doubt which the court entertains, whether the latter has done his duty towards the former, in giving the necessary information, repeated adjournments of the suit are made.

Inter 6. Are you of opinion that it would be advisable to extend the jurisdiction of the native commissioners to suits for sums exceeding 50 rupees, and that of the registers to suits exceeding S^r R^s 200 ? What is the amount to which you would recommend the jurisdiction of the courts of the commissioners and of the registers should be extended ; and to what degree, would the general administration of justice, in the district subject to your jurisdiction, be expedited, by the adoption of this arrangement ?

Ans. 6. The abolition of these numerous courts is recommended in my answer to the 4th interrogatory ; and if my objection to them had not been so strong, I should have been against any extension of their jurisdiction, in respect to the amount of the suits cognizable by them. And with regard to the register's court, it rather requires relief ; and I have proposed the relief advisable to be afforded to it, in the establishment and extension of the jurisdiction of the new courts suggested in lieu of those of the present native commissioners, recommended to be abolished.

Inter 7. Has litigation been checked by the establishment of the fee paid to government on the institution of suits ; of the fees paid to the vakeels ; of the fees paid on exhibits in the courts of judicature, and of the stamp duties ? Do you consider these several charges attending the institution of law suits, to be too considerable, or otherwise ?

Ans. 7. It certainly has been considerably checked by the establishment of these charges, and I am less against the aggregate amount of the expense to which law suits are now subject, than to the number and variety of heads under which it is made payable :—these, occasion delay, as before observed ; and from not being intelligible, or known to the generality of suitors, may partly produce that want of confidence noticed in their vakeels.

The simplification of them, by consolidation, and the establishment of a per-centage, would be advisable ; and I think the amount might be lessened, on the smaller suits ; for, in addition to these charges, it should be considered, that the generality of suitors are subject to the further expense of a private agent, to attend on the vakeel.

Inter 8. Do the fees paid to the licensed vakeels, on suits instituted or defended by them, constitute a sufficient inducement to men of character, and of proper qualifications, to undertake those situations ? Are the vakeels attached to your court, persons of the above-mentioned description ; and are they in general, well acquainted with the printed Regulations ?

Ans. 8. I am of opinion that the fees are fully ample for the purpose ; but the situation seems not yet to be sufficiently known, and hitherto few have offered, or been found willing to undertake it, excepting those who before acted in the capacity, under the former system ; and this description, affords few of character and of proper qualifications for the office. Hence few men of character and ability are to be found amongst the number at present holding the situations, at least, it is the case in this court ; for of the number (forty-eight) at present attached to it, there are not more than ten or twelve, who I think favourably of, or who appear to me to possess an adequate knowledge of the Regulations, to qualify them for discharging the duties of their situation.

The limitation of the number to twenty, which I think fully sufficient for the business of the court, would, I am of opinion, have a good effect, in increasing their emoluments and making the situations more desirable : this would induce good conduct and attention to improve themselves ; and men of character and of proper qualifications, would soon be found soliciting the succession to the stations, as vacancies occurred.

Inter 9.

Interr^y 9. Has the establishment of licensed vakeels contributed to expedite the decision of suits, by bringing more speedily and accurately before the court, the merits of the suits instituted?

Ans. 9. I was partial to the establishment at first, from a real belief that this good effect would have been produced by it; but it may be inferred, from what I have above said, that my expectations, in this respect, have been disappointed, and I am sorry to say, that it has not been produced, in any sensible degree; the failure, however, is not wholly to be attributed to the vakeel, but partly to their employers, who withhold the necessary information from them.

Interr^y 10. Do the vakeels in general, discharge their duty to their clients, with honour and fidelity?

Ans. 10. I have had no complaint made against them, by their clients; but have before observed that, in many instances, an indifference is shown by them, in regard to the issue of the suits upon which they are employed; and I am afraid that they do not always discharge their duty, with honour and fidelity.

Interr^y 11. Are the principal inhabitants of your jurisdiction, as well acquainted, as individuals in general can be supposed to be informed, of the laws of the country?

Ans. 11. I have found some zemindars, and principal farmers and merchants, tolerably well acquainted with those laws which chiefly concern them, but few seek the information; and, from this cause, I am afraid that the knowledge of the Regulations is much confined to the sudder station.

Interr^y 12. Are you prepared to state any alterations in the forms established for the trial of civil suits, which would contribute to expedite the decision of the suits, without endangering the due administration of the laws?

Ans. 12. I am not aware that any alteration in the forms established for the trial of civil suits, is necessary for the object proposed in this interrogatory, or that any thing further for it, is necessary than what I have suggested in my answer to the 5th. With that assistance, I can venture to promise, that there will be few suits in arrear, in the courts of this zillah.

Interr^y 13. Have you in your court-room, any place allotted for the bench of the judge, for the public officers, for the parties or their vakeels, for the witnesses, and for all persons who attend your court? and what forms or ceremonies do you observe, in opening your court, or sitting in it?

Ans. 13. The court-room at this station, has the accommodations mentioned in the interrogatory. No other form or ceremony is observed, than the proclamation of the opening and sitting; and after going through the causes notified for the day, all petitions and applications by motion, are received and heard, and orders passed upon them.

Interr^y 14. Are there any private schools or seminaries in the district under your jurisdiction, in which the Mahomedan or Hindoo law is taught; and how are those institutions maintained?

Ans. 14. There are few villages of any note, in which there is not a school, but the instruction in them, is confined to the teaching of children to read and write; and I know not, nor have heard of any within this jurisdiction, in which the law, either Mahomedan or Hindoo, is taught; the most learned in the latter, are found in the neighbouring district of Nuddea, from whence, and Benares, the other stations are supplied; and the Mahomedans bear but an inconsiderable proportion of the inhabitants of this zillah, receiving their education, in the common branches, from the village schoolmasters above mentioned, or from their friends.

Interr^y 15. What is your opinion regarding the general moral character of the inhabitants of your district? Has the moral character of the inhabitants in general, been improved or otherwise, by the system established by the British government for the administration of the laws, and for the conduct of the internal administration of the country?

Ans. 15. I am sorry that I cannot report favourably of it, or give it as my opinion, that the lenity and humanity introduced by the British system, has tended to improve either the Mahomedan or Hindoo moral character; certain it is, that much profligacy, vice and depravity, are to be found amongst the higher class; and the crimes committed by the lower, will I think be found more prevailing, and in greater number, than under the Mahomedan jurisprudence; at least, as far as a comparison of the records of the two periods, can be made the criterion of judgment, this is found to be the case, in this district: But it may be proper to observe, that all crimes and offences are now reported to the magistrate, and that few of the offenders escape; the increase may therefore, in a great measure, be only apparent; but I am of opinion, that the number actually committed has increased; and having observed, that few of the offenders escape, I cannot assign any other reasons for the increase, than that the punishment on conviction is inadequate to deter, and that the police establishments are inadequate to prevent, the commission of crimes. The increase may be ascribed, to the inadequacy of both for their purposes.

Interr^y 16. Are you of opinion that the inhabitants in general, of the district under your jurisdiction, consider their private rights and property to be secured, by the present constitution of the country, against infringement, either by the executive officers of government, or even by the supreme executive authority itself, or by individuals?

Ans. 16. They certainly do consider their rights and property fully secured, by the present constitution of the country, against infringement; and sure I am, that none have reason reason to entertain a contrary opinion, or that, where the infringement may be made, either by the executive officers of government, or by individuals, the fullest redress will not be afforded them:—They have the most perfect confidence that the government itself will not infringe the laws which it has enacted for their security; and that it will protect them, from the infringement by others.

Interr^y 17. Are you of opinion that the district under your jurisdiction is in a state of improvement or otherwise, with respect to its population, cultivation and commerce, and its buildings, or other works for religious, domestic or other purposes; and on what grounds, do you form your opinion?

Ans. 17. Notwithstanding what I have noticed in my answer to the 4th interrogatory, of the disadvantage which this district labours under, from the farming system, I have no hesitation in saying, that it is in a state of very considerable improvement, and that this is shown, in an evident increase of cultivation; in a number of new raised villages, whereby an increase of population may be inferred; an increased and daily increasing number of brick buildings, both for religious and domestic purposes.—The commerce has also been both much facilitated and extended, by the opening of the three grand roads leading to Hooghly, Culna and Cutwa, which have lately been put into a good state of repair, by the labour of the convicts; and nothing can more forward the commerce of this district, which has not the advantage of inland navigation, or more conduce to the general convenience of the inhabitants, than good roads.

Interr^y 18. Are you of opinion that the inhabitants of the district subject to your jurisdiction, are in general, satisfied with the British government?

Ans. 18. They certainly are satisfied with it; and living happy, and prospering under its mild and equitable laws, and the protection afforded them, I am sure are well affected to it.

Interr^y 19. Is the present system of police well calculated to insure the apprehension of offenders?

Ans. 19. In the answer to the 14th interrogatory, I have noticed that few escape, and it may therefore be inferred that it is well calculated for the purpose, in this district.

Interr^y 20. Are the police establishments in the district subject to your jurisdiction, adequate to the duties required of them?

Ans. 20. They are certainly not adequate; the tannahs are too few, and the establishments will not admit of the necessary detachments, for the performance of those duties in the numerous populous villages under them, and little assistance can be expected from the zemindarry Pikes, and village watchmen, as these, are generally found to be the offenders.

Interr^y 21. Are you of opinion that the number of crimes committed annually in the district under your jurisdiction, has increased or diminished, since the year 1793; and to what cause, do you ascribe the increase or diminution?

Ans. 21. I cannot assert that they have increased, since the year 1793; but a reference to the calendars, and the result of the trials, will evince that they have been lamentably numerous, in each subsequent year. There is, however, every prospect that they will be less frequent henceforward, from the number of offenders who have been punished on confession, by transportation, amounting in the two last years to upwards of two hundred; and I may fairly hope a good effect, from having brought many of the most notorious sirdars or heads of gangs to justice.

Interr^y 22. What crimes of enormity are most prevalent in the district under your authority; what is the cause of the prevalence of such crimes; and what are the means you would recommend to be adopted, for their suppression?

Ans. 22. The crime the most prevalent in this district is decoity or gang robbery, and the calendars exhibit few other crimes; this however is frequently accompanied with murder; and if I had not experienced it, to be equally prevalent in other districts far less populous, and indeed where the population did not afford hands sufficient for the purposes of tillage and agriculture, I should have ascribed its frequency in this jurisdiction, to the excess of population, in the lower order; but I am persuaded, that it is a calling, and hereditary with them, the same as any other trade followed by the lower classes of Hindoos.—It is the most certain mode of robbery, from their going in large gangs, for the acquisition of booty, and the most difficult of conviction, and therefore is preferred. An increased number of tannahs would certainly prove serviceable for checking the frequency of this crime; and I am of opinion that the transportation of all convicted of it, whether principals or accessories, would have a good effect.

Interr^y 23. Do the inhabitants in general, of the district subject to your jurisdiction, keep arms in their houses; what description of arms do they retain, and for what purposes are the arms retained?

Ans. 23. They do in general, and I may say without exception; for scarcely a person is to be seen, without a tulwar and shield. The higher and middling order have these and matchlocks, some as appendages of state, others for their own defence and protection; and the arms retained by the lower order, either for their own protection, or for purposes of robbery, are of every description—matchlocks, tulwars, spears, long swords, hatchets, axes, bows and arrows, &c.

Interr^y 24. Are there any brick or mud forts in your district; in what state are the forts, and what is the nature of their construction?

Ans. 24. There are no brick forts that I am informed of, in this district, but the remains of several mud, are visible. These were originally constructed for the security and protection of the inhabitants against the Mahrattas, who frequently harassed it, with incursions of horse; and when the internal government of the country experienced frequent convulsions from changes. Since the accession of the Company, and the protection afforded by the establishment of the military station at Midnapore, they have been neglected, as useless; and nothing now remains of them, but the ditches, and the bastions covered with jungle.

Interr^y 25. What proportion do the Hindoo bear to the Mahomedan inhabitants, in the district subject to your authority; and what do you suppose to be the number of the inhabitants of your district, of all descriptions?

Ans. 25. I have no data to guide me in the answer to this interrogatory, but the number of villages, and the number of houses in each village; and supposing each house, on an average, to contain four persons, which I consider a low average, the number of inhabitants would amount to one million seven hundred and eighty thousand; and I think the number may be computed at two millions. Of the number, I suppose 1-16 to be the proportion of the Mahomedans.

Interr^y 26. What are the names of the persons possessing the highest rank, and the greatest opulence, in the district subject to your jurisdiction; what number of followers, armed or otherwise, are they supposed to maintain in their service; and do they appear abroad, with such followers armed?

Ans. 26. The only persons possessing rank in this district, are the Rajahs of Burdwan and Bissenpore: the name of the former, Tajee Chund, and of the latter, Chyton Sing; but neither of these, maintain any followers in their service, hiring a retinue for the purpose of state, when they appear abroad, either on visits of ceremony or other occasions. The former, is not supposed to possess much wealth, nor do I believe that he has any, exclusive of his zemindary; and the latter, has the title only left; the greater part of the lands which composed his zemindary having been sold for arrears of rent, and the rest, now under attachment, preparatory to the sale.

The other zemindars are of no considerable rank; and many of the most principal, have their concerns managed by an agent, having their own residence in Calcutta, or in that part of the district comprehended in the Hooghly jurisdiction. There are several very considerable merchants, who carry on an extensive trade in salt, tobacco, grain and cloth; such are the following: Takore Doss, Nundee, Gocul Chund Koond, Preym Chund Goocy, Sartuch Syne, with several others; and most of the principal shroffs and banking houses in the country have their agents for conducting their concerns in the district.

Interr^y 27. Are there any persons in the district subject to your authority, supposed to be disaffected to the British government; and what are their names; and to what means do you resort for superintending their conduct? Have these persons any influence in the district, and to what extent?

Ans. 27. I know not of any, in the least disaffected to the British government; and am very certain there are none, possessing any influence to disturb it.

Interr^y 28. Are you of opinion, that it would contribute to strengthen the attachment of the natives to the British government in India, were that government to declare itself to be the sole source of honour within its territories, and to confer titles and other marks of distinction on its native subjects?

Ans. 28. The natives of Bengal, and of the provinces generally, I believe, are not famed for possessing gratitude, in any eminent degree; but it cannot be supposed that the adoption of the measure suggested in this interrogatory, will make them less grateful; and I am of opinion that it will contribute to strengthen their attachment to the British government, and prove serviceable, as encouraging to acts of good conduct, to merit the mark of distinction proposed to be conferred.

Interr^y 29. What is the state of the roads, bridges, and other public works in the district under your authority, and at whose expense are they kept in repair?

Ans. 29. In as far as the information required by this interrogatory respects the roads, I have great satisfaction in stating, that the authority given me by his excellency the most noble the Governor General in Council, to employ the convicts upon them, has enabled me to put them into a state of repair, in which they were never before known, and that this has been done, without any other expense than that necessarily incurred and paid by government, for the implements of the work. The three grand and most useful roads leading to Hooghly, Culna, and Cutwa, which may properly be termed the ports of the district, have been completely re-made. A fourth leading to Beerbhoom, is in a considerable state of forwardness; and I propose, in the course of a few days, to commence another to join the military road leading to Midnapore. Besides those mentioned, and which include an extent of more than fifty coss, a variety of others equally useful to the inhabitants, have been made, in the town and its vicinity; and I beg leave, in further answer to this part of the interrogatory, to subjoin the flattering testimony given by the acting third judge of the court of circuit, in a paragraph of his letter to me at the close of the last sessions held at this station; observing, that Mr. Bruce was formerly a resident at it for many years, and consequently, the improvements more visible to him.

"The roads in this district, are peculiarly deserving the attention of government; and the manner in which you have employed the convicts, have been attended, with the best success.—I need only instance the Cutwa, Culna, and Hooghly roads, independent of others, which

"which you had made, to prove to the Nizamut adawlut, the benefit the public has derived from your judicious application of the labour of the felons."

Some improvement has also been made, in bridges. The new one, constructed by his lordship's orders across the Banka Nulla, from its extent, and the superior manner in which it has been executed, is really a magnificent work, the admiration of the inhabitants, and of every person who sees it; and its usefulness, I trust is satisfactorily proved in the report which accompanied my letter to Mr. Secretary Dowdeswell, under date the 13th November last, showing that the number of persons who crossed it, in one month amounted to 180,000.

The expense incurred in the construction of the above bridge, amounting to about 20,000 rupees, with the exception of a small part, has been defrayed, at my recommendation, from the fine and forfeiture levied from the rajah and his vakeels,—the rest, by government: And a few others have been built, but these are inconsiderable works, and the expense of them been defrayed, partly by government, and partly by the voluntary contributions of private individuals. The roads, however, in this district, are still very defective in bridges, many more new ones, being requisite, and the old, requiring repair; and I regret exceedingly that I have not the means of improving and making them more useful and beneficial to the country; but, without the aid of government, or a tax being levied for the purpose, the intercourse must continue subject to much difficulty, from this defect in the roads; and it is the more to be regretted, from the district, as I have before observed, being destitute of the convenience and advantage of an inland navigation.

Interr^y 30. How are the convicts in the district usually employed, and is there any manner of employing them which *

Ans. 30. In reply to the preceding interrogatory, I have mentioned the convicts to be employed in the repairs of the public roads through the district, in the town and its vicinity, and I hope it will be admitted, that they cannot be more usefully or beneficially employed; and that the public has already derived considerable advantage, from this application of their labour. The security of the employment also, in as far as apprehension of escapes might have been an objection to it, is proved, from my not having lost a man from the time they have been upon the duty, now two years; and that the labour and exercise have been conducive to their health, is clearly shown, from the few deaths that have occurred among them.

Interr^y 31. What is the state of the jail in your zillah?

Ans. 31. The jail in this zillah is a very extensive brick building, and with the others of mud, constructed for the accommodation of the increased number of prisoners, very secure, and in very good condition; the former, requiring merely white-washing annually, and the latter, new thatching.

The number of prisoners confined in them is 1,327, of which 115 are dewannee or debtors, who are in a large spacious house, affording them every accommodation, separate from the building allotted for the convicts; and the others, confined in the foudarry department.

Interr^y 32. What is your opinion of the expediency of granting to zemindars, farmers, and other persons of character in your zillah, commissions empowering them to act as justices of the peace? Do you think that such a measure, will contribute to the suppression of crimes, and to facilitate the apprehension of offenders? By what rules, would you regulate the extent of the jurisdiction of such persons—would you confine it, to the estates or farms of the persons to whom the commissions might be granted, or otherwise?

Ans. 32. From what I have mentioned, in the course of my replies to the preceding interrogatories, of the zemindars, and of their farmers in this district, it must be seen that the adoption of the measures suggested in this interrogatory, if it is not impracticable, is not advisable in this zillah; and I am persuaded that to vest them with the powers proposed, would not only prove nugatory for the objects intended, but be highly detrimental to the country, and destructive of the peace of the inhabitants. Few of the zemindars and farmers of any respectability, reside on their estates and farms; to exercise it with effect for the purposes, and to allow them to delegate the power, or to vest their agents or under farmers with it, the worst and most mischievous consequences are to be apprehended, from their abuse of it. In other zillahs, the same objections to the adoption of the measure, may not exist, and where it can be adopted, it certainly would materially contribute to the suppression of crimes, and to facilitate the apprehension of offenders; but in any, I should deem it advisable to confine the extent of the jurisdictions to the estates or farms of the persons to whom the commissions were granted.

Interr^y 33. Are there any new rules or regulations, which you would recommend to be adopted, as being calculated in your opinion for the suppression of crimes in general?

Ans. 33. I am not aware that any rules or regulations are necessary for the purpose, but an increased number of tannahs, as suggested in my answer to the 22d interrogatory, would be useful.

Interr^y 34. What has been the operation of the last regulation, respecting the tax on spirituous liquors, with regard to the vice of drunkenness? Are you of opinion that the establishment of the taxes now levied on spirituous liquors, have rendered the vice of drunkenness more prevalent?

Ans. 34. I am sorry to say that the regulation has not operated to lessen the vice in any sensible degree; but that it has not had this effect in this district, is much to be ascribed to the great extent of the police tannah jurisdiction, and to the insufficiency of the establishments to perform the duties required from them by the regulation, in addition to the other duties which they have to perform. Whether from this or whatever other cause, it is certain that both the regulation and the taxes, have proved inadequate to check the vice, and I am am doubtful whether it is not more prevalent, than it was before the establishment of those taxes.

Inter^y 35. Do any measures occur to you, the adoption of which would in your opinion, contribute progressively to the improvement of the moral character of the inhabitants of the district?

Ans. 35. The institution of schools for the instruction of the young rising generation, Mahomedans and Hindoos, with examiners appointed to see that attention is paid to their education, and books printed and distributed at the public expense among the young children attending the schools, would doubtless have a good effect upon the character of both. The establishment of some English schools would also, I am of opinion, prove useful, and be attended with good effects, in time; but the education in these, should be gratis; and the progress of the children be inspected, by the magistrate of the district: and I am persuaded that the most beneficial consequences will result from the late institution at the presidency by the present administration, and that it will be found to contribute more to the improvement of the moral character of the natives, than any thing done for the purpose, by any former administration.

It is also much to be wished that government could employ the poor in any kind of labour, that their own industry could produce a subsistence, as this would lessen the number of thefts, whose frequency makes them be considered, in a less odious light than they would, if they seldom occurred. And vice being progressive, the institution of some courts in the interior of the country, for the cognizance of all petty offences against morality and good order, would prove useful, for checking its progress.

The establishments I have suggested will doubtless be attended with expense; but where the objects in view are of so much real importance, the expense should not be considered; and surely, something more than protection is due from government.

Inter^y 36. In your opinion, what has been the effect of the regulation which declares persons convicted of the crime of perjury, liable to be marked in the forehead?

Ans. 36. I have not known an instance where the punishment has been inflicted, and therefore cannot speak of its effects.—The persons generally suspected of the crime, are the low and illiterate, and to prove it wilful against them, is difficult; nor is it my opinion that this punishment for the crime can be attended with any good effect.

Inter^y 37. What has been the operation of the punishment of transportation, introduced by the British government?

Ans. 37. I am sorry to say that although the most sensibly felt of any, yet has not operated in any perceptible degree, to deter from the commission of the crimes exposing the offenders to it; but from the effect it has, upon the individuals who suffer it, extending to their families and connexions, I can entertain but little doubt that this very desirable object of the punishment will be answered, in the course of time; and I am happy to add that some instances have recently occurred in this zillah, wherein I have experienced it to have a very good effect, by inducing those who have been sentenced to it, with a view to procure its mitigation, to impeach their accomplices, whereby I have been enabled to bring a number of offenders to justice; nor has the benefit been confined to this, for it has bred distrust amongst them, and this, in its consequences, I may fairly hope, will do much towards destroying the gangs.

Inter^y 38. Are you of opinion that the Mahomedan criminal law, with the alterations of that law made by the British Government, is administered with too much lenity, or with too much severity; and what do you suppose to be the consequences produced, by the operation of the spirit in which the criminal law is in your opinion, administered?

Ans. 38. The punishment of mutilation formerly inflicted, certainly operated with more effect to deter from crimes, than that substituted by the British government, in lieu of it, has hitherto been found to have done; but I am far from being an advocate for the re-introduction of that cruel punishment, nor is it in my opinion, necessary.

The law, with the alterations made in it, by the British government, does not appear to me to be administered, either with too much severity, or with too much lenity, but in a proper mean; though I could wish the punishment of transportation to be inflicted more frequently, from a persuasion of its efficacy; and where it cannot take place, I would suggest the removal of offenders from the scene of their depredations, and from their connexions, to the jail of some remote zillah, as likely to be attended with good effects.

Inter^y 39. What is the nature of the general conduct of the Europeans not in the service of the Company, who reside within your jurisdiction?

Ans. 39. I am happy to have it in my power to say, that it has been such, as to meet with my approbation,—correct, regular, and moral; and it is a justice I owe them to observe, that I have not known an instance of complaint against any of them, since I have been at the station, now three years.

Inter^y 40. What is the general condition of the weavers and other manufacturers in your jurisdiction? Are the existing laws and regulations well calculated for ensuring justice to the weavers and manufacturers, in their dealings with the officers of the Company, and with private European merchants; and also for enabling the officers of the Company, and the individual European merchants, to obtain from the weavers and manufacturers, the punctual performance of their engagements for the provision of goods?

Ans. 40. I am really incompetent to speak to the general condition of the weavers and other manufacturers in this zillah, having little or no intercourse with them; but from every information information I can obtain from the merchants, both European and native, I understand it to be good, and I believe it is equal to what it will be found in any other district; and with respect to the laws and regulations, I can only observe, that I have had no complaints, nor am I aware that they are defective, for the purposes mentioned in the interrogatory.

Answers of the Magistrates of the 24 Pergunnahs: 1 July 1802.

Zillah 24 Pergunnahs, Fouzdarry Adawlut,
1 July 1802.

ANSWERS to INTERROGATORIES received by the Magistrates of the 24 Pergunnahs and Districts adjacent to Calcutta, from the Secretary to Government, under date the 29th October 1801.

PARA. 1st.—THE thirteen first Interrogatories applying expressly to the administration of the civil law; and the dewanny adawlut, with all its records, having been removed to Hooghly previous to our taking charge of the foujdarry duties of the 24 Pergunnahs and districts adjacent to Calcutta, we are unable to furnish the information required by Government, on the several points noticed therein: WE commence therefore, with the 14th INTERROGATORY, as the first in the paper, that does not immediately apply to the dewanny department.

14th Inter^y—para. 2.—There are 190 seminaries, in which the Hindoo law, grammar and metaphysics are taught in the districts subject to our jurisdiction. These institutions are maintained, from the produce of certain birmooter or charity lands, and by the voluntary contributions of opulent Hindoos residing in their respective neighbourhoods. The annual expense of these seminaries, is estimated at 19,500 rupees.

Para. 3.—We find only one madrissah or seminary in which the Mahomedan law is taught, in the 24 purgunnahs and districts adjacent to Calcutta. It is supported from the produce of certain lackrajee lands, and superintended by a moolavie, named Amsah ul dien.

15th Inter^y—para. 4.—We are sorry that we cannot make any favourable report respecting the moral character of the inhabitants of the districts, subject to our jurisdiction. The lower classes are in general, profligate and depraved. The moral duties are little attended to, by the higher ones. All are litigious in the extreme, and the crime of perjury was never, we believe, more practised amongst all ranks, than at present.

Para. 5.—The system introduced by the British government for the administration of the law, and for the conduct of the internal administration of the country, does not therefore appear to have improved the moral character of its inhabitants. The mildness and lenity which pervades that system, is not, we think, by any means adapted to the general character of the people, whose vices and crimes can only be controuled, by vigilant superintendence and severe example.

Para. 6.—The depravity of the native character may also, we think, be in great measure attributed, to the total want of attention shown to the maxims and discipline inculcated by the Hindoo religion. These maxims were either made the source of emoluments, or were wholly neglected, under the Mahomedan government; and under the British one, they do not appear to have been considered, as a requisite part of the system introduced by that government, for the administration of the laws, and for the internal regulation of the country.

Para. 7.—Outward forms of religion are the only ones, at present observed; and the use of spirituous liquors, debauchery, and numberless other vices, which formerly met with the severest checks and punishments, are now practised with impunity, amongst all classes.

Para. 8.—Under the ancient Hindoo government, the conduct of individuals was carefully watched by the perramanuks and heads of classes, and when reprehensible, met with severe public censure and excommunication from the class to which the offender belonged, and to which he could not be restored, without the rajah's permission.

Para. 9.—The persons thus excommunicated, became entire outcasts; no person could associate with them, under pain of excommunication; no washerman or barber could officiate for them, under pain of fine and imprisonment; nor were they allowed to return to society, till they were supposed to have made due atonement for the offences they had committed.

Para. 10.—We are of opinion that the renewal of this system, with some modifications under the controul of the magistrate, would tend to improve very considerably the moral character of the inhabitants throughout the country.

16th Inter^y—para. 11.—The inhabitants of the 24 purgunnahs and the adjacent districts, do, we believe, consider their private rights and property as secure from infringement, either by the executive officer of government, or by the supreme executive authority itself, under the present constitution of the country, as they could possibly be, under any form of government whatsoever.

17th Inter^y—para. 12.—We have reason to believe that the 24 pergunnahs and adjacent districts subject to our jurisdiction, are in a state of improvement, with respect to population, cultivation, commerce, &c. Our opinion is founded (and we have no doubt but it will be confirmed, by the report of the collector, and the records of his office) on the quantity of waste ground and jungle that appears to have been brought into cultivation, and the number of courts, religious temples, and other buildings, that have lately been constructed by the inhabitants.

18th Inter^y—para. 13.—We are of opinion that the inhabitants of the districts subject to our jurisdiction, are in general satisfied with the British government, and with the protection and security they enjoy, under its influence.

19th and 20th Inter^y—para. 14.—The present system of police is not, in our opinion, well calculated to secure the apprehension of offenders, or to answer the chief and principal object of all police institutions—that of preventing the commission of crimes, by a constant and vigilant watch over the conduct of such of the inhabitants as, from their general habits and character, may be supposed most likely to engage in them; nor are the police establishments in the 24 pergunnahs and adjacent districts, adequate, in our opinion, to the duties required of them.

Para. 15.—The increase of these establishments, would in some measure, remedy the evil noised in the first part of the preceding paragraphs, and enable the darogahs to keep a more effectual watch over the conduct of the inhabitants of their respective jurisdictions, than they can possibly be expected to do, with the present establishment.

Para. 16.—The burkundazes now employed under the darogahs, are neither sufficient in number, or calculated, from their character and occupation, to be useful officers of police, any further than relates to the seizure of such offenders as may be pointed out to them, and of conducting them, when apprehended, to the magistrate's cutcherry. To the more important business of police, that of preventing the commission of crimes, and tracing out the perpetrators, they are wholly inadequate.

Para. 17.—We would therefore recommend, that instead of increasing the establishment of burkundazes, a certain number of choukeydars be employed under each of the darogahs. The duties of these choukeydars should be, to ascertain the character, connexions, and occupation of the inhabitants of those parts of the district in which they are respectively stationed, and to report the same to the darogah. The tracing out of offenders should be left chiefly to the choukeydars; and the burkundazes, whose numbers are sufficient for the purpose, might be employed in securing and conducting them to the magistrate's cutcherry.

Para. 18.—We would also recommend, with a view to secure the immediate attention of the darogahs to the more important business of the police under their respective jurisdictions, and to stop, what we have reason to believe is at present made the source of very improper emolument; that the authority vested in them by Section 12, Regulation XXII. of 1793, of receiving razeenamahs, and discharging the parties executing the same, be withdrawn; and that in all cases where the darogah is now authorized to receive razeenamahs, he do in future take security for the appearance of the parties before the magistrate, or, in the event of their refusing, or being unable to give such security, that he forward them forthwith to the magistrate's cutcherry. The subject of complaint, in which the darogahs have the power of receiving razeenamahs, are in all instances so trifling, and in general so groundless, that were the plaintiff assured, when instituting his charge, that he must substantiate the same before the magistrate, he would we conceive, in very few instances proceed; and probably the ends of justice and the purposes of police would be more effectually answered, by discouraging, as far as possible, complaints of so frivolous a nature as those which the darogahs are authorized to settle.

21st Inter^y—para. 19.—The records of our office do not enable us to report, with any degree of accuracy, the number of crimes committed annually in the 24 pergunnahs and adjacent districts, from the year 1793 to the period of our taking charge. We have reason to believe that the police darogahs were by no means regular in reporting the crimes committed within their respective jurisdictions, and that numbers were perpetrated, which never came to the knowledge of the magistrate. We are happy, however, in observing, that capital crimes of all descriptions, and that of decoity in particular, have decreased considerably during the last two years, in the districts under our charge.

Para. 20. The following are the causes to which the frequent commission of crimes in general, and that of decoity in particular, may we think be, in great measure attributed.

First: The removal of all responsibility in matters of police, from the zemindars.

Second: The want of power in the magistrates to try all criminal cases, and to punish all offenders convicted of crimes, that are not of a capital nature.

Third: The delay attending the administration of criminal justice, and the length of time that elapses, before criminal prosecutions are brought to a conclusion.

Fourth: The want of a house of correction for the commitment of vagabonds and idle and disorderly persons of all descriptions, the good effects of which, are very evident in the town of Calcutta.

Fifth: The want of additional regulations to prevent the sale and purchase of stolen property.

Sixth: The inadequate punishment inflicted on offenders, when convicted of the crimes laid to their charge.

Seventh: The difficulty with which prosecutors and witnesses can be prevailed upon to come forward.

Inter^y 22.—

22d Inter^y—para. 21.—The crime of decoity appears to have been more frequent than any other in the 24 pergunnahs and adjacent districts, since the year 1793. Its prevalence may we think be attributed, in addition to the causes set forth in our reply to the 10th and 20th interrogatories, to the number (if we may be allowed the expression) of hereditary decoits, by whom, when we took charge of our office, we found these districts infested. Decoity was their profession, the one which their ancestors had probably for generations followed, and which profligacy, united with indolence, prevented them from relinquishing.

23d Inter^y—para. 22.—Arms are not in general kept by the inhabitants of the district, subject to our jurisdiction; birjechaussies, armed with tulwars, are however retained, though not in any great number, by some of the zemindars and talookdars residing within our jurisdiction, for the purpose of guarding their property against the depredations of decoits, and in some instances, we believe, to assist in collecting their rents, and to overawe the adjoining zemindars, with whom they are frequently at variance. They are also occasionally used as hircarrahs, to run before their master's palanquins in Calcutta, as well as in the Mofussil.

Para. 23.—The number of attendants of this description, ought we think to be limited, at the discretion of the magistrate. Their names should be registered at the cutcherry, and the zemindars, talookdars and others should be obliged to give notice to the darogah, or at the magistrate's cutcherry, whenever they change or discharge any of their armed attendants.

24th Inter^y—para. 24.—There are no brick or mud forts belonging to individuals in the districts subject to our jurisdiction, but such as are extremely old and entirely in ruins; so much so, as to render it impossible for us to give any accurate account respecting them.

25th Inter^y—para. 25. We reckon the Hindoo inhabitants of the 24 pergunnahs, and the adjacent districts subject to our jurisdiction, to be in the proportion of 12 to 4 to the Mahomedan; and the number of inhabitants of all descriptions, taken on the actual enumeration of the talooks in the 24 pergunnahs, may be estimated at one million six hundred and twenty-five thousand. To these, if we add the inhabitants of Calcutta, estimated at six hundred thousand, the population of the 24 pergunnahs, the town of Calcutta, and the adjacent districts within twenty miles, will amount to two millions two hundred and twenty-five thousand.

26th Inter^y—para. 26.—The Nawab Dilawur Jung, and Rajah Cullian Sing, are the only persons of real rank residing in the districts subject to our jurisdiction.

Para. 27.—The number of their followers, armed and otherwise, are as follows:

The Nawab Delawur Jung	-	-	32.
Rajah Cullian Sing	-	-	136.

Para. 28.—Both these persons appear abroad, with a considerable number of their armed attendants.

Para. 29.—None of the zemindars in the 24 pergunnahs and districts adjacent to Calcutta, possess any real rank; and few of them, are opulent.

Para. 30.—The number of their armed attendants seldom exceeds four or five, one or two of whom, are generally employed to run with their master's palanquins.

27th Inter^y—para. 31.—We have reason to believe that the inhabitants of the district subject to our jurisdiction, are well affected towards the British government; and we in consequence, have not thought it requisite to adopt any extraordinary measures for superintending their conduct.

28th Inter^y—para. 32.—We are of opinion that the conferring of titles and other marks of distinction by the British government in India, would tend considerably to increase the attachment of its native subjects.

29th Inter^y—para. 33.—There are 124 roads in the 24 pergunnahs and districts adjacent to Calcutta. The principal ones, are repaired at the expense of government, and in the dry season, are kept in tolerable good order. During the rains, however, with the exception of the Barrackpore, Balligant and Allepore roads, they are in many parts, almost impassable. The inferior roads are repaired, by the zemindars and other inhabitants.

Para. 34.—Most of the bridges are greatly out of repair; and a number of new ones, are requisite. The bunds also appear to require considerable repairs.

30th Inter^y—para. 35.—A number of the convicts at this station, are employed in repairing some of the public roads in the vicinity of Calcutta, in digging a tank near the jail at Russapuglah, and in making bricks for the roads.

Para. 36.—The number of guards requisite to superintend and watch the convicts thus employed, prevents our keeping so many of them to work, as we could wish, and as the preservation of their health seems to require.

Para. 37.—The construction of a house of correction in the vicinity of the jail, where all the convicts who are capable of work, might be kept to constant labour, with a very small addition to the present establishment of guards, would remedy the evil noticed in the preceding paragraph, and appears to us to be a preferable mode of employing them.

31st Inter^y—para. 38.—In reply to this interrogatory, we beg leave to submit the following extract from the Judge of Circuit's Letter to the Magistrate, under date the 9th March 1802,—“Your Jail is in excellent order, and your prisoners, well employed, are in good health.”

32d Inter^y—para. 39.—From the general character of the zemindars, farmers, and other inhabitants of these districts, we do not think that it would be advisable to vest any of them, with the powers of justices of the peace; on the contrary, we are of opinion that such a measure, measure, so far from being in any way beneficial to the police of the district, would be a source of great oppression to the lower class of the inhabitants, and of innumerable complaints to the magistrate.

33d Inter.—para. 40.—We submit, with deference to the consideration of government, the following rules and regulations, as calculated in our opinion, to amend the present system of police, and to check the commission of crimes in general.

Para. 41.—First, to hold the zemindars in some degree, responsible for the conduct of persons in their employ, and others residing on their respective estates.

Para. 42.—At present, we have reason to believe, though it is difficult to establish proof against them, that the zemindars not only in many instances, encourage and harbour decoits, but frequently partake of the property plundered by them.

Para. 43.—The choukeydars and pykes employed by them, are concerned in almost every decoity committed in the districts subject to our jurisdiction; and we have no doubt, were the zemindars held in some degree responsible, for the conduct of their choukeydars, and for that of others residing under their protection, that robberies and thefts would be much less frequent than at present.

Para. 44.—With this view, therefore, we beg leave to recommend, that the zemindars be called upon to enter into muchelkas, and forfeit a certain sum of money in every instance where it shall be proved that they have entertained any person of notorious bad character in their service, or allowed any such to reside on their respective estates.

Para. 45.—Second, to authorize the magistrates, assisted by law officers, to try all criminal causes, and to punish all offenders convicted of crimes, that are not of a capital nature.

Para. 46.—To ensure the speedy administration of justice, and to render the magistrates more efficient in their respective jurisdictions, it appears to us particularly advisable, that they should have the power of trying offences of all descriptions, and inflicting punishment, subject, in capital cases only, or when the criminals are sentenced to be transported, to the confirmation of the Nizamut adawlat.

Para. 47.—The trouble, loss of time and expense that attends a criminal prosecution on the present system, is, in our opinion, a serious evil; and not only induces many who have been robbed, to put up with the loss they sustain, rather than apply to the police officers for redress, but prevents numbers from coming forward with informations that would be highly beneficial to the community, and which we have no doubt would in numberless instances be preferred, were the administration of justice more prompt and speedy, than at present.

Para. 48.—We have now had charge of the fouzdar duties of the 24 pergunnahs and adjacent districts for upwards of two years; and during that period, only three jail deliveries have taken place. The consequence of this delay has been, that numbers of criminals of the most daring description, against whom, when committed for trial, there was the most full and complete evidence, have escaped, and been again let loose on society; owing to the death or illness of some of the principal witnesses, to their being kept collusively out of the way at the trial, or not being correct in their evidence before the court of circuit, as when the case was fresh in their memory before the magistrate.

Para. 49.—The depredations of decoits within this jurisdiction have been, during the last two years, in general confined to houses of the lower classes of natives, from whence they could expect little or no opposition; and the value of the property stolen, has in few instances, exceeded 30 or 40 rupees. A man therefore, who has been robbed of property to that amount, and who resides probably at the distance of 20 or 30 miles from the magistrate's catcherry, must in the first instance, after making his application to the police darogah, attend with his witness before the magistrate: further evidence may be requisite, and it is probably twelve or fourteen days, before the investigation can be brought to a conclusion. The magistrate then, with the fullest conviction of the guilt of the prisoners, commit them for trial before the court of circuit; and at the expiration of six, or as it may be two or three months, the prosecutor and his witnesses must again attend, and are probably again detained for some weeks, before the trial comes on. After this long attendance, loss of time, and, notwithstanding the allowance made to poor and indigent witnesses, some expense to themselves, they have too often the mortification to see the prisoner, whose guilt was fully established before the magistrate, escape with impunity.

Para. 50.—The prosecutor is also in many instances, more indifferent as to the event of the trial, when it comes forward, than he was, at the time of his appearance before the magistrate; threats have probably been conveyed, in a circuitous mode, both to him, and his witnesses, and they in consequence think it more politic, on their appearance before the court of circuit, to soften, than to urge what they have stated before the magistrate. Persons who have families and property, deem it extremely rash and dangerous to prosecute, or appear as witnesses against men of such desperate character, as the decoits of this country. Indeed, it is with the utmost difficulty that they can be prevailed upon, to come forward, even in cases where they have received personal injury, and when they have not to speak to the persons of the prisoners, but merely to identify the property found in their possession.

Para. 51.—The evils which we have here noticed would, we conceive, be in a great measure, done away, the prosecutors and witnesses be induced to come forward, with more alacrity, the ends of justice be more effectually answered, and a considerable saving arise to government, if the magistrates were nominated judges in the fouzdar, as well as in the de-wanny department.

Para. 52.—To enable the judges thus nominated, to act with energy and effect, they should, we conceive, be invested with the same powers, as are now exercised by the courts of circuit. They should be assisted by law officers, and a monthly statement of their proceedings should be transmitted to the nizamut adawlat.

Para. 53.—

Answers of the Magistrates of the 24 Pergunnahs: 1 July 1802.

Para. 53.—If so material an alteration as the one which we have now ventured to suggest in the judicial system, should not be deemed expedient or advisable, we submit, with deference to the consideration of government, the necessity of increasing the powers which the magistrates are at present allowed to exercise, and of authorizing them, in addition to the corporal punishment which they are now allowed to inflict, to imprison offenders, according to the circumstances of the case, for a period not exceeding one year.

Para. 54.—We further beg leave to submit to the consideration of government, the expediency of placing the subordinate officers of police entirely under the controul of the magistrate; many of the police darogahs, aware that they cannot be dismissed from office without a representation to government, consider themselves in some degree independent of their immediate superior, and many instances must occur where, though the magistrate has not what he conceives to be a charge of sufficient magnitude to prefer to government, he still finds the darogah wholly incompetent to the duties committed to his charge. We beg leave, therefore, to recommend, that clause 6, Regulation II, of 1793, be rescinded; and that the removal of the police darogahs be left to the discretion of every decoit, authorized by

Para. 55.—The reward of ten rupees for the apprehension of every decoit, authorized by Section 18, Regulation XXII, of 1793, does not appear to us a sufficient recompense for the hazard that must be run, and the expense that must frequently be incurred, in tracing out, apprehending, and prosecuting to conviction, offenders of so daring and dangerous a description.

Para. 56.—We would therefore recommend, that instead of the reward authorized by the section above noticed, the magistrates be allowed, in all instances where any notorious robber or thief shall be apprehended and prosecuted to conviction, to confer a reward not exceeding one hundred rupees; that they be also authorized to confer rewards for the apprehension of offenders of an inferior description, suited to the circumstances of the case, and to the hazard that may have been run in apprehending them.

Para. 57.—Third. To establish certain regulations for preventing the sale and purchase of stolen property.

Para. 58.—The facility with which stolen articles of all descriptions are at present disposed of, encourages robbery and theft, and renders detection extremely difficult.

Para. 59.—Itinerant purchasers of gold and silver ornaments, and brass and copper utensils, which generally form the greater part of the booty in a decoity, are allowed to perambulate every district, and to purchase every article offered for sale at half its value, without asking a single question, and without giving any notice whatsoever to the police officers.

Para. 60.—These purchasers are in general in the employ of principal monied men at the metropolis or the foreign settlements, and brass-beaters, who have considerable manufactories at Cutwa and other places.

Para. 61.—The gold and silver articles are either melted on the spot, or sent for that purpose to Calcutta, where the metal is refined, brought to the government standard, and sold to the mint.

Para. 62.—We have reason to believe, that several natives, apparently of great respectability, both in the Mofussil and in Calcutta, have made considerable sums of money by this nefarious traffic.

Para. 63.—Brass and copper utensils are purchased, in the same manner, taken to the manufactories, and melted down.

Para. 64.—Besides the itinerant purchasers, numbers of sonars and brass-beaters are established, in most parts of the different districts. These sonars and brass-beaters purchase indiscriminately, from all descriptions of persons, whatsoever articles they offer for sale, and melt them down, or deface them, in such a manner as to render it impossible for the owners, to recognize their property.

Para. 65.—We are of opinion that itinerant dealers should be strictly prohibited, from going about the country; that established sonars and brass-beaters should be put, under certain restrictions, and that all persons purchasing for less than their real value, any articles that may afterwards prove to have been stolen, shall be prosecuted, not merely as receivers of stolen goods, but as accessories to the robbery or theft, and punished accordingly.

Para. 66.—Brass and copper utensils should be marked with the initials of the proprietors name, or the name at full length, together with that of the village in which they reside.

Para. 67.—This might be easily done, at the time of purchase by the brass-beaters, who should be subject to penalty, if they sell any utensils without marking them with the initials or name of the purchaser.

Para. 68.—The established sonars and brass-beaters should be registered, and caused to make an entry of all articles brought to them to work up or melt down, with the head man of the village in which they reside, who should forward the same every week to the magistrate.

Para. 69.—Persons in the habit of lending money on pledges, should also be obliged to make an entry of them with the principal man of the village.

Para. 70.—Fourth, To punish the commission of crimes in general, and those of decoity, and perjury in particular, with more severity.

Para. 71.—The punishment by mutilation, has been humanely abolished by the British government, and that of imprisonment or transportation substituted in its place:—The former, unless attended with extreme hard labour, is considered by the natives of this country as little or no punishment; the latter, is however dreaded, and would still be more so, were it passed for a longer period, and more frequently than at present.—It seems also expedient owers of the Magistrates of the 24 Pergunnahs; 1 July 1802.

dent that the convicts ordered for transportation should be embarked immediately, or as soon as possible after the confirmation of the sentence, for the place of their destination.

Para. 72.—At present, they are allowed to remain for years in the jail of the 24 pergunnahs, and some instances have occurred, where the periods for which they were transported have expired, during their confinement in the jail.

Para. 73.—The sentences passed at the jail deliveries, which have taken place in these districts, since they were entrusted to our charge, have seldom, even in instances of decoity, exceeded seven years, and very few, considering the numbers tried, have been recommended for transportation.—In several instances, where the facts have been so fully established before the magistrates, as to make them conclude that the punishment could not be less than that of transportation for life, so different have those facts appeared before the court of circuit, or in so different a light has the court considered them, that the offenders have seldom been sentenced to more than five or six years imprisonment.

Para. 74.—Punishments so inadequate to the crime of which the offenders are convicted, must we conceive, and indeed it has in several instances come under our observation, considerably lessen that degree of awe with which persons brought before the courts of circuit ought to look up to their decisions. Several notorious decoits now in the jail at Russahpanglah, under sentences of four and seven years imprisonment, have ridiculed their punishment, and told the prosecutors to beware when they should be released.

Para. 75.—Convinced that unless some severe examples are made, no effectual check can be given to the commission of decoities, we submit, with deference to the consideration of government, the expediency of sentencing to death the perpetrators of every decoity in which murder, wounding, or any cruel treatment whatsoever shall have been inflicted on the persons whose houses may have been attacked, or others; and that in all instances when decoity shall not have been attended with any of these circumstances, the perpetrators be transported for life.

Para. 76.—The crime of perjury, with exception to the town of Calcutta, appears to have risen to an alarming height throughout the Company's territories, and to call most loudly for a much severer degree of punishment, than the existing Regulations direct.

Para. 77.—In addition therefore to the corporal punishment, public exposure and godens inscription, prescribed by Regulation XVII. of 1797, we beg leave to recommend, that all offenders convicted of the crime of perjury, be transported for a period of not less than seven years.

Para. 78.—Since the arrival of the judges, now presiding in the supreme court of judicature; the crime of perjury, which was formerly as prevalent at the Presidency as it now is in the Mossussil, has by the deservedly severe sentences passed by the court on all offenders of this description, been almost effectually checked; and scarce an instance of perjury appears for some time past to have, occurred in the supreme court.

34th Interr.—para. 79.—The operation of the last regulation respecting the tax on spirituous liquors, has, we think, been beneficial, in the districts subject to our jurisdiction. We have reason to believe that the vice of drunkenness is not so prevalent, as formerly; and we are of opinion that it would be less so, if the tax were levied in its fullest extent, throughout the 24 pergunnahs and districts adjacent to Calcutta.

35th Interr.—para. 80.—We are not at present aware of any measures, beyond those which we have already suggested, that would particularly conduce towards the improvement of the moral character of the inhabitants of our jurisdiction.

36th Interr.—para. 81. We are unable to speak as to the effect of the Regulation which declares persons convicted of the crime of perjury, liable to be marked on the forehead; no instances having yet come under our observation, in which the mark has been inscribed.

37th Interr.—para. 82.—We are of opinion that the punishment of transportation has been attended with good effect, and that it would still be more beneficial to the police of the country, if the sentence was passed more frequently, and the convicts embarked immediately, or as soon as possible after its confirmation, for the place of their destination.

38th Interr.—para. 83.—We have stated our opinion on the subjects noticed in this Interrogatory, in the 5th, 71st, and 73d preceding paragraphs.

39th Interr.—para. 84.—The general conduct of the Europeans not in the service of the Company, who reside within our jurisdiction, is correct; and very few instances have occurred, of any complaint whatsoever having been preferred against them.

40th Interr.—para. 85.—We believe the weavers and other manufacturers in our jurisdiction, to be well satisfied with their condition; and that the existing laws and regulations are well calculated, both for ensuring justice to them, and for obtaining the punctual performance of their engagements with the officers of the Company, and the individual European merchants.

Appendix, No. 11.

REPORTS OF JUDGES OF CIRCUIT, ON TERMINATION OF THEIR SESSIONS.

To JAMES STUART, Esq.

Register to the Nizamut Adawlut, Fort William.

SIR,

I beg leave to report, that in conformity to the orders of government, I have proceeded to the several stations in the Calcutta division, and held the sessions at each station, except the last, that of Zillah, 24 pergunnahs; which duty Mr. Ramus has, with the sanction of government, undertaken to perform himself.

2. The judge of circuit is required, by the Regulations, to transmit to the Nizamut Adawlut, a report respecting the jails; the treatment or employment of the prisoners; the effect of the administration of the present system of laws; and such other matters as may appear to him deserving of notice. Accordingly, I now proceed to submit to the court such observations as occur to me on those subjects.

3. The greatest part of the trials which have come before me were for robbery; and, as far as I have had an opportunity of looking into the records of former years, this appears to have been always the case.

4. The whole number of persons tried at the six stations, where I have held the sessions, is about 1,000; the number convicted, and sentenced to different punishments, is 446.

5. On considering the number tried, and convicted, of former circuits, I do not perceive when compared with the number tried, and convicted, of former circuits, I do not perceive any material difference. They are rather diminished; but not so much so, in my opinion, as to warrant any decisive conclusion in favour of the present system of police, or administration of justice. On this subject I shall, in a subsequent part of this report, trouble the court with a few remarks.

6. At Burdwan, Nuddea, and Jessore, substantial jails have been erected by government, on the same plan, and appear to be well calculated for the purpose. But, from the progressive increase of the number of convicts at all those zillas, I conceive it will not be possible long to accommodate them.

7. Indeed these three jails would have been full before this time, had not some of the convicts been removed from Nuddea and Jessore, to Midnapore; and at Burdwan it has been usual to keep many hundreds constantly on the roads, where they sleep in tents or huts, provided for the purpose. This plan seems to succeed, and I see no objection to it.

8. The port at Midnapore forms a very spacious and excellent jail, but it requires some repairs; at present, half of it, is appropriated to military purposes; and it is divided in the center by a wall. The whole would contain about two thousand prisoners, without inconvenience.

9. The jail of Hooghly was, formerly, the private dwelling-house of a native. The situation is not good; but, on the whole, I think the building answers the purpose tolerably well.

10. The jail at Beerbhoom is bad, being constructed of mud and straw, and situated on the worst spot that could well be chosen: at no station probably is a new jail so much wanted as at Beerbhoom.

11. It may be inconvenient to government to build a new jail at present; but the two grand objects of security from fire, and from escape, may be accomplished at a very small expense, without any other building than a pukka wall of four sides, and slight choppers erected in the inside, for the accommodation of the prisoners.

12. I would propose, that a good spot be fixed upon by the magistrate, and a substantial wall erected, ten or twelve feet high, such as will bear beams or arches, in case it should hereafter be determined to have a complete pukka jail.

13. I think that, at all events, a square wall of two or three hundred feet each side, with arches, and Syrian roofs in the inside, would answer every purpose of a jail, in this country. I do not clearly see the necessity of large apartments and cells, in the style of a European jail, such as have been erected, at a great expense to government, in many parts of the country.

14. The matter however has, doubtless, been considered long ago; and the opinions of professional men must have been taken, previously to the adoption of the plan on which government thought proper to build so many expensive jails.

15. Nevertheless, of Judges of Circuit,

on termination of their Sessions.

No. 1.—Calcutta Court of Circuit, 2^d Session
1802.

15. Nevertheless, it is my duty at present to offer such observations as occur to me on the subject; and I submit the above suggestion for such consideration as the court may think it deserves.

16. The convicts are employed, more or less, at every station of this division which I have visited; but I doubt whether their work is every where of much public utility, and whether it is laborious, as it ought to be.

17. The convicts are fed, clothed and accommodated, I think, better than the common labouring class of people, and their situation ensures them constant subsistence, even in a year of scarcity; but they do not, generally speaking, work so hard as coolies.

18. I beg leave to suggest, that at each zillah some officer be entrusted with the superintendence of the labouring convicts; that such officer be held responsible for their being regularly employed in any particular species of public work to be recommended by the magistrate, and that monthly reports be made of the progress of the work.

19. I conceive the judges of circuit might, without impropriety, be empowered to banish convicts, from one zillah to another. This might prove of service, both as public benefit, in directing their labour to objects of the greatest utility, and likewise as holding out a new punishment, heavier than simple imprisonment, and lighter than transportation beyond sea.

20. I take the liberty here to offer my opinion, that section 5. of Regulation 2d, 1799, rendering such convicts as escape, and are re-taken, liable to transportation, beyond sea, is a law which sometimes operates with great severity; particularly if, as I understand, no measures are taken by government to enable the convicts to return to Bengal, at the expiration of the term of their sentences; although it must be well known, that hardly any native possesses the means of procuring a passage for himself.

21. It is a duty lately imposed on the Judge of circuit to report upon the state of the embankments. I beg leave to mention, that I had no opportunity of personally inspecting them, and that all the information I am able to furnish respecting their condition, is the result of enquiries made by me, of the collectors and other persons, in the several districts which I have visited in the course of the circuit.

22. The bunds of Zillah, and particularly those of Mundulgaunt, received much damage last year, owing to an extraordinary inundation; a regular investigation was made into the cause of their failure; at present I learn that such measures have been taken to repair all the bunds of Burdwan which require it, as will afford the best prospect of their preservation in future.

23. It is intended, I believe, to abandon several of the Mundulgaunt bunds, and never to repair them again. I conclude that such a measure has not been hastily resolved upon. I have not myself sufficient knowledge of the country, to form an opinion on the subject.

24. Of the Nuddea bunds, I learnt that they suffered very little injury last rains, and that the zemindars, by whom they are kept in repair, in consideration of a deduction allowed them in their jumma, have been directed to commence the repairs. I think it unnecessary to make any further remark, than, that to the best of my judgment, there is no danger of their being neglected.

25. The bunds of Midnapore, immediately under the superintendence of the collector of that zillah, were very well secured from damage, during the last rainy season; and if the measures lately recommended by the collector be approved, and carried into execution, I have no doubt the state of the bunds, will be perfectly substantial next year. The collector of Midnapore has directed his attention to the subject of the poolbund, and in a very ample report to the board of revenue, has described certain abuses and oppressions, consisting chiefly of pressing ryots to work in the pools, which call aloud for a remedy.

26. The bunds in the vicinity of Tumlook were last year put in a state of substantial repair, and suffered no material damage from inundation; but towards the end of the rains, a considerable extent of bund near the Roopnarain river was washed away, with the bank on which it stood, by the violence of the freshes from the hills. By the immediate construction of a new bund further inland, the greater part of pergunnah Tumlook was saved from destruction, with the loss of only a large tract of land to the zemindar, and a few houses of the ryots.

27. The repairs of the bunds necessary for the protection of the country near Tumlook, against inundation in the ensuing rains, are now going on, under the superintendence of the salt agent, and promise to be fully adequate to the purpose. But it is proper to mention, that if the customary bunds in the adjoining pergunnahs of Mina and Cossijura be discontinued (and it is reported their relinquishment, is in agitation) it is the opinion of the salt agent of Tumlook, that a large portion of the lands in that division, and those the most productive in salt, will be greatly endangered.

28. The bunds of Zillah Jessore sustained less injury last year, than for many years past. The acting collector has lately, personally inspected, several of them; and I understood from him, that the expense of the repairs for the next year will be less by about one-third, than the amount usually laid out.

29. I know not whether it would be practicable, in some parts of the country, to employ convicts in the bunds, with advantage. Whenever a quantity of simple work, consisting chiefly of digging earth, is performed, and a considerable number of workmen is required on a small extent of ground, the plan might perhaps answer.

Judges of Circuit,
on termination of their Sessions.

No. 1.—Calcutta Court of Circuit, 2^d Session
1802.

30. It being expected on this occasion, that I should submit to the Nizamut Adawlut, what occurs to me on the subject of the police, and the administration of criminal justice, I shall endeavour to state my sentiments on those subjects; premising only, the local experience and information I possess, being by no means extensive, I shall possibly, in the little of novelty I have to offer, be very liable to fall into error.

31. I shall confine my remarks chiefly to the subject of decoity, because I do not recollect that any other crime of magnitude, affecting the persons and property of the community (except perhaps perjury) has attained a very alarming height in this division, or appears to require from me any observations; because any effectual measures taken to suppress decoity, would at the same time contribute, to put an end to all other breaches of the peace, and because decoity is in itself, in my opinion, the greatest evil existing in the country.

The crime of decoity, or robbery in gangs, consisting of from ten or fifty, sometimes above a hundred, prevails throughout this division, and I imagine throughout Bengal, to an enormous extent.

32. The crime of decoity has, I believe, increased greatly since the British administration of justice, and I know not that it has yet diminished.

33. In a year of plenty, like the present, when few are in want of food or employment, decoity will certainly prevail less, than in a year of scarcity. But generally speaking, taking one year with another, I doubt much whether decoity is less frequent than heretofore.

34. In spite of the great difficulty of proof, numbers are convicted at every session, and still greater number detained in custody as suspicious characters, till they give security for their good behaviour.

35. The numbers of convicts confined at the six stations of this division, under sentence of imprisonment (independent of Zillah, 24 pergunnahs) is about 4,000; of them, probably nine-tenths are decoits: besides these, some hundreds have of late years been transported. The growing expense of the maintenance of such numbers of convicts, will probably soon excite the attention of government.

36. The number of persons convicted of decoity, however great it may appear, is certainly small, in proportion to those who are guilty of the crime. This will be evident, if we consider the number who escape on trial, for want of satisfactory evidence, and the few brought to trial, in each case, in proportion to the numbers which it appears belonged to the gang.

37. Moreover, many robberies are committed that are never heard of by the judge of Circuit; some perhaps, that never reached the ears of the zillah magistrate.

38. At Midnapore I find, by the reports of the police darogas, that in the year 1802, a period of peace and tranquillity, they sent intelligence of no less than ninety-three robberies, most of them, as usual, committed by large gangs: with respect to fifty-one of these ninety-three robberies or decoities, nothing more was heard of them, than that they happened; not a man was taken:—of the remaining forty-two, a very few, frequently only one or two in each gang, were taken, and one hundred and thirty-eight, have been convicted.

39. It must not be supposed that decoity prevails in the district of Midnapore to a greater extent, than in other districts of this division; on the contrary, I think there is less, except perhaps in Beerbhoom. In Burdwan, there is certainly three or four times as much. The Midnapore reports I mention, only, because they were made under my own eye, and I am satisfied of their accuracy.

40. Moreover, they agree with my own observation at Jessore, and other places. If it is suspected that the reports are incorrect, or if they are admitted to be correct, and the prevalence of decoity is denied to be so general in other zillahs, as I would suggest, inquiries may be made, and further proof, I conceive, furnished without difficulty.

41. It is unnecessary to describe the shocking cruelty and ferocity of decoits, or the terror they inspire, among the most valuable classes of the community. I will just mention, that it is the usage of the country for those who have amassed a small sum of money, to conceal or keep it, in their houses; and that the case of a man robbed of all he possessed, the earnings of laborious industry for many years, is, to the best of my belief, not uncommon.

42. The Nizamut Adawlut know very well the nature of decoity, and must be aware of the misery of the individuals, whose persons and property are attacked by them. This the court know, since the worst cases are submitted to their revision. But I am not sure that they have an adequate idea of the extent, to which decoity prevails.

43. At all events, what I have already said is, I imagine, sufficient for my present purpose; that is, susceptible of a remedy. It will be proper to consider, shortly, the causes of the frequency of the crime of robbery.

44. The causes generally assigned, are, the want of co-operation in guards and heads of villages; the too great extent of darogas jurisdictions; the too small numbers of police officers; dishonesty of chokedars; dread of the vengeance of decoits; cowardice in not resisting decoits; facility of disposing of goods robbed; the general fear among the people, of killing decoits; the low pay given to darogas; the great ease with which burglary is committed; the repugnance in Hindoos to take the oath, and thereby contribute to the conviction of delinquents.

45. Besides these causes, which appear to me sufficiently to account for the fact, there is a general complaint that the laws are too lenient; hence, the most common and obvious remedy is, increasing the severity of punishment.

51. If the crime of decoity increases, it is proposed to condemn all decoits to transportation, which it is known the natives dread, and very justly, as the heaviest penalty next to death; and if decoity should still prevail, it will perhaps be thought proper, to punish capitally all such as may be convicted of the crime.

52. I am by no means sure of the necessity or propriety of such remedies. Before I can form a judgment of their efficacy, I must be certain that the punishment reaches the offenders; at present, the punishment does not reach them; they elude conviction; they elude apprehension. We have no right, therefore, to say that the punishments awarded by the present laws, are too light. We cannot say that men become decoits because the punishments are too lenient; they become so, because their chance of escaping altogether, is so good.

53. A robber, even in Bengal, is I presume a man of courage and enterprize, who, though he roughly estimates the risk he is to run, by continuing his depredations on the public, is rather apt to under-rate that risk, small as it is, in reality.

54. Each individual, in a gang of fifty decoits, perhaps calculates the chance of his being brought to justice, and imprisoned for seven or eight years, as ten to one in his favour. If by an efficient police, we could bring the chance to ten to one against his escaping, and leave the punishment the same, he would, I apprehend, be more effectually deterred from committing robberies, than by leaving the chance the same, and applying a capital punishment, in case of conviction.

55. It is, by enquiring how many decoits are convicted, and how many escape, that we may be enabled to ascertain, in some degree, to what proportion of them, the increasing rigour of the punishment can be applicable.

56. It is true that multitudes have been already transported, but a much greater multitude has escaped; and if the offence is as common, or nearly so, as before the increased penalty, then, we have only obtained one more example to illustrate, what was well known before, that heavy punishments, unless certain and expeditions, produce little effect in deterring from the commission of crimes.

57. The punishments at present inflicted, or intended to be inflicted on decoits, are sufficiently rigorous; when murder is perpetrated, the whole gang is liable to the penalty of death. When great violence or cruelty is exercised by decoits, and clearly proved, transportation ought to be, and I believe is, almost invariably recommended; and transportation is a most dreadful punishment to the natives: moreover, the sentence operates, if I am not misinformed, in all cases during life.

58. To punish burglary in general with death or with transportation, would, in my opinion, be unnecessarily severe. Simple burglary is, in this country, very easily committed; the temptation to commit it, is great. The crime called nunkub zannee, or making holes in the wall, and taking goods out of the house, would, in England, be held to be a burglary; but the evil or loss suffered, and the danger or alarm incurred, by the person whose house is robbed in this manner, are in few instances, very serious. To punish such a crime capitally, would surely be inflicting a penalty, entirely disproportioned to the offence.

59. In Benares it is said that the crime of robbery is, comparatively speaking, uncommon; and if so, how happens it that the same laws are sufficiently rigorous for the inhabitants of Benares, which are not, for those of Bengal? There is nothing, I presume, in the character of the inhabitants of the Upper Provinces, which can lead us to infer that they are more easily deterred from violence, than the mild and timorous Bengalis.

60. On the whole, I should be sorry to see the penal laws altered. It may be thought that they are, as at present, administered, in some degree arbitrary and uncertain; and they may be so; but I think them not the worse for that, nor do, the well informed natives. I am sure, if we appoint specific punishments for every crime, we should feel the inconvenience of it.

61. I admit, as a true and wholesome general maxim, that no distinctions should be made, but that all should know they have a certain punishment to expect, if convicted of a specific crime. Yet in this country, it will be found that the injury suffered is frequently very different, from the commission of crimes of the same denomination; and that it is hardly possible for us, accurately to define particular crimes.

62. I see not why we should despair of preventing crimes by any other method, than that of holding out the fear of punishment.

63. I think that by classing and numbering the villages and the inhabitants; rendering the tannabs more compact; subdividing them, and nominating sirdars, over each division; something might be gained. The object should be, to obtain the co-operation of the people. The ignorance of the police officers respecting the persons and character of individuals residing within the limits of their jurisdiction, is notorious and inevitable.

64. The zemindars, pykes, and village chokedars, can hardly be deemed public servants; they are ill paid; and their pay, does not depend on government or its officers. They occasionally attend the ranna, and give information of a robbery committed by some other chokedars, their rivals; but as to any effectual resistance to decoits, or any previous steps taken to prevent their depredations, little can be expected from this description of persons.

65. It is to the daroga then, and ten or a dozen subordinate officers, each in all respects inferior to a parish constable in England, that we commit the care of preserving the peace of a district 2 or 300 square miles in extent, and often containing 100,000 inhabitants.

66. The darogah is generally unfit, possessing no spirit, vigour, or address; he is a stranger too, not interested, or possessing property in the district. He is often negligent and corrupt; sometimes, little respected, being ill paid, and unable to maintain any dignity of character; and his only care is, to make a shew of vigilance and activity, lest he should create displeasure in the magistrate.

67. It should be the study of government, in my opinion, to form, if possible, a body of gentry, such as exists in other countries; an intermediate order between the governors and the governed, to whom the one might look down, and the other might look up. At present, no such order exists. Most of the men who once possessed rank and wealth, are gone to ruin. The men of property who do exist, are, for the most part, such as have lately risen.

68. That the magistrate can maintain the peace over a million or more of persons, without the help of a considerable number, whose interest, or sense of duty, shall induce them to assist him, is plainly impossible. It is equally impossible, that a million or more of individuals, comprising the lower classes of the community, can be prevented from preying upon each other, unless there is constantly in their sight, a sufficient number of men deriving competent authority from government, to compose a superintending power, capable of keeping them in awe, and, in some degree, of affording them protection.

69. The lower classes, indeed the whole people, are removed to a distance from the magistrates; and individuals are lost and confounded, in the immense mass of the population of this country. The natural operation of our system, does not appear to me to diminish the distance between the people and the magistrate; neither our regulations nor our habits have, I think, any tendency to correct the evil.

70. The terror of decoits among the ryots is excessive; they cannot be persuaded to enter into a league, for their own security. They are the most timid spiritless race in the world, and will not, though ever so numerous, make the least effort to defend themselves and families, from a handful of decoits.

71. I would endeavour to arm, and in some degree, embody and discipline the inhabitants of every village, for the special purpose of opposing decoits. I would have it explained to all of them, that government wished them to defend themselves, and with that view, invite them to accustom themselves to assemble at the sound of a drum, or on the first alarm or signal to be agreed upon, that they should repair to the spot, unite and support each other, and do their utmost, to seize or destroy the decoits.

72. I would cause them clearly to understand, that to wound or kill a decoit, while committing an act of violence, was no crime, but on the contrary meritorious; and would assure them, that, in the event of any of themselves being killed or disabled in such a service, government would grant a provision for their families.

73. If this should prove effectual, a step would be gained, towards emancipating the ryots of Bengal from their present most helpless and degraded state. They would no longer tamely deliver themselves up, to the wanton and desperate attacks of decoits; they would no longer resort to the expedient of retaining, as chokedars, well-known decoits, paying them rather for their forbearance to do mischief, than for acting as guards.

74. Neither would they, after a robbery, be harrassed by the vexatious visits and outrage, and the plunder of gooyendas and girdwars, who constantly, when supported by the least colour of authority from the magistrate, intimidate, extort, suborn, and rob, under pretence of bringing offenders to justice.

75. In the course of trials, the guilty very often, according to the best of my observation, escape conviction.

76. Sometimes an atrocious robbery or murder is sworn to, and in all appearance clearly established, by the evidence on the part of the prosecutors, but when we come to the defence, an alibi is set up; and though we are inclined to disbelieve it, if two or three witnesses swear consistently to such alibi, and elude every attempt to catch them in prevarication or contradiction, we are thrown into doubt, and the prisoners escape.

77. Very frequently, the witnesses on the part of the prosecution, swear to facts in themselves utterly incredible, for the purpose of fully convicting the accused, when, if they had simply stated what they saw and knew, their testimony would have been sufficient: they frequently, under an idea that the proof may be thought defective by those who judge according to the regulations, and that the accused will escape and wreak their vengeance upon the witnesses who appear against them, exaggerate the facts, in such a manner, that their credit is utterly destroyed.

78. Witnesses have generally each a long story to tell (they are seldom few in number, and often differ widely, in character, cast, habits, and education) thrice over; namely, to the daroga, the magistrate, and the court of circuit; they relate tediously and minutely, but not accurately, a variety of things done and said; numerous variations and contradictions occur, and are regarded, with cautious jealousy; though in reality, they perhaps seldom furnish a reasonable presumption of falsehood.

79. But who shall distinguish between mistake and imposture? what Judge can distinguish the exact truth, among the numerous inconsistencies of the natives he examines? how often do those inconsistencies proceed, from causes very different from those, suspected by us; how often, from simplicity, fear, embarrassment in the witness; how often, from our own ignorance and impatience?

80. We

80. We cannot wonder that the natives are aware of our suspicious and incredulous temper: they see how difficult it is to persuade us, to believe a true story, and accordingly endeavour to suit our taste, with a false one.

81. I have no doubt that, previously to their examination as witnesses, they frequently compare notes together, and consult upon the best mode of making their story appear plausible to the gentleman; whose wisdom, it cannot be expected, should be satisfied with an artless tale; whose sagacity is so apt to imagine snares of deception, in the most perfect candour and simplicity.

82. We cannot but observe, that a story, before it reaches us, often acquires the strongest features of artifice and fabrication. There is almost always something kept back, as unfit for us to hear, lest we should form an opinion, unfavourable to the veracity of the witness. It is most painful to reflect how very often witnesses are afraid to speak the truth, in our cutcherries.

83. We cannot study the genius of the people, in its own sphere of action. We know little of their domestic life, their knowledge, conversation, amusements, their trades and casts, or any of those national and individual characteristics, which are essential to a complete knowledge of them. Every day affords us examples of something new and surprising; and we have no principle to guide us, in the investigation of facts, except an extreme diffidence of our opinion, a consciousness of inability to judge of what is probable or improbable.

84. Sometimes we see the most unfair means taken, by informers and thief-takers, to detect and apprehend the accused. We find confessions extorted, and witnesses suborned: at the same time, we think the accused guilty, and the prosecution fails, merely because the unfair play used against them, leads us to suspect more.

85. Twice or thrice during my circuit, prisoners have escaped, in spite of strong evidence against them of decoity, because it appeared that the prosecutors and witnesses had long concealed, what they afterwards pretended to know; and this concealment, gave an appearance of the story being afterwards trumped up against the accused.

86. One case of this kind,—the trial of Radakaut Sirdar and others for robbery and murder, I had occasion to refer to the Nizamut Adawlut from Hooghly. Another of the same kind, occurred at Nuddea, where the evidence was strong, but where the witnesses had failed to come forward, during a month and more; and it is very possible that, in both these cases, the concealment arose from the causes assigned, namely, in the one case, the dread of decoits; and in the other, the aversion to take the oath.

87. When we recollect the extreme uncertainty to us, of every fact which depends on the credit of the natives to support it, who can wonder that a very slight circumstance should turn the scale in the prisoner's favour; and that while, we think innocence possible, we hesitate to condemn to death or transportation.

88. I do not speak of these things, with any view of proposing a remedy. If the mind is not convinced of guilt, an acquittal must follow; and we have nothing left to do, but to lament that a robbery or a murder took place, and that justice has failed to overtake the offenders.

89. I have no new rules to propose for the conduct of trials, in the criminal courts, or for admitting or believing evidence. I am inclined to think no rules of evidence can serve any purpose, but to embarrass the courts, and create new obstacles to the conviction of the guilty.

90. The evil I complain of is extensive, and, I fear, irreparable. The difficulty we experience in discerning truth and falsehood among the natives, may be ascribed, I think, chiefly to our want of connexion and intercourse, with them; to the peculiarity of their manners and habits, their excessive ignorance of our characters, and our almost equal ignorance, of theirs.

91. Prosecutions are often instigated, or carried on, by the agency of persons at enmity, or in rivalry, with the culprits; this is frequently the case, when the accused are village chokedars; yet most of the decoits, in some zillahs, are these chokedars; and few dare appear against them, but those who are of the same description with themselves.

92. From all the above causes, proceed the numerous acquittals of prisoners, at every jail delivery. The calendars, the darogah's reports, the evidence on every trial, and the information of all, convince us, that innumerable robberies and murders, that atrocities of the worst conceivable kind, are committed; and that very often, the perpetrators are before us; yet do we find ourselves, from causes of the nature above described, constrained to let them loose again, to prey on society; or, at the utmost, to direct that they be discharged, on giving security for their good behaviour.

93. And this giving of security, it may be observed, is no pledge whatever of future good behaviour; since whoever has a few rupees, whether a man of the best or worst character, can procure security; and whoever has nothing, can seldom or never procure it.

94. The judge of circuit is from day to day, engaged in trying large gangs for robbery and murder, and letting them go; and the country continues to be overrun with them, to a degree truly deplorable. After wading through a mass of contradictory evidence, he is left unsatisfied respecting the reality of the facts under investigation, very strongly inclined to believe the guilt of the prisoners; it may nevertheless be easily conceived, that in the double chance of the folly, and the villainy on the part of the prosecution, and the fabrication of a defence by the accused, the evidence is deemed imperfect; and the result is, that the culprits are discharged altogether, or perhaps, ordered to give security.

95. Indeed,

95. Indeed, considering all the obstacles, I am rather surprized at the number who are convicted, though so many do escape.

96. We are, in every stage, presented with complicated difficulties; we cannot prevent decoity, by holding out the dread of penal laws; we cannot prevail upon the ryots, to resist the decoits; and they are backward, in giving information, or deposing against them. Our efforts, whether directed to deter, to resist, to detect, or convict, are all frustrated.

97. I think the judges and magistrates should be entrusted with the power of pronouncing final judgment, and carrying the sentence into execution, without reference to the court of circuit, in all cases where they might be of opinion that imprisonment for a year, or even two or three, was sufficient for the crime.

98. By this, the business of the circuit would be much diminished; fewer false defences, would be fabricated; fewer witnesses would be harrassed, with two journeys to the sudder, and government would be subjected to less expense, for the subsistence of the witnesses and prosecutors.

99. I was happy to hear, in reply to my reference respecting the corporal oath administered by us, to Hindoos, that government have it in contemplation to enact a regulation which may provide for the inconvenience, which I took the liberty to state to the Nizamut Adawlut.

100. I have mentioned the number of robberies, accounts of which were received last year, by the magistrate of Midnapore. Of these robberies, it is remarkable, that two or three only, out of the ninety-three, were committed in the Jungle Mehals; where, a few years ago, nothing but anarchy and depredation prevailed; but where, at present, the police is committed to the zemindar, and is attended with little, or no expense to government.

101. The reason of this appears to me, that the jungle zemindars are able to avail themselves, of the assistance of the body of the people, in maintaining the peace. Their ryots, or a great number of them, are now engaged to act as pykes, or guards, when occasion requires.

102. Whenever this is not the case, the police will probably be found to be bad. Whenever the state of the community is such, that a great part of the individuals composing it, cannot be made use of to preserve order, insecurity must subsist, in one shape or other.

103. To imagine that a darogah and ten burcandaze, can maintain the peace throughout a tanna, is, I fear, a vain delusion: whenever the police is good, it cannot, I am inclined to suspect, be justly ascribed to that establishment, but to the operation of other causes.

104. It is possibly to the influence possessed by the inhabitants of a particular pergunnah, by a particular zemindar, or by aumils and gomastahs, of men of courage or wealth, or to some other interior local cause, and not to the general plan of the establishment of a darogah and his officers, that we are indebted for the preservation of the peace, whenever the peace is preserved.

105. I take the liberty to suggest, that if reports were made of the number of decoities committed; and if the local circumstances which might be supposed to affect the police were pointed out; if such reports were regularly procured from different parts of the country, in my opinion, much valuable information would be gained.

106. My experience does not extend far; and I am unable to form an accurate opinion upon the effect of the different systems which exist in different parts of the country.

107. I hear from common report, that in parts of Behar, Benares, and the Upper Provinces, there is less decoity than in Bengal; and I should conceive there would be little difficulty in ascertaining, whether this is the fact or not.

108. I should suppose too, that it would not be impossible to discover to what it is owing that decoity prevails, less in one part of the country, than in another: whether to the general character of the people, the incentives or discouragements to idleness and profligacy, the vigilance or negligence of magistrates, the face of the country, the general system of the police establishment, and the officers in the pay of government, or the subordinate arrangement of village chokedars; whether in any of these, or other circumstances, we are to search for the increase and decrease of crimes, might I presume, be ascertained by carefully comparing the state of one part of the country, with another; and till the defects shall be clearly ascertained, it is vain to hope that adequate remedies will be applied to repair them.

109. It may not be amiss to say a few words upon a question which has been much agitated of late, whether, to invest the proprietors of land with the police in their several estates, would be an advisable measure?

110. I have mentioned the success of this plan, in the jungle mehals of Midnapore, when I was empowered by government three years ago, to carry it into execution. I have observed too, that our object ought to be, in my opinion, to procure the assistance of a large portion of the ryots; and this it may be concluded, can best be effected, by the influence of their landholders.

111. Wherever the zemindars do possess the same kind of influence over their ryots, that is employed by the jungle zemindars of Midnapore, I think they might with advantage be authorised to exert it. But I do not know that this influence is now, any where to be found, but in the jungles.

112. Nor would it be safe or easy, or perhaps practicable at present, to create anew this sort of influence. It prevailed, I apprehend, heretofore, very much throughout the country; but owing to our system of laws, and to the sale of almost all the large estates, which are still still every day changing proprietors, it is much diminished every where, and in some places, nearly extinguished.

113. For by us, all is silently changed. The ryot and the zemindar, and the gomastah, are, by the levelling power of the Regulations, very much reduced to an equality. The protecting, but often oppressive and tyrannical power of the zemindar, and the servitude of the ryot, are at an end. All the lower classes, the poorest, I fear often, in vain now look to the regulations only, for preserving them against extortion and rapacity.

114. The operation of our system, has gradually loosened that intimate connection between the ryots and the zemindars, which subsisted heretofore. The ryots were once the vassals of their zemindar. Their dependance on the zemindar, and their attachment to him, have ceased. They are now often at open variance with him, and though they cannot contest with him, on equal terms, they not unfrequently engage, in law suits with him, and set him at defiance.

115. The zemindar formerly, like his ancestors, resided on his estate. He was regarded as the chief and the father of his tenants, from whom all expected protection, but against whose oppressions there was no redress.

116. At present, the estates are often possessed by Calcutta purchasers who never see them, whose agents have little intercourse with the tenants, except to collect the rents, and in that business, they proceed strictly and coldly, by the Regulations.

117. I believe that in general, the ryots are not ill treated by this description of persons, but it is obvious that gomastahs cannot generally be entrusted with the police.

118. I have been led to enlarge upon these topics more than I at first proposed to myself; and perhaps, in an unusual manner. The subject is important and interesting, and it would, I conceive, be a breach of duty in me, to neglect this opportunity of delivering my sentiments as fully as I am able.

Calcutta,
24th March 1803. }

I am, Sir,
Your most obedient humble servant,
(Signed) H. STRACHEY.

To S. T. GOAD, Esq.

Register to the Nizamut Adawlut.

Sir,

I BEG leave to inform the court of Nizamut Adawlut, that shortly after my return from the last circuit of the Ceded Provinces, I was engaged in another public duty at Futteh-gur, which occupied me till within these few days. I have now left Futteh-gur, and am proceeding down the river as expeditiously as I can towards Calcutta, with a view to embark for Europe this season.

2. Although I have thus put off writing the usual report after the circuit till I am so situated as to be unable I fear, to furnish any useful information on the subject of the police of the Upper Provinces, I proceed, in conformity to the regulations, to submit what occurs to me; and have only to lament that my communication must necessarily prove somewhat defective.

3. On my return last year from that part of the circuit which fell to my share, viz. the jail deliveries of Allahabad and Goruckpore, I troubled the court with a few observations on the state of the police of those zillahs.

4. I stated that robberies were much less frequent, than in those parts of the Lower Provinces with which I happened to have any knowledge; and I attributed this chiefly, to the habits of the people which lead them to defend themselves from violence.

5. This remark, appears to me to be applicable to the other districts of these provinces. The natives trusting to their own prowess, and being accustomed to stand by each other, in the hour of danger, are seldom molested by the attack of robbers. The grand object of law and police, security of person and property, is better accomplished here, by the spirit of the people themselves, than in Bengal, by the regulations, which are not I believe, in spite of the incessant labours of the officers of the foudarry department to render them effectual, found adequate to the ends of preventing the crime of decoity, or bringing the decoits to justice.

6. There may be some other causes which prevent the formation of bands of robbers, in these provinces: when a man, from idleness or misfortune, is reduced to distress for subsistence, the same opportunities and facilities of joining bands of decoits, are not open to him here, as in Bengal. There are, I imagine, few or no persons whose sole occupation is robbing: the country contains fewer navigable rivers than Bengal. These, while they contribute to the abundance and prosperity of that country, at the same time, afford encouragement to decoits, by presenting them with the means of easy retreat and concealment.

7. The character of the people here, is certainly different, owing possibly in some degree, to the climate, which is less moist and relaxing to the body; and to their food, which is somewhat more substantial and invigorating, than that of the natives of the Lower Provinces. I chiefly, however, ascribe their superior energy and courage, to active military habits, acquired under the loose government they have been accustomed to.

8. I ascertained

8. I ascertained to the best of my power, at the several stations I visited, what number of offences had been reported to the magistrates, in the course of the preceding six months. I have not with me the memorandums I took on this subject, but I remember the result to be uniform. The number of crimes reported is small, and the number of offenders taken and brought to justice, when compared with the number of cases reported, is greater than I should expect to have found it.

9. In future, abstract statements will be submitted to the Nizamut Adawlut, agreeably to the court's orders of the of which I did not receive till I had finished the circuit.

10. I think it proper, however, to declare my opinion, that no certain conclusions respecting the number of crimes committed, and the security enjoyed by the natives, can be drawn from these reports. If in Bengal, many crimes are committed, information of which never reaches the ears of the magistrate, as I believe to be the fact, the case must be more so, here; because our police officers are more ignorant of, and inattentive to, their duty, than the darogahs in the Lower Provinces; and because the people are, I think, less in the habit of conveying public information, and more averse to appear in court, and prosecute those who have injured them. Attendance on the court, whether as a prosecutor or witness, is who generally regarded as a heavy misfortune, to avoid which, many leave their homes, and submit to infinite inconvenience and vexation; and many more, I presume, pay handsomely to the Nazir or his people, for permission to keep out of the way. Hence crimes are perpetrated; and no records remain of them. This last remark, however, I do not suppose to be exclusively applicable to this division.

11. The calendar at each zillah exhibited a few cases of robbery, and not very many of theft or of fraud. It is only the crime of homicide that appears to me to require notice, as prevalent.

12. It is known to the Nizamut Adawlut, from the references I have had occasion to make, that homicide, in all its gradations of guilt, is frequent. The number of persons convicted of wilful murder is certainly great. The introduction of a regular administration of justice is so recent, that the minds of the people can hardly yet be fully impressed with the apprehension of being brought to trial and punishment for crimes; but I have learnt that the examples made of murderers, and more particularly the exposure of the bodies of malefactors after their execution, has inspired a very general terror, and therefore produced a most salutary effect. I still hope and expect that this division will not long remain mark for the frequency of the most heinous of crimes.

13. The cases of murder are easy of detection and proof; and I imagine those guilty of this crime, seldom escape. They are, for the most part, cases of revenge, jealousy, wounded pride, and sudden violence, committed by a single individual, without the concert or complicity of others. Few murders are perpetrated, in prosecution of a plan of robbery. No general alarm is, by the prevalence of this crime, spread among the people for their safety, as by gangs of decoits. The instances of murder which occur are, in themselves, shocking; but this crime is not attended with those extensive mischiefs to society, which the violent invasion of property by plunderers, produces.

14. The murdering of children for the sake of their ornaments is, I am sorry to say, common; so much so, that I submit whether it might not be advisable to strike at the root of the evil, by taking away, if possible, the temptation to commit the act: I mean, adopting measures to prevent children, from wearing gold and silver ornaments.

15. For my own part, being convinced that we have no other means of putting an end to the frequent perpetration of this crime, I could wish to see the practice of adorning children with valuable trinkets, altogether prohibited. I would, at all events, prevent the practice, by rendering the ornaments liable, on information, to forfeiture; or by any other expedient that may be thought preferable, to that of denouncing such a penalty.

16. The exertion of authority in a matter of this sort will probably be deemed objectionable, but it would not be really oppressive. It would not excite discontent: It would not, at least, offend the feelings of any well informed individual.

17. If it is thought that such measure, would encroach upon any one's natural rights and established customs, I might urge, that these helpless infants, have rights also. They have claims to protection. Their parents are found, after long experience and innumerable warnings, so heedless and infatuated, as to expose them to perils, from which the existing laws cannot defend them. Such being the case, in my opinion, it becomes the duty of the magistrate, or the ruling power, to interfere, even in an unusual mode, to save their lives.

18. The objections to legislative interference, seem to me to rest, on the score of convenience and regularity, and cannot weigh much with those, who have present to their minds, the horror of a single case of child murder. I therefore beg leave to recommend, that effectual steps be taken to prevent the wearing of valuable ornaments by children.

19. A want of tenderness and regard for life is very general, I think, throughout the country; and may, perhaps, like most of the crimes and excesses of the natives, be ascribed, in a great degree, to the influence of fatalism, the maxims of which, universally pervade their minds.

20. The defence, or rather the confession of a person accused of the crime of homicide, is very frequently expressed, in such terms as these:—"I was provoked—I was impelled by

"by fate, to kill the deceased—All must die, at the hour appointed—No one can struggle against destiny—It was written, his time was come; and mine, may now be come."

21. Such is the train of thought on these occasions, among the learned as well as the unlearned, and every change of fortune and variety of event, strengthens and confirms it. Exertions, they say, are ineffectual to contend with a power, in whose hands, man is a mere instrument. It is the part of mortals to resign themselves, and abstain from useless attempts to alter the established course of things.

22. Thus reasoning, in action they surrender themselves to the first impulse; and in guilt or misfortune exonerate their minds, from moral demerit, and console themselves, in the conviction of a natural impotence to resist temptation.

23. These doctrines, have their full operation here; but homicide being, if I mistake not, more frequent in these provinces than elsewhere, there must be some other cause, which produces the difference. This cause is, I suppose, the natives being very generally armed, and their having been long unrestrained in the practice of gratifying revenge, and settling the slightest quarrels by the sword. Though by no means a ferocious race, we meet with many instances of their spilling each others blood with that sort of thoughtlessness and unconcern, which might be expected from barbarians accustomed to scenes of slaughter.

24. In spite of the frequency of homicide, which I have thought it my duty to notice, I think myself warranted, from the information I have been able to gather respecting the number and the nature of crimes of all sorts committed in this division, to say, that in my judgment, the security of the natives and their property is not ill insured in these provinces, from outrage and depredation; and that though for the most part, very poor, the condition of the people, may be deemed flourishing.

25. I do not assert that this is entirely owing to the regular administration of law, and to the system introduced by us, but it must be ascribed to those causes, in some degree; at all events, the fact of the welfare and security of the inhabitants, must be satisfactory to the Nizamut Adawlut.

26. I am further enabled to state that the tehsildars are becoming more attentive to their duty, and that regularity begins to appear in their proceedings. I think the police tolerably vigorous and efficient; and that it is, in a state of improvement.

27. I proceed to mention the state of the jails in this division. The jail of zillah Etawah is not at all adapted to the purpose, being a private house in the town, much too small for the number of prisoners it contained, when I visited it; constructed chiefly of mud, and having no water to which the prisoners can have access. I wrote to the magistrate, and I imagine he has addressed government upon the expediency of removing the prisoners to a place better suited to them.

28. The jail of Furruckabad is likewise in the town; but the accommodation it affords is spacious and tolerably convenient. The prisoners seemed healthy, and comfortably lodged. The jail is, however, situated four or five miles from the cutcherry. The one or the other, therefore, ought I think to be removed. The prisoners are brought from the jail to the cutcherry, and taken back in hackeries.

29. On the day when the Mahrattas encamped near the town of Furruckabad, the guards at the gate, proved negligent, or treacherous; and though the enemy did not enter the town, nor cause any tumult therein, all the prisoners were allowed to escape. The guards, I understand, have not made their appearance since.

30. The Cawnpore jail, situated near the cutcherry, appears to me well contrived for accommodation and security; a mud wall encloses a large square, in which are two or three buildings, where the persons sleep. There are also good wells of water within the square. I beg leave to mention, that the health and comfort of a native, cannot be insured, in my opinion, unless he has constant access to water.

31. In this jail, the chief objection is, that the women are confined in the same enclosure, and cannot be kept completely separate, from the men. But this defect, the magistrate will be able and was preparing to remedy, by erecting a small building and wall, for the women alone.

32. The magistrate of Cawnpore was also taking measures to remove the debtors, who certainly ought not to be imprisoned, with convicts.

33. The jail of Allahabad is, in all respects, bad; I last year described it to the Nizamut Adawlut; and it is needless for me to say more upon the subject now. The prisoners did not appear to me, to be unhealthy; but I strongly recommend that another place, as soon as practicable, be provided for their accommodation. I am informed, that government have resolved upon erecting a new jail at Allahabad, which zillah is now annexed to the provincial court of Benares.

34. The jail of Bareilly is a pukka building, constructed by government, upon an approved plan. The plan is not so complete and extensive, nor is the work so substantial, as that of the jails constructed some time ago, in many districts of Bengal; but I think it answers the purpose tolerably well, affording sufficient accommodation and security from escape. The foudarry court is, at present, held at the distance of about 4 miles from the jail.

35. The jail of Moradabad is similar, in its plan and construction, to that of Bareilly; but the cutcherry is close to it.

36. The convicts are not yet numerous, at any of the stations of this division; they are employed, for the most part, on the roads.

37. I have

37. I have nothing further to say on these subjects. That our administration of justice affects all it pretends to do, I do not believe; that all crimes are punished, no one, I presume, can expect; that all wrongs are redressed, or even a great proportion of them, is probably not the case. The delay and expense of prosecuting, are intolerable to the lower classes; of this, however, I am confident, that sufficient security is maintained to ensure the prosperity of the body of the people; that the country is rapidly improving, and that its improvement is promoted, by our system.

To S. T. GOAD, Esq.

Register to the Nizamut Adawlut, Fort William.

Sir,

I HAVE had the honour to transmit you, a Report on the last circuit of the Ceded Provinces, bearing date the 25th January; which report, I presume, you have laid before the Nizamut Adawlut. It has since struck me, that there are certain questions, intimately connected with the internal peace of these remote provinces, which are highly interesting; viz. How far the system we are introducing is, in itself, just? and, how far it is adapted to the actual state of the country, or congenial to the minds of the several ranks and classes of the natives? how far our system is calculated to prevent disaffection, or to quell commotions? These questions, although I cannot undertake to discuss them thoroughly, strike me as so important, that, scanty as my information is, and crude and insignificant as the opinions I have formed, must appear to the Nizamut Adawlut, I am nevertheless unwilling to close this, my last task, without soliciting the attention of the court, to such additional observations, as I may be able to recollect; and I beg to be permitted to offer them, by way of supplement to my report.

1. Rumours, it seems, have prevailed, that our government is extremely unpopular in the Ceded and conquered Provinces; and that the country has been, during some time, in a state of much commotion and disorder. This is not precisely the fact: no alarming disorders exist to my knowledge; nor is the system, I think, obnoxious to the main body of the people.

2. It appears to me further perfectly clear, that none of the classes of our subjects have, the means of resisting the authority of government, with any prospect of success. Besides, if we consider the nature and degree of mischief which can be done to the population and agriculture, to the trade, or to the land revenue of the country, by the disaffected; I fancy all will agree, that it is not likely to prove very serious. A rebel may raise disturbances in his neighbourhood, and create alarm, during a short time; but, unless assisted by a foreign power, able to cope with our whole military force, his speedy ruin or expulsion, are inevitable.

3. I should imagine, that few of the zemindars would, from the mere spirit of loyalty, support the government, in a doubtful contest. They cannot feel attached to us, because we have deprived them of their power and importance.

4. With respect to the ryots, their security and happiness, are, as far as I can learn, better maintained by our system, than they were, during the most prosperous periods of the native governments. They are, I think, in general, sensible of their situation being improved; but still the influence of a chief, is sufficient to induce his ryots to follow him; and on occasion, to take up arms for him, even against a government which promotes their interest.

5. A zemindar, possessing the means of paying his people, finds little difficulty in procuring followers: not merely his ryots and immediate dependants and connexions, strangers in great numbers will assemble round him. Let his case be what it will, either that of a wretched outlaw, or of a defaulter, driven by misfortune or injustice from his paternal estate, if he thinks proper to erect his standard, and defy the ruling power of the country, he will find brave and faithful adherents, as many as he can maintain. But it is my opinion that the equalizing nature of the Regulations will gradually correct this. Hitherto, that sort of influence which enables a man to retain troops, is not much diminished.

6. The dread of our criminal law, exercised in all its rigour, or even of our military law, affords, in my opinion, an insufficient remedy to this evil. In case of a serious insurrection of our subjects, of which I have no apprehension, except on the occasion of their being assisted by a foreign power, I do not think that the proclamation and exercise of martial law, would prove of the least use.

7. Rohilcund, Furruckabad, and the upper part of the Douab, abound with a warlike race of Mahomeddians, ready to join any leader. Some thousands of this description, I mean the Patans, are now said to be serving with Holkar, and with their countryman Meer Khan. They dislike us; not because our government is oppressive and unjust, which their own probably would be, but because there is no employment open to them; and they are left inactive, without distinction, and almost without subsistence.

8. Few of these men enlist in our military service, because they cannot bring themselves to submit to the strictness of our discipline. The Patans in general, are reduced to much distress: they are idle; and with difficulty and great reluctance apply to any profession but that that of arms. The whole race, with a very few exceptions of servants and chiefs pensioned by us, and probably all these cannot be excepted with for a change of government.

10. I take the liberty further to express my opinion founded on the best information I can obtain, that the better part of the inhabitants of the Conquered Provinces, who are not yet completely subject to our dominion, regard our political power with much jealousy and dread. That we or any other rulers, should be restrained by a sense of justice and forbearance, from conquest and encroachment, they have no idea. Hence is bred in the minds of aspiring and high spirited people, a hatred to the English. The most learned, intelligent, and liberal-minded of the natives, suppose, that the business of a state, with a powerful army, is to make encroachments on its neighbours. These are the sentiments which operate to our prejudice, among most men of spirit and independence.

11. But the chief cause of our unpopularity with the higher classes, I believe to be that which I have already mentioned, namely, that they consider themselves reduced to a degrading subjection, by the introduction of a practical system of justice; of the only system, perhaps, which could restrain them from rapine and cruelty.

12. The influence of a rebellious or disaffected chief over his people is wonderfully great, and is not founded in the popularity or supposed justice of his cause, and very little, on the probability of his success. Though he be a mere robber, and his situation quite desperate, still his people will adhere to him to the last, and never betray or forsake him. They may be bad subjects; but they are excellent servants.

13. The influence of our government, in securing the allegiance and attachment of its subjects, I conceive to be most inconsiderable. Such persons as we take into our service, may be depended upon, as long as we pay them regularly, and treat them well; but our influence, reaches no further.

14. The discontents or tumults, excited by zemindars, afford no certain evidence of grievance or oppression proceeding from our system. The rebellious zemindars, who have appeared in the Upper Provinces, are by no means numerous. They consist, if I mistake not, of men who have fallen in arrear to government, through misfortune or imprudence; who were ruined, and then began to plunder their neighbours, and defy the magistrate.

15. There may be a few men of another description, who, during the late irruption of the enemy, showed a disposition to join him. I imagine that the greater number of the zemindars would join even a Mahratta invader, if they had any opinion of the stability of his power. They wish for a change, by which they conceive that they would regain their importance.

16. The minds of the zemindars in general, I believe to be alienated and estranged from us; and if they forbear to rise against us, or join our enemies, it is I conceive only because they see that our army is irresistible, and our power firmly established.

17. The ryots have every reason to dread the prevalence of the Mahratta power; of that power which yields them up to the tyranny and oppression of their chiefs, which affords no protection to its subjects, which is perpetually at war with its neighbours, which has in effect, laid waste the greatest part of Hindostan.

18. Yet could many of the zemindars of the Doab prevail on their ryots to contribute to expel us, and establish the Mahratta power. The invasion of the country by Holkar, probably caused a few disturbances, which ceased when he retired. It is generally said that he was well received, wherever he came. I do not hear of any strict inquiries into the conduct of the zemindars, on this occasion; nor do I believe that such inquiries, would serve any useful purpose. If the enemy should re-appear, the people will not join him, unless their leaders, the zemindars, should entertain expectations of his expelling us the country, and thereby rescuing them from subjection.

19. It should not be supposed, that it is oppression and unpopular measures that produce resistance and revolt. The people are never stirred up to rebellion, by popular acts: reason has nothing to do, with the matter. The salt monopoly was, till lately, exceedingly oppressive. It affected the poor, and the great body of the people; but they were totally helpless. Their discontents, their sufferings, produced no rebellions. Disorders are raised, by the rich and powerful; and no person of that description, was materially affected, by dearth of salt.

20. Deprive the ryots of a necessary of life, and they sit silent; nobody cares for them, and they cannot help themselves. But take from their chief, the management of the police, which he exercised only to oppress them; restrain him, from disturbing the peace of the country, and he will prevail upon them to take up arms in his cause, and contend in a hopeless desperate enterprize against all the powers of government, civil and military. Such are our subjects. They resist authority, without pretence of right, or hope of success. Their disorders, afford no signs of grievance, or even of discontent.

21. With respect to the possibility of restraining men from joining rebellious chiefs, who can pay them, or prevailing upon dependants to detach themselves from their masters, I think it out of the question. Neither the hope of reward, nor the fear of punishment, as held out by government, have much effect. Our influence scarcely extends, to induce the servants and connexions of the most worthless outcast of a decoit or assassin, to betray or desert him.

22. It is my opinion that disorders may exist, as I believe they do, which ought by no means, to be ascribed to the government, or to the system of laws introduced by us. Disturbances turbances and rebellions are frequent, in all the native governments: they arise, I imagine, usually from the resistance made by the zemindars to the demands of the ruling power.

23. It is generally understood that our judicial regulations are much disliked by the natives of the Upper Provinces. Perhaps a clamour has been raised against them, by persons ignorant or interested. Certain it is, however, that many persons of credit and respectability join, in condemning the judicial Regulations. Military men and commercial men, seem to dislike them; so do, the higher orders of the natives.

24. When we come to enquire particularly, into this matter; when we ask a native of the Upper Provinces, which part of the regulations is obnoxious to him? he replies, as they would reply, in the Lower, "That which reduces me, to a level with my domestics and labourers."

25. A man of rank, cast and wealth, conceiving that he possesses superior rights and privileges, thinks himself disgraced, by being called into court upon any occasion. He has an aversion also, to be examined publicly, as a witness. "Is my testimony," says he, "rated no higher than that of my servants and coolies, and I, to stand on an equality with them, and reply as a criminal, to their petty complaints for an assault or abusive language?"

26. I do, think that much allowance should be made for the prejudices and long habits of the people; and as far as I have observed, the magistrates are tender and cautious on these occasions, not to outrage the feelings of a man of rank. But the treatment of these men, should not depend upon the temper of the magistrate.

27. The complaint is very general; and it might be better to relax still more, for a time at least something of what we are apt to conceive to be, the strict equality of justice. It is sufficient if we attain the object of protecting the weak from the cruelty and oppression of the strong. This may perhaps be effected, and at the same time, the minds of the higher classes upon this head, might be quieted, by enjoining the magistrates to abstain from requiring the personal appearance of a superior in court, on the complaint of an inferior, for a bailable offence.

28. A regulation might be passed for this purpose, or if objections should occur to the enacting of such a regulation, I am of opinion, that a proclamation or declaratory resolution of government might be published with good effect, in these provinces. The proclamation might be expressed, in terms to this purport:—That, in consequence of misconceptions having gone abroad respecting our system of laws, government thought proper to declare, that it was their intention to secure to every individual, the just privileges of his cast and station, according to the laws, religion, and established usage of the country; that the prevalent principle in our administration of justice was, that of affording to every one, as far as was practicable, redress for injuries sustained in his person, his property, or his reputation; that we were perfectly aware, that without subordination and a due distinction of rank in the several classes of society, peace and good order would not be maintained; and that so far from its being in contemplation to encourage the lower orders in disrespectful or insolent conduct, whether in word or action, towards their superiors, it was perfectly consistent with our maxims, and the anxious wish of government, that every native of consequence should, upon all occasions, be treated with the respect due to his rank and cast: that in the event of any complaint upon this subject, being preferred to the courts of justice, the Judge or Magistrate would be required to consult the Hindoo or Mahomedan law-officers (according as the case might relate to Hindoos or Mahomedans) and found his decision, upon their written opinion.

29. A proclamation of this nature, I do not, by any means, think necessary for preserving the country from serious discontents, but I think it would be pleasing to the better part of the natives, as evincing an attention to their opinions, customs, and prejudices; that it would be productive of no material inconvenience; and in short, seeing no objection to the measure, I recommend it for consideration.

30. I do not recollect to have heard any other distinct objection made to our courts of justice, except the expense and delay which attend the procuring of redress. Upon this subject I do not wish to make many observations. The expense I have always thought too heavy; but the objections arising to the system, from the expense and delay in procuring justice, are not exclusively applicable to these provinces.

31. Supposing it to be true, that these evils exist to a great degree, such evils should not be charged to the introduction of our system, as its most characteristic marks. Let not the present, be compared to a state of things never known here, when justice was cheap and expeditious, but with that state, which certainly did heretofore exist; viz. one, in which there was no justice at all, to be got; where the important, the sacred duty of redressing injuries, and punishing crimes, depended upon the tyranny and caprice of a revenue officer, who either entirely disregarded the duty, or by corruption and abuse, made it a source of profit.

32. It is indeed extraordinary, that it should with any one, ever become doubtful, whether the country actually derives benefit, from such a change as has taken place:

33. When, for rapacity and injustice, is substituted a system of mildness, humanity, liberality; in a word, of justice;—of justice, the acknowledged source of moral relations, the only solid basis of legitimate government.

34. Is it to no purpose that our government, at an immense expense, maintains its judicial establishments, that so large a portion of its servants is occupied in diligently and conscientiously enquiring into, and redressing, the wrongs of individuals.

35. The same people, heretofore accustomed to look for extortion and violence at the hands of their rulers, without appeal or hope of remedy, may now see public officers, the most respectable for rank and station, and connections, if accused of malversation, undergo a strict, impartial, open trial. When they see such things, I cannot but believe that they acknowledge the blessings conferred upon them, by their new rulers. They will not at least deny, that our intentions are good, and that we appear to be guided by principles of equity and justice, and to have their welfare at heart, more than their old rulers, had.

36. It is scarcely possible for an unprejudiced mind to doubt the superiority of our government, when firmly established, to the native governments. To do so, is to compare anarchy, oppression, and wretchedness, with justice, moderation, peace, and security.

37. I cannot help repeating, because I am convinced of the fact, and think it important that an impression almost universal prevails, of its being our policy and practice to destroy the independence of the zemindars; of those who had heretofore, power and address to maintain themselves. Hence our extreme unpopularity with these persons. They seem to forget, or value not, the advantages they derive from our system of justice and general security. They remember only the power which most of them, made a bad use of. To protect the ryots from violence and extortions, within, and from the depredations of hostile and barbarous enemies, without, gains us the good will of the weak and helpless only; of those whose voice is not heard, of those who have ever been led or driven by a master.

38. It is not possible that a system which tends to diminish the importance of the leading men of the country, and does in fact, encroach on their just, and long established privileges, can be introduced, without extreme dissatisfaction. That dissatisfaction, however, I do not mean to state, as universal among the zemindars. The weak, the moderate, and the peaceable, who were unable to maintain a degree of independence, under the old government, probably like the change.

39. The great advantage, and it cannot be over-rated, of government, is that of securing the country, from foreign incursion. Failing in that, every other benefit is comparatively slight, and indeed nugatory; for without security, no benefit can be enjoyed. It so happens that this object, has not been fully accomplished. The inhabitants of the upper parts of the Doab had not seen a foreign enemy, during many years. They cannot fail to remark, that shortly after becoming subject to our dominion, they have been invaded by the Marhattas; and ignorant as all are, of our political views and quarrels, and of those of our enemies, they probably conceive themselves, still exposed to danger.

40. I beg leave here to state a few circumstances regarding a trial which occurred at Minpoory. The case appears to me not wholly unconnected with the present subject. It may serve to illustrate some of my remarks on the state of the country.

41. Mr. Birch, a very decent respectable English gentleman, considerably advanced in years, had long been settled at Shekoabad, a town between Minpoory and Agra. He was a farmer of a considerable quantity of land, and had large concerns in trade. Under the old government he was effectually protected, and his affairs prospered. The government of the country being assumed by us, Mr. Birch's farm is taken from him immediately by the collector, because our laws allow no English settlers. Soon afterwards, a war breaks out between us and the Marhattas, and a body of predatory horse having crossed the Jumna and advanced to Shekoabad, Mr. Birch's house and property are plundered and burnt, either by the invaders, or our subjects, several of whom are said to have joined them.

42. Some of the inhabitants of the neighbourhood were, at the instance of Mr. Birch, apprehended and tried at the last sessions of Etawa, but acquitted. In spite of the acquittal, however, there is no doubt of the fact, that Mr. Birch's property was burnt and plundered. The evidence did not appear to the court sufficient to convict the persons accused, but it is certain that either they, or others, committed the crime, and that it was produced solely, by the incursion of our enemies the Marhattas.

43. This is not a fit place to set forth the hardship and losses suffered by Mr. Birch, with a view to his indemnification; nor is it my province to come forward and solicit justice or other liberality of government. But it will not, I hope, be deemed irregular in me to state my opinion, that his case, as far as it came under my notice, is a hard one; and that though the offenders have not been brought to punishment, there can be no doubt that he has suffered a great injury.

44. Mr. Birch, who attended during the whole of a long trial in the court of circuit, must feel heavily the trouble and delay of procuring justice under the new system, and the difficulty of proving, in our cutcherries, facts notorious elsewhere. Heretofore, when robbed or otherwise injured, the aumil allowed him to take the law into his own hands, which Mr. Birch stated to have answered his purpose at all times. He used to seize the culprits, or those whom he conceived to be the culprits, confine and punish them, and seldom failed to obtain restitution of his property.

45. Mr. Birch's case is, in some respects, similar to that of many a native zemindar who complains of our laws; they are deprived of some rights and privileges, and influence, which a few of them, may have exercised to good purpose. Some injuries may have been committed with impunity, under us, which would have been redressed, by the old system; but how many instances must occur, in which the innocent are, by our courts, protected from their prosecutors. The strong exclaim against laws, which enable the weak to contend against them.

46. A regulation has passed lately, and been promulgated, from which it appears to be the intention of government to proclaim martial law, and execute it, in all its rigour, on the

the first appearance of rebellion in our territories. I have already taken the liberty to suggest that some objections occur to me to the adoption of this measure, and I beg to be permitted here to introduce a few more observations on the same subject.

47. It is my opinion that the greatest caution ought to be observed by all officers, civil and military, in having recourse to arms for the suppression of tumults and disturbances raised by refractory chiefs. No case is likely to occur, in which delay and conciliation might not be attended with good effect. Whereas the resorting to violent measures is, itself, an evil of the greatest magnitude, producing immediate loss of lives and property, and confusion and distress, in every shape.

48. I would moreover submit, that some considerations arise in my mind, which lead me to think that the proclamation and exercise of martial law, according to the English mode, can seldom or never be advisable, even during the existence of open warfare, between our troops and our subjects.

49. There are, I believe, in different parts of our territories, zemindars, in some degree independant; that is to say, chiefs who have never been brought under complete obedience, and who being unused to control, would infallibly, if they possess the means, resist any force that could be sent against them. As our conquests extend, more of these persons, I conclude, become subject to us.

50. There are persons of this description residing in fortresses, or in hills and jungles, who, with their followers, can hardly be called subjects, though situated within our frontier. I should imagine, it will never be thought degrading or inconsistent with the honour of government, so far to yield to circumstances, as to conciliate the good will of these persons, and to avoid innovations and encroachments on their rights and long established usages.

51. I am particularly encouraged to hope that these principles, and this practice, will not be discountenanced; because on a former occasion, when I held the office of judge and magistrate of Midnapore, my conduct towards the inhabitants of the jungles was founded very much on these principles: experience has proved them to be just and politic, and government have not withheld, their approbation of them. Now there are, or have been, refractory zemindars in these provinces, who may be considered, in some respects similar to those inhabitants of the jungles. I fear the anxiety of government to introduce the Regulations among such people, may have given rise to much discontent and disorder.

52. It may be proper, with a view to point out how far the persons to whom I allude may really be considered rebels and traitors, to enter into some little detail of the state of the country.

53. The only efficient government, both under the Nabob vizier and under the Marhattas, did in fact, reside in the aumil, who, as long as he paid the revenue, was in no danger of being called to account for abuses.

54. In like manner, when the zemindar paid his revenue to the aumil, or to the tehsildar, with punctuality, he was not troubled with enquiries into the mode of collecting it, or into the general state of the police.

55. The aumil maintained order, not by means of courts of justice, which were scarcely known, but by a military force; and the zemindars, as already observed, were deemed loyal or disloyal, in proportion to their punctuality, in paying their revenue.

56. Many of the chiefs of these provinces, yielded a very imperfect obedience to the ruling power; that is to say, to the aumil. There were, I am told, refractory chiefs of several descriptions; but all of them had fortresses, or some military force, otherwise they would soon have been reduced to submission by the aumil. I may mention as instances, the zemindar of Tuttea, and, I believe, that of Saneer; the reduction of whose forts cost us so many valuable lives.

57. It would not be difficult, perhaps, for the magistrates or collectors, to procure lists and descriptions of these persons, if any still remain; and it seems to me, that without some information on these points, we must, in forming revenue and police arrangements, act very much at random. My information is very limited; but I have learnt, that although some of these chiefs might properly be styled robbers, others possessed hereditary and prescriptive rights of sovereignty within their estates; of this I am certain, that there were many, with whom the aumil had no alternative, but to tolerate their turbulent habits, or enter into a bloody and expensive contest with them: nor did it by any means, till our time, follow, that he who once drew the sword, and erected the standard of rebellion, was inevitably ruined. With more than one zemindar, Almas Ally Khan, after a doubtful contest, has been treated with as an equal, and come to a compromise of disputes.

58. If the chiefs were thus disobedient, and could scarcely be called subjects, it will easily be believed, that their ryots and dependants, invariably and necessarily followed their example; and this, I conceive, must still be so, for some time. The soldiers and domestics of the turbulent chief, who serve him for pay, will fight his battles, and will look up to him alone as their sovereign; since it is he alone, who affords them protection and subsistence.

59. Before we introduce new laws, I conceive, that we ought to look to the condition of the people. We should consider how far it may be consistent with humanity or policy, to apply the principles of the English law, in all its rigour, to a people, among whom the zeal and spirit of loyalty were never diffused or understood; whose ignorance of our laws and customs is complete; and whose acts never, in the slightest degree, endangered the existing government.

60. For that point, although not immediately in question, at present, I must maintain, whatever others may have thought on the subject of sedition or conspiracies, I am convinced the state was never in danger from internal disorders.

61. Had there existed any spark of a rebellious spirit, capable of injuring us, would it not probably have broken out in a flame, on the first appearance of a system, which materially affected every man of power, influence and consideration, throughout the country?

62. For such, I conceive, was the sudden and immediate effect of the change of government, that the chief persons, under the late governments, must look upon themselves as the victims of our acquisitions and conquests; yet how few rebel! how few are so infatuated! they know the force of our army, and that rebellion against us, must produce their speedy ruin. Our new subjects are transferred to our dominion, without the least trouble. Nobody enquires whether the change is agreeable to them, or not; those who have never been subject to any law, come suddenly, under all the laws we may judge it expedient to promulgate, few of which they will ever fully comprehend.

63. The cases of disaffected persons, except those of mere robbers are, generally speaking, I believe, somewhat of this nature. Some misunderstanding or quarrel arises on questions of revenue or police. The zemindar commits illegal acts, to which he has possibly been provoked by our officers. Complaints are made, and a warrant issues, according to the usual form of process. The chief, feeling himself insulted, or perhaps apprehending danger and indignity, resists, first the peon, and afterwards, the scapoyes sent against him.

64. He is then, having opposed lawful authority, though probably he is ignorant of its nature, considered as having forfeited his allegiance; and is termed a rebel and traitor. He is perhaps outlawed, a price set on his head, martial law proclaimed, and he and all his followers caught in arms, are liable to be punished with immediate death, by any military officer who happens to be sent against him, in command of a detachment. These measures do not appear to me to be necessary for the maintenance of the peace and good order of the country.

65. I beg leave to explain, that I am not here alluding to events, which have actually happened within my own official knowledge. I am not aware that the extreme case, has ever occurred; but I humbly apprehend, that it is liable to occur.

66. The case of a zemindar, forcibly opposing lawful authority, is however, one which frequently happens; and on that occasion, vigorous measures must be resorted to, always recollecting, that such cases are neither alarming to the government, nor indeed of any very great consequence to the permanent tranquillity of the district. But I would, to the last, make every allowance for the lower orders. I hardly know that I would, in any case, proceed against them, with a view to bring them to legal punishment. To put them to death, as rebels and traitors, I think manifestly useless, unjust, contrary to the custom of Hindostan, founded entirely on notions and rules brought from the other side of the globe, and totally inapplicable to this country. It cannot be necessary to point out, that the case of rebellion and treason in England, and in this country, must be entirely dissimilar.

67. We every day find our native subjects serving against us, as soldiers; but our officers have not thought proper to put in execution, against men found in this situation, the rules of English military law. For this forbearance, there are doubtless, good reasons: one reason is, I presume, that of our being aware, that the natives look upon their master, as their sovereign; and that no degree of severity could produce the certain effect, of detaching them from their chiefs.

68. Supposing, for a moment, what is, in my opinion, impossible, that the dependants of a rebellious chief, in a distant province, could have been well informed regarding the duties of allegiance to the ruling power, still it would remain to be ascertained, whether they possessed the means of deserting their chief, without probable destruction to themselves, or their families.

69. But it is evident that there are, or were lately, followers of chiefs, who had not yet learned to look up to us, for justice and protection. If we never interposed to defend them from the cruelty and rapacity of their chief; if they did not obtain from us, the means of security from oppression, or of the peaceful possession of their property, they could not, in fairness and equity, be held to owe us allegiance.

70. I am very far from wishing to justify resistance to the sovereign power, or its officers. It is not my intention to question the wisdom and equity of the acts of government, or to advance principles derogatory to the honour and dignity of the state, or disrespectful to its members. It is our business to support the established government.

71. I know, that our subjects are bound to a punctual and faithful obedience; and I believe, that it is the resolution of government, to act upon principles of moderation and humanity: which principles teach us, that the obligations of protection and obedience are reciprocal.

72. With respect to the followers of refractory chiefs; I think it may naturally be expected, from the very circumstance of their attachment, an abject submission to a bad master, that when a more just and liberal authority shall come to be substituted over them, they will be found tractable, orderly, and dutiful subjects. Having trespassed too long on the time of the Nizamut Adawlut, I here close this address.

I am, Sir,

Your most obedient humble servant,

To W. B. BAYLEY, Esq.

Register to the Nizamut Adawlut, Fort William.

Sir,

Para. 1. IN the Letter which I had the honour to address to the Nizamut Adawlut, under date the 5th February, I intimated that I had been preparing a Report on the Judicial arrangements in the Provinces, but was prevented from completing it, by want of leisure. Having since revised that portion of my observations which relate to the police, I now venture to submit it to the consideration of the court, and the right honourable the Governor General in council, and to beg that it may be considered, as the sequel of the address mentioned above.

2. I am the more encouraged to take this step, by finding that I am not singular in my sentiments; but that several gentlemen, whose talents and local experience entitle their opinions to the greatest weight, have countenanced my views on this part of the subject.

3. Mr. Crisp, the Chief Judge of the provincial Court of Appeal and Circuit for the division of Bareilly, I am informed, has deprecated the measure of confiding the police to darogahs. It would be superfluous to speak of the merits and services of this gentleman, which, I hear, are about to place him, in the court which I am addressing.

4. I derive particular gratification from feeling myself authorized to say, that my sentiments, in general, are also sanctioned by the concurrence of Messrs. Cox and Tucker, the members of the late commission for the Ceded and Conquered territory, who, by the extensive circuit they made over the country, have possessed peculiar advantages, in forming their judgment.

5. I need hardly mention that one of these gentlemen, Mr. Tucker, has likewise had long experience in the judicial department. I am persuaded that the zeal and ability with which he filled the important office of Judicial Secretary to the government, are not yet forgotten.

6. To the authority which I have already mentioned, I may also add, the recommendation lately made to government by the present board of commissioners; for suspending the new arrangements indefinitely, in the large district of Bundelcund. This recommendation cannot but throw doubt on the accuracy of the information which induced the government to introduce the arrangements in question, into that country; and the doubt, in this instance, must be allowed to afford presumption in favour of the opinion, that the same arrangements have been prematurely introduced, into the whole of the new territory.

7. The preceding considerations, I venture to flatter myself, may produce an effect which I certainly should not have been presumptuous enough to expect, from my own humble efforts; and the destruction of the tehsildarry system be at least suspended, till government have had time to weigh the additional information and arguments which have been, and may be submitted to them on the question.

8. Should that resolution be adopted, and the deliberations of government, end in the determination to give the system a further trial, means might, in my opinion, be without difficulty found, to bring the controul nearer, to guard against gross abuses in the patronage, and to prevent the powers confided to the tehsildars, being perverted to serious oppression.

9. In submitting the accompanying paper, I do not know whether I have any apologies to make for the freedom, with which I have discussed the topics to which it refers. I will only say on that head, that I have not intentionally violated the respect due to the authority which I have addressed. If, in my anxiety to state my reasoning forcibly, any expressions have escaped me which can bear a different construction, I am persuaded they will be candidly considered with a reference to this declaration.

I am, &c.

ALLAHABAD.

Para. 1. THE calendar and reports, submitted by the magistrate of this zillah, exhibit a very small number of crimes; so small, indeed, that it proves too much for the police, and compels suspicion that many offences are committed, which do not come to the knowledge of the magistrate. The contrary supposition would imply a degree of perfection, by no means credible.

2. On one point these papers afford matter for pleasing reflection. They do not show, a single case of gang-robbery:—All the private information which I have been able to procure, leads to the same conclusion; and it is indeed obvious, that gang-robbery will not admit of concealment. I am also told, that the observation is generally applicable to the Ceded Provinces.

3. This

3. This fact, compared with what happens in other parts of the Company's dominions, appears highly deserving of attention. We have but recently received these provinces from the hands of a prince, to whose internal government, we are accustomed to ascribe all that is reproachful; and they are free from gang-robbery. Bengal has now, for a long series of years, been subject to a system, which was the fruit of the deliberate wisdom of the British government; yet gang-robbery, in that province, is a scourge to the inhabitants.

4. Reasoning upon these singular circumstances, some of the judicial officers have been disposed to entertain the belief, that they must be connected with some peculiarity in our management. This inference must be allowed to be, at least plausible; and many reasons occur to me, in its favour.

5. According to every account which I have heard of the Nawab's government, its only object was the collection of money; all care of justice, civil or criminal, was utterly abandoned. To its efforts, therefore, I do not mean to ascribe this advantage enjoyed by its subjects. Its internal arrangements, and the principles of its management seemed, notwithstanding, favourable to the prevention of gang-robbery.

6. An amil, or naib amil, was stationed in each pergunnah, with a body of troops, which he could make use of, at his own discretion. This officer, whatever oppression he might be guilty of himself, had a sufficient interest in his pergunnah, to incite him to secure it from the ravages of banditti, and the celerity and promptness with which he could act, ensured success to his efforts.

7. But the principal circumstance which produced the effect, was, the authority maintained, in estates. These, were always kept in a few hands, to guard against the obvious difficulty of forming frequent settlements, and collecting the revenues from a multitude of persons. Then, while the landholder or farmer paid his revenue, little attention was paid by the government or its officers, to what passed within the estate. The power of these men was consequently great. It enabled them, to preserve order internally, among their dependants. It also enabled them, to call forth, at pleasure, the strength of their estates or farms, and it was their manifest interest to guard them, from external violence.

8. There were, indeed, circumstances which prevented the neighbouring villages from being liable to attack, from their respective inhabitants. The chief persons in them, are frequently united by the ties of common descent, or family alliance. This connexion preserved a good understanding between them, which their inferiors durst not violate. Even when no bond of this sort existed, a consciousness of mutual strength, and of the danger of retaliation, often produced the same observance. The powerful zemindars quarrelled and attacked one another; the petty zemindars had their boundary disputes and feuds; but robberies between village and village, were, I believe, and are to this day, almost unknown.

9. Of late years, the injustice and feebleness of the Oude government, had suffered the evils which I have mentioned in the preceding paragraphs, to reach a dreadful height. They are, however, very different in kind, from the disorders which exist in Bengal; and, I think, are far more easily remedied, by a wise and vigorous government. The strength of such a government, bears down all resistance, and the cure of open violence is simple and expeditious.

10. Here, we behold a society, which, for internal protection, was thrown in a great measure, upon its own resources; a greater contrast than is presented by the police administration of Bengal, can hardly be imagined. That system, if I may be allowed the expression, has no root in the native soil of the community. It is purely artificial, with so little adaptation to local peculiarities, that it would equally suit any country on the globe. British magistrates are placed over the districts. Each district is arbitrarily divided into square proportions of ten coss, and these subdivisions, are guarded by small establishments of peons, headed by native officers of our own creation, called police darogahs; in the selection of whom, no attention is required, to any local fitness. The magistrate, in his endeavours to protect the community, must place his sole reliance on these establishments. The arrangement is not interwoven with any institutions, that previously existed in the country; and it rigidly excludes the co-operation of all persons who possess any natural influence over the people.

11. In this last observation, I particularly refer to the landholders and other persons, having power and authority in landed estates. Nor is the exclusion of these persons from any direct share in the police; all their weight, if it had continued unimpaired, might still have had, indirectly and imperceptibly, a salutary effect in repressing disorders. But our system has also powerfully operated, to extirpate their influence. Much of the ancient proprietary has disappeared before the operation of selling estates for revenue balances, and has carried away with it, the authority attached in all countries, and in none more, than this, to birth and hereditary possession generally; the subdivision of landed property which it has been a great object of the system to promote, and the admission of numerous sharers to equal rights, have been in the highest degree unfavourable, to the consequence of the landholders.

12. This is the first point which I have chosen to select for comparison and discussion, as appearing to me, one principal cause of that weakness which is the chief feature of the system.

13. In maintaining this opinion, unless I greatly deceive myself, I may appeal to the general practice of almost all nations, originating, doubtless, in circumstances and feelings common to all mankind. The natural mode of managing men, is to employ the agency of those with whom they stand to them, they regard with sentiments of respect respect and confidence. Accordingly, all governments seem to have made the authority of these native leaders, the basis of their police; and any hired police establishment which they maintain, are not intended to supersede the native police, but to superintend, watch over, and aid its efforts.

14. To take an example, with which we are all familiar. In our own country, we all know what services the society contributes to its own protection. We know how much vigour is conferred on its police, by the support which it receives from native gentry, from the respectable landholders, from the corporations in towns, and from substantial persons of the middle class in the villages. We can form some conception of the mischief which must ensue, if that support should be withdrawn, and an attempt made to compensate it, by positive laws and artificial institutions.

15. It is not indeed necessary to travel beyond the territory of this government, in quest of examples to establish the principle. These limits, afford us some striking instances of the advantages which may be reaped, by attending to it, and the evils which arise, when it is neglected.

16. At an early period of the British administration, that tract of hilly country lying between Beerbhoom and Bhaugleporc was, in a state of extreme disorder. The inhabitants were in open arms against the government and its other subjects. A perpetual savage warfare was maintained by them, against the inhabitants of the plains, and they were proscribed and hunted down, like wild beasts; so that I have been informed by a gentleman who was at the time, collector of Beerbhoom, their heads were brought to him by basket loads. Such a state of things, must naturally have excited the attention of government, and have called forth all the ordinary means of prevention. Detachments were undoubtedly sent out; police establishments formed, revised and corrected; instructions issued, and reports called for; but all, without any effectual improvement, till some sagacious mind, saw that the only chance of managing the hill people, was, by the influence of the hill chiefs. They were accordingly negotiated with; their confidence acquired; their interests engaged to us, by stipends; the charge of their hills, confided to them; and that wild country has ever since, been one of the quietest portions of our dominions.

17. We have a more recent instance of the same policy, attended with the same success. Within the district of Midnapore, there existed a considerable extent of forest country, called the Jungle Mchauls; the inhabitants of these wilds, are little better than savages, and their only principle of obedience seems to be, their devotion to their native chiefs: without sufficient attention to their peculiar character, this people had been included in the general system of internal administration. The immediate authority over them, was given to police darogahs, and by the operation of selling estates for revenue balances, many of their zemindars had been dispossessed. The effects of this violence on the habits of the people, were felt by degrees. They sided with the discarded zemindars, contemned the authority of the police officers, and were frequently guilty of great disorders. The mischief, however, had excited no particular attention, and might long have escaped observation, when at last, some more than ordinary mismanagement drove them into open insurrection. Fortunately, at this critical juncture, Mr. Henry Strachey was selected to take charge of the district. His discernment and activity quickly discovered, and efficaciously applied, the proper remedy; many of the zemindars were brought back, and secured in their estates; their confidence was acquired, and their influence employed, to manage the inhabitants. The fruit of these judicious measures, was soon seen, in reviving tranquillity; and I have since heard of no serious disturbances.

18. These are the most proper cases for illustrating the principle; because the peculiar character of the society showed the effect of the system, in a manner that forced itself upon the attention. The symptoms were so strongly marked, that the disorder could not be mistaken. The people were so rude that they could be made to comprehend nothing but the authority of their chiefs; that, withdrawn, they immediately fell into confusion. In those parts of our dominions, where the inhabitants are more improved, the same cause will naturally operate with less violence, because partially counteracted, by milder manners and consequences, therefore, will be less distinctly observed. But to conclude for that reason, that it does not operate at all, would be a great error. In my judgment, it may be traced throughout the country, as one principal source of the disorders which prevail.

19. But the system of police darogahs requires to be examined, in another point of view: I have explained the importance of these officers: I have shown, that with the British magistrate, they constitute all of the police, which is not mere physical strength; all, which it possesses, of superintendence and authority. Are their the general circumstance of these men, their character, their qualifications, their estimation in the eyes of the people, such as to compensate to the police for its other deficiencies?

20. This question, I fear, must be answered in the negative; their office is not, on a liberal footing; their salary is trifling, being only 25 rupees per mensem; their duty is confined to the apprehension of criminals: from a necessity which arises out of their situation, they are often treated with rigour, and not unfrequently subjected to disgraceful punishments. After this account of the office, I need scarcely add, that it is not filled by men of education or respectability: the darogahs, in fact, possess generally little consideration with the people; and by their qualifications, are unequal to any, but the most ordinary functions of the police.

21. How great must be the tendency of such a system to weakness will, I think, be evident, on the slightest consideration. The inability of the magistrate, from the multiplicity of his business and the extent of his district, to control his officers, will aggravate the mischief; within a small circle round his station, the peace may be tolerably maintained, and the darogahs restrained from mal-practices; but as this distance increases, his power will be less and less felt, till, in the remote parts of the district, it will become almost nugatory, and the darogahs be, in a manner independent. Then, many of them, will inevitably yield to the temptations to which they will be exposed, by such a situation. They will not only neglect their duties, and oppress the people, but even be emboldened to collude with criminals, and the strength of the police, will be turned against itself.

22. This is so natural a result of the arrangement which I have been stating, that it might have been presumed, without the authority of experience. But it does not rest on speculation. From the preamble to Regulation III. 1805, I observe, that the existence of this evil has excited the attention of government.

23. With the subject which I have just concluded, is closely connected another source of the defects, in our internal management. I refer to the want of a due support and encouragement to ancient and respectable families, not being landholders: this cause is indeed equally connected with the topic of natural authority, for it is obvious, such families form a portion of the natural authority of every country.

24. When the British first acquired the dominion of these provinces, they found a considerable body of what might be called, native gentry. These persons, were principally either the officers of the old government, or, if not immediately in office, the descendants of ancestors who had acquired distinction and property, in the service of the state. Taken as a body, they were not deficient in the acquaintance with men and business, the knowledge and elevation of sentiment, which in a certain degree, seems always attached to the long possession of power and affluence.

25. To exclude these men from offices of trust and power, was a necessary effect of the British ascendancy; and from this exclusion, the decline and ruin of the majority of these families would soon follow, as a secondary consequence.

26. Completely to guard against this consequence, was obviously impracticable; but it would undoubtedly have admitted of great palliation. Without too much burthening our government, we might have reserved a considerable number of offices for natives, upon a liberal footing of confidence and emolument. These, would have been a resource to many of these families; would have maintained them, in a decent state of respect and competency; and have enabled them to give their children an education, which would have preserved them, from falling below the place which their parents had held in society.

27. But our government has not appeared to think this object worthy their attention. I have shown the nature of the offices assigned to natives, in the police department. The same principle, runs generally through all the arrangements for the Lower Provinces; as far as respects natives. It is a system of petty agency; it consequently offers no adequate encouragement to men of respectability. If therefore not the policy of the government, it has at least been the tendency of their internal measures, to hasten the extinction of this class of men. Accordingly, the greatest part of these families have sunk under neglect and poverty; and their descendants have become confounded with the mass of the people.

28. To me, it has been always a subject of deep regret, that this course should have been pursued. Since I have been at this place, I have had opportunities to judge of some of the last of the race; and the very able assistance which I have received from them, has given me a high sense of the advantages our administration might have derived, had means been taken to preserve the stock, and to make a proper use of their services.

29. The preceding observations refer to the general frame of our police, and to the persons in whose hands it is trusted. Other causes of inefficiency may be pointed out, in the distribution of the powers confided to those officers, and the regulations under which they act; causes honourable indeed to the government, and to the national character, as they originate in the mildness and humanity of our administration.

30. The native government, in its best times, was stern and severe, like all other despotic governments; more awake to the necessity of public order, than alive to the feelings of humanity. The state was, all; the subject, nothing. No anxious consideration for individuals restraining them from trusting their agents, with almost unlimited powers. Their officers were enabled to act, with celerity and effect. They held in their hands, all the means of prevention. As no scrupulous apprehensions of oppressing innocence, embarrassed their proceedings, they were tolerably secure of reaching the guilty; rapid executions impressing the imagination with terror, and connecting the ideas of the crime and the punishment, completed a system well adapted to overawe men's minds, and to maintain the public tranquillity.

31. Upon what opposite principles the British government acts, is well known. Their constant aim is to reconcile the support of public order, with a due attention to the honour, the lives, and the fortunes of individuals. Out of this tenderness, for the people, arises a jealous anxiety that the powers given for their protection, shall not be perverted to oppress them. Hence the authority of their officers is contracted, within narrow limits; hence numerous checks, multiplied formalities, and inevitable delays. The humane maxim, that the safety of the innocent is of far superior importance to the punishment of the guilty, being the corner stone of our criminal system, many offenders must escape, and their impunity will naturally operate to increase crimes.

32. Even in our own country, these beneficent and lenient principles are thought to render our police, weak, though supported by all the strength of society, by the intelligence and public public spirit of, perhaps, the most enlightened and public spirited nation of the globe. Can we then be surprized that the same maxims have been attended with great disorders, when introduced among a people whose habits have been formed, under despotism, who hardly possess the name of public principle, and who have been absolved, as I have observed, from the authority of their native leaders.

33. Such are the prominent reasons to which I ascribe the weakness of our police, and the disorders which prevail in the Lower Provinces. On subjects of this nature, however, unanimity of sentiment cannot be expected; and I am aware that my opinion will have to encounter respectable authority.

34. Gang-robbery, it is alledged, exists chiefly in Bengal; and is to be ascribed, not to any defects in our system, but to the local circumstances of the country, and the peculiar character of its inhabitants.

35. The first cause assigned is the nature of the country, in which labyrinths of forests and rivers afford refuge and shelter to banditti, offer favourable opportunities to attack passengers, and enable them to elude pursuit. This is certainly a very sufficient cause, as far as it goes; but it seems much too partial, to account for the general effect, since it cannot be denied that decoity prevails in several of the districts, the local circumstances of which, offer no such advantages.

36. The second and only other cause advanced, is of a nature to rob the unfortunate sufferers of all claim to sympathy, by casting the whole blame on themselves. The inhabitants of the other provinces, Behar for instance, it is said, owe their safety to the manliness of their character, which defies assault. The natives of Bengal are paying the natural penalties of cowardice. Their villages are fired, their property pillaged, their women ravished, and themselves tortured and assassinated, simply because they are poltroons.

37. This hypothesis, as it implies a sort of moral dispensation, is captivating; but I conceive, will not stand the test of deliberate examination. If indeed the decoits of Bengal, were always foreign invaders; or, though not foreigners, were (as sometimes happens) a peculiar class of men, reared in woods and deserts apart from the rest of mankind, and inured from youth to their savage occupation, it might be argued, speciously enough, that their success arose, from the pusillanimity of the people. But it is very well known, that in many of the districts, the banditti spring up from the very bosom of the community. In these cases, I must think the theory, plainly inadequate to the solution of the facts. For how can it be explained, that the selfsame people, who supply spirit for the assault, should be so miserably deficient, in resolution for the defence? Cowards, as they are represented, they might still, it should seem, take heart against their brother cowards. In truth, they do not appear to merit the imputation. They have often made, a very brave defence; and if the instances are not more numerous, it is not surprizing that their spirits have sunk, under the long pressure of so grievous a calamity. They who think so meanly of the Bengalese, surely forget, that, at an early period of our military history, they almost entirely formed several of our battalions, and distinguished themselves as brave and active soldiers.

38. In addition to those internal presumptions, there exists external evidence against the solidity of this account. Gang-robbery is certainly much less frequent in Behar, than in Bengal. But the explanation, which I am opposing, assumes, that it is hardly known in the former province. Now I beg leave to appeal, both to the actual state of the province, and to the records of the court of circuit, and Nizamut Adawlut, as affording abundant matter to disprove this notion. A very remarkable instance occurs to my recollection, which happened a few years back, in the district of Tirhoot. A party of banditti established themselves, and reigned, without controul, in the populous town of Hagypore, close to Patna, and not far distant from the magistrate's station; to such a pitch had their audacity, and the subjection of the people, arisen, that their chief, on the occasion of a marriage in his family, actually sat in state, and compelled the respectable inhabitants to attend, and offer him their congratulations. These men, were at length seized and brought to justice; their trial is to be found among the records of the Nizamut Adawlut, and may serve for a multitude of proofs, that whatever privilege the men of Behar possess, over their less fortunate neighbours of Bengal, cannot be ascribed to their personal qualities.

39. All parties however agree, that the same system has been attended with very different results, in the two provinces. There must, therefore, be some way of accounting for the difference; and as I reject the explanation commonly given, I may be expected to offer one, more satisfactory. But it is one thing to refute an erroneous account; and another, to give the true one. The arguments which I have urged, against the causes which have been assigned, will lose nothing of their validity, though I myself should be unable to point out more adequate causes. To the public officers, who have local experience, I must leave the task, of explaining the circumstances which have enabled Behar so much more successfully to resist the disorganizing principles which appear to me to have done the mischief in Bengal; only venturing to suggest, that the reason may be, perhaps, found in the different state of the landed property.

40. But even Behar, it is said, is running the same course with Bengal; the influence of all, who were respectable, dying away; the people fast dissolving into a dispersed, unconnected multitude, without any points of union, any sufficient power to embody them for self defence; the vicious and disorderly, encouraged by these advantages, forming combinations to prey on the rest of the community.

41. What may be thought of the weight of the preceding reasoning, I know not. A very few years back, I should have been afraid, in advancing the arguments which I have offered, offered, of exposing myself to the imputation of singularity. I have now the satisfaction to find, that some of my conclusions, at least, are sanctioned by the highest authority. The preamble to Regulation 12. 1807, declares, that the police establishments, in the provinces, those establishments on which we have relied for 16 years, are inefficient; and the intention of that regulation is, to strengthen the police, by engaging in its service, persons whose character and situation give them authority among the people.

42. How far, indeed, the means adopted, are likely to effect so desirable an end, is, I fear, very questionable. On the one side, I observe great sacrifices. On the other, no adequate inducements. Pecuniary indemnification the regulation does not promise generally; and in proportion as this resolution is deviated from, the plan will become costly. In addition to expense, the police aumeens will be called on for no inconsiderable sacrifices of time, ease; and, in many situations, where gang-robbery is formidable, of personal safety. But the responsibility, I imagine, will be the great objection the foudarry adawlut, and the court of circuit; things, the contrast of which, unless impelled by very powerful motives, it is the aim of every respectable native during life to avoid. On the other hand, what are the inducements? Public spirit, I think, will not be mentioned. And I see nothing else, but the temptation of being raised to the same level of dignity, with petty police officers; not quite that indeed, for the aumeens will be, to a certain degree, subordinate to the darogahs. The event, I sincerely hope, will be contrary to my expectation; but I think it impossible that many natives of character will be brought to accept the new office: some respectable men may, perhaps, undertake it, from deference to the wishes of government; but, in that case, they will take good care not to commit themselves, by an over officious zeal.

43. If I have been at all successful in explaining my sentiments, it will readily be collected, from what I have said, that I must entertain great doubts, on the expediency of the innovations which have lately taken place in these provinces. But, as connected with the immediate object of my consideration: the police, they present themselves to me, in a light peculiarly unfavourable.

44. The police in these provinces, before the late changes, rested upon the zemindars and tehsildars.

45. In a former part of this Report, speaking of the zemindars of the Ceded Provinces, I have attempted to explain the causes which operate to make the influence of these men, favourable to the tranquillity of the country at large. The same cause, to a certain degree, still exists in Benares, and ensures a very reasonable portion of security, to the fixed inhabitants; at the same time, it will be easily understood that this protection does not extend, to strangers, travellers, and passengers. We find, in fact, that these persons are the chief objects of crimes committed for the sake of lucre. There is no doubt that the zemindars are frequently the instigators; and even when that does not happen, it left to themselves, they regard with indifference, the sufferings of men who are without the pale of their domestic ties.

46. A state of things, however, which offers to our hand the security of the great body of fixed inhabitants, is an admirable basis upon which to build a police. All that was, in my judgment, required in addition, would have been to preserve that foundation, the zemindary system itself, from decay, and rapid changes; and next, by instituting a vigorous controul over the zemindars, to compel them to extend their protection to strangers.

47. The present zemindary proprietary is menaced with destruction, from various causes. The first and principal is, the minute division of estates by the Mahomedan and Hindoo laws of inheritance. The operation of this cause, is already so visible in the Benares province, that petty estates will be found with 50, 100, and even more co-sharers. It would be foreign from my present purpose to enlarge on the ruinous consequences of such a state of property, to the owners, the inconvenience from it, to the revenue, its effects, to overwhelm the courts of justice with a multiplicity of suits relative to scarcely tangible interests, or the injurious influence of the litigiousness which it unavoidably breeds, on the morals and happiness of the people. But it is evident, that in estates where such anarchy prevails, no persons can have sufficient weight to perform any service for the police.

48. As landed property in this province, was virtually a boon from the British government to the present possessors, they would gladly have received it, on any conditions which the public welfare made desirable: I cannot, therefore, but lament, that at the time the gift was conferred, the consequences I have stated were not foreseen and guarded against, by limiting the partibility of estates. Even now, the government, I think, should interfere, in its legislative capacity. The mode and extent of the interference are, indeed, questions of delicacy; but the interference itself, is plainly made necessary for the public welfare, and would be justified by that necessity. If the sacrifice of rights be objected, I answer, that I should propose to sacrifice no rights that were not mere shadows; unprofitably engrossing the attention of the wretched claimant; involving him, in unavailing litigation, and diverting his time and industry, from a more advantageous channel. Lawyers act without scruple on the maxim "de minimis non curat lex;" and I do not see why the same licence, may not be taken by the lawgiver.

49. As far as the revenue is concerned, government, I am aware, have applied a partial remedy by Regulation 6, 1807, which provides, that no share of a zemindary shall be separated, and erected into a distinct estate, unless it will bear a jumma of not less than 500 rupees. But this regulation does nothing to remedy the internal confusion to which the multiplicity of shares give occasion. The right to separation, however, is very important; and the shares to which it is denied, must lose much of their value by the measure. It therefore fore assumes the principle, that the interests of the zemindars, must give way to those of the public; and after going so far, there seems no good reason for not going as much further, as the same end may require.

50. If this great evil could be corrected, the principal remaining danger which menaces the proprietary, is an incapable or unfaithful administration of the revenue. Whenever this cause unhappily exists, and oppressive exactions are added to the heavy demands of government, many of the zemindars necessarily sink under the burden, and lose their estates, for public sale.

51. It is also obvious, that the pecuniary embarrassments which these causes create, will often terminate in private alienations, or in what amounts to the same thing, judicial sales. Abstracted from them, private alienations, I imagine, would not be numerous; the people clinging to their estates, with tenacious fondness. Various accidental events, indeed, must be expected occasionally to involve the proprietors in pecuniary distress; but there seemed no reason to apprehend, from the operation of these causes, any such rapid changes, as would seriously have affected the zemindary police agency.

52. The necessity of putting bounds to this discussion, restrains me from entering into the specific remedies which I should have suggested for the mischiefs, actual and possible, which I have enumerated; I must therefore assume that proper means would have been adopted, to keep up some authority in estates, and the body of proprietors guarded, against violent change. The next object would have been to compel, the proprietors to render faithful services to the police, not only by protecting their dependents, and abstaining from injuring their neighbours, but by watching over the safety of the traveller and stranger.

53. To state all the measures I should have proposed with this view, would lead me into too much detail. The controul is the great point; and for that, I should have despaired of making any more effectual provision than existed in the superintendence of the old tehsildars. From the liberal footing on which these officers were placed, they derived weight and authority with the people; their revenue transactions with the zemindars, gave them a strong hold on that class of men, made them intimately acquainted with their characters and conduct, and put in their power opportunities, peculiarly favourable, of acquiring the local information essential to good police. How comparatively destitute the new darogahs must be of all these advantages, it would be waste of time to demonstrate.

54. But if the union of police and revenue powers was favourable to the strength of the police, as far as the tehsildars were concerned, I must acknowledge that in another important point, the controul of the magistrate, it was liable to objection. The revenue is of such primary consequence, that any objects that come in competition with it, will necessarily give way. On this ground, probably, the nomination of the tehsildars was, in the collector, who, on the same principle, if he had secured the revenue by his choice, would be apt to think that he had done enough. Then the two duties would occasionally clash; and the police of course, suffer in the conflict. Often too, the duty of the revenue would be made a plausible plea to the magistrate, for neglect and inattention to the other duty. He would thus frequently find himself without any person to send him regular information, and duly execute his orders.

55. A situation in which the magistrates made so little figure, would naturally disgust many of them with the system, and dispose them to undervalue the good it contained, which indeed lay somewhat deep, while the evil was on the surface. Zealous men of business inclined to over-rate the advantages of order and precision, and the formalities and machinery of office, would be peculiarly impatient, at the obstructions and irregularities which they experienced.

56. An obvious and effectual mode of surmounting the difficulty, and of powerfully strengthening the magistrate's arm, would be to place the tehsildars under his sole authority, by giving him the collection of the revenue; such an arrangement would indeed be inconsistent with what is deemed, a fundamental maxim of our code, that judicial and revenue functions shall not be united. How far this principle ought rigorously and invariably to be observed, in all situations, and under all circumstances, is a very serious, and in my judgment, by no means, a clear question; but without proposing what might perhaps be generally thought so violent a cure, the inconvenience did not strike me in so formidable a light, that it would have induced me to change the tehsildars to maintain a regular establishment sure recently adopted, which compelled the tehsildars to be approved by the magistrate, went far for the sole purpose of police, with a darogah to be approved by the magistrate, and to secure to remedy one part of the inconvenience. To remedy the other defect, and to secure some attention to police, in the appointment of tehsildars, the judicial officers should have been allowed, some voice in their selection; their nomination, for instance, might have passed through the Court of Appeal and Circuit; and here I may be permitted to observe incidentally, that the proper choice of a tehsildar would almost always have secured, a good police darogah.

57. But the new arrangements have struck at the root of all such views. They have totally changed the condition of the tehsildars and zemindars, and trust to police darogahs, as the main support of the police.

Here, perhaps, I shall be reminded that the new system continues the responsibility of the zemindars. I see indeed that it is so declared; but I do not perceive that any means have been adopted, to effectuate this intention.

58. The original Regulations for Benares were framed by a gentleman who had a long and intimate knowledge of the province. Both his rules, and the traces of his sentiments left left on them, show us his opinion, on these subjects. He could not fail to perceive, that the good order of the province mainly depended, on guarding against violent changes in the body of the landed proprietors. He was also aware, that the ignorance of the zemindars; their improvidence and turbulent character, would long require their subjection to a vigorous controul, equally with a view to their own welfare, and the interest of the public. Accordingly, he placed them generally, under the authority of the tehsildars. At the same time, he held out to them, the prospect of independence, from this restraint; but not, as a gratuitous gift. He instituted a test for determining the fitness of those who might claim the privilege, which made it, in some sort, the reward of prudence and good conduct; and by that very precaution, he took care that emancipation, should be a gradual process. Before a zemindar could be made huzzoory, he exacted security from him, for the punctual payment of this revenue, and the faithful discharge of his police duties. Those who could not give this pledge that their liberty would not be abused, to their own and the public detriment, Mr. Duncan thought, ought to be left, under guardianship. As this scheme was well suited to the habits and condition of the zemindars, so it was also calculated to restrain the zemindars from oppression. Any severity on their part would naturally prompt the zemindars to struggle to release themselves from a controul, under which, if well treated, they would be contented to remain: and every instance of emancipation operated on the tehsildar, as a diminution both of his profits and his consequence. As an encouragement to zemindars who might raise their views to independence, and to assist them in providing the required securities, Mr. Duncan allowed them a moiety of the tehsildars per-centage on their revenue, which was taken from the tehsildar.

59. In the late arrangements, the policy dictated by Mr. Duncan's plan, has been wholly abandoned. The zemindars have been stimulated to claim their independence, but the pecuniary allowance annexed to it, has been withdrawn; and, as a kind of indemnification, they have been exonerated from the securities which were originally made the condition of the privilege. The regulation which introduces this measure, observes, that, for the revenue, the estate is sufficient security; which is tantamount to a declaration, that, provided the rent be paid, who may be zemindar, is considered a matter of indifference. On the security, with relation to good conduct, the regulation proceeds to remark, that the zemindars are of course amenable to the laws: now that consideration, I beg permission to remark, could not have escaped Mr. Duncan. Let me solicit justice to that gentleman's views. The letter and the spirit of his rules evidently show that the personal deportment of the zemindar was not the intention of the security, but his conduct as a police officer; and for that object I think he must be allowed to have judged rightly, that somewhat more was requisite than a responsibility common to him, with every individual of the community.

60. From these observations I have purposely excluded all mention of the pecuniary liability of zemindars for thefts and robbers. It is universally acknowledged to be a dead letter.

61. But I may be thought guilty of a more important omission, should I neglect to notice that the new system also includes the tehsildar, who is to act as a police aumeen, and possesses, concurrent authority with the darogah. I must confess, however, that I augur no good, from this co-operation. To place officers, almost independent of each other, to perform active duties of the same nature, within the same limits, is, in my humble opinion, a contrivance ill suited to the native character. I perceive no rule by which the darogah and the aumeen are to adjust the balance of their respective powers; and I see much reason to apprehend that they will either unite in a collusive agreement, or by their contention, when those motives may not influence them, harass the people, and impede the public service.

62. I must at the same time, observe, that this arrangement, whatever may be its merits or defects otherwise, is liable to an objection, much urged by many who were adverse to the old system. It unites police and revenue powers, in the same hands. It may, indeed, be observed, that the police is not to be confided to the tehsildars indiscriminately, but to those alone, whose superior character and good qualities will warrant the trust; still, as I am happy to perceive, enough is done, in spite of the qualification to explode the maxim, that the union of these two ingredients of revenue and police must necessarily form a deadly compound. But I venture to say further on this point, that no man ought to be appointed a tehsildar, who is not fit to be trusted with the power of a police darogah. A discreet collector, in chusing his tehsildars, would never have lost sight of this principle; and when any collector did, the authority placed to superintend him, ought to have corrected his error. Now, if the power of government was adequate to compel such a selection, it might have been applied to the tehsildars of the old system; and then, as far as respected police, there would have been no urgent need of change. If, on the other hand, all the power of government was inadequate to that object, where is the security for a better choice of police darogahs? in the magistrate's sense of duty?—And are magistrates, more than collectors, invariably governed by a sense of duty. Are they so much easier to be controuled?

63. But the tehsildars, to whom the functions of police are now to be trusted, it may also be said, are very different from the old tehsildars. They will be reduced in authority, in consequence, in emolument. They will thus be disinclined of the power to do harm: and what, in my turn, I must be permitted to ask, will become of their power or inclination to do good? Will they escape, unimpaired from the process? I have always been taught to think, that in reasonable degrees, and under proper limitations, distinction, authority and affluence, are some of the most powerful instruments of good, and afford some of the strongest excitements to upright conduct.

64. To the British European officers, this reasoning has been wisely and liberally applied. They have been placed, in circumstances so advantageous, that prudence and virtue unite to secure them from the influence of base and sordid motives. Are the natives of Hindostan a different order of beings, that they are to be stinted into honesty, and degraded into principle?

65. And this consideration, leads me to the abolition of the former tehsildary system, to which, in fact, these police arrangements are subordinate. Simply, with a view to the police, the new arrangements I presume, would never have been adopted. Discarding theories on either side, and judging by the solid test of experience, the Benares police was the more effectual to its end, than the police of the provinces below. To say all in one word, we had hardly any decoity, and the little which did take place, happened principally on the Nawaub's frontier. Accordingly, the Nizamut Adawlut, in their letter to the Vice-President in Council, dated the 27th December 1805, speaking of the proposed change, do not seem to expect that it will be attended, with any positive advantages to the police; all they say of the Bengal police, is, that it does not increase crimes, and all they promise themselves, from its introduction into Benares, is, that it will not be attended with ill consequences.

66. Now it is obvious the Nizamut Adawlut and the government would never have acted, on such negative views. We must therefore look for some ulterior motives, in the innovation; and this undoubtedly was the resolution to abolish the old tehsildary system. The former police, rested on the system, and was involved, in its fall.

67. They who regret the loss of the police, and think as I do, that the change is likely to be followed by many evils, must endeavour to find their consolation, in the general benefits of the measure to which it has been sacrificed. But this is a consolation which I cannot reap; I thinking the principal measure, open to a still more powerful objection than those which I have made, to the accessory one; and notwithstanding the discredit into which the tehsildary system has fallen, professing myself to be its friend and advocate.

68. The motives which led government to this great measure, and think as I do, that the change is likely to be followed by many evils, must endeavour to find their consolation, in the general benefits of the measure to which it has been sacrificed. But this is a consolation which I cannot reap; I thinking the principal measure, open to a still more powerful objection than those which I have made, to the accessory one; and notwithstanding the discredit into which the tehsildary system has fallen, professing myself to be its friend and advocate.

69. No where perhaps has the argument from the abuse against the use, led to so many errors, as in this country; yet nobody I trust, carries this reasoning so far as to maintain, that every system must be destroyed, which is not free from abuse. Proceeding with that rigour, none of the institutions of government of the Lower provinces; and in all the provinces, I am sure, that if gross abuses could be a reason for the downfall of the present judicial establishments, they would not stand another hour.

70. To justify the overthrow of institutions which have long existed, and have tolerably answered the purposes of their institution, a general vague charge of abuse, is not enough. It seems reasonable to require that the abuses, should be accurately stated; that it should be seen, whether they are inherent in the accused system, or merely accidental and casual; whether they do not admit of palliation and amendment; what may be the good, by which they are compensated; finally, and above all, what is to come in place of the system proposed to be abolished?—A sober dispassionate discussion of the Benares tehsildary system, upon these principles, I have yet to see. Meantime, without pretending to deny that the system, like all human systems, carried within it the seeds of evil, I could perceive that many of the alleged abuses were accidental, others, gross deviations from the system; that those most clearly connected with it, admitted of palliations; that on the whole, the good predominated; and, lastly, that there exists no security against greater evils in the system, which is to come in its place.

71. On the points stated in the preceding paragraph, I propose to make some observations. I must, however, previously notice the disadvantage which I lie under, in this part of the discussion. Had the Benares tehsildary system been extended, like the arrangements in the provinces below, over a great tract of country, divided among a number of officers, all reference to individual character would have been superfluous; because in that case, the great number of officers, would have afforded room for a balance and compensation of their different personal qualities. But the Benares province, in which alone the police tehsildary system has been tried for any length of time, it must be remembered, has constituted one single office, and has been, in very few hands. To form therefore a fair estimate of the abuses which have existed, reference must be had to the character of individuals; and delicacy and propriety forbid my entering upon such an examination; what weight is to be allowed to this consideration in the argument, I must leave in silence to the prudence of the Nizamut Adawlut and the government.

72. This same circumstance, the whole province being committed to the charge of one individual, may however be mentioned as one source of abuse, not having any natural connexion with the tehsildary system. To show the magnitude of the trust, it is enough to say, that the collection amounts to half a million sterling. This, upon general principles, was a greater temptation than it was prudent to offer, to any individual. But this is not the only, nor the chief point of view, in which this fact deserves to be considered. They who are at all acquainted with the native character, can judge of the difficulty which the collector of so great a district must find, in restraining his native agents from abuses. I am persuaded persuaded that no union of intelligence, activity and integrity, would prevent numerous abuses, in such a situation. What must happen, when there is a failure of any of these qualities, may easily be conceived.

73. Another cause is, the distance and consequent weakness of the controuling power. If government are unable to prevent abuse, in the districts below, and almost under their own eyes; greater abuses must have been expected a fortiori, at this distance, even if the system had been the same. In appreciating the abuses charged against the system, great allowance is evidently due to this most important consideration.

74. But I must acknowledge that some abuses have been alledged, which I cannot account for, by any of the causes which I have mentioned. It has been said, that almost all the tehsildaries in the province, have been monopolized by two or three opulent individuals. If this took place, as I fear to a great degree cannot be denied, it was certainly a great evil, and a most gross deviation from the whole principle and spirit of the system. But I cannot concede that it proves the tehsildary system itself, to be a bad one; my sole inference from it, would have been, that government should have exerted its wisdom, to effect a more vigorous controul.

75. How indeed, so glaring an abuse should have so long escaped the vigilance and correction of the board of revenue, and the government, it is not easy to understand. I can only explain the fact, by a circumstance which I have before adverted to; the disposition to consider the tehsildars' office merely as connected with the revenue, without sufficient reference to it, as a police trust, much less, as a fund for respectable men. The circumstances which have happened to a very respectable tehsildar in this province, are so well calculated to support this conjecture, that I cannot forbear giving a short history of his case.

76. This person's name is Akbarally Khan, nephew to the historian Ghollaum Hossain, and tehsildar of Sheopore, one of the smallest pergunnahs in the province. His pergunnah adjoins the city; and on the occasion of Vizier Ally's insurrection, he conducted himself in a manner that gave the highest satisfaction to Mr. Davis, the magistrate. That gentleman, in consequence, warmly recommended him to government; and suggested, that he should be promoted, on the first vacancy, to a larger pergunnah. The government fully concurred in Mr. Davis's sentiments on the merit of Akbar Ally Khan, and directed Mr. Davis to give him a public written testimonial of their sense of his services. But they did not think proper to adopt Mr. Davis's recommendation, that they would order him to be promoted; observing that, by the Regulations, the appointment of tehsildars was vested in the collectors.

77. Many years had elapsed from this event, when the strong representations made by Mr. Deane, then magistrate of Juanpore, on the abuses in the patronage of the tehsildary office, and the fatal consequences of it, to the police of his district, forced the subject upon the attention of government.

78. Mr. Deane had represented that many of the pergunnahs were held in the names of the servants and dependants of one person, who was in fact the tehsildar, and enjoyed all the authority and emoluments of the station. Instructions were in consequence, transmitted to the collectors and the magistrates, to ascertain and report the real holders of the tehsildaries. Their answer showed that Mr. Deane's complaint was too well founded; and strict orders were accordingly issued to correct the abuse.

79. But among the persons who had thus irregularly ingrossed many of the tehsildaries, was Rajah Odinarain, the Rajah of Benares; and the peculiar claims this person possesses to the indulgence and consideration of government, induced them to exempt him from their general orders, and to direct that his pergunnahs should not be taken from him, but allowed to drop in; at the same time, it was explained, that the Rajah was not to be permitted to continue this system.

80. A few months after these orders had been issued, a person named Deharam, one of the Rajah's dependants, who had been appointed to the large pergunnah of Mohomedabad, died; Mr. Morrieson was at that time acting as collector. As register to the city court, he was well acquainted with the character of Akbar Ally, and thought this, a proper opportunity to do justice to his merits. Mr. Morrieson accordingly recommended him to the board of revenue for the vacant situation; stating his claims, and acquainting the board, that, notwithstanding the honourable testimonial which he possessed of his services, he had during so many years, remained unrewarded, and in the smallest pergunnah of the province. Mr. Morrieson might have added the collector's opinion of Akbar Ally's character, contained in his report to the board of revenue on the tehsildars, dated 20th October 1804. I transcribe it verbatim. "Syed Akbar Ally Khan, who is the tehsildar of the pergunnah Havelly Sheopore, which yields a jumma of R^s 35,991. 12 A^s per annum, is a very able and respectable man; is punctual, in the discharge of his tehsildary; is perfectly correct, in the duties of his office; always resides in his pergunnah, and is fully competent for the trust he holds."

81. The board of revenue were pleased to adopt Mr. Morrieson's recommendation, and Akbar Ally was accordingly appointed; and the orders of the board containing his appointment, dispatched to Benares. Before they had arrived however, Mr. Morrieson had resigned the charge; subsequently, the Rajah preferred a petition, which was forwarded to the board of revenue, stating, that not having been able to dispense with the attendance of Deharam near his person, another of his dependants, by name Sheolol Chobey, had been some time in charge of the pergunnah; and praying that this man might be appointed tehsildar. His representation was successful; and Akbar Ally's appointment was cancelled.

82. In communicating these new orders, the board were pleased to direct that attention should be paid to Akbar Ally's merits, on some future occasion. But after what he had experienced, this mark of the board's attention could have afforded him very slender consolation. In fact, he continues to this hour, tehsildar of the petty pergunnah of Sheopore.

83. Will it however be urged, that the abuses I have stated as extensive, are an evil inherent in the system; since they prove that the temptation to abuse was so powerful, that it baffled all controul. This objection I have already partially anticipated, by observing, that the whole province, need not have been given to one man. If the objection be applied to the tehsildary system, under any distribution of the province, I must observe, that it proves too much: for in that case, let the real meaning of this argument be considered, it amounts to this; that generally speaking, the government have so little confidence in their servants, and are so little able to controul them, that they cannot venture to have any offices for natives, on a liberal footing, lest they should become venal. But, in this view of the case, I do not see how any arrangement is to cure the evil: after all, we must have native agents, and we must trust them with power, which, upon the very facts assumed by the objection, will be perverted to the purposes of exactions. The new office, therefore, however humble in appearance, will bear a value proportioned to the facility of abuse. There will always be unprincipled men, determined to take illicit advantages, and indifferent about the means. There will always be weak men, who will allow the officers about them, to convert their patronage into profit. There will be thus, as much corruption, under the new, as under the old system; with this difference, that this new corruption, will be more sordid and disgraceful, and its consequences, more pernicious. What has taken place of late years, in the provinces below, where business, as I have before observed, is chiefly conducted by petty native agents, would, I fear, afford sufficient evidence that these observations, are not mere theory.

84. The tehsildary office was so respectable and so liberally rewarded, that it by no means followed, because a person paid a consideration for it, he looked to illegal profits: but admitting that, in many cases, those who purchased, would indemnify themselves in that way, their station and their advantages, upon the ordinary principles of human nature, were a sort of security that they would observe a certain moderation and decency, in their misconduct. In the case of petty officers, there is no such restraint; they have nothing at stake but a bare subsistence; they are exposed to great temptation; and if they once give way to it, the fear of detection will only stimulate their rapacity. They will descend to the vilest exactions, and their gains will often be wrung, from the poorest and most helpless of the community. It would be curious to know how much is annually levied by police darogahs, commissioners of petty causes, commissioners of distraint, and the various retainers to the courts; much more, I am persuaded, than government are at all aware. The corruption of a collector, and the oppressions of tehsildars, make a noise, and excite scandal; petty officers fleece the people rupee by rupee, and little attention is attracted: the items are trifling, and we are apt to forget that the total amount, may be enormous.

85. In making these remarks, I am not afraid that I shall be suspected of any sympathy for the abuses attached to the system, which I have been defending. Sensibility shrinks from the name of corruption; the indignation that would sweep away, without further question, every system in which it lurks, may be amiable; but to perform solid service, public men must look at these things, odious as they are, with cooler feelings.

86. The abuses which I have hitherto mentioned, were, in a great measure, foreign to the tehsildary system: but the oppression of the tehsildars themselves, has been much insisted on. In forming a judgment on this point, it is proper to take into consideration the accidental causes which I have mentioned, particularly the great extent of country placed under one collector, and the distance of the controul: after allowing for the operation of those causes, I see no reason why the tehsildars should have had power to practise greater abuses than the other native officers attached to the revenue and judicial departments. One of the abuses alleged against the tehsildars however, on account of its magnitude, deserves to be specially noticed. They have been charged with contriving to defraud the zemindars, of their estates: a notion of this sort, undoubtedly prevails; but I have not been able to ascertain with any precision, the extent of the alleged grievance, or the means by which the fraud was supposed to be accomplished. If, indeed, such things have commonly happened, since the province was settled, and the revenue of the zemindars fixed in perpetuity, it is a fact pregnant with very melancholy inferences. The tehsildars were a receiver of revenue, and an officer of police; and in both characters, had very limited powers. The board of revenue, by the trouble by the collector; the collector, by the board of revenue; the judge, by the government; then, to check the executive officers, came the judicial authorities, the high court of the district, the provincial court of appeal and circuit; and last, the high court of the sudder dewanny and nizamat. Are we to believe that the result of this costly and elaborate organization was, that persons, in the situation of revenue receivers and police agents, could not be prevented from defrauding people of their estates?—They who credit this conclusion, ought not to be very sanguine about the effects of any new arrangement.

87. A jealousy has been entertained by some gentlemen, of the tehsildars keeping the people, at a distance from the British officers. This effect must have happened, in two ways; either from the dread of their power, or from the influence of their character. On the first head, I must repeat what I have already hinted, that if government cannot devise an effectual controul over officers in the circumstances of the tehsildars, there can be no rational hope of improvement from any new system. The cause is desperate. I must weight which the tehsildars might possess, by their character and respectability, I must contend contend, that though, like every thing human, it was liable to abuse, that influence on the whole, was beneficial and salutary; no country in the world, as I have repeatedly observed, can be well governed, without this natural authority; and if the people are disposed to depend on it, too servilely, the evil can only be effectually cured, by ameliorating the general condition of the society. Now this, in my humble judgment, cannot be a hasty operation, nor be accomplished by rules formed, on abstract reasoning; however benevolent, in the intention. To improve the general condition of the people, we must secure some hold, on them; our plans must be built, on the existing basis of their ancient institutions, and adapted to their habits and manners; and we must engage in the execution of them, those whom they can understand, and to whom they will look up, with confidence and respect. By degrees, proportioned to the capacity and uprightness of the British officers, what might appear too harsh, in the authority of these native leaders, and unreasonable and injurious, in the customs of the country, would be mitigated, and the people led to know, and to assert their rights. If we attempt to reverse this order; if we begin, by destroying all that is known and respected, we shall inevitably introduce a thousand more evils, than we correct: society will be thrown into anarchy, and all our efforts wasted, in a vain contest with its vices and disorders.

88. Petty officers, it is thought, will not over-awe the people; will not prevent their reaching the British officers, with their grievances. Granted that it may be so, at first, what will be the conclusion? The people, unfortunately, will not only, not fear, but they will despise such officers; they will be discontented, with all they do, right or wrong. Feeling themselves emancipated from all restraint, a spirit of litigiousness will go forth, among them, and vent itself in complaints, till the channels of justice become choked. Then, by the sure course of things, one extreme will terminate, in the other. Redress will be impracticable. The officers will perceive their strength; they who complain against officers will become rare; and the people will be subjected to the odious harassing oppression, of a multitude of petty tyrants.

89. And is it not at length, time to consider what may be the influence of these principles, on the character and morals of the community. As we proceed, these provinces will soon present the singular spectacle of a great empire, the government of which, rigidly excludes its subjects from every object of fair ambition, which, in the pursuit, could stimulate men to cultivate their faculties, or, in the possession, enlarge their understandings and elevate their minds. The natives may accumulate wealth, as merchants; they may be proprietors of land; but these occupations, as they are managed in this country, have no great tendency to raise the character. Beyond them, with the rarest exceptions, there is nothing to which the people can aspire, higher than the command of a platoon of seapoys, or the possession of some petty civil office, insignificant in its functions, and paid with a salary, hardly adequate to a bare subsistence. My speculations may have perhaps misled me, but I am persuaded that very unfavourable effects from these causes, may already be traced, in the habits of our native subjects; and their long continuance, must, I think, infallibly end, in reducing the whole population to one ignorant, grovelling, litigious, and profligate herd.

90. But I may be charged with exaggerating the consequences, of the late arrangement; I may be reminded, that the tehsildary office has not been abolished; and that tehsildars will still be maintained, on a liberal footing. I must be permitted to answer, that my experience of the past, gives me no confidence in such assurances. Should such declarations be made by government, it would be superfluous to profess my implicit reliance on them. I am convinced that they would be perfectly sincere, at the time. But new necessities will arise; motives for economy will again press; the roll of establishments will undergo future revisions; no reasons will occur, why the tehsildars may not perform their duties, on less salaries; and at length perhaps, the abolition of the office may be resolved on;—even now, rumours are abroad, that these officers are to be altogether discontinued in Behar. The per-centage allowed to the tehsildars, in this and the Upper Provinces, was a fixed fund, which I had hoped would have been kept sacred, for the encouragement and support of respectable natives. Now, that its integrity has been violated, it will soon melt away. The salaries proposed to be substituted, will gradually dwindle, by retrenchments; and the abolition of the office itself, will probably not be long postponed;—then, after the lapse of a few years, a native of education and character, will be a phenomenon; and if afterwards, this consequence should be regretted, that which might easily have been prevented, will never be retrieved.

91. The economy of the measure, is yet to be touched on; a motive of government, which I can never think, much less speak of, but with respect; yet I take the liberty of observing that economy has no connection, with the merits or defects of the different systems under examination. If improvements can be made in the interior management of the country, and a saving accrue to government, at the same time, that, would be a fortunate secondary result of the new measures, but ought not to be regarded, as the motive. On the other hand, if an imperious state necessity, enforce the adoption of a worse, but cheaper system, let that, be understood as the ground of the measure, and whatever regret may prevail, all objections must cease. But when these considerations are suffered to mingle, there will always be danger that the merits of the opposing plans, will not be steadily weighed, and that economy, which ever side it may embrace, will have too powerful a voice, in silencing scruples and overruling difficulties.

92. Waving this reasoning however, and examining the new arrangements, by the test of economy, I am of opinion that its expediency is by no means, clearly ascertained. There may may indeed, be a considerable immediate saving; but to say nothing of possible loss of revenue by the change, the establishments below, are very costly, and seem to have a constant tendency to increase. I have already observed, that the police establishments have been declared inefficient. I now observe, from the report of the Nizamut Adawlut to government, on the police establishments of this province, dated the 18th of December 1807, that they have a plan in contemplation for strengthening the police, by stationing armed peons throughout the country, in every town or considerable village. I think I am within bounds when I say, that the execution of this plan, will double the present charge on account of police. The judicial contingencies below, in the articles of jails, gauds, cost of banishment and transportation, rewards for the apprehension of criminals, diet of prisoners and witnesses, are already very heavy; and as there seems reason to dread that crimes, and decoity in particular, are increasing, may be expected to augment daily. Should there be any weight in the arguments which I have presumed to advance, the system will by degrees, be attended with the same effects in the Upper Provinces, the first saving will insensibly be absorbed, in these charges; and there will be superadded an expenditure, still more to be deplored, of the blood and happiness of the people.

93. I have already exceeded all ordinary bounds; and there yet remains a topic, so important in itself, and so closely connected with all my former reasoning, that I cannot pass it over in silence, though my observations on it, must necessarily be very brief.

94. Within a few years back, by cessions and conquest, the territory under the immediate superintendence of the government general, has been doubled, for I believe I may say double, without any exaggeration. The plan adopted for the management of these extensive acquisitions, has been to appoint a temporary commission for the settlement of them, which on executing its task, is to be withdrawn; and afterwards, the whole detail of revenue, justice and police, is to be placed under the cognizance of the boards and great officers, at the presidency of Fort William, who already exercised the superintendence of these objects, in the old territory. With great submission, I take the liberty of expressing my firm conviction, that this system is defective, in the very important point of controul, and consequently, that it will be found inadequate to maintain the internal peace, justice, and good order of these remote possessions.

95. The superintendence of revenue details, and of the appointment of the native revenue officers, is vested in the board of revenue. The superintendence of the judicial and police establishments is the duty of the court, called the Sudder Dewanny and Nizamut Adawlut. The superintending powers of the provincial court of appeal and circuit are too insignificant to be taken into the account.

96. In the course of this report, I have had occasion to notice strong symptoms of inefficiency, in the controul of the board of revenue and government, over the revenue affairs, even of this province. After this experience, what can reasonably be expected of the same controuling powers from the province upwards, in Bundelcund, the Doab, and Rohilcund, to Banda, Saharunpore, and Moradabad. The same reasoning may be extended, with equal, perhaps superior force, to the superintendence of the court of Sudder Dewanny and Nizamut Adawlut, in proportion as its duties are more extensive, arduous and important, and exact a more thorough knowledge of every local peculiarity.

97. Rumours very generally prevail, that the abuses charged against the tehsildary system in the province of Benares, have also existed, in the provinces above. If the fact be so, can any person who has duly weighed the preceding considerations, deem it a subject for surprise, or derive any inferences from it, unfavourable to the particular system.

98. To resume the immediate object of my attention, the great distance of the seat of controul is not the only mischief. The new country, has already, and will every day, still more pour into the boards and offices of the presidency, an increase of business, to which they are totally unequal. Those boards and offices had certainly, not too little to do previously, and thence their present burthens may be conceived. But the extension took place, and the sole cause of this increase of business. When that extension took place, by the offices at the resolution was adopted, to administer the affairs of the new country, by the offices at the presidency; an arrangement seemed absolutely necessary, to shift on some local authorities, a portion of the details which now center in those offices. So little however, has this temperament been resorted to, that a practice prevails, and every day gains ground, of drawing down to the presidency, every species of minute detail. To show how far this practice has been carried, I shall content myself with quoting the provisions of Regulation 5, 1804; by which none of the British officers, judicial, revenue or commercial, can transact any business immediately dependent on the government general, (that is, in the immense extent of country immediately dependent on the government general, and remove any native officer receiving a salary of more than 10 rupees per mensem, (that is, in English money, £. 15. per annum) without first bringing him to a regular trial, and submitting the proceedings, to some of the superior authorities in Calcutta. Nor is this formality required merely in cases of guilt and misconduct, where the ground of the mission would involve a stain upon character. Incapacity so easy to see, so difficult to prove, and to embody on a record; has been constituted a corpus delicti, and subjected to the same process.

99. It is worth while to attend to these rules, in reference to the courts of circuit and appeal. These courts are composed of three members, who must all be of long standing in the service: in their civil capacity, they have considerable power and property: as criminal judges, they possess singly, a very extensive jurisdiction over person, liberty, and reputation: yet to leave them, the regulation of their own ministerial officers, has been thought too much;

the united voice of all the three judges will not suffice, to remove the lowest of the classes of their clerks.

100. To trace the future effects of these two causes, the remoteness and consequent weakness of the superintending powers, and the overwhelming multiplicity of business, would be patched. The want of leisure, and difficulty of procuring accurate information, will render impracticable a patient discriminating attention to local peculiarities, and will generate a general rules. The real inefficiency of controul, in spite of the shew of minute and rigorous superintendence, will be felt and abused; evils and disorders will multiply; new rules and forms will be resorted to, as the remedy. The remedy will, in turn, increase the load of business; and these causes will continue to operate on each other, in a perpetual circle of action and re-action, till a pressure arises, that will endanger the stoppage of the whole system.

101. Political objects may perhaps be thought beyond my province; but in the new territory, they are, and must for some time be, intimately blended with revenue and judicial affairs. The wars of Sonshee and Beejee Ghur, and more recently of Kamouah and Gonowry, arose out of revenue and judicial matters. I have no intention to insinuate that these unpleasant events were owing to any mismanagement of our public officers, or to any defects of our regulations; for I am really not particularly informed of the circumstances, in which they originated. But they shew that such causes, might produce such effects, and in my humble judgment, concur, with a thousand other considerations, to prove that a subordinate government is as necessary in the new territories, as at Madras or Bombay.

102. I will not, for the present, longer encroach on the time of the Nizamut Adawlut and government, though I cannot but regret that want of leisure has compelled me to lay my reflections before them, in so imperfect a shape. To complete the subject, a review of the administration of civil justice, was required; which, if I do not flatter myself, would have afforded, many powerful arguments for the opinions which I have advanced. This, I may perhaps undertake hereafter; but I must now return to my ordinary duties, and leave these great questions, to the wisdom of my superiors.

Benares,

(Signed) JA. STUART,
3d Judge.

To W. B. BAYLEY, Esq.
Register to the Nizamut Adawlut.

Sir,

Para. 1. IT is with much diffidence that I address the Nizamut Adawlut on the present occasion, for I have to propose measures, the nature of which they are, I know, generally averse to.

2. As the Nizamut Adawlut, the government, and the people of the country, look to the judges of circuit, as well as to the magistrates, for the establishment of an efficient police, I consider it to be my duty to call the attention of the superior court to this subject.

3. I do not wait till the end of the circuit, when, in the course of official routine, I should have to make a report to the court; because the evil which I complain of is great and increasing, and every instant of delay, serves only to furnish new victims to the atrocities which are daily practised.

4. That decoity is very prevalent in Rajeshahye, has been often stated; but if its vast extent were known, if the scenes of horror, the murders, the burnings, the excessive cruelties which are continually perpetrated here, were properly represented to government, I am confident that some measures would be adopted, to remedy the evil; certainly there is not an individual belonging to the government, who does not anxiously wish to save the people from robbery and massacre, yet the situation of the people, is not sufficiently attended to. It cannot be denied that, in point of fact, there is no protection for persons or property; and that the present wretched, mechanical, inefficient system of police, is a mere mockery.

5. The decoits know much better than we, how to preserve their power: they have with great success, established a respect for their order, by speedy, certain, and severe punishments, and by judicious arrangements for removing obstacles and for facilitating the execution of their plans.

6. Such is the state of things which prevails, in most of the zillahs in Bengal; but in this, it is much worse than, in any other I have seen. I am fully persuaded that no civilized country ever had so bad a police, as that which Rajeshahye has at present.

7. It is not many years since the people about Govingunge, on the northern frontier of this district, finding that they could get no protection from us, and that their condition was become quite intolerable, rose in a mass, and executed a great number of decoits. One or two happy instances of successful opposition to robbers might possibly excite the same spirit here; in the present state of things; it is perhaps desirable that such an insurrection should take place here, and probably it will happen sooner or later; for things cannot continue continue much longer, as they are. I trust, however, that government will rather administer relief, in a proper manner, than suffer the application of so violent a remedy.

8. There are two grand points for the decoits to effect; first, to prevent apprehension; second, to prevent conviction. For the first, they bribe the zemindary and police officers; and for the second, they torture and murder the informers, prosecutors and witnesses, who appear against them.

9. The progress of this system is dreadful; the decoits become every thing, and the police and the criminal judicature, nothing.

10. I do not speak of these evils, merely to add that I lament their existence; but to propose a remedy, and to entreat that steps may be taken without delay, to save some of the lives which are every day exposed to the decoits.

11. I am at this time, oppressed with business; near 1,700 witnesses are kept from their homes, and three or four hundred prisoners remain untried. I cannot keep these people waiting, while I am reading papers to procure information, digesting plans, and writing letters. I have no leisure, but on Sundays and at night; so, I must be excused from going minutely into things now; and I shall only beg, for the present, at least, I may have the credit of giving no overcharged statement, but simply describing things, as they appear to me, from the most accurate observations I can make, and the best information I can procure; and I have only to recommend that relief be soon granted to the unfortunate people of this district.

12. On my way through the northern parts of this zillah, I had some conversation with a zemindar and a police darogah, who have distinguished themselves, by their exertions to apprehend decoits. I exhorted them to use every effort for the seizure of Pandita and Cartica, two notorious sirdars, whose gangs have long infested that part of the country. They told me that it was impossible to get any information about the great decoits; that the houses of all the principal inhabitants were open to them; yet, that nobody dared mention their names, for fear of being murdered. The darogah told me that orders issued by the police, were immediately communicated to Pandita. They attributed the success of the decoits to the same cause, that everybody else does; namely, the protection given them by the zemindars and police officers, and other people of power and influence in the country. Every thing I hear and see, and read on this subject, serves to convince me of the truth of this statement.

13. The principal persons who have lands or farms in the northern parts of this district, where there are most decoits, are the foudary serishtadars; Unoopinder Narain, and the peshcar Ruheem oodeen Kishen Sindial, a dewanny mohrir, and Domeen Geer Goseyn and Anoop Moonshee, who hold no offices under government.

14. There is evidently a connexion of interests between Domeen Geer Goseyn, and the two foudary officers who farm lands together, and mutually support each other. Anoop Moonshee again, is connected with Kishen Sindial, and with one Liadamohun Ghose, a serishte vakeel, who appears to be a very considerable person here. Most of the police darogahs seem to be, under the influence of Ruheem oodeen; Anoop Moonshee and Domeen Geer accuse each other, of harbouring decoits, and there is every reason to believe they are both guilty; for a great many notorious decoits, and harbourers of decoits, live on their estates, as well on Ruheem oodeen's, and Unoopinder Narain's, and Kishen Sindial's, although it is not easy to apprehend them; or if they are apprehended, to convict them.

15. The magistrate here, has so much to do, that a great deal of important business is necessarily left to the principal omia; that is to say, to the serishtahdar and Ruheem oodeen. It rests with them, to bring forward whatever appears to be most pressing, and the magistrate always allows them, to give their opinions on the cases before him. Now it appears to me, that if matters of consequence are unwarrantably kept back, and if criminals are improperly released, great responsibility should attach to these officers; for it is quite out of the question to suppose, that as far as the magistrate is concerned, these errors proceed from any thing but inadvertency.

16. But if there are very serious charges against these men and their dependants, for all sorts of oppression and violence, and for using the power and influence of their official stations to tyrannize with impunity, and to suppress complaints and prevent their being brought to decision; I think it must be admitted, that they ought not to be allowed to retain their situations.

17. I have lately sent an order to the magistrate to bring to decision without delay, seven complaints of this nature, all very serious, and most of them, bearing the strongest appearance of truth. The complainants had been twice to the court of circuit, and once to the Nizamut Adawlut, and the magistrate, whenever they came, ordered the cases to be brought forward; yet they were not brought forward; and it is plain, that as far as regards the magistrate, the only reason for the neglect, was the multiplicity of business which compelled him to trust to his omia, for a proper selection of the most important cases.

18. I mention this, to introduce a more daring instance of their interference, which, with the fact of their nefarious connexion with decoits, leaves no doubt in my mind, that these two men are the chief causes of the decoity here, and the chief obstacles to its suppression. Anoop Moonshee, who is not friendly to Ruheem oodeen, or the serishtahdar, seized Ata, a notorious decoit, of Pandita's gang, an inhabitant of Sonadiggee, which belongs to the serishtahdar and Ruheem oodeen, and appears to be a nest of decoits. Ata confessed to the darogah, three decoities, two of them attended with burning; and he was sent to the magistrate, who took evidence of his confession, and, instead of committing the prisoner, as he usually does in such cases, ordered the proceedings to be kept with those of Jhaupra and others. The magistrate does not know why they were joined with Jhaupra's; probably it was, because Ata was of the same gang as Jhaupra; this happened in February. Among the proceedings held in April, in the case of Phuttoo and others, notorious decoits, it is said in the examination of some of the witnesses, "the witness then looking at Ata, who was apprehended on another charge, said, This Ata is a notorious decoit." In fact, there was but one charge against Ata, that had been joined with Jhaupra's case, and the magistrate can give no account of the introduction of Ata, among the prisoners in Phuttoo's.

19. On the 2d of May, without any further evidence for or against Ata, is an order on Jhaupra's case, in the record of which, was the confession of Ata, stating that there was nothing proved against Ata; but that as there was another charge against him, he must not be released till that should be decided. On the 4th of May the case of Phuttoo was brought on, and among the prisoners was Ata, placed there, I suppose, by a trick of the omia, that he might be regularly discharged; for there was nothing against him;—then an order was passed for the commitment of Phuttoo and others, and for the release of the other prisoners; so, Ata escaped.

20. Hearing of this, I called for the proceedings on the 2d June, and after exclaiming much and publicly against the atrocity of releasing a decoit, I gave notice that I should enquire into the affair next day; but, owing to great pressure of business, I was obliged to put it off, till the day after. Among the papers, I found an order of the magistrate, dated 4th of May, directing that Ghausee and Chamareah should give security, or be imprisoned a month. From the proceedings, I suspected that they were both notorious decoits: and there was evidence of Ghausee harbouring Jeetoo, a notorious sirdar decoit and murderer, who had robbed and murdered with Pundita's gang for many years. These were all ryots of Domu Geer, Ruheem oodeen's friend. As that day, the 4th June, was the term of their imprisonment, I sent instantly to the jail, to prevent their discharge; but they had been released, the day before. One of the mohrirs, Nundomar, admitted that he had written out the order for their release, and taken it to the magistrate to sign, telling him the period for their imprisonment, was expired. When I attempted to make enquiry into this affair, I found Mahomed Tuckee, the mohrir of the jail, whose particular business it was to prevent the release of persons in their circumstances, trying to thwart my enquiring, by threatening another mohrir, whom I was questioning on the subject. I directed the magistrate to suspend Mahomed Tuckee, and I hope the Nizamut Adawlut will dismiss him.

21. The foudjaree serishtadar, with his 60 rupees a month, and the peshcar, with his 40, have contrived to possess themselves of great landed property in this district; from their connexions with zemindars, and their official situations, they have acquired a degree of power and influence which they turn, to the worst purposes. I am persuaded that they derive a revenue from the decoits, and give them protection; and that they suppress complaints, which are brought against themselves or their dependants.

22. I will not venture to say, that the dismissal of these two men, will be followed by an immediate cessation of decoity; but it is very plain that, as long as they retain their power and influence, decoity will increase; and that it is extremely difficult for any man to obtain justice here, if they are disposed to prevent it.

23. If the court do not think proper to dismiss the serishtadar and peshcar, I recommend that they be suspended, till all the criminal cases now pending against them, or any of their officers or dependants, be finally settled.

24. I further beg leave to recommend, that the magistrate be permitted immediately to suspend any police darogah, in whose jurisdiction decoity may be very seriously prevalent, or where notorious decoits reside.

W. B. Bayley,

Register.

To W. B. BAYLEY, Esq.

Register to the Nizamut Adawlut, Fort William.

Sir,

I MUST again entreat the attention of the Court to some suggestions with respect to the Police, and to the operation of the more immediate causes of decoity; and to a consideration of the reasons, why the sanction of the criminal law is become inefficient in the way of example, and can no longer deter from the commission of crimes, or affect any criminals, except those who, in justice are not deserving of severe punishment.

I consider it as out of the question, to improve the moral and religious principle of the people, by direct positive institutions. We are too ignorant of the natives, to attempt any thing so artificial, without imminent risk. We do not understand the operation of such institutions on their minds, or their tendency, with respect to the frame of the society. As for the criminal law, I believe the impolicy and inefficacy, even the mischief of very severe punishments, is generally acknowledged, as well as the injustice of inflicting punishment, where other remedies might have been used, with equal effect. With respect to increasing the severity of the criminal law, we have before our eyes, an admirable example.

In 1803, and again, in 1805, this principle was expected to prove a remedy for decoity. It has been tried, and it has utterly failed. As it is impossible to conceive a case more directly in point, or a more full, simple, convincing proof of the insufficiency of the means to the end; I trust no increase in the security of the criminal law, will ever be again resorted to.

As punishments are more severe, stricter proof of the crime is required; and consequently a proportionally greater number of criminals, escape conviction. Besides, the terror of the severer punishment, makes the criminal more careful to guard against being taken; and as it has no tendency to increase the activity of the police, but the contrary, the number of offenders apprehended, will, of course, be less than before. The decoits now guard against the danger of apprehension and conviction, by corruption and terror. They would give more bribes, and commit more murders, if they thought more precaution necessary; and the consequence would be, that the difficulties of apprehending and convicting decoits would increase, and people who had been robbed and tortured, would still be compelled to perjure themselves, that they might not be murdered.

And with respect to the administration of the laws, are not the Judges now entrusted with as much power as is proper? and if the law was made more severe, would it not be necessary to extend their power still further? And are we all fit persons, to be entrusted with discretionary power to inflict punishments, which are by many considered, to be worse than death? Persons who are entrusted with such power, ought to be appointed from no other consideration whatever, but that of the fitness of the man for the place. But I would ask, whether all our appointments have ever been so filled? and whether it is probable, from the nature of our service, that they ever will be? We may all be judges, learned, and unlearned.

With respect to myself, I must candidly confess, that every day's experience and reflection on the nature of our courts, and of the minds and manners of the natives, as far as I can see, serve to increase my doubts about our capacity to discover truth among them. It appears to me, that there is a very great deal of perjury, of many different shades, in our judicial proceedings; and that many common rules of evidence here, would be inapplicable, and absurd. Even the honest men, as well as the rogues, are perjured. The most simple, and the most cunning, alike make assertions that are incredible, or that are certainly false. If the prosecutor in cases of decoity was to be disbelieved in all cases, because there was perjury; scarce a decoit would be convicted. By cross-examination, you may draw an honest witness into as many absurdities and contradictions as you please; but it is not easy to detect the persons who come forward, as eye-witnesses in cases of decoity; and how can you all true, but one point, the identity of the persons whom they accuse; and how can you discover whether this is true or false?—Some witnesses are loquacious, some taciturn; some frigid, some over zealous; some willing, some unwilling; some bold, some timid, some scrupulous; some come to give false evidence, in favour of a friend or a master; some ruin an enemy; and the signs of the different modes that disguise truth, are so very equivocal, and often so unintelligible, that nothing can be depended on. There is not one witness in a dozen, on whom you can implicitly rely for a purely true story. It has very often happened, that a story which, by attending only to the plain direct course of things, I believe to be true, has, by examining into matters apparently connected in a very distant degree, with the case, turned out to be entirely false. I am afraid that the evidence of witnesses in our courts is, for the most part, an instrument in the hands of men, and not an independent, untouched source of truth. With these impressions, it is natural that I should at least, entertain some doubts of the propriety of extending the powers of the court. What can be more absurd than some of the futwas of the law officers? And is it not very bad to subject such futwas to the confirmation of men, who are not capable of forming a rational opinion concerning them?

I rather wish that our power of inflicting severe punishments were more confined, and that there were more distinctions and modifications in the now existing laws against decoity; for it is dreadful to confound, in one undistinguished mass, infinite shades of criminality; to blend even innocence and misfortune, with guilt the most atrocious.

What does a gang of decoits consist of? There is the sirdar; the leader of the party, when he is present, and their director, when he is absent. He is a professed robber and murderer. He is not only the conductor of the atrocities that are committed, but he is the point of union of many inferior criminals. He finds recruits for his party, not only by accepting the services of wretches like himself, but he has recourse to persuasion, to force, and to terror: some of his party, are pressed to carry bundles or torches; some are severely beat; some threatened, with death; some, with decoity, if they refuse to join. Many, thus initiated against their inclination, are gradually corrupted, till the greatest crimes are familiar to them, and they become, at last, hardened decoits. A gang of decoits, then, does not consist entirely of professed robbers: many of the party, are poor, honest, industrious people, who are seized for the service of the night; some assist willingly, but not actively; and some, are regularly established robbers. Is it right that so heterogeneous a set as this, should be jumbled together, and be all liable to the same punishment?—It is the duty of the legislature to protect those ignorant and helpless creatures, who cannot protect themselves:—One part of the system, should not denounce against an unfortunate wretch, death or other exceedingly severe punishment, for a crime which, owing to the defects of another part of the system, he is compelled to commit. If you refuse him protection, and leave him to the uncontrolled power of robbers and murderers, will you inflict severe punishment on him, after the offence has been forced upon him? If you could not check that power, how could he resist it?—But the duty of the legislator is not confined to this coarser sort of protection; he he must consider that this is a weak and ignorant race, and it is a duty to save them from temptation, to prevent corruption from spreading round them; and if this duty is neglected, and crimes are generated in consequence, with what justice can the criminal be punished?

Such are the considerations from which I think it is repugnant to all good principle, to neglect the means of prevention, and to punish for decoity indiscriminately. If it is now admitted that to increase the severity of the criminal law, and to enlarge the powers of the courts, is exceptionable in every point of view; let it be considered whether good preventive measures could not be contrived. In proposing such measures, I am aware no infringement on our political principles, can be allowed; no changes, in our fundamental institutions; no additional expense; no serious innovation of any kind. I do not want to create any new power; to establish any new office; to rescind any regulation, or to proceed on any principles, but those which are already admitted.

What I purpose generally, is this: to turn the existing power and influence of the country, to the assistance of the police.

I assume as a fact ascertained beyond all doubt, as far as my sphere of observation extends, that is to say, the Calcutta and Moorshedabad divisions (of the Dacca part, I am wholly ignorant) that decoits inhabit populous countries. Where there is power and influence, of course there are few exceptions; but I speak generally. If any person demands proof of this, I refer to the reports of the darogahs, and the records of the criminal courts; and I ask, in what sort of places decoits are apprehended, and what appear to have been the ordinary habits of their lives. I am not afraid that this will be contradicted; and I am convinced that the more detail is gone into, to ascertain the fact, the more fully will it be confirmed. Indeed, a little attention to the circumstances of decoity, to the persons of whom the gangs are found to be composed, the nature of our government, and the state of society, would, without any actual knowledge of the fact, render it highly improbable that decoits should be other, than what I have stated. In short, I take for granted that decoits are not the solitary inhabitants of woods and deserts, and secret places; but that they live in the neighbourhood and society of men.

It seems to be a prevailing opinion, that the state of society in Bengal, owing to the reduction of the great families, and the division of estates, is now such, as to be unable to afford assistance to the police. That this opinion is erroneous I entertain not the smallest doubt. Consider who are the chief persons of power and influence in the country, and how perfectly they are, at the mercy of government; how closely within its reach. These persons, are the principal native officers of government; and the zemindars and farmers, under their immediate authority, are the inferior native officers of government; and their dependants, and the naibs of the zemindars and farmers, under them again, are the gomastahs and pykes of villages. Large estates are managed chiefly by naibs in the Mofussil, and the very small estates are managed by the proprietors themselves. Large towns which are, I believe, very seldom the residence of decoits, are the only places where there are many independent men. Throughout the rest of the country, the great body of the people are subject to the power and influence, of a few individuals; no objection can arise, from the vast number of independent talookdars. I know that the decoits, generally, do not live on their estates. Indeed, he who carries desolation into the neighbouring lands, cannot expect to hold an undisturbed residence, on the estate of a man who is unable to protect him. I should have no concern about the estates of petty talookdars; decoits may be there, sometimes, but not often; and if they can be rooted out of the great estates, there will soon be an end of them. The connection of dependance from the zemindars and the officers of government, to the lowest of the people, is as general and as perfect, as can be conceived. Government, and natural authority, is strong throughout; the superior is, in the daily exercise of authority over the inferior, by calls on his personal services or his property. If this authority is exercised in moderation, and according to usage, we hear nothing of it; when it is excessive, it frequently appears in our courts. When a darogah gives a detailed account of his proceedings to apprehend decoits, he almost invariably speaks of his demanding assistance from the zemindar; when he or his omrah go to a village, they immediately apply to the chief officer of the zemindar; when they find it necessary to apologize for the bad state of the police, they blame the zemindar and his officers. I scarcely know an instance of any other reason being assigned. Again, every zemindar has at the tannah, a vyke-l or a pyke, or some sort of agent. This man, generally acts as a goindah also; he is often the confidential agent of the zemindar, of the police officers, and of the decoits. The effects of this soon appear, that is to say, decoity begins; but if the first appearance of the evil, was a signal for the punishment of the zemindar and the darogah, and the dismissal of the latter; we should soon find, that instead of uniting against the police, they would see that their immediate and obvious interests required them, to unite for its support. The zemindars are bound by their engagements, and by the regulations, to assist the police. Let that part of their duty be explained; let it be taken in rather an enlarged sense; and let it so have the sanction of law. I would not require of the zemindars any acts which they are not themselves, occasionally in the habit of performing, and to which they are not themselves, but instead of making them apprehend notorious decoits as they do now, whenever they think fit, or whenever they are specifically called on by the magistrate, or the police darogah, I would declare it to be their duty to apprehend notorious decoits, at all times. I would subject them to fine and imprisonment for neglect; and if any notorious decoit lived lived on their estate, the presumption should be, that it was by their neglect, and the burden of proof that it was not, should be upon them. I would declare, that the fact being proved of any notorious decoit holding undisturbed residence on their estate, should render that estate liable to forfeiture, and the inferior officers of the zemindar, to be liable to fine and imprisonment. I would not allow the naib of a non-resident zemindar to act, without security from his principal to a large amount, which should be forfeited, if he neglected his police duties; officers of government guilty of offences against this rule should be liable to immediate dismissal, should never be allowed to serve again, and their estates should be liable to be forfeited.

I think it is impossible to doubt that the decoits are protected by the zemindars or their dependants, by the police officers and their agents at their tannahs, and by the persons who have power and influence at the magistrate's catcherry. When I speak of protection, I mean to include in the expression every sort of connivance and neglect by which decoits are enabled to live unmolested, and carry on their profession.

I beg leave to remind the court, that some suggestions about the harbouring of decoits, which I made last year in my report on the Calcutta circuit, were generally approved; and I understood that what I then proposed would be carried into effect; and though as yet nothing has been done, I can with some confidence again address the court on the subject, knowing that my first principle has been admitted. I am aware it may be urged, that what is true in Rajeshahy may not apply elsewhere. I must however, beg leave to say, that when the causes of decoity are hidden, our best hope of discovering them, is to force itself into public attention to these districts, where the evil is so intolerable as to force itself into public notice, in most points of view. Such was the state of Nuddea last year, till it was reformed by Mr. Macan; and such is the state of Rajeshahy. Now my opinion respecting the great causes of decoity was chiefly founded on what I saw at Nuddea; and it is most fully confirmed, by what I have seen here.

I trust that the importance of the subject, and the nature of my troubling the court with so very long a letter; I have however more to add, relating more particularly to this district.

It is ascertained that a great number of murders, and of decoities attended with murder and with dreadful cruelty, have been committed, in the northern parts of this district; many of these offences are so alike, in the circumstances attending them, that, prima facie, it is evident that they are not entirely unconnected, but that they are directed, by the same persons or on the same principles, or follow, from some common cause. The most exact mode of ascertaining the truth is doubtless, by the proceedings of a court of justice, when that is practicable; but if causes do exist to prevent the truth from being so ascertained, other modes must be resorted to. We must in this, as in other cases, take the best evidence that can be had.

We know that certain persons who have been murdered, were objects of vengeance to certain individuals; we know that those individuals, are the terror of the country; so that a common and almost universal belief prevails of their always murdering their accusers, which is founded on the fact, that many of their accusers have been murdered, and an opinion that they were the murderers. We know that many of the crimes imputed to these offenders, are committed in open day, in the most public manner; and therefore we cannot doubt that ample evidence against the criminals, does exist; although from the operation of a pre-established terror, it does not appear in the courts, such evidence is certainly whispered about in the country: hence it is, that public opinion or common report and notoriety, is in the present state of things, intitled to a particular degree of credit.

It happens sometimes that persons connected with some of the individuals above alluded to, are apprehended by the police officers, and the darogah is said to have made, with a magistrate a full confession of crimes, which the prisoner is said to have made, with a disclosure of the circumstances connected with them, and of his accomplices. This confession is seldom successfully employed, as a ground for ascertaining truth; but it is considered as in itself authentic, and is sent to the magistrate, who commits the accused to be tried by the court of circuit. A confession sent by a police darogah is liable to such strong objections, that it is impossible to believe it, without some further confirmation than the oaths of the attesting witnesses; for it is not improbable that the darogahs or their dependants or goeyndahs very commonly intimidate or ill treat the accused, till his spirit is broken, and he agrees to confess; then, his examination is taken, and to the attesting witnesses, it seems to be voluntary. Notwithstanding this, if many of the circumstances stated in the confession are certainly true, and the rest of it, corresponds with public notoriety, it is impossible to withhold our belief from it entirely; although such evidence is not enough to convict the person said to have confessed, much less those who are accused by him. When the confession is confirmed, so far as to convict the person confessing, some additional weight is due to the accusation of his accomplices. It is admitted that the terror of a sirdar decoit prevents people from giving evidence against him; a witness is sometimes persuaded by the police darogah to give information, and when he comes to the sadder, he denies it all. How is it possible to ascertain whether this difference is owing to the roguery of the darogah, or the timidity of the witness?—But this we know, that a sirdar decoit has generally the means of saving himself from conviction; and that, although all the world say he is a notorious robber and murderer, not an individual can be found, who will give evidence against him. This is a dreadful state of things; and so it must remain, till confidence is restored to the people by removing their well grounded fears, by entreprising the sirdars, and giving a real efficiency and vigour to the police.

From what I have said, the court will perceive that the trial and the disposal of the sirdar decoits is of the most serious importance. If these persons are condemned to imprisonment for a term of years, or to be confined till they give security, they are soon mixed with a horde of convicts, and they are not distinguished from the rest; yet the release or escape of one sirdar decoit, is of more evil consequence to the community, than that of a thousand inferior criminals. Pundita, who has been the cause of so many robberies and murders, escaped from the Rungpore jail. The sirdar decoit among the Fakeers, north of Dinagpore and Purneah, was released from prison, a few years ago; so was Amanut Khan, a sirdar, lately taken here; so was Sookta. I don't remember any other instances at present; but I dare say the Nizamut Adawlut must know many of the same kind.

Pundita and Kartica have long been the scourge of the northern part of this district. The extent and boldness of their depredations; the many murders, burning, and other cruelties which they commit; their discipline and secrecy, and the terror which they have established, are well known. Pundita and Kartica are supposed not to rob often, in person; they are known to the ordinary decoits, only by name; no account whatever is to be had of them: it is from notoriety only, that they are believed to be the heads of the robbers. Their subordinate sirdars, however, are well known, and several of them have been apprehended: Jhapra, Bheeka, Sookta, Jeetoo Phuttoo, and a few others of inferior importance, are now under trial. I think it is pretty certain, that the three first, have been principals, in at least 10 or 12 deliberate murders; the two others, may not have committed, quite so many perhaps. As to the persons who have been burnt by them and their gangs, so as to survive but a short time, they may be hundreds.

I now enclose several papers, from which the court will be enabled to judge of the state of the northern parts of this district. The court will observe, that many of the events mentioned, are not of very recent date, and several sirdars have been since apprehended; but I cannot consider the evil to be cured, till there is reason to believe, not only that decoity is reduced, and that the fears of the people are removed, but that the causes of the evil are destroyed; that is to say, all the sirdars are taken, and till the police is rendered efficient, and the power and influence of the county, is actually employed for its support.

I have now further to recommend, that the trials of all sirdar decoits may be sent to the Nizamut Adawlut; my reason for this is, that the disposal of these greatest of all criminals is of very high importance to the community, and it is proper that such cases should be brought under the highest authority in the fullest manner.

NOTES.

BAROO PARAMANIK, of Amun, was robbed and murdered by decoits in Augun 1213. Jampra is supposed to have been of this party. In Assin 1214, Jampra carried off his widow Poosee and her young child, and kept them at Kyogatace in Mymensing, till Poosee died. Such was the terror at Amun, that Poosee could get no protection, and was under the necessity of going with Jampra, who threatened to kill her and her child, and every body who interfered. The child, who appears to be about seven years old, is terrified to the greatest degree, at the sight of Jampra. The people of Amun, whether from fear or from collusion (they say from fear) neglected to report to the tannah the murder of Baroo, and the rape of his wife.

NIZAMOODDEEN and RUBBEA were two goyendahs, who were made away with. It is supposed that Jampra, Hureca, Bheeka, and some others, murdered them only because they were goyendahs.

RUHNUT MUNDUL lived at Tulasore, where the decoits frequented his house. At last, he gave some information about Sookta and Bheeka. In Mang 1213, he was carried away from his village in open day, in the most public manner, by six men dressed and armed like tannah chuprassces. The villagers assembled, and made some feeble attempts to rescue him: at night, the decoits brought him back to his own house; completely plundered it, and carried him off again. It is said, by confessing decoits, that he was murdered that night, by Jampra, Bheeka, Sookta, and others.

WUZERA and KHUTTEAH were goyendahs employed by the darogah of Sheerpore, in Chyt 1213, to apprehend Sookta and Bheeka. The decoits heard of this, and murdered them. Several of the gang confessed at the tannah, and pointed out the bodies of the goyendahs. Six men were executed for these murders. In their mofussil confessions they said Bheeka and Sookta were the persons who killed Wuzera and Khuttea; several other goyendahs, who have given information about Sookta and Bheeka, and his two associates, the decoits. In 1803, Kunkye, goindah, accused Sookta and Bheeka, and his two associates, Dewannoo and Buharoo, gave evidence in the case for which Sookta was apprehended. Sookta was released by the court of circuit. Kunkye, and his companion, Ashik Mahomed, soon after were missing, and it is supposed that they were murdered by the decoits; as for Dewannoo and Buharoo they were murdered in 1805. They were sent with two other goyendahs, by the darogah, to procure information of Pundita's party, and they went to a house near the place where the gang was assembled; but the decoits got intelligence, seized and carried them off, and of course murdered them. The morning after this business happened, Moolca, who was a sirdar like Sookta and Bheeka, under Pundita and Kartica, came to the village. Several persons described him as coming forward with an earthen pot in his hand, and addressing the villagers:—"If any body tells that the four goyendahs were taken off last night, I will tie this pot round his neck and drown him; I will cut him and his wives and children to pieces. I am Moolca; you know me; and you know that I will be as good as my word." Moolca was afterwards taken by Asudzooman, zemindar of Silburees, was tried and acquitted; but the Nizamut Adawlut ordered that he should not be released without security. A great many more goyendahs have been murdered. I shall relate one more case. In Augun 1213, Mungla, who had acted as a goyendah at Khurna, was carried off by several men, very near the tannah, in open day, and was never heard of again. A woman, named Phulchuree, told the darogah that she had seen Mungla taken away; she returned to her village, and two days after she and her husband were missing, and have never been heard of since. A man who is now committed for this murder, is believed to be of Pundita's gang, and to have murdered another goyendah some time before.

Mohun Chung, a goyendah, who lived near the tannah at Sheerpore, had been instrumental in seizing one of Pundita's gang. In Jeyte 1214, his house was robbed, and he received several very severe sword-wounds from the decoits, who left him for dead.

Hureca was not apprehended till he had separated himself from the decoits, and become goyendah; then the darogah of Kurma sent him to Nattore, in charge of two burkundazes, about two coss from the tannah; he was taken from them in open day, by 20 or 25 men, armed and dressed like tannah burkundazes. The two men who were in charge of Hureca swear, that they saw in this gang, his old enemy Jeetoo, on whose account he left the gang.

Almost all the decoities, mentioned in these papers, were attended with murder or burning, chiefly of women. It is unnecessary to go into any further detail on the subject.

Sir,

To W. C. BLAQUIERE, Esq.

Magistrate 24 Pergunnahs.

Par. 1. I HAVE completed the second session of jail delivery at your station for the current year. Warrants for carrying into execution the sentences passed in all the trials brought before the court, were delivered during the session to your officers, with exception to those cited in the margin, which were referable to the Nizamut Adawlut.

2. In the case of Hurry Nye, N^o 3 of your Calendar, who was brought before me for contumacy, under Regulation 9. of 1808, it appeared that the proclamation for the prisoner's appearance was not issued in the manner prescribed by section 3. of that Regulation, viz. by affixing it at the magistrate's cutcherry, and at the several police tannahs, and by transmitting copies of it, for publication to other districts, in which the magistrate might have considered it probable that the proclaimed person had concealed himself*. But the most reprehensible point in this case is, that, notwithstanding the prisoner's usual abode was actually known to the officers of police; still the proclamation was not published by beat of drum on the spot, or other public notice given of his appearance being required. Where the penalty for non-appearance is so great as imprisonment for life; the due publication of the proclamation is not a matter of mere form. It is essential to the ends of justice, that a person accused of decoity should not be tricked into a conviction without trial, and rendered liable to the punishment prescribed by that crime. The Regulation is highly penal, and its provisions must be strictly and literally observed. The culpable and apparently wilful neglect of the tanahdar to whom the proclamation was sent, and the phaunderdar to whom he delivered it, in omitting to publish it, in the prescribed manner at the place which the phaunderdar knew to be the prisoner's usual abode, deprives them, in my opinion, of all title to the reward offered for his apprehension. Under what pretence can a claim be made to reward, when the phaunderdar, who suppressed the proclamation, was the very man who seized the prisoner, as soon as the lapse of time debarred him of his right to be heard in defence of the charges brought against him? What construction can be put upon such conduct, but that the police knew, that if he was seized or surrendered earlier, he must be acquitted for want of proof; or that the crimes of which he was accused, existed only in idea? To reward under such circumstances, would be to pay the police for false charges of decoity, with the option of convicting without trial.

3. In illustration of my letter to the acting magistrate of the 7th July last, I should wish it to be understood, that a prisoner proceeded against, for contumacy under the provisions of Regulation 9, 1808, is (according to my construction of that Regulation, and of the circular orders of the Nizamut Adawlut†) not to be brought to trial on the specific charge for which he has been proclaimed, till the charge of contumacy is disposed of; unless (as in the present case) the nature of the crime is such as to render him liable to a greater degree of punishment under the Regulations, than is specified in the proclamation; in which case he is to be put on his trial on such charge, as soon as possible‡. But whenever a specific charge has been proclaimed (not being that, for which he may be such as to render him liable to an equal or a greater degree of punishment under the Regulations, the prisoner in such event, whether the charge be preferred before or subsequently to his apprehension (provided there appear to the magistrate, sufficient grounds for commitment) is to be brought to trial on such specific charge, as soon as may be practicable after his apprehension or surrender.

4. The sentence and orders passed on the 16th ultimo by the Nizamut Adawlut on N^o 7. of your Calendar, have been already communicated to you, through the regular channel. Pursuant to the 6th and 12th paragraphs of those Orders, you will herewith receive, in the form of a roobacarree, particular instructions, as well with respect to the evidence by which the charge of conspiracy and perjury is to be supported against the prisoners whom the Nizamut Adawlut have ordered to be prosecuted on the part of government for those offences, as in regard to the local inquiry which you are directed to institute by the 12th paragraph.

* Note.—No notice is taken of the circular orders of the Nizamut Adawlut of the 24th July 1810, as they were not in force till some months after the prisoner's apprehension.

paragraph. You will hereafter receive the sentences which the Nizamut Adawlut may pass on N^o 10. of your Calendar, and on the three prisoners in N^o 14. and 16. of your Supplementary Calendar; and in the mean time you will be pleased to retain those prisoners in confinement.

5. Your predecessor and yourself have been furnished from time to time, during the session, with directions for the magistrates guidance, on such points as appeared to require the interposition of the court. The prohibition against demanding security from accused persons on their discharge, is of course only meant to prohibit the requiring security, when nothing may appear in evidence unfavourable to the general character of the accused, as expressed in the order; and is not meant to restrict the magistrate from demanding security previous to release, if during the enquiry into a specific charge, the accused should appear to be a person of general bad and dangerous character.

6. The nefarious practice, so prevalent in the mofussil, of extorting and fabricating confessions, cannot be too severely reprehended, and requires your most serious attention. You will be pleased to pay the strictest observance to the various orders issued during the session, for the prevention of this atrocious offence, by introducing checks and restrictions*, which will render the fraud more difficult of execution, and more easy to detect. A proper attention to the precautions directed by the court, will at least render the abuse, less uniform and systematic than heretofore; and the general conduct of the police, touching confessions (commencing with the principal thannah of Manick Tulla) will, if the people see you are in earnest; and that such things cannot be tolerated, put a final stop to this system of iniquity. I remarked, with much concern, that in every case of decoity brought before me, the proof rested on a written mofussil confession, given in evidence at the trial; and regret to add, that all those confessions, bear the marks of fabrication. In one of these cases (N^o 7. of your Calendar) a prisoner, who was perfectly innocent of improper means before the magistrate, under the influence of a confession before a police darogah, which was proved on the trial, to be false; and which had, in fact, been extorted by intimidation and violence. It is hardly necessary to remind you, that confessions made before yourself, are to be received and acted upon, with the utmost circumspection.

7. An erroneous idea prevails in the mofussil, that a confession is the strongest proof of guilt; and that all that is requisite is to obtain one, and, if possible, to get it confirmed before the magistrate. This false notion, perhaps first gave rise to the custom of fabricating them; and the practice appears to have increased, till it has become general and systematic. You are yourself of course aware, and it should be impressed on the minds of your officers, that a bare uncorroborated testimony that vious to trial, is the weakest and most suspicious testimony that can be adduced against a prisoner. From the ease with which it is obtained, and the readiness with which, in the alarm of danger, a falsehood or a truth is indiscriminately acknowledged, it is intitled to little credit as evidence, unless strongly corroborated, by other circumstances; and where facts go to disprove the truth of such confession, or even to cast suspicion thereon, it becomes as inadmissible, as evidence against the prisoner (whether confirmed before the magistrate or not) as it would be, if positive proof was adduced of its having been obtained, by the flattery of hope, or extorted by the impressions of fear. The magistrates are in consequence strictly enjoined by section 6th, Regulation 9, 1793, "notwithstanding such confessions, invariably to bind over the witnesses to the commission of the crime alledged against the prisoner, that they may be examined before the court of circuit, in the same manner as if the prisoner had denied the charge." I had occasion, in the course of the session, to call the acting magistrates attention to this rule; and trust that in future it will be strictly adhered to. In all the cases of decoity before me, I was obliged to call for evidence to facts, having been furnished only with evidence to confessions.

8. In a trial for decoity and murder (No. 13. of your Supplementary Calendar) I found two witnesses illegally confined, for not testifying on oath, to the truth of a fabricated mofussil confession. These men had been in jail for seven months, and were in close custody when the trial came on, though no inquiry had been instituted, nor was meant to be instituted against them, for perjury, and they had, in point of fact, deposed to what was true; namely, that the confession sent in by the police darogah, did not correspond, in any one circumstance, with what the prisoner had said; that the prisoner had said one thing, and that the backshee, had written another: the testimony of these two men was corroborated before me, by other evidence.

* They chiefly consisted of the following general Rules:

1st. Where a prisoner can read and write, the confession invariably to be in his own hand writing, and not that of any other person.

Note.—Though one of the prisoners in N^o 13. could write and read Bengallee, and the fact was perfectly known to the police at the time, still his akessed confession was taken down in Persian, under the pretence that there was no Bengallee writer at hand; as if he could not have written it himself, had it not been fabricated.

2^d. Whether he can read and write or not, the confession to be witnessed by one or more persons, who can sign their names, and are not tools of the police.

3^d. The paper to which original signatures may be affixed, to be sent to the magistrate, and not a real or pretended copy; as any other document than the original is perfectly inadmissible, as evidence.

Note.—In N^o 17. the paper deposed to, was signed by one witness in his own hand, and marked, by another, &c. that there could be no mistaking it; but neither the paper sent in to the magistrate by the darogah Mahomed Nukkee, nor another, which he afterwards produced before me as the original, had such signature, or mark; and it was positively sworn by all the witnesses, that the size of the paper, was not the same. The motive in changing the confession is of no moment; it is sufficient that the thing tendered in lieu of it, was inadmissible as evidence.

4th. Daroghas of police to state, at the foot of every confession, the hour at which it was taken, with the date and hour of its being witnessed.

5th. Where it may have been taken at night (which was the case in almost all the confessions given in evidence at the before me) the special reason for its having been so taken, to be stated in the daroghas report, with a note of the date and hour at which the prisoner was apprehended, and date and time of taking the confession.

6th. The magistrate to be careful in examining the witness, to satisfy himself that the signature to a confession, is not obtained by misrepresenting the contents of the paper (as was the case in trial 13, and 15.) or other fraud.

dence at the trial, and the darogha was accused by his jemadar, of attempting to support the fabrication by subornation of perjury, as soon as he found that the persons whose signatures affect the merits of the case, whether this charge (which you have been directed to enquire into) is true or not. The ground on which the two witnesses were kept in confinement, viz. of their inability to give security for their appearance, which had been demanded, in consequence of their testimony before the magistrate, was altogether illegal. The subordinate officers of this fresh incitement to their industry; and, I trust, that the court will not again hear of witnesses being put in jail, on such grounds.

9. It would be endless entering into a detail of the different modes, in which confessions are fabricated and proved. The usual course appears to be, first, to apprehend as many people as caprice may dictate, and then to select from the number, those individuals who are thus arranged, the victims are made over to the subordinate agents or instruments of police, to be dealt with according to circumstances; and the rest are discharged. It sometimes happens, that they meet with a man whom they are able to deceive, by assurances of immediate pardon, and false promises of future favour and indulgence; in such case, he is usually told, that, by signing a paper prepared by the bundshee for that purpose, or repeating before witnesses what he is instructed to say, he will not only escape hanging, or at least perpetual dah; that all he has to do, is to pretend that he was concerned in the decoity, and say, that the gang was composed of particular individuals who are named to him, and leave the rest to the darogah; that there can be no harm in this, because all the world know they are the real decoits; and, in short, the alternative is offered him, either of making a friend or an enemy of the police; either of suffering an ignominious death through their power, or of raising himself to a post of honourable ambition and profit, by their favour. By these, and similar artifices, they catch a dupe, who suffers for his credulity; but when these means fail, which they generally do, they have recourse to compulsion. In this event, the prisoners are taken out singly, at night, and subjected to every species of maltreatment, till they consent to subscribe before witnesses, to the contents of a confession, drawn up for their signature by the bundshee, or to learn it, by heart, and repeat it, in their presence. When the prisoner is thus prepared, if there appears no danger of his retracting before morning, he is left at peace, for a few hours; but if any apprehension of that sort is entertained, a bundshee and they are aroused from their sleep, at all hours of the night for that purpose. It is to be observed, however, that the sending for impartial witnesses does not often occur, except where the darogah has not sufficient weight or talent to keep his place, and the same time set appearances at defiance. A darogah who is sure of his post, will, with the utmost impudence, send in a confession, witnessed only by a few pykes, or other police dependants, who were perhaps the very instruments by whose means it was extorted. Sometimes a broken pot, an old rag, or some other article of little or no value, belonging to the person robbed, is procured by a goyendah or other inferior agent of police, and deposited in a half dry tank or ditch, to which the prisoner is afterwards taken, for the purpose of bringing it out with great formality, in the presence of witnesses. Trash of this sort is sometimes thrown into the compound of a man's house, or other part of his dwelling, in the hurry and confusion of a sham search for stolen property, and brought out with his own things, by way of corroborating a confession. A case came under my observation, in which a goyendah was caught, in the very act of disposing of property in this way.

In No. 12, of your Supplementary Calendar, the darogah of Maniktula, in his capacity of thanah ameen, with the aid of his subordinate, had prepared all the proofs which were to corroborate a confession, long before the confession itself, was pretended to have been openly made. Even his first report to the acting magistrate, that the decoits were apprehended with the property (which I found amongst the miscellaneous records of your office) bears a date prior to the confession, by which the property was subsequently pretended by him, to have been discovered. All that is asserted to have been ascertained, was known to him before he brought the prisoners to the thanah of Bydebattee; and yet they were confined there, for some time after their arrival, for the sole purpose of preparing sham confessions, in direct violation of section 17. Regulation 9. 1807; by the provisions of which, he was prohibited, on pain of immediate dismissal from office, from detaining the prisoners beyond the time indispensably requisite for the enquiry which had already been made. I shall not enlarge on this unpleasant topic. In regard to the individual darogha, and the vacancy occasioned by his suspension, you will, of course, conform strictly to the instructions which I have separately given you, and the confirmation of them which you have received from the court at large. In correcting the general abuses which have been pointed out to you, the court expect your most earnest and zealous co-operation.

10. Another point to which the notice of the acting magistrate was directed, and which cannot be too often repeated, is the shameful practice which prevails, of suppressing all the evidence on the part of the prisoner; especially where the proof of guilt rests, on a mofussil confession. It will, of course, sometimes occur, that a particular witness, named by a prisoner, is not forthcoming; but where several are summoned from different villages, and not one, or at least any material one, is to be found (as was the case, in all the trials at the present sent session) the only construction which can be put on a general and repeated return to that effect by your officers, is, that such return is false.

11. A practice has been adopted in the magistrate's office, which must tend to increase the difficulty (if any exists) of procuring the attendance of material witnesses, namely, the subpoenaing for attendance before the court of circuit, all the witnesses to character, who have put their names to the sooruthaul. Now, a sooruthaul to character is sometimes signed by three fourths of the residents, in a village; and these persons receive intelligence from phandadar, that a police peon, or burkundaze, is come amongst them to carry them off from their ordinary occupations; it is not at all surprising or improbable that most of those who are unable to pay for exemptions, should desert the villages, till he is gone; and that even two or three material witnesses to facts, should be amongst the group who absent themselves for the time. But their absence is but temporary; and it would be as difficult to satisfy me, that those who are material cannot be sent in, singly on their return, as it would be, to assign a fair reason, why witnesses to facts, should be more difficult to discover, than witnesses to confessions. It would be far better, however, that the proof of general bad character (which is quite a secondary consideration) should be dispensed with altogether, than that the mode of obtaining it, should afford to the darogahs a plea for suppressing all the evidence to facts which would tend to a discovery of the truth, and all the proofs of innocence adduced by the accused. Where it is meant to be shown that the prisoner bears a general bad character, the selection of a few of the most creditable of the witnesses who have put their names to the sooruthaul (of course, including those who may have been examined before the magistrate) would be sufficient, without summoning every individual who may have signed the paper; and where the prisoner's general character is found, on inquiry by the magistrate, to be good, or unobjectionable, I cannot see what end is proposed to be answered, by establishing that fact on the part of the prosecution, instead of leaving it, as it ought to be, to the prisoner. No. 14. of your Supplementary Calendar exhibited the names of upwards of a hundred witnesses to character, on the part of the prisoner Fummol, on whose unnecessary; whilst, on the other hand, the character of the prisoner Fummol, on whose alleged confession, the other prisoners in that trial were apprehended, and who is represented by the police as the leader of the gang, was altogether overlooked. I beg that the useless and objectionable practice adverted to in this paragraph, may (as directed during the session) be discontinued.

12. Several petitions were presented to me, in the course of the session. Those of the greatest public importance, complain of the rapacity, oppression, and gross and daring acts of illegal violence and rapine committed by goyendahs, and strong disinclination evinced on the part of the magistrate, to redress grievances of that description. I regret that the acting magistrate's proceedings, in the case of Ram Mohun Bakkal and Ramjee, goyendah, should give a colour to the latter part of the charge. It is with concern I observe, that the censure passed on those proceedings, was attended with no effect; and that the court's instructions of the 4th July last, respecting an inquiry into the merits of the complaints, should have been totally disregarded. I am aware of the pressure of other business, and of the unusual number of persons in actual custody for examination, whose cases ought, generally speaking, to be taken up, in preference to those of persons who are at large on bail; but I cannot admit this, as a sufficient plea for neglecting the court's orders, in a case of so much importance as the present; nor can I wink so hard, as not to see that the accused, from the nature of the charge, ought not, in strictness, to be at large on security. But if this unmerited indulgence to a man, accused on oath of the most daring acts of outrage, and open robbery, with a tender of ample proof, is to operate as a bar to inquiry, it becomes incumbent on me to order that his bail be withdrawn, till the investigation, which I directed in vain three months ago, is completed. The charges are of a serious complexion to be lightly treated, or to be longer neglected; and I am urgently impelled, by a sense of duty, peremptorily to direct that no farther time be lost, in conforming to the instructions communicated to the acting magistrate on the 4th July last, in preference to other business; and that, as soon as the prescribed investigation may be brought to a close, you submit the whole of your proceedings (as already directed), together with my roobacarrée of the foregoing date to the court of circuit. You will not omit to examine the whole of the witnesses whose names are mentioned in the above order, to the points therein directed; besides receiving the evidence of such other persons as you may deem material. You will also be careful to ascertain whether any part of the 400 rupees, of which the complainant swears he was pillaged, was corruptly received by the police darogah of Nohuzzaree, or his subordinates; and take the most effectual means in your power, for the recovery of the stolen cash, to whosever hands it may be traced.

13. The case of Mahomed Sadhokhan requires the immediate interposition of the court. The accusation against the goyendahs named in his petition, amounts to an unqualified charge of robbery by open violence, and should be treated, as such. His house is alleged to have been broken into at night, during his absence from home, by a gang of about 25 persons with torches, who compelled his wife by force and menaces, to disclose where his money was deposited, and did not quit her, till they had thus obtained 305 rupees in cash, besides all the gold and silver trinkets of the women and children of his family, and several articles of household property; property which they took as spoil. She raised the neighbourhood, he says, by her cries; but they could only pity, not assist her, for the chiefs of the gang, disclosed to the terror of them all, that they were goindahs. They then took possession of his house, and after rhyoting therein at his expense, for a complete day and night, quitted it with threats and imprecations; but not till they had extorted 14 rupees more from his wife. You will be pleased to lay the information required, on the 8th instant, in regard to this case, before the court at large, without delay.

* It appears from the Magistrate's report in return to a precept from this Court, that on the 8th September there were no less than 209 prisoners in the baiyut fujwaz jail, some of whom had been in confinement from the 20th April. (Signed) E. W.

14. In one of the cases complained of, your assistant had demanded excessive bail in the sum of 5,000 rupees from the principal party accused, and 500 from each of his people, on charge of a common assault. He was prohibited from exercising this arbitrary discretion in future, and was informed that in all cases which appeared to him of sufficient magnitude to require more than ordinary bail pending the enquiry, he must submit the whole of the proceedings to the magistrate, for his information and orders.

15. The other petitions do not require particular notice. Orders were passed on all, which I conclude have been conformed to.

16. Under the powers vested in the court by Regulation 9, 1807, I inspected the magistrates proceedings in the cases of all the persons in confinement under requisition of security by him for good behaviour, and passed such order, with my reasons at large in such case, as appeared just and proper. I was sorry to observe, that many of these people, had been confined for a very long period, some for upwards of two years, on insufficient grounds. The cases with which I was most dissatisfied, were those of persons doomed to the ignominy of a gaol, without any enquiry whatever having been made, into their general character; or whose character, habits, and means of livelihood, had been found on enquiry, to be good or unexceptionable, merely because their names were thrust into thanah confessions. This is a complete perversion, both of the letter and spirit of section 10. Regulation 22, 1793; which authorizes and directs the magistrates to examine, on oath, vagrants and suspected persons, and also any persons who may have a knowledge of their usual place of residence, occupation, or mode of obtaining their livelihood; and if there shall appear to him, grounds for supposing that they are disorderly or ill disposed people, he shall employ them, in repairing the public roads, &c. until they find security for their good behaviour, &c. or the magistrate shall be satisfied that they will of themselves, take to some service or employment, so as to obtain an honest livelihood. Even supposing the confession, not to have been fabricated, or obtained by improper means, and admitting it, to be evidence against others, which it is not; you would still have no authority as magistrate, to punish the specific offence, by condemning the offender to the public roads, till he finds security for his good behaviour. I cannot too strongly animadvert on a practice which, in its operation tears the bonds of society asunder; degrades and vilifies all ranks and classes, without distinction, and subjects every honest man to infamy and penury, by treating him as a rogue and vagabond. In requiring security for behaviour, you must look to general character; and by that, and that alone, you must be guided. If from the evidence before you, during an investigation into a specific charge, or otherwise, there should be grounds for supposing that the persons accused are disorderly or ill disposed people, or of general bad or dangerous character, it would then be your duty, in conformity with the section quoted, not to release them until they enter into sufficient security for their good behaviour, in such sum as you may deem it expedient to exact, under the particular circumstances of the case; observing it, as an invariable rule, to state the amount in your proceedings. But where nothing appears unfavourable to the general character of a person accused of a specific offence, you possess no power whatever to demand from him security for good behaviour; but he must either be committed for trial before the court of circuit, punished, or discharged, according to the evidence before you under the general Regulations. Your report exhibited several instances of persons improperly confined for security, on suspicion of specific crimes.

17. I found several prisoners in jail, under requisition of security; not for their good behaviour, but simply for their appearance, chiefly on the ground of their having been named in mofussil confessions. One of them (No. 2. of your list) had been in jail, from the second of May 1808. This illegal and objectionable practice of demanding bazir zamenee security from accused persons, previous to their discharge, appears to have been almost generally exercised where there was no ground, either to commit for trial, or to punish, or even to object to character. It attracted my attention, at an early period of the session, and I prohibited it in future.

18. The acting magistrate, in his report of prisoners in confinement for security, by order of the court of circuit, omitted to state under the provisions of section 11. Regulation 53, 1803, whether the accusation of a muchelka by any of the persons who had been confined for a year or upwards, under inability to give the security required, would, in his opinion, be sufficient to provide for the object intended. I nevertheless deemed it proper to call the whole of the prisoners before me, and examine the proceedings held by this court on their respective trials, as far as was necessary to ascertain the grounds on which they were required to find security. This was done with a view of determining, 1st. What prisoners, on consideration of the circumstances of their respective cases (of which circumstances, the magistrate must necessarily be ignorant) were proper objects of release on their muchelka, without security; leaving it to the magistrate to show cause to the court at large, why the prisoners should not be released on muchelka, either in consequence of misbehaviour during their confinement, or on other grounds unconnected with the trial.—2dly. What security in cases where the prisoners are not released on their muchelka, should, under the provisions of of section 9, Regulation 8, 1808, be deemed substantial, to the satisfaction of the court. After duly considering the whole matter, you were furnished with detailed instructions on each of these points, and directed to report to the court at large, your objections at length to the release of any of the prisoners, whom the court do not consider it necessary, under the facts in evidence at the trial, to detain longer in jail.

19. In respect to the prisoners confined for security by order of the Nizamut Adawlut, who were reported pro forma, I had no correct means of forming a judgment; I contented myself therefore with hearing, what they respectively had to allege; and, directing that those who had tendered before me substantial security for their future good conduct, at the different thanahs, should be sent to the several darogahs of police, for the purpose of furnishing it. From this general rule, I except Muddun Roy (No. 50) who stated, that he had tendered security, in vain. It is unnecessary to remind you, that the two goyenudahs, by whom he was accused, were tried by order of the Nizamut Adawlut, and convicted at the present session, of conspiracy and perjury in this very case, and sentenced in conformity to Regulation 2, 1807. You have accordingly been directed to discharge Muddun Roy, on the security tendered by him, or immediately assign your reasons to the court at large, why you do not.

* These persons (some of whom have been confined for the last six years) are not to be set at large, without substantial security for their future good behaviour; but as the amount is not specified, I take the liberty of submitting to the consideration of the Nizamut Adawlut, whether an arbitrary discretion is not thereby left in the breast of the magistrate, to imprison indefinitely, or release at pleasure. The frequent change of magistrates has the necessary effect of precluding local and personal knowledge, in cases of this description; and they have not the means of exercising a sound discretion, in fixing the amount (especially where the order for detention is grounded, on suspicion of gang-robbery) because they have not heard both sides of the question. In some instances, excessive security will be demanded; in others, it will be unwarrantably low.

(Signed) E. W.

20. On looking over the calendars of persons apprehended and discharged, or punished, which were submitted to the court under section 17, Regulation 9, 1793, and section 22, Regulation 9, 1807, and reviewing your proceedings, I observed a few trifling irregularities, which have been pointed out to you; but there are two cases amongst them, which require particular notice. The one, is a case in which three travellers are stated to have been stripped of their property on the road, by a man who had given them poison; which was irregularly decided by your assistant, and does not appear to have been, sufficiently investigated. A farther inquiry is now, impracticable; but it is my duty to remind you, that in cases of such magnitude as this, your assistant (if referred to him at all) should be instructed under the provision of section 21, Regulation 9, 1807; to submit the matter himself. The other, is a mination, for the magistrate's decision, and not determine the matter himself. The other, is an instance of corporal punishment, inflicted by your assistant on a woman, for preferring a groundless complaint. This offence, as well as all others, which the magistrates are empowered to hear and determine, without reference to the court of circuit, (except theft) is punishable by fine, imprisonment, under sections 8 and 16, Regulation 9, 1793; and it is only in cases of petty thefts, which may not have been attended with aggravating circumstances, or committed by persons of notorious bad character, that the magistrates and other assistants are authorized to inflict corporal punishment, not exceeding thirty rattans. You will be careful that no deviation is made from this salutary rule in future, either by yourself or your assistant.

21. These are the only points to which it appears necessary for me to revert in this letter. For details of every description, I must refer you to the separate instructions, you have received at various periods, during the session.

22. I was much gratified, on visiting your jail, in observing the cleanly appearance of the different wards, and the care and attention which is evidently paid to the health and comfort of the prisoners. It is incumbent on me, also, to notice, in favourable terms, the conduct of that portion of your Aumleh who attended me, during the session; and my thanks are, at the same time, due for the facility of access to the foudary records, so obligingly afforded by yourself.

To GEORGE DOWDESWELL, Esq.

Secretary to the Judicial Department, Fort William.

Sir,

1. I have the honour to submit an abstract Statement of the cases of a heinous nature, which were brought before me, at the second quarterly session of jail delivery for the 24 Pergunnahs for the present year, according to the prescribed form.

2. The proof in all the cases of decoity, rested on confessions sent into the magistrate by the police darogahs, which were given in evidence against the prisoners, at their respective trials. An uncorroborated confession before trial, especially when taken by a native officer, is by far the weakest and most suspicious species of testimony, which can be adduced, even where there is no proof of its having been obtained, by improper means; but in all the trials before me for decoity, there were grounds to suspect, that the confessions brought against the prisoners had either been obtained, by false hopes and promises, or extorted, by the impressions of fear, or fabricated; recourse was seldom had to collateral circumstances, to strengthen strengthen a confession, and whenever the attempt was made, it failed. Only one instance occurred, of a prisoner having confessed before the magistrate, a confession received from a thanah; and in this case, there was not merely sufficient evidence to warrant a belief that the confession was false, and afford ground to suspect that it had been confirmed by the prisoner, under the influence of improper means previously made use of towards him; but, the Nizamut Adawlut, to whom the trial was referred, and by whom the prisoner was acquitted, thought proper, under all the circumstances, to direct a public prosecution to be instituted against the police darogah and others, on a charge of conspiracy and perjury against the prisoner and others, named in the confession.

3. The offence of accusing or threatening to accuse innocent persons of crimes punishable with death or transportation, especially of the crime of decoity, with a view to extort money or chattels, or for other criminal purposes, and conspiring to convict them, by fraud and perjury, has, I apprehend, materially increased; but whether I am right or not, in this conjecture, it no doubt prevails, to a very serious extent. I had three cases of conspiracy and perjury touching decoities before me, at the session just concluded. In two of them, the prisoners were convicted and sentenced under the provisions of Regulation 2, 1807. The third ended in an acquittal, for want of legal proof, though strong suspicion existed of the guilt of the accused.

4. I take this opportunity of soliciting the instructions of government, in regard to my return to my station. At this season of the year, the only practicable mode of proceeding to Benares is by water, which will delay the period of my arrival, towards the middle of November. I propose therefore, with the permission of government, to defer my departure till the weather will admit of my travelling by land, so as to reach my station, about the close of the dusseya vacation.

Sir,
Para. 1. I am directed by the right honourable the Governor General in council to transmit to you the accompanying copy of a letter, and its enclosure, from the acting judge of circuit in the division of Calcutta.
2. In that letter, Mr. Watson observes as follows: "The offence of accusing, or threatening to accuse, innocent persons of crimes punishable with death or transportation, especially of the crime of decoity, with a view to extort money or chattels, or for other

"other criminal purposes; and conspiring to convict them, by fraud and perjury, has, I apprehend, materially increased."

3. The offence noticed by Mr. Watson, being of the most serious nature, and pregnant with the worst evils to society, the Governor General in council desires that you will communicate with the officiating magistrate of the 24 Pergunnahs, with the view of ascertaining whether it be still prevalent in the zillah; and if so, of devising the best means for the suppression of it.

4. His Lordship in council likewise desires that you will avail yourself of such opportunities as may occur, of communicating on the subject, with the other magistrates, with the view of ascertaining whether the offence in question exists in other parts of the country; and in case there shall be ground to suppose that it does exist, that you will submit to government such suggestions, as may appear to you best calculated for the extinction of the evil.

I am, &c.

Register to the Nizamut Adawlut.

Calcutta first circuit.

Sir,
Para. 1. In continuation of my address of the 10th instant, I beg you will do me the favour to lay before the court of Nizamut Adawlut, the inclosed copy of a letter which I wrote to the magistrate of the 24 Pergunnahs, at the close of the second quarterly session of jail delivery, at that station, for the present year.

2. As it expresses my sentiments at large on all the points to which it appears to me necessary to advert, I shall not trouble the court, with any separate remarks in this report, but merely subjoin an abstract of the calendar, and a statement (drawn out in the prescribed form) of the prisoners convicted and sentenced by the court of circuit, without reference to the Nizamut Adawlut.

3. It is in my mind, however, of so much importance, that the Nizamut Adawlut should be fully apprized of the nature of the cases of all the persons whom I found in jail, under requisition of security, that I must beg leave to trouble them, in this instance, with details; and accordingly inclose copies of my proceedings in the cases noticed in the 16th, 17th, 18th and 19th paragraphs of my letter to Mr. Blaquiére.

Appendix, No. 12.

MR. SECRETARY DOWDESWELL'S REPORT ON THE GENERAL STATE OF THE POLICE OF BENGAL.

Extract BENGAL Judicial Consultations, 29th September 1809.

Secretary's Report.—Introductory Observations.

IT cannot be unknown to government, that I have for some time past, given a good deal of attention to the state of the police throughout the territories dependent on this presidency; and that I have sought for information on the subject, not only from the official reports which have passed through my hands, as secretary in the judicial department, but likewise, by private and personal communications with several of the officers of that department. The enquiry into which I have been led, has appeared to me more interesting, every step that I have advanced, from a contemplation of the magnitude of the evils which exist, or at least did very recently exist, in the country; and from the acknowledged and obvious importance of an efficient police, to the peace and happiness of society.

In the consideration of this question, I have had occasion to observe, that those evils were in some instances, to be ascribed to the supineness of the local magistrates; but that they were much more generally imputable, to the defects of the existing system. I trust, therefore, that this report will be suppressed, and consigned to oblivion, in the outset; or that the foregoing avowal of my sentiments will be taken, once for all, as an apology for any freedom of remark which may be found on any of the existing Regulations, in the following discussion.

Were this report intended solely for the consideration of the local government of this country, it would be superfluous to enter into details regarding the evils arising from the inefficiency of the police. As, unhappily, occasions have too frequently arisen to arrest their attention on this important subject; but as the arrangements suggested may possibly attract the attention of the honourable the court of directors, to whom those evils may not be so familiar, a brief exposition of them, must be deemed a necessary introduction to any plan which may be suggested for the general improvement of the police.

Were I to enumerate only a thousandth part of the atrocities of the decoits, and of the consequent sufferings of the people, and were I to soften that recital, in every mode which language would permit, I should still despair of obtaining credit, solely on my own authority, for the accuracy of the narrative.

In order, therefore, not to be suspected of detailing fictitious and imaginary horrors, I shall state little on this subject, which has not already received in some sort, the stamp of public authority, either at the hands of government, or of the highest criminal tribunal in this country, beyond the limits of the supreme court of judicature.

In the former report which I had the honour to submit to government on this subject, and which is recorded on the proceedings of the 13th June last, in speaking of the evils attendant on the crime of decoity or gang robbery, it was observed as follows:—"But robbery, rape, and even murder itself, are not the worst figures in this hideous and disgusting picture. An expedient of common occurrence with the decoits, merely to induce a confession of property supposed to be concealed, is to burn the proprietor with straw or torches, until he discloses the property, or perishes in the flames; and when they are actuated by a spirit of revenge against individuals, worse cruelties (if worse, can be) are perpetrated by those remorseless criminals. If the information obtained is not extremely erroneous, the offender*, hereafter noticed, who was apprehended, through the agency of Mr. Blaquiere's goyendas, at Patna, himself committed fifteen murders, in nineteen days; and volumes might be filled, with the recital of the atrocities of the decoits, every line of which, would make the blood run cold with horror."

On this point, Mr. Lumsden, in a Minute recorded on the same day as the report, observes as follows:—"That the existing system of police, has entirely failed in its object, and that the detestable crimes of gang robbery and murder are now equally prevalent, in every part of Bengal (the division of Dacca, perhaps excepted) as at any former period, are truths of too much notoriety to admit of dispute. The details of the enormities which are still committed with impunity, in the immediate vicinity of the capital of British India, as described in the report, are not too highly coloured."

* Gungaram Doss. He has been since convicted and executed. See within Title, No. 2.

THE prisoners were charged, with being part of a gang of decoits, who committed a robbery at the residence and factory of Mr. Faddy, an indigo planter in the Nuddea district; on which occasion, Ghowsee (a servant of Mr. Faddy) was murdered. Mr. Faddy and Mr. Lediard (who was on a visit to Mr. Faddy) and others, were wounded, and property to a considerable amount, was carried off by the robbers.

This attack upon Mr. Faddy appears to have been instigated, by the following circumstances:—The prisoners, Bishnaut, Buddea, Shaundass, and another person named Petumber, were convicted criminals, who had been banished under a sentence of imprisonment to Di-nagepore, from whence they effected their escape, and returned to Nuddea, where they again assembled a very numerous and powerful gang, and committed the most daring robberies and acts of cruelty, and created the greatest terror to the inhabitants. Mr. Faddy had been very active, in communicating to the magistrate such information as he could procure, for the detection and seizure of the principals of the gang, and at length, Panneh Cowne, his head Pyke, having obtained accurate information of the retreat of Petumber before mentioned, he, in conjunction with two of his relations, Meghye and Hisaboodeen, succeeded in seizing the offender, who, however, was severely wounded, in resisting his seizure, and died shortly after. This appears to have instigated the robbery and murder charged against the prisoners.

From the evidence in this case, it appeared that between 3 and 4 o'clock in the morning of the 27th September 1808, Mr. Faddy and Mr. Lediard were alarmed by the report of a gun, and on rising, found the house surrounded by decoits, who, in despite of all resistance (in which one of the gang was shot dead) forced their way into the bungalow, from all sides, and four of them, seized Mr. Faddy, after a considerable struggle, in which he was nearly strangled. Two of the prisoners wrested the gun from his hands. Mr. Lediard's gun having repeatedly missed fire, and he having received a severe spear-wound in his breast, was also disabled from further resistance; both gentlemen, remained entirely in the power of the decoits. During these transactions, the prisoner Bishonaunt repeatedly required Mr. Faddy to deliver up Panneh Cowne Pyke, who appeared to be the immediate object of their vengeance, and to point out, where his own money was. The decoits several times dragged Messrs. Faddy and Lediard to a short distance from the house, treating them with great insult and indignity; some, proposing to put them to death, and others, to put off their ears and nose; the prisoner Buddea in particular, having discovered that one of their gang had been shot, held a drawn sword over Mr. Faddy, and was on the point of striking, but was restrained, by the authority of Bishonaunt. At the approach of day, the decoits retired, carrying off all the arms in the house, about 700 rupees in cash, and other property, to a considerable amount. On their return from Mr. Faddy's house, they set fire to the house of Panneh Cowne, and murdered his two relations, Meghye and Himboodeen, the head of the former being found on the following day, suspended on a tree near the house.

The court of Nizamut adawlut, after a few proceedings, held on the 1st October, 1808, sentenced the prisoners to be hanged by the neck, and the body of the deceased to be buried.

The court of Nizamut adawlut, after a full consideration of all the circumstances and proceedings held on the trial, were fully satisfied of the guilt of the prisoners 1. 2. 3. 4. 5. 6. 7 and 8, in having been concerned in robbery, murder, and other acts of aggravation; and accordingly, under the discretion given by the fatwa of their law officers, sentenced each of the said eight prisoners to suffer death.

The prisoner Jumal not being convicted, but he lying under strong suspicion of being one of the gang, the court directed that he should not be released, without substantial security for his future good conduct, and appearance, when required.

THE prisoners were charged with being the principals of a gang of decoits, who, on the night of the 20th October 1808, attacked the village of Gadpokheria, in the district of Nagpore, and committed the following crimes:—1st. A robbery at the house of Premchund, and the murder of Bhyrob, his brother.—2d. A robbery at the house of Kalipaul, and the murder of Bhyrath, his brother, and Musumut Cheetra, his wife, by burning them to death.—3d. A robbery at the house of Sheebiswas, and burning to death, his mother Musumut Tegee.—4th. A robbery at the house of Musumut Kalender; attended with her murder.

From the evidence in this case, it appeared that the crimes charged against the prisoners, originated chiefly in motives of revenge, for evidence given by some inhabitants of the village, against some of the gang, on a late trial at Krishnagur. The evidence, among other matter, established the following facts:—That about 50 dacoits attacked Kalipaul's house when they found Bhyrob, and tied him to a stake before the house, when the prisoners Koraur Sirdar and Secuebhoo Dunnee, (telling Bhyrob that they "would teach him how to give evidence, against them again,") gave him several mortal wounds, by thrusting a spear through different parts of his body, and cutting him with a sword:—That a party of the robbers, then proceeded towards Premchund's house, whilst others, taking straw from the thatch of Kalipaul's house and lighting it, went into the house, from whence were immediately heard the screams of Kalipaul's brother and wife, for some time without intermission, crying out that they were burnt and tortured, and imploring the robbers for mercy:—That the robbers next went to the house of Sheobiswas, from whence also cries were heard:—That after midnight, when the robbers had departed, the body of Bhyrob was found near the stake, with several wounds on different parts:—That in the house of Kalipaul, were found the bodies of his brother and wife, apparently burnt to death, by the application of torches and lighted straw to different parts:—That the house of Premchund was found plundered:—That in the house, Sheobiswas his mother was found burnt to death, and in that of Mussumut Kalindee, she was found killed, by the thrust of a spear.

The futwah of the law officers of the Nizamut adawlut, declared the whole of the prisoners convicted of being concerned, either as principals or accomplices, in all the robberies and murders laid to their charge, and liable to discretionary punishment, by seaseet extending to death; and the Courthaving no doubt of the guilt of the prisoners, condemned them accordingly to suffer death.

9. Kunkye Kupally	Gang-robbery and murder.
Charges	Principal persons of a gang

THE prisoners were charged with being the principal persons of a gang of robbers, who, on the night of the 27th August 1808, attacked and plundered the house of Loharam, the prosecutor's secutors' father, at Madhobpore, a village in the Nuddea district, and murdered the above-mentioned Loharam, together with Mussumut Coomona, the prosecutor's mother.

The Prisoners pleaded Not Guilty.

From the evidence on the trial, the murder of these persons appears to have been attended with unexampled cruelty. The prosecutor related the circumstances, as follows:—That about 12 o'clock on the night on which the robbery and murders took place, he was sleeping in a house at a short distance from that of his father, and being awake by the noise of robbers, went out, and saw that a party of about 50 decoits had attacked his father's house; that from fear, he concealed himself, in a plantain garden within 50 yards of the spot, from whence he saw the robbers drag out from the house, his father and mother; and after binding their hands and feet, apply lighted straw and torches to their bodies, demanding of them, at the same time, to point out where their money was concealed; that the unfortunate people assured them, they had none; but that the robbers proving inexorable, went into the house and brought from it, a quantity of hemp, which they twisted round the body of Loharam, and after pouring on it ghee, or clarified butter, to render it more inflammable, set fire to it:—That they then procured a quilt from the house, which they also moistened with ghee, and rolled round the body of Loharam:—That the prisoners 'Balka Sirdar, 'Nubboo Sirdar, and 'Kumkye Capally, at the direction of the prisoner 'Bulram Sirdar, threw the prosecutor's father on the ground, and keeping him down, with a which they held over his breast, set fire to the quilt:—That at this time, the unfortunate man were most shocking, the robbers continually calling on him to give up his money was, and he assuring them that he had none, and imploring them to take him to further cruelty, having procured some mustard seed, and torn up the flesh of Loharam's breast, by drawing a large bamboo several times, across it, pounded the mustard seed on the sores, with a view to make the torment more excruciating:—That, at the same time, the mother of the prosecutor was tortured nearly in the same manner, by the robbers tying hemp round her body, and setting fire to it, and dragging her about from place to place, by the hair of her head, calling on her all the while, to tell them where her husband's money was concealed; and also calling out on the prosecutor by name, to come and witness the state of his father and mother:—That these cruelties, together with the plunder of the house of Loharam and other ones adjacent, continued until between 3 and 4 o'clock in the morning, at which time, the robbers departed; and that the prosecutor, on going up to his father and mother, found them most dreadfully mangled, but still alive; that his father the prosecutor swore to have recognized, at the murder of his parents, in addition to 'Bulram Sirdar, 'Balka Sirdar, 'Nubboo Sirdar and 'Kumkye Capally, before mentioned, were:—'Dacooa Sirdar, 'Shookoor Peada, 'Madary Peada, 'Calichurn Ghose and 'Nubboo Sirdar; and he also specified 'Casinauth Bagdy and 'Gulda Barooge.

Several witnesses on the part of the prosecution (Inhabitants of the village) confirmed the circumstance related by the prosecutor.

The court in consequence, sentenced the prisoners convicted, nine in number, to suffer death.

AN accurate judgment of the nature of the evils in question, may be formed from the foregoing documents. It is not so easy to judge of their extent. The state of the police has been very different, in different zillahs; and in the same zillah, at different periods of time. Even the various parts of one and the same district, may not always be equally infested with the crime of gang robbery.—In transcribing therefore the following extract from the orders passed by government on the 30th June last, upon an enquiry made by Mr. H. Shakespear, into the prevalence of gang robbery in the tannah of Beenipore, that is, in about the 13th part of the district of Hooghly, it is proper to remark that there is substantial reason to believe that the crime in question, was not by any means, so prevalent in other parts of that district. On the other hand, there are grounds to apprehend that in the district of Nuddea and Rajshahye generally, the crime of decoity had at one period, become still more prevalent than it was in Beenipore, at the time to which Mr. Shakespear's report refers. The following is an extract from the orders passed by government on that report.

"The following appears to be the result of Mr. Shakespear's enquiries respecting the public offences committed within those parts of the tannah of Beenipore, to which his investigation extended, from the month of Bysaack 1215, to the month of Tyte 1216, (13 months.)

After the foregoing exposition, which I have rendered as brief as the nature of the case would permit, I presume that any augmentation of expense which may be required for the suppression of a crime, so pregnant with evils, so fatal to the peace and happiness of society, will not for a moment, be thought an object. By augmentation of expense, I mean the immediate increase of establishments; for it appears to me demonstrable, that if the many appropriated to this purpose be productive of the end desired, that is, the reform of the police, it will ultimately be attended, even with pecuniary benefit to government.

On this question, the following observations of the Governor General in Council, appear to me to be perfectly in point; with this difference, that what is there stated with respect to the arrangements adopted in one district, viz. the jungle Mohauls, is to be considered applicable to the country at large.

"We apprehend, that a plan of that nature can never be duly appreciated, solely from the immediate expense attending it: considered only in that point of view, an argument may always be drawn, against the adoption of it. In order, however, to form a proper judgment on the question, it is to be considered, whether the more regular and certain collection of the public revenue, the prevention of disturbances, and consequently of the expense with which the suppression of them is ever attended, the saving of rewards for the apprehension of criminals; the prevention of loss by the robbery of remittances of public treasure, &c. do not in the aggregate, counterbalance the immediate expense, with which any such plan is attended."

The foregoing remarks premised; I now proceed to the immediate subject of this Report, which will be considered, under the following heads:

- Office of Superintendent of Police,
- Office of Magistrate,
- Darogahs of Police,
- Zemindars and others,
- Secret Service,
- Office of Superintendent of Police.

OFFICE OF SUPERINTENDENT OF POLICE.

This office, considered as an active and efficient establishment, has only existed since the enactments of Regulation IX, 1808, or from 4th November of that year. Previously to that period, it seems to have been supposed, contrarily I imagine to the practice of every well-governed state, that a local police, that is, the appointment of a magistrate in each district, on the aid of one or two European assistants, and of establishments of native officers, was adequate to the difficult task of discovering the haunts of gangs of decoits, of watching their movements, of forming plans for their apprehension, and of carrying those plans into execution. Had the depredations of this kind of criminals, been confined to particular districts, the principle of those arrangements would not have been so very erroneous; it is evident, however, that persons addicted to predatory habits, may wander from district to district, according as local and temporary circumstances may invite them: the consequence is, that after a magistrate may have watched the movements of gangs of decoits, and may have nearly matured his plans for their apprehension, those plans are entirely defeated by the emigration of the offenders to another district, where to his orders; where his immediate officers, instead of obtaining assistance and co-operation, would experience every possible obstruction from these classes of people; where, in other words, he has no efficient power; and where all further efforts on his part, to apprehend the offenders, must almost, without exception, be fruitless and unavailing.

We have frequently seen, that in consequence of the energy and activity of a particular magistrate, the district under his immediate charge, has been nearly freed from the depredations of decoits. In effecting that object, some of their number have, doubtless, been apprehended. By far the greater part of them have, however, on all such occasions, emigrated to other districts, where the qualities above noticed, did not exist in the same degree, in the local magistrates. The consequence has been, that the best directed efforts of those praise-worthy officers, have rather tended to relieve particular districts from the effects of decoity, than to free the country at large, from this intolerable evil.

The justness of the foregoing observations, may be established, by facts of very recent occurrence. The measures taken to relieve the districts of Nuddeah from the alarming height to which gang robbery had risen in that district, have been noticed in my former report, and are of course too well known to government, to require any recital in this place. In consequence of those measures, all the principal decoits, who were not immediately apprehended, retired; some, to the district of Hooghly; some, to the district of Burdwan; and some, as far as Backergunge. It is evident, therefore, that whatever relief the exertions made, might have afforded to the district of Nuddeah, the rest of the country would have been far from benefiting by them, had not the suppression of gang robbery been pursued in those districts also, in the same spirit in which it had been commenced in Nuddeah. The superintendent of police directed his particular attention to the apprehension of the gangs which had retired to Hooghly and to Burdwan; Mr. Blaquiere was invested with powers correspondent to those of the superintendent in Backergunge; and the magistrate of Nuddeah was invested with similar powers in Burdwan, with a view to the more effectual protection of the eastern part of that district. The experience hitherto obtained respecting the success of the exertions of those officers, justify the conclusion, that the most substantial benefits may be derived from the labours of the superintendent of police, combined with other arrangements, which will be submitted, under different heads of this report.

It is not, however, by a fixed residence in the vicinity of the city of Calcutta, that the important objects of the superintendent's appointment, can be accomplished. It is by proceeding, as often as his own discretion may suggest, or the wisdom of government may direct, to any part of his extensive jurisdiction, where his services may be required. It is, by visiting the cities of Moorshedabad and Dacca, and collecting at those places information respecting the state of the police, in all the circumjacent districts; it is, by visiting the northern frontier of the province of Bengal, or the southern extremity of Orissa, as occasion may require. It is, by these and similar means that the principal object of his appointment, the suppression of gang robbery throughout the lower provinces, can alone be effected.

It is stated in the letter to the Nizamut adawlut, dated 13th June last, "that the principal cause why the measures hitherto adopted for protection of the public against robbery by open violence, have been ineffectual, is the very defective information which government and the principal authorities under government possessed, respecting the actual state of the police."

The defect here noticed, may arise, either from the very imperfect information which the local local magistrates themselves possess, respecting the state of the police, or from an ill-judged, but not an unnatural solicitude, to represent the districts, in the most favourable state possible. In either case, it appears quite impossible, that with the existence of such an office as that of Superintendent of Police, whose duty it will be, whether at the presidency, or in the interior of the country, to obtain every possible information respecting the state of the police of the different districts, government should remain long unapprized, of the prevalence of gang robbery, or of any public offence, in any part of the country, within the limits of the superintendent's jurisdiction.

On the grounds above noticed, it appears essential that the superintendent of police should be relieved, from the local duties of magistrate of the 24 pergunnahs. The superintendent, even when resident at the presidency, will find ample occupation, in considering and digesting the reports of the local magistrates; in collecting information from the zemindars, farmers, or their vakeels resident at Calcutta, and in forming and executing plans for the apprehension of public offenders. But a considerable part of the superintendent's time must be passed, as already noticed, at the other stations; and on all such occasions, it is of course impossible that he should discharge the duties of magistrate of the 24 pergunnahs.

REMARKS.

Extract of Orders to the Magistrates, dated 24th June 1809.

"I am directed to transmit to you the enclosed extract of a letter from the superintendent of police, together with the fore-mentioned, to accompany it in the Persian language; and to acquaint you that the right honourable the Governor General in Council desires that you will transmit punctually to the office of the superintendent, in the proposed form, the substance of all information obtained by you either from the darogahs or the zemindars or farmers, respecting the commission of any decoity, murder, arson, or highway robbery."

2. "You are desired to encourage the zemindars and farmers to furnish you with immediate intelligence of any occurrences of that nature, which may take place within the limits of their respective estates and farms. You will observe, that separate reports are to be transmitted to the superintendent, of intelligence obtained through their means, and of the information furnished by the darogahs of police."

3. "In the letter accompanying those reports, you will of course state to the superintendent, any observations which may appear to you calculated to facilitate the apprehension of public offenders."

Copy of Orders to the Acting President of the Board of Revenue, and Persian Secretary, dated 24th June 1809.

"I am directed to transmit to you the enclosed extract of a letter from the superintendent of police, and to acquaint you that the right honourable the Governor General in Council desires that you will encourage the zemindars and farmers, or their vakeels, who may be in attendance at your office, to wait upon the superintendent from time to time, for the purpose of furnishing him with any information in their power, respecting the general state of the police in that part of the country from which they come, or which may be otherwise known to them."

If there be any truth in the evidence noticed in the margin, and the accuracy of it, might be confirmed by a variety of circumstances, there are grounds to apprehend, that some of the sirdars of banditti, who reside ordinarily, in some of our most western provinces, or perhaps beyond those territories, organize gangs for the commission of robberies so far as the province of Benares, or possibly the province of Behar. It is only, therefore, by the appointment of an officer, who can watch the movements of such offenders, through the whole sphere of their depredations, that any reasonable expectation can be entertained of their speedy apprehension; at all events, it is quite impossible that the exertions of the local magistrates, whose respective influence and power do not extend Extract from Bundelcund Magistrate's Letter of the 21st July 1809.

"The inhabitants of the village Murkahi are and have long been, notorious for their refractory spirit; and are said to live by expeditions of plunder into the Vizier's dominions, and possessions of the surrounding chiefs, and even into the Company's dominions in the Doab."

Extract of a Letter from the Magistrate of Etawah, dated 4th July, 1809.

"I beg leave to acquaint you, for the information of the right honourable the Governor General in Council, that the notorious rebel Rhimai, accompanied by about six hundred armed followers, attacked the village of Hauderbarry dependent on the Fyre Buddereah in Pergunnah Kas Gunge, on the morning of the 25th ultimo; and having burnt and plundered the village and killed six men and wounded eight others severely, he effected his escape into a jungle called koorhar, in the district of Ally Gheer, contiguous to Pergunnah Kas Gunge; and I have just received information from the officers of the police at that place, that he has now concentrated his force there, and threatens to plunder the whole of the Pergunnah, unless immediate measures are taken to prevent him."

"As the officers of police are by no means able to contend with, and much less able to protect the inhabitants from, the atrocious acts of violence of this powerful marauder; &c."

country, and possessing the information which, by the means noticed in a subsequent part of this report, it will not be difficult for him to obtain, would frequently be able to form plans with success, for the apprehension of persons engaged in such offences.

Government has already ordered a corps of irregular horse to be raised for the more effectual support of the police, in the ceded and conquered provinces; which corps is to be quartered at Furruckabad. This circumstance, combined with the geographical situation of Furruckabad, naturally suggests this place, as the proper station for the ordinary residence of the superintendent. In such case, it may be advisable that the duty at present entrusted to the local magistrate of Furruckabad, with respect to that corps, should be transferred to the superintendent. It is scarcely credible, that if proper means are employed by that officer, to obtain information respecting the designs and movements of banditti, with so powerful an engine as a corps of irregular horse at his disposal, he should not be able speedily to suppress the commission of robbery by open violence.—At all events, government by this arrangement will obtain, as in the lower provinces, accurate information respecting the state of the police in the different districts, which will enable them to adopt, from time to time, such measures for the protection of the public, as may appear necessary.

It is not however, in my judgment, sufficient to appoint a superintendent of police on the footing above stated, in the lower provinces, and another in the western provinces.—It also appears extremely desirable that government should possess the power of nominating joint superintendents, whenever circumstances may require it, in each of these divisions of the country. The permanent superintendents may be equal to the discharge of the ordinary duties of those stations. It is evident, however, that disorders may arise in different parts of the country, which may require the personal exertions of two or more officers, to suppress them.—As the latter officers, will be only temporary, the arrangement will be attended with little

The hands of robbers above noticed, are ordinarily not less numerous, than the gangs of decoits in the lower provinces, and possess a degree of intrepidity, far surpassing that of the latter. To attempt therefore, to meet the evil, with the ordinary establishments of police, consisting of a darogah and about 20 burkundazes, seems to be entirely out of the question. It is only by well-concerted plans, supported by military force, that the object in view can be effected. But the local magistrates, confined in their jurisdiction by the limits of a single district, are ill calculated (as already observed) for the performance of that duty. Let it be supposed, for instance, that a robbery is concerted within the district of Allygheer, that the gang collects in the different zillahs lying between that district and the district of Juanpore, and that the robbery is ultimately perpetrated, in the last-mentioned district; it seems evident that in such case, none of the local magistrates could act with effect, especially the magistrate of Juanpore, as the offenders would not probably enter his district until a few hours before the perpetration of the robbery. A superintendent, however, of police, having jurisdiction throughout that extent of little expense to government. Whenever such nominations may take place, the occasional superintendents should be invested with the same powers, as the permanent superintendent.

It appears essential that government should also possess the power of determining whenever the superintendent or his temporary colleague may proceed in person into any of the districts, whether the local magistrate should continue to discharge the duties of that office, or otherwise. In ordinary cases, it may be most convenient that the zillah or city magistrate should continue to perform those functions. In other instances however, it may be essential that he should be divested of the discharge of them, and that the duties of the magistrate should be committed exclusively to the superintendent.

It remains to offer a few observations on the powers which should be exercised by the superintendent and his officers, relative to the local authorities of the different districts comprised within his jurisdiction. It must be evident to government, that the superintendent and his officers will be liable to great counteractions from the local police, and that consequently, the best concerted plans for the apprehension of criminals may be frustrated, unless they are armed with such authority as shall render all such attempts abortive.—For that reason, I would propose that the superintendent be invested with a certain controul over all the zillah and city magistrates within his jurisdiction; and that his officers be declared in a great degree, independent of the native local officers of police. The following are the principal rules, which I would recommend to be established with respect to this point:—

First,—That the zillah and city magistrates be required to conform to all orders which may be issued to them by the superintendent, in matters connected directly or indirectly with the discharge of his own official duties.

Secondly,—That the officers of the superintendent of police, be rendered independent, except in case of great enormity, of the local police authorities, and that the former be only held responsible for any acts of misconduct to the superintendent himself, whose duty it will of course be, to take cognizance of any cases of that nature.

Of course, some more specific provisions will be requisite on the latter point, should the principles of the present arrangement be adopted and carried into effect.

OFFICE OF MAGISTRATE.
No objections occur to the principles on which the office of magistrate, in the different cities and zillahs, has been constituted. The error was (as already noted) in supposing that this office was of itself, adequate to the suppression of public offences.

In the preceding section of this report, I have detailed the means which appear to me best calculated to obviate the inconveniences arising from the circumscribed jurisdiction of the local magistrates; and under the present head, I shall state the aids which may, I conceive, be obtained, in support of the local police, by means of such other European agency as we possess in the country.

One of the most efficient and (it might have been supposed) the most obvious, of those aids, is to invest the person in charge of one district with the ordinary powers of magistrate in the adjoining district.

The different zillahs being divided from each other, in many cases only, by an imaginary and frequently, a very ill-defined boundary, it is evident that great facilities of escape must be afforded to criminals, by retiring from one zillah to another, as may suit their convenience,—from the zillah in which they have committed offences, and where their crimes must necessarily have attracted the attention of the magistrate, to a district where the local authorities may have little or no knowledge, either of the offenders or the offences, or (which is too frequently the case) where they may find protection from some of the native officers of police. If, however, the magistrate of the first-mentioned zillah, could act with effect in the latter, the means of escape to such criminals, must necessarily be materially contracted.

I am aware of only one objection, which could be urged to a general application of this principle, which is, that it might occasionally create a collision of authority between the two magistrates. That it would be productive of that effect, when persons were actuated more by a puerile jealousy than by a real zeal for the public good, I cannot doubt; but that it necessarily leads to any such consequences, putting all personal considerations out of the question, is what I cannot discern. On the whole, however, it may be expedient that the arrangement in question, should only be adopted, according as circumstances may require it, and at the discretion, in each case, of the Governor General in Council. So long as the local magistrates shall perform the duties of their stations with effect, there can be little occasion for the interference of the magistrate of the adjoining district, or even of the superintendent of police; but whenever public crimes become prevalent in any district, it appears to me that both these aids may be resorted to, with great benefit and effect.

It is not solely on any general reasoning, that the arrangement here noticed is recommended. The benefits experienced from Mr. Blaquiere's co-operation in the districts of Nuddea, Jessore and Backergunge; the successful exertions made by Mr. Elliot (magistrate of Nuddea) in the district of Burdwan; and of Mr. Pattle (magistrate of Rajshaye in Mymensing) are all practical proofs of the substantial advantages, with which this plan is likely to be attended.

Another aid, which may be employed with considerable effect, is the deputation of assistants to those parts of a district, in which public crimes, especially gang robbery, may at any time, become prevalent. The principal causes of the prevalence of such crimes, are the supineness, and in some cases, the connivance, not only of the zemindars, farmers, and others, but of the police darogahs themselves. Considering the great extent of the different districts, it may be frequently difficult and sometimes impracticable for a magistrate residing at the principal station, to adopt any effectual measures for the apprehension of public offenders, and still more, for the detection of the abuses on the part of his police officers or others, by which the evil may have been prevented. This duty would however be easily performed by a capable a capable assistant on the spot, and in all such cases, it may be advisable that the assistant should be invested with the powers of magistrate, to enable him to act with greater effect.

It may be observed on this point, as has been done with respect to the preceding question, that the benefits which may be anticipated from the frequent deputation of assistants on the footing above described, do not rest solely on opinion. Very considerable benefit was recently derived from the deputation of Mr. Ewer into the interior of the district of Rajshaye; and the magistrates themselves, appear so sensible of the advantages with which it may be attended, that the magistrate of that district recently again recommended, that his assistant should be deputed into the interior of the district on the public service; and the magistrate of Etawah submitted a similar recommendation for the deputation of his assistants into certain parts of that district.

I cannot conclude this branch of the subject without observing, that whatever arrangements be adopted, it is indispensably necessary that the magistrates should exert a much greater degree of personal activity than what, with very few exceptions, they do at present. By this remark, I do not mean to impute any intentional neglect of duty to the magistrates. On the contrary, I believe that they think that they have fully discharged the obligations of their public duty, in passing orders on the reports of the police darogahs, and in investigating charges which may be preferred by individuals. It cannot, however, in my judgment, be too often or too strongly inculcated, that there can be no police in this country, unless the magistrates will from time to time, visit the different tanahs, listen with their own ears, and see with their own eyes, instead of depending on the reports of officers, entirely unworthy of confidence or credit. By this suggestion, I do not mean that the magistrates should make regular circuits of their districts at stated periods, but that they should proceed instantly to any quarter of their jurisdiction, where they may have reason to believe that public offences are prevalent, or that abuses are committed by the darogahs, and above all, when they are least expected by those officers. An objection has, I believe, been sometimes made to such visits, grounded on the interruption which it might occasion in the conduct of the business of the civil court; but surely if the police, or the trial of civil causes, must experience interruption and injury, it is much better that the latter should suffer, than the former. It seems, however, to be a mistake, to suppose that either will ultimately suffer from that cause. It is, in fact, only by establishing an efficient and well regulated police, that the judge and magistrate (united as those offices are, in the same person) can never find time for the duties of the civil court. When public offences at any time, become prevalent in a district, the business of the criminal department is multiplied to such a degree, that it requires not only the undivided attention of one, but in many cases, of three or four persons to transact it.

DAROGAHS OF POLICE.
The zillah and city magistrates, like the justice of the peace in England, or in the city of Calcutta, are properly invested with considerable powers, being persons of education and character, and possessing some knowledge of the general principles of law. But the darogahs of police form a class of officers, to whom, if we consider their extensive powers, on the one side, and their general character and situation in life, on the other, I can find nothing in the smallest degree analogous, under our own constitution.

The darogahs are not only authorized to apprehend persons in the actual commission of public offences; to make immediate pursuit after such offenders; and to seize persons detected with the stolen goods in their possession (duties to which all subordinate officers of police are confined, under our laws); they are likewise empowered to receive charges and information respecting the commission of all crimes, public offences and misdemeanors, of whatever description, without any limitation as to the time when they may have been committed; to determine whether such charges or information shall be received on oath, or under a solemn declaration (a point of material importance, considering the prejudices of the natives with respect to an oath); whether it be proper to proceed against the party accused, by the immediate arrest of his person, or only by summons; to determine whether the case reference should be made on the subject, to the magistrate, to determine whether the case be bailable or otherwise, &c.; to fix the amount of the bail; to hold inquests on the bodies of persons, supposed to have died an unnatural death; to make or cause to be made, at their discretion, a local enquiry respecting the commission of any recent robbery or other violent crime; and finally, to apprehend, and send to the magistrates, individuals coming under the vague denomination of "vagrants and suspected persons."

The foregoing is, I believe, a tolerably accurate review of the general powers vested in the darogahs of police,—powers, which are of almost equal extent with those of a single justice of the peace under our laws; which never have been confided to any subordinate peace officers in England; and which indeed would not be tolerated for a moment, in that country.

To judge of the expediency of continuing to vest such extensive powers in the darogahs of police, it is of importance to enquire, how far the persons ordinarily appointed to fill those situations, are qualified for the discharge of the duties entrusted to them.

The darogahs of police are not chosen from any particular class of people, and consequently seldom, if ever, possess any previous instruction, as to the nature and extent of their duties, nor any habits of life calculated to enable them to perform those duties with effect. A bramini*, a sirdar, a moonshy, or even a menial servant, is each in his turn, a candidate for this situation. It is easy to conceive the degree

* "A Bengally brahmin, it will generally be admitted, is of all human beings the least qualified of knowledge possessed by such persons. It is equally easy to judge, from their former habits of life, of their fitness for a situation, requiring on all occasions great activity, and in many, a very considerable share of personal courage.

"qualified for the office of a police darogah, and yet I understand that the thanadar of Mozufferpore, and of two or three other police stations, are persons of this description," &c. &c.

Extract of a letter from Mr. Ernst, dated 14th June 1809.

"Thus it will be seen, that in the accompanying statement the number of dacoities in Benneepore, reported by the police officers, amount to 16; whereas, according to Mr. Blaquiere's mode of computation, it would be 33, being the number of houses or persons robbed."

Their agency, even in furnishing information respecting the commission of public offences; a duty which requires no particular exertions or capacity, is totally ineffectual. In the tannah of Benneepore, in the district of Hooghly, only 33 dacoities had been reported to have taken place, from Bysack 1215, to Jeyte 1216, a period of thirteen months; whereas it appeared from a local inquiry made by Mr. H. Shakespear, that in those parts only of the tannah to which his investigation extended, 104 houses had been robbed during the above-mentioned period of time, attended with the wounding of - 8 } torture of - 3 } Persons.
murder of - 5 }

Happy, however, it would be, if the defects already noticed were the greatest, to be found in the character of the police darogahs. The vices which render them a pest to the country, are their avarice, and addiction to every species of extortion.

In speaking of this class of officers, the late magistrate of Hooghly (as noticed in my former report) observes as follows:

"All descriptions of police officers require to be narrowly watched; and it is only by this means, and by making severe examples among them, when they are guilty of misconduct, that they can be kept to their duty. During three years that I was at Burdwan, I punished several police officers myself; and I committed for trial no less than eleven darogahs, who were all convicted before the court of circuit, and sentenced to different terms of imprisonment, from three months to three years. Since I have been at Hooghly, four darogahs have been punished and dismissed from their offices, and four more, will be tried before the court of circuit in the present sessions. I have found the good effects of these measures of severity; and situated as the police officers are, it cannot be expected that any better sentiment than that of fear, should keep alive a sense of duty, amidst all the temptations which surround them."

By an abstract which I caused to be prepared from the records of my office, it appears that 84 darogahs were dismissed from their offices for misconduct, between the periods of the 1st January 1808, and the 31st August 1809; and that seven of those persons, were ordered to be tried before the criminal courts, on account of the aggravating circumstances with which the offences committed by them were attended.

The number of persons so punished, will doubtless appear considerable; but great as it is, I believe it bears no more proportion to the number of offences actually committed by the darogahs, than the number of crimes reported by them, bears to the number of crimes actually perpetrated within the limits of the different tannahs.

The natural remedy for this evil is to simplify the duties of the darogahs, and to confine them to the exercise of such functions, as are essential to the immediate maintenance of the peace of the country.

The offences of which the darogahs in some form or other take cognizance, may be reduced to four heads, — 1st. Petty offences, such as inconsiderable assaults, abusive language, &c. which are punishable by the magistrates. — 2d. Bailable offences, such as forgery, adulteries, as murder, robbery by open violence, &c. — 3d. Actual breaches of the peace and serious affrays; and, 4thly, the more heinous crimes, as murder, robbery by open violence, &c.

With the impression which I have, respecting the general character of the darogahs, and the intolerable vexations with which their interposition is attended, I cannot hesitate in recommending, that they be precluded from all interference whatever in future, in any of the special warrant in each case, from the magistrate; and that individuals having charges or complaints to prefer of that nature, institute them in the first instance, at the magistrate's cutcherry. I am aware that persons may sometimes experience inconvenience, from the necessity of proceeding to the magistrate's cutcherry to prefer a complaint; but I am not certain on the whole, that this may not prove a very salutary check to litigation. Confident I am, that if it be an evil, it is a much smaller one, than that which arises from the exactions and oppressions of all kind at present committed by the darogahs.

The third and fourth classes of offences comprehend actual breaches of the peace and serious affrays, — theft, arson, counterfeiting the coin, house-breaking, robbery, and murder; in which cases, no restrictions can, consistently with the peace of the country, be imposed on the agency of the darogahs, who should on the contrary be encouraged, and required to make every exertion for the apprehension of offenders, either flagrante delicto, or on formal complaints preferred by individuals.

The darogahs, however, at present possess by far too great a latitude of action, in cases of homicide, or their powers are very ill defined by the existing Regulations. It appears to me that in cases of murder and manslaughter, they should uniformly send the party accused under safe custody to the magistrate, and that in cases of accidental and justifiable homicide, they should as regularly admit the party to bail.

On this branch of the subject, I have only to add, that from the enquiries which I have made, it appears to me indispensably necessary, that the course of proceeding prescribed for for the guidance of the darogahs by Section 18, Regulation IX, 1807, should be considerably modified. I do not mean with respect to the inquiries on dead bodies; but with respect to robberies, and the consequences with which they have been attended. These investigations are almost uniformly, I believe, a source of exaction. That, however, is not the greatest evil with which they are attended. In the confusion and alarm incident to a recent robbery, attended frequently, as has been seen from the above reports on trials, with murder and the most horrid cruelties, the inhabitants of a village are required to give information respecting those atrocities. Some of them, intimidated by the spirit of revenge by which they know that the decoits are usually actuated, deny all knowledge on the subject; others, in the agitation and alarm naturally occasioned by the perpetration of such offences, give inaccurate and inconsistent accounts of the circumstances attending them; — brought, in cooler moments of reflection, before the courts of judicature, all those persons, may be capable of giving (and frequently do give) clear and consistent accounts of the circumstances attending the robbery. Their evidence is however then, contrasted with their former declaration, rejected as fabricated, and the witnesses themselves perhaps committed for perjury.

To remedy this inconvenience, I would propose that on the commission of any recent robbery, the darogah should be required (as at present) to proceed to the spot, and furnish a report under his own signature, of the nature and circumstances of the case; but that it be left entirely optional with the villagers to attest a soorut haal, or not, as they may deem proper. In cases in which no apprehensions may exist of future consequences, it is natural to conclude that they will have no hesitation in signing such instrument. When such impressions may prevail in their minds, the soorut haals may lead to error; but cannot be productive of any beneficial effects. If I am not greatly deceived, the rule, as it at present stands, has obstructed very materially the course of criminal justice.

ZEMINDARS AND OTHERS.

Different opinions have been entertained respecting the services which should be rendered by the zemindars, farmers, and by other proprietors and managers of land, in support of the police. Some persons have contended, in defiance I think of the known character of the people, and certainly, in opposition to all the experience obtained of their conduct previously to the establishment of the system of 1793, that the above classes of our subjects ought to be rendered the principal, if not the sole instruments, in the maintenance of the public peace. Others, again, are of opinion, that if the zemindars and others be invested with any share of power with respect to the police, they will not only abuse it as peace officers, but likewise render it an engine of oppression, in the collection of their rents.

Extract from the preamble of Regulation XXII. 1793.

The clause in the engagements of the land-holders and farmers of land, by which they were bound to keep the peace, and in the event of any robbery being committed in their respective estates or farms, to produce both the robbers and the property plundered, having not only been found nugatory, but in numerous instances proved the means of multiplying robberies and other disorders, from collusion which subsisted between the perpetrators of them and the police officers entertained by the land-holders and farmers of land, in virtue of the clause above mentioned, the Governor General in Council, with a view to afford that protection to the persons and property of the people, which is so necessary to their happiness and to the public welfare, was pleased to pass certain Regulations on the 7th December 1792. Those Regulations are now re-enacted with alterations and amendments.

every individual, to aid, according to the extent of his means, in the apprehension of public offenders, I do not conceive that any natural right would be infringed by rendering the different classes of people above noticed, especially responsible for the immediate communication of intelligence of all serious offences to the proper officers. — This principle is in fact already recognized in Sections 12, 13 and 14, Regulation IX, 1808, with respect to proclaimed decoits; and all that seems to be required is, the extension of it, to all murders, robberies, and other heinous crimes. By these means, without investing the zemindars and others with any actual power respecting the police, we should obtain full information respecting the commission of public offences. It is to the defect of that information, more than to any other cause, that the present imperfect state of the police is to be attributed.

By the existing Regulations, the zemindars and others in the province of Bengal, are declared responsible for all robberies which may have been committed "with their connivance, or in which they may have received any part of the property stolen or plundered, or harboured the offenders, aided, or refused to give effectual assistance to prevent their escape, or omitted to afford every assistance in their power to the officers of government for their apprehension;" and in the province of Benares, and in the Ceded and Conquered provinces it appears to have been intended to render the zemindars and others, in a more especial manner responsible for all such offences. But in both cases, the the rules are clogged with so many provisos, that I doubt whether a single instance can be adduced, (notwithstanding the suspected connivance and acknowledged negligence of the zemindars and others, in all matters respecting the police) of the penalties prescribed for such misconduct being enforced against them. It consequently follows, that the rules in question, may be rescinded without inconvenience.

Under the present head, I must beg leave to advert to Regulation XII, 1797, for the appointment of police aumeens in the province of Bengal, Behar and Orissa, extended to Benares, and to the Ceded and Conquered provinces by Regulation XIV, 1807:—Those rules have likewise, with the exception of the district of Moradabad, proved a mere nullity; and if I may be permitted to express myself freely, this is the best consequence with which they would have been attended.

In the foregoing remarks, I have drawn what appears to me to be a just character both of the zemindars and the darogahs.—I have at the same time, endeavoured to show the inexpediency of vesting any share of actual power, in the former, and the absolute necessity of circumscribing materially, the authority of the latter. By the appointment of police aumeens, it was proposed to unite the influence of the zemindars with the power of the darogahs. The persons acting in that capacity, were not to receive any salary, nor even the pay of their establishments: consequently, they would have been entirely free from the ordinary checks arising from the apprehension of the loss of authorized emoluments, in the event of their dismissal from office.

Other reasons might I think, be urged against the provisions of the Regulation. Scarcely any persons have been found willing to accept the office on the prescribed terms, and the Regulation has consequently proved nugatory. It cannot require further argument to recommend that it be rescinded in toto.

It would be an omission, not to notice in this place, the village or zemindarry pikes, to whom should be added, the pikes and burkundosses in the service of merchants and others. The character and situations of these people, rendered it extremely difficult to convert them into faithful and efficient instruments of police. With respect to their character, they are watchmen and robbers alternately. In regard to their situation in life, selected and paid as they are, by individuals, it must of course be difficult to render them subservient in the proper degree, to the controul and authority of the magistrates. Instances however are not wanted, in which this class of people have rendered very beneficial services, in the apprehension of public offenders. If they possessed the will, in the same degree as they possess the means for that purpose, they might become a most powerful instrument of police, from their personal courage and local knowledge. The best means of rendering this class of people efficient are, I think, stated in section 13, Regulation XXII, 1793, except that the register ordered to be made of their names, should be submitted to a very different authority than that of the darogahs.

Section 13, Regulation XXII, 1793.

All pykes, chokedars, pansbauns, dusades, negabans, harces, and other descriptions of village watchmen, are declared subject to the orders of the darogah: he shall keep a register of their names, &c. &c.

I am afraid, likewise, that the rule, as it now stands, is imperfectly attended to in practice. To remedy this inconvenience, and to render this class of people, including, as above noticed, the pykes and burkundosses of individuals, as efficient as the nature of the case will permit; I beg leave to submit the following suggestions, which will be found to be nearly conformable in substance, to an existing provision in the Regulation for the support of the police in the district of Cuttack.—1st. That the collectors be required to form complete registers of the lands at present assigned for the support of pykes, and other village watchmen under the superintendence of the board of revenue and board of commissioners, and to transmit copies of those registers to those boards, respectively.—2d. That the magistrates be required to obtain annually from the zemindars, farmers, merchants and others, a correct register, specifying the names of all pykes and other village watchmen for the time being, and to transmit copies of them to the superintendant of police.—3d. That the magistrates be required to make the best disposition which the nature of the case will admit with respect to those persons, by subjecting them to the controul of the darogahs within whose jurisdiction they reside; by ascertaining, and as far as depends upon the magistrate, by regulating their place of residence; and by nominating, in cases appearing to require it, a zemindar or sirdar, to be paid by government, for the more immediate superintendence of the conduct of this class of people.

SECRET SERVICE.

In matters of police, it is I believe much more common to employ spies, than to acknowledge the use of those powerful but dangerous instruments.—Under these circumstances, I should be disposed to pass the question over in silence, did it not appear to me that a general declaration of the sentiments of government was indispensably necessary with respect to that point. Those sentiments have indeed been to a certain degree, already explained to the court of Nizamut adawlut. Opinions, however diametrically the contrary, are both entertained and avowed by some of the judicial authorities, especially by the court of circuit for the division of Moorshedabad.

A formal decision on this point, consequently appears to me requisite, in order that the employment of spies may at once be prohibited, or that the opinions of a few individuals, may not be suffered to clash with the general system of the government. Situated as the courts of circuit are, the expediency or inexpediency of employing spies, and the good or ill use which may be made of those instruments, must be brought under their consideration.

consideration, in not less perhaps than one-half of the trials which may come before them. It is consequently essential that they should not only be apprized of the sentiments of government on this point, but that they should be compelled to sacrifice any preconceived opinions to the general system, which may be established. Without uniformity in the leading principles of the police, it would be in vain to expect permanent or substantial benefit from any new arrangements. The following observations may have some tendency to show the advantages which may be drawn from this species of agency.

About twelve months have now elapsed, since the disturbed state of the district of Nuddea began to attract the particular attention of the Governor General in Council. Since that time, many sirdar decoits have been apprehended by means of spies; some in the district of Nuddea, some in Jessore, some in Backergunge, and one, in the city of Patna, at the distance of 500 miles from the presidency. It is in the highest degree probable, that many of those offenders would never have been apprehended, without the agency of hired informers. Certain it is, that they could not have been taken so soon, as they have been by those means.

Turning our eyes to those countries in which the police has attained any considerable degree of improvement, it appears to me that this end has been accomplished almost solely by espionage, and that the improvement, has almost universally been proportioned to the skill with which this powerful engine has been employed.

Negative as well as positive proofs may be adduced, with respect to this point, in the district almost under our immediate inspection. The person, who has manifested the strongest dislike to the employment of spies, is Mr. Ernst, the late magistrate of Hooghly.

Extract of a letter from Mr. Ernst, of the 20th May 1809.

Para. 12. "It will be found that the number of decoits who have been apprehended and committed for trial during this last period, exceeds in proportion the result of the preceding year; some of the decoits appear to have come from Nuddea, and I am of opinion that the emigration of decoits from that district, in consequence of the extraordinary measures which have been adopted to apprehend them, presents the most formidable obstacle that I have to encounter in my endeavours to suppress the crime of gang robbery in Hooghly. There is a very general impression among the natives, and I have found reason to believe, that many of the decoits of Nuddea have escaped from that district, and are now infesting the neighbouring jurisdiction."

Extract of a letter from Mr. Ernst, of 4th June 1809.

"If, after all, there has been an increase of decoity in this district in the past year, it is probably to be ascribed to the same causes, whatever they may be, which produced so much decoity in Nuddea;—to the relative situation of Hooghly, which is only separated from Nuddea by the river; to the seizure of many of the principal decoits in Nuddea, and to the dispersion of their gangs in the time of Mr. Maun; and to the emigration of many decoits from that district, in consequence of the extraordinary measures which were taken against them some months ago by Mr. Blaquiére and Mr. Leyden, and by our agents and goondas. This supposition is not merely a conjecture; several decoits who were apprehended at different times in the course of last year, having been ascertained to have absconded in Nuddea."

With respect to espionage, three questions occur.—1st. As to the persons who should be employed as goyendas or spies;—2d. The mode in which they should be remunerated; and, 3d. The mode in which their services may be rendered useful, without danger of abuse.

In regard to the first-mentioned point, at every jail delivery some of the persons concerned in robberies, escape legal conviction, but are ordinarily detained in confinement, on account of their bad character, until they can give security for their future behaviour. These persons are almost uniformly willing to engage, as spies in the service of the magistrates.

magistrates. They know the haunts of all the principal gangs of decoits in a district, and the persons of the sirdars; and, if properly remunerated, are both willing and able to effect their apprehension.

The proper mode of remunerating them is, by a small monthly allowance for their immediate subsistence, and the payment of a sum of money (suppose from 100 to 300 rupees), for their agency, in the seizure of any criminals whom the magistrate, on the grounds of public notoriety, or of specific charges preferred, or information lodged by individuals, or on any other authorized ground, may have deemed it his duty to order to be apprehended. Those rewards should uniformly be paid on the apprehension of the accused or suspected persons, and not on their conviction before our criminal tribunals;—a mode which is sanctioned, indeed, by the existing Regulations, but which appears calculated to lead, in many cases, to the oppression of innocence and the perversion of justice.

With regard to the other point above noticed, that is, the mode in which spies should be employed, I imagine that it must be clearly understood, after the discussion which the question has already undergone, that they should never be invested with a particle of power, and that their character as spies, should never be confounded with that of the ordinary officers of police, whose principal duty of course is to apprehend offenders. I am not aware that the course which should be observed in cases of this nature, can be stated in clearer terms, than in the following extract of a letter from the register of the Nizamut adawlut:—

“The established duty of the goendras, is to discover the haunts of the decoits, to watch their movements; to mix with them occasionally, with the view of obtaining accurate intelligence respecting their operations and designs for their employer; to communicate to him the result of their observations and enquiries; and, finally, to point out to the goendras, who are usually regular police officers, the persons of the individuals whom the magistrate, in the discharge of his public functions, may order to be apprehended.”

At the same time, it seems essential to distinguish between informants, in the first instance, before a magistrate, and prosecutors in a subsequent stage of the business, whether before the magistrate or the court of circuit. However circumspect a magistrate ought to be in admitting or acting upon information lodged by persons of bad or suspicious characters, such information cannot, I think, consistently with the maintenance of an efficient police, be generally nor indeed often rejected. In all such cases, it must depend upon the discretion of the magistrate to allow up the information so lodged until he shall have obtained satisfactory and legal evidence of the facts alleged, or shall deem the charge groundless, and to dispose of the case accordingly. In cases, however, in which the informants, whether hired spies or others, may not be themselves the persons aggrieved, it cannot be necessary or proper that they should appear in the characters of prosecutors, in a more mature state of the business, either before the magistrate or the court of circuit. On all such occasions, the prosecutors should of course be either the individuals who may have themselves been robbed, or the relations of persons murdered, or the vakeel of government, under the directions of the magistrate. With that course of proceeding, I am at a loss to conceive how any ill consequences can arise from the agency of spies or secret informers.

Extracts of three Letters from the 2d Judge of Calcutta Court of Circuit, on the case of the Sessions in Jessore, Nuddea, and Hooghly, dated in July and August 1809.

“As far as I could learn whilst there (Jessore), the crime of decoity had previously been mostly confined to those parts of the zillah bordering on the Nuddea, Rajeshahye, Dacca, and 24 Pergunnahs districts. But the statement itself, is a satisfactory proof that the commission of his crime has diminished considerably, since last sessions of that district; and I have no doubt that the operation of Regulations VIII and IX, 1808, aided by the activity and vigilance of the magistrates, will in a short time suppress the crimes of decoity and highway robbery;—indeed, such has already been the exertions of the magistrate of that district, that of late decoity has hardly been heard of; and during the time I was at that station, no person was sent in to him, charged with that offence.”

“(Nuddea).—I am happy to state, that owing to the operation of Regulations VIII and IX of 1808, and the activity and vigilance of the magistrate, the crimes of decoity and highway robbery have been nearly suppressed, at least at present; as there does not appear (as far as I could learn) to have been a single offence of those descriptions committed

The foregoing are the principal rules which should I think be observed, in the employment of spies; and under those restrictions, and with only common circumspection on the part of the magistrates, it does not appear to me that the agents can ever commit any great abuse: of their efficiency, no doubt can be entertained. If the principal sirdars, who with their gangs lately infested the districts of Jessore, Nuddea, and Hooghly, and not unfrequently extended their depredations to other places, have been apprehended;—if several of them, have been tried and executed;—if a state of security and exemption from public robbery, has at length been happily established in those districts; that end has, in a great degree, been accomplished through the agency of secret informers.

It may be the best of others, to be trebly alive to the dangers of an affray, or of an act of extortion on the part of informers. Of such offences, one solitary instance is known to have occurred, the last twelve months; a period during which they have been employed to a greater extent than ever before were in the country. In this species of philanthropy, I must profess myself to be, in a considerable degree, a stranger. But if I can be instrumental by this report, and by the means which it proposes to employ, to the suppression of the heinous crimes of robbery, rape, arson, torture, and murder, committed in that district in the month of June.”

“(Hooghly).—Even the greater part of the recent commitments in this district, may be attributed to the active measures lately pursued in the Nuddea and Jessore districts, which naturally induced many desperate fellows to cross over the river into the Hooghly and Bardwan zillahs, to avoid being apprehended; where they continue to pursue their depredations on the public, until seized by the latter magistrates; there are many of this description who have been lately tried, included in the statement.

“I am happy to add, that during my stay at Hooghly, which was almost a month, not more than one decoity had been heard of in that district.”

CONCLUSION.

I HAVE now stated all the measures which suggest themselves to my mind, for the improvement of the police, without entering into minute details, or deviating into a course which might be thought foreign to the subject. I am satisfied, that if those measures be adopted, they will be attended with considerable benefit, in the suppression of the crimes most injurious to the peace and happiness of society; an opinion which I express with the greatest confidence, as it is founded on practical experience of the system now recommended, so far as the existing regulations would permit. I am at the same time sensible, that a great deal more must be done, in order to eradicate the seeds of those crimes: the real sources of the evil lies in the corrupt morals of the people. Under these circumstances, the best laws can only have a partial operation.

If we would apply a lasting remedy to the evil, we must adopt means of instruction for the different classes of the community; by which they may be restrained, not only from the commission of public crimes, but also from acts of immorality, by a dread of the punishments denounced both in this world and in a future state, by their respective religious opinions. The task would not perhaps be so difficult, as it may at first sight appear to be. Some remains of the old system of Hindoo discipline still exist. The institutions of Mahomedanism of that description, are still better known. Both might be revived and gradually moulded into a regular system of instruction, for both those great classes of the community; but I pretend not to have formed any digested plan of that nature, and at all events, it would be foreign, as above noticed, to the immediate object of my present report.

It affords to me sensible satisfaction, amidst the want of support which the present plan has experienced on the part of some of the judicial authorities, and the direct opposition of others (a fate which experience has already shown, that it did not merit) to be able to bear testimony to the ardent zeal and operation of some gentlemen in that department. Among those persons, I deem it incumbent on me to name Mr. Guthrie, Mr. Eliot, Mr. James Pattle, and Mr. C. Patton, to whose services government appears to me greatly indebted for the present tranquil state of the districts of Nuddea, Jessore, Rajeshahye, Hooghly, and the 24 Pergunnahs.

It would likewise be an act of injustice, not to notice the very useful services of Mr. P. Andrews, by whose zealous exertions several of the principal offenders have been apprehended, and have suffered the penalties due to their atrocious crimes.

I feel myself still more particularly bound to mention Mr. Blaquiere. If a state of peace, tranquillity and confidence, has succeeded in most of the districts contiguous to Calcutta, to the most dreadful outrages and unprecedented cruelties; and if the foundation has been laid of a general system of police, which shall afford effectual protection to the lives and property of the community;—those advantages are in a very great degree to be ascribed, to the unwearied exertions and uncommon skill manifested by Mr. Blaquiere, in the discharge of the public duties entrusted to him.

The Vice-President in Council has been pleased to authorize you to draw, in addition to your established allowances, an extra allowance of 500 R^s per month, to defray any additional personal expense to which you may be subject, so long as you may continue to officiate as a magistrate in the above or in any other districts in which your services may be eventually required.

POLITICAL SURVEY OF THE NORTHERN CIRCARS,

By JAMES GRANT, Esquire;

Transmitted by the Bengal Government, in the year 1786, to the Court of Directors.

To the Honourable WARREN HASTINGS, Esq.

Governor General, &c. Council, in their Secret Political Department, Fort William.

Hon^{ble} Sir and Sirs,

CONCEIVING it to be one of the primary duties implied by the tenor of my commission as public minister to the Nizam's court, to learn the political situation of the different independent states of the Deccan, with which we were or might eventually be, at enmity or in alliance, as well as to ascertain the value and relative circumstances of the British territorial dependencies in the neighbourhood, to the end, that if the fortune of war, (always precarious,) should, contrary to the experienced judgment of intelligent rulers vindicate the gloomy apprehensions of the multitude, previous to the battle of Porto Novo, and become so far unpropitious to the national cause, as to authorize or impel a sacrifice to be made for the attainment of peace, we might be at least enabled to enter on the business of negotiation, with some certain precise knowledge in political arithmetic.

But the more immediate particular objects of enquiry seemed to be; first, to determine the actual power, with the inclinations, of Nizam Ali, to espouse the interests of the English against the Mysorean; and secondly, to ascertain the true territorial worth of our possessions adjacent to Hyderabad, called the Northern Circars, of which the re-annexation to the Nizam has been very naturally the favourite ambitious wish of his highness, from the moment of necessary and rightful dismemberment of these provinces in favour of the Company. This nabob's power, estimated on a superficial view of an extensive dominion, with an annexed revenue, or from recorded public informations, appeared as formidable as his inclinations were interpreted to be favourable on the present occasion; while on the other hand, according to the accounts laid before Parliament in 1772, or subsequently in private circulation, and verified by farther committee investigations in 1781-2, it did not appear that such great advantages, either financial, commercial, or military, were derived from the Circars, for fifteen successive years of occupancy, with local tranquillity and abundant territorial produce as might reader continued possession, with the utmost expected benefits, in future, grounded on experience of the past, an object of any political importance, to be set against either the entire loss of the Carnatic, or the further expense of a ruinous war in that quarter, under circumstances of unavoidable or factitious distress, perhaps unparalleled in the history of a powerful empire, not visibly arrived at the period of final dissolution. The materials however to form the estimate required, in order to be prepared rather against the possible than any probable contingences (though the best to be procured at the time, and sufficient at least to justify the lukewarm measures of cautious responsibility), carried with them such marks of imperfection and inaccuracy, as are ever inseparable from the infant state of every branch of experimental knowledge, and must have left an impression of doubt on the least enlightened minds.

To learn therefore something more circumstantial and certain, on matters so important, and which might eventually come under discussion within the scope of further negotiations, engaged my earliest attention, when arrived at the place of my destination, or afterwards more conveniently situated in the neighbourhood. Such informations as I could procure under the vigilant jealousy of a Mussulman court on the first mentioned topics of investigation, touching the Nizam's power and inclinations, I transmitted to the Governor General in his private capacity; and though in substance and form, these communications were unfit for the public eye, or in proof insufficient to authorize active measures, yet it seems possible they might in some degree, have influenced the continued suspension of a fruitless negotiation during the whole period of my own residency, and while the posture of affairs was less in reality, than apparently, unfavourable to the national cause. With respect to the second branch of enquiry relative to the state of the Circars, I flatter myself that my endeavours have been more successful, and it is therefore as well as from an idea of the importance of the subject itself, as connected with the duties of my late office, that I presume to offer the following sheets, which contain the result of my observations on the former topics in the abstract, on the latter in detail, for the inspection or consideration of the honourable board; hoping, if no new or beneficial lights should be communicated to those for whose use my labours are for the present exclusively intended, that yet they may bear some testimony of the mundry, together composing the northern subdivision, and extending along a coast of 105 miles, within 45 of Pentacottah, at the mouth of the Sittaveram, and boundary of Chicacole. Both these portions united, may contain 700 square miles of land immediately dependent on Masulipatam, which is not only the capital of these districts, but also the seat of a subordinate government, ruling the different provinces described, except Guntour, and is the principal fort and bulwark of all the Northern circars.

6th. Chicacole, anciently Kulling, the most northerly and last in order of the grand division, is also subdivided into two districts, of which, one deriving its name from that of the province, is dependent on Vizagapatam; the other, called Johapoor, is placed under the chief and council of Ganjam.

The former lies between the rivers of Settaveram on the south, and of Poondy north. From the cross hills approaching the sea near those extremities, it forms a kind of amphitheatre, or semicircular territory, of which the diameter along the coast extends 180 miles; and its greatest dimensions inland to the high mountainous region on the west, about one third of the same distance, comprising an area not less than 4,400 square miles. The latter subdivision of this province is of a triangular figure, stretching its longest side along the shore about 80 miles from Poondy to Moland, the southern frontier of Cuttack, and its shortest, to the angle at Goomsur; 50 miles in a west northerly direction towards Berar, containing near 1,600 miles of superficial measure, exclusive of that portion of country which in this district, as well as in all the others southward to the Godaveri, we have assigned to the high inaccessible region, extending to the great ridge of boundary mountains on the west, in variable breadths. The climate of the Northern circars, with a general conformity to what is observable in the other parts of Hindostan, north of the Kistna, has yet, from latitudinal extent of country, maritime situation, and position of the inland hills, some peculiarities in each of the three seasons of the year, worthy of remark. The periodical rain, called by the natives Bursant, usually sets in about the middle of June, with a westerly wind, in moderate showers, until the latter end of August, which month concludes the poonass fussul, or small grain harvest, and continues from this period, in greater abundance to the beginning of November, when it generally breaks up with violence, and ushers in the zemmestan with a strong north-easterly wind, greatly tempered, however, in its coldness, by the mild influence of the sea over which it blows. The middle of this latter and delightful season early in January, finishes the fussul khereef for rice and bajary, which are the great productions of the country north of the Godaveri; and in like manner its close at the vernal equinox, terminates the third fussul or rubbi harvest: the grand one for zoary or zanaloo*, as well as for all the different species of grain or pulse south of that river. Then commenceth the jabestan, or hot season, which is always extremely moderate towards the northern extremity of the circars near Ganjam, by reason of constant simindimal breezes from the sea; and the position of the neighbouring hills from south to west, contrary to the ordinary direction of the wind about Masulipatam. On the south, for the first two months, strong southerly gales along the shore, together with the sea breezes, moderate the heat, but the baleful influence of the former in blowing over salt stagnant marshes on the coast is injurious to animal life, and absolutely destructive of vegetation; and during the succeeding month, until the rains, the wind coming from the west over a parched loose soil of great extent, uninterrupted by any continued chain of hills, but particularly in passing along the broad, and at this time of the year almost dry sandy bed of the Kistna, becomes so intolerably hot near the mouth of that river, as to raise the thermometer, sometimes for a week entire, to 110 degrees within the house, and seldom under 105, during the first part of the day. Another peculiarity of climate, too often and fatally experienced in this country, is the noxious state of the air in all the hilly regions throughout the different seasons of vegetation, which occasions the distemper called the hill fever. This general mortal disorder, has been sometimes ascribed to the water, impregnated perhaps with the poisonous quality of copper ore, in passing over the mountains, or with unwholesome mineral earths, in issuing through springs; and sometimes with equal probability it has been attributed, to the corrupted juice of vegetables washed down by torrents into the public reservoirs; but the great operative cause is doubtless the grossness of the atmosphere, charged and contaminated with the exhalations of a luxuriant soil pent up in valleys, as seems to be clearly evinced by the prevalence of the same distemper even in the plains, where the richer crops of zanaloo are cultivated, and a free circulation of the air impeded by the luxuriance of the proper growth of this plant, or by surrounding trees and villages.

In all these provinces along the coast, the soil is chiefly sandy, improving gradually towards the hills. The same ground therefore seldom, if ever, yields more than a single crop of grain annually; but there being everywhere an abundant supply of water, the one produced is generally extremely rich; for, besides the boundary rivers already mentioned, which fertilize the country on either side, there are many lesser ones within each of the circars, running into the sea, or divided artificially into canals, and afterwards conducted into the tanks and great reservoirs; such, are the streams passing through Guntour, and which, for the most part collected near Bopetta, together with the overflowings of the Kistna, water the lands of Nizampatam; such also, are the rivulets drawn from this great river and the Godaveri, which uniting in the Colare, between the provinces of Condapillee and and Ellore, are from thence diverted into numberless channels, to water the circumjacent territory. In Rajemundry the Yel-erie or Yalare, running parallel to, and not far south of the Settaveram is, with uncommon intelligence and industry subdivided, to answer the purposes of cultivation within the two principal zemindaries of Peddapore and Pettapore, on its opposite banks, while the island of Nagur or Nagurum, enclosed chiefly by the two greater branches of the Godaveri, and intersected by five others (lesser ones) is made wonderfully productive, not only by a constant and plentiful supply of the great element of vegetation, but from the acquisition of an extraordinary rich soil, in being thus, from situation, the grand receptacle of all the slimy mould carried down by the greatest river in the Deccan. The southern subdivisions of Chicacole, with a better soil than is found in other parts of the circars, is sufficiently watered by four interior rivers, which have their outlets at the respective ports of Vizagapatam, Bimlipatam, Maphus Bunder or Chicacole, and Calingapatam, besides many lesser streams in the seasons of the rains; in advancing to the northward, and in the territory of Jehapoor, the river of Gangam, uniting different branches from the vallies of Vizianagur, Burragur, and Govinsur, in the very center of the whole district, in its greatest breadth, as Aska makes this portion of the province equally fruitful with the other, comparatively to its extent.

From the many advantages which we have already enumerated, as common to the circars, it may be expected, that their natural produce will appear proportionate; nevertheless, the more useful classes of animals are found in greater abundance than variety, being almost wholly reducible to sheep and the larger species of horned cattle; but the neighbouring sea, and its numerous inlets, abound with every kind of Indian fish, a few excepted, together with some that are common to Europe, such as mullet, soal, and pomflet; the latter resembling most the turbot, if it be not exactly the same in miniature, is most peculiarly attached to this coast, and is turned to no inconsiderable benefit when salted, for the inland markets. It is, however, in the grand and most necessary articles of vegetable production, that this territory is particularly famous. In grain, the different sorts of which we have already had occasion to mention, it is properly the granary of the Carnatic during the north-east monsoon, in like manner as Tanjore is reckoned on, for the other season of the periodical winds from the opposite point of the compass. Fruits, roots, and greens are scarce, or reared with difficulty, to the south of the Godaveri, and even to the north of that river; owing, no doubt, to the influence of the sea air, are neither so excellent in kind, nor are they to be met with in such plenty or variety as in other parts of the Deccan. It may farther be observed, that some of the articles of second necessity, such as sugar and cotton, are also too scantily produced in Rajemundry and Jehapoor, for the general consumption of all the provinces, while on the other hand, bay salt and tobacco, the latter from the vicinity of Masulipatam, known everywhere for superior excellence, have exceeded, of late years, in quantity, the home and foreign demand for both. But, in the estimation of a commercial people, all the partial disadvantages we have named would be more than counterbalanced by a single uncultivated advantage, if proper use were made of the forests of Rajemundry, on the front the greatest utility, if proper use were made of the forests of Rajemundry, on the front the commencement of the hills along the banks of the Godaveri to Paloumcha, so generally tiers of Commamet, yield a superabundance of the best and largest teak timbers, so generally thought superior in quality even to oak, for the ship-building and navigation of the Indian seas. At present, the cocoa and palmyra, or in the more northerly province, the toomecara*, form the principal materials for constructing, in the different parts of the circars, 500 of those unwieldy vessels called doonies† of various burthens, from 60 to 300 tons each. The diamond mines of Guntour and Condapillee, reserved by treaty to the Nizam, deserve barely to be mentioned as a rarity; not to be considered as of any great political consequence.

In regard to Manufactures, the staple produce of the country worked from cotton is of two different sorts and fineness. Plain long cloth, so valuable at foreign markets, is chiefly wrought in the island of Nagur and its vicinity, where the manufacturers have always found a sure asylum from the ravages of war; it forms the ground-work of the best printed calicoes in Europe, and of those inimitable painted ones called palampores, in the districts of Masulipatam. The coarser plain cloths made to the north and south of the Godaveri, or coloured with chay root, which is the madder of the East, and growing in most perfection in the pure sands annually overflowed by the Kistna, are equally articles in vast demand abroad, or for interior consumption. But the muslins of Chicacole; the beautiful woollen carpets of Ellore and silks of Burrampore in Jehapoor, wrought from raw materials imported from Bengal or China, are rather objects of curiosity and meriting encouragement, than considerable in quantity or benefit. Of this nature also is the art of painting, or inlaying ivory and black wood, in the cabinet work made at Vizagapatam; but the facility, convenience, and cheapness, with which ships of war or of burthen, not exceeding 500 tons, have been, and might in greater number be constructed, in the ports of Coringa and Narsapore, at the two principal mouths of the Godaveri, are considerations of the utmost importance to a maritime state; nor should the extensive branch of ship-building at present in use, though with so much imperfections and improvidence in supplying 50,000 tons in small craft for the coasting trade, be forgotten, in stating the more useful arts, which at once favour the proprietary and local interests of the country.

The several objects of natural or artificial produce, when united, form the grand resources of commerce, which in the circars may be classed, under three different heads. The trade to Europe,

* This seems to be a species of the tree which produces the gum arabic.
† Coasting vessels of one or two masts, managed by native lascars or seamen, having a convex upper deck, with the view of resisting more effectually any incumbent waves.

* Toney and Pelajary, the former white, the other yellow and coarse, are a species of Maize, with a large bushy top, in contradiction to the Mecca Joary or Indian corn, which hath its grain growing on one instance of a conic form, as hath in like manner the Bajary or Millet, on a larger and slenderer Bulha or Bar.

Europe, to neighbouring Indian ports, and the inland provinces of the Deccan. The first confined entirely to the fine cotton manufactures exported by European nations which have establishments on this coast, or purchased by other foreign adventurers, may amount in the whole, at prime cost, to thirty lacks of rupees, of which one-half seldom finds its way to England, though a much greater quantity would be productive of a certain benefit, of upwards of 100 per cent. The 2d, or coasting trade, carried on almost entirely with Madras, since the late prohibition against importing bay salt into Bengal, consists either of grain, amounting annually to half a million of bags, and valued on a medium, at twenty-five lacks of rupees including freight and other charges, which return to the country; or for the most part, in the coarser cloths proper for the eastern markets, and which may be estimated at ten lacks more. The 3d branch, or interior commerce, in salt and piece goods of native production, or copper, and raw salt; the latter, chiefly from Bengal, leaves a balance of ten lacks, after deducting half that amount for returns of cotton and wheat recircars;—and these are the various commercial benefits computed in the gross at 75 lacks of rupees, which, in a flourishing period of 17 years back, and most so under the late distractions in the Carnatic, have annually increased the hidden treasure, or languid circulation of the parsimonious Indians, excepting an overplus never exceeding 15 lacks, saved from a very disproportionate revenue, to liquidate the yearly gratuity paid to the Nizam by treaty, or be remitted in specie to the presidency of Fort St. George.

The native inhabitants of all these provinces, exclusive of a few thousand Mahomedans dispersed in the principal towns, and among the more regular infantry and militia, are wholly Hindoos, and may, with great moderation, be numbered at two million and a half, under all denominations. They are composed, or rather they are parts, of the two nations of Telinga and Oria, Worja, or Orissa, formerly divided from each other by the Godaveri, but since their union under the same government, a good deal mixed among themselves, as well as with some of the neighbouring tribes; still, however, under a general religious conformity to the doctrines of the Bedes, as received in the Deccan. They speak and write different dialects, perfectly distinguishable from each other. The four great casts or divisions of the people, as founded on spiritual authority, are therefore common to both countries; but with less deviation from the original institutions in Oria, where braminiical abstinence from animal food, excepting fish, contrary to the practice of all the other Decanics, is pretty generally observed by the higher tribes of every class. Farther, as these distinctions had equally a reference to the temporal, as well as religious state, so, even where the ancient rule, prohibitory of intermarriage, has been once or oftener infringed, and the tendency consequently greatest to contemne most tenaciously adhered to, in civil occurrences among the Sunker, mixed or bastard descendants of the primitive inhabitants. Thus, the Bramins continue to enjoy their pre-eminence and consideration among the other tribes, though always in proportion to the Velmast, of which denominations the principal zemindars in the circars are actually composed, affect the warlike character and manners of Rajapoots, to entitle themselves to be ranked with the more genuine offspring of the Chesterce, or second class. But the commewar conbies, or husbandmen; golawer-ahere, or cowherds; saliwar-julhai, or weavers, together with the twelve bullootedars or artificers, maintained by the greater villages, and taxed by government, though all incorporated in the sooder, last, or fourth great casts, have yet sometimes claimed the degree, immediately above them; and from their utility, have as often been allowed by a foreign magistrate, to rank with the compte banias, or retail merchants, which are properly of the third or class assimilated with that of Bice †.

REVOLUTIONS AND HISTORICAL EVENTS.

IT was not until the year 1471 of the Christian era, or 876 of the Hejirah, that the Mahomedans of the Deccan extended their arms to the Northern circars. At this time, Oriah, the rajah of the country of the same name, separated from the rest of Orissa on the north by the Chilca lake, having died without issue, a dispute arose for the succession between Mungul-rai, the adopted son, and Hunner, the cousin of the deceased. The latter, had recourse for assistance to Mahomed Shih Lushery, who then ruled over the Bramineesh empire in Beder, and long wished for such an opportunity of extending his conquests on that side of his dominions; in consequence of which, the claimant was not only put in possession of the family estates, but through the aid of his great ally, acquired the new conquests of Condapillee, including all the intervening districts, to Rajemundry, on condition of becoming tributary

* Lomballies, Lombardies, or Buyarabs, are a wandering tribe of carriers or camp followers; the descendants of those who, with their cattle, accompanied the emperors Shah-jehan and Allum Geer, in their wars in the Deccan. They are a tribe of Sieks subdivided into about 18 lesser ones, all followers of Nanik Shah.

‡ N.B.—What further regards the character, customs, manners and religion of these Decanics Hindoos, is the subject of a more ample description, in another part of our Political Survey, which treats generally of all the six Indian nations inhabiting the Peninsula, giving their names to, or denominating from, the grand divisions of country, Malabar, Canara, Meshat, Telinga, Oria and Goudwanah, into which the Deccan is naturally and properly distributed.

butary for the whole to the Mussulman empire; but the ambitious projects of Mahomed Shah were not accomplished until nine years afterwards, in subjugating more completely to his authority, the districts of Masulipatam, with the important province of Guntour. These formed part of a principality lately established by Narsingh, who was probably descended from the conquered Telinga rajahs of Worungaul; and being driven from the family inheritance, took advantage of the distractions which prevailed in the Carnatic, to make himself master of the sea-coast of Coromandel, from the Kistna south, to Kanje, or Conjeveram; fixing his chief residence at Chudergeery Narsinga, and so often confounded by European travellers or historians with Bejenagur, the capital of the greatest Indian empire of Canara, from which it had been dismembered, entered largely into the political views of the court of Beder; so the possession of Guntour in particular, as lying on the south side of the Kistna, and in other respects, from situation, justly considered the master-key of the Carnatic towards the north, appeared of the greatest relative importance.

In the year 1512, the Kootubshahy, or second dynasty of Decanny Mussulman kings, dismembered, as turrefidars or governors, in right of power, the eastern division of the Bramineesh empire, called Telinga, but in after ages, more generally denominated, from its capital and principal fortress indiscriminately, the state of Hydrabad or of Golconda; and in proportion to the limited sway of this new sovereignty, so the complete reduction of all the tributary dependencies, especially those on the sea-coast, which are now the subject of consideration, became more an object of policy with the ruling administration. The counties south of the Godaveri to the river Gondegama, were entirely subdued, reduced nearly into their present form of provinces as described, and otherwise modelled almost on the same principles of interior government, as prevailed to the period of the last revolution, when they were annexed to the British dominions in India: but at that time, Wistna Deo or Gajepetty, a powerful prince of Orissa, having united under his sceptre all the ancient family domains, from the confines of Bengal to those of Telinga on the south, no impression could be made on Rajemundry, or the more northerly province, formerly tributary to the Mahomedans, while possessed by the descendants of Oria, until the year 1571, under the reign of Ibrahim Kootub Shah. Then, a new participation of the Rheddy, or proprietary chief of the defence, and facilitated the reduction of the Rheddy, or proprietary chief of the inheritance. The treason of Vachevay Mussalee, ancestor to the present zemindar of Peddapetty, to whose lot the southern division, along the banks of the Godaveri, descended as an pore, and renter or manager for the Rheddywars, furthered the ambitious projects of the sultan, while it procured for himself, the farm of Kimmoodeta, which served as a foundation to more extensive acquisitions. But the conquest of Rajemundry was still far from being complete: The island of Nagur was wholly inaccessible to Mussulman troops; nor could the interior of the province be sufficiently protected from the ravages of the ejected proprietors, who were driven to their unwholesome fastnesses among the hills, without a standing militia and feudatory force; which, besides the ordinary estimated revenue of the state, or plunder taken from neighbouring independent inhabitants, who were possessed of greater wealth than courage to defend it. In like manner, Cicacole was but imperfectly reduced; and reckoning only its first valuation, according to the public records, rated at an assessment greatly short of the actual collections made from the people, and the necessary military disbursements of a frontier Province*.

Such, however, was the state in which all the Northern circars, together with the other dominions of Abril Hussien, the last of the race of the Kootubshahy, fell in the year 1687, to the victorious arms of Allum Geer, the great Mogul emperor of Hindostan. But, during the remaining twenty years of his reign, this monarch was too busily employed in conquering the larger provinces of the Deccan, and curbing the upstart Marhattah power, to inspect or render as productive as they ought to have been to the treasury, either of the two maritime dependencies of Hydrabad, henceforth termed a soubah, lying north of the Godaveri; and in the period which immediately followed his death, successive wars or contention for empire precluded every where, the possibility of a reform, having introduced anarchy and usurpation in some places, or in general occasioned a total suspension of all regular governments, throughout the whole extent of Hindostan.

At length, the memorable battle of Shuckerked, A. D. 1724, gave a transient repose to the Deccan, while it transferred in fact, though not in form, the sovereignty of this great limb of the Mogul empire, from the house of Timoor to that of Assiphean, in the person of the first and famous Nizam ul Moolk; self constituted, as well by sunnuds from Mahomed Shah the reigning emperor, viceroy of all the six soubahdarries south of the Nerburda, one of the great ancient and modern boundaries of proper Hindostan. The wisdom and vigour of this new ruler, were immediately felt in the circar of Cicacole, by the appointment of Anweer ud dien Khan Gopamovee to the post of aumildar, or controller of that province; but we are not to estimate the public benefits derived from an able administration of fifteen years successively, by the criterion of a rent-roll, under the best constituted Mussulman government. The pride, the advantage of a great military establishment, though often nominal,

* About the year 1592, Rajah Manning, the emperor Akbar's delegate in Bengal, having partially subdued the western provinces of Orissa, including in the list of his conquests, the southerly dependencies of Kulling or Cicacole, and Rajemundry, valuing the former of 27,000, at rupees 2,20,000, and the latter of 16,000, at rupees 1,25,000; but in truth, the Mogul arms did not penetrate beyond the Chilca lake, and the assessment of those two districts annexed to, or making part of the original Toomar Jumda of Toorel Moll, as exhibited in the Ayeen Akbary, serves only to evince the imperfection of that famous rent-roll, with respect to the soubah of Bengal.

nominal, must be taken into consideration; and if the policy and passion of princes did not so powerfully incline them to the system of purchasing personal attachments by conferring individual favours, yet it is so much the interest of ministers and other courtiers present, thus to promote the wealth and influence of provincial delegates, perhaps originally recommended by themselves, that full credit ought always to be given to public management, for every acquisition of private fortune authorized by unqualified despotism, written positive laws, or a conscientious implication of their reason and true spirit: nor will such liberality appear so great, when it is considered that death legally gave to the prince, entire and unconditionally, whatever portion of the riches of his subjects, the forbearance of his arbitrary will, left to their enjoyment in life, only, perhaps, in the hope of future reversion. To judge, therefore, impartially of Anweer undien Khan's progress in reducing to proper obedience, or in ascertaining and realizing the full revenue of those districts, so long placed under his management, we must take into the account his ample private emoluments, of which a skillful application probably paved the way to further preferment, until finally rewarded by the foujedary of the Carnatic. That the remains of his fortune, escaped the grasping hand of his immediate superior, the soubahdar of Hyderabad, at the period of his death, must be attributed to the inability of even the great viceroy himself, their common ruler, to assert the more undoubted rights of sovereignty in any part of the Deccan, under the terror of the then prevailing power of the Marhattas. And it may not be unworthy of remark, that even nineteen years afterwards, it required the irresistible influence of the British government to obtain for Mahommed Ali, the successor of Anweer ud Dien, a full discharge of the arrears, or pretended defalcations in the revenue of Chicacole. But if such were the advantages resulting from the ability and good fortune of the Ommilden, deputed by the great Asiph Jah to one of the maritime circars; greater still were the benefits derived from the vigour and integrity of his contemporary, Rustum Kkan, who, from 1732, for seven successive years, ruled with the most ample delegated sway, Rajemundry, with the other four more southerly provinces. There the zemindars, or Indian farmers generally had availed themselves of the surrounding distractions of the death of Alem Geer, to usurp the rights and feeble authority of their corrupt Mussulman superintendents. To correct these dangerous abuses, and restore the ancient legal or necessary forms of interior administration, were the arduous task assigned to this new zelahdar or provincial governor next in subordinate degree to, though on the present occasion, vested in the plenary powers of a foujedar; and the conduct of the man so fully justifies the Nizam's choice, that even to this day it is held up and considered by the inhabitants in general, as an example worthy of imitation for necessary policy, considerate humanity, rigid and universal justice. At the same time that these zemindars, defrauded the public treasury, they squeezed, with the iron-hand of oppression, the industrious husbandmen and manufacturers. The first objects, therefore, of Rustum Khan's government, was the total extirpation of such merciless tyrants. Those who escaped the sword were proclaimed as traitors, and a reward being offered for their own, with adherents heads, a sufficient number was soon collected, to erect two of those shocking pyramidal monuments, called Khulla-minar, near each of the provincial capitals; for one of which kind, though in a larger scale, the cruelty of Nadir Shah is held in Europe, so justly in abhorrence. The remains of one of those singular proofs of Eastern depravity, the cause or effect of the most violent despotism, are still to be seen in the neighbourhood of Masulipatam, and might be supposed to serve as a lesson of useful instruction to the natives, to contrast and reverse the knuty of their actual government. But the legislator will assuredly be disappointed who expects to find in Hindostan the operation of free enlarged reason and reflection; and the characteristics of the people, as sketched by the great Tamerlane, in his celebrated institutions, would not have been so long and universally admitted by his imperial successors, as making the true unchangeable features of their subjects, as well as indicating the infallible standard of practical rule in politics, if they had not been drawn with exact similitude by a superior discerning genius and the hand of a master. Accordingly, the severe administration of Rustum Khan, which he now farther distinguished, by substituting ameens, supervisors or temporary collectors, in the room of the annihilated refractory zemindars, as proverbial for exemplary excellence in the circars as that of Jaffier Khan, who devised the famous loathsome torture of the by-kunta or paradise, to extort from similar delinquents in Bengal the settled revenue of the soubah, collected from the ryots. Still, however, the jumma kaumil, or original assessment, continued at an under rate on the Khalsah records; and the benefits derived by the state from superior management were always temporary, depending on the personal ability of the individual employed, and for the most part flowing in, through the private channels of corruption. Mussulman depravity, indolence and ignorance, soon made it necessary to recur to the ancient system of finance, through the agency of Hindoo farmers in general, who, to remedy the evils of a fluctuating government, were made to have a permanent interest in the soil and general prosperity of the country, by certain local privileges which were so invariably continued in the same family by successive namildars, that they were often mistaken by the possessors for hereditary rights; proper always to be enlarged in anarchy, or under the authority of natural law, when civil restraints lost all controuling influence; and thus the creation of new zemindars was, in a few years, productive of fresh disorders under similar circumstances, throughout the whole extent of the Northern circars.

5th.—The French.

For when these provinces, A.D. 1753, were annexed to the French dominions in India, under the nizamut of Salabut Jung, who owed his elevation and future support chiefly to the great address and military conduct of the famous Bussy, so this able politician and commander, appointed to rule the Ceded Territories, found himself under the necessity, but always with true measured civilized humanity, of going over the same ground with the best of his Mussulman predecessors, in re-establishing order, and the indispensable indubitable rights of Eastern sovereignty. Zemindars were as usual dismissed from their employments, but generally permitted to enjoy, under French sunnuds, their rassoons and poyments, but generally permitted to enjoy, under French sunnuds, their rassoons and poyments, or conditional hereditary privileges, amounting to from eight to twelve per cent. on the net revenue collected; and excepting in the circar of Chicacole, there are more instances of new creations than total extirpation of the necessary officers of government. Here indeed the reform was not complete, a number of petty Indian superintendents divided the deed the reform was not complete, a number of petty Indian superintendents divided the whole province betwixt them and family; new internal usurpations, together with multiplied abuses, for ever disturbed the tranquillity, while they lessened the receipts greatly below the dues of the exchequer. The union or annexation of these several possessions under one head, appeared the most eligible system of administration, and Vizieram Rauze, the predecessor, not ancestor of the present zemindar of the same name, who then only held the four pergunnahs or lesser districts about Vizianagrum, rendered himself the most useful and acceptable man to act in the capacity of chief. It is not our province to trace the progressive execution of the plan projected; and we could wish to forget such bloody scenes as occurred, in the acquisition of Bobilee;—suffice it to observe, that success crowned the enterprise, and raised the favourite Vizieram to that unrivalled power and consideration which the adopted representative of his family still is permitted to enjoy among a multitude of other official landholders dispersed throughout the circars, some of higher pretensions from birth, but all of inferior territorial consequence. At length, a complete survey and hustaboud, or detailed account of the gross collections of the whole country, infinitely more accurate and useful than the famous Doomsday book of England, were formed, and put Mr. Bussy in the knowledge of resources entirely beyond the reach of his Mussulman predecessors, and greatly exceeding perhaps the general belief of modern financiers. But moderation was necessary, under a recent foreign administration; the regular troops to be supported by the revenue were to be employed in distant service, and the great director general himself, whose presence might frequently be requisite to enforce his decrees, was almost constantly obliged to reside at the Nizam's court, to keep in order and set in motion that wonderful political machinery, which was at once the basis of his own grandeur, and made his nation the arbiters of the Deccan. The jumma bundy or annual settlement, therefore, was only doubled in Chicacole and Rajemundry, and brought somewhat nearer the kham wossool, or gross receipts, in the other provinces. Besides which, as a temporary expedient, the zemindars were bound to maintain the public peace, defray all charges of collections, and keep on foot a scundy corps or militia of twelve thousand infantry, which, over and above the ordinary service of preserving the three yearly crops, or enforcing their equal division between government and its tenants, were liable to be called on for a very small daily allowance, to repel any invading foe. All this, however, we believe to have been only the first step towards establishing a more adequate jumma kaumil, or standard revenue, which a future prospect of stability was to make progressive, until arrived at that equitable medium of rent or taxation that leaves abundance to the husbandmen, with a sufficient spur to industry; that supplies the exigencies of the state in the necessary means for general system of defence, or to diffuse with returning increase, through the channels of commerce or other public disbursements, the enlivening benefits of provincial circulation, and after all, afford to indispensable intermediate agents, not princely fortunes to feed idleness, or pamper useless luxury; not hoards of wealth to be secreted in the earth, for the purposes of superstition or chicanery, and thus set at nought the deadly labour of man in the acquisition; not enormous defalcations, from the indisputable rights of royalty to purchase remissions, privileges, and influence by corruption, to maintain a formidable military retinue, whose only virtue is personal attachment, to the master that pays them, chiefly in alienated lands, on the footing of those territorial benefices, which, with equal impropriety or ignorance, are sometimes suffered to be given away to gain the partial favour of Bramins, until at length the king's conquered domains are rendered of no account, or wholly parcelled out to support meditated rebellion, and be again reunited under refractory subjects, in the form of hereditary independent possessions; no, not any such dangerous superfluities or embezzlements would probably have been allowed to zemindars; those necessary servile links in Eastern despotism to connect the distant extremes of prince and ryot. Nothing beyond a splendid family subsistence, with just such an overplus of income as might serve to support official dignity, consequential appearance, personal pre-eminence, and gentility. This we believe would have been the equitable political result of Mr. Bussy's scheme of finance, if he had been allowed to complete it, though the ignorant calumniators of that great man, without attending to the other inexhaustible sources of private wealth, which he possessed in commanding the entire ministerial influence of the Nizamut, do not give his disinterestedness all the credit due in the adjustments in the mean time concluded, for the annual revenues of the circars.

But in April 1759, by the conquest of the fortress of Masulipatam, that great commanding bulwark, the virtual sovereignty of all the maritime provinces on either side, from the river Goudegatha to the Chilca lake, was absolutely and necessarily transferred from the French to the British government. The gallant officer, however, under whose command this new and amazing revolution had been effected, could not conceive the possibility of maintaining, under the rule of mercantile establishment, territorial acquisitions of such vast extent. He contented himself, and still more fully his employers, in obtaining a formal grant for those districts only, which have since constituted the immediate dependencies of the conquered capital from Salabut Jung, the supposed rightful renter of the Deccan set up by Bussy, 7th.—British Rule.

September.

The fate of Guntoor was singular; nor doth the possession of it, yet complete the conquered granted right of sovereignty. A seven years lease of this province, granted to Bazalet Jung by his brother Salabut Jung, the viceroy, to enable the former to entertain the party of Frenchmen to be expelled from the limits of the Deccan, ignorantly described by the river Kistna on the south; and thus virtually set aside the agreement entered into by the latter in 1759, with the English government, was just expired at the period of concluding the treaty of Hyderabad in 1766; and though Nizam Ali, the successor of Salabut Jung, at this time would have considered the extermination of his brother the lessee, a more desirable circumstance than the renewal of his holding, and soon afterwards actually proposed the alternative; yet, as the latter proceeding curtailed the advantages of a more formidable natural enemy, and left great room for future contingencies, so the farm of Guntoor was continued to Bazalet Jung, but under the erroneous description of a jagheer, on conditions acknowledged to have been broken on his part in 1768, and always depending on the good will will and pleasure of his immediate proprietary superiors, who, at the same time, enjoyed the most rightful, extensive, and powerful sovereignty actually existing in Hindostan. But, strange to relate, in 1779, we find the local representatives of this mighty government tor of the circar of Adoni, to obtain the rental of Guntoor, that they might have the honour of sub-letting to the lately constituted subadar of the Carnatic, their great feudatory nawaub or deputy, as in propriety he must be called, since there are no treaties, or circumstances of equality, to authorize his being distinguished as a federate ally, or otherwise, such a reversal of the natural order of things could not have been of long duration. Ignorant, ambitious, incapacity of governing, unless through the vain medium of their own flattered ability and supremacy. And as an earnest of greater acquisitions, the Nizam, in November 1780, seized the province in question, which was now ordered to be evacuated by the English troops; and has, from a series of (to him) fortunate circumstances, continued in his possession even beyond the period of its final absolute reversion to the Company, on the 5th October 1782, when death put an end to all and singular pretensions of Bazalut Jung.

GOVERNMENT.

WERE we to judge of political events from partial experience, it might be concluded on a superficial view of the preceding account of Revolutions, that the system of government in the circars has undergone the same variety of change. But as limited monarchy and freedom peculiarly distinguish Europe, so despotism and slavery seem to be the universal indelible character, in which nature has stamped the state of civil society in Asia; and if any one local division in this quarter of the globe can be said to bear the first and strongest impression, it is undoubtedly Hindostan. From the remotest antiquity, this country has not only been subject to the single arbitrary will of native rulers, in patriarchal feudatory subordination to one or more superior chiefs, but it hath constantly, in whole or in part, been held in a state of double vassalage or tributary dependence on foreigners, until its final absolute conquest by the Mussulman arms at the close of the 13th century. This revolution, indeed, having effected the total subversion of the ancient inferior empire of the Hindoos, introduced the most violent unnatural tyranny, as being engrafted on a new and sanguinary religion. The rights of persons and things universally, as understood in free states, had, it is true, at all times, concentrated in the prince, or flowed from him as the focus of royalty, to such of his servile subjects as came within the reflected rays of his temporary benevolence; but at this period, a spirit of enthusiastic intolerance made a daring and successful attempt on the divine and indefeasible right of mental freedom. Thousands of the Indian youth were carried into captivity, chiefly for the purpose of being educated in the slavish detested principles of Mahomedanism, and death or conversion was the usual alternative held out to the mild, though stubborn adherents of the Bedes; grown old under the scriptural rules of Braminical jurisprudence. Yet, even in this horrible oppressive state of society, might have been long endured, through the extreme passive indifference of the conquered, if the evil itself did not carry with it in the depravity, licentiousness and mutual disagreement of their tyrants, the better seeds of reformation, and prepare the land for that memorable change which at length brought the whole empire of Hindostan, under the more qualified despotism of the race of Timur.

Although the small portion of country at present under consideration, experienced in a greater or less degree, the effect of these various revolutions, and ought still to enjoy the desirable constitutional benefit of the last mentioned, yet it will not be expected that we should here trace any of the outlines of general administration, even as laid down in the Mogul code; our scope is too limited, for such a design; and it must be remembered, that notwithstanding the more universal political maxims of Tamerlane, deduced from his own practice, and recommended to his posterity, have been invariably adopted by the best of his imperial successors, and only enlarged, modified, and brought into more extensive use by the celebrated institutions of Akbar; yet every prince or delegate had his own دستور or special rule of government, which was never reduced to a form in writing, but for the most part, depending on his single capricious will; and that, therefore, to define a system of the mildest despotism, would be no less a task, than to analyze the various compound of the human mind, in the same man, or discover all the intricate mazes of deceit, inconsistency and folly, in the actions of thousands. This is properly the province of oriental philosophy, general and particular history. We have to lament that the knowledge to be derived from such sources, should be locked up in the difficulties of a foreign language, or confined perhaps to the scanty manuscript records of one accessible library, and which is the more to be regretted, that some palpably erroneous and dangerous doctrines, subversive of one of the first, most essential, and best ascertained principles of Eastern legislation, by which the proprietary right of the soil is constitutional, and solely vested in the sovereign ruler, should of late have gone forth, and received not only the sanction of speculative writers, misled by the misrepresentations of ignorant travellers, or by partial annalogous reasoning from an imperfect understanding of fact and local circumstances, but also be adopted and strenuously urged by men of influence and experimental knowledge, equally eminent for ability and and integrity; though it seems evident in this instance, that a close attention to public avocations, or their private pursuits, left them not sufficient leisure to investigate or discuss with due consideration, the true theory of their own practice.* For that such is the foundation of the revenue system, in all parts of Asia, is not only deducible from the nature and spirit of despotic governments, as universally established there, and manifested in a manner, in every page of the genuine particular histories of each country, but absolutely ascertained to be so in Hindostan, in form and fact, by written positive laws; not indeed declaratory of a right which never was or could not be disputed, nor otherwise understood than as instituting and enforcing a practical scheme of finance over the whole landed property of the empire, and calculated to draw the greatest possible rent into the royal treasury, after deduction of the necessary expense of agency, and having exercised the highest proprietary authority in obtaining the legal sources, personal management, and amount of revenue, according to an exact measurement, and proportional assessment of the land, on an equitable valuation of the annual territorial produce, to be equally divided between government and its ryots, or the immediate cultivator of the soil; neither is it to be expected that we should in this place, describe all the higher gradations of delegated power, the standing forms of office, or the functions of superior agents, however necessary it may seem for the more perfect comprehension of the relative subordinate administration of the Northern circars, depending also on discretionary individual rule. Such information will best be collected from the firmans, sunnuds, or commissions of the respective officers employed, connected with an historical detail of executive management, throughout all the various departments of the state. We shall therefore now confine ourselves, to a cursory view only of those provincial arrangements respecting the civil jurisdiction of the territory at present under consideration, which occur, in describing in very general terms, the formal authority of the lowest class of arbitrary delegates, beginning with the aumildar as the immediate representative of government.

This officer, though greatly below the degree of the foujedars of the Carnatic Payenghaut and Kerpah, held his appointment in like manner, directly under the soubadar of Hyderabad, but most commonly by patent, from the universal superior, the Nizam or great ruler of all the six soubahs of the Deccan, including the whole peninsula or southern promontory of Hindostan, from Cape Cormorin in 8° North latitude, to the river Nerbuddah, almost under the tropic of Cancer. His local jurisdiction also, when extending over all the northern maritime provinces between the Gondegama and the Chilca Lake, was no wise inferior in magnitude or relative importance, to that of either of his two southerly colleagues, and he was absolutely vested in the same undivided plenary powers of zelahdarry, foujedarry, and shaikdarry, which may be defined provincial civil magistracy, military command, and controul of finance; though with this difference however, in latter times, that he continued in fact, as well as in form, subject to a superior; whereas the others had effected or were supported, in a state of virtual independence.

In the first capacity of Nizam, or ruling magistrate, he was guardian of the rights of sovereignty; prevented or chastised foreign encroachments and interior disorders; declared what should be construed into rebellion or treason, and punished such delinquency at discretion. Arbitrer in all cases of life and death, he presided personally, or by naib or deputy, in the sudder cutcheree adawlut, or chief court of justice. The darogha or principal clerk, prepared the indictment, summoned the evidences, and went through the forms of examination, as directed from the bench. The mufti or molavi, doctors learned in the law, expounded the text or numerous orthodox commentaries of the Koran; the cazi, or supreme judge, pronounced the sentence, and the cutwal or lieutenant of police, executed it; but only at the special command of the aumildar. In like manner, this high representative of royalty took cognizance of, ultimately, and solely determined, the more consequential civil disputes or causes of considerable private property; but left the decision of such as were of little moment or unproductive of heavy fines, and the usual forfeiture of one fourth of the amount litigated claimed by government, to the cazi, who was also public notary in the attestation of deeds of grant or contract, and writings in general. Thus the Mussulman code was the universal established law of the land in crimes and punishments, and regulated the forms in all cases of judicial administration, though the virtual exercise of it depending on the single arbitrary will of an individual; and, considering the mixture and common depravity of inhabitants, the crafty pusillanimity or inoffensive bloodless disposition of the greater part, the propensity of the stronger few or slaves in power, to tyrannize over the weaker and more dependant classes of the people, it must be confessed that a system of jurisprudence summary, severe, and despotic in the execution, seemed the best calculated to preserve the distant, feeble supremacy of the prince with the internal tranquillity and order of society. But in mere civil cases or personal differences, the genuine parsimony and bigotted Hindoos seldom, if ever, had recourse to a foreign tribunal so expensive, uncertain, and violent in its decisions. The simple, amicable mode of arbitration by reference to the heads of casts and tribes, to native superiors, or mutual friends, was universally followed by those who formed the bulk of the community; and from its convenience, never opposed by their slothful, proud, selfish rulers, since the commencement of English administration. We know not on what principles there has been a total suspension of the long-established Mussulman law and high court of judicature, without substituting others in their room, yet incurring the usual expense of all the requisite officers. That no very great public inconvenience hath as yet been experienced or made visible from such extraordinary deficiencies, may be a good argument to prove the habitually pacific submissive character of the natives, or the strong impression of ancient forms of rigorous justice over timid minds; but will scarcely vindicate the continuance of the same negative course of government, or indeed recurring to any other than the former, under milder and better regulations, unless it be admitted that the experience of ages and reasoning of the best statesmen of Hindostan can be controverted; that the nature of man is changed, and requires not the checks of a legal despotic authority; or that civil society can long exist in a state of judicial anarchy, under the forced dominion of a handful of foreigners, removed at the distance of a six months voyage from their mother country.

In the second capacity of Sirdar fouze, or head of the troops, the amildar himself held the principal jagheer or military fief, which was denominated tatie or personal, mushroot or conditional; imposing, in either case, an obligation to maintain a certain number of cavalry and infantry for the protection of the province, and follow the superior's standard in times of foreign war. In like manner, all lesser jageerdars and munsibdars, with their respective quotas of sepoys or soldiers, were immediately under the command of this provincial nizam, who was further vested with the power of making additional temporary levies for apparent and useful services, annexed, as usual, to the post of buckshe or paymaster, which always gives the highest official designation or title to the commander in chief of the imperial forces, and places him next to the vizier in rank and consequence.

But it was chiefly in the third capacity of shaikdar, or dewanny delegate, that the amildar exercised the most important functions of his office. This department had always, during the vigour of the Mogul government, continued separate from the two former, held by the soubadar and his nawabs, or deputies; but on the resolution in favour of Nizam ul Mulck, was, in the first instance, in fact united in his own person, and became so, of course, throughout all the inferior gradations of the sovereign authority. The ordering, management, and collection of the revenues, the amount, ways and means, and personal agency, in raising the supplies, the confirmation of former grants, the suspension of any provincial sunnuds to new men, were the high powers annexed to the post of even provincial controller of finance. He was virtually restrained in nothing, except alienation of land. Remissions of the annual assessment on an increase of expense, the least encroachment on the more consequential prerogatives of the crown, could not be tolerated; but in the extension of imperial formalities attending the royal or viceregal approbation, under the seals and signatures of all the ministers of state, were indispensably necessary. It is true, indeed, that the proper sources of revenue were ascertained by law and custom, as also the government share of the yearly territorial produce, whether in kind or in specie, and which constituted at least nine-tenths of the public income; but in the latter case, the proportion has only been struck for such lands, as were completely valued by measurement and actual rent, and even then, a latitude was left for greater exactions, on account of further improvement; and in all cases whatsoever, under the most vigorous administration, the amildar not only could, and generally did, by means of bribery, justify a deviation from any standing regulations touching private intension, to increase them as much as possible, and by every expedient ingenuity could devise, consistently with the political safety, or temporary views of despotism. In this department also, the Sudder dewanny adawlut, or principal court of exchequer, was under the immediate superintendence of this president of all the other superior provincial tribunals, and the nazer, or supervisor, enforced his decrees through the agency of the hazary, or commander of a thousand peons, of seduwar or head of the jummadar chief, any inferior indefinite number of the sebundy fussulla, or revenue troops, entertained every where originally on stated monthly wages, but latterly, from abuse in great certain allotments of land throughout the different pergunnahs, fraudulently sequestered from the circar, to increase the private emolument of one or all of the officers employed in the collections, who were comprized under the following denominations, and divided into two classes; viz. such of the natives as held their appointments, rights, and privileges, by sunnuds from the reigning sovereign, with the good-will of the ryots, or such as were merely temporary, more immediately dependent on the amildar.

Among the former, the Desmook Zemindar Chowdry, or chief of a district consisting of one or more pergunnahs, held the first rank or consideration, for he was at once, the agent of government, the head farmer, and natural representative of the people. This office was originally instituted in 1582, under the name of Crory, by the Mogul emperor Akbar, and during the second administration of the famous financier, Tuder, or Toorel Mull. It was intended to remedy those necessary evils in despotism, frequent changes of the provincial delegate, and the distant remove of the protecting hand of this sovereign representative from the helpless indigent peasantry, as well as to reconcile the conquered multitude of opposite religious tenets, laws, habits, languages, and characters, to the unnatural oppressive dominion of a few intruding Mussulman barbarians; therefore the occupant, though holding his grants only during the life and pleasure of every succeeding prince, or any of his more powerful deputies, was considered as permanent officer, the intermediate agent of government to superintend a certain portion of the country, redress the petty grievances of the Hindoo inhabitants, furnish the husbandmen with the necessary advances for agriculture, and collect or become responsible for their annual rent, to the circar of state; his nancar, or Persian derivation, tion, or according to the usage, Decan saveram, from the Turkish word, with the common Telinga termination of um, signifying in both cases, a subsistence in bread, or a livelihood being to arise from small allotments of land freed from any public incumbrances, and conveniently dispersed throughout the district, so as to make his presence necessary every where, gave him local attachment and greater effect to general superintendence, in attending to his own private interest. At the same time, his russooms, customs, a commission on the gross revenue collected, invariably fixed at 5 per cent. in addition to nearly the like income from his territorial property, were supposed to quicken his endeavours in the exercise of the public re- ceipt by improvements, or greater economy in the peaceful prosperity of the country. From the in general, bias his inclination to promote the death of Alemgeer in 1707, the person employed in first institution of the crory, until the death of Alemgeer in 1707, the person employed in that office, properly speaking, was the only subject under the crown of Delhi who held any thing like a free tenure in lands, to the extent of a family subsistence; for such holdings did not, in form, confer hereditary right, yet they were generally continued, except in cases of delinquency, to the posterity of the original grantee, who was usually chosen, in the progress of Mogul conquest, from among the agents of the ejected and former proprietors, or the most experienced farmers and managers to be found in the country. Nevertheless, his freehold was but a very inconsiderable portion of his zemiadary, or territorial jurisdiction, it might justly be considered the price of securing a local attachment, influencing the welfare and happiness of the inferior inhabitants, in like manner, as his russooms were intended to compensate, as well as stimulate, the laudable endeavour of realizing the public revenue, when he himself acted on the part of government, as the immediate receiver or farmer general of his whole district. But about the period we have just mentioned, from the unsubdued state of the more difficult and distant parts of the kingdoms of Hyderabad and Bajepoor, then recently formed into soubahs or provinces of the Mogul empire, a variety of native landholders, either wholly independent, or in different degrees of subordination to the new mussulmen conquerors, became first known in Hindostan, and distinguished in the records of the khalisah shereefa, or ryot exchequer. Such were all the former class, entirely free, the petty rajahs of Malabar, in the southern extremity of the peninsula, and those of Rumpa and Bustar, among the high unhealthy ranges of mountains which separate the maritime circars, north of the Godavari from the soubah of Berar; and such were of the latter designation, imperfectly reduced, or subject to a certain tribute, the rannies of Bednore, with the rajahs of Mysore and Tanjore, which served as barriers to the unconquered countries of Malabar, in like manner as the nearest hilly districts of Tarpoor, &c. dependant on another branch of the royal family of Orissa settled in Cicacole, being only partially subdued, enjoyed the perfect freedom of the more interior mountainous regions of Rumpa and Bustar, ruled by the Coywar and Goddwannah rajahs. In process of time, and during the latter convulsions of the empire after the invasion of Nadir Shah, in 1739, not only some of the principal Hindoos, Jagheerdars, and farmers general, but even inconsiderable enamdars or charity landholders, hoisted the standard of rebellion, and in different provinces of Hindostan, under distracted feeble governments, actually acquired a greater or lesser degree of independence. All those territorial proprietors therefore, in general, whether free or tributary rajahs, crories, desmooks, or chowdries, acting in their different capacities, or self-dignified with Hindoo titles, usurping the real property of their Mahomedan masters, or mere feudatory or simple pensioners for life, yet claiming, and on the ipse dixit weakly or ignorantly acknowledged lawful inheritors of their conditional temporary benefices were ultimately confounded with each other, and classed under the same common well known appellation of zemindar or landholder, and from which proceed those gross mistakes of late occurrence, and doubts entertained, respecting the rights and privileges annexed to a patent office, originally and constitutionally of Mogul creation, under the forms, limitations, and controul already specified. But there is not throughout the Northern circars, more than within the rest of the wide circle of the British or subordinate allied dominions in India, excepting the few instances we have mentioned, a single individual or set of men among the native Hindoos, calling themselves, or acknowledged, rajahs and zemindars, who have the smallest pretension in form, right, or fact, to an inch of territorial property, beyond the extent of their nancars or saverums, or who can be considered in any other light, than as mere renters, with stated local privileges, depending on their own good behaviour, and the bounty of the proprietary lords of the soil; unless the English East India Company, in the latter capacity, have, since the date of their territorial acquisitions in 1765-6, formally alienated or transferred, which we believe they have not, any of their indubitable, necessary, possessory rights of Mogul royalty, under the crown and parliament of Great Britain.

The next revenue officer of rank, and of the same class with the desmook, though of greater utility, and sometimes of more extensive local jurisdiction, was the despandeh, or provincial register; this employment, for the most part exercised by Bramins, is the only one in its nature hereditary, to be found in the whole system of Mussulman government: it was an exception to the general rule, from necessity; but policy, convenience, and universal use, gave to the person holding it a greater degree of consideration at court, and in the public estimation, than could be acquired in virtue of the highest incorporeal rights and privileges. All firman sunnuds, grants of every kind, rules, ordinances, regulations of inferior police, judicial decrees, from each of the three departments, the jumma kaumil toomar, or original more perfect rent-roll of the lands in detail, serving as a standard and gross valuation, or political calculations of the revenue, and to fix the amount of jageers, as well as of religious or charitable endowments; the hustabood, or actual sources of the collections made from the ryots; the jumma wassel baakey, or annual account of the assessments, receipts, and balances of the country, as settled in behalf of government, with its intermediate agents; the divisions, measurement, quality, and produce of the lands, enumeration of villages, farms, husbandmen, manufacturers, or artificers, liable to taxation; and in general, all donations, arrangements, and circumstances affecting real or personal property, but more particularly touching the proprietary interest of the state, were necessarily made matters of record in the duffer or office of the despandeah or canongoe, as they could only be properly authenticated, and acquire validity after passing through such form of registration, to render still more efficacious this great intended check, not only on the zemindars and lesser native superintendants, but also on the aumildar himself, and all his immediate agents, in affairs of civil administration or finance; private interest and hereditary independence were the powerful incentives, added to personal honours, consideration, and influence. To ensure the honest full discharge of a very important trust, a rusoom of two and a half per cent. on the revenue, ascertained by his own vouchers to have been collected throughout the country, was assigned to the public register, his heirs, and deputies in perpetuity. In lieu of this commission, however, at present there are a number of inferior depandeahs, claiming a right to free incassary, hereditary villages, or to others held by a tenure called bilmokta or tutoodarry, at a low unalterable rent; but all these, we apprehend to be improper, unauthorized alienations, made by the desmooks or other officers of government in power, to purchase greater defalcations in their own favour, from the stated dues of the exchequer.

Puttel and Koolcurny.

Thirdly, the Puttel mucuddim or chief ryot of a deh-gam or village, was precisely, within his narrower precincts, what the desmook was in the pergunnah or zemindary, as in like manner the koolcurny, curnum, putwarry, or accomptant, held the next inferior gradation to the despandeah. These were the principal and more permanent officers of the revenue, in a regular chain of subordination to each other, when acting under their native head; but serving as mutual checks during the suspended authority of the zemindar, either from insufficiency or mal-administration, and while the interior management devolved on the secondary class of agents before described as temporary and immediately dependent on the aumildar himself, in the following order; 1st. The ameen vested with inquisitorial and controlling powers in general, became security for the rents of the district committed to his charge.—2. The sheristadar or mujumadar, keepers of official forms or annual adjustments of the revenue, though they did not supersede or exonerate the canongoe, found it of advantage, and were always permitted, to interfere in scrutinizing his conduct, as well as in ascertaining the actual resources of the country, to satisfy the private enormous exactions of corrupt agency, rather than increase inadequate public supplies. In the circar of Rajemundry, at the period of the last change in its government, one of the most remarkable instances on record, perhaps, occurs in proof of the vast individual benefits to be derived with ordinary address and knowledge, from the union of the two offices now in contemplation, in the same person, under the necessary ignorance of new rulers.—3. Tahseeldars, or collectors of different denominations and rank, with their moherries, or writers of accounts, assumed the inferior departments, usually assigned to the mucuddim and putwarry, as far as the interests of the state was concerned.

Thus, then, it appears the aumildar, in his several capacities of zolahdar, foujedar, and shackdar, united in himself almost all the executive powers of sovereignty, if not virtually; the whole legislative authority is exercised under despotism, though dependant on the will of a regular gradation of superior officers; yet, like them, he was substantially the representative of the prince, within the limits of his inferior government, executed a greater variety of trusts than constitutionally ought to have fallen to the share of any of them, and were in fact the lot of few, and yielded to them in nothing but extent of local jurisdiction, with its relative influence. Nevertheless his province, such as was in boundary, might justly be termed an independent state in its interior administration, imperium in imperio, precariously attached to a distant crown, in proportion to the power, the dread, the awe of the reigning sovereign, and the virtue of that chain of delegated authority on which, was suspended the necessary insulated dependencies of a vast despotic empire. But we are of such frail securities of allegiance, as rested merely on the invisible influence of fear or opinion; there was some immediate personal checks on this lowest representative of royalty within the circle of his proper government, and these complete the list of all the independent officers in succession of rank or consequence, from the aumildar himself giving to the killadar a commandant of either of the principal forts, such as Masulipatam or Condapilla, the second place. This important post has been usually held for life, under approved conduct, and the form of temporary sunnuds from the actual ruler. A portion of the haviilee, or household lands of the circar, was set apart for the maintenance of the garrison, and repairs of the fortifications, a certain stock of provisions and warlike stores were to be kept up; the allowance was invariable, unless to make up the losses sustained from a siege, no accounts of ordinary expenditure were required, and then the jageer or tenure was denominated mushaool, or conditional. When the pay of the king's troops was, in like manner, included in the grant, it was called Ashsham, and returns of the men were annually made to the Men Autisty, a grand master of artillery. But when the lands adjoining to the fort were held, bella shirrit, or unconditionally, nothing was required of the killadar besides simple fealty to the sovereign, and he was in all respects independent of intermediate authority.—3. The Savannah, or news-writer, was a political intelligence, or spy upon the conduct of the aumildar and all the other officers of government employed on the part of the soubadar, or Nazim, as the Wakeh negar was properly a remembrancer of transactions in the dewanny department.

department, particularly in receipt of revenue; both these officers, maintained a weekly correspondence openly with their respective principals; whether at Hyderabad or Delhi; they were the instruments which set in motion the great springs of despotism, fear and suspicion, and were dreaded by the provincial delegates, or venerated by the vulgar, in proportion to their ability and integrity. Nor were there religious and moral preceptors wanting to curb the suggestions of unlawful ambition of learned men, under the common appellation of Mulla, whose duty it was to instruct youth and inculcate, among others, the doctrine of passive obedience to the prince, were dispersed throughout the districts with competent enaums, or gifts of land. But these, with all the other constitutional checks on Mogul government, prove more or less effectual only, in proportion to the vigour of the hands which hold the reins of government.

REVENUE.

CONSIDERING only the length of time the British sovereignty has been established in the circars; the peaceable indisputed possession for seventeen successive years of a country so accessible, inhabited by a race of people so submissive and mild, as not to have required in so long a period, the exercise of the old or the institution of a new system of a judicial administration; that the government has been armed with all the plenary despotic rights and privileges of the most absolute princes in the universe, added to a military power, and acquired mental endowments in the whole circle of scientific knowledge, of a nature greatly superior to what the Moguls could ever boast of in Hindostan; that there were apparently such extraordinary opportunities to gain information in every branch of politics, and trace true theory to its source, through the detail of practical experience, it may seem wonderful that, at this day, so little should be known of objects of such vast and necessary importance, as the ways and means, mode of management in raising the public supplies, and actual amount of revenue collected on behalf of the state, as to encourage any individual destitute of official local intelligence through others, or from self practice, to step forth in the ambitious hope of being able to say something new and interesting on a subject which at present so deeply engages the attention and inquisitorial powers of the nation; to hazard the imputation of presumption in opposing general belief, founded on the almost concurring testimony of experience of respectable persons, and recorded opinions, which may have influenced even a parliamentary decision; and lastly, to incur the certain risque of shame, without any expected private benefit, should it appear hereafter, that groundless assertions have been substituted for facts and vain speculations, and imposed on the world, for the more useful deductions of true plain reason.

But to a well informed unprejudiced mind, it will cease to be a matter wonderful, that so little progress should have been made in the knowledge of Eastern finance, when the rapidity of British conquests, and the peculiar circumstances of the Company's servants in India, are taken into consideration; when it is remembered that for many years back, there hath been a constant fluctuation in the government of our territorial acquisitions, and that in the struggle for the actual possession of these, or annexed influence between the crown and proprietary interests, the representatives of the latter were unable to discriminate by whom, or under what forms, the rights of sovereignty ought and should continue to be exercised; that all public accounts of the revenue, and in general, the whole political learning of Persian are locked up in the intricacies, studied ambiguity, and verbose inaccuracy of Persian manuscript writings; that to the ordinary difficulty of acquiring a foreign language, a remarkable difference of character in the Asiatic dialects, adds a further obstacle to their being learnt by Europeans; that, nevertheless, no adequate inducements have been held out to encourage a painful, and in itself, generally speaking, an unprofitable study; yet so necessary to develop the true efficient principles of a system of political economy, professedly serving as a basis for the conduct of public measures, that among the few individuals, who rather from motives of private satisfaction or a natural bent, may be said to have mispent their time in Eastern literature, scarcely one is to be found who has gone through a course of general original history, much less perused, or perhaps ever heard of many of those dry, incorrect, and tedious narratives, which contain the particular annals of Hindostan in detail, and which, though often mortifying to the pride of freedom, in instances of the most servile flattery or unmeaning praise bestowed on rulers as well as disgusting to Christian humanity in exhibiting the native deformity, the horrid depravity, oppression, and tyranny of Mahomeddars, may yet be of some universal utility in conveying a true knowledge of facts more or less important to the interests of mankind, and are indispensably necessary to the public understanding of the past and present system of local administration, or forming a new, more intelligent one for the future. But when it is known how few, if any, of the Company's civil servants in the circars, have been induced to learn the Persian language, either from want of encouragement, or the facility of procuring Hindoo interpreters, who, with the knowledge of the English, might be supposed capable of transacting the business of the country, through the medium of their native dialects; that in consequence, all original more authentic accounts of the revenue, the rights and privileges of the prince or lights into the settled forms of government, the firmans, sunnuds, temporary or hereditary tenures, were absolutely and wholly precluded, or of no avail to the superintending agents of people, by a critical examination of treaties, firman, sunnuds, temporary or hereditary finance; that further, there was no virtual control over the inferior intermediate native officers employed, whose interest it was for the most part to deceive, who are endowed with sufficient cunning to second predominant inclinations, and who were moreover liable to be imposed on themselves, through technical literary ignorance; and above all, that on the first acquisition acquisition of these provinces, necessity perhaps threw the whole executive administration, for the three following years, into the hands of an unprincipled intriguing Mussulman amildar, formerly in office under the Nizamut, in conjunction with an artful intelligent Hindoo, elevated on that occasion rather informally, to the high incompatible lucrative trusts of diwan, public interpreter, and of serishtadar, or actual chief canonigos; that in consequence of a combination so powerful to veil the mysteries of finance, or rather the defalcations of immediate agency, under the pretended forms of ancient practice, continued by the most experienced men, an example and routine of management was established, which necessarily shackled all future superintendence; we repeat, when these various circumstances are known, it may seem more surprizing that so much should have been ascertained, and brought to public credit under the head of revenue, than that so little should yet be generally understood of affairs involved in difficulties and obscurity; at least, equal to their importance.

As to the pretensions of an individual, a mere sojourner in the country; of his observations as to any thing new and interesting, whatever they may be, he claims no particular merit from them. The office of public minister to the Nizam's court necessarily requires some knowledge of the Eastern language, and the proper discharge of its most ordinary functions, implies a general acquaintance with every branch of politics; at the same time, a private intercourse, founded on a very trifling obligation, with the first statesman in point of station and rank in the Deccan, perhaps the greatest that has appeared of high birth in Hindostan during the present age, in universal learning and experienced ability, accidentally opened a way to uncommon sources of information from an extensive library, and the most useful public records of the highest authority; the neglect of which, would have argued the greatest demerit, considering the difficulty, perhaps the impossibility, of an European's meeting with the like favourable opportunity of gaining political instruction through the best native channels, always shut up with the most cautious jealousy against foreign inquiry.

In regard to apprehension of incurring the imputation of presumption in refuting received opinions, however far they may have had the sanction of the most respectable personages, such an individual, conceiving the general belief to be founded in error, and of dangerous tendency, must be shielded either by a sense of public duty, or the conscious rectitude of his own intentions; but with respect to the consequent shame of detection in wilful misrepresentation, rather than shelter himself under the uncertainty of private motives, he must wish to rest his defence on the truth of facts and justness of observation on the subject of finance, within the large scope of present consideration, which may be divided into the four following heads, viz. 1st. The nature and sources of the Revenue of the Circars proportioned to the total produce of the country.—2d. The mode of settling the Jummabundy, or raising the annual supplies of Government.—3d. The gross and net Receipts of the public Treasury.—4thly. An account of current charges, involving a proposed Scheme of future expenditure.

First. It is well known that throughout the whole of Hindostan, the ordinary revenue of government is comprised under the two general denominations of Mahl and Sair; the latter, arising from a variety of imposts chiefly on personal property, fluctuating and uncertain in its amount; is therefore of an unsettled precarious nature, ascertainable only at the close of the year, and including almost the whole system of taxation in Europe. The mahsool, or customs in exports and imports, were fixed by the Moglis at 5 per cent. from Hindoos, or half that proportion from merchants of their own persuasion, or favoured foreigners; but chaddarry is an inland toll, collected at different chowkies or stations on the roads from the sengers, or on account of merchandize, grain, and all the necessities of life, carried to market, and being exacted at an indefinite rate, according to the usual indiscretion of zemindars, or other officers of government, is intolerably burthensome to the lower class of people, without producing any adequate benefits to the state. The Pandery, or tax on the shops of workmen and retail merchants in towns, or, under a different denomination, on the temporary stalls erected during the fairs held annually at places of Mussulman pilgrimage, or Hindoo worship, formed also a considerable branch of the sair, together with licences to the makers and sellers of spirituous liquors, or to the keepers of brothels; in like manner, in many places were included a tax on houses in general, on marriage, on looms, on the cloth manufactured, and the motherreffa or poll tax, on artificers and manufacturers, continues every where a great discouragement to industry. The jizea, or tribute imposed upon the Hindoos or idolaters, was, perhaps, for the last time collected in the beginning of the present century, by Anweer o Deen, the father of the nabob Mahommed Ali, when acting as superintendent of this branch of the revenue, in the town of Surat; but what may appear strange, the personal exactions, under the Mussulman government, from Indian pilgrims resorting to Jaggernaut, or other famous pagodas, are still rigorously enforced by the freest native rulers, successors to the tyrannical dominion of Islamism, yet superstitious adherents of braminiical faith. The ferroay, foujedarry, or produce of fines, confiscations, and the chout, or fourth of sums litigated in the civil courts, made no inconsiderable part of the variable uncertain sources of public supply; and to these may be added within the Northern circars, the profits on salt farms, estimated at a lack and a half of rupees, or about two-thirds of the prime cost of near ten lacks of maunds, exclusive of half that quantity exported annually to Bengal before the late prohibition there, on a medium of 25 rupees per 2,0 maunds, likewise the yearly rent of cocoa nut and palmyra trees in the neighbourhood of the sea ports most frequented by the lascars and fishermen, and chiefly near the mouths of the Godavari; properly dependant on the port of Masulipatam, though sometime since included in the zemindarries of Muggletore and Peddapore, and which, at one rupee each tree, may be rated at least two lacks and a half half rupees additional, as arising from barren unappropriated lands; yet the total of all these abwabs or imposts, levied on the general head of sair, either in the circars, or any other part of Hindostan, never exceeded one-tenth, and now falls rather short of that portion of the stated public income; and they were thought of such little account to the state, so oppressive in their nature, for the most part, to the poor, consequently so repugnant to the principles of the established, as well as any other system of religion, that the wise and politic Alem Gheer, the last great emperor of the Hindoostany race of Timoor, abolished, by edict, seventy of these several articles of taxation; though the selfish lenity of the prince, more than the refractoriness of foudedars and jagheerdars, whose fiefs continued to be valued without abatement, according to the jumma kaumil, or old standard assessment, which included the recently prohibited abwabs, together with the future disorders of the empire, virtually prevented then and ever since, the carrying into effect the royal mandate, left now as historical record, rather of what ought to be done in policy and humanity, than at any time could be expected from the universal benevolence of an Eastern despot.

It is therefore the mhal, or landed property, the first mentioned general distinctive term of revenue, which constitutes the grand, the permanent, ascertainable pre-exigent source of finance over the whole of Hindostan, and indeed; all the rest of Asia, under one universal rule, perhaps peculiar to this quarter of the world, though admitting of many subordinate variations in its several divisions; and to this important branch, we shall confine our future disquisitions on the subject before us. Nothing can be more erroneous than the public opinion entertained of the nature of our territorial income throughout the British dominions in India. In Bengal, where most progress hath been made in ascertaining the true original principles of the actual system of revenue, it is generally considered under the denomination and common idea of a land tax imposed on certain classes of native and supposed hereditary proprietors called Zemindars, from a compound in the Persian language, signifying literally, tenants, or holders of land. In the circars, it has acquired the more dignified appellation of tribute; and the petty farming landholders from whom it is collected, have been sometimes honoured with the title of feudatory lords, but most commonly with that of rajah, or hereditary Hindoo princes. It would be no very difficult matter to shew the foundation of these mistakes, and their influence in determining the opinions of those, who have only European ideas. To comprehend the state of things in Asia, conveyed in general terms of the English language, seems at once obvious and necessary: but it is our present task rather to exhibit the truth of a different, and what we conceive to be the only proper definition, of Indian revenue; viz. not a tax of 1-5th, as in England, on the proprietary income of freehold estates, far less a feu duty, or fixed perpetual quit rent, on such as are in vassalage, and by the ancient military tenures known in other parts of Europe, but in form and fact, the landlord's proportion settled on a medium at one-fourth; the rebba, or chout * of the original gross produce of the land, shared with the tenantry, or rather a yearly rent, variable according to the circumstances of the country at the period of adjustment, paid to government, as the sole, legal, known territorial proprietor, as generally understood by the ryots or immediate cultivators of the soil, through the agency of the most part of a certain class of Hindoos, nominated on behalf of the state, with suitable appointments; land and money, to the office of zemindar, or superintendent of a local provincial subdivision; and who, collectively, to the greater satisfaction of the people, as native guardians of the public peace and private rights, as well as receivers, or rather farmers general of the revenue, relieved their ignorant voluptuous Mussulman rulers from the intricate troublesome detail of internal police, and the management of mofussil collections. That this was, and continues to be, the true nature of the territorial income of the circars, under the Company's or former administrations, can only be fully illustrated by taking a short general review of the original institution and progress in Hindostan, of the Mogul system of finance, which is still regarded in fact, or by legal construction, as the only genuine source and support of every actual established mode of raising the supplies, throughout one and all of the discovered members of this once great empire.

Much hath been said of the assil toomar jumma, or original roll of the rent, agreeable to the first general assessment of the twelve soubahs of Hindostan, north of the Nerbuddah; undertaken and imperfectly accomplished through the superior agency of the famous Hindoo rajah Toorell Mull, in the reign of Akbar, one of the greatest Mogul emperors; but of the performance little more seems to be known in Europe, than the total amount for which the several districts were rated, or of its author, any thing further than that he was an able financier. The following short Analysis therefore of a work so celebrated, connected with as much as may be necessary of the history of the man, may be equally new, as it appears essential to the more perfect understanding of the subject under consideration.

Toorell Mull, of the Kshetry cast, from Lahore, and at length raised to the munsib, or dignity of four thousand, began his political career in the province of Gujerat, both as a military commander and intendant of the revenue, in one thousand seven hundred and fifty-three of the Christian era. The two following years he acted in the same capacities in Bengal, with greater reputation, during the viceroyalty of Khanjehan. He was afterwards deputed a second time to Gujerat, and on his return to Delhi in 1577, having resumed the of the soil, and at first with the more ready concurrence of the sovereign, because the demand did not come home immediately to himself, and only lessened the power of more refractory subjects.

office of peshear, or chief assistant to the vizier Shah Munsoor, which he held in the intervals of his residence at the capital, had no doubt a great share in the regulations of that year, such as the division of the empire into twelve soubahs, the appointment of eight principal officers with distinct independent powers to each, and a fixed jummabundy or annual settlement of the revenue, formed on a medium of the ten preceding years actual receipts, according to the best information which could be obtained from the local investigations of a number of skilful amcens distributed throughout the several provinces. But it was not till 1582, when he received for the second time investiture of the vizaret Ashraf Dewan, or post adopted since, by succeeding administrations as a model of perfection, and serving as a basis for the actual collections in every part of Hindostan, without any variation in the principle, or much increase in the amount of assessment to the present time, excepting in the maritime countries, since so prodigiously enriched by an enlarged direct commerce with Europe, or in such other places, as were not then completely subdued; or of which the valued rent could not with sufficient accuracy be ascertained in the other period of this great man's administration, finally terminated with his life in the year 1589. That system embraced the three great objects of Eastern government: regulations of finance chiefly for the support of a feudal military establishment, through the medium of a gold and silver currency; as best calculated to maintain the power, the dignity, and supply the necessary profusion in expense of a despotic prince.

The ultimate point of perfection, aimed at in the revenue department, was to form a rent-roll on an actual measurement of the lands, of exactly one fourth of their full annual produce, shared with the husbandmen, to be paid into the royal treasury in specie, according to the number of beghas or extent of ground in cultivation, distributed into four classes, expressive of the nature of the soil, and to be invariably rated by a medium then struck of this was called the Jummabundy nekdy, or money settlement, and the farms so rented were denominated Ruckbah, an Arabic term, signifying possession held by a slavish tenure, though probably introduced in Hindostan, from the more ancient custom of assessing the country, by the estimated labour of a yoke of oxen. But such a scheme of finance was only applicable to, and intended for, places where circumstances of soil, population, commerce, and general civilization, admitted of the more improved state of agriculture in its various branches, arising from the superfluities, as well as the necessities of life; accordingly, it prevailed chiefly in the soubahs of Delhi, Agra, Gujerat, and Behar; Bengal being at that time, as little known, as imperfectly reduced, and its climate held in such disrepute, as to impress the idea of banishment on the minds of those, who afterwards carried thither, in multitudes, all the enriching arts of luxury, and acquiesced in the propriety of bestowing and resorted to only from necessity.

In the other provinces, therefore, the public revenue was levied by a different rule, technically understood under the Hindoo word Buttai, signifying division, which was better adapted to the scanty resources of an indigent ignorant peasantry, deriving their subsistence chiefly from pasture lands exempted from taxation*, or who contenting themselves with the luxuriant growth of a single harvest, where two might be produced with a little additional labour, required that spur to industry given by a judicious increase of the demands of government, and who, as yet generally unused to a gold or silver currency, were for the most part, obliged to pay their rent in kind. Agreeable to this mode, it was ordained, that the great natural productions in all sorts of grain and pulse, depending on the periodical rains, and reaped in either of the two seasons khareef or rubbi, being wholly ascertained, and accurately estimated on the spot by the mokeem, or skilful appointed appraisers, husbandmen; nor will such appear an inequitable participation, though the expense of seed, with the whole of the labour, fell on the latter, when we consider the facility of the simplest culture; the general forty-fold returns of a quick spontaneous vegetation; together with the peculiar advantages to a Hindoo, of a free unbounded common pasturage. When charge of watering them artificially from wells, public reservoirs, or by means of drains from rivers, then the state was only to be entitled to one-third proportion, as sole proprietor of the soil, of the gross original product; but with respect to articles of greater value thus brought fourth, such as opium, sugar cane, vines, plantains, mulberry and cotton plants, the share claimed from the immediate cultivators, through the agency of zemindars, or farmers general, by a lenient, wise, beneficent government, varied from one fourth to one eighth of the entire yearly crop, according to the additional expense and labour of culture, hazard, or trouble of carrying them for sale. Moreover, in countries where this rule of buttai, or division of the ordinary and extraordinary harvests between the prince and his farming subjects was established, yet it was always in the option of the latter, as it may be said to have been the terminating ultimate view of the former, as landlord, when the agriculture was in its improved state of new and various cultivation, to commute the larger proportions proportions of rent, as paid in kind, for the rehba, or pecuniary assessment of one-fourth, as settled in other places, on a measurement of the lands, together with a medium valuation of their whole and mixed produce annually. There were still, however, very extensive tracts of the Mogul dominion, either totally unexplored, difficult of access, or imperfectly subdued, which neither of the foregoing modes, could bring into a general computation of the revenue. These districts were, therefore, estimated according to the best information possible to be obtained for the present, subject to future alterations; and thus were commuted the foundations of that famous original system of finance, involved in the Toomar juma of Toorel Mull, intended to sustain the vast fabric of the Mogul empire.

The means of realizing the new-formed universal rent-roll, were made subserviently relative to the support of the imperial household, together with the civil and military establishments; the economical reform of which, particularly the latter, was the next grand object of the minister's general plan. Accordingly the whole kingdom, as now assessed, was distributed into lands immediately dependant on the khalsa shereefa, or royal exchequer, or such as were assigned over to the greater or lesser officers of government, for the maintenance of troops and personal dignities; by a feudal temporary tenure, at first called atka, then jageer, signifying territorial possessions so alienated, at the will and during the precarious favour of a despotic monarch. The former division, including the capital town, with its dependant circar, or province of a soubah, or vice-royalty; and the principal pergunnah or district of all the other circars, under the subordinate rule of rahbys, the foujedars, or aumils, constituting together the whole khalsa or household lands of the emperor, set apart to defray his personal and court expenses, those of his guards, state garrisons, as well as the similar establishments of all his delegate representatives throughout the empire, including also in general, every where the largest, the richest, and best ascertained portion of the country, was, besides its geographical juridical subdivisions, parcelled out into others, depending on the amount of revenue, being one crore of daams, or two and a half lack of rupees per annum; these were denominated Chucklas, and the immediate superintendence, internal management, and collection of each, were conferred on the wealthiest, most skilful trusty Hindoo farmers which could be found in the district, with an allowance of 5 per cent. on the net receipts of the treasury, from their collections, in addition to small freehold possessions in land for family subsistence, already described under the appellations Nanar suverum; and the officers thus employed, were at first distinguished by the name of Crory, afterwards more familiarly known as zemindars, though the original designation is still made use of in all the Mussalman capitals, but with a total change in the nature and forms of the public charge from whence derived.

The other grand division of the country, assigned over at the new valuation to the several military commanders, for the maintenance of their respective troops, included, for the most part, the least productive unsettled districts with a view to further improvement, and more perfect subjection, under the advantages of a local, joined to the vigour of a species of feudal administration. The lands thus distributed in all the twelve soubahs of the empire, as best calculated for the purposes of finance, as well as to insure the stability of recent conquests, under an unnatural foreign yoke, though generally distinguished by the Arabic term Atka, or the synonymous Persian word, jageer, yet received various, more particular denominations from the nature of the different tenures on which they were held. According to the more precise and proper signification of the general term for such possessions, nothing more was understood than a simple allotment of an extensive territory, with its jurisdiction and revenue, to a foujedar, or military commander for a limited or indefinite period, under an express obligation of maintaining a certain body of troops to attend the king in person, or any of his lieutenants in the field. Such were in modern times, the foujedars of Karnah, and the Benatic Payenghaut dependant on the soubah of Hydrabad; but the latter grant of Tycul, most commonly confined to a single circar, was sometimes, as Kunool in the beginning of the present century, but then with particular services, or a small quit rent. The Sycughal again, was an assignment usually for life, on certain lands for the whole or part of their assessed revenue, without any local jurisdiction, similar to that bestowed on Lord Clive in the Company's zemindarry of Calcutta, which though denominated billa shereit, or an unconditional atka, answers exactly to the zatee or personal jageer of the moderns, in like manner as the preceding tenure of Tycul, being also of Mogul or Turkish derivation, corresponds with that now in use under the terms mushroot, or conditional, and aksham sepahy, or military jageers, appropriated either for the support of garrisons or provincial troops. Under the division of assigned country, were also classed, those petty alienations, consisting of a few beghas of ground made over by the prince, in the manner of a religious, charitable, or gratuitous donation for the maintenance of individuals, singly or in community, thus an Aynna was granted to professors of learning, and the Mussalman faith, and Pundna in Bengal. Enaums or seminaries, such as Gopaman in the soubah of Oude, and bestowed on mendicants, whether Hindoo or Mahommedan, he common singers, bramins, and likewise on zemindars, under the more particular denomination of Nanar, or means of subsistence, though the arrogance of some of the usurping rulers of the present age has imposed the same word, as descriptive of the highest, most extensive grants, on the ignorance in such matters, but an altumgha, according to the power or influence to command the greatest real favours, in conformity to the literal signification of the two Arabic terms of which this technical one, is composed, conveyed gratuitously from the sovereign to a few of the most favoured of his servants, a small heritable grant of territorial property, perhaps then, and since, the only one of the kind in the whole system of Mussulman jurisprudence. Sometimes the same jagheer held all the principal subordinate tenures within the limits of his atka, or more extensive jurisdiction, the other was contrary to Eastern policy; as in those days, the Nabob Zuffier ul Dowlah enjoyed in his turreddary or division of the Nizam's dominions, the tyeul of the circars of Commamet and Worangole, the sycughal of many lesser districts, together with alumgha of Niernul. Nor were such holdings, entirely confined to Mahomedan amceers; for we find even in Akbar's reign, that the great Hindoo rajahs of Mauvar and Jaepour, after being conquered, and wholly deprived of their ancient possessions among the hills of Aginere, received them back, as military fiefs, subject to the new regulations of the Mogul empire; and when the same princes were afterwards so far humbled, as to submit to the mortifying, though intended conciliatory requisition of the emperor, to send their daughters to the royal harau to be espoused under a rule the most repugnant to their natural principles, their assigned territories were enlarged beyond the usual extent of the most considerable jagheers.

It must further be remembered, that one and all of the superior and lesser tenures which we have enumerated, could only legally and formally be obtained, directly from the sovereign ruler, under his proper seal and signature, though often through the recommendation of ministers or favourites; and therefore, when in later times of actual usurpation, yet outward respect for the old imperial rights, any self-created soubahdar, in imitation of the lord paramount, conferred such feudal possessions on the individual verant in, and claiming rank with consequence from the ancient forms of Mogul royalty, the grant could only be received under the base tenure of Toahheddy, a contract, or Ejarah, a farm for years; thus, in the nizamat of Salabut Jung, when the circar of Guutoor was made over to his brother, Bazalet Jung, who also derived his honours and vice-royalty of Benjapour nominally from the crown of Delhi, as the common source of legitimate authority or grandeur, the transfer was made in the manner of a lease, which having just expired at the period of the Company's taking possession of the other circars, was continued by treaty with Nizam Ali, on the same footing of occupancy during the life of the incumbent, under the denomination of a jagheer; moreover, it is to be understood of the division of atka, or alienated lands in general, as well as of that portion of the empire immediately dependant on the khalsa, that the inferior mofussil administration, in matters simply of interior police, or affecting the public revenue, was, with a few exceptions, vested universally in Hindoo zemindars, chowdries, talookdars, mocudlins, and the lesser ryots or peasantry, sometimes acting in a chain of subordination to each other in the rank we have placed them, sometimes separately; and there are instances where rights, jurisdictions, and privileges, annexed to the higher of all these subsidiary official distinctions, expressive of a landholding or tenancy in the soil, were united in the same persons, in like manner as hath been remarked, with respect to the lordly feudal tenures of the Mogul amceers, the forms of which may have given rise to analogous ideas in the management of the finances. Accordingly we find, in the zemindary granted to the Company of the lands about Calcutta, investiture given not only under the general more comprehensive, but also under the special subordinate ones of chowdrary and talookdar; the one more particularly signifying in the Hindoo language, an inferior civil jurisdiction; the latter in the Arabic or Persian, a dependant tenement or farm, usually assessed in Hindostan, at a fixed annual rent.

But though Toorel Mull, by these regulations, ascertained the legal sources, together with the amount of revenue proportioned to the gross yearly produce of the country, and made the means of collection subservient to another object of government, which was the support of a feudal military establishment; yet a gold and silver currency was still wanting to facilitate the operation of either department, involving the receipts or disbursements of the royal treasury. Strange as it may appear, before this period, the only coin in common use, in the supposed rich commercial empire of Hindostan, was on copper, under the nomination of pull, siah, or telooos, sixteen of which were reckoned equal to a tunka of base silver; these were sometimes struck, but solely for the king's use, in making the usual presents to foreign ambassadors, rewarding singers, or the particular services of any of his nobles. Trade must therefore have been carried on, chiefly by barter, the rents for the most part paid in kind, or subject to the same tedious details which might have been found less inexpedient, in the issues of money for defraying the public expenses. To remedy such inconveniences, and enlarge the circulation of specie a new coin of the finer metals was introduced, and from thenceforth gold mohurs, each 11 masheh weight, worth 9 sicca rupees of 11½ masheh, or about 7 dwts. 11 grains, pure silver, each of these to be valued at 40 dawns or telooos of copper, every one of which to weigh agreeable to the former standard, 21 masheh, were substituted as the universal medium of exchange in all financial accounts and pecuniary transactions of the state. These different arrangements considered, severally or as relative to the simple object of revenue, comprehended the whole scope of that system of political economy, as celebrated among the wise institutions of Akbar, as being the most equitable and perfect for the government of a foreign conquest, and still constituting, after a lapse of 200 years, the ground work of the actual legislation of finance throughout the whole of Hindostan, or esteemed the best model to be adopted in future.

In the Deccan, although considerable progress had been made by the Mogul arms, in the reduction of the four nearer soubahs, from the very beginning of the seventeenth century; it was not until the year 1654, in the reign of Shah Jehan, and under the auspices of Moorsheed Koole Koole Khan, then dewan of these southern countries, that Toorel Mull's regulations were there introduced, and became thenceforward the standing immutable law of the land. The original scheme was so servilely copied on this occasion, that the only difference lieth in some nominal distinctions, which are however worthy of notice, to prevent mistakes, in tracing the genuine source of the revenue system established in this great limb of the Mogul empire. The Persian terms, dustoor ul amil, applied to the first institutions, are changed for the Hindoo word, deharah, of the same signification, to express the ordinations promulgated for the government of the Deccan jumma kaumil, complete or more perfect assessment, is substituted for the assil toomar jumma, of proper Hindostan; baghat, or gardening, is applied to the finer more laborious culture depending on the artificial supply of water; and the provincial dialect of the South afforded the personal titles, desmook, chief of a district, or despan-deah, its bramin, recorder, and accomptant, instead of the more universal ones of zemindar or crory, and canongoe, or public register. A silver and gold currency has been already long established among the Deccanee Hindoos. This advantage, perhaps, was derived from the early extensive intercourse in trade, between that people and the Persians, or more recently the Arabians, to whom the use of a national coin had been known, near a thousand years before: but whether it was borrowed from others, or originated in the country, it had been found inconvenient, under the preceding Mussulman governments, to attempt innovations, and this may be the reason why Toorel Mull's regulation of the coinage was left out in his system, as revived by Moorsheed Koole Khan.

But it hath been already observed, it was not before the year 1687, that the Northern Circars, forming part of the soubah of Hyderabad, fell under the Mogul yoke. It doth not appear that any alteration, either in the amount of rent, or mode of assessing these districts, was introduced at the period of this revolution; the old valuation, or standard of revenue, as fixed, we have reason to believe, on the first establishment of the Kootul Shahy, was transferred to the imperial rent-roll of Alenigeer, and the rule of battar, or equal division of the crop between government and its ryots, is continued exclusively and universally down to the present time, except in places where the unnatural, unrestrained oppression of zemindars, has increased the moiety, demanded in behalf of the public, from the peasantry, solely for private advantage. This simple mode of rating lands for half their yearly produce, is derived from the remotest antiquity in different parts of Hindostan, and still invariably prevails in such countries as were left unsubdued by the Mahomedans, like Tanjore, where the ancient Indian forms of administration are for the most part preserved entire; it will not, therefore, be thought extraordinary, that the same custom should thus be the ground-work of one system of finance, and enter largely into the formation of another, through ignorance, policy, or necessity, to the former usage of the same unconquered people. Such, however, is the fact; either the circars were subject, in the reign of the Kootul Shahy, to similar regulations as had been instituted by Toorel Mull, or his copyist, in the Deccan, for the management of the Mogul revenue, or when they were annexed to the crown of Delhi, they necessarily and immediately fell under the general laws of the empire, which, to this day, authoritatively ascertain the nature and sources of the public supplies to be conformable to the definition which we have endeavoured to support in discussing this first general head of the subject of present consideration.

Second. The mode of settling the jumma bundy by annual agreements, is derived from the highest antiquity in all parts of Hindostan; and arises necessarily from the local circumstances of the country, joined to the character of its inhabitants. The frequency of revolutions in government; variations in the state of population, from the too often experienced calamities of war, pestilence, or famine, and perpetual changes in the produce of agriculture occasioned by inundations, drought, or any irregularity of the seasons, must influence inevitably a periodical valuation of the lands; while the poverty of a people, the fewest possible wants, where nature is most profuse, in yielding all the necessities of life, their factitious simplicity in diet under the severest rules of a stubborn faith, which still further reduces the prices of labour, and encreases of course the indigence of the peasantry, added to the policy of keeping poor the zemindars, or intermediate agents of the state, whose sole use in society is confined to the exercise of their civil employments; who are taught through the superstition or chicanery of their priests, to consider the concealment of wealth, as the first of religious duties; whose fortunes, therefore, could not be brought into circulation, unless in the execution of schemes of ambition, either by direct treason or corruption for the destruction of that government, from which they derive their political existence. While we repeat the universal irremediable poverty of such a people, partially and very moderately favoured by commercial benefits, passive in their natures, unindustrialious from circumstances of situation or the charms of a pastoral life, which eludes contrivance for the support of civil society, renders a yearly settlement of the revenue, however inconvenient it may be, in extensive dominions ruled by a few individuals, unavoidable, and highly expedient, as the shortest term that can be prescribed. The only source of Indian wealth in general, excepting the confined, though daily increasing trade with Europe, exclusively enjoyed within the circle of the British possessions, is territorial property, of which the value is low, in proportion as the natural fertility of the soil and general influence of climate, are greater than in other countries; but local circumstances originating in the religion, government, genius and habits of the natives, depreciate so far this single revolving fund fund of riches, that even indigenous states, deriving from it alone their means, of support, have been forced to exclude intermediate property. Interests found so essential to freedom and individual civil prosperity, in places where these effects are supposed so prompt the welfare of society, or increase the portion of human felicity; and instead of raising the public supplies by an European system of taxation, were necessitated to claim the landlord's proportion of the yearly harvests, and enter into all the troublesome detail of immediate interior management, on the variable foundations of a temporary settlement of territorial rent. Foreign rulers, possessing by the violent right of conquest and country under such circumstances, and whose wants are not limited to the simple exigencies of internal defence, but relative to the vast complex operations of a distant mighty empire, involving an universal system of politics, and the very reverse of Hindostan in opulence, power, civilization, or particular interests, may find themselves compelled, as lords of the land, to exact a larger share of its yearly produce from the tenantry; but it is impossible they can relax in the established demands of their predecessors, or substitute any other adequate source of revenue, without supposing an alteration in the state of affairs, greatly beyond the perception of human foresight. The stock of existing productive wealth, together with the public supplies derived from it, depending on and being thus limited to the pecuniary returns of a single revolution of the harvest seasons, all operations in finance must have the same temporary bounds, subject to general principles reduced into a system, of which the superior excellence will rest, on the efficiency of mutual checks on personal agency or simplification of forms, accounts, and interior management. Having already described the functions and relative powers of the different officers of Mogul government within the circars, to determine the important question which now arises from the subject before us, the next progressive enquiry leads to a short recital of the established mode of proceeding, in fixing and realizing the Jumma bundy, or annual assessment of the lands.

The Fussilee or harvest year in the soubah of Hyderabad, to the north of the Kistnah, and in the circar of Guntoor to the south, commences on the 25th September, and is of course solar, though founded on a lunar epoch through Mussulman bigotry or ignorance. From the time of Akbar, it had been customary forcibly to introduce the Hegirah, wherever the Mogul arms could command a tributary acknowledgment of superiority, without reflecting, perhaps, on the almost immediate deviation of style which must ensue from the necessity of computing time agreeable to the invariable periods of the seasons. Accordingly, when Shah Jehan, in the year 1045 of the Mahommedan era, enforced the reading of the khotbah in his own name throughout the dominions of Abdallah Kootub Shah, that lunar period was then established; but having been since continued by solar calculation, a difference of near five years has already arisen between the two methods of reckoning, so that the beginning of the present Fussilee 1193, falls in the 10th month of the Hegirah 1797, or corresponds with the autumnal equinox A.D. 1783, from whence is to be dated the eighteenth annual settlement of the revenue, supposed to be concluded agreeable to the ancient and usual forms, until others are established in their room under the Company's administration. Preference of being continued another year in the collection of the public rents, is sent to the zemindars, as head farmers, to secure their influence in promoting and quickening the ordinary process of calculation. It seems impossible for government to enter into a minuter detail of management, than through the immediate agency of these native officers. To obviate such a difficulty, was one of the chief ends proposed by their original appointment, or from the confirmation of successive rules, of local rights and privileges, which so eminently distinguish them among the lower class of peasantry, and raise them so near the level of the landholders of other countries, as it will be found now, or whenever it is thought necessary to discuss the merits of the actual system, to be the only good purpose answered by adopting so much of the Mogul policy, notwithstanding the practice which hath so long prevailed of letting out whole rightful territory appertaining to the state. However this may be at seed-time, the koolerunes or village accountants are, in the next place, directed to ascertain the quantity of ground in tillage, with either the real amount or estimate of the grain sown, and which Tookhem rezi they do with a minute exactness, though rather in the view of preventing any fallacious representations for claims of remission, on the plea of casualties, than to value the future harvest. This grand preparatory operation is performed in consequence of another special writ to the same inferior officers, distinguished in Telinga by the word Anchumna, which seems to be a corruption of two Persian adverbs, signifying "there" "is" "so" "much;" but in proper Hindostan it is better understood by the Arabic term koot, applied to ripened corn, when about the month of November such valuation is ordered to be made of the two great crops in the ground, constituting the khareef and rubbi harvests.

At this important crisis, the zemindars, when most impatient to reap the fruits of their industry or ambitious care, are summoned to renew their agreements with government. It is a mistaken notion that the business of the season must be impeded, by the absence of these people; the very reverse, is oftener the case; they are for the most part all over Hindostan, and in the circars, with the exception of one or two individuals, wholly incapable of transacting affairs of such magnitude, as of late years have been left to their management, and are therefore in a state of tutelage to some crafty, designing, inferior agents, who forward their own selfish views, or maintain their consequence by feeding the vanity of their ignorant employers with ideas of princely grandeur, and too frequently with schemes of independence, under the presumed inability or negligence of any ruling administration, added added to the certainty of incurring no responsibility while they hold no ostensible office, and are personally unknown; accordingly the zemindars, of women and of minors, have always been found the best regulated internally, and the most profitable to the public, simply because the agency is united with responsibility in the same individuals, who are subject to controul in proportion to the inferiority of their pretensions, and who moreover, from the general depravity of manners in Hindostan, may be emulous of recommending themselves to the favour of government in the sinister view of being continued in the management, to the prejudice of, or with the end perhaps to the utter exclusion of their former principals. Whether then a jumma bundy be concluded on the spot, or elsewhere, by the removal of zemindars to any indefinite distance from their respective residences, exclusive of the small personal expense, which it is possible for Hindoos to incur beyond the hire of a pageant retinue, the mock resemblance of an army only when capacity fails in sending the ever constant inclination to command, and intimidate with the reality, is a matter of very little consequence to popular interests, and those of the prince can only be affected more or less in proportion to the degree of intelligence, vigour or probity, with which his delegates are now supposed to proceed, in thus bringing the revenue settlement to a close.

All the superior officers of government, and more especially the despandeahs, being assembled in the dewanny cutcherry, the first most important indispensable account called for by the aumildar or president, is the jumma kaumil, or complete assessment of the Deccan. The principles on which this original rent-roll, to give a more precise idea of it, was formed, have already been explained, as in like manner have its intended uses, which were in the beginning to regulate the two grand divisions of the country, in khalsa and jageer lands by ascertaining the gross value of either, for the immediate purposes of finance or political arithmetic, and ultimately, by gradual systematical progress, in estimating accurately the full dues of the exchequer, as proportioned to the whole amount of territorial produce, to form an invariable standard of revenue, which should be at once an effectual check on the most corrupt intermediate agency, as well to prevent public defalcations, as any encroachment on the private rights of the ryots. But such progressive improvement was contrary to the genius of Eastern governments, and never could be effected under the rule of arbitrary distant delegation; nevertheless, the ancient rental of the Kootub Shahy, incorporated with the jumma kaumil near a century since, imperfect as it is when compared to the present circumstances of the country, is yet absolutely necessary in the formation of a settlement in the circars, particularly to the South of the Godaveri, as exhibiting the only authoritative account extant and in use, made from an actual survey of the local sub-divisions, number of villages, quantity of ground in or capable of cultivation, together with the estimated territorial produce in money, according to the established rule of Buttai.

To remedy the defects of this antiquated rent-roll, the despandeahs are next called upon for the hustabood jumma, or comparative account of the former and actual sources of revenue, shewing the total increased valuation of the lands, whether real, by improvements, or fictitious, by a reduction in the price of specie, the variations produced by casualties in the state of the country, new appropriations or extinction of jageers, affecting more or less the khalsa portion of territory, together with the amount of new imposts, such as the Marhatta Chout* established in the same places, less frequently from the tyranny of rulers, than the fraudulent practices of zemindars, in withholding their stated collections made in behalf of government. Had the profits arising from such contingent sources of supply, in a long series of yearly agreements, been applied as originally intended to accumulate or really complete the standing rent-roll, which fell so short of perfection, under the delusive Persian epithet of Kaumil, little now would remain to be learnt on the subject of Indian finance; and the business of settlement being reduced almost to a simple form, might, without any material prejudice, be transacted in Leadenhall-street, as well as at Masulipatam, through the superior agency of English collectors, under suitable appointments and regulations. But here lay the grand defect of Mussulman administration; deeply rooted in the constitution of unchecked violent despotism, and in the singular depraved nature of the native inhabitants of Hindostan, the knowledge derived from the hustabood was generally perverted to selfish purposes, and in consideration of a nuzzerannah, or present, greater or smaller in proportion to the intelligence or power of the aumildars, comparatively with the value of the returning favour, remained in petto, the future productive source of private benefit.

In compliance however, to the customary forms the zemindar is now ordered to produce the Doul bundobust, or an account of his particular agreements with inferior farmers of the district, attested by the canongoes. This sub-rent-roll should be the counterpart, or rather a verification of the hat-hackent, or present state of revenue, as exhibited in the hustabood formed from the actual subordinate settlements of the current year or collections of the last for the whole zemindary, inclusive of khalsa and alienated lands; and which, with the tookhem rezi or account of seed sown, the koot, the hustabood, and jumma kaumil, might be supposed sufficient to ascertain the gross receipts or government's share of the full produce

* The Marhatta Chout, or fourth demanded by these people from countries to which they could extend their predatory empire, in imitation of the Kebba of the Moguls, was sometimes levied by the Mussulman government from their Jageer-dars, to indemnify the public for real or pretended exactions, paid in gross, and at once to the Marhattas, in lieu of such a proportional tax on the revenue as in the Soubah of Hyderabad, where the Nizam assesses all his Jageerdars for the full chout of their territorial income, though the whole sum stipulated to be paid to the Marhattas annually on this account, for the province entire, has been invariably fixed at one lack of rupees from the time of the 1st Nizam.

of the country, were it not for the baleful influence of Mahomedan administration, in corrupting the whole chain of intermediate agency, and invalidating the necessary checks on the universal moral depravity of the natives. Kharidge jummah, or excluded territorial appropriation in jagher, alimuga, and charitable donations to Bramins, &c. with the khurcha net jumamahundy of the rents actually to be paid into the public treasury; the former of these accounts would, since the commencement of British rule in the circars, be reduced to a very small compass, if such enormous fraudulent sequestrations as of late years have taken place by the collusion of zemindars and despondeahs, were, as in right they ought, to be resumed; and the latter, including the rassoons and savarums of the superior native officers, with the petty allowances to the chakram or inferior servants, was little more than a simple memorandum of about 14 per cent. to be deducted from the amount of their actual collections, though the prodigious defalcations of modern times, particularly under the new, dangerous, and unwarrantable article of sebandy, when allowed to the zemindars, in derogation of the prince's most essential exclusive right to command and pay the whole armed force of the country, will be found to make this account of charges the most voluminous and important to be examined, as stating, literally and truly, the sinking fund of near one-half the stipulated known dues of the public exchequer, perverted in the application to the intended destruction of, instead of relief to, that state within which it is annually formed.

On a short review of these various materials for forming an adequate jumamahundy, and which, though more hidden or dissipated, must still exist, and may be found as well under an English government, as that of a French, or Moorish, the work might be supposed quickly terminated, with no less justness than facility; but whether from the innate chicanery of the people, or that a propensity to evasion was the necessary consequence of undue exactions under the tyranny of one administration, or received encouragement from the insufficiency of public demands through the ignorance of another; it generally happened that the zemindars, by various concealed arts and specious pretences, retarded the conclusion of the settlement a whole month, in adopting the usual cant of farmers of being over-rated in their rents, and never failing to urge a diminution, however low the assessment might be proposed, when once it fell short of the equitable medium due; and so betrayed a want of knowledge in the agent of government, respecting the value of the territory now to let. If in the mean time the proper season for reaping the harvest was likely to expire, then the prejudice the crop might be permitted to lie on the ground, the zemindars could not be brought to an agreement, then the only alternative left was to suspend their authority, and to depute aumeens or tahildars, being the proper and more immediate officers of the state, to supply the vacancies in the minute interior management of the collections. It was on such extraordinary occasions that the benefit, the political expediency, was best understood, of training up in the knowledge of the country languages, of the finances, and above all the characters of the people, to be acquired only by local experience on the exercise of provincial employments, a certain number of individuals making part thereof attached to the interests, and subject to the whole effective control of the actual government, in whom might safely be confided trust of such high responsibility and importance, as the general superintendence with the collectorship of an extensive district; but under Mussulman despotism, if these requisite qualifications were readily found among a race of men now barbarously ignorant, yet the superior universal depravity of their natures, when compared with the Hindoos, together with a slavish dependance on the delegated chief, rendered them always wholly unfit, for public disinterested purposes, to act in the capacity of supervisors; and, during the former more enlightened administration of the French, though it be admitted that national virtue would have induced the gentlemen in power, even while expectants themselves for the united subordinate rule of all the circars, thus to countenance a system which must necessarily lessen the authority and emoluments of any one man inclined to follow the established practices of his predecessors, by diffusing local knowledge and participating influence among intelligent independent patriotic agents, instead of employing the more servile mercenary natives of the country, who are only faithfully secret in the business of corruption when favourable to their own private interests; yet a transitory dominion of six years did not admit of much experimental proof, in the advantages of a multiplied European superintendence. Accordingly, it very rarely happened that zemindars were deprived of the management of the current revenue of their districts, when their offers did not fall greatly short of the ascertained valuation of annual produce; and when they could give advance for about two-thirds of the net jumamahundy at which they might be rated, and are now supposed to acquiesce in, on or before the 1st of January, being the utmost time that can according to custom, or with safety, be admitted of, for the final adjustment of such periodical settlements; these teeps are the best collateral security which can be obtained by government, for the payment of the public rents. When collected by native officers from the ryots, they may farther be considered a pre-existent source of supply, as well as affording to the state a necessary and political control over the monied and mercantile interests, in case of interior or foreign commotions; indeed, the natural influence which such pecuniary obligations give the soucars, in directing the conduct of zemindars, joined to the dread of private losses from the casualties of civil war, have often been the means of preserving inward tranquillity, where all other restraints on a daring rebellious spirit, might have proved ineffectual. At the same time, the acceptance of teeps is founded in necessity. The real or fictitious poverty poverty of the Hindoo peasantry is, and must ever be such, under the influence of their own peculiar rights and habits, that, in order to carry on the common operations of husbandry, in places where the culture is simple, and of the meanest kind, as in the circars, they find it expedient, at the different seasons, to borrow money at high interest, in proportion to the risk incurred by the lender, and never under 2 per cent. per ann. agreeable to the institutions of Akbar, and by one known general rule over the whole Mogul empire, expressed by the Arabic term Tuckair. The zemindars through whom this aid is usually obtained, have still greater occasion, on their own accounts as merchants, rather than in their proper capacity of principal farming landholders, to make use of, and extend a credit with their Hindoo bankers. As agents for the state, they are put in possession of the public share of the annual produce of the country, divided with the ryots, at a very moderate pecuniary valuation; but that stubborn propensity to parsimony, chicanery, and refractoriness, which so notoriously characterizes them, would render it extremely unsafe to trust to their hands so much property, without some previous security; and the most favourable consequences to be expected would be, a secretion or collusive dissipation of the revenue, which nothing but personal fear, imprisonment, or torture, could bring into the treasury; at the same time, to touch a deposit of hidden wealth, though with the manifest advantage of saving an exorbitant interest for money borrowed, would be deemed sacrilegious. That hoard must be eternally increasing, and cannot admit even of the temporary diminution in making profitable loans. To enjoy the full recompence of meritorious conduct in the short probationary life of man, it becomes, therefore, necessary, first to mortgage the current crop of the season to such persons as have given the collateral security of their teeps to governments, and then to participate with them in the benefit arising from the sales, as an indemnification for the risk of staking their credit, or the inconvenience of making the stipulated advances to the state. It is chiefly this intricate, though necessary mercantile operation, which would render a more minuter detail of management, than by the permanent intermediate agency of zemindars, if not impossible without loss, at least ineligible, to any ruling administration. Yet, it must be confessed, that the power which it gives to these petty tyrants to oppress the poor, establish monopolies, or withhold the requisite supplies of grain from the provincial troops when on service, most frequently in the view of being better enabled to furnish the enemy, is often productive of the greatest inconveniences; but as a local vigorous superintendence might, in a great measure, correct this evil, it is only principally to be regretted, that some share of the enormous profits derived from the transfer and sale of the annual territorial produce by the zemindars in their mercantile capacities, cannot be brought into circulation, or by any means be rendered beneficial to the public.

Having thus brought the Jumamahundy to a close, and secured the payment of two-thirds of the amount, by kists or monthly instalments, let us follow the usual process of the year, in realizing the remainder of the stated revenue to the final adjustment of accounts. The 30th of April, corresponding nearly with the termination of the most general civil year of the Hindoos, and concluding the periodical season, in which the returning dispatches for Europe may be made with convenience, has been, with great propriety fixed, on balancing the books of the circars; but it is from the 31st of August to the end of the Fussullee, that the accounts are ultimately settled with the farmers general of the government lands. In the latter of these periods, the poonass or small-grain harvest, the third and last being reaped, enables the ryots to fulfil their engagements with the superior renters, who are therefore, at this time, debited with the remaining portion of their jumamahundy, and required finally to liquidate their balances; at length, on the 24th of September, the expiration of the revenue year, a general statement, called the Jumma Wassil Bawky, shewing the amount, receipts, and balances for or on account of the current settlement, is drawn out by the head accountant, from the mofussil or similar detailed provincial documents, signed by the zemindars, attested and recorded by the canongoe, and after having gone through the critical examination of many different auditors, is deposited in the khalsa duff, to serve as a basis for the jumamahundy of the succeeding year. It was usual, at the same time, under the Moorish administration, for the amildar or collector general, as well in his own justification as to remove every possible pretence for future deficiencies, to produce a writing under the denomination of a Muchelka in darud, signed jointly by the desmooks and purporting that they have not, in the way of bribery or otherwise, paid a despondeahs, and besides what is specified in the public account of single daum to the agent of government, besides what is specified in the public account of receipts; after which, the only care left, though often imposing a very arduous task, was the recovery of such balances as appeared to be due, on the ultimate adjustment of the year. For this purpose, it might be necessary to scrutinize the transactions of the zemindars, both with the inferior tenants in the participation, and with the merchants in the sale of the annual crops, because the debts which could be ascertained to be due from the two latter classes of people to the former, together with the amount of rassoons and savarums, constituted the sole fund of indemnification within reach of the sovereign dewanny authority, to make good defalcations in the revenue, proceeding from negligent or corrupt intermediate agency; seeing the uncertainty, if not impossibility, of ever being able to touch the secret treasure of a Hindoo.

To avoid the detail, and lessen the other public inconveniences of such a system of management as we have described, though principally defective in the latitude its periodical renewals may give to speculation, or the insufficiency of a variable administration, it has been imagined, that to fix the yearly assessment unalterable at a moderate quit rent, and so put the zemindars of India on a footing with the copyholders of England, would be no less effectual, effectual, in accomplishing the desired immediate purposes, than ultimately beneficial in utmost importance to the British nation at large, and more particularly interesting to the Company. A local knowledge of the country, of the people, practical experience, or the judgment of those who partake of such partial lights, to pronounce with truth and confidence, the danger, inexpediency, or absurdity of innovations in the financial policy of Hindostan; that to lessen or fix the exactions, from the actually farming intermediate land-holders, would soon be fruitless to themselves, rather add to the burthen of the peasantry, and prove doubly injurious to a ruling foreign state, in reducing for ever the already too scanty sources of supply, even when considered in all their hitherto unrevealed plenitude, or as paving the way to a refractory independence; that in proportion to the decrease of public demands, so would the restive presumption of enfranchized slaves grow excessive, and become most ungovernable, under the feudal acknowledgment of a barley corn, which, in freer countries, best ensures tranquillity. But to impress conviction on the mind of those who, from situation, are precluded the benefit of such contingent aids, to draw a right conclusion in what regards persons and things, differently circumstanced to what they appear to be in Europe, may require the evidence of some ascertainable facts. It is therefore we adduce the following, as applicable to the subject under consideration.

In the circars immediately dependent on Masulipatam, we suppose it generally known, that the zemindars, since, and not before the establishment of the English government, have been considered no matter how erroneously, as hereditary proprietors of the lands included in their respective jurisdictions, and that, agreeable to the mistaken idea of possessing feudal tenures, they were subject to military services, together with a certain tribute in proportion to the valued rent of the countries. We know not whether any enquiries were ever set on foot to ascertain these different positions, or that they have been admitted on any other ground than simple surmise, the ipse dixit of the farming landholders themselves, or at best the in-formation of the Company's Hindoo interpreter, who, in the capacity of scribtedar, enjoyed an annual income of near forty thousand pagodas from the zemindars of Rajemundry ac- quiesced in about the 13th of February, 1767; but such is the fact; the assessment of these several districts for seventeen years back, has been rated extremely low. We shall venture to say, in anticipation of what we have further to add on the subject, that at least one half of the rents collected from the ryots in behalf of government has been remitted to its interme- diate agents, under the head of expense, on an idea of their being the rightful constitutional proprietors of the soil. Moreover, the portion demanded by the public, has been invariably limited to the amount, according to the received notion of a tribute; for though an increase of 12½ per cent. is supposed to have been put in the last five years settlement, on what is termed the Mahmool, or customary jumabundy; yet the total amount of that addition, to- gether with the 10,000 pagodas per annum salary to the interpreter, and 5,724 to be paid into the treasury for his mecrassy, did but barely counterbalance the afore-mentioned serishte- darry appropriations, added to an unaccounted portion of Hussein Ali's jagheer, and which then were reannexed to the Rajemundry zemindars, as equivalent only to the aggregate of the two last sums specified:—on the other hand, the stated military services, however much wanted of late, have neither been required, nor commuted for in money. The most profound tranquillity, an increasing commerce, the free secure enjoyment of private property, have peculiarly distinguished the circars for a long series of years past, amidst surrounding distractions, anarchy, or barbarity; and so far have these provinces been, from experiencing the calamities of a neighbouring war in the Carnatic, or been burthened with new consequent imposts, that they have rather in the mean time received a prodigious increase of wealth, through the extraordinary profits derived from the exported produce of the country, at least twenty-five per cent. above the usual price. Under a government so lenient, admitting of such uncommon privileges and individual advantage, it might naturally be supposed, that the zemindars, as being the superior class of Hindoo subjects, and most benefited by the powerful beneficent protection of the sovereign authority, would be found constitutionally submissive, grateful and liberal in proportion to their own prosperity, compared with the embarrassments, and the exigencies of the public. But the expectation would be politically unreasonable, and only betray a total ignorance of national character; the very reverse must always be the case, and has been more especially manifested in latter times within the dependencies of Masuli- patam, as may be sufficiently proved by a reference to such recorded facts at large, as we shall here only generally touch upon.

The annual jumabundy of these districts, on a medium of the last seventeen years, may be reckoned seven lacks of current pagodas, on which the total balances incurred at the end of the 11th Fussillee year 1186, by zemindars and renters, did not exceed two lacks and a half, exclusive of five lacks more due on soucar teeps, or bills receivable. In the beginning of 1187, corresponding with the year 1778 of the Christian era, computed from the date of the first payment of revenue, it was imagined that the current and futuro collec- tions might best be insured, by calling up the farmers to the principal seat of government at Madras, and concluding a settlement with them there, for five years. That period expired the 24th September 1783, and the balances were increased to twenty-two lacks eighteen thousand two hundred and ninety-three current pagodas, including only 1,76,411. in bills receivable; of this sum, the four principal zemindars, under circumstances which we shall briefly mention, stand indebted as follows; viz. Jaggaputty Rauze, of Peddapore, in Rajemundry, a vain and voluptuary, who is allowed to control 2,000 sebundy peons, the constitutional militia of the

the district, chiefly maintained by unauthorized alienations of land, and who, with that extra- vagance which characterizes a spendthrift debauchee, incurs an annual personal expense of near 24,000 pagodas, rather exceeding the income of his savorum, or proper landed estate, to acquire the epithet of liberal among his parsimonious countrymen, on a revenue of a lack and forty thousand* from actual collections made by him, of two lacks sixty thousand, owed nothing at the commencement of the last six years, but is now in arrears 2,36,876. notwithstanding the effect of repeated military persuasions.

Trippety Rauze, of Mugletore, in Ellore, a sensible man, but infirm and indolent, a greater economist, with nearly the same private fortune and number of peons as the preceding zemindar, on a jumabundy of 98,000, from mofussil collections of two lacks thirty-two thousand, owed at the former period, only thirty thousand; but at the latter, 6,61,050 current pagodas, including the revenue of neighbouring districts, for which he became security, and received, by himself or his agents, a rent of at least two-thirds exceeding the amount of the public assessment.

Opparow, of Noozed, a stubborn refractory subject, entertains 3,000 sebundy peons, many of them of the Velma cast; the only one of his degree in the circars that even affects a warlike character, and which he supports, not by opposition to the smallest regular force, but by sheltering himself, when pressed, in the neighbouring woods of independent zemindars, and instigating his scattered peons to commit depredations, until government is distressed into forgiveness from the hazard of incurring inquisitorial notice for the small temporary defi- ciencies which might attend the prosecution of more vigorous measures, on a jumabundy of 92,000. from the gross receipts of the country, amounting to about one lack eighty-five thousand, was indebted, at the beginning of 1187, not more than 35,000; and owed, the latter end of 1192, current pagodas, 1,41,798. his family and personal charges not exceeding twelve thousand, being amply defrayed from his private landed estate.

Mahputty Row, the uncle and guardian of the young zemindar of Pettapore, and there- fore on his good behaviour; on a revenue demanded by the public of sixty-two thousand, collected from the lands actually assessed, and paying in the gross one lack fifteen thousand, owed nothing at the first period, and fell only 1,58,435. in arrears at the close of the last year. His private expenses are about 12,000, but the sebundy peons entertained in his district, mostly on fraudulent alienations of territory, cannot be numbered at more than 1,500.

Twenty-seven petty zemindars, besides the foregoing, with others in the capacity of simple renters, are answerable for the remainder of the balances due the 24th September, 1783. making almost one half of the whole.

Thus, in a short period of six years, the jumabundy so low, the receipts from the country so ample, and the private necessary disbursements of the zemindars so trifling, a debt up- wards of two years ordinary revenue, has been incurred; and that too, on a settlement on the enlarged plan of a five years lease. But the truth is, that no public advantage whatever can be derived from such an extension of time, as the annual adjustment and collections from the crop always have, and must ever be continued. Nor would this minutiae of manage- ment be either difficult, inconvenient, or liable to abuse, if the established dewanny forms of government were practically observed; if the native officers were called on, as they must wish, to execute their more consequential functions, and for which they are already so liberally paid in money or in lands; and if under the auspices of intelligent well appointed provincial su- perintendants, chosen from the body of the Company's civil servants, means were taken to ascer- tain, with all possible accuracy, a true jumma kamil of the lands, and restrain within necessary constitutional bounds, the dangerous and lately usurped authority of farming landholders.

Third.—The gross amount of collections, though at once the simplest, and most indis- pensible branch of knowledge in the whole science of finance, is generally the least under- stood, or most difficult to be ascertained. In despotic states, where forms of government are the best, and the administration usually the worst; where the superior energy, order, and subordination incident to individual rule, assist every political operation and enquiry, in return for the infinitely greater disadvantages of popular slavery, it very seldom happens that the actual resources of the country are fully investigated or estimated in the view of proportioning, with moderation and policy, an adequate revenue to answer all public exigen- cies; when done, it has been usually at the period of foreign conquest, or some great revolu- tion, which throws the most arbitrary executive power into the hands of one of those rare superior geniuses, endowed with all the virtue, vigour and ability, peculiar to the founders of well regulated, mighty, and permanent empires. But however just the principles of the original plan may be, a work so new, of such extent, depending on variable unskilful agency, and limited in the execution, to the short busy life of a conqueror, must necessarily be extremely imperfect; while the daily changes introduced by native and extraneous causes in every thing of human production, may in a period of years lessen the practical utility of, or absolutely set at nought, all the advantages derived from primitive institutions, excellent in themselves perhaps, though easily perverted by ignorant deviations from their true spirit, or rather through the corruption, the base chicanery of ministers and inferior officers, acting under the degrading sway of despotism. In such cases, particularly applicable to Hindos- tan, the knowledge of individuals, ever partial or confined to the narrow circle of their own experience, experience, is reserved exclusively for private interested purposes. The financier who has learnt the excess of provincial collections made in behalf of the state from the ryots, beyond the amount of an antiquated valuation, obtains the disposal of the district at the usual rate, confers it on the highest bidder for the secret productive favour, or shares more largely the concealed emoluments of superintendence, through the channel of immediate agents. It is seldom, however, this lucrative arcanum of the revenue departments extends further than the delegate himself, who, by dexterous management in his employment; by altering and inter-benefits; seconding from similar motives, the most frequently groundless pleas of farmers for remissions of rent, or increased allowance for scabund or other molusil expenses; de-general or broken statements of the collections, may so involve the finances of his district in mystery and obscurity, as to render his own particular services necessary, if he be not altogether deficient in address, and at all events, prevent the transmission of local knowledge to dependents on his private bounty. To make amends for the consequent defalcations of corrupt agency, instead of a reform, or recurring to first principles of the established system of taxation, new contributions are levied, and without sufficient intelligence of its present state, and circumstances on a whole pergunnah without sufficient intelligence of its present state, and circumstances of the people; by which a latitude is given to zemindars to oppress the peasantry, while they themselves, with the other intermediate officers of government, continue their wonted pecuniary demand of public exigency. Such more especially, were the conspicuous defects and disorders incident to the system of policy pursued throughout the Northern circars, from the period of their being first subjugated, to the Mogul yoke in 1687, to their final virtual dismemberment in 1753;—as we shall endeavour to prove by induction, from the following facts.

* The Jumabundy and gross Mofussil collections of the zemindars, are here put down in Madras, or three image pagodas, valued in the Company's account at ten per cent. more than current pagodas, rated at 350 rupees the hundred, or at eight shillings sterling each; but of late, the exchange has run 400 Arcot rupees per hundred current pagodas.

THE JUMMA KAMUL, or complete assessment of these Provinces, as originally settled for those south of the Godaveri, probably in 1512, and with more certainty sixty years later, for the two, extending north of that river, under the dynasty of the Kootub Shahy, ascertained by a general statement in 1635, when the Princes of that line became tributary to Shah Jahan, and finally enrolled on the Imperial Khalsa Records of Alem-goer, on the entire reduction of the kingdom of Hyderabad; continued thenceforth, with a small addition, as the standard of Revenue, down to the establishment of the French government, at the commencement of the Nizamut of Salubut Jung;—stood thus:

CICACOLE; the most distant frontier province to the north, only explored along the sea-coast; divided into two pergunnahs, and 115 villages, and rated at - - - - - 8,40,322 12; of which the whole, excepting a pescheush of 35,000 rupees, paid by the ancient princes of the country of the race of Gajepetty, then resident at Pootnoor, and since banished to the hills of Jaepoor and Havillee, and collected from the farms of Cossim Cotah and the capital, to maintain chiefly the paga, or household cavalry, a considerable body of which was always stationed there, in like manner as in the southern frontier circar of Guntoor, before the conquest of the Carnatic, in the year 1652; therefore, the appropriations were proportionably great in each of these provinces, being in Cicacole - - - - - 8,05,322 12

The total assessment, then, of all the foregoing maritime circars, including the havillee lands, set apart for the special maintenance of the royal garrisons, sea ports, the civil and military establishments, amounting to rupees 20,87,481. 6. did not exceed, in the sixteenth century, or, to be more precise for the sake of analogical illustration, we shall assume the date of Toorel Mull's financial regulations for the rest of Hindostan, A. D. 1582, being exactly 200 years before the present, the sum of rupees, 52,07,700. 8½; but as this was only the jumma-band of the khalsa and jagheer lands at the first period of settlement, and necessarily excluded, such appropriations were thenceforward to be considered permanently attached to the officers, not the families, of certain Hindoos; as we may allow by estimation 10 per cent. on the revenue for the rissooms and savorums of the zemindars and despaudeals originally appointed, besides enaums to the value of one hundred rupees annually for the support of two bramins in each village, reckoning the number of the latter, then ascertained, to be 3,000, making together 8,20,770 rupees, in addition to the public income. The aggregate of these two sums paid by the whole body of the people, and amounting to, rupees 60,28,470, or, Madras pagodas 15,07,117, it should be here remembered, including the sayer, or variable imposts, with the full territorial rent, or royal proprietary share of the gross annual produce of a tract of country, which at that time might have comprised about two-thirds, or something more than eleven thousand square miles, of the better ascertained dimensions, since of local divisions generally known under the same denominations.

Now however sufficient in itself to answer the demands of government, or justly proportioned to the state of agriculture and manufactures, such a pecuniary assessment might have been at the period of its first establishment; we believe it must be deemed wholly inadequate and disproportionate a century afterwards, about the era of the Mogul conquest, considering the prodigious change which, in the mean time, was gradually brought about all over the world, in the relative value of specie, and nature of commerce, in consequence of the two grand discoveries of America, and a passage round the Cape of Good Hope. These memorable events were antecedent even to the earliest date that can be assigned to the settlement of the revenues, now under consideration, made by Kootub Shahy; but it would seem their influence began only to be sensibly felt in proper Hindostan, towards the latter period we have fixed on, when a gold and silver currency was first introduced as the universal medium of exchange; or perhaps somewhat sooner in the Deccan. To account for the tardy circulation of the treasures of the West, in thus proceeding to enliven, and at length, as is supposed, overwhelm with riches the opposite hemisphere, we are to recollect that the conquest of Mexico was not completed until the year 1525; and that 40 years more was not completed, before the communication with Manila could have opened a direct channel to the continent of India, for pouring thither the annual sum of near half a million sterling in silver, since paid by the Spaniards from the produce of their Northerly American mines, in exchange for Eastern luxuries; that Peru was unknown until 1532, and the famous mines of Potosi undiscovered for thirteen years more; then the united wealth flowing into Europe from these great extraneous sources, did for the first while but replenish the exhausted veins of circulation, or supply the increased and quick demands of reviving industry; that though the passage round the Cape facilitated the communication with India, to drain thither the growing superfluity of specie in the West, yet the most natural and only effectual channels of commerce were in a great measure neglected, or altogether in the power of a nation whose trade was chiefly warfare, and whose barter with the petty states of Malabar has been considered, even by neutral barbarians, as unqualified piracy.

But when towards the close of the sixteenth century, the empire of the Portuguese in Asia, was in a manner dissolved; when the descendants of Tamerlane had firmly established their sway over the greater part of Hindostan, and by the influence of the mildest despotism, founded on the best political institutes, drew a great portion of the riches of the new world within the circle of their dominion through Surat, the grand emporium of both the Arabian and Persian gulphs; when the industrious Hollanders shook off the yoke of tyranny, and in 1602 laid the foundation of their fortune with subsequent ruin, in paving the way, and exhibiting a model for the numerous mercantile establishments of other European nations, which soon afterwards, by mutual rivalry and rapid circulation of the signs of wealth, so prodigiously increased the demand, with the price of Eastern productions; and when, instead of a precarious transit over deserts, infested by a powerful unconquerable race of plunderers, to be afterwards transported on the unwieldy coasting hulks of the Indian seas, capable only of making a triennial voyage to and from their destined ports, the merchandize of either hemisphere hemisphere, found a much safer and speedier passage through multiplied channels round the Cape, then it was that the commerce of Hindostan may be said to have flourished, the quantity and value of its natural or artificial commodities increased in due proportion to the greater influx and consequent diminution of the value of the precious metals, considered relatively as the common medium of exchange. It is difficult now to ascertain with accuracy, the amount of bullion imported throughout this extensive region, in return for the whole export trade of the country, in the course of the century succeeding the year 1582; but we think it may be moderately estimated on an average, at a crore of rupees, or a million sterling annually, of which Mr. Orme, who had access to the contemporary records of the Company, assigns to Surat, in his historical fragments, one half, we may give to Bengal for its opium and manufactures with those of Coromandel, distributed to the Eastward in the China seas, twenty-lacs out of the Manila treasure, and surely thirty more may be thought rather a scanty allowance for the direct commerce with Europe, though at that period, it was confined for the most part to the coast of Malabar. This sum, if it had entirely been thrown into the general circulation, must certainly have more than tripled the existing stock of gold and silver currency, but a considerable portion was undoubtedly secreted, in conformity to the usage of the Hindoo inhabitants. Still, however, the necessities and luxuries of life acquired a high nominal value; ancient revenues, paid in money by a fixed disproportionate standard, became insufficient, and should have been increasing, agreeably to the change of actual circumstances.

Accordingly in the year 1687, in the reign of Alemgeer, we find a large addition had been made to the original assessment of Akbar, over the whole of the old Mogul domains, with the exception of some particular countries singularly situated, or bestowed mostly in jagher, on favoured individuals:—thus, as stated in our manuscript of an ancient official common-place book on which we only rely for the fairness of local comparison, or the relative accuracy of the sums of both periods, in 1582 the Assil toomur of

HINDOSTAN, exclusive of Bengal, Panjab and Moultan, was - - - 4,20,45,92,000 daums;

And the azala, or increase in 1687 on the revenues of the same divisions of territory, besides the new annexations made in the intermediate space of time, by conquest - - - 98,00,11,653; being little short of one-fourth of the original assessment.—In like manner in

THE DECCAN, the Soubah of Berah Proper, including the rents of the Khalsa lands, as well as of those alienated in jagher by various military tenures of the Moguls, was rated in the beginning of Akbar, at - - - 59,28,90,000; but in the year specified, when Alemgeer held, unparticipated, the sceptre of all India west of the Birumbpoteer, an increase of one half had taken place, on the first jumma, or - - - 30,24,70,962 daums.

Another circumstance which further marks the influence of the American mines, or the discerning policy of the Emperors of Hindostan throughout the seventeenth century, in proportioning their finances to an extraordinary influx of specie is, that the relative value of silver with the other metals in currency, underwent such a change as might be expected, and soon became universal, in consequence of there being a greater quantity of the former, comparatively with the latter, thrown into the general circulation. We have no certain data for determining the proportion of gold to silver, either at the beginning or close of the period now in question; but from such loose informations as can be collected from cotemporary historians, we are led to suppose that it might have been as one to ten in the time nearly the par of exchange as the discovery of the gold mines of Brazil, in the year 1695 has since in a great measure, maintained the equilibrium. In regard to the relative worth of silver and copper, which appears the best criterion to ascertain the truth of our present position, we are furnished with precise recorded facts from the imperial edicts. It hath already been observed, that the sicca rupee, according to the standard of Toorel Mull invariably adhered to since, and at first rated for 40 daums or telooos of copper, each weighing 21 mashch; but towards the close of the 17th century, the same coin was reduced by legal valuation, to 48 daums of fourteen mashch, which lowered the proportion from one to ten, to something near one to eight, as may be still the case, on account of the increased importation of the less valuable metal from that time forward.

Yet however far the two extraneous events we have noticed, might in their necessary consequences have authorized a considerable increase of the original revenue over all parts of the Mogul empire at the memorable conquest of the kingdom of Hyderabad; the subsequent neglect of such an operation, more especially with respect to the finances of the Northern circars, would have appeared quite inexplicable if the causes were not manifest, in reviewing the history and system of Mussulman administration there; considering the influence of a still more important though domestic occurrence which is sufficiently known, as it illustrates the annals of the Deccan, when the victorious arms of Alemgeer were led thither by himself in person, to crush the upstart destructive power of the Marhattahs. The rise of this famous Hindoo aristocracy, on the ruins of the great monarchical state of Bejapoor, and the rapid progress of its elevation, soon after the accession of Bahadar Shah in 1707 to the imperial throne of Delhi, were productive of such local effects, as might be expected from the establishment of a government founded on principles the most barbarous and repugnant to every idea of civilized society. The enriching arts, manufactures and foreign foreign commerce, in a manner exclusively confined to, or peculiarly distinguishing the Western coast of the Peninsula, while under the protecting sway of the Mahomedan princes of the race of Adilshahy, were, when subject to the violence, rapine, and predatory policy of the Marhattahs, driven thence to find an asylum on the shores of Coromandel and in Bengal, where they have continued since to flourish with increasing prosperity; and in no place more remarkably, than within that portion of territory, the present object of consideration; though it required all the virtue and superior intelligence of a free European administration, to draw adequate public supplies from the new current of wealth thus flowing in from three such copious sources as we have named; and which, during the Mogul government, was turned solely to private advantage, fed the ambition, with the pernicious luxury of intermediate agents, or could only be made beneficial to the state, through the dangerous channels of corruption.

But to estimate with more precision, the progressive improvement of the revenues of the circars, in consequence of the revolution of 1753, we shall here exhibit a statement of the French Jummabundy, five years later, and one immediately prior to their expulsion, when the influence of the recent change may be supposed greatest; in doing which, for the sake of a just comparison with the original assessment fixed in 1582, we shall follow the order observed in the latter, and consider the relative circumstances of both, premising, that for the districts south of the Godaveri, we are not furnished with an account of the particular settlements made with the zemindars by those Mussulmen or Hindoo agents with whom the French concluded general agreements, exclusive of all disbursements; and that therefore, we must substitute the ascertained collections of later times, made from the farming landholders, under the immediate sanction of sovereignty.

Bussy, Munniar Sultan or king of the Jungles; these annexations being, in addition to the old possessions of Potndor, Boglepoor, &c. four pergunnahs, now constituting the zemindary of Vizianagram, valued at rupees two lacs ninety thousand, which, as it was gradually dismembered from the antient havillee or government lands, by the Mussulman deputies from Hyderabad, was bestowed on the predecessors of the actual possessors between the years 1655 and 1741, when the ambitious Vizieram, having acquired the whole district by the usual tenure of Hindoo landholders, began to extend his jurisdiction over the reduced proprietary lands of petty talookdars in the neighbourhood, through the corruption of Jaffer Ali Khan, then the deputy of Nizam ul Moolk, from whom he obtained Singricotah, until the year of murderous scene of Bobilee, in 1756, terrified ten more of these little proprietors into submission, under the controul of the same Vizieram, now appointed farmer-general of the whole province of Cicacole south of the river Poondy. Accordingly, in 1758, the jummaundy of this circar, exclusive of sebundy and other charges, as appears by an original abstract Statement, stood as follows:

Thus then the general assessment of all the Northern circars, while under the French government, was augmented to pagodas of 3 images, 14,81,310 and a fraction, or to rupees 59,25,243, clear of every Mofussil expense; but as charges of security or revenue troops were very considerable in the time of the Moguls, and always to be deducted from the jumma kaumil of the provinces, we must, in order to draw a just comparison, make an allowance accordingly, and give credit for the amount to modern settlements, made in exclusion of such expenditure; then the difference will be merely political, that is to say, the native militia corps, which did and still continues the great efficient power of the Mahomedans in Hindostan, notwithstanding the recent practice of maintaining standing armies in imitation of Europeans, introduced by a few aspiring rulers, when considered with respect to the French government, were a proportional diminution of its strength, in as much as the ancient military force of the country, thus kept up more especially to secure the interest, and late usurpations, influenced irresistibly a disposition hostile in the extreme to a foreign establishment, though perhaps the very source of their own political existence, as was evinced in 1759, in the innovation of the circars by the English, when Gajeputty Rauze of Vizianagrum, whose predecessor had been the most favoured landholder of M. Bussy's creation or aggrandizement, appeared the foremost to rebel against the actual sovereign, and join the standard of the foe with the subsidies of his district, which undoubtedly he would have done thereafter on any similar occasion, to oppose his new friends, favourable to the universal Hindostanny maxim, that every revolution in the state, must be under the dispossessed party, with the additional concessions obtained by stipulation from the one succeeding, or at any rate, establishing former pretensions, as coeval with the date of the last conquest.

There never was however, any certain invariable rule for the militia establishment of a single district, perhaps for two years successively; the expense being estimated at one fourth, or less, according to the influence of the provincial delegate, whose grand private emolument arose from the abuse of this necessary institution. To ascertain, therefore, with any degree of accuracy, the amount of security sepoy charges in all the circars, to be added to the French bundobust, in order to compare it with the original assessment of the Mahomedans, we must have recourse to the accounts of a later period than the era of either, though the numerary of individuals entertained in this service has, without doubt, been on the increase since the commencement of the English administration. Accordingly, the committee of circuit in 1777, found that the military force of the zemindar of Vizianagrum alone exceeded 11,000 peons under every denomination, to which might be added, 5,000 auxiliaries from dependent landholders of Chicacole, exclusive of those of Ichapoor, to whom we may moderately assign 7,000 more, for all the provinces subordinate to Masulipatam. A pretty exact calculation makes the number 12,000, and a still better authenticated computation, allows 6,000 to the circar of Guntoor; the whole forming a total of forty-one thousand armed men, entirely under the control of about seventy zemindars, and which, though collectively, not equal to the regular battalions of sepoys in the face of an enemy, would yet be of prodigious importance in the moment of an invasion, are the great support of the refractory spirit so notorious among the superior class of Hindoo landholders, while they are the bugbear of feeble unintelligent Mussulman administrations; incurring an annual expense to the state, now indeed partly defrayed from fraudulently sequestered lands, at the rate of four rupees monthly each man, of nineteen lac sixty-eight thousand rupees, though one half of this sum, would be fully sufficient to maintain, even on the European establishment, the requisite body of militia for the business of the collections, as well as to answer every purpose of internal defence against the enterprize of any of the neighbouring country powers.

The gross assessment of the circars then, with this addition under the French government, will amount to rupees 78,93,243, exclusive of ransoms, raverans, and emans to bramins; forming an increase of nearly one half of the original settlement concluded in the sixteenth century, and in proportion to the augmentation of the revenue of Berar, an inland soubah of the Deccan, little benefited by commerce, seventy years earlier. Now, if we take into con- sideration, deration, that the world had in the mean time been enriched, upwards of two thousand million sterling in specie, from all the American mines; that of this treasure, if we only allow one-twelfth, or a million annually, to have been brought into Hindostan through all the old and newly discovered inlets of trade, the currency of the empire circulating it on the largest scale, must have accumulated four-fold since the year 1582, and, consequently the pecuniary value of lands proportionably risen; that the Northern circars more especially have been benefited by the great revolution in the commerce of India, from the rise of the Marhatta aristocracy on the opposite coast; and above all, that nearly one-third of the whole territory of these provinces has been recently explored, conquered, and annexed to Rajemundry and Chicacole, where the increase of the old jumma kaumil is most remarkable, perhaps it will appear, that the French assessment in 1758, was less adequate to the circumstances of the country at that period, than we endeavoured to prove the antiquated settle- ment of the Kootub Shahy to have been, when in 1687, the amount was transferred to the Mogul records as the standard of future revenue, to mark the value of so much of the then conquered kingdom of Hydrabad.

To decide with greater certainty on this subject; let us draw a comparative view of what passed nearly in the same interval of time, with respect to the Finances of Bengal, which, though differing in importance, afford almost an exact parallel in other relative circum- stances, except in the article of augmentation. There the assil toomar jumma of Toorel Mull, for reasons which have been assigned, or are self-evident in the depravity of Mussulman government, had undergone no variation in the way of improvement, from the days of Akbar to the death of Alemgeer; nor then, until the gradual subversion of the Mogul empire pro- duced provincial independence, and made it the interest of Soubahdarry usurpers to bring into the public coffers of dismembered states, what they had before embezzled, when acting under the delegated authority of the kings of Delhi, virtually, as well as in form. In like manner Bengal, rich in manufactures, peculiarly so, in some natural productions required for foreign luxury, happy in its situation, and many concomitant local advantages, derived the same successive mercantile benefits from the discovery of America, of the passage round the Cape, and from the revolution of Bejapoor, than the circars had done, on a smaller scale, within the same period of time. Thus, agreeable to an authentic statement be- fore us,

BENGAL, in its modern state, exclusive of Midnapoor, with the other provinces of Orissa formerly annexed, and of some later continued annexations, which we shall particularize, was assessed in the gross, in 1582, for daums 50,96,36,280, or	Rupees 1,27,40,907

But as it appears by a settlement made in 1728, in the government of Sujah ul Dowlah, that the assessment of Iskandabad and Cooch Behar was reduced below the original valuation stated in the preceding account; so we are to observe, that the sum total of the increase accumulated to the year 1763 was only on the amount of the assil jumma of Toorel Mull, and makes, therefore, rather more than three-fourth parts of that ancient rental fixed in the reign of Akbar. It is further to be remarked, that since the commencement of the immediate financial administration of the English in 1772, over the whole soubah of Bengal, it had been discovered, and if not already, will soon be made manifest to the public, that the net actual revenue of the country due to the exchequer, and levied from the ryots with great moderation and equity, agreeable to the original proportion or political principles established in 1582, and invariably adhered to since, in assessing all and every part of the Mogul empire in Hindostan, exceeds three crore of rupees, including fraudulent or un- of hazzee zemeen; and that therefore the true pecuniary increase arising in this most valuable portion of the British dominions in India, comprising an area of 72,000 square miles, being nearly the extent of Great Britain itself, instead of seventy-five per cent. as ment, in the same period of time, generally understood that the French government were enabled to realize only fifty per cent. in addition to the jumma kaamil of the Northern circars, which being equally favoured with the neighbouring territory of Bengal, in local or extraneous circumstances, might be supposed capable of yielding a similar increase, in proportion to the ancient revenue; and still with respect to either country the public be but on a par, with the first regular assessment; and what appears an extraordinary exaction, must be considered as merely nominal, without imposing the smallest additional burthen in the way of taxation, or servitude, on any of the more useful classes of the people employed in agriculture, manufactures, or commerce.

It is a disagreeable task to expose our own proper defects; but the knowledge is necessary to induce an effectual reform. We have freely adverted on the deficiencies of the French and Mussulman governments, in regulating the finances of the circars; and impartiality, with the natural order of our subject, leads us now to a comparative view of English administration, as far as it relates to the amount of revenue collections. All the indulgence we have any right to expect, is, that public judgment may be suspended until nation, properly understood, compared and discussed. Deeming our materials sufficiently correct and ample, we shall here exhibit a general abstract Statement of the annual assessment of the Northern circars, under the immediate sovereignty of the Company, formed, not on the partial settlement of a single year, nor from former or future agreements of rent for the same provinces, but from the jumma abundies actually concluded, since the establishment of British authority down to the present time, extracted from the public records already for the most part published, and including a period of seventeen successive years from the Fussullee 1176 to that of 1192, both inclusive, or from 25th September 1760, soon after the formal annexation of this valuable territory to the empire of Great Britain, with all the despotic rights and royalties claimed or exercised by the great Mogul, or his viceroy of the Deccan, without even accepting the arrears of balances then due from the several zemindars, and still more largely from Hussein Ali Khan, the last Mussulman aumildar, though never claimed to the 24th September A. D. 1783.

* The financial occurrences of Egypt might also be cited in 1516. When Sultan Selim conquered this country from the Mamelukes, he fixed the rent of the lands capable of cultivation, then ascertained by measurement (and which from the physical circumstances of the country, confined from its southern limits, under as far as Cairo, in lat. 30° North, to a narrow valley of 10 to 20 miles in breadth on either side of the Nile, and thence to the sea, circumscribed by a desert bordering the two branches of that river forming the Delta, could never have exceeded 14,202 British square miles in its greatest extent, or of local measure 68,73,768 Theodans,* of which perhaps only $\frac{1}{2}$ was arable, each of 20 square cossils of 12 English feet every side, or nearly one acre and a third) at 10 mydens or parats, equal to a Turkish piastre, or $\frac{2}{6}$ sterling per Theodan,* including a mirdi or tribute only of 25 mydens to the Porte, and the remainder to defray the expense of the civil and military establishments, being together thought equivalent to half the yearly produce of so much land, about the year 1684. When the value of specie had considerably diminished, and the governing Beys were advancing to independence, the rental of a Theodan* was generally increased to one mahhab, 1,200 parats, equal to $\frac{1}{3}$ German crown; but in 1779 the ordinary proportionate exactions of the old Timur proprietors, for the same square measure, had risen to $\frac{1}{2}$ German crown, or seven and a half times the original assessment of Sultan Selim; and when the Beys settled by a valuation of the crop, with yearly measurement of the lands actually in cultivation within their own immediate dominions, then the price of a Theodan* varied from 5 to 10 German crowns, according to the quality of culture; the revolution in the relative worth of money and territorial produce throughout all the kingdoms and states of Europe in the same period of time, and through the same causes, discovery of the American mines, with increased commerce, is too well known to be here noticed; the change is comparatively great, as the distance of situation with respect to the source of riches is lessened, and as the custom of secreting treasure is peculiar to India.

RAJAMUNDY underwent the same changes as the circars of Ellore and Mustafanagur: Anno 1176/78, it yielded to Tongee Pundit and Hussein Ali, as very accurately stated in the Madras jumma bundy of 1778, inclusive of the havillee, and the valuable territorial grants which these men obtained under a certain irregular form of sunnud from the Nizam, but in fact through the bounty of the Company, under whose government the right of possession, at least, was first established, on a medium of the three years, Madras pagodas 2,99,940, of which Tongee Pundit, appointed public interpreter or dewan, while he held the high responsible trust of serishtadar or canongoe being also in the present case, the immediate farmer of Rajemundry, agreed to pay yearly into the exchequer of his employers, including 40,000 pagodas for half the expense of regular troops employed in reducing to proper obedience the zemindars of this province, and particularly to

* This was the Jumma bundy settled with the zemindars, including a Nuzzeranah of pagodas 25,300, and a certain portion of schandy charges, amounting to 14,500 pagodas, but exclusive of the Havillee or Jagheer lands of Guntur and Condavaree, rented for Madras pagodas 19,200, which, if added, constitutes the Jumma 2,61,150 Madras pagodas.

† We have discovered that in the amount of the increase, Madras pagodas 22,200, here assigned to the circars of Mustafanagur and Ellore is included the valued rent of the Havillee of Rajemundry, being pagodas 2,310, which should have been placed in the accounts of that circar, for the sake of a just comparison.

Deducing then from a fact thus gratuitously admitted, a reform so important; and having already confidently supposed the complete liquidation of the balances at present due from the circars, instead of a diminution on this account from what the English jumma bundy has been stated at, in our Comparative Estimate, we hope to be allowed in justice, to add the whole amount to our seventeen years settlement, in lieu of what if heretofore exclusively levied, may from henceforth be incorporated with the ordinary annual demands of the public exchequer to this augmentation, of one and a half lacks of Madras pagodas. We have farther a national right to four lacks ninety-two thousand, or rupees nineteen lacks sixty-eight thousand, being the term assigned to the French bundebust for the maintenance of the militia

GUNTOUR, of which the capital is 55 miles W.E.N. $\frac{1}{2}$ N. from Masulipatam Fort, 15 miles south of the Kistna, which is three farther in the same direction, from the fort of Condapillee, anciently composed of five pergunnahs; and a portion subdivided since into 25 mootahs, containing 868 villages, exclusive of their pollams, or small detached dependencies, distributed under the five following Desmoukkes, or patent territorial jurisdictions; viz.

1st. CHINTAPILLE, the zemindarry of Vassreddy Rasmanah, of the Combewar cast, situated on the south bank of the Kistna, chief town of the same name, 20 coss N.W. from its capital of Guntour; containing 300 villages, comprized in one-half of the great havillee pergunnah of the circar, the derobast or whole of Raipoondy, and a kismut or part of the Veniconda; together yielding, on a moderate valuation of half its produce, being the Circar's share - Madras Pagodas 1,32,000

2d. RAIPILLEE and Raichore, inconsiderable forts near the south bank of the Kistna; 18 coss easterly from Guntour, giving name to a zemindarry, held separately or in copartnership, formed of a fourth dismembered portion of the old havillee pergunnah; containing 180 villages under Manick Row and Tuppetty Row Jungannah, brothers or cousins of the Velmarwar cast, yielding, exclusive of enaums, &c. - Madras Pagodas 75,000

3d. CHITTCOM-PAY, Chilcoloor-pondeo, the jurisdiction of Manoor Nar-sina, bramin mynnaodon of the province, 14 coss south of the capital; another fourth of the havillee, containing 150 villages, and rated on a medium at - Madras Pagodas 68,000

HAVILLEE, which included the grounds and gardens of 12 pettahs, with their circum-jacent six pollams, the salt-pans of Masulipatam and Pernanco, some lacks of toddy trees, farmed to the distillers of arrack, and together with the sayer or variable taxes on houses, the mohterefa, the sea, land, and river customs, yielded, according to the jumma kaamil, an annual revenue of - Rupees 3,30,855. $1\frac{1}{2}$

But by reasons of these rents and taxes being for the most part discontinued, though we know not from what considerations they are levied every where else within the Company's jurisdiction, that a great number of palmyra trees have been cut down, through the avidity of temporary farmers, or negligence of superintendants, and that the produce of salt has been reduced one-half by recent prohibition of its importation in Bengal, the actual receipts under this head may be estimated, one year with another, 60,000 rupees: for Mint Duties, Sea, Land and River Customs, at 3 per cent. on exports and imports, exclusive of indulgencies to the factors of foreign nations, &c. 40,000 rupees; being the profits on salt, and 20,000 more arising on the arrack farms; the whole making an object of gross revenue - Madras Pagodas 30,000 militia or schandy establishment, which always had been considered, as indeed common policy and the safety of the state required it should be, in forming the original jumma kaamil, as well as in every temporary succeeding assessment, established by their predecessors the Moguls. But besides the pecuniary increase thus annexed to our settlement, and constituting thereby its amount, Madras pagodas 18,65,617, or rupees 74,62,468, we must be allowed to state the Company's donations in land, lately resumed in favour of Hussein Ali and Tougee Pundit; also the value of still greater appropriations yet continued to the whole body of zemindars or Indian landholders, on the erroneous, impolitic, unconstitutional idea, of their being the original, natural, or rightful proprietors of the soil; an idea perfectly novel in the financial legislation of Hindostan; and being equally unknown, in the Mussulman and French systems established in the Northern circars, could only have originated from the enlarged, humane, and generous principles acquired under a free constitution of government, and may therefore be exclusively ascribed to the English; and on the foundation of which, we now presume to give their benevolence credit for the past, and their treasury in future, for just such an increase, of revenue, to be within moderate bounds, as will make the net sum of a crore of rupees, or a million sterling per annum, being nearly double the amount of the ancient Mogul settlement, and one third in addition to that much boasted one of modern date, concluded by our rivals in Europe, while in possession of this most valuable portion of the present empire of Britain in the Deccan.

Nor in this, do we derogate from the national character of liberality, more than violate the private right of individuals; seeing that the same laws, privileges, and form of administration, instituted by the civil authority of a small insulated nation, as peculiarly adapted to its own genius and local circumstances, were not ordained for all countries, and all mankind differently situated, disposed, or ruled. That with respect to the natives of Hindostan, it would be a most dangerous innovation, diametrically opposite to the letter and spirit of all Oriental legislation, ancient and modern, devised by conquerors, to admit, either in theory or practice, the doctrine of private individual landed property by inheritance, free or feudal tenures, extending beyond the period of a single life; but above all, seeing that the great law of society, public expediency, requires the full aid of established financial resources; justly proportioned to the gross annual produce of the soil, equitably moderate with respect to the natural wants or ability of the peasantry, and only barely sufficient, on the most economical scale, to supply the absolute exigencies of the lenient protecting sovereign state, under the dominion of which such rare peculiar advantages are enjoyed, amidst the despotism, tyranny, and oppression, common to almost all the other countries of Asia. Neither do we go beyond the bounds of moral certainty, as to the actual rental of the circars, belonging always of right, exclusively and unalienably, as we hope in future it will be so in fact, to the established government, in thus enhancing the current revenue of the Company, (even without touching the fraudulent appropriations of land made in favour of Bramins or others, and necessary now to be resumed, so greatly above the present jumma bundy or demands of the exchequer, by supposing and bringing on a virtual increase of rupees 51,05,532, being rather more than equal to the amount of the assessment itself, calculated on a medium of the last 17 years, according to our settlement, at 48,94,468 rupees. We are supported in our belief by documents, which cannot readily be procured through any other channel, and which, if we be not too presumptuous, though difficult now to be authenticated, even should they prove in the end fallacious, may with the greatest facility be point out the order and proper mode of enquiry, and state positive facts, with all the written formalities of legal evidence, which at least remove the difficulty of proving a negative, but exhibit such a minute detail of the finances, however new to the public, or to others more immediately concerned in them, as seems best calculated, if not to incur instantaneous detection in error, at any rate, to meet the corroborating testimony of more authoritative vouchers. All the indulgent favour we claim individually to ourselves is, that the following more true and perfect statement of the actual revenues of the Northern circars, extracted from and carefully collated with these our original papers, corrected by a variety of experienced personal informations, local enquiries, and analogical reasoning, may be substituted in the room, as it should in right, of the deficient inadequate jumma bundy before assigned to the English be set against, and eclipse; for it will not admit of comparison with any former settlement, and henceforth be regarded as the true criterion of national merit, in estimating the respective integrity, ability, and intelligence of financial administration.

Double bundobust, or gross sub-rental of the mhal and sayre of the khalsa or government lands throughout the Northern circars, as concluded annually by the zemindars and temporary renters on their own proper accounts, with the ryots or inferior husbandmen; but by virtue of a previous yearly agreement with the state, according to which the full amount thus collected from the peasantry, is supposed to be paid in or accounted for with the public exchequer, after deducting unavoidable specified losses and charges incurred in the management, as well as exclusive of landed property and privileges allowed to the several zemindarry agents employed in the collections, as an ample reward for their services, under the denomination of Enaums and Severians: The whole taken from a variety of authentic original accounts, as will be hereafter set forth; but chiefly from a statement formed on a medium of ten years of the gross revenues of the country, agreeably to the rule of Buttai or Seri, extracted from the mofussil or village records, under the auspices of Hussein Ali Khan; who, in the capacity of amildar, almost uninterruptedly and universally superintended the finances of all these provinces, from the year 1759 to that of 1769.

CONDAPILLEE, consisting of 24 mehals, into which it is still divided under the following ten zemindaries, excepting the dismembered pergunnahs of Guntour and Auchilminar.

1st. CHAHUR MHAL, or Cancole, its capital, 10 coss north of Masulipatam, the desmokey jurisdiction of Comdana Paupia and Soubyah Row Velmawar, first established under sunnuds from Salabut Jung 1759, and confirmed by similar, but more irregular grants from the French governor of Masulipatam, and future Mussulman aumildars, not formally vested in the zemindary by the English government, though virtually so, as being included in the Convention of 1766, of late years exonerated from official duties; but in receipt of the annexed emoluments of russooms and saverums, which have been doubled in favour of Opparow, who, without any pretensions of right, claims what we understand by a superiority. The district extremely fertile, compact, and advantageously situated; bounded by the Colair lake, on the north; divided on the east, from the zemindary of Mungletore, by the river of Calipatam, and encircled on the south and west, by the pergunnahs of Auchilminar Guntour, with Voyoor and Medoor, in Opparow's zemindary, forms nearly a square of about 20 miles each side, and comprehends 260 villages, in the four following Mehals or Pergunnahs; viz.

- (1.) VENICOTAH, 84 villages anciently rated for R^s 97,152, actually yielding to that amount; but in our Doul bundobust only - - - - - Madras pagodas 17,000
- (2.) GOODEVARRI, 64 villages: formerly rupees 84,674, now Madras pagodas 13,000
- (3.) BINTERJELY, within or overflowed by the lake; contains 66 villages, of which 44 lankas or islands, extremely rich in paddy, about 10,000 candies yearly produced from one thousand catties of ground, being 1/10th of the whole land of the pergunnah, should therefore yield as it does actually to the circar, or rather its farmer, near 20,000 pagodas; was valued in the jumma kaumil at 34,328 rupees, but in the Doul bundobust is set down at - - - - - Mad' pag' 10,000
- (4.) CALDINDER, containing 57 villages, of which 11 have been annexed to Mungletore: assessed in the jumma kaumil, rupees 20,404, yielding now - - - - - Madras pagodas 7,000

2. DEVARCOTAH, 15 miles south of Masulipatam on the north bank of the Kistna, adjoining to Divi on the west, fertile in rice and ioary, and well managed pergunnah zemindary of Ezlagudda Codant Ram of the Combewar cast; the family first settled here as combies combies or husbandmen, in the year 1580, are supposed to have got their first sunnuds for Desmokey jurisdiction from Abdullah Kootub Shah in 1640, though not constantly confirmed in the possession of it, by future rulers. In 1726, one of the family obtained the zemindary of Guntour and Auchilminar; but in 1732, being involved in the general proscription of Rustum Khan, lost all territorial jurisdiction, rights, and privileges, in the confusion of future revolutions, have by some means or other, regained possession, and were numbered in the Convention of 1766, paid formerly rupees 2,19,455. are supposed actually to collect pagodas 70,000. exclusive of saverums, &c. but by the Doul bundobust only - - - - - 60,000.

3d. NUJERE, or NOOZED, the capital at the distance of 60 miles N. westerly from Masulipatam, and about 16 coss northerly from Condapillee, of the extensive desmokey, supposed to appertain by right of sunnuds, to Macca Narraya Opparow, of the Velma east. Macca Venkiah, the first of this family, came from the Carnatic, and rented 5 or 6 villages of Golapillee or Nujere in 1652; twelve years after, the next in succession obtained a lease of the whole pergunnah, and took the name of Opparow, in addition to the local patronimic of Macca. In the beginning of the present century the 5th descendant, by the actual zemindary grants of aumildars, was for a time in possession of the several districts which actually compose this territorial jurisdiction, but under the immediate management of tehseldars family were expelled, and the lands put under the management of the provincial ruler, for twelve successive years afterwards. However, on a change of the provincial ruler, an upstart of the name of Venkiah was produced, under the patronage of the Condana family, who were the acting farming superintendents, and then of considerable influence with Ali Kuli Khan, the aumildar, as the heir of line to Opparow, and in that capacity, was reinstated in 1738, in part of the zemindary jurisdiction. Juggiah, the brother of this pretender, who succeeded, died a prisoner in Bussy's camp before Khalburga, in 1755-6; from this time forward, Vencatari Opparow, another pretender, through the management of Condana, and influence of Hussein Ali Khan, was put in possession, in virtue of aumildary sunnuds, but participated the management of his desmokey, with his brother Naraya, until the year 1772; when dying, the latter assumed the zemindary by sufferance of the English, without any other right, and under the same authority, was expelled as a rebel in the present year 1783. The district extends from the Kistna to the Godavari, and is pretty equally divided between the Circars of Ellore and Condapillee, comprising near 2,000 square miles, of which the six following pergunnahs, depend on Condapillee; viz.

- (1.) MEDOOR, on the banks of the Kistna, 30 miles north-westerly from Masulipatam, adjoining on the west of Devarcotah, assessed in the jumma kaumil for rupees 94,083. yielding now - - - - - Madras Pagodas 25,000
- (2.) VOYOOR, adjoining to the preceding pergunnah on the north, anciently rated at Rupees 63,855. now - - - - - Madras Pagodas 20,000
- (3.) NONASTALLUM further to the west and north, but united to the two former mehals, contains the diamond mine of Mullavilly, still annexed to the Nizamut, in all, formerly, rupees 63,746. now - - - - - Madras pagodas 25,000
- (4.) GOLAPILLEE, in which pergunnah is situated the capital town Nujere, assessed anciently for rupees 36,693. but in the Doul bundobust, - - - - - Madras pagodas 10,000
- (5.) CHAITRAI, adjoining to the former on the north, surrounded by small hills, chiefly alienated in unauthorized grants to peers of the Velma east, valued anciently at 14,000. rupees, actually worth 10,000 pagodas, and exclusive of these fraudulent enaums, set down in the Doul bundobust at - - - - - 6,000
- (6.) VEJERAI, another hilly pergunnah, disposed of in like manner as the former, to which it adjoins, worth 8,000 pagodas, and exclusive of enaums - - - - - 4,000

4th. BEJIVARIA or BEZOARA, on the banks of the Kistna, 39 miles N.W. by W. from Masulipatam, adjoining to the pergunnah of Medoor, and forming what was anciently considered an important pass, through a small broken range of hills, which terminate here. The first or lowest region of the maritime provinces, constitutes the zemindary of Trinmarow, and Ramarow, Velmawars of the Calwa Collee family, first obtained in the beginning of the present century, and fell to the ancestors of the present occupants, who are not heirs of line, in the year 1731. Of late years, this jurisdiction, though small, was suffered impolitically, to be subdivided into three kismuts or shares; viz. Bezoara proper, Tejoor, and Chimulpar, worth, separately, 10,000 pagodas, 6,000, and 2,000. were together rated in the jumma kaumil at rupees 58,301. but now - - - - - Madras pagodas 18,000.

5th. MYLAVERAM, on the confines of the former district, about 50 miles N.W. of Masulipatam, and 3 coss from Condapillee, is the name given to a zemindary formed of the greater part of the havillee pergunnah of Condapillee, assigned informally to Vencata Row and Narsinva Row, Velmawars, of the family called from the place of their origin Sooranany, who first settled in the district about the year 1670, in the capacity of simple farmers, and obtained, as it is supposed, their earliest zemindary sunnuds, from the killahdar of Condapillee, at the commencement of the present century - - - - - 15,000.

6th. HAVILLEE.—Of this circar, and immediately around the capital and fort of Condapillee, 48 miles N.W. ½ W. from Masulipatam, is the remainder of the old pergunnah Havillee, and worth 5,000 pagodas for its 11 villages; but to this should be added, the Simt Walloor, Walloor, or as called, Walloor Samals, dismembered from the pergunnah Medoor, and now annexed to the Havillee, composed of 10 villages, and valued in Dool bundobust for 8,000. together - - - - - 13,000.

7th. VARAGONDA about 50 coss N.W. from Masulipatam, beyond Mylavaram, and on the frontiers of the circar of Commammet, is the principal town of a zemindary jurisdiction, allowed to be vested in the Velumki family, Velumawars, whose ancestors first settled in Trivoor, in 1675; but of late years, has very unconstitutionally been suffered to be divided between several brothers, and still more improperly, to be participated with the despandeals, or public registers of the district. The principal persons exercising the desmooky functions are Mulla Row, Sinjeva Row, Vencata Row, Rama Row, Visseram Rowze, and Roman. The district united is extensive, but hilly, jungly, and barren, composed of the two following pergunnahs, of 63 villages:

- (1) JEMLAVOY, valued anciently 24,284 rupees, in the jumma karnil of Kootub Shahy, now barely Madras pagodas - - - - - 8,000
- (2) MENCON GUTT, so called from a mound to contain its waters, formerly 23,829 rupees, now - - - - - Madras pagodas 7,000

8th. MUDIGAMA, about 78 miles N.W. by W. from Masulipatam, and 22 in the same direction from Condapillee, is a portion of the zemindary of Vassreddy Ramana, in this circar, on the north bank of the Kistna, opposite to the larger jurisdiction of Chintapillee, in the province of Guntoor. The ancestors of the present family settled here about 1670; but did not acquire the desmooky before the commencement of the 18th century. In 1760, the possessory rights were transferred to a younger branch of this family in Chintapillee, who being afterwards expelled by M^r Bon-enfant, Bazalut Jung's managers, were acknowledged by the English in 1772, zemindars of Nundegamah, and were also re-established in Chintapillee. The portion now under consideration, extends far into the Commammet circar, extremely fertile, and includes the diamond mines of Pertyal, Ahtoor, &c. five villages annexed to the Nizamut, and is composed of the three following pergunnahs; viz.

- (1) NUNDIGONG, formerly 87,125 rupees, valued now at - Madras pagodas 25,000
- (2) PENGUNCHEPOLE, 45,201 rupees, and now - - - - - 13,000
- (3) BEATAVOLE, anciently 9,423 rupees, and now - - - - - 7,000

9th. MONGAL, about 120 miles N.W. by W. from Masulipatam, is a detached desmooky, on the distant frontier of Commammet, and bordering on the circar of Doverknomda and Nelconda, assigned to the family of Kissa Vencalum, who settled here in 1680 - 10,000.

10th. LINGAGEERY, a small pergunnah zemindary dependant on this circar, though insulated in that of Commammet, between Nundegong and Mongal, near the Kistna, claimed by Codant Ram, of Devarcotah, and Narrawhurry, as despandeah, jointly formerly 7,546 rupees, now - - - - - Madras pagodas 2,000

TOTAL of Condapillee - - - - - Madras pagodas 3,18,000

CIRCAR

ELLORE, consists, as anciently, of 12 pergunnahs, included in the havillee, and the four following zemindaries, with the lands held in vassalage by the Dutch.

1st. MUGGLETORE, about 45 miles E. N. E. from Masulipatam, 12 from the sea shore, and five miles from the English factory of Muddapollam and Nassapore, on the banks of the Washeesta, the great southern branch of the Godaveri, is the square mud fort and capital of the desmooky jurisdiction of Culdinder Trippetty Rauze Rachewar, whose ancestors obtained the first sunnuds for holding the pergunnah of Canje calva, or Muggletore, as it is now called, as early as the year 1624. Ranga Vauze, the 5th in descent, by his good management and fidelity to government, was rewarded with the zemindary rights of all the other mehals, which at present compose the district, in 1703; but thirty years afterwards, under the government of Rustum Khan, the whole family were expelled as rebels, and forfeited their territorial grants. On this occasion, the immediate heirs of line are supposed to have perished among the unhealthy hills of Tontapille, where they took refuge; but Vencatram Vauze, a distant descendant and father of the present occupant, escaped to and received the protection of the Poosaputty family of Vizianagram; and in 1751, through the intercession of old Vizieram Rauze, is said to have been formerly Trippetty, the actual possessor, probably was created desmook on the death of his predecessor in 1764; at any rate, he has been admitted in the convention with General Caillaud, in the year 1766; and though his pretensions might not then or since have been known, or however, in common course, will have the re-disposal of one of the richest territorial grants in the Company's gift within the circars, as the present occupant is turned of fifty, and the race of Culdinder is likely to be in him extinct. The district is extremely compact, containing taining about 800 square miles in its six pergunnahs, most advantageously situated between the sea, the rivers Godaveri and Calipatam, and in the neighbourhood of the ill managed demousky of Opparow, abounding in manufactures, and yielding in some places, what is very uncommon in the circars, a double harvest.

2d. NUGERE, that portion of Opparow's zemindary, situated in this circar, partook of the great commercial advantages derived from the fall of the empire of Mysore, which enhanced so prodigiously the value of the neighbouring lands of Muggletore; but of late years, it has been greatly impoverished through the treasonable designs of its desmook, in establishing an independent military power, and by the ruinous system of letting out some of the richest pergunnahs in farm, under the name of security, to Trippetty Rauze, the neighbouring zemindar, whose policy of course it has been to enrich what he may consider his more permanent holding, at the expense of the temporary one, which, by depopulating, he might further hope, agreeable to the ordinary views of Indian landholders, of bringing under his proper jurisdiction, through the temptation of a larger rent to government, than it may be worth to any yearly farmer, as it has been successfully practised in other parts of the Company's territories, such as the jagher in the Carnatic, rated by Mahomed Ali, and the havillee lands of Chicaate, farmed to Sitteram Rauze, while virtual zemindar of Vizianagram. The whole district may contain about 1,200 square miles, being more than one half of the zemindary in extent, though scarcely exceeding the moiety of its value, when reckoned in all, Madras pagodas 1,85,000, (exclusive of savorums, enaums, &c.) and is composed of the following pergunnahs:

- (1) GONDAGOT, near Ellore, on the north side of the Colair Lake, worth 10,000 pagodas, together with the mootah of Amberpet, consisting of 42 villages, dismembered from the Havillee pergunnah by Hussein Ali Khan in 1764, and valued at 15,000 pagodas more, being together rated at - - - - - 25,000

3d. CHINTTALAPOONDY, at the distance of 17 coss northerly from Ellore, on the frontier of Commammet, and between Medeongutt and Jemlavoy to the south-west, and Polaveram towards the north-east, in the pergunnah Desmooky, divided between Mullarow, Vencatrow, Narsinwarow, &c. cousins of the Velma tribe, and of the Tcopellah family, who settled here in 1711, having emigrated from Udgere, in like manner as all the rest of the Velma cast, now in the Circars, had done from other parts of the Carnatic, after the dissolution of the principality of Chandergeery in 1652, when the race of Narsingha, reckoned chiefs of the Rowars, were driven from thence, and dispersed by the Mussulman arms. It is therefore no less from clanship or family attachment, than from interested rebellious views, that these zemindars, together with those of Medoor Gutt, Janlavoy, Mylavaram, and Bejwarra, which encircle the larger jurisdiction of Opparow, make usually a common cause with that refractory landholder; while the impetuous division of their respective lands, enables any one man, with or without the consent of the copartners, to assemble their numerous dependent peons, fraudulently maintained, to act against government, on its presumed lenity in all events towards the other more passive members of the same zemindary fraternity.

The district, though large, and containing 44 villages, being hilly, jungly, and poor, yields peons, only

CIRCAR

RAJAHMUNDRY, since the establishment of European government, has acquired so many additional territorial dependencies by conquest or policy, and has undergone such a total reform and change in the extent, value, and denomination of its several local subdivisions, that a very few of the 17, of which it was anciently composed, can be now traced, but are all included with the new annexations, in the 7 following districts:

1st. THE HAVILLEE pergunnah, depending on the capital situated on the North bank of the Godaveri, 78 miles N.E. of Masulipatam, is reduced, properly speaking, to the town of Rajahmundry, and 5 neighbouring villages, possessed by Khajah Zeeloor Ullah Khan, as it is supposed by sunnud from the Nizam, previous to the grant to the English, which of course invalidated all inferior temporary alienations, though in deference to a subsequent request for the soubah, the occupant's claims have been acknowledged; viz.—to farm the capital for Madras pagodas 2,100, from which to be deducted 1,900, allowed under the name of Rosina, or daily charity to Mussulman poor, and to hold the five villages as a free jageer, the whole, being worth annually 4,200. But as this pergunnah was rated formerly 50,311 rupees, and as we find a number of small talooks described as meerassees, or inheritances in the possession of different persons, once or still officers of government; so we hesitate, not setting them down here as unauthorized alienations, which could not with equal probability have belonged to any of the other districts, 4,200

- (2.) VEGAMPETTAH, &c. 13 villages, claimed by Soudapah, despandeah of the district - 3,000
- (3.) PATICONDA, &c. three villages claimed by Ramajee Burroo, another quondam Mujmadar - 1,500
- (4.) VELLA, the enaum villages of Mahomed Ruffa, when acting as cauzeer of the district - 700
- (5.) VENCATAPOLLAM, the enaum village, anciently of another Mussulman officer, now of Alta Ali Khan - 600
- (6.) PAMING-PILLEE, in the hands of Jebenevess Maganah, gomastah of Bramajee Kistnoo, valued at - 400
- (7.) VEDASSARAPORAM, in the management of Bookna Pundit, the Company's Persian linguist - 350
- (8.) MACAMATA, the village of Persottim, dos Sugar Gujerally, worth - 85
- (9.) JAGGEMAUTPORAM, or Cokenura and Gottapollam, two villages on the sea coast, near Angeram, on the northern branch of the Godaveri, and belonging to the Dutch factory, paying a tribute to the English, as actual subjects of the country - of 217

2d. POLAVERAM, ten coss northerly, from Rajemundry, on the southern bank of the Godaveri, is the capital of a small tributary raj, or Hindoo principality, and the only one under the government of Masulipatam, immediately subject to the Reddewar, or territorial proprietary chief, Munguputty Deo Rajepoot, descended from Hunner, of the royal family of Orissa, distinguished by the common appellation Gajeputty, or prince of elephants, and who, as before related, was put in possession of all the four circars north of the Kistna, in the year 1471, on condition of holding them as a dependent fief on the Mussulman empire of Beder, then ruled by Mahomed Shah, surnamed Lushkery, or, the warlike. In what manner, about a century afterwards, the princes of the house of Orissa lost the greater part of their inheritance, and were driven from the plains to the high unhealthy regions, at present constituting the whole of their tributary dominions, hath also been set forth. It is therefore only necessary here further to observe, that the great military power of two successive Mahomedan dynasties, employed on different occasions for a century and a half to exterminate the race of Rajeputty, or reduce their mountainous territory, proved altogether ineffectual; nor were the districts, now under consideration, explored or partially subdued under the establishment of the French government in 1753, and latter attempts to complete the conquest, to gratify the ambitious vanity perhaps of those upstart zemindars, whose aim it is to substitute their own groundless pretensions to territorial property, in the room of ancient acknowledged rights, once vested in the lordly ejected proprietors, have only served to evince the futility, the inglorious triumph, of dispossessing innocent inhabitants of their hills and wilds, resorted to from necessity, unhealthy, and yielding but a scanty subsistence; with a great certain sacrifice of men, and always a comparatively small, though at the same time a mere temporary doubtful benefit in revenue. The district is very large, and of unknown extent among the hills, but bounded on the north and west by Rumpa, the territory of Rambopetty, a perfectly independant rajah of the Coywar or savage mountainous tribe of Hindoos, and by Bedrachellum and Peloucha, the imperfectly reduced zemindary of Ashwa Rou Velmawar, dependant on the circar of Commamet; on the south and east it fronts with the pergunnahs of Chilalapoondy and Cavor, in the province of Ellore. On both sides of the Godaveri which intersects it, the country besides a rich produce in grain, when the people are allowed the peaceable cultivation of their plains and vallies subject to a moderate quit rent, abounds with the largest and best teak timbers, which, though difficult in many places to be conveyed to the river side, or more distant transportation by water carriage, might nevertheless under proper encouragement, be brought to any of the ports in the bay of Bengal, where ships are or may be constructed at a much lower rate, and no less fit than the wood imported from Pegu for the same purpose. That portion, however, of the district on the south side of the Godaveri is by far the largest and most valuable, and though now considered a part of the circar of Rajemundry yet being thus detached from it, would not most probably, if subdivided under the order and regularity of Mussulman arrangement, have been so disposed of. It forms two of the three following pergunnahs, into which the whole principality is properly divided:

- (1.) GOOTALAH, at the distance of eight coss from Rajemundry, on the banks of the Godaveri, is open plain and fertile, but easily commended from, and always dependent on, the neighbouring hills. It has been wholly explored, and valued at 24,000
- (2.) POLAVERAM, higher up the river two coss, has been traversed by European troops in great part, and cannot be deemed inaccessible anywhere, unless by reasons of the unhealthiness of the climate, and high pathless forests; the gross revenue has been estimated, from information, not records in the Dou bundobust at 26,000
- (3.) COTTAPILLEE is the pergunnah on the Rajemundry, or north side of the Godaveri, directly opposite to Gootalah, and extending in line to the frontiers of Rumpa, among different ridges of very high mountains. It has, till of late years, belonged to another branch of the same family; and was, for some time, under the immediate management of government, when the rents, including the munim or family estate, was 8,000

Mad. P^a 58,000.

But we may confidently reduce the tribute that should in justice or policy, or that can in effect be realized from the country, to 25,000.

3d. PEDDAPORE, 24 miles E.N.E. from Rajemundry, is the capital of the principal desmook or farming landholders of the province, named Finraje Vatcherry, though better known to the English under the title of Juggaputty Rauze, bestowed on his father by the Nizam, agreeable to the recently assumed privilege of the court of Hyderabad, thus to confer substantial honours. This family were first distinguished by government in 1571. When acting as servants or managers to the Rheddewars, they made themselves useful in disclosing the value, and facilitating the conquest of the country under their superintendence, and were rewarded first with the farm, and then the collateral branches of the house of Vachevoy and But in 1734, the lineal descendant with all the collateral branches of the house of Himoor, to be found, were attainted and cut off by Rustum Khan, the provincial amildar; and all their rights, privileges, and effects, whether official or paternal, incurred legal forfeiture to the actual sovereign. Accordingly, the whole district was put under the immediate administration of ameen, or temporary Mussulman officers, until the year 1750, when Neamat Ulla Khan, at that time amildar, for the private consideration of 90,000 rupees, conferred by his proper sunnuds, the zemindary of Peddapore, on Royeperrauze, a youth of the Vachevoy family, who had been concealed under the protection of his jurisdiction and influence, in quality of guardian to the new desmook. Nine years however afterwards, the latter latter, and his protector's successor, Gauzeputty, took different parts, from personal animosity to each other, in the contest between the French and English, during which Roycepperauze was killed fighting on the side of Mons'. Conflans, in the victory gained by Colonel Ford near Pettapore, at which time the present Timraje, son of the deceased, was only 8 years of age. By what means the zemindary might have been confined to this young man, it is needless to enquire, when the corruption of aumildars and the example of his father are so notoriously known; and when it is remembered how lavish the present Nizam was when he came to the circars in 1761, with the ambitious views of overturning his brother's government, through the pecuniary aid and personal attachment which he might command in return for such employments, in distributing them to the highest bidder, or at the recommendation of Hussein Khan. The district comprises near one half of the whole circar of Rajemundry, both in extent and value, and contains 585 villages under the following pergunnahs:

(1.) KIMMOOR, or Peddapore, of 65 villages, most advantageously situated on the Yel-erree, and to the eastward of the hills, of the same name of Kunthennoor, fertile in rice	60,000
(2.) BENOLE, of 48 villages, between Peddapore and the Char Mhal zemindary, towards the Godaveri
(3.) ETACORAM, of 99 villages, great and small, in the fertile island of Nagur. The first was made for this, and the following pergunnah, from the Mustafa Kode Khan aumildar in the year 1697, from Hyderabad	29,000
(4.) CACORAM, of 40 large, and 34 small villages or pollams, exclusive of enaums	35,000
(5.) TAVURAM, of 71 villages, in the island of Nagur, first conferred in zemindary in 1702, by Rustum dit Khan, and again under the English government in 1774/5, yields	11,000
(6.) JEMMAM, two mhalas of 48 villages, among the hills, west of Sittiaverum, rented for	28,000
(7.) INDERAM and Bloomillah, of 23 villages, first obtained in 1705, from the aumildar	12,000
(8.) MULERE, of 20 villages, and rented for	10,000
(9.) PARVATHI, a mootah, in the island of Nagur	5,000
(10.) ISCAPILLE, another mootah, pergunnah	14,000
(11.) MUMERIVARRUM, with the town of Casacoras	12,000
(12.) MUNDAPETTAH Mootah	10,000
(13.) CONTRAVOOCORAM Mootah, north of Footapillee, together with the four preceding, containing 128 villages, were first regularly conferred in 1722 by Abdullah Khan, the Aumildar	20,000
(14.) TOTAPILLE, a region of tygers, is a small hilly country 22 miles north-west of Peddapore, and adjoining to Cottapillee, the inheritance of Rajinadora of the independent Coyewar tribe. In 1771, at the instigation of Timraje, this little territory, with the sacrifice of almost the whole detachment to the unhealthiness of the climate, was reduced by the English to pay a future tribute to the zemindar of Peddapore annually, of	8,000

TOTAL of the Doui landobust of Jaggaputty Rauze - 2,61,000

4th. CHAR MHAL, or Two Pergunnahs Zemindary, is surrounded by the preceding one of Peddapore, on the banks of the Godavari, or northern branch of the Godaveri, highly cultivated, and abounding in long cloth and other manufactures, and was first erected into a separate desmooky jurisdiction by M. Busey in 1753, and conferred by him, under his proper sunnuds, in nearly equal divisions, at the request of old Vizieram Rauze, on two branches of the Cacarlamoody family, his own kinsmen; the district is therefore composed of the two following pergunnahs:

(1.) DACHEVARUM, or Ramchunderporam, about 16 coss S.E. by East from Rajemundry, was assigned to, and has continued since under the immediate zemindary management of Cacarlamoody Ramchunder Rauze; contains 38 villages	20,000
(2.) CORAM, 20 coss in the same direction nearly from Rajemundry, and close to the Godavari, assigned as the zemindary portion of Cacarlamoody Venkataputty Rauze, cousin to the former, and though containing only 22 large villages, exclusive of pollams, yields a high rent, besides enaums, savorun charges, of	25,000

5th. PEROUR is the pergunnah portion of the zemindary of Coldindee Trippety Rauze of Muggletore, in the circar of Rajemundry. It is divided from his other possessions dependent on those by the Washeshta, the southern branch of the Godaveri, and forms what is properly called the Island of Nagur, though the name is more generally applied to the whole insulated triangle, between the foot of the Godaveri and the sea, including the pergunnahs of Etacatah, Tautepauk, &c. and which space, we before compared to the Delta of Egypt, as resembling it in figure and fertility, and being in like manner, formed or intersected by seven branches of a great river, to which the names of as many tutelar, or happy in both countries derived from the Arabian or planetary divinities, have been assigned by the superstitious natives. When the English were put in possession of the circars, this valuable valuable little territory was under the desmooky management of Vizieram Rauze, whose predecessor in 1750, had made some alienations in favour of the Company; but in 1767, it was transferred with 63 villages of Tautepauk in Jageer, to Hussein Ali Khan, and on his death, in like manner as these were bestowed by the English on the zemindar of Peddapore, so the district in question was conferred in 1774/5 on Trippety Rauze. It contains 37 villages, and together with those of Vadropillee and Tautepauk, worth separately 2,000 pagodas, are greatly under rated in the Doui landobust at - - - - - 22,000.

6th. CORCONDAM, four coss from Rajemundry on the north bank of the Godaveri, on the road to Cottapillee N.W. is the pergunnah zemindary of the family. Trippety Rauze, who first obtained desmooky jurisdiction and rights from Meer Khaleel Khan, the aumildar, in 1744, and soon afterwards gave an ordinary proof of Hindoo magnanimity, in putting himself to death for a verbal insult offered to him by Meer Ibrahim, the aumildar's son. His immediate successor, father of the present occupant, fell more gloriously in 1750, in supporting the cause of the French, as actual rulers, against the invasion of the English. The district consists of 51 villages, of which 12 on the river side, 15 Mergaputty on an elevated ground, and the remainder, equally divided between Condaputty and Jungleputty, or hilly and woody ground; its annual rental, exclusive of enaums, is - - - - - 20,000.

7th. PETTAPORE, eight miles E. northerly from Peddapore, from which it is divided by the small river Yellerru, and five in the same direction from the fort of Samuel Cotah, now the principal garrison of the English in the circar of Rajemundry, is the present capital of the zemindary jurisdiction of Mahaputty Row, Velmawar, whose ancestors were established in part of the desmooky as early as the reign of Ibrahim Kootub Shah, after the expulsion of the Rheddewars, the ancient proprietors of the country in 1571; but this family were also involved in the general proscription of Indian landholders under the government of Rustum Khan, until the year 1746, when Neladerow, father of the present occupant, obtained the farm of Pellafore; and, after an imprisonment of four years for non-payment of rent, procured sunnuds for the zemindary on the accession of Neamut ullah Khan, to the post of aumildar. This district borders on Cicacole, and contains 146 villages, under the following pergunnah divisions; viz.

(1.) POLNAUD or Pettapore, of 48 villages, yielding	60,000
(2.) CAUKINARD and Salapah, 25 villages, including the profit on salt, produce	10,000
(3.) BENDAPOONDY, of 35 villages, near Sittiaverum, with salt	12,000
(4.) BHEEMVARUM, near Samuel Cotah, a kissmut pergunnah, 13 villages	15,000
(5.) CHELLOOR, a mootah of another pergunnah of 7 villages	4,000

CICACOLE, or Kulling, the most northerly and largest of the circars, has in like manner as Rajemundry, undergone almost a total change in the denominations, extent, and value of its subdivisions, since the first establishment of European government; though less in reality, than apparently, with respect to the actual assessment of the country, which was always under Mussulman aumildars greatly beyond the old jumma kaumil, or the amount with which they were charged, or chose to account for, with the public treasury. In its present state, the whole province, as hath already been observed, is unequally divided between the superintendence of two subordinate councils, of which the most considerable is that of Vizagapatam on the sea coast, one hundred and seventy miles N.E. from Masulipatam, nearly central to all the circars; and exercising superior local jurisdiction over the following districts; viz.

1st. HAVILLE of Cicacole, 65 miles N. E. from Vizagapatam, originally comprehending all the lands on the sea coast, from the northern extremity of Rajemundry to the river of Poondy, was dismembered of so many pergunnahs conferred in zemindary, on the desmook of Vizianagram, that in 1758 the annual assessment had decreased to rupees 4,27,970, which was little more than one half of the old valuation; and since this last period, it has been curtailed, though we believe irregularly, and unconstitutionally, of so large a portion of its territory that the remainder is now wholly included in the following pergunnahs, the gross rental of which, being of course greatly diminished through the impolitic system of farming the lands, especially to a neighbouring landholder, without giving him an interest in the permanent prosperity; we shall substitute the net jummabundy clear of all charges, as settled under the French government for the Doulbundobust or present mofussil receipts.

2d. JAPEPOOR, about 104 miles west from Cicacole, and of that distance, forty beyond Saloor Gaut; among the hills is the capital of a tributary raje called also Nundapore, which lyeth nearer to the W. southerly 20 miles, the poor remains of the extensive territorial inheritance once enjoyed by the Rajepoot family of Vickerum Deo, the actual representative, lineally descended from Wistna Deo, the last great prince of the house of Gajeputty, who in 1571, united under his sceptre all the ancient domains of the kings of Orissa. This barren and unhealthy principality, in its limited modern extent, is bounded on the west by Buster or Bussdero, the country of the independent rajah Derriao Sing, of Goondwannah, which being laterally situated among several ranges of high impassable hills, and about 80 miles in length, in a N.E. or S.W. direction, by 40 in breadth, forms a very secure barrier on the side of Berar, where the Marhattas, in taking possession of Chanda, the former inheritance of the Goondwannah family, might otherwise and without the cession of Saloor Gaut, the only known pass through which they entered the circars in 1754, be deemed formidable neighbours. Jazepoor, to the south, borders on Rumpa, and to the north joins the tributary munnims of two other branches of the royal family of Orissa; the one, Gajeputty, settled in Kimeddy, and the other, Persotim Deo, in Kalolindi, lying farther to the N. W. dependant on Chatesguir. To the east, this district extended far into the plains of Cicacole, until the year 1742, when old Vizieram Rauze began to make incroachments, and was so successful under the political favour of Bussey, as to wrest almost the whole of the low fertile portion of the country from its original proprietor, and obtain from his patron, sunnuds for the zemindarry of it, on the footing of his other possessions, when a new revolution transferred the sovereignty of all these provinces to the English. Sitteram, the brother and manager of the present zemindar of Vizianagram, an artful, intelligent, ambitious man, neglected not the opportunity of obtaining a renewal of the family grant of the jurisdiction, or rights of saverum, over the recently conquered pergunnahs of Nundapore. Accordingly in 1768, perhaps inadvertently, though at the same time agreeable to the spirit of true and necessary policy, the claims of Vizieram to a landed desmooky income of 24,000 rupees per annum, issuing from the rents of the dismembered portion of Vickeram Dess's country, and other territorial acquisitions hereafter more particularly to be specified, were admitted, and we conceive firmly established during the life of the actual incumbent, by which act the districts in question were formally, as they were before virtually, annexed to the other dominions of Britain, and of course subjected to the same provincial rule of government. But in 1775, the restless Sitteram, on the raje of Japeoor; and through the conduct and gallantry of the English commander, who penetrated to the capital of this principality, still continues to levy in the nature of a tribute, for which he is accountable to his employers, from Vickeram Deo, the reigning sovereign of a mountainous region, valued in the whole in its present reduced state, at three lacks of rupees annually, for the following considerable portions of it, more recently and thus imperfectly subdued; viz. Nairamapatam, Raigur Singaporam, and Vcassam, having been dismembered on a former occasion by Sitteram, from the territory of Kimeddy, or as sometimes called Saureacca, before dependant on Japeoor; the whole estimated in the gross, at a lack of rupees, but actually yielding a precarious tribute from the ancient sovereign, of - - - - - 10,000.

3d. KIMEDDY, 50 miles N.E. by N. from the town of Cicacole, is the capital of another tributary, but more accessible dependent principality, vested in a rajah of the royal family of Orissa, who actually bears the titular designation of that ancient house, under the proper name of Gajeputty Deo, through the refractory imprudence of Narrain Deo, father of the present occupant, in opposing the Company's authority. During the war with Nizam Ali in 1767-8, almost the whole country was over-run by the English arms, and the proprietor being expelled, was in danger of losing for ever the family inheritance; and though this object hath ever since been the favourite policy, and constant aim of Sitteram Rauze, as a necessary attainment to accomplish his own ambitious views of aggrandizement and unrivalled pre-eminence, yet the lenity and virtue of the British government have hitherto preserved the rights and privileges annexed to this little territory entire, in lineal succession, succession, to the lawful heir, with the exception of the districts of Gandaporam a Eremundlehun, valued at 60,000 rupees. Nevertheless, the remainder still yields a gross revenue of two lacks, of which perhaps the public, either in policy or justice, should not claim more than one half, being - - - - - 25,000.

REVENUE:
3d. Amount collected.

4th. TECKALY, 43 miles N.E. from Cicacole on the sea coast, entirely reduced, serving, and necessarily, under complete subjection to the English government, as being situated in the line of communication between the northern and southern divisions of Cicacole, is, as it may in fact continue to be, the inheritance of Jagget Deo, another descendant of the royal family of Orissa, but more immediately branching from that of Kimeddy. The district yields a lack of rupees; but if the proprietor is to be supported in princely grandeur, the tribute cannot with propriety be increased beyond - - - - - 10,000.

5. VIZIANAGRAM, 38 miles west southerly from Cicacole, and nearly the same distance northerly from Vizagapatam, is the capital, not only of the largest desmooky jurisdiction in this, but, comparatively with districts held under a similar tenure, throughout all the Northern circars, and at present, as it has been since the establishment of the British government, through the extreme favour and indulgence of the Company, vested in form, or by sufferance, in Vizieram Rauze Reddewar, adopted in 1759, by the widow of old Vizieram, from a collateral branch of the Poossaputty family, on a failure of the direct line, at the decease of Gajeputty her son; while the office of zemindar virtually, and in fact with extraordinary, if not unconstitutional powers, has, at the same time exclusively and almost uninterruptedly been exercised by Sitteram Rauze the elder, but half brother of the nominal occupant. In general, the history of all the Rauzees, or tribe of Rachewar in the circars, trace their origin to a dependance on the ancient rajahs of the country, either as chelaks or favoured slaves, managers, talookdars, or renters of the subdivisions of the sovereign domain; and such also was the rise of all the other petty holders of land existing in this province, whether descended from the Velmawars of Telinga, or natives of the soil itself, properly called Oria. But the family now under consideration, are an exception to this genealogical rule; for they are at least foreigners, with respect to Cicacole. The first of them on record, was Madavarama, who inhabited a small village in the Condapillee circar, called Poossaputty, afterwards retained as the local patrimony of the family; when in 1651, Shere Mahomed Khan was sent by Abdullah Kootub Shah from Hyderabad, as aumildar, or provincial governor of all the maritime dependencies north of the Kistna. The following year, this man engaged in the sebandy train of the Mussulman deputy, accompanied his master to Cicacole, and in 1655 was rewarded for services which were not, throughout, worthy of being recorded, with the farm or rental of two mootahs of the pergunnah of Bogapoor, where from henceforth he fixed his residence, for the annual sum of, rupees, 5,207 and a fraction. From this time forward, under three irregular successions of the race of Poossaputty, they acquired, through the favour of eight succeeding aumildars, at different periods, and in greater or smaller portions, down to the year 1734, almost the whole of their original rightful zemindarry in the present extent of four pergunnahs, dismembered from the Havillee lands of the circar, and rated in the antiquated jumma kaumil of the Kootub Shahy, at only 1,92,857 rupees. At the last-mentioned period, the famous Vizieram, having dispatched by poison, in the district of Vizianagur, in the division of Jehapoor, his cousin Sitteram, who had received investiture as heir of line to Madavarama, of the Bogapoor desmooky, seized the family rights, and through the corruption of Jaffier Ali Khan, in 1741 was allowed to exercise the public office to which they were annexed; having removed the zemindarry residence to its present site of Vizianagram, so called either from his proper name, or the place of his former abode in the division of Jehapoor. About this time, it was that the same ambition which prompted Vizieram to commit parricide, and led him more naturally to encroach on the civil rights of neighbouring landholders weaker than himself, in which he was politically supported by the aumildar, until the greater part of the territories of Margool, Singreecotah, and Nundapore, was added to his former possessions; but not being with equal policy checked in his career of power, and made sensible of his own dependence on superior authority, he punished, very properly, as an example to future rulers, the negligence, corruption, or inability of the government that cherished him, by being principally instrumental to the revolution in favour of the French in 1753, in like manner as his son and successor, six years afterwards, on similar grounds, aided in the expulsion of his benefactors, to bring about another change, which might be no less favourable to the interested views of an ambitious powerful subject. This zemindary, so extensive as generally described, has been acquired under such various rulers of civil or political right, and comprehends so many scattered inferior territorial jurisdictions, which, as they were before, should perhaps still, in justice and propriety, be considered as separate and wholly independent of each other, that it must be impossible, from rather imperfect materials, and a very limited local knowledge, to exhibit a connected accurate view of the whole in its real present state, especially as all and singular landed rights, privileges, or civil jurisdiction, as have been, can legally, by custom or in form, be claimed or vested in the zemindar of Vizianagram, could only be derived under sanction of the actual Government, by a renewal or confirmation of former grants, or other sunnuds entirely novel, and which being yet unpublished, have the nature, extent, and validity of a Vizieram Rauze's pretensions to any territorial or desmooky jurisdiction (excepting the three districts of Nundapore, Singreecotah, and Margool, of which the saverums are supposed to have been regularly assigned to him), matters of the greatest uncertainty and doubt. We have, therefore, been under the necessity of recurring to the period of M. Bussy's government in 1758, to determine the points in question; as they were then fixed, substituting, however, from later and equally authentic information, a more competent valuation of the lands lands than is stated in the hustabood, or gross rental formed by that able financier, of the whole zemindarry, as it was conferred at that time, under his proper summads, on Gajepatty Rauze, the son of Vizieram.

1st. TALOOKEH KUBEEM, or original zemindarry possessions, dependant on Vizianagram, dismembered from the ancient Havillee lands by different annikdars, in small portions, between the year 1655 and 1741, and formed into one desmooly jurisdiction, continued by successive administrations, in chosen or approved members of the Poossaputty family, and consisting of the following Pergunnahs, all in the neighbourhood of the capitals of the district and province, assessed, in M. Bussy's rent-roll, for the sums here set down in rupees, in contradistinction to the more recent valuation, in pagodas, which we follow, as the most perfect, to complete our Doult bundobust of the Circars; viz.

4th. TALOOKEH ZEBBERDESTY, or lands recently seized without any authority, and held rather through the inattention, than intended favour of government:

(1.) WOORATTA, &c. four pergunnahs, between Cossim Cotah, the Hills, and the Sitteaveram or Golinda rivers, 30 coss south of Vizagapatam, belonging to the Havillee Lands, let to Timrajee Vacheroy in 1750, before his restoration to the zemindarry of Peddapore, afterwards farmed by Hyder Kooli Khan, and in 1758 to Gajepatty Raje, for the net sum to be paid into the treasury of, rupees 1,43,000; besides 30 garce each of 7 ordinary candies of paddy, estimated at, rupees 8,000; but, according to the more adequate valuation of Matthews, the four pergunnahs yield as follows:

In 1769, after having cut off all the males of the family, as commonly supposed, Sitteram Rauze became security for, or rather levied, the rents, moderately valued, as follows:

1. Ankapillee and Milpauk, &c. - - - - -	27,500

TOTAL of Unauthorized Possessions

TOTAL of the zemindarry of Vizianagrum in Bussy's hustabood account in 1758, at rupees 18,51,539; in General Matthews' account in 1775, stated at rupees 27,43,000, and in the present Doul bundobust, exclusive of Verkeram Deo's tribute of 40,000 - Rupees 27,56,540; or Madras pagodas

GANJAM on the sea-coast, near the N.E. extremity of this and all the Northern circars, at the distance of 187 miles from Vizagapatam, 357 from Masulipatam, 650 from Madras, 372 from Calcutta, and only 245 miles from Jellasore, the present boundary of Bengal towards the Marhatta division of Orissa, is the regular pentagon fort and capital of the lesser northern division of Chicacole, commonly called Ichapoor, in the country of Oria, under the superintendence of a chief and council, and subdivided as follows:

(1.) HAVILLEE, rated in M. Bussy's Jumma bundy of 1758, at rupees 1,76,141; yields now to the public, clear of charges; viz.

1. Ichapoor, 31 miles southerly from Ganjam, including the sayer or land customs, and arrack farms - 15,500

(2.) VIZIANAGUR, about 50 miles west of the capital of a small principality, among the hills; united, till lately, in the person of Bheem Deo, another descendant of the royal family of Orissa; now divided pretty equally between Mumides and Jaggernaut Deo, sons to the former occupant, the latter residing at the foot of Pertabgeery. The whole district may be worth 1,20,000 rupees; was assessed by Bussy, in 1758, for a tribute of rupees 84,454. But until this, with all the numerous petty munnims in the division of Ganjam, be reunited under one head as formerly, and the person thus acting destitute of all pretensions of his own, the mere officer of government, which necessarily excludes every branch of the royal family of Gajepetty, we cannot realize, whatever may be the just or necessary demands of the public from this raje, more than (3.) MUNNIMS, or Jungle possessions, situated partly in the plain, and partly among the boundary northern and westerly hills, held by petty warrior proprietors of the Candiat or warlike tribe, formerly the servants or vassals of the Gajepetty family; and never reduced before the era of the French government, though then and ever since only partially so, by reason of the unhealthiness of their dwelling-places. All these, taken together, may be estimated at eight and-half lacks of rupees; but, perhaps, never will yield to government a greater revenue than M. Bussy's assessment of 1758; viz.

1. Mopery, eight coss south, the most central, to control the rest, under Varraindar, assessed for - 15,000
2. Goonsur, 50 miles west-northerly, under Kissenbunje, increase of 20,000 rupees on Bussy's rent - 14,500

10. Paloor to Gajender, also near Ganjam - 1,000
11. Hummah to Santerou, originally to the former - 200
12. Burragurr, to Permanaud Sing; this, with all the preceding munnims, except Mohery, lying between the sea and Souzerah, to the north of the Roosheoila, or river of Ganjam, on the frontiers of the Marhatta division of Orissa - 3,000
13. Chigutty, to Rawal Rao, between Mohery and Vizianagrum - 14,000
14. Jerridah to Santerow, further south - 2,900
15. Jellantha to Chowhao, south-west range - 5,700
16. Mundesau to Rajamany, near Kimeddy - 7,250

THE original accounts and authorities on which the preceding Statement of the gross Revenue collected from the Northern circars is founded, may be considered in the following order.

1st. The Jumma Kaumil, or complete standard assessment of the Deccan, begun by Moorshed Kooli Khan in 1654, on the principle of Toorell Mull's original Rent-roll of Proper Hindostan, and finally terminated for the six southern soubahs by the emperor Alemgeer, in the year 1687. This account was obtained immediately from the dufter of the Nizam; but it is so common, and of such universal use, that either in whole or in part, it must be in the hands of every man skilled in the finances of the country; accordingly, there is not a candespandeh employed throughout the Peninsula, and worthy of holding his office, who cannot repeat at least as much of it, as regards the particular district of his own superintendence: and many persons, entirely unconnected with the business of revenue, are in possession of the whole unmutated in detail, by the extracts published in Mr. Orme's Historical Fragments. The manuscript procured for him of the subdivisions and territorial income of the Deccan, appears evidently to be no other than a copy of the jumma kaumil, with geographical illustrations drawn out for the use of M. Bussy, under the inspection of Hyda Jung, while he had access to the public records about the year 1756, and perhaps carried about by one of the dispersed followers of the French chief after the national overthrow in India, until it accidentally fell, several years afterwards, into the hands of an English commander in one of the Northern provinces of Hindostan. We have already, on different occasions, explained the nature and utility of this famous rent-roll, and endeavoured to shew, that though every where indispensably necessary to ascertain even the present political circumstances of the country; yet with respect to the actual amount of the revenues of the circars, it is chiefly applicable to, and comes nearest the modern valuation of those south of the Godavari. Some very intelligent men have, however, suggested a doubt whether the population and more useful arts, in all these provinces, may not have been on the decline, since the commencement of European administrations; and that consequently, the ancient rental may exceed what, on the same principle of taxation, should now be exacted from the landholders. These would be most extraordinary unaccountable facts, if they could be brought within proof: and, however mortifying to the pride of the highest civilization, should be fully displayed, as touching national prosperity, and the general interest of mankind. For if, after a lapse of two centuries, in the relative decreasing worth of an amazing revolution has taken place all over the world, have been almost exclusively acquired and enjoyed by the inhabitants of the lands made with all possible commerce) it should appear that a pecuniary estimate of the lands made with all possible acknowledged exactness, antecedently to that period, be too high in proportion to the actual produce of the country, or the medium by which it is rated, depending on the mass of gold and silver currency in circulation; if, above all, it should be found the violent sanguinary despotism of the Mahomedans, who have ruled universally and uninterruptedly all these provinces for ages past (holding in the most unqualified debasing slavery the native, inoffensive Hindoos, composing at least nine tenths of the whole body of the people, and including every class of industrious subjects) proved more favourable to population, agriculture, manufactures, and commerce, than a government the freest and most liberal and lenient, existing perhaps, at present, even in a more enlightened part of the world, in a time of the most profound tranquillity and abundant produce respectively of the country under consideration, than of Christians; Humanity militated so far with one of its best precepts, "increase and multiply," as to reject the example of Mussulman tyranny, found experimentally thus to answer so effectually the great ends of society, we should at least have the satisfaction to know the chief impediment to the attainment of all these grand political desiderata, forming together the basis, as generally understood, of national power, wealth, and grandeur. But this would be more than a paradox; it would be a solecism in reason, and could only be admitted, under a total ignorance of existing circumstances, or from a partial observation of the wretched state of those districts denominated Havillee, rented so improvidently to mere temporary, needy, and unqualified farmers; for certainly the population has increased, and all the acts of civilization have been improved throughout all the Northern circars, under the influence of the British government, though these will be never made beneficial to the state, nor carried to the greatest possible height, on the present corrupt, dangerous, and oppressive system of usurped, indefinite, uncontroled zemindarry administration; but that the jumma kaamil falls greatly short of the amount of the revenue now actually collected on the same financial principles, as were laid down in the formation of that original antiquated assessment, has been more positively proved. Admitting the authenticity of the account following next in order, and on which more especially depends the verification of our statement, being,

2d. The Doul Bundobust, or sub-rental of the three middle circars, on a medium of the ten years preceding 1769, formed under the absolute authority of a Mussulman amildar, aided with all the acuteness, intelligence, and irresistible influence of a Bramin, at once dewan, serishtedar, and principal mutesddy, feared for his knowledge and abilities by such of his own tribe as were most prone to chicanery, but popular amongst all, for the extreme of a virtue rarely possessed in moderation by a Hindoo, profuse liberality; this man, whose name is Vencatram, a native of Conjeveram, was grown old in practical finance before the deprivation of his office in consequence of the revolution, which transferred the reins of administration from his own and superior hands into those of the English, through the immediate effective agency of Togure Pundit, his disciple; but by the death of his master Hussein Ali in 1771, and through his own extravagance, or an improvident turn of mind, fell into such indigence as to become a pensioner on the bounty of his successor in power, for a family subsistence in an allotment of about forty acres of land near Yamarum, six ross north of Masulipatam in the pergunnah Inacotah, under the denomination of an enaum, or charitable donation. As however he could not brook being indebted for his own personal expenses to his successor, nor to act in an inferior office, tendered to him in a place where he had before appeared, as principal, he accepted of an offer made by Sitteram Rauze, to be employed as peshear for the districts of Chicacole under the zemindarry of Vizianagram; and in 1779 embraced a similar proposal from Mahomed Taje adeen, amildar of Guntour, when he may be supposed to have completed his financial, by a particular local knowledge, of all the Northern circars. The vicissitudes of his fortune, brought him at length into the service of the author of this tract, whose curiosity being excited to make the inquiry, from the uncommon intelligence he discovered respecting the state of the country, learnt so much of his private history from many living evidences.

That the circumstance of Vencatram's former situation fully enabled him to ascertain, with the most minute accuracy, the gross revenues of the districts included in the rental now in question, no one will doubt, who knows the unlimited power of a Mussulman delegate authorizing such an investigation to be made, and the personal influence of a Bramin, officially heard of the different members of his last acting in the capacity of despandeahs, the only native accountants and keepers of all the provincial records, or who has heard that Jonguee Pundit, this man's successor, received a yearly pension of about twenty thousand pounds from the zemindars of Rajemundry alone, for relinquishing a part of the public authority annexed to the serishtedarry; or that the same Jonguees inheritor still receives from the Company five thousand pounds more as dewan or interpreter, while his superior, the English chief and high representative of government, is not allowed a fourth of the same income. But the authenticity of the particular account itself, thus exhibited as genuine, must in a great measure rest on probable circumstances, until the inquiries of the committee of circuit, or local knowledge of others, allowed to be skilled in the finances of the country, bring the truth to light. All that we have to say on the subject, that it bore the marks of originality, and even of the chequered vagrant life of its owner, on whose part there were no apparent inducement to attempt deception, for he neither could have expected, nor did receive, any reward for bringing it forward; which was merely a matter of chance, occasioned by a reference to satisfy some inquiries on points beyond the scope of his memory; and being arrived at that time of life, when all the passions of a man, except avarice, are generally dormant, it is not likely that he had any personal malice to gratify; while the utmost of his ambition, after having outlived the vigour of his faculties, and being long since disencumbered of his family, may be naturally supposed limited to a bare subsistence for himself individually. If these testimonies should not be thought sufficient, Vencatram may yet live a few years to answer, viva voce, in his own behalf; but we have indicated indicated more minutely his family dwelling-place, in the event of his being called on; less, in the certainty of finding him there, than to prevent, through the liberal humanity of English superintendants, the sequestration of a miserable, perhaps an unauthorized enaum, which might otherwise inevitably be the consequences of incurring the resentment of his Bramin brethren in office.

3d. An English manuscript relative to the circars, in great part confirms the justness of the preceding document. We know not, with certainty, the Author of this piece, which was written in the year 1772-3, and professedly for the information of Mr. Dupree, while in the government of Fort St. George; but from the uncommon and practical knowledge it discloses of the Finances, or political state of the country, it may with confidence be said to be the production of some gentlemen long resident, and high in office, within the dependencies of Masulipatam, who only wanted original historical intelligence, with a true understanding of the forms and rights of government, alone to be acquired through the medium of the Persian language, to be perfect master of the subjects brought into discussion. Between the sum total of gross revenue here exhibited for the three middle circars, being pagodas 9,96,020, and that of Vencatram's doul bundobust 11,62,195 pagodas, there is a difference of 1,67,175; but as this deficiency in the former account, is owing to a notoriously undervalued rental of the four larger zemindaries of Peddapore, Pettapore, Nujere, and Mugiet-tore, it serves rather to establish the authenticity of the latter statement; while a similar partial amount of 22,000 pagodas, in the estimate of Vencatayloo's mecrassy, betrays the channel through which the misinformation of our English authors has proceeded.

4th. A Hustabood account of the village of lands of Rajemundry in detail, formed in the year 1738, by order of the French government, in exceeding greatly the medium valuation of Vencatram for the same circar, if it does not authenticate so much of the doul bundobust itself, proves at least the moderation of the scale on which this assessment has been formed.

5th. Teshkhees Jummabundy of the whole circars Chicacole, concluded for the Fussullee year 1167, under the auspices of M. Bussy, with an Appendix, shewing the Khan wossool, or gross receipts on account of the zemindarry of Vizianagram, being the valued rental of the lands, as then ascertained, to be specified in the sunnuds newly granted by the French chief to Gasseputty Rauze, agreeable to the forms required in executing all such territorial grants. This account has been corroborated, enlarged, and corrected to the year 1775, by the more accurate, minute, and equally well directed investigation of General Matthews into the state of the revenues of the southern division of Chicacole, as exhibited in the abstract recently laid before a Committee of the House of Commons; and with respect to the value of the northern district of Ichapoor, it has been no less authoritatively confirmed by the special written informations of an English chief, to whose ability, zeal, and superior intelligence, the India Company are principally indebted for the first regular establishment of their authority over that portion of the same circar.

6th. A comparative general estimate of the receipts from all the six Northern provinces, by which these are deemed equivalent to the whole of the remaining portion of the soubah of Hyderabad, left to the government of Nizam Ali, and comprising 13 circars, rated annually for one crore of rupees, though not above half be realized to the exchequer*, founded on a summary traditional calculation, adopted by all other native financiers, from the late Sum Sam ul Moolk, who succeeded his father, the famous Shah Nowaz Khan, in the high offices of king's dewan and vice-royal prime minister of the soubahdarry of the Deccan, and corresponding with the result of local observation, and the best personal private information procurable, in a period of near three years residence within such of the Nizam's and Company's territories as are made here the subject of comparison.

But the amount thus ascertained, by the positive and circumstantial evidence of facts, written, or oral testimony, to be levied from the country, under the sanction, and wholly for the use of the sovereign proprietary government vested in the Company, is absolutely in the exclusion of the Kharige jumma, or territorial grants of savorum and enaums, for the maintenance of zemindars, with their respective jurisdictions of Despandeah throughout the pergunnahs, in lieu of rissooms of koolkernies in the villages, and of priests, mendicants, and singers of the Hindoo or Mussulman persuasion, on the few existing religious and charitable foundations. Moreover, what is truly reproachful and dangerous to the state, it is in exclusion of those recent fraudulent and unconstitutional alienations of land, either to purchase the collusive assent of Bramini superintendants, or to support a numerous military force, wholly dependant on the desmooks, and kept up with no other view than to tyrannize over and oppress the peaceable ryots, or favour premeditated rebellion against the lawful sovereign, on the first convenient occasion. The former of these rightful appropriations to the farming landholders, may now be moderately estimated at five lacks of rupees annually: half that sum is not more than the original pecuniary due of the provincial recorders; and reckoning one inferior Bramin accountant at a hundred rupees for each village, supposing the number of these increased, by enlargement of territory and population, to 6,500, the amount then assigned in land to the immediate officers of Mofussil administration, will be in all fourteen lacks; lacks; to which we shall only add three more, on account of all public endowments or charity, as Sinnachellum near Vizagapatam, is the sole pagoda of note within the circars, and amply provided for, as the clerical and soothsaying or calendar Bramins are otherwise supported, through the superstition of the people, who class them with bulootedars, or artificers, entitled each at harvest time to a bulootch, or bundle of corn; and as donations to Mahomedans, or mendicants in general, have been a great part resumed under the uncontrolled grasping sway of Hindoo zemindars.

To ascertain the amount of fraudulent sequestrations of land to peons, &c. it should be remembered that 41,000 armed men, of every denomination, are supposed to be maintained throughout all the provinces, by the official landholders, on pretence of enforcing the collection of the rents due to government, which is virtually or in fact debited for the expense of such militia establishment, under the head of subsidy; of this number, one half of different tribes, Mahomedans or Hindoos, wholly undisciplined, and with no local or personal attachments, are paid altogether in money, and a peon for every village, forming what is called the Naikavarry establishment, consisting chiefly of Mussulmen in hereditary succession, and indispensably necessary for the collections and peace of the country, paid a subsistence in kind in harvest time, in equal proportions, by government and its ryots, will make up the numerary of Mofussil troops thus provided for, 27,000. It is the remainder only of 14,000, composed of the military tribes of Rachewars, Rowars, Velinas and Kundaitis, sprung from or adopted into the families of the zemindars, and therefore personally attached to their chiefs, that have been clandestinely favoured with territorial grants for their ordinary and constant maintenance, besides extraordinary pay in money when on service; and these alienations, at the most moderate computation of 50 rupees annually estimate similar defalcations in favour of Bramins, &c. added to the kharije jumma, make the whole income of landed property, exclusive of what is assessed for government, amount to twenty-four lacks; and inclusively of the latter portion, one crore thirty lacks of rupees, with a fraction, being the sum total of what we shall henceforth assume, as the gross rental of the mehal and sayer throughout all the Northern circars collectively.

Large as this revenue may at first sight appear, either comparatively with the actual public receipts, or hitherto supposed capacity of the farming landholders, yet it will be found to fall short of the estimated yearly produce of the country, by the lowest general calculations which can be formed of the extent and value even of all the arable ground in or out of cultivation, setting aside the greater portion of land appropriated for pasture, now become altogether unproductive, and of no financial account to the state, unless in the gratuitous partial maintenance of the whole body of peasantry. To discuss this point with the wished-for precision, a topographical survey of the outlines of the Circars, particularly those of Guntour, Rajemundry, and the southern division of Cicacole, would be necessary, in order to ascertain their exact superficial contents; nevertheless, according to such imperfect materials, as the public or individuals on the spot, have as yet been furnished with, and lights derived from viewing a manuscript drawing executed under the French government, though still unpublished, (except on the diminutive scale of D'Anville's general map of Hindostan) we have ventured to give an area of 17,000 square geographic miles to all the six provinces united; but, to be within the most moderate bounds, let the dimensions be reduced to 15,000 of the same measure, or for the sake of easier calculation, in round numbers, to 20,000 square British miles. In like manner, we have been under the necessity of assuming the proportion of arable land rather arbitrarily, and, to ourselves, on very unsatisfactory grounds, at one fifth of the whole territorial extent, finding that neither the Mogul, French, or English administrations, the former from sloth and ignorance; the second for want of leisure, in the short period of six years rule; and the latter no doubt from disinclination, have not adopted the easy constitutional mode of ascertaining this matter with greater accuracy, by an investigation into the detailed annual accounts of the despondeabs or other revenue officers employed by government, and which can only be deficient from relaxation or negligence, in the exercise of necessary legal control.

To value this portion of land, being 4,000 square British miles, on the principles of Toorel Mull's jummaundy nekdy, on a fair comparison, and with due attention to relative circumstances, it is to be observed, that the begah duty, or square official measure instituted by the same financier, and serving as a basis for his general pecuniary assessment of one fourth of the yearly produce of the soil, in those parts of the empire where a money settlement could with advantage be made, consisting of 3,600 square ells, each at the lowest calculation of 38½ inches, and at the highest 41, being very little short of an English acre. But in process of time, in consequence of the increased influx of specie, from the days of Akbar, throughout the commercial provinces as well as those around the capitals, so greatly benefited by a rapid circulation of the signs of wealth, and agreeable to the ever constant effects of growing luxury with riches, the natural and artificial produce of the country acquired a high proportionate value; the price of labour was enhanced, and, to re-establish an equilibrium in the general system of political economy over the whole empire, the foudjeds, amils, and zemindars employed in the Mofussil collection, sometimes blindly, and often interestedly, were made the state conductors for drawing a superabundant currency into the exhausted coffers of the exchequer. These intermediate agents sustained the shock often unexpectedly, and always irregularly themselves, from the hand of despotism; but communicated its influence for the sake of a selfish return; benefit, benefit, with more moderation, though no less arbitrarily, to the great mass of the people. A fixed standard for estimating the lands had been instituted, and was found necessary to be continued, to regulate the extent and value of territorial assessments, whether for civil or military services. The tide of American treasure, which afterwards so prodigiously altered the relative worth of real and personal property in Hindostan, flowed in through so many different channels of commerce from the beginning, that its progress seemed slow, and was scarcely perceptible. When made visible by its effects, an increase of revenue was demanded; but instead of recurring to the original principles of finance established by Toorel Mull, ignorant or corrupt Mussulman deputies preferred the mode of arbitrary taxation in addition to the first regular assessment; and which being precarious, and indefinite, afforded greater scope for ministerial speculation, or of purchasing ryots, and superior landholders, in the hopes of future discontinueance, or of purchasing partial remissions of public income by the private douceurs of bribery. An age elapsed before a weak, blind, unsystematical government, could avail itself of the change thus gradually introduced in the value of things in general, assert its territorial rights, and resuming only the known defalcations of its proper Mussulman amils, or foudjeds officers, consolidate with the original rents, all the recent abwabs or imposts. The reform, however, was still but half completed in the soubahs of Delhi, Agra, and Bengal; the two former, so enriched by the collected spoils of the empire, or the profuse expense of a Mogul court; the latter, so greatly benefited by enlarged commerce. In these places, therefore, over and above the ordinary taxes, to remedy the growing disproportion between the produce of the land, and royal proprietary share, a reduction of two-thirds was made in the square extent of a begah, which, by a very simple operation, nominally tripled the quantity of ground in cultivation; this lessened measure of 1,200 ells, being equally valuable or subject to the same financial demands as the larger one under the same denomination, instituted as a basis for the original assessment of Toorel Mull.

Particularly in Bengal, (the circumstance of which may be deemed the fairest to be brought into comparison with those of the Northern circars), the common begah, now called Ryotty, in contra-distinction to duftery, and made almost the universal standard to estimate annual farm or permanent transfer of territorial property, contains no more than 1,600 square yards, while the proportioned rent, including the assil toomar, with all the additional taxes since established, and already exhibited, may be calculated at least from one to four rupees, varying with situation and soil, for grounds laid out in the culture of grain; and from five to thirty, for such as are appropriated to the dearer productions of second necessity. Or, to obviate every possibility of cavil, the medium yearly income of the whole, may be stated at two rupees, according to which 4,000 square miles each, of 1,936 begahs, being the supposed arable land in the circars, should yield a gross revenue to government of 1,54,88,000.

Nor will the amount be less, on a computation, by the actual established rule of Buttai, of the produce of the three yearly harvests in corn, equally divided between the state and its ryots. Allowing the same quantity of ground fit for cultivation as in the foregoing estimate, one fourth should be deducted for the portion always suffered to remain fallow, and subject to no assessment, reckoning only 3,000 square miles, or nearly 1/7 of the area assigned to the whole country in constant tillage, liable to the operations of finance. This territory then being equivalent in local measure to 1,94,464 catties, each of 32 guntah, composed of 16 square vassam, every one of which consisting of from 4½ to 5 covids, or on a medium 7¼ feet square, and producing at the lowest calculation per catty, one year with another, 8 candies, each of about 1,600 lbs. weight in grain, either rice or toary, which usually fetches on the spot 5 pagodas, or 20 rupees per candy, will, after deduction of one moiety, as the legal and customary share of the peasantry, though sometimes curtailed through the iniquity of zemindars, yield an annual income to government of rupees 1,55,57,120; while the amount of sayer or variable imposts in addition, may be supposed amply to compensate for the extraordinary expense, risque, and unavoidable loss, in thus concluding with the farmers a revenue settlement in kind, paid by pecuniary estimation.

On the other hand, we are not to imagine that the burthen thus imposed on the great mass of the people, more especially the useful husbandmen, leaves a smaller proportion of the fruits of their labour to satisfy their own necessary wants, or indeed, is in any respect so oppressive, as what is experienced in all other civilized parts of the world. In the freest countries of Europe, Great Britain, Switzerland, Netherlands, and the Pais Bas of France, we believe the share left to the peasantry of the growth of the soil, with their own industry, has never been reckoned more than from two-thirds to four-fifths of the whole yearly produce. By the regulations of Tamerlane, for all his Tartarian, Persian and Syrian dominions, from China to the Mediterranean sea, one third of the annual crop, by common valuation, whether of the finer or coarser articles of culture, was to be appropriated to support the established military government, and the remainder, to subsist the ryots, or defray the expense of cultivation. But by the constitutions of Sultan Selim, for the general administration of his new conquest in Egypt in 1516, the lands, or native tenantry, were assessed chiefly in money, and by measurement. One half of the gross annual produce of it is true an extraordinary luxuriant soil, either to maintain the feudal republican establishment with a standing army, in subordination to the Turkish bashaw, or to be remitted in treasure to the Porte, and in corn to Mecca, as an offering to the holy Mussulman sec-under the denomination of Mira, or imperial tribute. * Whereas, in Hindostan†, agreeable to the institutions of the emperor Akbar, universally adopted and invariably adhered to since, whether we make the jummadundy, nekdy, or battai, the basis for calculation, it would seem as if a medium had been struck of all the foregoing proportions established in other countries, to fix those of the Mogul dominions, as they are by the despotic law and usage, wonderful moderation, at one quarter for the circar or sovereign proprietor, and three-fourths for the ryots, or immediate cultivators of the land. Though, when circumstances of climate and habit are taken into consideration; when necessary wants of clothing, fuel, and various diet, with all the conveniences required by the inhabitants of the colder regions, yet so scantily supplied even by excessive toil, from sandy barrenness in many places, united to the effect of inclement seasons in others, are compared with the food, enjoined by the strongest moral and religious precepts; the rank luxuriance of a soil, yielding almost spontaneously, a triple yearly harvest; and above all, a perpetual verdant pasture, of such vast extent and richness as to subsist through its flocks gratuitously, without any fiscal charge, half the great body of the people; then it must be confessed that the proportional assessment stated as forming an apparent mean, is in reality, the very extreme of financial moderation; and that, instead of three-fourths, we may allow seven-eighths to be the share of annual territorial produce enjoyed by the Hindoo peasantry‡.

But it may be urged, that it is not the great mass of the people, (two millions four hundred ninety-nine thousand nine hundred and thirty, out of two millions and a half, the supposed total enumeration of souls existing in the circars,) that are objects of consideration, as likely to be oppressed, or deprived of their rights, in realizing to the public treasury the territorial rental levied from the ryots in the name or behalf of government, and therefore stated as its due; it is solely a class of seventy zemindars, who being called landholders, must therefore be so in fact, according to European ideas of feudal tenures, or rather being ignorantly styled rajahs, or Hindoo princes, have of course an original hereditary right, not only to the proprietary occupancy of the land, but also to exercise tyrannical uncon-trolled authority over the persons and property of the bulk of the inhabitants, either virtually, or in contemplation of law, subjects to the dismembered sovereignty of a portion of the Mogul empire. The very proposition is so palpably absurd, and erroneous in its principle, that it seems impossible to express it in any terms of language, which do not at the same time convey, a self-evident refutation; and expose the fallacy, both of the premises, and conclusion; yet in delicacy to the public opinions, and as the legislators of India in Great Britain, seem rather inclined to adopt the popular belief, though in their wisdom they have not thought proper to this time, to alter one of the most ancient fundamental maxims of policy in the East, by creating great intermediate proprietors of land, on the footing of freeholders, copyholders, or feudatories of Europe, otherwise than by temporary jagheers to the officers or pensioners of government, so we shall still formally suppose the existence of such a description of men under the appellation of zemindars, for the sake of a direct positive denial of the fact, and of the truth of the inference deduced from it, implying an unwarrantable oppressive infringement of individual privileges. This subject has already been irregularly discussed, in different parts of the preceding disquisition; and it seems only necessary here to bring all the arguments used by reference, into one connected point of view.

Accordingly, it hath been asserted, and we presume to think, on grounds admitting of political demonstration, that no one tribe of Hindoo landholders, jointly or severally within the

* The feudal republican establishment consisted of 24 foreign beys, with as many kashiefs or lieutenants for the 24 provinces of Egypt, each of these possessing in property and feudal subordination, an indefinite number of Malakies or Circassian, Georgian and Abyssinian christian slaves, educated in Mahomedanism, who formed the standing militia, and succeeded always by adoption, ability, or favouritism, to the landed property and offices of their masters, until they attained the highest dignity among the beys of Shekhal Belad, or chief of the whole country. The standing army was composed of 12,000 regular troops, chiefly infantry, divided into 7 regiments or regiments, commanded by as many kyeaks under the orders of the bashaw. The militia of Egypt, in money, was settled at 25 mydins per fedan of ground, and for Said or upper Egypt, 2,60,000 ardebs of wheat, according to the measure of that time.

† In Siam also under a different denomination, the rule of Battai, by equal division of the yearly crops, between government and the peasantry, is a fixed regulation established by ancient despotic law or custom.

‡ From verbal information on the spot, not vouched to be correct in particulars, though perhaps sufficiently so to convey a general idea of the matter of fact, the town of Kacooloor pergunnah, Bheterjhelly zemindary, Chakeer Kacooloor, contained in 1783 one hundred families, of which 85 farming Bramins, in all about 8,000 souls, paying to government as its due, under the denomination of a variety of the produce 200 pagodas, yearly, for 1,000 caries of the richest arable ground in the circars of this space, only $\frac{1}{2}$ was in cultivation, and yielded 2,000 caries of grain, valued at 10,000 pagodas, from which, after deducting the stipulated rent to the state, and an allowance of 14 per cent. on the gross receipts to defray the customary charge of Russooms, Saverums, &c. to zemindars and lesser officers whose authority for some years past hath been suspended, 6,600 pagodas should remain to the husbandmen. The usual pay to the pariahs, who are the common labourers, and employed six months on tiling or reaping the harvest, is two seer of paddy per day each man, and 20th of the grain produced, distributed among them all at the close of the season, being about four rupees per month for half the year, each person at the usual calculation of the price of half a candy of seed grain, required for the same square measure, make the total expense of the cultivated lands 4,100, leaving a clear profit to the farmers of 2,500 pagodas; as the maintenance of oxen for the plough is otherwise gratuitously provided for by indulgent sovereigns, they derived a gain of about 1,200 more, the yearly produce in ghee or numerous increase of 600 milk cows, pastured on the remainder of the land in tenancy, subject to no assessment, while it was notorious that the Bramin families forming $\frac{2}{3}$ of the whole population of the place, and there as well as over the rest of Hindostan, generally speaking, the most voluptuous and extravagant in their diet, drew half their subsistence from butter milk, or the very squeezing of ulchym, the more substantial partage into still more substantial gold.

the circars, or the whole of them, collectively, under whatever denomination, (excepting the ancient rajahs of the country, which have been particularized as descendants of the royal family of Orissa or Gajepetty,) have in right, form, or fact, the smallest pretensions to any territorial property, beyond the extent of their specified official domains called Saverum, making scarcely 1/20th part of the local civil jurisdiction committed to their management by the sovereign proprietary government.—1st. The private right of a more extensive landholding could only be acquired, by conquest, royal grant, hereditary or prescriptive tenure of free or feudal possession, while it is notorious that every zemindary title is the most limited and precarious in its nature, depending on the arbitrary will of the lowest provincial delegate; equivalent to a simple lease in tenancy subject to annual renewals, and to be traced to the same base and recent origin, within the period of British rule, as generally distinguishes the spurious claims of the farmers-occupant themselves, to family pre-eminence from birth, on the enjoyment of a large territorial income, in prejudice of the prince's necessary undisputed regal dues.

2d.—The form of such sunnuds or dewanny patents, as constitute the desmooks or zemindar official collectors of the revenue with inferior civil powers, at the same time that it ascertains the extent of their petty freehold estates appropriated for family subsistence, with each local jurisdiction, determines specifically or comparatively, if we may be allowed to make use of an European term, the unqualified villainage to the sovereign, or his feudal representative, of the great portion of land in occupancy, as well as the slavish dependance of the Hindoo landholder, for the whole of his uncertain tenure, on the lordly Mussulman jagherdar or annil. That the possessors of such inferior grants, should be reluctant now in producing their respective deeds, under the prevalence of a delusive idea which magnifies their relative importance, is perfectly natural; but that the rights and privileges of subjects, as derived from government, should so frequently be agitated, and to this day acknowledged to be matters wholly undefined, or of the greatest doubt; and that yet the only sure, easy, and simple mode of discovering the truth by a critical examination of sunnuds, should be neglected, appears altogether extraordinary and unaccountable.—3d. In point of fact, the most conclusive evidence offers itself of the sovereign's claim to the landholder's share of yearly territorial produce, that the whole body of zemindars were from the beginning, and are still to be considered simply, as intermediate agents for the state, to realize the stipulated rent of the peasantry. This doctrine forms incontrovertibly the ground-work of the past and actual system of finance, throughout all the discovered members of the Mogul empire. It is practically enforced every where by the prince, acknowledged or acquiesced in by the Hindoo landholders themselves, and notoriously respected by the ryots universally, as the foundation of their Magna Charta, stating the proportions to be invariably drawn of the produce of the soil, assisted by their labour for the public service; accordingly it may be clearly traced in the letter and spirit of the original instruments conferring investiture, describing the nature, local extent, with the powers of zemindary offices, as well as in the annual cowle, bestowing the temporary management of the revenue on the same generally permanent agents. It is manifested in the ever customary frequent acts of government at pleasure, or for mal-administration, in suspending their authority as collectors, and depriving them altogether of territorial jurisdiction with its assigned advantages, unless in some cases with the exception of saverum or subsistence in perpetuity or for a time. And it is finally demonstrated, by the tenure of the muckela, or written obligation of the zemindars, to discharge faithfully the trusts reposed in them, otherwise implicitly acquiescing in the justice of suspension or entire exoneration, and never requiring at any time in the nature of territorial property beyond the extent of their saverum, but always to account with the treasury for the last daum, collected throughout the remainder of their local jurisdiction, whether constructively or positively by royal authority, and which, though they do, by general abstract or false statements of receipts, resume defalcations, and curtail unnecessary sebandy or exorbitant mofussil expenses of the circar or state, being all that is contended for, as requiring public investigation and economical reform, in order to reduce the emoluments of intermediate agents, to the primitive, legal, and equitable standard of russooms and saverums, virtually as well as in form.

How far this decreased allowance in itself, may be supposed insufficient, adequate in policy, or an infringement in equity, on the natural rights of Indian landholders, can only be truly ascertained, by estimating their character, wants, and relative circumstances. In addition to what has already been observed on this topic, it is incontestable, that the most voluptuous Hindoo in the country, of whatever denomination, doth not in general, (without a flagrant deviation from every good principle, moral and religious, which could make him as dangerous a subject in society, as in ordinary he is worthy of being cherished for inoffensive manners growing out of a virtuous simplicity) cannot in his own person, house, equipage, dress, and proper family subsistence, exceed in his expenses on a scale of the highest rank, from a hundred to one thousand rupees monthly; while a zemindar's legal allotment of about ten per cent. out of the public revenue, together with certain other pecuniary and contingent advantages, not only amply provide for all such necessary charges, but are considerably more than sufficient to defray all those of useless luxury, pernicious extravagance, joined to all the empty pageantry of retinue and outward shew, ever indulged in or affected by the richest, most debauched landholder, as yet unmoved by a spirit of extraordinary refractoriness, and untainted with the vice of ambition, so common among this order of men in India, to raise self despotic independence, on the ruins of established constitutional authority. That therefore, and from a variety of moral and physical causes, in their effect not peculiar to Hindostan, and any excess of wealth enjoyed for a while by these people, must ultimately and inevitably, according to the prevalent custom of ages, the most stubborn religious habits, or slavish pusillanimity in yielding to superior authority without regarding its legitimacy, be diverted into one or all of the three following channels equally pernicious to the state:—1st. A secret hoard of treasure, set apart for the purpose of chicanery or superstition, withdrawn from the public stock of currency, never to return again into circulation, unless by violence or chance. 2d. A profuse expense to purchase dependants, or a visible or concealed train of soldiers, for the certain unequivocal purpose of subverting that government, which hath thus raised and nourished the native serpent of rebellion in its bosom: or lastly, a dangerous superfluity, which if neglected through ignorance or design to be drawn by authorized taxation, into the public coffers of the state, will most assuredly become a prey to ministerial agency, either in the way of private exaction or in purchasing remissions, privileges, and power, directly or indirectly, by corrupt influence, not otherwise to be guarded against, even in the golden age of the most virtuous societies, but in lessening or removing the evil of temptation.

Fourth.—Having shewn the nature and sources of Indian revenue, mode of raising it, and the amount collected, we shall now, agreeable to the form prescribed to ourselves in treating on the general subject of finance, pursue the grand pecuniary result of our enquiry, being a gross rental of one crore thirty lacks of rupees, ascertained to be actually levied from the country in behalf of government, through a detailed account of annual provincial disbursements, involving a plan of future expenditure, and leaving only the net, proper, or perhaps possible sum, after a deduction of every necessary local expense of administration, to answer the greater political exigencies of general superintendence.

1st.—The Kharije Jumma, or excluded rent of land assigned in freehold to certain individuals, either in the way of official, charitable, or religious donations, and therefore exempted from all public burthens for a time, or in perpetuity partially or otherwise, according to the arbitrary will of despotism as hitherto exercised, offers itself for consideration; but to comprehend clearly the nature and extent of this, with all the following heads of charges, it is necessary after the example of Toorel Mull, to fix on some definite financial divisions of country, in order to regulate the number, jurisdiction, and collections of agents employed in a chain of subordination to each other, or to the state, in due proportion to their personal capacities, or trusts reposed in them. Accordingly, we assume for data, that the whole territory is distributed into five circars under the ancient denominations, in exclusion of the sixth dismembered portion, constituting the immediate dependencies of Masulipatam, and reannexed to the neighbouring provinces, Nizamputam to Guntour, as lying south of the Kistna, and the straggling maritime pergunnahs situated north of the same river, to Condapillee, Ellore, and Rajemundry; that these five circars are subdivided into twenty zemindaries each, composed of five pergunnahs, and under the inferior jurisdiction or financial management of a desmook, rated annually and invariably for a revenue of five lacks of rupees present currency, being nearly equivalent to a crore of dauns, as fixed for similar purposes in the time of Akbar, from whence may be derived all modern dewanee institutions; that every pergunnah is subject to a chowdry or talookdar in subordination to the desmook, but in matters of account or record, wholly controlled by the despaudeah; and that in every village of which there are supposed to be in all 6,500, muccudim presides over the other ryots as chief collector, checked and assisted by a koolkurni, who keeps the public accounts, and by one or two peons on the naikwarry the crops when exposed to risque before and after partition. All which we believe to be nearly descriptive of the circumstances of the country, as in fact arranged with a few deviations in form, easy as expedient to be corrected. Then under this head, should in propriety be classed as a public charge,

1st.—Saverum, or Namcar, the freehold real estate of twenty zemindars, included within their respective territorial jurisdictions, both to give them a local attachment, and to serve as a certain independent means of subsistence, when in or out of financial employment. However proper and political it may be, thus to distribute the ordinary official appointments in land; yet it will appear rather a delicate if not a dangerous operation, without a minute historiogeographical knowledge of the country and people, for it affects three descriptions of property, as at present disposed of: (1.) The Havillee or household domains under the immediate management of the sovereign, by erecting them into new zemindaries, or incorporation with those already established, and in the neighbourhood. (2.) The overgrown possessions committed to the superintendence of the desmooks of Vizianagram, Poddapore, Muggletore, and Noozed, by reduction of local extent, to the limits actually producing according to the new or true valuation, a net revenue of five lacks of rupees. And (3.) The five tributary principalities, with all the lesser landholdings, to the number of forty; by annexation under zemindary chiefs, on the same financial scale. With respect to the former, the present wretched state of the lands, comparatively with those adjacent under different management, sufficiently point out the propriety of the proposed regulation; in regard to the second, a reform is equally just, political and necessary, especially in the instance of Vizianagram, which has been increased to a dangerous magnitude of late years, by

by suffering the desmook to usurp and engross in his own person, the territorial jurisdictions, rights, and privileges, of a number of lesser landholders; as also in the instance of Noozed, which is too extensive for single superintendence, or from situation on an open frontier, to be left wholly in the hands of any one tribe or family, particularly the present rebellious occupants: and as to the last description of property, it is not intended there should be any diminution of individual advantages rightfully enjoyed by the proposed annexations. The lesser proprietors, in losing their saverum, or being united under one zemindary chief, may be amply indemnified, by enrolment as talookdars, to be assessed invariably hereafter for a rent equivalent to the actual doul-bundobust, subject to no farther increase; and the rajahs or ancient princes of the country, will experience no additional hardship or mortification in being denied the privileges of holding their lands in capite of the superior sovereign, or continuing to pay their tributes through intermediate agency. Happily for themselves, and the public tranquillity, they have lost all sense of their former pre-eminence, or if the remembrance of it, be still engraved on their minds, or handed down by tradition, viewing as they do the deplorable condition of their ancient great feudal patriarchal lord, Birkishen Deo, actual representative of the royal family of Orissa, now reduced to beggary and a prison, by the violent tyranny of the Mahrattas, a brother Indian nation, they must exult in the benefits of a revolutionary dispensation, which, though superseding their own enfeebled dominion, derived only from equivocal, civil, hereditary rights, by the superior one of conquest, founded in nature, law, and equity, leaves them entire personal freedom, with the secure enjoyment of property on true constitutional principles, as universally admitted on a former occasion. We have stated, and here again suppose, the amount of saverum, as now distributed among the several zemindars, about 70 in number of high or low degree, henceforth reduced to 20, on an equal footing throughout all the circars, to be nearly - - - - - Rupees - - five lacks.

(2d.) Enaumal, charitable, religious, or gratuitous donations, for the support of places of public worship, the officiating priests of either Mussulman or Hindoo officers, with all the different classes of inferior magistrates and mullas, left as an useless incumbrance eventually on the country by the preceding government, and before stated at three lacks; to which might be added one third more, as an endowment for two seminaries of learning, the one to Hindoo pundits, the other, Mussulman molavies, with other public officers of both religions, highly necessary to be employed in the different departments of government, but more especially in the administration of justice. The antiquity, fame, and sanctity of the pagoda of Suimachellum, near Vizagapatam, mark the proper site for the Bramin foundation; while the magnificent mosque erected in the town of Cicacole, by Sheer Mahomed Khan, in the Hegyra year 1031, still unimpaired, indicates the fittest situation for a Madressa or Mussulman college.

Then the appropriations under this head, being - - - - - Rupees - - four lacks; together with the foregoing article of Saverum, deducted from what we shall henceforth call the corrected jumma kaumil, or complete assessment, will leave for the doul bundobust the sum of - - - - - 1 crore and 21 lacks.

2d. Khureja Mofussil, or expense of native, interior management of the collections, highly expedient, though contrary to the present practice in many instances, to be paid in money, either in the nature of a commission on the revenue, as anciently established, or by monthly stipend to the several officers employed.

- (1.) Rusoom Desmookan, or annual allowance of 5 per cent. on the net Jumma bundy, stating at one crore of rupees in gross to the 20 zemindars acting in behalf of government, as farmers general of their respective territorial jurisdictions, or to the aumeens and lesser officers, occasionally substituted in the room of the other more permanent native class of agents, when these are necessarily deprived of a temporary collectorship - - - - - Five lacks.
- (2.) Dustoor Despondian, or established commission of 2½ per cent. calculated on the same amount as the preceding charge to the chief Canongoe residing at the capital, with 100 subordinate despondials, dispersed throughout the country, one to each pergunnah, in lieu of all other emoluments, especially such fraudulent possessions in land as they may hold under the denomination of Meerassy and Bilmookta villages - - - - - 2½ lacks.
- (3.) Mushaira Koolkurnain, a monthly stipend of 6,500 Bramin accomptants, one to each village, at the rate of 100 rupees per annum each, as a compensation for all present undue advantages in land; or a proportion of the crop, called in some places Seri, being an allowance of 10 sean for every candy of grain produced at harvest time - - - - - 6½ lacks.
- (4.) Nasf Naikwarian, or half the wages of all the village peons who are permanently stationed there as peace officers, exempted from all military service, and in subordination to the muccudim, or chief ryot, to support him in his dignity, or the exercise of his civil financial employment. They are chiefly as they ought entirely to be, Mahomedans, being more orderly, better versed in rules of government, always commanding greater respect than Hindoos; and are too indolent or proud to attend to husbandry or manufactures, which might interfere with their official duties. They receive at harvest time, a bulotch of corn from the peasantry, constituting the moiety of their salary; and which, with some perquisites, in return for protection and the indulgencies in their power to bestow, render them somewhat dependant on, or conciliate their good will towards the poorer inhabitants, 6,500 peons, at $2\frac{1}{2}$ rupees each per month, as half subsistence paid to the state, will rather be less than -

(5.) Bazee Kurch, or various contingent disbursements made by, and indemnities allowed to, the zemindaries, in lieu of all expense, otherwise unprovided for; personal trouble, and risk of intermediate agency in the transfer and sale of yearly crops, including the charge of cleansing the tanks and canals, the repairs of their banks, those of rivers and causeways, under the denomination of Poolbundy; also of highways, bridges, ferry-boats, and choultries; the temporary salaries of inferior officers employed at seed-time or harvest in the Mofussil, such as the mokum, or appraisers of corn. The jerebian, or measurers of ground, and extra peons or pikes to guard the crops when cut and lying on the fields; likewise including a compensation for the possible losses which may be incurred by furnishing the ryots with tuckay or money, at 2 per cent. per mensem, to enable them to prosecute with vigour the business of cultivation, though this, of late years, by abuse and chicanery, has been rather a certain source of large benefit to the landholders, who have usually borrowed from and defrauded private individuals of a sum exceeding the necessary loans to the peasantry; and lastly, comprising a very considerable profit or allowance to the Desmook himself, to indemnify him against all casualties, risk, or uncertainty, in the transport and sale of territorial produce, until carried to market, over and above the customary acknowledgments made in money to the serross, or by participation with them in grain, for their security in teeps, or temporary advances to government in cash, before the returns of the harvest could, with the utmost advantage, be realized by a mercantile operation; and supplying every deficiency of weight in the coinage, loss of exchange, &c. expressed by the terms Kumisagon, Serf, and Batta; sources of vast speculation in the system of Indian finance, to these intermediate agents, in all, rupees five lacks; which, joined to the four preceding articles, and subtracted from the amount of the new doul bundobust, will leave a teskees jumabundy, or a net effective yearly revenue of exactly -

Rs 1 Crore.

Thirdly.—Fouje Sebandy or Monlacho, the established, indispensable native militia, to secure the stipulated revenue derived from the three yearly harvests, as expressed by the first appellation, to enforce the authority of aumildars, as understood by the second, and to maintain the public tranquillity against internal commotion or foreign invasion, agreeable to the design and use of the original institution, as inferred from the universal invariable practice of all the more civilized ancient or modern states of Hindostan. Accordingly under the Mogul empire, or lesser Mussulman governments, since raised on its ruins, the sebandy troops constitute the great effective standing force of the country. The expense is paid be all, in strict subordination to officers immediately appointed in command by the sovereign rulers, as they were indeed in form, even throughout the Northern circars, though more or less virtually, in proportion as the debility and corruption of governors yielded to the pecuniary temptation, or the restive ambition of upstart zemindars, down to the very instant which commenced the era of British administration; since which, through inadvertence or misapprehension of right and political expediency, not from any deficiency of power to exercise a legal authority, this grand palladium of an important conquered dominion has in fact been transferred from the sovereign, to a number of rebellious servants, who wait impatiently for the moment of a foreign invasion to throw off a yoke; the more galling, as it restrains their own despotism and tyranny over inferior subjects, forming the great mass of an inoffensive people. Supposing, therefore, a necessity for resuming the ancient constitutional authority of government, to control unparticipated, the existing military force in all these provinces, we shall distribute the body of soldiers, henceforth thought requisite for the business of the collections, and amounting to 20,000 men, under the two following heads, expressive of their designation or number; viz.

- (1.) SEDWARAIN, or 100 independent companies, each of a hundred Hindoo pikemen of the military tribes, subject in part to a commandant of the same order; and in part to a Mussulman, both nominated by government, one to be stationed in the capital of every pergunnah, mustered once a year, and paid through the desmook, as well as under his immediate control when acting with full powers in behalf of the state, either to attend his own person to be deputed into the several villages, occasionally to secure the harvests; assist or restrain the inferior collectors, in levying the yearly assessment imposed on the ryots. It would be in vain to attempt to confine these troops to a stated and monthly salary. Such is the force of custom, that however sufficiently in itself their pay might be made, they will constantly draw a subsistence, when employed on actual service, by the usual exaction of batta, from those persons over whom they exercise a coercive power; and which may be considered rather as a political connivance of government, to lessen the occasion of coercion, by making the means a private incumbrance, in the nature of a fine for breach of agreement: Moreover, this class of soldiers, besides the constant favour of the zemindars, to whom they must naturally have personal attachment, will be entitled to a pecuniary gratification of two annas per day each man, agreeable to local custom, whenever they are called on by the state for military services, out of the ordinary line of their duty. For all these reasons, a retaining fee, equal however to a permanent subsistence, when stationary within each respective Mofussil jurisdiction, is the utmost that, from expediency or policy, should be allowed; and then the whole corps, consisting of 10,000 men, at $3\frac{1}{2}$ rupees per month, on an average to every individual, will be maintained throughout the year, for - - - - - Rupees

Four lacks.

- (2.) HAZARIAN, or two regiments of 1,000 men each, under the command of English officers, distributed as follows; viz. Two in the circar of Guntoor, three between the river Kistna and Godaveri, one in the Rajamundry, and the remaining four to be stationed in the circar of Cicacole; but all subject to the immediate control of eight provincial interdants, covenanted servants of the Company, under the orders of one or two superintending chiefs, hereafter supposed to be vested in the management of the revenues, to support the sovereign authority, secure the collections, and check the refractory spirit of zemindars. It is from this corps that the Mataenah, or reinforcements sent to Aumildars in native Mussulman governments, are usually draughted; but it is more properly the standing militia of the country, as well to maintain internal peace, as to repel any foreign invasion, and, under a proper system of administration, very rarely employed in the financial departments. When, however, called forth into actual service, or detached to any of the zemindary districts, the men are entitled to the same additional allowance or perquisite, called batta, as hath been assigned to the Sedwanean, and therefore their ordinary pay is proportionably less than that of regular troops; but as they are from number, personal ease, imputed want of discipline, and consequent reciprocal antipathies, a very important natural check in the last-mentioned body, whose obedience could not otherwise be so confidently relied on without the controul of an European force, while they are both in use and order superior, comparatively, to the former corps of sebandies, so their pay with situation, should form a medium, and may be fixed at 5 Rs monthly each man, which, for 10,000, will be - - - - - per ann.

Six lacks.

The sum total of these two sums being then deducted from the teskees jumabundy, there will remain, for further appropriation, in the public exchequer - ninety lacks; though this amount, according to the present dangerous system of leaving the standing provincial militia in the power of naturally disaffected Hindoo subjects, would only be on a par with the net corrected settlement of the year, as in ordinary concluded with, the landholders.

4th. Khurcha Sudder, the expense of the ruling local administration, or of the capital, in contra-distinction to that of Mofussil, or the country. In like manner as we were obliged to fix on certain data, to regulate the charges already detailed, so here too, we find ourselves necessitated to suppose in great part a new establishment, which, though extremely different from the old, yet apparently is only indispensably so, to complete or carry into effect the universal reform, suggested by recurring to the true original, financial system of the Mogul empire.

(1.) General Civil Department, without premiums, to determine whether a supreme legislative authority over all the British possessions on the coast, should be vested in the native governments of Bengal or Madras; it will readily be admitted, that the exclusive power in the Northern circars should hold of the latter. Time and experience must, in like manner, evince the expediency of single magistracy in all the offices of state influencing the conduct of, or capable of being influenced and disunited by the intrigues of country now in question, is committed to the charge of two chiefs, of at least 15 years standing in the Company's service; the one resident at Masulipatam, having ordinary jurisdiction over the four southerly provinces; but in time of open war or of danger, to extend his authority to that of Chicacole, which is otherwise supposed to be subject to a superintendant of its own. These two provincial rulers to have the inspection and supreme immediate controul over, without interfering in the detail of duty assigned to any of the subordinate departments classed under the heads, Financial, Judicial or Military. They are supposed, however, to make the circuits of their districts at least once in the year, to hear complaints, redress grievances, or, in general, to enforce the municipal laws existing; to regulate the form, with the conduct of interior administration; and to give them an interest in the true politico-economical management of the revenue which must be the secondary object to commerce of every European establishment in this country, they should be paid by a commission not less than $1\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. on the net amount of the jumabundy, 8 Q bundy, which being increased to one crore of rupees, will afford them a handsome income of a lack and a half of rupees, to be divided thus:

To the chief of Masulipatam, as senior	80,000
- - - of Vizagapatam -	70,000
Further; as it may be of political consideration to make as many as possible of the servants employed in finance, interested in its administration and improvement; so one half per-cent. more on the same capital may be distributed among the inferior agents, immediately attached to the chiefships, (viz.) six assistants, with an allowance of about 600 rupees per month each, besides the expectancy of preferment hereafter to be named; two head surgeons, in receipt of 500; and as many Hindoo dewans or sherishtedars, with 400 rupees, making together, for the year, about	50,000

Or, in all, for the general Civil Establishment, a commission of two per-cent. on the annual settlement - - - - - estimated at - Two Lacks.

Second. Financial.—The regulations and divisions of this department, have already in part been anticipated. Eight intendants or collectors of the revenue, at least of seven years standing in the service, and after the first succession, as an indispensable qualification, supposed to be versed in the Persian language, if not in one or more of the native Hindoo dialects, to have the exclusive local management of the several districts as hereafter named, subject only to the supervision and control of their respective chiefs, (viz.) Four in the capitals of the four Southern circars, of which each to compose a jurisdiction, all subdivided into so many portions of country dependant on Vizagapatam Cossim Cotah. Four in the province of Chicacole, henceforth to be extending from Rajemundry to the river of Boai or Bimlipatam, northerly, will form the first; Vizianagram, from thence to the Gurry Ghuda, or river of Handiriba, the ancient boundary towards the dependencies of Viekaram Deco, and the actual one of the Havillee lands, will constitute the second; Chicacole, to the river Peondy, inclusive of the three principalities of Nundepore, Kimmedy, and Teckaly, to make the third; and Ganjam, or Ichapour, as formerly, to remain the fourth collectorships. All these intendants, as mutual checks on each others management, and the better to be qualified for the two higher departments, to which they should have a certain prospect of succeeding according to respective adjudged merits, may be supposed locally interchanged among themselves every two years, and entitled to a commission equally distributed, of three per cent. on the annual jumabundy, which will afford an immediate income, capable perhaps largely to be increased, of 37,500 rupees to each individual per annum, or in toto 3,00,000. But in a country where health and life are so precarious, it may be necessary to provide for the vacancy of such important offices as have been now described, as well as to ensure their active zealous discharge, by the appointment and actual presence on the spot, of an apparent successor, who might also participate the burthen of inferior duties, such as superintendence of adawluts, payment of the sebundy corps, &c. and thus become qualified by local residence, with gradual initiation in the business of revenue, to occupy eventually, as principal, or locum tenens, the post of intendant. The situation and functions of these provincial agents, supposed eight in number, would answer more nearly to the kotel of the Moguls, under Tamerlane, than the Naib nabob, or deputy of Hindostan, which, by a strange perversion of language in modern times, is made to signify a prince with regal prerogatives, when applied to Mussulman delegates, but is used rather as a term of reproach, in the designation of Europeans. Whatever denomination may be given to such a description of officers, being at least five years in the country, and acting two more, as probationers in finance, they may be deemed competent to succeed to a collectorship, the certain prospect of which might, in the mean time, reconcile them to the otherwise inadequate subsistence requisite for the eight intendants, being ensured in the succession to the kotelain, might be contented with an income of 5,000 rupees, making together, one per cent. on the estimated revenue, or 1,00,000; and reckoning one half per cent. more to be divided among eight surgeons, at the rate of about 320 rupees monthly to each, with 200 rupees to as many dewans, attached to the several provincial establishments; then the whole expense of the proper financial department, will be $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. commission on one crore, or four and half lacks.

Third. Judicial.—The charge necessary to be provided for under this head, is already actually incurred without any benefit to the state. All the petty officers employed in the Mussulman courts are still existing, enjoy emoluments of land in lieu of salary, but have been exonerated from all public duty, since the era of the Company's territorial administration; and what may appear incredible to foreign civilized nations, no effective, regular, or formal judicial system, has been substituted in the room of that, which, for seventeen successive years, hath been virtually suspended throughout all the circars. Nevertheless, in criminal cases, the maxims of law and policy introduced by the Moguls, and followed down to the period of British rule, have exercised, despotically and uncontrouled, the powers of civil magistracy, in punishing with death, dismemberment of limbs, or slavish personal labour; yet such is the habitual submissive indifference of the Hindoos, that whatever acts of cruelty or oppression have been, or may be, committed under the single arbitrary will of natives in office, no complaints can ever be expected to be brought forward against them by that people, though the same may not be altogether the case, with respect to the less timid Mahomedans, or such other classes of individuals as have, by an intercourse with Europeans, acquired a greater or lesser spirit of freedom. It is, however, only consistent with Christian humanity, and liberal enlarged notions of civil jurisprudence, to rescind the more indigent, useful, docile, and numerous body of inhabitants, from the tyranny of uncertain law, or rather the yoke of brutal slavery, imposed by a race of the most ignorant, violent despots, known by the imposing nominal distinctions of Rajabs, or native landholders; and as they are supposed to be under their own ordinations, as handed down in the Mussulman or Indian codes formally, let them be so virtually and invariably, according to the letter and spirit of the text, as interpreted by enlightened judges presiding over regularly instituted courts, subject to the controul of the sovereign authority, but not wholly to be at the mercy of the single capricious will of depraved and generally illiterate fellow-subjects, in zemindary offices. When such a reform takes place, then will be seen re-established, and as before, predominant, the sadder cutcherry adawlut of the Mahomedans, tempered by the lenient influence of superior British administration.

It might be attended with some extraordinary expense, as pageantry is the very soul of every Oriental government, commanding due respect both at home and abroad, if, in the circars, the charge were not already amply provided for, besides the subsistence of land allowed to the lesser officers, in a pension of a lack of rupees continued gratuitously, and at present worse than uselessly, to the family of Hussein Ali Khan, the last amildar appointed under the Nizam's authority. That the actual representative of this man, should be wholly united in his own person, to execute the honorary, consequential, judicial employment henceforth to be conferred on him, in order to relieve himself from the reproach of eating the bread of idleness, and the public from the burden of furnishing it, is no more than what occurs in all the greater and lesser departments of perhaps every existing native government of Hindostan; with the whole train of inferior agents judiciously selected, and requiring only small allowances, are every where the real effective instruments; while the principal, in almost every instance, is the most pageant drone of state. As it is chiefly to curb the licentious depravity of the lower classes of foreigners of every denomination, native mariners, and mongrel Christians or Mahomedans inhabiting or itinerant on the sea coasts, and unrestrained in their conduct either by religion or morality, that the exercise of a high criminal judicature is more particularly wanting; so, one supreme court at Masulipatam, with another subordinate to it at Vizagapatam, under the immediate control of the two chiefs of these places, would be all that is necessary, while in civil disputes the superintendents of the Dewanny Adawluts might be referred to, when the more ordinary simple mode of arbitration through the cauzy molaries, pundits, or others, proved dissatisfactory. The expense of such an institution is, as hath been observed, already largely provided for in the pension continued to the sons of Hussein Ali, who will most assuredly think the trouble to be imposed on them, amply repaid in honour and consequence, without requiring any additional pecuniary emolument to that which they possess from the Company's hitherto unmerited bounty annually, of - - - - - rupees one lack.

4th. Military.—Considering the great establishment of troops allowed already under the head of sebundy, more might be thought useless for internal defence; but a standing regular force for the same purpose, seems also necessary, either to garrison the principal forts, or to keep in perfect obedience and awe, the most turbulent of the natives, as well as the whole militia of the country. The number and expense of the disciplined corps actually stationed in the circars, might be the same in future (viz.) 200 effective Europeans, trained to the use of artillery, with two battalions of 750 seapoys each, for the garrison of Masulipatam; two battalions of the latter, in cantonments at Ellore, and the like number equally divided between Vizagapatam and Ganjam, in readiness for service. The body of seapoy infantry, however, thus amounting to 4,500, instead of being raised on the spot, dispersed as usual in the business of the collections, attached to the soil, unruly, undisciplined, and under the influence of the zemindars, should be altogether drawn from the Carnatic, and if possible, composed of that class of soldiers born and bred in our own camps, under the denomination of Pariahs. These are held in abomination by, and never incorporated with, the other casts, and have therefore a mutual antipathy to each other, which might be of use to subjecting both to the rule of a foreign government; while the indiscriminate use of animal and vegetable dier, renders them in every respect the fittest to follow the military profession, as they can never be in danger, while they can otherwise keep the field, of being famished for want of provisions, like the more scrupulous warlike tribe of Rajepoots, who live chiefly on rice. Allowing an expense, as now incurred under this head, inclusive of hospital charges, the amount per annum will be about - - - - - rupees six and half lacks.

5th. Fortifications.—To determine the disbursements necessary to be made for these, it may be proper to describe their situation and number.

Inmicondah, in the province of Guntour, on the frontiers of the Carnatic Payengaut, towards Kerpah; and Condapiller, the capital of the circar of the same name, on the confines of the Nizam's territory of Commamet, are both fortified hills in the old Indian style, of great strength and extent, serving as places of rendezvous for the militia, or as an asylum for the inhabitants, in case of an invasion, and forming at the same time, very important outposts, capable of being defended each by a hundred men, against an army of thousands; for the security of treasure or stores, as well as to stop the progress of an enemy. Ganjam, near the northern extremity of the circars, on the sea coast, but beyond the reach of annoyance from shipping, is a small pentagon fort, on plain ground, which, with a garrison of one thousand men, ably commanded, and tolerably provided with ammunition and provisions, might hold out a regular siege for a month, even against a formidable armament, and might defy for ever any Indian force likely to be brought against it. But Masulipatam is the grand, and, with a few improvements, may be termed, inexpugnable bulwark of the circars, supposing it well furnished, and resolutely defended by 5,000 troops, such as may be drawn in two days from the regular or irregular military corps in the neighbourhood. It is nearly of an oblong figure, 800 yards by 600, situated in the midst of salt morass, close to an inlet or canal, which, opening a communication with the sea and the Kistna, enlarges the means of defence, without exposing the works to an immediate naval attack, as no ships can come within the reach of cannon shot, nor can any approaches be made on the land side, unless between the north and east points of the compass, and from the month of December to May. It was from the last-mentioned quarter, favoured by a cluster of sand hills on the beach, at the distance of 800 yards, that Colonel Forde attacked and carried the place; but the present excellent wet ditch which surrounds it, had not then entirely been formed: still, however, the defences on this side are incomplete. The bastions are too far asunder. The rampart is too low, and not thick enough to admit of an occasional battery to be opened from the curtains; while the revetment is too slender to bear any additional weight of earth, by greater height or breadth. After all, notwithstanding the advantage of a very extensive area, a few casemats might be necessary to shelter the troops within, and a counter exterior ditch, similar to that now used as a navigable canal on the west side of the fort, would be of vast importance on the east, especially as by the excavation, with ease and little expense, could be formed a proper glacis, which is very much wanted. These different works, together with the ordinary charge of all the fortifications, interior buildings, mounting artillery, magazines, &c. may be stated, on a medium of years, annually at, Rupees ————— one lack.

Which, with all the preceding charges, civil, financial, judicial, and military, make the total of Sudder expenses ————— fifteen lacks.

Leaving a clear net balance in the public treasury, of, rupees ————— seventy-five lacks.

But if to these several articles of disbursements be added, 6th. Pecuniary gratuity, or acknowledgment, conditionally to be paid to the present Nizam, and amounting to rupees, annual, of ————— seven lacks; inclusive of two lacks, or the reversionary possession of Guntour, in consequence of the death of Bazalut Jung*; then the actual receipts of the Company's exchequer, or free yearly income of all the Northern circars, after deduction of every ordinary expense necessary to be incurred, will be reduced to, rupees ————— sixty-eight lacks.

It is not however to be imagined, that the whole of this sum can be withdrawn from the general circulation, and remitted as an annual tribute in specie to the superior government of Fort St. George, although it falls rather short of the supposed revolving gain, on a balance of trade, within the same tract of country and period of time; thirty lacks of the amount, have been assigned for the commercial exports to Europe, which are indispensably necessary to support or realize the estimated territorial revenue, and as the English pay their proportion of the investment from the landed income of the circars, while foreigners alone can be expected to furnish bullion, so the share of either, must be ascertained in order to determine the surplus of cash that may be sent to the Presidency, without any injurious diminution of the provincial currency. If, as hath been already observed, half of all the cotton-manufactured cloths made in the course of the year for European markets, have ever reached England, such instances have been extremely rare; most frequently, the proportion has not exceeded a quarter; and we are sure of being within bound, in stating the annual medium of the Company's commerce for the last seventeen years, at ten lacks of rupees, or one-third of the whole estimated produce. The remainder, unequally divided between the Dutch, French, Danes and Portuguese, through the inability or disinclination of the English to increase their own investment, hath been so far beneficial to the country, in having brought into it an equivalent in specie, excepting a very small amount imported by the agents of the former nation for home consumption in spices and copper. It may be true that the greater part of the sum requisite for the provision of goods thus allotted to reigners, was furnished from the settlements of Madras and Bengal, as affording a means of remittance to England for the fortunes of individuals there; but the advantage hath been in effect the same, in keeping up the revenues and manufactures of the circars.

A very

* At the end of the Fussilee year 1189, when the Nizam took possession of the Guntour circar, there was due to him, on balance from the Company, on account of his annual stipend of five lacks of rupees, calculated exactly to the 1st of October 1780, the sum of 14,24,333 rupees. For the two following years, until the period of Bazalut Jung's death, in October 1782, ten lacks more should be added to this debt; but from the aggregate of both sums is to be deducted a demand of current pagodas 63,438, or rupees 2,22,038 on the Company, for stores, &c. furnished for the defence of Guntour, to be repaid from the yearly revenue, and then the net amount owing to the Nizam will be 22,02,300 rupees. Now, as the rents in the circar in question (being, according to the jumma kamil or standard assessment, about 12 lacks per annum) forming a mean between the jumma bundy and gues collections, were actually levied by and realized to his highness for the same period of two years, through the Company's favour in withdrawing their troops, with only a deduction of two lacks, paid in all that time to Bazalut Jung; so it may be said, that the Nizam's debt hath already been more than deservedly liquidated. But supposing the revenue of these two years gratuitously given up, on the ground that it is properly an affair to be settled between the son, successor of the nabob of Adoni, and his uncle, then, as a difference of five lacks arises yearly against the Nizam while in possession of Guntour, after his brother's demise, on a comparison of the valued rent of the circar, with the pecuniary gratuity to be paid by the Company in October 1784, only a balance of about twelve lacks, agreeable to the letter of the treaty of 1768, would remain due; and in the beginning of 1786, the whole debt must be virtually and absolutely cancelled, entailing thenceforth a peshcush of five lacks per annum on his highness, to be accounted for with the honourable Company.

A very important question here suggests itself, as to the policy or probable efficacy of the late Act of Parliament, in restraining British subjects in India from giving such pecuniary or mercantile supplies to other European nations, even when our Company (for there is no promissory clause) cannot purchase cargoes for their proper ships, or will not accept the means of doing it, on terms of mutual convenience from their servants abroad, who with the loss of health, and the labour of many years, may have acquired a very disproportionate compensation in personal wealth, which they are anxious to realize at home, and thus accumulate the general stock of national riches. Our laws, we are taught to consider as the perfection of reason, and, therefore, must in every instance, command due respect; and certainly the one now under consideration, was adopted by the legislature on principles as pure, as the limitations and objects might have appeared laudable, to the original advisers, for whose benefit it was no doubt intended, by obliging foreigners to bring bullion into the country, or contract the scale of their commerce, with the view of lessening the competition of sales in Europe. But if its wisdom or general good be not apparent, and universally acknowledged within the sphere of its operation; if it should be deemed illiberal and impolitic with respect to the other nations, as imposing an invidious, unprofitable restriction on their trade, which may provoke a retaliation in the way of farther prohibitions in receiving the re-exports of Great Britain; and especially, if it be found to militate against the private interests, ports of Great Britain; and especially, if it be found to militate against the private interests, natural views, and reasonable claim of a whole society of necessary agents in a remote corner of the world, some of whom are to enforce its execution as a legal check upon all, then we might venture to foretel, that it will in the first place, be evaded, and in the next, become obsolete or wholly disregarded, until finally expunged from our Statute Books, on the same principles as lately brought about the repeal of some other penal laws, antiquated and dormant. Indeed, from the glaring ineffectual provisions of the present act, to accomplish its apparent purpose, it may perhaps have been intended to be classed among the number of those recently made for the government of this country, acknowledged by the framers themselves to be proposed only for temporary expedience, or by way of experiment, until the lights of time, with a more perfect understanding of facts and local circumstances, evince the propriety, or the reverse, of giving them further stability. The truth is, so many openings occur for evasion, that this or any similar law must prove altogether nugatory, unless it can be first made manifest to ordinary comprehension, that more benefit will accrue to the State and individuals, from its actual operation, than virtual suspension; at the same time, that any loans in money, transfer of merchandize, or credit by bills to foreigners is interdicted to British subjects residing in India, the whole scope of such mercantile intercourse is left open to those individuals, who after having acquired fortunes here, have returned to Europe, and are willing to realize their wealth at home, by giving draughts on their agents abroad, in favour of adventurers of other nations; and while the prohibition of supplying goods extends only to European traders, without any immediate or indirect connection among themselves, the intelligent Hindoo may step in as mediator, in the capacity of merchant or broker, and administer to the wants of both: nay, it seems a matter of legal uncertainty, whether there may not be a direct communication between the principals, in the way of respondentia loans or bottomry payment of money for bills of exchange on Europe, and sales of merchandize by public auction, or from open warehouses in authorized markets, where a discrimination cannot be made of the nation, character, or employers of the buyers. Such being the presumed errors in the principle, and deficiencies in the provisions of the Act here alluded to, as to authorize anticipation of its speedy repeal, and supposing at the same time a change in the Company's policy, by which their servants abroad will be permitted to remit private fortunes through their proper always preferable channel; then we might venture with political certainty, to estimate the future proportion of English investment to be provided in the circars at eighteen lacks of rupees annually, and out of the balance of fifty lacks which after that deduction, would still remain unappropriated in the public exchequer from the current revenue, four-fifths might constantly, with the utmost safety, convenience and expediency, be remitted in specie or in grain, as the yearly tribute of the dependent provinces to the protecting superior government of Fort St. George.

TO conclude this division of our subject relative to Finance, in general it may be observed, that nothing is more easy, just, or necessary, than to reduce to universal practice, and give full effect to the whole system, as here rudely sketched in all its parts. It is only simply recurring to the ancient institutions of the country, following their order and spirit in the establishment or definition of the civil rights of persons and of things, as connected with revenue. These institutions, universally acknowledged to be founded in policy, moderation and equity, are deeply engraved on the minds of the more enlightened natives, revered by a great majority of the commonalty; and in their scope, design, and tendency, are manifestly calculated for the good of all, by enlarging or securing, according to a fixed inviolable, equitable standard, the tenures of real or personal property, immunities, privileges, with the recompence of bodily labour, to be enjoyed by the more useful classes of society employed in agriculture or manufactures; by realizing to the zemindars or intermediate land holders to their utmost legal extent, certain supposed rights and advantages hitherto equivocal, indefinite, and precariously attached, agreeable to the capricious will of ruling despots, to their respective offices of receivers or farmers general of the rents, and reserving only for the sovereign the bare rightful, indubitable, legal dues indispensably necessary to the most economical scale, for the support of the best, most lenient, and in true ingenious belief, acceptable government, to the great mass of the people, comparatively with any of the past or still existing states to be found throughout the wide extending realms of Asiatic dominion.

Final observations.

RELATIVE POWER.

RELATIVE POWER.

The great political importance of the Northern circars is not alone to be estimated by the intrinsic or relative value of territory on the foundations of revenue and commerce, but must always depend, more or less, on comparative power, which, by way of contra-distinction may be termed contingent, worth only to be determined by ascertaining the facility with internal means of defence, either natural or artificial, joined to collateral aids, easily derived however from the superior neighbouring settlements, in virtue of a fortunately central position, the whole calculated on a comparison with the power, situation, and circumstances of surrounding states, or such as are likely to act offensively. We have already exhibited in some detail, though irregularly, the proper interior resources of the country, and shall again occasionally touch on them, as well as bring to view the nature and extent of extraneous assistance alluded to; but more particularly in this place, it is our intention to take a short political survey of the nations around, naturally inimical to, and capable of annoying the circars, in order to form a sufficient accurate idea of the effective force of these, compared with the probable occasions of resistance in the event of a foreign invasion, thence deducing the real permanent security of territorial possession.

First.—The Rudra &c.

First.—The rudely formed aristocratical republic of the Marhattas occurs. Under the most comprehensive description, their dominions may be said to extend from east to west on the parallel of $21\frac{1}{2}$ degrees north lat. from Piply on the Soobaurecka falling into the Bay of Bengal to Broach, towards the mouth of the Nerbudda, in the gulph of Cambay, stretching full 16 degrees of longitude across the Peninsula, and from south to north near the meridian of Cape Comorin, or about 77° east long. from the forks of the Kistna, to Kalpee, on the banks of the Jamna, ten degrees of latitude, consisting of the soubahs of the Jugeral, Malwa and Khandees : two-thirds of that of Aurungabad, one half of Bejapoor, as conquered by the Moguls : an equal portion of Berar, of Beder, and of Orissa, with a few pergunnaahs of Allahabad and Agra ; the whole comprising an area of about 260,000* square geographic miles, yielding a yearly income, at the utmost calculation, with chout from neighbouring states, of four and a half krore of rupees. But of this, the share allotted to the Koking Bramin empire of Poonah, raised on the ruins of that of Sattarah, in 1750, on the death of the 2d Sahoojee Bhosla of the Sunker Keltery tribes, together with the jageer and almost independent inheritances of a great number of inferior chiefs, all of the former race, and therefore acknowledging the Peshwa as their head, situated at the distance of 500 miles from the circars, beyond the territory of Nizam Ali, does not actually exceed one half. The other moiety of country and revenue is divided between rulers of a different cast, who have virtually dominions, views, and interests wholly distinct, alien, often hostile to their nominal sovereign, and can scarcely ever be united in the same causes. Of these, Futty Sing Guicawar, a Marhattah Rajepoot, enjoys a third of the soubah of Gujerat ; Scindea claiming descent from the same tribe, and Holcar, of the Cutteacur Sooder, or fourth class, divide between them almost equally, Mulwa and Khandees, with the recent addition of some of the pergunnaahs of Agra, conquered by the former, and Moodajec Bhosla, a branch of the depressed family of Sattarah, under the nominal designation of samaputty, or commander in chief of the Marhattah armies, rules in the name of his son Ragoojee, in full sovereignty, one half of Berar ; and collects to a muckassa or tribute from the Nizam of a moiety of the rental of the other half is in possession, in violation of the English rights, of an equal portion of Orissa ; pre-tends to a kind of feudal superiority over a part of Gundwannan called Gurrah, lying to the north of the Nerbudda, heretofore annexed to Malwa, and forming the inheritance of Nizam and Boorham Shah, together with that of the districts of Rutteeppoor or Chateesgur, as also their dependencies of Sunblireppoor, &c. making part of Jehar Cuad, or the jungly country of Bundoor Battah, united by Alungeer to the soubah of Allahabad, and more recently seized as a free conquest by Bembajec, the younger brother of Moodajec.

Among these greater chieftains, denominated of the same nation, it is alone the dominions of the last mentioned, that have the smallest connection with the Northern circars. The superficial contents of the whole country may be computed at 60,000 square miles, and thinly inhabited, producing a revenue of one crore of rupees, which is sufficient to maintain a body of 20,000 horse of every kind; and yet, in time of peace, from the extreme of Hindoo parsimony, add a surplus of 50 lacks yearly to the hoarded treasure. But of this territory, it is only the division of Orissa, or Cuttack, that immediately borders on and touches any part of the British possessions. This province, at the distance of 600 miles from the capital of Nagpore, extends along the sea-coast in the Bay of Bengal, about 200 miles from Malond, the northern boundary of Ganjam, on the Chilca lake, to Pibley, at the mouth of the Soobanreeka; the southern limits of Midaapore, dependant on Bengal, and on a medium being about 40 miles inland, should comprise an area of 80,000 square miles, yielding from a hustabood, in the beginning of the present century, 22,58,000 rupees, including

• There being no correct map of Hindostan, or of any of its states, excepting the British possessions, it is impossible to specify with accuracy the square contents, taking however the whole country as laid down by European geographers at 1,116,900 square miles, and with greater precision allowing to the Deccan south of the rivers Nerbuddah and Mahanuddy, and circumscribed by the ocean on all its other sides, an area of 410,000 square miles, we have endeavoured to allot to each subdivision of territory described, its portion of superficial measure, which though perhaps not very correct in itself, may yet be sufficiently so for purposes of political arithmetic, to compare the extent of one state with that of another.

N.B. All the Marbathian dominions collectively, are rather of greater extent than the republic of Poland, before its late dismemberment, and with all its feudatory dependencies of Prussia, Courland, &c.

a net jummahbundy of 13,94,522, lately increased to sixteen lacks, of which one half is remitted as a yearly tribute to Moodajee, after defraying the expense of a military establishment of 5,000 horse, besides the ordinary seabundy and charges of civil government. It is divided almost in equal portions from west to east, by the great river Mahanuddy, which, taking its rise in latitude 22° north, among the hills separating Khandess from Berar, and after running a course east southerly of 700 miles, empties itself at False Point, or Coojung, in 20½° North latitude, 50 miles east of the provincial capital, passing close on the north side to the walls of Barrowbutty, its oblong square indefensible citadel, of 12 tower bastions. Besides the disadvantage which Cuttack labours under in being so remotely detached from the central force of government, it is wholly and absolutely cut off from Berar on the west by the districts of Jehareund, under the dominion of Bencut, on this side its frontier, from Goomsur, the most northerly point of the dependencies of Ganjam, to Gongapoor, near the southern extreme of Chutea. Nagpore, subject to Bengal, does not exceed 150 miles. In that whole extent, however, along a mountainous, barbarous, unhealthy tract of country, there are scarcely three passes which can be termed practicable for an army; while Coppertongee, the easiest or most frequented, leading to the banks of the Mahanuddy, could not admit, as generally described, of a passage for any wheel-carriages. But if troops be once introduced into the province, a double frontier on either side towards the British dominions, of at least 300 miles, is for the most part wholly defenceless, and exposed to depredation; so that however paradoxical the proposition may seem, yet, in the present case, it is demonstratively true, that to realize by possession, and extend our territorial rights over that portion of Orissa which now very inconveniently interrupts the land communication between Bengal and the circars, would literally in fact lessen the necessary line of defence against the attack of a neighbouring enemy: nevertheless, as hath been already observed, on the side of Ganjam an invasion is never to be apprehended from the Marbattahs, though they have found means improperly to possess themselves of some of the gunnahs lying to the south of the natural barrier of Manickpatam, on the tongue of land between the sea and Chilca, at the same time that this lake, narrowed to a point by the boundary northern hills of Cicacole, widens and extends forty miles towards the centre of Cuttack, laying the whole country open to an attack by water from the English settlements.

Though in general description it might be observed, and from local ignorance pass all settlements. Goondwannan imperfectly re-noticed, that the two provinces of Deogur and Chanda in Goondwannan Moodajee, form duced, and annexed to Berar by the emperor Alemgeer, now governed by the north-west side of actually an adjoining foreign frontier, as running parallel inland to the north-west side of the circars of Chicacole and Rajemundry, and having no formidable well known state between, yet in the present estimate of relative power inherent in the British territories, we cannot punitively with those around naturally inimical or capable of the remark. The intermediate admit of the geographical precision or political justness of the remark. The intermediate space parting these collateral districts, and which may very properly in future be called Je-hareund, though that name hitherto hath been exclusively applied to Chateesgur, &c. running in the same direction north of Mahomeddy, forms not only by nature an insurmountable barrier against invasions from either side, but is inhabited by a warlike savage race of aboriginal Hindoos under their native princes, for the most part perfectly independent. The whole country equally mountainous, poor, ill watered, unhealthy, and thinly peopled, extends in length, from the last-mentioned river to the Godaveri, in a line, nearly south-west, 200 miles, and in breadth, from the conquered plains of Chicacole, &c. westerly to the nearest ascertained limits of Berar, on a medium very little if at all short, of eighty; thus comprehending an area of 16,000* square miles. It is usually described as divided longitudinally by seven high, impassable ranges of hills, forming a great number of valleys, under their respective chieftains of the Warrior, Coywar, or Gondwannah tribe, all of the Rajepoot or Kheteri cast, among which, those of Kulahindi, Bustar, and Rumpa, entirely free towards the frontier of the Marhattas, and of Kimeddy, Nundapore, Golgonda, and Cottapillee, partially subjected to the English government, are the most considerable. The revenue is chiefly paid in kind, and cannot exceed in the gross, by any tolerable well-founded calculation, fifteen lacks of rupees, for besides that, the commonalty are uncivilized, indolent, and stupid, being very much afflicted with those wens of the throat, called goitres in Europe, they carry on little or no commerce, and lands so elevated, in the more sterile regions are but in small part watered by the Siffry, the only river proper to the country, and which taking its rise from an inland chilca or lake, as pretty correctly laid down by D'Anville, in the districts of Kulahindi, unites with the Godaveri, about 20 coss higher up than Polaveram, between Rumpa and Rahapillee, after having traversed the principal valley of Bustar. The people in general, although rude and barbarous, may yet be denominated warlike, as they have always distinguished themselves bold persevering champions of the great law of nature. Being driven to their wild unwholesome fastness, among the mountains, they frequently descend in harvest time, into the low lands, to dispute the produce of their ancient rightful inheritance with the present possessors, but their incursions are desultory and simply impelled, by the pressing want of subsistence; for as the sea air is as fatal to their temperament, as that of the hills is to the inhabitants of the neighbouring plains, the idea of a permanent conquest, even if they could conceive a possibility of effecting it, would be as foreign to their purpose as, on the counterpart, it is to be exploded by a civilized state, as inhuman, ungenerous, and unprofitable.

Collateral Territory of the Carnatic.

To stem such a torrent of power as might from this quarter, overwhelm the little territory of Guntoor, besides the provincial resources, a collateral aid here presents itself, in the neighbouring British dependencies of the Carnatic Payengaut. This maritime country, extending in length 600 miles from the banks of the Kistna to Cape Comorin, these considerably outstretching the bordering frontier of Mysore, is yet in its greatest breadth, from Madras on the sea coast to Vellore, westerly, near the foot of the Gauts, no more than 90 miles; and therefore, in all its dimensions, including the rajé of Tanjore, cannot contain

In a long series of political mistakes, or rather by the artful connivance, chicanery, and intrigue, so peculiarly characteristic of Mahomedan ministry, under the incongruous form, with the corrupt influence of a double government, from the surrender of the nabut or nabobship of the Carnatic, to the actual occupant in 1763, after wresting it from the French in a contest of 15 years, with a larger waste of British blood and treasure, down to Ali, by the same powerful arm and means; it has happened that no military establishment, effective and sufficient for the purposes of defence, always obligatory, was ever fixed on, with certain pre-existent provision for its maintenance, to be drawn from the ample natural resources of the protected dominion; and such is the complexion, the delicacy of our situation with Mahomed Ali, raised to princely importance, by the intercourse, countenance and favour of a high and most glorious sovereign, that, during the former's life, perhaps, more than a suitable necessary supply to remedy so glaringly inconvenient a deficiency in the political system of the coast, can now be openly contended for. So much, however, is expedient, indispensable, though greatly short of undoubted civil right, in law and equity; and accordingly we shall take the liberty, by anticipation, of specifying the supposed force requisite in future, for interior defence. 30,000 sebandies are the least that can be employed in so large a tract of territory, to secure the public peace and collections. They already exist, and only require being commanded and tolerably disciplined by English officers, to be equal to twice the number under native leaders, who have hitherto exclusively benefited by the institution or use of a great standing militia; 2,000 European infantry, 1,000 artillery, 4,000 Mogul cavalry, and 10,000 sepoys; in all 17,000 regular troops, to be formed, after providing exclusively 1,500 British soldiers for the garrisons of Fort St. George, Vellore, and Trichinopoly, into equal divisions or legions; the one, stationary, and in cantonments in the neighbourhood of Trincomaly; the other, also collected in a state preparatory for field operations, without incurring any extraordinary expense, somewhere about the northern fortified port of Nellore. To judge experimentally of the efficacy of such a force, which is very little if at all greater than what is already really or nominally entertained, though otherwise distributed and unequipped, to keep in check the most formidable native power actually existing in Hindostan, even supposing it miraculously hereafter to acquire a double strength, contrary to its present rapid progress in declension, we have only to recall to memory the decisive victory of Porto Novo, with the circumstances that will for ever mark its glory in the annals of Britain. Hyder, a wonderful man, made for conquest and to rule, having perfected a great natural genius for tactics in an European art, having raised himself by superior talents, from the meanest condition to be the sovereign of a kingdom, tripled its magnitude by an uninterrupted career of success and conquest; in a period of twenty years, selected or formed a great number of ministers and generals; trained on the parade, and exercised in the field, by continued military exploits, a long standing army, chiefly cavalry; and from the resources of universal rapine, with the ordinary accumulated revenue of an extensive empire, having completed with infinite diligence and foresight, his vast warlike preparations for premeditated invasion of the Payengaut, he availed himself, in the spirit of true political wisdom, perverted by the madness of ambition, of the fleeting moment when his own fame, military strength and means of supporting a war were greatest, while his opponents were to be distracted at home, threatened from abroad, with scattered forces, an exhausted treasury, destitute of all the requisites for offensive or defensive operations, to rush like a torrent into the lower Carnatic, with a hundred thousand veteran soldiers, including 700 Europeans, under an approved personally hostile leader. He swept every thing before him; the devastation and terror were universal; and having cut off one-third of the opposing army, before a junction had been effected with the main body, in all the pride of triumph, flushed with victory, he turned his arms against the remainder, as if with certainty of success, while supposed to be dispirited with an unexpected loss. The event proved what a phalanx of European and native troops, even inferior in number to one of our proposed legions, can do, under the greatest possible disadvantages, when disciplined and commanded by British officers, against a host of Indian foes, outnumbing the former twelve to one, favoured by every circumstance which can at any time combine, to render such an enemy relatively powerful.

* Equal, in every respect, to all the scattered dominions of his Prussian majesty, including the electorate of Brandenburg, Prussia Royal, and Ducal Silesia, Magdeburg &c. &c. &c.

But though the northern circars may thus be completely secured against the attacks of native inland enemies, along an accessible coast of 470 miles they may be said to be every where exposed to the maritime invasion of an European force, and more particularly the French, as the most ambitious, enterprising, and formidable nation, notwithstanding that article of the treaty of Paris in 1763, which puts the coast of Orissa with Cuttack as far south as Yanam, on the Godavery, its ancient boundary, on the same footing as our other possessions of Bengal. It would be unnecessary to describe the various resources or means of offence within reach of this people, to execute such a purpose, did we think ourselves equal to the task; and we should feel no sentiment of pose, did we think ourselves equal to the task; and we should feel no sentiment of exultation, in contrasting that decided superiority of the British navy, manifested in the course of the last war, as an eternal insuperable bar to inimical success. Suffice it to observe, that if Great Britain, torn by faction, and deprived of half its wonted energy at home; embarrassed by the unruliness of a sister kingdom, and dismembered of its colonies, could, with so much glory, maintain the empire of the sea, in a long and bloody conflict against the united efforts of all America, France, Spain, and Holland, with an armed equivocal neutrality of the rest of Europe, a combination of political strength, perhaps unparalleled in the annals of the world, as opposed to a single unsupported state! it is not to be supposed that any one power, making only part of that incongruous union, will dare to attempt, or can effect, what the whole found themselves unequal to, even after the object was determined on, under the most inviting circumstances to try its attainment. Yet admitting, for a moment, the worst that can possibly happen, and that the French, after gaining a superiority on the natural element of insular dominion, could effect the landing of an armament of five thousand, or more European troops, intended for the conquest of the circars; cut off, as the invaders must be, from any intercourse with either of the neighbouring interior powers; unassisted by the native militia of the country, and internal resources of money or provisions: when these means of defence are, as they ought to be, taken out of the hands of traitorous, rebellious zemindars, and lodged with the protected sovereign, perhaps the provincial force of 30,000 men, under any description, with forts, natural barriers of hills, rivers, and woods, would be more than sufficient to repel the invasion; if not, the collateral aid of a Carnatic legion, in itself, almost equal to the like number of disciplined Europeans, from Nellore, is at hand; and should both resources fail, still the great superintending government of Bengal is near enough, and otherwise conveniently situated, to furnish an immediate auxiliary reinforcement.

It would convey a very inadequate idea of the intrinsic, or relative importance of this vast body of the British empire in India, with its immediate dependencies, to state its form, by giving reality to a thing heretofore imaginary, as resembling a horn of plenty*, extending from its apex in lat. 30° North in the Servalic in Camaron hills, where the Gauges first enters the plains of Hindostan, and thence, in a curvature of a thousand miles, in a south-east direction, constitutes the bay of Bengal, after traversing 14 degrees of longitude, and then pouring forth immense territorial or manufactured riches, through a hundred navigable channels, into the boundless southern ocean. To describe its square dimensions to be 170,000[†] geographic miles, or longitudinal extent of the immediate dominion of the English alone, as stretching ten and half degrees on the parallel of 25° North, from the western limits of Benares to Cossipoor, on the eastern frontiers of Sylhet, within 300[‡] geographical miles of Calcutta; still less would in China, being nearly equal to the distance of Ganjam from Calcutta; still less would the statement of an effective yearly revenue of six crore of rupees, of which four and an half, may enter the Company's treasury, serve to give a competent idea of the prodigious resources of this invaluable country; for, besides defalcations and unconstitutional alienations of territory, so highly proper at all times, but indispensably necessary henceforth to be resumed, who can estimate the value of public credit, now so successfully introduced, and firmly established in the East, yet exclusively enjoyed by the English? while neighbouring states are compelled to hoard up the current specie, exhaust the veins of circulation, and thereby ruin commerce, solely in the view of carrying on a desultory languid war, the length of which, together with the scope of its operations, may be calculated to a minute precision. It is only by distant analogy, then, that even a tolerable guess may be formed on this subject. Great Britain, in Europe, on the strength of public credit, hath maintained a war eventually universal, from the year 1778, until its close in 1782, against the most formidable combinations of foes that perhaps ever were united against any single state in the western hemisphere; and besides the disbursements of an unappropriated revenue of five millions, a debt, funded or unfunded, of near 80 millions sterling more has been incurred, being about eight times the amount of the whole ordinary yearly income, as it stood at the commencement of hostilities. In like manner as at Bengal, disturbed internally by civil dissensions, or the rebellion of refractory zemindars, was beset by an inimical confederacy of all the respectable native powers of Hindostan, stimulated and assisted by the French

* The origin of this emblematical figure, it will be remembered, was the gift of King Assuon to his daughter Amalthæa, afterwards reigned by the poets to be Jupiter's nurse, of a territory in Libya, exceedingly fertile, resembling in shape a bullock's horn.

† An area equal to the square dimensions of the following states united:—The kingdoms of Great Britain, Ireland, Sardinia, and Naples; the old Roman Commonwealth, when extended over the present territories of the Pope and Grand Duke of Tuscany only; all the ancient republics of Greece; the Jewish empire in Syria, together with the whole kingdom of Egypt, as ever inhabited or capable of cultivation.

Conclusion.

and Dutch America was lost to the British Empire in the contest of the West; but in India, with many vicissitudes of fortune, in the same period, the national power never appeared against a host of enemies, without any other sacrifice or abscission than the poor detached town of Proach, and by incurring a debt far short of a single year's ordinary revenue, which may be easily liquidated in two more of tranquillity, through economical reforms, with many dormant resources, equally proper, as perhaps expedient to be brought forth, and after having supported, besides the military operations of many distant armies, in some measure the civil commercial establishments of all the presidencies united, supplied in great part the pecuniary wants of China, and, as usual, made chiefly by the spirited patriotic contributions, with a view of remittance of the private fortunes of British subjects; a provision for and dispatched the annual investments to Europe, without which, indeed, the national resources might have failed, and the credit of the Company in England be shaken to its foundation. In a word, with such collateral aids as the Circars may thus derive on the one hand, from Bengal; on the other hand, from the Carnatic, joined to their own proper interior resources of men and money, we may venture to pronounce their perfect security of being long possessed as dependencies on the British Empire; on a comparative view of the power, situation, and relative circumstances of neighbouring states, naturally hostile, or capable of giving annoyance.

Summarily to estimate the political importance of the Northern circars, we shall recapitulate the substance of what hath been diffusely scattered on this subject, under different heads, throughout the preceding sheets. A territory happily situated on the sea-coast, under a more temperate climate than common, within the tropics, 17,000 * square geographic miles in all its dominions, yielding copiously all the gifts of nature necessary to the support of two millions and a half of inoffensive native inhabitants, with a commerce of seventy five lacks on balance, and a gross revenue of a crore and thirty lacks of rupees, collected on the most moderate scale of exaction, to defray all the necessary expenses of government, are the circumstances which principally determine the intrinsic value of possession; dependent provinces lying between the superior establishments of Madras and Fort William, facilitating the communications between both, capable of receiving from or giving immediate support to either, particularly to the former, in the article of grain and other provisions in the north-east monsoon, excluding rival European nations in a length of coast, 470 miles, from any intercourse with the interior states of the Deccan, and thereby preventing intrigue with insidious policy, so baneful to the general peace of mankind, from entering into the ignorant councils of the natives, extending the scope of a foreign legitimate empire, desired and venerated by the great mass of the people, and at the same time, increasing its political strength, by checking neighbouring powers, or in yielding vast resources of an army; a marine and very extensive and universally beneficial coasting trade, a valuable commerce amounting to 18 lacks in cotton cloths, for the markets of England, there serving as raw materials for an inestimable home printed manufacture, besides 12 lacks of similar goods exported to other states of Europe, paid in specie in the country, to enliven provincial circulation, producing also a clear territorial income of one crore of rupees, deduction being made of all mofussil expenses, and affording, besides a surplus of ten lacks to remain in the subordinate treasury, an annual tribute of 40 lacks to the superior protecting government of Fort St. George, to be remitted in money or grain, after defraying the charge of a military force of 30,000 men, under every denomination; a great civil establishment which handsomely provides for at least sixty gentlemen, servants of the Company, and the yearly provision of an investment, exceeding double the worth in Europe of any other Indian commodity, originally invoiced equally;—these, are the most material advantages stated to convey an idea of the relative worth of the territory under consideration, while the contingent circumstances of great internal means for offensive or defensive operations, with the continual and virtual support of collateral aids from Bengal and the Carnatic, comparatively with the slender resources, inefficient, contemptible, military power of barbarous neighbouring states, evince the security of possession, and finish the abstract of our proposed political estimate.

On the whole, if Bengal deserves to be considered the richest jewel in the British Crown, it may be observed of the Northern circars, that though only forming a cluster of lesser magnitude, they give additional value, with a superior lustre, to the royal diadem; as constituting the only portion, annexed constitutionally, without the incongruity of formal participation, except the zemindary of Benares, in free, avowed, undivided sovereignty.

Mr. White's Minute—
14 Feb. 1793.

IT would appear that early in February 1791, the chief and council put the Billumcondah and Innaccondah districts under charge of Vassareddy, without consulting the board of revenue; which measure was disapproved by them. In consequence of a letter from the chief and council, dated 30th April, the board consented afterwards to his being continued in charge, on his engaging to protect the districts, and to pay their stipulated quota of the jumma agreed on for the whole Guntoor circar. In the month of June, the chief and council estimated the receipts of revenue for the Fusly year, from pagodas 24,000, to pagodas 28,000, and as this fell so short of the proportion (M. pagodas 57,000) of the general assessment proposed for that Circar, they remarked upon its inadequacy, and recommended that the rent of the two districts should be offered to Vassareddy for a term of years. This proposition, as well as the former measure, was reluctantly acquiesced in. However, the chief and council were desired, if they could devise no other means of securing the tranquillity of the country, and an adequate revenue, to settle for a rent; but not to extend the term beyond the period of the existing leases for the other districts, which was about three years. In August, the chief and council represented that Vassareddy declined undertaking the rent, for so short a period—that he alleged, the impoverished state of the districts must render it impossible for him to restore them within the period of the other settlements in the Guntoor circar, so as to enable him to pay their stated proportion of jumma (M. Pagodas 57,000), and that he could not engage, for a shorter time than seven years. The board of revenue stated their remarks on the occasion, and government acquiesced in the proposition so decidedly recommended by the gentlemen at Masulipatam; but as the term of rent was longer than they wished, the chief and council were desired, previous to entering into any engagement, to make a further trial to prevail with Vassareddy to agree for a shorter period, by reducing the demand of rent.—In consequence of the recommendation of the chief and council, it was at the same time resolved, with the view of relieving the inhabitants, to grant a remission of all balances standing against them for the two preceding years, amounting nearly to M. pagodas 30,000.

Various pleas of absence and sickness of the zemindar and his vakeels, have since been represented as the causes which delayed the final adjustment of this transaction; and it at length appears, that Vassareddy is totally averse in coming to any agreement for renting those districts on any terms. In the mean time, however, he could undertake the charge and detail of the collections; and it is evident that the mode now proposed for the future management, must effectually continue his interference and influence, without any degree of responsibility.—I conceive his motives must be sufficiently obvious; besides present advantage, he may wish to obtain controul over those districts, and ultimately to get them annexed to the Chintapilly zemindary.

It cannot be supposed that Vassareddy was unacquainted with the actual situation and value of the two districts, which are contiguous to his own zemindary, when he made his proposal for renting them: but as no caboolat has been taken from him, it rests with the honourable the Governor in Council to determine on his conduct.

The actual collections for the year, are mentioned by the chief and council, to be M. pagodas 11,603. 9. 45. But this sum does not appear to correspond with the abstract transmitted by them, which states the collections at - - - 16,331. 35. 35.

And if the amount charges, Sibbendy claimed by Vassareddy be deducted, 9,079. 35. 35. amounting to - - - 7,252. —

The actual net collections can be only - - - - -
And if from this sum be deducted, the monthly subsistence of Pagodas 100 to each zemindar, as proposed by the chief and council, and which certainly would be the smallest allowance hitherto given to persons in their situation, the net receipts for both districts, will only be Pagodas 4,852; though it is said Vassareddy effectually preserved the peace of the country. But the chief and council hold out hopes, that with proper management it may be increased in seven years, to pagodas 80,000 per annum. Before Vassareddy's charges of collection are admitted, it will be proper for the board to see his account particulars with other vouchers, which ought to be transmitted with the same regularity as the collectors forward such papers.

The chief and council mentioned the proposal of the Gundarows:—They paid in Fusly 1200, pagodas 33,998. 18; and offered to pay into the treasury, for the year Fusly 1201, M. pagodas 25,000; and that the balance of the seven years stated revenue should be divided vided upon the ensuing years.—Vassareddy offered to become security for the payment, on condition that he retained his influence in the country.

The appointment of an ameen to act in conjunction with Vassareddy's manager, is, I believe, a new mode of administration for the company's revenue.—It appears to me more remarkable, that the chief and council should seriously tell this board that the despots of the country will be a check upon those managers, when strengthened also by the influence of Vassareddy.—I believe there are few people who have had the least opportunity of observing the conduct of the native revenue officers in the Circars, would be satisfied that such a mode of checking them, was likely to be efficient.—The chief and council have not been in the habit of mentioning the names, or of giving any account of the qualifications of the persons employed on such occasions; but for my own part, whenever I hear that a set of men called ameen, are dispatched from the pettah of Masulipatam, into the distant districts, without any vigilant inspection over them, I expect to find that the inhabitants will be plundered and the collections embezzled.

The chief and council say, however, that if this board think proper to require any other mode of management to be instituted, it will be readily attended to by them; so that after a year has elapsed, and their own recommendations consented to, in all their variations, another mode, widely different from any former proposition, is adopted "as a necessary expedient;" and it is left to this board, at this advanced season of the year, to acquiesce, or to direct some other arrangement.

As the zemindars of the two districts were set aside, in consequence of the representations of the chief and council, I know of no other mode but that of placing them under a collector, or farming them out to the local inhabitants, or to renters of good character, and who would be likely to preserve their tranquillity. In such case, a small party of Sepoys might be kept there for a time, to assist for that purpose. But should either of these modes be attempted at present, the board may expect to hear of damages to the growing crops—that the peace of the country is likely to be disturbed, and other inconveniences;—and from what appears on record, and the former representations of the present chief and council, respecting the refractory and turbulent conduct of Vassareddy, I think it more than probable that he will be the principal, in exciting disturbances in the country. It will not be the first time that the board of revenue have felt themselves in a similar predicament, and have in a manner been forced to yield to measures, which appeared very objectionable, in order to avoid disturbances, loss of revenue, and charges stated or apprehended by the chiefs and councils.

The chief and council at Masulipatam having expressed their apprehensions that no part of the heavy balances outstanding for the two preceding years could be realized, they were directed, in October last, to ascertain and report what indulgences were shown by the different zemindars, and what proportion of their demands had been remitted to the inhabitants during the famine. This information appeared necessary, before the board submitted any opinion or recommendation to government, for granting remissions; and it became more requisite, as they understood that the greater part of the zemindars had paid no attention to the distresses of the poorer classes of people; but on the contrary, had secreted and disposed of their grain and other necessities of life, at the most exorbitant prices.

It would appear from their letter of the 26th ultimo, that the chief and council have lost sight of this object of the board's instructions, under date 31st October, and repeated on the 12th ultimo; and I conceive that the circular letter written upon the receipt of the board's orders to the different zemindars, requiring information from them as to the means they possessed for making good their balances, must be found not only ineffectual, but likely to occasion obstacles.

The chief and council however observe, that holding out hopes of remissions might be productive of inconvenience; but did this board desire them to hold out any hopes of the kind, or give them any order on the subject, until they had repeatedly declared their apprehensions of being unable to realize any part of the balances for the preceding years? Can it be conceived for a moment, that the vakeels and news-writers employed by the zemindars at Masulipatam, who are so watchful of the most minute circumstances, were ignorant on this point?

The chief and council seem to have confined their enquiry to the loss of inhabitants and state of the present crops; and without doubt, it will appear that the country has suffered in a dreadful degree, though perhaps not actually to the extent of the account collected by them, for the zemindars will certainly be inclined to exaggerate, as a foundation for claims to remissions. Instead of expecting any satisfactory information with respect to the conduct of the zemindars during the late calamity, and the means taken by them for the preservation of the inhabitants, it is pretty evident that the board may expect to find such an enquiry will, in the usual phrase, be represented as ill-timed interference, and likely to produce confusion and difficulties. If there had been an effectual interposition twelve or eighteen months ago, by obliging the zemindars and others to bring their secreted grain to market, and to dispose of the same at a moderate price, and actually to have remitted such a proportion of the revenue to the ryots, as will now be claimed on account of deficiencies, it might possibly have saved the lives of many thousands of inhabitants in the different districts, without loss to the company. I am sure that neither the present government or this board would authorize any vexatious scrutiny or useless research; but there is a necessary enquiry and information, and without which, it is impossible to proceed with propriety to any decision.

I am however convinced, if the Masulipatam zemindars had been under the superintendence of three or four separate collectors, that they might, by a residence and local knowledge knowledge, with proper enquiries in the respective districts, have furnished the required information without the least difficulty, and averted many of the late calamities. But in proof of the defects of the present system of administration in the Circars, and that innumerable mischiefs have been experienced under it, I would wish to appeal to the records, which must likewise show, that after twenty-five years possession, undisturbed by any foreign enemy, the company's authority is incompletely established—that no regulation has been introduced for the security of the inhabitants against oppression, and not a single improvement proposed worthy of any notice.

It has been a mass of contradictions and dissensions, garbled and disingenuous representations, or accounts of failures, disturbances, depredations, increased charges, frauds, balances, remissions, &c.; and until the reports of the committee of circuit were received in 1786 and 1787, there was little or no information of those countries. Should it appear that I am mistaken in such opinions, I hope the board will explain and set me right. I have no hesitation, however, in offering it as my opinion, that the revenue will be better conducted, and that the inhabitants will receive more protection, under collectors residing in the different districts, than under the present system of a chief and council stationed at Masulipatam.

The procrastination and various impediments which arise to the dispatch of business at present, are obvious; and the frequent attendance of so many zemindars or their vakeels, at the chiefship, have occasioned the greatest inconvenience. From what may be learned on an examination of the records, and from every source of the most respectable private information, I apprehend there is not in any country, a greater sink of intrigue and corruption, than the pettah or black town of that settlement. There, it would appear, the darkest schemes of cabal and counteraction have been contrived by dubashers and other natives, or the most daring projects formed for procuring undue advantages, by every means of oppression and plunder. The usual mode of transacting business by means of the chief's dubash as interpreter, and making him the sole channel of all negotiation with the zemindars and other natives, must have been favourable to such schemes, and could not fail of producing the worst of consequences. But as the influence and misconduct of such men, must be within the knowledge of every person who has paid the least attention to the affairs of this coast, I shall say no more on that subject.

The chiefs and councils do not transmit their accounts and vouchers in a distinct and regular manner, or enter into a simple and clear detail of the collections, or give that satisfactory elucidation, which must have been intended and expected from the institution of collectors. The latter, by residing in the districts, have it also in their power to watch the conduct of the zemindars, and to check any improper designs which the chiefs and councils cannot so well attempt, from being ignorant of what is actually passing in the different zemindars. In short, the forming of the districts into divisions, the establishing one uniform plan, by appointing collectors, and separating the duties of revenue and commerce, are measures which appear to me to be essential to the company's interests, and to the prosperity of the country. The regulations adopted in the year 1791, for the revenue department, and for the conduct of collectors, were framed, with very little alteration, from those established in Bengal. But the present mode of transacting business by the agency of chiefs and councils, appears to me in some degree incompatible with the revenue regulations; and I imagine the late board of revenue must at the time, have had in view the introduction of one uniform system of collection, corresponding with that of Bengal, which after long experience has been found to answer.

Let any one contrast for a moment, the situation of the Bengal provinces with the northern Circars: in the former, there will be observed a well-regulated and efficient system of revenue; but in the other, an unconnected jumble, without authority, subordination, arrangement or regulation. Although vested with such a charge and detail of revenue management, I do not recollect to have heard that any gentlemen in the provincial councils had ever acquired a proficiency in any of the country languages, or proposed any plan of general utility since the acquisition of the Circars. Can there be wanting any further proof of the supineness and total want of exertion and emulation in the public service, under the present system of chiefships? I will here add, that the regulations lately framed by this board for the administration of civil justice, and which I make no doubt government will approve, are also framed from the Bengal code. In my opinion, those regulations are equally well adapted for the Circars, without requiring farther modification as to any local usages; but here again the present system may tend to obstruct an useful institution, though the necessity of establishing courts of justice for the security of property, and protection of the inhabitants, must be obvious.

Upon the establishment of collectorships, it will be of the utmost importance to select persons of moderation, industry, good capacity, and of honourable character. When servants of the company holding such situations, aim at the rapid acquisition of a large fortune, many inconveniences must ensue; for whatever may be the vigilance of the board of revenue, the success of the collections must in a great measure depend, on those employed in the immediate management of the district. As the selection must be made by the honourable the Governor in Council, it might not be proper for me to say more; but I am sure the present government will not be displeased at any remark from a member of this board, on a point so connected with the revenue, and the various duties committed to their charge. It is unpleasant in some respect to make distinctions; and yet it is the duty of this board to discriminate merit and exertions in the public service, on the part of those acting under them. I will only add, if the Circars were placed under seven or eight collectors, who ramah districts, I am convinced that the most important benefits would soon be experienced.

There are other measures which must appear absolutely requisite for the benefit of the country, and should be carried into effect at a proper time. The mode of settling with the zemindars from year to year, or for a short and precarious lease, and assessing them in proportion to the value of their districts, without regard to those who may have increased their resources by good management, could not fail to check every attempt of improvement, and to render them equally rapacious and unfeeling as common renters. In this state of perplexity, and often harrassed by demands for public or private payments, they have been left without any controul as to interior management, and might commit the greatest abuses and enormities with impunity.

Without the zemindars are assured that they shall not be liable, by additional demands, to be wholly deprived of the benefit of their exertions, and without adopting some more permanent plan of settlement (which would put a stop to the plea of private exactions) it is impossible to expect a proper conduct in the zemindars, and that they will not oppress the inhabitants in the lands, would soon be attended with beneficial consequences to the country. The measure, would certainly be most effectual to its prosperity; but it cannot perhaps be effected without changing materially the present situation of the zemindars.

If the real value of the different zemindars is supposed not to be sufficiently ascertained by the reports of the committee of circuit, the appointment of the collectors must, I think, tend to complete that object, and to enable government to fix a plan of permanency where-ever the affairs of the Circars approach to such a state as will admit of a permanent arrangement; the principle of the last settlement in Bengal for ten years is worthy of being taken as a model; but without the institution of courts of justice, and the appointment of collectors, as a previous step, I apprehend that it may be found impracticable to adopt many of the regulations of that settlement, though applicable in other respects to the circumstances of the Circars, and highly expedient for the benefit of the country. The collectors, within a proper time after their appointment, should make a full report of the state of the districts under their respective charge, with every information to assist the board in preparing and arranging a plan for the future settlement. On so important an occasion, and when their own credit must be so deeply concerned, the collectors will naturally feel an emulation, and be anxious to acquit themselves in a satisfactory manner, by furnishing complete materials for that purpose.

Then it is to be hoped that the present abuses will soon be rectified, with respect to the low and fluctuating exchange of the copper currency, which are so grievously felt by the poorer classes of people in the Circars;—that some effectual methods will be adopted for supplying the districts with water, by means of tanks and canals, which from the advantages of the situation, and the many springs issuing from the adjacent hills, besides the two great rivers, can be accomplished with less difficulty than in most other countries;—that large tracts of lands capable of the highest improvement, but at present waste and neglected, will be brought into a state of cultivation;—that manufactures will be promoted, as well as the culture of the sugar cane, the mulberry, indigo, cotton, and other valuable articles, which hitherto have been totally overlooked or discouraged by chiefs and councils.

The necessity of a reform, with respect to justice, is also a subject which has been Oram delivered in M.

The necessity of a reform, with respect to internal taxes, is evident. Mr. Petrie and Mr. Oram delivered in Minutes on this subject in the months of November and December 1791, and both have shown in strong colours, that great abuses are at present practised, but the arrangement proposed by the former gentleman appears to have been intended, rather as a temporary expedient than an effectual remedy. The plan of commutation recommended by the latter, might not be found to answer. In consequence of an application to the supreme government, the Bengal regulations for inland duties are now in the possession of this board; and as this subject has been so fully investigated there, it may be the safest and best mode to adopt them, as a guide in regulating or abolishing oppressive imposts in the Circars. At a proper time, similar regulations should be established in the management of lands in the other divisions.

At a proper time, similar regulations should be established to those adopted in Bengal, for incapacity, contumacy, or lunacy, as well as for the care of the persons, maintenance, or education of such disqualified land-holders. It must also appear necessary to adopt the Regulations passed in July 1792, by the right honourable the Governor General in Council, defining the nature and extent of the coercion, which land-holders and farmers may exercise to enforce payment of their just arrears, and at the same time for protecting under-tenants and ryots from oppressive and unjust demands of the land-holders. There are other useful revenue regulations observed in Bengal, which may be introduced at proper times, and when government can fully rely on the zeal of those employed for carrying them into execution.

Every attempt almost for introducing interior administration, and for carrying them into Every attempt almost for introducing any remedy with respect to oppressive taxes, or the interior administration of the revenue, has been opposed by the chiefships; but upon no better ground than that I can discover than that of affecting the present receipts of government. The more wise and equitable considerations of increasing the population and securing the permanent prosperity of the country, by rendering the condition of the people more comfortable, by encouraging industry and commerce, by discontinuing unjust demands, and adopting useful regulations, appear to have had but little weight.

The progress made in Bengal in every branch of the revenue, and knowledge of the usages and government of the country, is without comparison, far beyond any attainments of the servants on the coast; and the expediency of establishing an uniform system, as far as local circumstances will admit, in all the company's possessions, must be evident: but there is

 is a more powerful argument:—why should not the inhabitants on this coast, enjoy equal indulgences with those in Bengal? and indeed, exposed as they are at present, to the untrolled power of the zemindars, and having suffered so much from the late famine, they have stronger claims to lenity. Should it appear that within the two last years a third, and in many places, half of the inhabitants have perished in the zemindaries, as private reports mention, some diminution of the present assessments, at least for a few years, must be allowed, or the country will become more depopulated. Upon receipt of the public accounts from Masulipatam, the amount of remissions should be determined, as well as the abatement of the future revenue, proportioned to the effects of the famine, for the relief of the remaining inhabitants. This may appear a proper time for the regulating or abolition of the inland taxes in the zemindaries.

This may appear a proper time for the regulating the zemindaries.

Corcondah is situated about six coss to the northward of Rajahmundry, and as it is represented that no person has a just claim of succession to this zemindarry, which contains, by the accounts of the committee of circuit, 55 villages. I am decidedly of opinion, that it ought to be declared havelly, and that the giving a preference, by appointing any one of the claimants, would probably tend to produce disputes and future embarrassment. I agree with the chief and council, that in chusing districts for havelly, those in the plain country near the sea coast should be preferred; but it appears to me that the disturbances in the zemindaries situated near the frontiers, have frequently been occasioned by the misconduct of the zemindars, in refusing the just demands of government, and then taking refuge in the hills until they obtain, their own terms, and at other times by affording shelter and assistance to the refractory dependants of the company. The usual pleas of the subordinates, for not taking vigorous and efficient measures, on account of the war with Hyder, Tippoo, or others, or in the present situation of affairs, cannot now be urged, and such arguments would be more humiliating than ever for foregoing the rights of government, or the security of the inhabitants. The resistance however of the zemindars is not always occasioned by endeavouring to enforce the public claims; for example, is it not evident that the demands of individuals and their private loans, were the principal causes of the disorders and loss of revenue experienced in the Noozed zemindarry?

The committee of circuit, to be about seven coss from Corcondah, had suffered much from Mylaveram is represented by the committee of circuit, to be about seven coss from Con-dapilly, and they mention that this district, consisting of 53 villages, had suffered much from the disputes between the two zemindars: Mr. Oram stated it, on a late occasion, "to be in reality a part of the Condapilly havelly, and that as the villages of both interfere, they might with great propriety be added to the havelly collection."

In settling for the rent, or with the inhabitants in all lands near the hills, it would certainly be good policy to require a more moderate assessment, and to allow every indulgence with respect to vexatious taxes, &c. A small force of Sepoys being stationed in such situations, would probably secure their tranquillity, and be the means of security to other districts in the neighbourhood, which have often suffered from depredations.

While I am on the subject of havellies, it might be proper to mention that I understand a scheme has been on foot for some time among several natives, to get a zemindar appointed to the Muglatoore district, though it had been long resolved and finally determined in 1791 to make it havelly, as no one had a right of succession on the death of Trepetty Rauze. The person employed for this purpose at Madras, is named Cousinadoo Venkiah; but finding, I have reason to believe, that he is not likely to get the business brought forward at the present time, it is reported that he has advised his party to redouble their efforts among the natives at the northward. As such views must produce intrigue, besides inconvenience to Mr. Gambier, in the management and collections of the districts, I think Venkiah should be ordered to return to the northward, or to desist from his present pursuit, in case the board have reason to believe that it is not an unfounded report.

I am also of opinion, that it might prevent many such designs and intrigues, if the scrish-tadar or interpreter of this department, were directed to lay before the board once or twice every month, the names of all vakeels, agents, or others employed publicly or privately by the zemindars, renters, or others concerned in the revenue, or on the part of any persons who have any claim to lands, which will better enable this board to carry the orders of government into effect respecting vakeels, &c.

I will take leave to add, that the foregoing opinions are not hastily adopted, but the result of some examination of the records, corroborated by an evident combination of circumstances, and by the sentiments of men of character and observation, who have been on the spot.—It is a subject that embraces the happiness and prosperity of a whole country; and cannot be considered with indifference by any person. Should it appear therefore that I might in any instance have used a more qualifying expression, I hope it will but be the objection of a moment.—I may be deceived, but under a full conviction at present, that such evils have existed, I might be blameable in me to express myself in a less undisguised and ingenuous language. I can safely say that to the best of my judgment I have used no exaggeration, that no private motive can weigh with me, and that I never have had the least personal difference with any one hitherto employed, or likely to be employed, in the provincial councils.

EXTRACT Proceedings of the Board of Revenue at Fort St. George, the 25th March 1793.

MR. White delivers in the following Minute:

IN a Minute delivered at our meeting of the 14th ultimo, I stated my opinion of the defects in the present system of administration of the company's revenue on this coast. It has afforded me the greatest satisfaction to find that government have concurred in the proposed alteration, and intend to recommend it to the honourable court of directors. With this pleasing prospect before them, and the previous institution of courts of justice, this board may begin to hope that a plan is soon to be established which will produce regularity, subordination, and a due realization of the revenue, with full protection to the inhabitants, who at present have not the smallest security, either of property or person, against the rapacity or violence of the zemindars or principal tenants.

Without the institution of courts of justice, and under the present system, it is in vain to stipulate any conditions in favour of the inhabitants in the muchelkas of the zemindars, because any complaint against the latter, would not only prove ineffectual, but must expose the poor ryots to their resentment and greater acts of oppression. Indeed, however disposed the chief or collector may be to do justice, and however fair the decision, yet where there are no legal established rules of process, it will be unsatisfactory and disregarded. Hitherto in the Circars, the settling of causes, for it cannot be called an administration of justice, has been left with the zemindars, reaters, or the native revenue servants, according to their influence. Sometimes, it appears by the records, the native commandants of the Sepoy battalions have assumed the right of deciding disputes and causes in the districts, which proved a profitable concern to them. Those who could not pay, but who in general were the injured parties, had a very small chance of success.

As the time did not admit, when I delivered the afore-mentioned Minute, of my being so explicit on several points as their nature and importance required, I take this occasion to offer some observations more in detail, and of submitting a few propositions for remedying particular inconveniences.

My opinion was stated before, respecting the necessity of a permanent assessment with the zemindars, and that it is equally expedient to settle, on a similar principle, with the head inhabitants of the government lands, as the system of employing intermediate renters, however modified and regulated, must ultimately prove ruinous. It may then be expected that the zemindars and others will again think of protecting and preserving the industrious cultivator, instead of reducing him to a scanty and miserable subsistence, and at other times harassing him even to famine and death, which has lately been experienced to a dreadful extent in the Circars; but I am aware that obstacles occur in respect to the company's possessions on this coast, which are not felt in Bengal, arising as well from the want of due obedience on the part of the principal landholders, as from doubts of having accurate materials of the real value of their districts. The devastations occasioned by the former war, and the effects of the late famine in the Circars, must increase the difficulty for the present.

In the meantime, it is proper to keep this desirable object in view, and that the present measures should tend to a permanent establishment of land-rent, as soon as affairs will admit. The next settlements might be formed for a period of five or seven years, within which time, every necessary information ought to be obtained relative to the value and state of the country. Much counteraction in this respect, and in establishing the company's authority, may, however, be expected, while the zemindars are allowed to retain such a number of armed people, and to hold such ideas of their own independence. It has often encouraged them to withhold the public demands, to resist the company's troops, and to commit depredations in the adjoining districts. The records must show, that few instances of such misconduct have been attended with any serious punishment, particularly when the zemindars had the means or would agree to discharge their payments; and as to any enormities committed within their respective limits, they have not been considered a matter of enquiry at the subordinates, or, if known, were apparently disregarded. Indeed, the chiefships have constantly represented, that inconvenience would result from any interference with the internal controul of the zemindars, which could not fail to impress them with ideas of their own independence, and to encourage them often to acts of resistance.

The want of a sufficient force in the Circars, and the danger to be apprehended to the health of the troops in pursuing refractory dependants among the hills, are in general the reasons assigned for not acting with vigour and effect on occasions of disobedience. It has been usual to allow the zemindars, and particularly those in hilly and frontier situations, to entertain a considerable number of armed men for the protection of the districts against incursions, but hitherto the inconvenience of this measure has been frequently experienced, without any adequate advantages; for instead of assisting the intentions of government, they have constantly given great cause of displeasure, by affording shelter to delinquents, by committing oppressions in their own districts, and irregularities in the adjacent countries. It will perhaps appear highly proper to restrict the zemindars to the internal duties of their lands, and not to trust them, in any instance, with a large body of military for the purpose of defence, but who in fact are oftener employed in resisting the orders of government. In Bengal, the zemindars are not allowed even to keep up any police establishment for the preservation of peace within their own limits; but this duty is now confided to officers of government, appointed to that trust under proper regulations.

I have heard that in Bengal there are small cantonments in particular frontier zemindaries; and I make no doubt a very small force stationed in such situations in the Circars would effectually secure their tranquillity, and obviate many inconveniences. The most healthy spots might might be chosen, and encouragement given for clearing away the jungle in the neighbouring lands, by allowing the whole produce for three or five years, and afterwards to pay a moderate and increasing rent. To guard against the fatal effects of the climate, to which the regular troops must be exposed near the hills, it will be highly expedient, on every consideration of policy and humanity, to employ the people of the country, as was suggested by the committee of circuit, and lately by the resident at Ganjam, under date 7th October last.

A sufficient number of the military peons employed by the zemindars, might perhaps be easily retained for the purpose; and certainly no persons would be fitter for that service, than those who have already been employed in situations near the hills. If ever such an arrangement takes place, a party should be stationed in the Nundaporam zemindarry, who, by commanding the passes of that country, will be enabled to prevent the incursion of any enemy, and, at the same time, to contribute materially to the interior tranquillity of the company's districts.

A corps of this description was raised by a well-known collector of the Baugleporé district in Bengal, who induced the savage inhabitants to quit the adjacent mountains and woods, to enter into the service of the company. They soon became a protection to that country, which they had so often desolated by acts of plunder and bloodshed; and the traveller, the merchant, and peaceful cultivator and manufacturer were no longer under apprehension of safety.—Trade, revived; agriculture, and manufactures, were improved and extended; and the population rapidly increased.

The expense of a similar corps in each of the four Circars under Masulipatam, and two corps for the Chicacole circar, would be no object to be put in competition with the advantages which would result from the establishment of order and regularity throughout the country. No further time should be lost in establishing an efficient controul, and in adopting preparatory measures for the institution of courts of justice, and other necessary regulations. But without the aid of some corps, on the footing before mentioned, the usual force stationed in the Circars may be found insufficient to overawe the zemindars, and to preserve a proper submission to government, particularly upon the introduction of any plan, which must affect their independent authority, by a reduction of their armed people, and by restricting them from undue demands and giving relief to the inhabitants.

Additional military establishments, and the employing them in the districts, should be avoided as far as possible; but until the orders of government are respected and obeyed by the zemindaries, such inconvenience must be submitted to, as they are trifling in comparison to the solid and permanent benefits which result to the prosperity of the country, from establishing justice, order, and a due subordination. At present, the irregular military in the service of the zemindars are very numerous, attended with an enormous expense, and extremely burthensome to the inhabitants. The necessity of taking some decided steps for establishing the company's authority, and reducing the zemindars to a proper state of subjection, must be obvious. If the measure be attempted, it should be carried through with vigour; for, if done by halves, the zemindars will have recourse to their old habits of intrigue to raise disturbances; and counteract the intentions of government. The apprehension of a temporary deficiency of revenue ought not to impede the object for a moment, and it will soon be seen that they will relinquish their practices of throwing the country into confusion, and leave the collectors in quiet possession of the districts. While the zemindars are suffered to retain their present force and influence, incompatible with, and derogatory to, every principle of good government, no collector will be able to afford protection to the inhabitants, to obtain the necessary information of the revenue, or to realize it, without perpetual difficulty and embarrassment. If the zemindars in Bengal some years ago were in a state of depression, I am sure every person must allow that their situation on this coast, has been on the other extreme. The medium is what, in my opinion, they are justly entitled to, and what is necessary for the good order and prosperity of the country; and on this principle, they ought not to keep up large bodies of armed men at an enormous expense, in order to maintain an improper influence and consequence, and from more dangerous motives.

It will be an essential object in conciliating the zemindars to the proposed reform, to convince them that it is intended, as well for the security of their rights, as to guard them against undue exactions, as to protect the inferior classes of inhabitants, so that government have no other end in view than the general welfare and prosperity of the country, by affording mutual justice, and supporting the proper degree of authority of all description of persons residing within their limits. Nothing, however, will contribute to relieve their minds so much, as the conviction that government intend to form a permanent settlement with them; and without this belief, and that they are to enjoy the fruits of their labours, they will never heartily attend to the principles of the present of their districts.

I have already stated my opinion on this point, and that the principles of the present Bengal settlement, with the subsidiary regulations, are so excellent, that it may be safely taken as a model on this coast. Particular modifications, which local differences may require to be adopted, must hereafter be pointed out by the collectors, when they become well acquainted with the customs existing in different parts of the country. Upon one point, however, I must presume to express a doubt how far it might not be advisable, as a security to the great body of the people, and particularly as the landholders on this coast are not reduced to the same submission, to require their giving fixed leases to the ryots, renewable on descending in perpetuity, specifying the proportion of revenue or shares of the crops which the cultivators of every denomination are to receive, free of all superadded demands or claims whatever, which should be duly registered. At present it is well known that the ryots are exposed to great distress, by the frequent practice of exorbitant demands, additional additional assessments, or by taking their shares of grain at a low rate, and afterwards imposing it on them, at a high valuation.

The reports of the committee of circuit have been taken as the guide in the late settlements with the zemindars; but considering the method observed by them of obtaining information from the accounts delivered by the village curmums, without, in general, a personal investigation of the different pergunnahs; that no one of the members, or their assistants, had a knowledge of any of the country languages, but was under the necessity of trusting entirely to native interpreters, to prevent and discover impositions; considering the influence which the zemindars had over every description of the revenue officers and inhabitants; that they even refused, in many instances, to furnish any accounts; and that all were interested in concealing the truth, and under-rating their lands; considering the counteractions used by those people, the habits of rapacity and deception of the public officers, and their probable fabrication of accounts, on many occasions; considering the limited powers of the committee,—that they received but little countenance and support, and met with constant opposition from the chiefships;—I am really of opinion, that their calculations in general must fall short of the actual value of the districts, which indeed the committee acknowledge in respect to Nundegamah, held by Vassareddy and other zemindars. There were, however, men of integrity on the committee, and I have no doubt of the authenticity of their information on many other points, particularly with respect to the produce and manufactures, the imports and exports, the oppression and abuses of the landholders and public officers, the poverty and degraded situation of the inhabitants, the heavy and vexatious inland duties, &c.

However, for want of more accurate documents, which might and ought to have been furnished by the chiefships, the last assessments, particularly in the three circars of Rajahmundry, Ellore, and Condapillee, under Masulipatam, were formed upon the principle of requiring two-thirds of the gross revenue, as estimated by the committee of circuit; and allowing the remaining third to the zemindar, for charges of collection and his own expenses. The same rule has since been adopted with regard to the Guntoor circar, and it is perhaps a more moderate assessment in general, than the jumma fixed in Bengal.

But in the Chicacole circar, this regulation or proportion of the revenue has not been observed. Vizieram Rauze, the most considerable zemindar on the coast, is scarcely assessed more than one-third; and until a few years ago, he did not pay to government the proportion of one-fifth of the gross collections of the countries under him, though there is the most indubitable evidence that, by means of intrigue and oppression, and often without any public sanction, the districts of several zemindars of much more ancient family, have been annexed to his authority, besides a considerable part of the havelly or government lands. The conduct of Vizieram Rauze, for some years past, gives him no claim to indulgence; and should government be compelled, by continued acts of disobedience and mismanagement, to divest him of his authority, they will have an opportunity of doing justice to several ancient families, and of obtaining a considerable increase of revenue. From the circumstances stated by the committee of circuit, it would appear that, on an average, the two zemindaries (Kimmedy and Teekaly), in the Cossimcotah division of the Chicacole circar, are assessed about one-third of the gross collections. These two zemindars, and perhaps a few others in this Circar, are, I believe, the only persons subject to the company's government who have descended from the ancient rajah families. It would appear that most of the ancestors of the other zemindars, have acquired possession within the present century.

In the Ichapour division under Ganjam, the committee of circuit often proceeded upon conjecture or private information, as several zemindars refused or declined to furnish any accounts for their inspection. It may be supposed that the zemindars in general, or upon an average, pay to government about the same proportion, that is, one-third of the gross revenue. But the zemindaries are of small extent, and many, very difficult of access, from their hilly and frontier situations. The whole stipulated annual jumma, with about twenty zemindars in this district, amounts only to about ^{one} ^{hundred} ^{thousand} ^{rupees}; but though there may be motives of policy in assessing many of them at a moderate rate, I imagine the same reasons cannot be urged for fixing the jumma of Vizieram Rauze, in a proportion so unequal to what is settled with the zemindars in the other four Circars.

I am decidedly of opinion that Vizieram Rauze ought, upon every principle of reason and justice, to pay to government as large a portion of his revenue, as any zemindar subject to the company's authority on the coast; and upon this footing, he will still have a very considerable residue for his own expenses, without great misapplication and profusion. The reduction of his numerous armed peons, and the separation of the small zemindaries now dependent on his authority, would effectually check his overgrown power, and prove essential to the proper regulation of the country. It must appear extraordinary, and is a strong proof against the present system, that so inadequate a revenue has not been realized, without balances arising, and frequently employing an armed force for the purpose; and, what is more to be lamented, the inhabitants were suffering the most cruel oppressions under Sitteram Rauze's management. In short, it must appear that this province, in common with the other northern Circars, has suffered a material decline in trade, manufactures, and population; though, if a proper management had been observed within the last 25 years, the country must have afforded nearly double the revenue actually realized, without the least oppression. But with the exception of the late Codant Row of Tallapillee, and Mahapetty Row of Pettapore, I have not heard of any zemindars who pay a proper attention to the cultivation and improvement of their districts. They trust to managers, from whom as little good can be expected as from a Madras dubail, if allowed by any collector to interfere with with the revenue. The usual mode of proceeding has been, for the zemindars or their vakeels to attend at the chiefship to negotiate the future settlement; and conditions being agreed upon, the whole junta of zemindars, renters, dubashes, interpreters, catcherry servants, and inferior oppressors, form a league, without fear or remorse, against the devoted inhabitants. It does not appear that the provincial councils have attempted any interference, and consequently they could have very little experience of the interior management and detail of the collections in the zemindaries, which, added to their distant and stationary situation, must in a manner disqualify them, from judging with accuracy and precision of the real condition of the districts, or from what particular sources the revenues have arisen.

The principle of equal assessment should on every account be observed, as far as circumstances will admit; and upon adopting any future settlement, especially upon a plan of permanency, it must become a serious question, how far the reports of the committee of circuit should be relied on or taken as a guide, in respect to the valuation of the lands. In the present state of the country and diminished population, and from other local causes, it is impossible to prepare any standard, as a future assessment, or at least as a permanent jumma; but in those districts where the famine has raged in a greater degree, it may be necessary to allow a temporary abatement, and not to increase the present stipulated revenue for the next five or seven years, upon the expiration of existing leases. The Chicacole circar has suffered less from the drought; and an increase of revenue may and ought to be expected within that time, nearer to the proportion fixed with the zemindars in the other four Circars. The deficiency of population, under a proper mode of management, might soon be replaced, as many inhabitants would be induced to leave the neighbouring districts subject to the Nizam and other unsettled governments, if they were once encouraged by protection; and granting such privileges, as have been allowed in many parts of the country to new settlers. In case of any remission for the past or future abatement being allowed of the present revenue, it will be necessary to act with caution and a due consideration to the particular state of the districts. During the most unfavourable seasons, the country gives crops of dry grain, and if the tanks were in good condition, the inhabitants ought not, with proper care, to be exposed to any severe calamities from the drought of one year; and as the cultivators get an advanced rate for their grain, they are enabled to pay their kists to the zemindar. The burden in this case, falls upon the manufacturers and other classes, who for one year are better able to support it; but this calculation supposes that the ryots and cultivators receive their proper share, and are allowed to dispose of it, without restrictions.

A temporary drought or failure of a third or even half of the usual harvest for a year, ought not to be productive, as at present, of a famine, and claim to remissions. Such a scarcity, is generally a source of profit to the zemindars and others, by the increased price of grain; and they are better enabled to pay the revenue, than in ordinary years. It is therefore extremely difficult, and indeed impossible, without the minutest knowledge and inspection, to ascertain the amount of remissions which should be allowed from the want of rain, and in what proportion, to the different zemindars. I would ask, how a chief and council stationed at Masulipatam, without a competent knowledge of what is passing in the many zemindaries under them, can regulate the proportion, or take effectual measures for securing to the ryots the benefit of such indulgencies? Even under a vigilant collector residing on the spot, and distributing the proportion with his own hands to each village, there would be some abuses practised. The extent, however, of the late famine was such, and its effects so dreadful to the population of some parts of the country, during three successive seasons, that it may be come highly expedient to adopt some mode of relief for the inhabitants, and that they should benefit, by any abatement allowed. It would be a great delusion to suppose that zemindars in general will not exact their usual demands, without an effectual interference to prevent them; and in excuse, they may plead the present uncertain state and apprehension of being called upon for the full payment of their kists. Where collectors are stationed in the districts, government may, in times of great scarcity, declare a remission of the public revenue to the zemindars, directing them to remit an equal proportion to the ryots, and that any deviation will be attended with a heavy fine or expulsion. If this mode cannot be adopted, the collectors should at all events prevent exorbitant prices for grain; and a reasonable deduction ought to be allowed to the land-holders.

Under present circumstances, it is difficult to determine what measures to adopt.—If the full amount of the zemindar's engagements be required, under plea that he has not relaxed in his demands, and that the high price of grain has enabled him to make good his kists, he will consider it a tacit sanction for keeping up his demands in future, as well as the prices to the inhabitants; at the same time, it is well known that during the late famine, the zemindars did actually sell their grain at triple and quadruple the usual rates, and exacted the full duties on all the necessities of life. But in the present state of the country, it may be better to err on the side of lenity; and though such an example will not perhaps have any material effect on the conduct of the zemindars, yet it will obviate any pretence for future exactions.

As the chief and council at Masulipatam have omitted to report, agreeably to the orders of the board, on the subject of the balances of the preceding years, which they were of opinion could not be realized, I think they should again be called upon to state particularly what steps have been taken by them. Uncertainty with respect to such arrears or claims of remission, must be attended with inconvenience; for, whatever may be the result, the zemindars will not, until they know the decision, relax in their demands.

The present zemindary cowles in the Chicacole circar, are granted only for one year; but the agreements with the zemindars in the other four northern provinces, are for the period of of five years, and expire in September 1794. The next leases should tend to a permanent arrangement, and to the expectation of such a revenue as the country will be capable of affording to government. I am convinced it may be greatly increased in the event of there being no war or famine, and that the districts are placed under a proper system of management. As it will be satisfactory to have the most accurate information that can be obtained without inconvenience to the inhabitants, the collectors should be directed to exert themselves in furnishing every useful document, with their observations.

In the Bara mahal, Salem, Dindigul, and Nagore districts, and such havelly lands to the northward, as have suffered less by the effects of war, famine, or rapacious renters, it might be eligible to take the first opportunity of settling for a long period for a permanent arrangement with the inhabitants. A thousand advantages must result from a plan of permanency, not only by exciting the people to improvements, but by enabling government to effect a reduction of the revenue officers, by rendering those employed of some use, instead of a burden on the inhabitants; by reducing in general, the charges of collection; by ensuring regular payments; by rendering the revenue accounts more simple; and, above all, by putting a stop to intrigue and corrupt practices.—Under the present system, and from a total ignorance of the country languages, it appears to me that, with the exception of a few instances, the management of the company's revenue has, in a great measure, been committed to Wherever this pernicious influence has prevailed, an evident collusion may be perceived between them and the native revenue officers. It is to be apprehended their whole drift has been, to conceal the real state of the revenue from the company's servants employed, to levy undue advantages, by the payment of large bribes, or stipulating for private assessments amounting to a considerable per-centage on the public settlement, under various pleas and promises of indulgence. As far as relates to the concealment of the real produce of the lands, and fabricating false accounts, the landholders and ryots had a material interest in the connivance of the revenue officers. But if the tricks and deceptions of these people be such, that the most vigilant, able, and upright European, with every advantage of experience and knowledge of the languages, cannot entirely guard against their dishonest practices, I would not attempt any description of the abuses that must be felt, where the company's servants are deficient in these points, and wanting in zeal and other qualifications.

With respect to the other possessions of the company at the southward, (the Jaghire, including the home farms, and lands under the resident at Cuddalore,) which suffered considerably by the former war, it might be necessary to postpone any agreement for a permanent settlement, until they have recovered their former population. Agreements, however, may be made with the inhabitants for five or seven years, renewable at a proper rent; and, in about the space of 15 or 20 years, a perpetual assessment may be determined. Similar leases maybe granted in the havelly lands in the Circars, which have suffered much from the late famine and other causes. It has been represented that, from mismanagement and the oppression of renters, the inhabitants are reduced to such poverty in many parts of the havelly villages, as to be incapable of renting the land; but their present state of wretchedness, must I think prove the impropriety of trusting any longer to intermediate renters.

As the southern and western poligars belonging to the Carnatic are, in consequence of the late treaty with the nabob, to pay their peshcush directly to the company, it may be supposed that they will conduct themselves differently from what has been their former practice, not only in respect to the regularity of their payments, but in laying aside their plundering schemes, and attending to the improvement of their lands. Many of them possess the most fertile countries, and in general, by no means difficult of access, but they are very inadequately assessed, in proportion to any other persons paying revenue to the company. There may be good reasons at present, for not demanding any increase; but as in general, their present stipulated revenue does not perhaps exceed 1/4, and in some instances, 1/6 or 1/8 part of their gross collections, it may hereafter appear necessary to require an augmentation, as, in justice to the public and individuals, the principle of equal assessment should be observed among all the dependants of the same government. It is well known, that while they paid their peshcush to the nabob, the polygars were constantly obliged to pay considerable nuzzers and other extra demands, far exceeding the fixed kists. It was the policy of the durbar to adopt this mode of assessing them, in preference to an open, fair, and acknowledged revenue.

Among the many humane, liberal, and wise regulations adopted in the Bengal provinces by the present Governor General, those for constructing new works, and keeping the former in repair for the supply of water, are very important, and worthy of being followed on this coast. If such works, (of which there is not, I believe, a single instance since the establishment of the company's administration on the coast,) had been executed in the Circars previous to the late famine, a great part of the inhabitants who have perished within the last three years, might without doubt, have been preserved. It is not less deplorable that the tanks and watercourses in the southern districts, have been suffered to fall into a most ruinous condition. For example, the company's Jaghire, which abounds with works of this kind, and formed at a vast expense under the country governments, has had no substantial repair, for the last 30 or 40 years. It often happens, therefore, that even the blessings of Providence are attended with ruinous consequences to the inhabitants; for we have had experience at our own doors, that in plentiful seasons of rain, the patched and unrepaired banks cannot resist the pressure within, and the great source of cultivation is lost, which, if preserved with due care, might have served as a store, for one or two years.

Indeed,

Indeed this district, which formerly was and is still capable, from its soil and situation, of being rendered one of the most fertile spots in India, has within the last ten or twelve years, been the prey either of needy and rapacious renters, or of dishonest dubashes and native revenue officers. After the loss of 2-5ths or 1/2 of its inhabitants by the former war, it would ill bear such an accumulation of misfortunes and checks to the recovery of population. The planting of fruit-trees, and of other descriptions in the villages, so useful to the inhabitants, and advantageous to government, has been totally neglected by the renters; although the plantations were almost entirely destroyed by the enemy and our own troops during that war.

By the exertions of Mr. Clerk and Mr. Balfour, a more adequate revenue has lately been settled with the inhabitants, for three years. But, without an effectual repair of the tanks and watercourses, this valuable district cannot be restored to its former state of prosperity. The appropriation of one year's receipts, would probably effect this object completely; and I am convinced that, at the end of the present leases, the country would afford a material increase of revenue, and in a few years, more than double the present assessment. I am of opinion that this measure ought to be recommended to the immediate attention of government.

The last war commenced by Hyder Ally occasioned so great an increase of expense, and left such heavy incumbrances, that government have seldom had it in their power to spare any considerable part of their resources for useful purposes; and the same reasons must, I imagine, have operated in preventing any attempt for altering the present inconvenient mode of managing the revenue, and correcting many evils experienced under it, from an apprehension of incurring any additional expense, or any temporary diminution of the collections.—But, for my own part, I cannot perceive its policy, independent of the injustice of sacrificing the ease and comfort of the inhabitants to such considerations. It is now to be hoped that the late treaty with Tippoo, terminated in a mode and under circumstances, as honourable as the former were humiliating, will produce a long peace. Indeed, the effect it has already produced with respect to public credit in this country, is obvious.

In the execution of so important a work as the repairs of the tanks, it will be necessary to proceed upon the best information, and under proper checks to guard against collusion and abuse in the expenditure of the company's money. The head inhabitants, who are the present renters in the Jaghire, might, in the first instance, be called upon to deliver in to the collectors an account of the tanks, wells, and watercourses in their respective villages, describing their nature and extent, with their exact measurement, and the work requisite to their complete repair, with an estimate of the expense; also the grounds at present watered from each tank, and what would be the additional cultivation when the tanks are repaired, with a list of the inhabitants in each village; after which, the collectors might proceed, with an estimate of the expense of each tank, and their observations thereon, and within what period the work can be completed, without interruption to the cultivation of the country.

The chiefs and councils and residents should be directed to report the state of the tanks in the government lands in the Circars and to the southward, where others are wanted, and could with advantage be constructed. A similar report should also be required with respect to the tanks in the zemindarry lands; and as the zemindars will seldom commence such works, or at least, not until a permanent settlement is made with them, they should be undertaken by government, and their lands held responsible for the amount advanced. It appears by the reports of the committee of circuit, that several of the districts in the Chicacole circar, are watered by small rivers issuing from the adjacent hills, and that some parts of the zemindarries under Masulipatam are supplied by small channels from the Godavery and Kistnah. But it is a melancholy truth, that, with so many natural advantages, large quantities of rice are annually imported for the consumption of Masulipatam.

The survey lately ordered by government, of the rivers Kistnah and Godavery, is a circumstance which must afford the highest satisfaction to every person who feels a wish for the prosperity of the country. With the supplies furnished by means of canals from these sources, and the further advantage of tanks in proper situations, the Circars will scarcely be liable, from a failure of the periodical rains, to any material want of water for the purpose of cultivation. The expense will, I imagine, be of little consideration, even should it appear necessary to sink a large portion of the current revenue for two or three years. It is a matter that deeply affects not only the comfort, but the preservation of the inhabitants, from whose labour the funds of government are wholly supplied, and whose industry is the source of every public and private benefit.

As no measures have been adopted by government or the principal landholders, to prevent the dreadful effects of famine, by providing storehouses of grain, the inhabitants on this coast have no other dependence for their preservation in times of scarcity, than from Bengal supplies, or the scanty stores of those persons who may have kept up their grain for the sake of great profit. The prices, however, are so high on those occasions, that it is not within the reach of the poorer people to purchase it, as they have unhappily experienced, during the last three years in the Circars. It therefore becomes the more necessary to guard against the consequences of failures of the periodical rains, by providing reservoirs of water, and by preventing oppressive duties being levied on grain and provisions. Here I cannot omit repeating, that there are the strongest reasons to believe the zemindars, during the distress of the inhabitants, not only collected to the amount of their usual assessments, but levied the inland taxes on the grain imported, and even on the supplies sent by government, for the preservation of the lower classes of natives.

The precautions lately adopted by this board, should be observed, with such others as may appear more effectual to prevent abuses in the expenditure and execution of the repairs.

These objections, are perhaps to be obviated; but admitting them entirely, and viewing the measure as a matter of profit or traffic, and that the lives of the people are no more to

The department of sea customs at the presidency, and the different parts on the coast, appears to require some reform. The duties on Bengal and coast articles are abolished; but as all other imports, as well as goods exported, are liable to the payment of customs, the merchants are still subject to vexatious delays, by their goods passing the usual examinations; and as the same establishment of native servants is kept up, it will be difficult to prevent impositions. The fees to the sea customer at the presidency are fixed; but those claimed at the different stations, and which vary from each other, have never been reported to, or sanctioned by this board. Besides the fees to the sea customers, there are others which the merchants are required to pay to the native servants, and for charities under different denominations. It might be proper for this board to call for a list of the fees, as well as the duties of every description collected or demanded at each station, and such as are approved should be inserted in a register to be constantly kept for general inspection in some public part of the the sea customer's office. If any indulgences or exemptions be allowed to particular merchants, they should be stated. As the anchorage fees and river duties on vessels produce a trifling income to the company, and are inconvenient to the merchants and owners of the small coasting craft, it may appear proper to recommend their abolition. I observe they were abolished in Ganjam, by orders from this board, in December 1788.

It is to be lamented that no maps or surveys of the districts are to be procured. Had the chiefs and councils bestowed a few of their leisure hours for the purpose, or if they had employed the talents of others which occasionally offered, they might have ascertained the geography of their own limits, with little difficulty. But I do not recollect hearing that any gentleman in the provincial councils had ever visited the zemindaries under their respective charge, unless for some hostile purpose of punishing refractory dependants, or enforcing payment of arrears. Who among them, has even made a tour to enquire into the real value of the lands, to ascertain what improvements could be introduced with respect to manufactures and agriculture, to redress grievances, or to relieve the inhabitants from oppressions, and the effects of famine? It is to be hoped, when a change takes place, that the collectors will employ themselves in such useful enquiries, and in visiting the different parts of the districts under them, for the purpose of observing the conduct of the zemindars, for affording relief to the inhabitants, and preserving order and good government.

Under the present system, every useful object appears to have been overlooked; and besides so many other defects already noticed, it is without any defined responsibility. A great part of the business is transacted by the chief alone; and the council receive his report of all personal interviews with the zemindars and others, which could not fail of producing inconvenience. The arguments used in the late suit against Mr. Floyer, are in proof on this point, as his solicitors endeavoured to show that he could not be individually answerable for any act, which had the sanction of the Masulipatam board; and that the responsibility must rest with them, and with him jointly as chief. This kind of reasoning has been urged on other occasions, according as it suited the parties concerned, and must often have been the cause of embarrassment, in discriminating on whom to fix the greater or less degree of blame. It seems a further proof in favour of an undivided authority in the detail of the collections, and the appointment of collectors.

It appears, however, to me, that no one circumstance has contributed more to irregularity, than the small salaries granted to persons in such situations. Until a few years ago, the allowed emoluments of the chief of Masulipatam amounted only to about 400 rupees per month; and to this time, the members of the provincial boards are without any allowance, and prohibited from trade, but permitted to hold different employments, such as export and import warehouse-keepers, sea customers, &c. which produce a very trifling emolument. While men were vested with a considerable trust, and so inadequately paid, with various temptations around them, few would refrain from improper channels of gaining advantages, and still fewer, who would exert themselves with zeal and ardour for the prosperity of the country. Under such a system, considerable fortunes were acquired by the chiefs, dabashes and others, and the inhabitants could find no protection against oppression. One irregularity produces another; and the evil had taken such deep root, that it could be no easy matter for any administration to put a stop to the prevailing example of preferring private interests, in opposition to useful institutions, and objects of public advantage.

If the collectors execute their trust with attention and fidelity, it will soon give a new face to the whole country, and put an end in a great measure to those calamities, of which there have been so many instances. But I am not so sanguine as to suppose that essential benefits will arise from the best arrangements, without men of integrity and experience are employed. Upon adopting the plan of collectors, many of the servants will without doubt conceive that they possess the necessary qualifications, excepting a knowledge of the languages; but this last is so requisite, that they cannot completely discharge their duty without it;—whatever may be their good intentions, they will be constantly liable to impositions; and I am really of opinion, that no permanent settlement of any district should be made, without being minutely investigated by a collector of tried integrity and industry, after a residence of a few years in it, and who possesses some knowledge of the language and of the customs of the people. Intrigue and counteraction were the only means of defence which the natives could have under a tyrannical government, and those habits will not easily be corrected under the best administration.

It becomes requisite, therefore, that the collectors should be able to speak without the intervention of a dabash. In Bengal, every European soon understands something of the Hindostany, and in consequence, the company's servants acquire more knowledge of the country, of the revenue, and of the manners of the natives, in two or three years, than they do on the coast, in ten years, or during their whole residence in India. It is unnecessary for me to say more in respect to the beneficial influence it would have, in the management of the revenue; but until some farther encouragement be held out, or a declaration be made that no person will be eligible to a revenue appointment, who is not qualified in one or more of the country languages, I despair of any great progress being made, for some time. As there is not, I believe, any dictionary of the Gentoo language, a suitable reward might be offered for the compilation of a proper work of this description, with such other books as might be useful to learners. Upon the institution of courts of justice, a knowledge of the languages will become more indispensably requisite.

The honourable Court of Directors, in their letter of the , and in subsequent advices (copies of which were transmitted to the Board of Revenue), direct that a plan should be prepared for the administration of their revenue on this coast. It was found difficult, difficult, perhaps, to offer any general plan for a permanent settlement; which has been increased, I conceive, by the depopulating effects of the late famine in the Circars. But whatever might have been the difficulty in this respect, it ought not to prevent any member of the board from pointing out any defects in the present system, or proposing some mode of relief to the inhabitants, by the institution of courts of justice, by the abolition of oppressive demands, and by establishing one uniform system, which might be productive of subordination and tranquillity in the country. I have therefore thought it my duty to offer some remarks on this occasion, which I am sensible can only be considered as a general view or outline of the company's revenue; but they may lead to a further detail or other suggestions towards completing a future plan, of more efficacy than the present system. Should it appear that I have been mistaken or misinformed on any point, I can only say that I have acted to the best of my judgment, and that I can at least lay claim to the indulgence of the board, for offering a disinterested opinion.

I will only add, that the present appears a proper time for offering any proposition of improvement, or that may be of any public utility, as this board can depend upon its meeting with support, or at least a suitable attention from the honourable the Governor in Council; and if recommended by him to the honourable the Court of Directors, there can be little doubt of their confirmation.

INSTRUCTIONS ISSUED TO COLLECTORS UNDER THE GOVERNMENT OF FORT ST. GEORGE DATED IN JUNE 1791.

Extract FORT ST. GEORGE Revenue Consultations, the 24th June 1791.

READ the following letter from the Board of Revenue, with Draft of Regulations for the different Collectors.

To the Hon. Major Gen. Medows, Governor in Council.

Hon. Sir,

Under date the 10th February last, we had the honor to submit for your approbation, a code of regulations for the conduct of the board of revenue, and which you were pleased to sanction with your concurrence.

We have since drafted another set of regulations, for the guidance of the several collectors employed under this board, having selected such part of them as appeared to us applicable to circumstances on this coast, and modified, and introduced others, so as to form a system, which, properly supported, will be adequate, we hope, to the purposes of benefit to the revenue as well as justice and security to the inhabitants. Copy of these Regulations are now submitted for your approval and confirmation.

We have the honour, &c.

17. That as cases may, however, occur, in which the payment of the revenue may be protracted or delayed, from accidental causes of necessity, without any fault or neglect of the renter, the collector in such instances be authorized to suspend the rigorous execution of the injunctions in the conclusion of the 16th article, reporting the case to the board of revenue, with the reasons which have induced him to suspend the measure.

35. That in case of appeal, the decision of the collector shall remain in force, until approved or disapproved by the board of revenue; and in like manner, the decision of the board of revenue, until confirmed or rescinded by the superior board; the collector and board of revenue, until confirmed or rescinded by the superior board, to abide the event of the suit.

38. That all application from the collectors for temporary leave of absence from their stations, shall be made to the board of revenue.
39. That no collector upon any account exceed the fixed or established charges; and that he insert no charge in his treasury account, but such as may be conformable to the fixed establishment, or sanctioned by a special order of the board of revenue; which is in that case to be quoted, with the date of its being issued.

Neither is he to impose, on any account whatever, any new articles of taxation upon the ryots; and if hereafter any irregular assessments, under the names of nuzzar, saderwared, or gram khurch, batta, &c. or any new taxes whatever, should be imposed by any renter, the collector, on proof of such extortion, is to decree double the amount thereof to the party injured.
42. 50. Whenever there shall be any of the honourable company's troops at a revenue station, the commanding officer shall on no account, of his own authority, detach any Sepoys, either singly or in parties, beyond their quarters, upon any service whatever, except at the requisition in writing of the collector of the station at which he is fixed. This order is not to be understood to impede the performance of any customary regimental services or duties.

52. Whenever the collector shall find it necessary to detach any Sepoys for escorts of treasure, or other public duties, he shall make a requisition in writing to the commanding officer, specifying the nature of the service; and the officer shall determine the strength of the detachment, and give his separate orders to the officer commanding such detachment, for the performance of any service in such case as may require it, and no detachment shall be made without a requisition in writing from the collector.
53. That no collector shall be authorized to employ regular troops in the collection of the revenue. Such particular cases as may require the assistance of regulars, must be immediately reported to government.
54. All requisitions and instructions relative to military service, shall be entered by the collector in a separate book, to be kept for that purpose, of which he shall transmit a copy monthly to the board of revenue.
55. That whenever a requisition for Sepoys shall be made by a collector, he shall, within twenty-four hours after such requisition has been made, transmit advice thereof to the board of revenue, assigning the reasons which induced him to make it, that the board may, if the reasons shall not appear to them sufficient, give orders for recalling the detachment, or limit the duration of it.
56. That no batta be ever levied or taken by Sepoys employed on revenue business.
57. That the collectors do pay attention to all references of complaints, and to all applications or requisitions made by the president of the board of revenue, the acting president, or the accountant, for papers or accounts.

60. That the collector make it an invariable rule to report the death or apparent approach of any zemindar, as also the death of any pensioner, or officer paid by him; and that the pay of any deceased pensioner be not continued to his family, without the express sanction of the board of revenue.
61. That when the property of land is disputed between persons under the authority of different collectors, the land shall remain in the possession of the person holding it, until a regular decision upon the case shall pass.

62. That when persons under the authority of any collectors shall take refuge within lands under another jurisdiction, they shall, upon application from the person from whose authority they have fled, to the collector of the district where they have fled, be delivered up.
63. That no application shall be made by any collector for persons flying from his authority to that of another, excepting for officers of government; or upon specific complaints preferred against the parties flying, for balances due on accounts unadjusted; and previous to such an application, the collector shall endeavour to satisfy himself as far as possible, that the complaints are well-founded, and that the persons complained against, have not been forced into elopement by severities or extortions. On their return, the collector himself is required to enquire into and decide the complaints preferred to him, on which his application is grounded; it being understood, that no collector shall compel any ryot or other persons, not his public servants, to reside within the bounds of his collectorship, but shall permit them to settle where they please.
64. That the present Regulations, except the 19th, 28th, 30th, 30th, 31st, 35th, 37th, 38th, 39th, 40th, 45th, 46th, 48th, 50th, 51st, 52d, 53d, 54th, 55th, the latter part of the 56th, the 60th, and 70th, be translated into the country languages, and published for the information of the persons under the authority of the collectors; being all orders, injunctive or prohibitive, contained in these Regulations, to which their observance is required; and that copies of them be constantly kept in the public cutcherry of each collectorship, and be there open to the access of all persons desirous of consulting them.
65. That the collectors be directed to cause the deeds of settlement to be executed by the zemindars and renters in their presence at all times, where there is no good reason for the zemindar not appearing in person.
66. That every petition or application relating to any matter of revenue, either verbal or written, shall be received, heard, and recorded by the collector, whether dismissed or not; and the dismissal, with the reasons assigned for it, be recorded, leaving it to the party to seek further redress at the presidency, if he thinks fit.
67. Numerous petitions being daily presented to the board from different quarters, which tend to embarrass and impede business of greater importance, as without having sufficient means of decision before them, they are under the necessity of making constant references to remove this inconvenience, all petitions, being regularly signed and dated, shall be first presented to the collector in whose district the subject of complaint or representation may occur; who shall either afford redress or satisfaction to the parties aggrieved; or on the other hand, if the claim or fact is deemed inadmissible, the collector shall subscribe or affix to the petition, the causes of dismissal, and return it to the petitioner (reserving an authenticated copy for record) who, if he should think proper, may afterwards lay it before the board of revenue, who will then be enabled, from the consideration of both sides of the question, to decide thereon, and either finally reject the prayer of the petition, or confirm such part as they may judge admissible.
68. And farther, if any petitioner shall complain to the board, of the collector having refused, or unnecessarily delayed to give him a hearing, in which, if it shall be found he has been well grounded, such collector will incur their severe displeasure, however trifling the cause; and if on the contrary it shall appear that the complainant has been guilty of misrepresentation, and that his petition had not been previously presented to the collector, he will either receive an adequate punishment for such an offence from the board, or be returned to the collector for that purpose, to be made an example of, on the spot, as circumstances may determine.
69. That on the resignation of a collector, he shall deliver over to his successor every public account and document, with all original letters received, and copies of letters sent, relative to his charge: two lists of such accounts, letters, &c. are to be signed by the collector on making over his employ, one, to be delivered to his successors, the other, to be transmitted to the board of revenue.
70. The collectors are required to address the board of revenue, if they have reason to apprehend any particular inconvenience likely to arise from a literal adherence to any of the above Regulations; and they are to state the grounds of such apprehensions to the board of revenue, who are to submit the same, with their opinion, to the decision of the Governor in Council. The above present general Regulations are to be held in force from the 1st of August 1791; and the collectors are to consider them, as standing rules of conduct; any particular orders or instructions they may have received that are not revoked or superseded by the above rules, are also to be in force and observed accordingly. The Governor in Council require the strictest attention on the part of the collectors of the revenue to all and each of the preceding Regulations. And the Board of Revenue are hereby strictly enjoined minutely to attend to their execution, and to report every instance in which their observance shall be neglected, or in any manner omitted.

EXTRACTS FROM REPORT OF MR. PLACE,

Respecting the Land Tenures in the Jaghire; dated 6th June 1799.

Collector's Report on Land Tenures in The Jaghire.

PARA. 69.—I draw my first arguments in favour of the hereditary right of the indigenous natives and husbandmen to the usufructuary property of the soil,—from the division of the lands into shares,—and from the appointment of a distinct class of people to record them, to note down every variation that takes place, and to keep all accounts of the cultivation and produce. As I have already said, these divisions are supposed to have taken place at the original settlement of each village, and were, to a greater or smaller number, according to the number of original settlers or of labouring servants that they brought with them: for I presume I need not explain that the latter, doomed to the meanest offices, can acquire no property in land. Had they been regulated by any other rule, villages of the same extent, would have been divided into the same number of shares; whereas, whilst one is divided into ten, another having the same quantity of land annexed to it, may be divided into one hundred shares, but all equal. Every original share may be reckoned a freehold, which although it may have been subsequently subdivided into several smaller ones; they all hold of the proprietor of the original remainder, who retains a pre-eminence over them, and to whom, I imagine, they were originally considered to owe service: for his right of pre-eminence is still so tenaciously asserted, and so unequivocally acknowledged, that when making the late settlement of the jaghire, a few meerassadars only of the villages, where I knew them to be very numerous, appeared to rent them. I was told that these were the proprietors of the original shares: that all others were sub-meerassadars, and would agree to whatever terms their principals entered into: and although I thought it proper that all should give their consent personally, or by writing, yet I found that the sub-meerassadars invariably considered themselves dependent upon the proprietor of the share, from which they had ramified, if I may use the expression. The village of Poolah, for instance, was originally divided into four shares, which stand upon its records, and originally held by four proprietors or meerassadars, but from those causes which, in all parts of the world, occasion, in the course of time, a greater diffusion of property, there are thirty meerassadars; yet the original division into four shares is preserved, and not multiplied into thirty. Ask any one of the thirty, into how many shares his village is divided, he will say four: ask him, how much meerassassee, or how much landed property he has in the village, he will say an half, a quarter, a sixteenth, or any fractional part of a share. The village of Damerlah, on the other hand, is divided into 160 original shares, but is now enjoyed only by twenty-three proprietors, who are registered, as holding so many shares and fractional parts of a share. But although the sub-meerassadars are thus considered subordinate to their principals, this is all the difference between them; for they are equally entitled to participate in those fees and privileges which, as I shall show hereafter, mark the distinction between a meerassadar, or actual proprietor, and a pyacarry, or temporary cultivating tenant. This, perhaps, will convey a distinct idea of the terms meerassassee and meerassadar; and the system bears so strong an analogy to feudal tenure, that mankind, when formed into societies, seems to have been intuitively directed to it: it is indeed the doctrine of confederacy and subordination, calculated to impress upon the mind, that individual property is invariably subservient to the purposes of the community, and conditionally held of some superior. By the feudal system, the great feudatories held of the king; and the lesser owed service to their superior lords. The whole, afterwards, were denominated freeholders. Here the original meerassadars held also, of the sovereign, and the sub-meerassadars, of them: and all, I think, come properly under the definition of freeholders, and are equally entitled to hold their property on the same terms.

70. In the course of the various revolutions that have happened since the original settlement of the villages, it may be supposed, that their division into shares, has been frequently changed. Whole districts were desolated by the cruelties and arbitrary exactions of the Momedan governments, and the entire population of them fell into a temporary or a permanent state of servitude, to some other parts of the country, for protection. If the whole returned to their native villages, they retained of course their former customs: but if partially, after any great lapse of time, or if the villages were settled with new inhabitants, these circumstances directed their future customs, as to the establishment of shares, still more, if the lands had by long neglect, been again overrun with judge. But reverence for the customs of their forefathers and predecessors, if they could be discovered, for the most part, influenced their adoption. In the course of my management in the Jaghire, I have had occasion to settle villages of all descriptions, and have found this attachment to ancient habits and institutions, invariably prevail. Where remembrance of them was preserved, I adopted them, as far as was practicable; but in cases where none was to be obtained, that is, where the lands had grown entirely into disuse, and nothing more was known of the villages to which they belonged, than the name, the division of them, was regulated by the abilities of those who were to be settled on them. 70. In the course of the various revolutions that have happened since the original settlements of the villages, it may be supposed that their division into shares, has been frequently changed. Whole districts were desolated by the crackles and arbitrary exactions of the Mahomedan governments, and the entire population of them removed either temporarily or forever, to some other parts of the country, for protection. If the share returned to their native villages, they retained of course their former customs: but if partially, after any great conquest of time, or if the villages were settled with new inhabitants, these circumstances directed their future customs, as to the establishment of shares; still more, if the lands had by long neglect, been again overrun with jungle. But reverence for the customs of their forefathers and predecessors, if they could be discovered, for the most part, influenced their adoption. In the course of my management in the Jaghire, I have had occasion to settle villages of all descriptions, and have found this attachment to ancient habits and institutions, invariably prevail. Where remembrance of them was preserved, I adopted them, as far as was practicable; but in cases where none was to be obtained, that is, where the lands had grown entirely into disuse, and nothing more was known of the villages to which they belonged, than the name, the division of them, was regulated by the abilities of those who were to be settled on them. As it was deemed essential by the inhabitants, that all the shares should be equal, I conformed to preceding usage; and they agreed among themselves, to take one or more, or only a fractional part of one.

71. It may perhaps at first sight be thought that the office of curnum, being that which I said a distinct class of people is appointed, whose duty is to register the meerrassadars or proprietors of the village; to note down all changes among them; to attest all deeds of sale, transfer or assignment; and to keep an account of the cultivation and produce of the village, at the will of government, and that it is instituted, because, as they may argue against the inheritance of the lands, and be occupied promiscuously by the inhabitants of that or any other village, it is the more expedient to have such a check. The office itself, is known to be hereditary, so long as the duty of it, is faithfully performed; and to be mutually for the interest and convenience of the government and the subject. Every office besides implies a compensation; and it could neither be hereditary nor compensated, if the lands were precariously held. The caprice of the inhabitants might give them a preference for the lands of another village; and any temporary dissatisfaction might prompt them to remove, if their interest expired with the harvest. The lands being forsaken, (for it might not always be possible, to persuade other inhabitants to cultivate them,) the office of curnum could be no dependance, and he would also forsake it to find subsistence elsewhere. I have made use of the word meerasssee to express this hereditary property, because it is in more familiar use; but cauniatthy is the proper term, as I have before shown, among the natives, to denote the interest which they possess in it; and by its signification, conveys a self-evident proof of this right.

72. I draw my argument, secondly, in favour of the hereditary right of the husbandmen, from the tanks and other immense works that have been constructed for the purposes of cultivation. If the division of the lands, and the office of curmum are received as testimonies in favour of the hereditary property of the inhabitants, these expensive undertakings argue in favour of the intention of government, that it should be hereditary; for it is absurd to imagine that they would have been constructed, without a sufficient assurance of the attachment of the husbandman to the lands that they water; and this attachment, as I have already said, and shall further illustrate by positive example, is to be given only by permanent possession, and a total freedom from restraint, in the use and transfer of property. I might indeed here put the question immediately home, by asking,—if under an impression of the precarious occupation of the lands, the very large sums that have been laid out upon the tanks and watercourses the last four years, would have been expended? These are, I think, such self-evident proofs as are superior to all argument.

73. Thirdly, I deduce the position, from the two discriminating terms made use of, to express the two descriptions of husbandmen in whose occupation the land may be, of meerassadar and pyacarry, and from the usages that obtain among the natives themselves, under a conviction of the privileges appertaining to these different tenures. If the first of these terms, as I have already endeavoured to show, is definitive of that class of husbandmen who have descended from, succeeded to, or stand in the place of, the original settlers in the villages, that is, real proprietors; the latter, must be expressive of another class, who have a different interest in the land, less than that of proprietors. A pyacarry, accordingly, means a husbandman who cultivates the land of another, either for one or more years, by agreement, but mostly for one only, as leases do not seem formerly to have been in use; and having only a contingent interest in it, as an incitement to exertion, he him to bring part of his labours from his own village, or as an incitement to exertion, he receives one half of the produce, which is, generally speaking, a greater share than a meerassadar receives. If the meerassadars are capable of cultivating all their lands, a pyacarry will not be admitted; nor can he, on any account, in that case, have a preference from any competent authority, without a palpable injustice to the others.

meerassadar receives. If the meerassadar, on any account, is pyacarry will not be admitted; nor can he, on any account, to the from any competent authority, without a palpable injustice to the others.

74. There are, however, many instances, where pyacarrys bear exact analogy to the copyholders of England. The latter, it has been shown, derived their title to their estates from long residence and occupancy of them, and thence were enabled to prescribe against the lords of whom they held them, even before the statute of Charles II. which gave them a property in land, although originally mere tenants: they could not, before this, be compelled to relinquish their lands at the lord's will, if they continued to perform the services, that is, to pay him the rent, into which all services were for the most part resolved. Yet their subjection to the lord is, even to this day, so clearly preserved, that a copyhold does not pass from one man to another, by the common rules of alienation, as in other estates; but must be first surrendered back to the lord of the fee, on which it is dependant. So the description of pyacarrys here mentioned, enjoy the right of cultivating the soil by prescription, themselves and their ancestors having done so, for many generations. They cannot be forced away from the village at the will of the meerassadars, who must assign ground for them. But they cannot sell, mortgage, or transfer, for a valuable consideration, their right; for it consists in the use only, and not in the substance of the soil. Their heirs succeed; but, in default of them, the lands revert to the meerassadars. This, however, to be considered the law, as it originally stood with regard to such property; for, on account of the reduced state of population, these pyacarrys, I believe, are allowed to call in others, and to appoint successors. Still the right is never a subject of bargain and sale. They receive a share of 45, instead of 50 per cent.; because, although they have no more than a contingent interest, yet it is improved at least into a life estate. But they do not, in any shape, participate in the fees and privileges of the meerassadars, to whom, on the contrary, they pay fees.

75. There is yet another description of pyacarry, or rather perhaps of servants, who also may be compared with a copyholder. They are found in fertile and well-watered villages, the the meerassce whereof belongs to Bramins, who being forbid to cultivate the lands themselves, must employ servants for that purpose. The labouring servants are for the most part piriars, who can by no means acquire property in land; and I have not yet met with an instance of their having done so. They receive wages, partly in money and partly in those fees, which I explained in my report of the 6th October 1795, called cattavassum, and if not the slaves of the meerassadars, renew their service every year. But the other class of servants are men of the pulle cast, and, either by custom or rule, have an hereditary right of service under the meerassadars, and are entitled to one-third of the share which the latter receive of the crops. The meerassadars, in this case, receive the cattavassum. Madranticum affords a very curious example of the preservation and assertion of this right. Previous to the repair of the tank, it is not known how long the lands were cultivated: but so soon as this work was completed, the descendants of many families, who had formerly been the hereditary servants of the Bramins, claimed and were admitted to their inheritance; although in the intermediate time, they had taken up other occupations, and might be supposed to have forgot it. The office constitutes the inheritance, like many offices of the feudal system. It might of course be relinquished by the occupant, who by that means, broke the succession; and in failure of heirs, it rested with the meerassadar to appoint others or not; but this, also, cannot be sold, mortgaged, or transferred.

76. It may be better perhaps to mention now, than hereafter, one very striking resemblance that this country affords to the feudal system, regarding servants; and as I could not quote those of Judge Blackstone. In my report of the 6th October 1795, I slightly mentioned them, and intimated my intention of making further enquiry into their circumstances; but it would now be difficult to institute any investigation into their origin; and is one of those things that we must be contented to know existed with the Hindoo constitution, without assigning a reason, or discovering a cause.

77. "Under the Saxon government there were, as Sir William Temple speaks, a sort of people, in a condition of downright servitude, used and employed in the most servile works, and belonging, both they and their children and effects, to the lord of the soil, like the rest of the cattle or stock upon it."

78. "These villains belonging principally to the lords of the manors, were either villains regardant, that is, annexed to the manor or land; or else they were in gross or at large, and transferable by deed, from one owner to another. They could not leave their lord, without his permission; but if they ran away, or were purloined from him, might be claimed and recovered by action, like beasts or other chattles. They held, indeed, small portions of land, by way of sustaining themselves and their families; but it was at the mere will of the lord, who might dispossess them whenever he pleased."

79. Slaves of this description, are very numerous all over the country; and are, I think, preferably situated to servants more at liberty, who also, from the constitution of their religion, are very little better than slaves. I have seen that the masters of the former, take an interest in protecting, and in marrying them; for their offspring is in fact, an increase of their own property.—nay, so contented are they with the treatment they meet with, that but very few instances have come within my knowledge of their desertion, when they have been claimed in the manner stated in the quotation; and but one, where it has been so tyrannical, that they were not to be prevailed upon to return. One man, a nattawar in Poonamallee, lately dead, possessed four hundred families of slaves. Reduced by the improvidence of his father to great distress, he could employ only about one hundred; but so strong did the attachment of all the rest remain to him, that although they had for the most part, engaged in the service of European gentlemen, and of myself among the rest, had he possessed the means of subsisting them, they would voluntarily, or with very little persuasion, have returned to him. The servants of the vellalers were antiently all slaves, and I believe it is only with such that they are now found. Perhaps it was thought to be politically necessary that they should be made slaves, on the first peopling of the Carnatic.

80. But to resume my subject. The striking contrast between a meerassadar and a pyacarry of any description, fixes, I think satisfactorily, a right to the substance of the soil in the former: for if he had no more than a right to cultivate it, or only a preference in the cultivation, it would be equally to him, as to the pyacarry, a thing of no real value.—Whereas the meerassadar sells, mortgages, gives away, or leaves his lands to his posterity, which the other, cannot; at least, he cannot do that which constitutes value,—he cannot sell or mortgage them; nor would he, but for the low state of population, be allowed to give them away, or appoint his successors in default of heirs.

81. This idea of property, I conceive, can never have rested on a surreptitious title. It must either have been acquired by a positive grant, or conceded upon the principle of that compact which binds society together, by which every individual establishes in himself, a right to use his property, liable to those demands which the state has, or may have upon it. If it had been a pretended title furtively set up, doubts and suspicions would somewhere have betrayed it; and we never should have seen the natives so tenaciously assert and challenge enquiry into their rights regarding it; nay, if they harboured a suspicion that it was a thing of which they might be deprived, without infringing justice, it is impossible that they would buy or sell it, or that they could consider it the most substantial security for borrowing and lending.

82. Meerassce then is the ultimate and the largest interest that they can covet or can have in lands; and the force of its operation upon them has, on numerous occasions, been as strongly exemplified as in the enfranchised villages of Poland; and if it bears a construction different from that which I have always given it, and which it has, in the common acceptation tion of the natives themselves, I can only hope to be excused for having mistaken the rights of government, by the beneficial effects of the illusion.

83. The war of 1780, and the famine which it occasioned, I need not say swept off a great part of the population of the Jaghire, whereby the lands of most villages were partially or wholly left without proprietors. Parents, children, and relations were, in some places, extirpated. In this state, I found many parts of the Jaghire; but when the system of village rents was to take place, it was indispensable to assign meerassadars to the unappropriated lands. Without it, I found that they could not be rented; but the idea of permanent property was such an inducement, that I was not only able to fill up the vacant shares, but to convert the most stubborn soil, and the thickest jungle, into fertile villages. Give the meerassce, and we will both rent the lands and employ all our labour to make them productive, was the common observation; but without it, as we can have our choice of land, we will cultivate only that which will yield us the quickest and the largest product.

84. But besides the contingency of extinction by death, other causes may call forth the exercise of this sovereign privilege. Voluntary relinquishment is one; and many acts may be done contrary to the tenure by which property is held, amounting to a forfeiture of it, as when the land is wilfully neglected: for as the public revenue is drawn from it, public embarrassment in that case ensues, and it is incompatible that the state should be exposed to injury, by individual caprice. One of the first duties of the sovereign, is to neglect no means of redering the land under his obedience, as well cultivated as possible, and not to allow either communities or private persons to acquire tracts of land, in order to leave it uncultivated.—Upon all these occasions then, the privilege appearing to me so inherent, and the exercise of it so indispensable, I had no scruple in giving covele for the unoccupied meerassce. To those who would consent to accept it, I gave it "to them, and their heirs for ever, so long as they continued in obedience to the Circular, and paid all just dues:" in which words, are comprized all the duties they owe, and the conditions they are to perform. The effect hereby produced, I shall have occasion to explain hereafter.

85. Lastly, the right of the meerassadar to the property of the soil, is established by the Gentoo laws themselves. The translator makes a very obvious and just remark in his preface or commentaries, that "the code begins with regulations for that which, is one of the first cements of civil society, the mutation of property," by which I suppose he means security in the possession, and free agency in the use of it. The laws speak of property and effects, and of estates real and personal; and the first chapter ordains that money shall be lent on pledge, security, bond or witness, the two first of which are to answer the payment of the debt, and the latter to prove its validity. Now these distinctions are perfectly conformable with our own ideas and our own laws; for although every thing that belongs to a man may be called his property, in common language, yet when the term real is prefixed, it defines it to be that substantial kind of property which exists independent of himself, and which he cannot annihilate or destroy; on the other hand, personal property means that which is produced by a man's own labour or industry, and absolutely at his disposal. His money, his goods, or his chattels, may pass away from him; but his land remains for ever. I apprehend also the terms pledge and security will be most aptly applied to those two kinds of property, in the same order; for although property real and personal may be considered either as a pledge or a security, yet the word pledge conveys an idea of solidity most adapted to land or real property. It may be said also, that security does not always mean an actual deposit. A man may borrow upon the security of another; but it is the property of this man, the wealth which he is known to possess, that becomes the security, and not his plighted faith; for it is to answer the debt.

86. The Gentoo laws regulate the division, which a man among his sons, or which his heirs shall make among themselves, of his "glebe land, orchard, houses, rents, &c. of his estate real and personal." They permit him to mortgage his land as a pledge for debt, and even to sell it.

87. page 83. "A father shall not so give away or sell the effects and glebe belonging to himself, or to his father and ancestors, as that his immediate dependant should be distressed for want of victuals and clothing; if reserving so much as is necessary for the immediate food and clothing of his dependants, he should sell or give away the property, he has authority so to sell and give away." He could not sell or give away that to which he had not a permanent right; and as his sons may succeed to his estate, property in land, as well as other things, I conceive, is clearly made inheritable. I might quote many more passages, in support of the position; but unless any imputation, which I have never heard of, lies against the authority of the code, this will be received as sufficient.

88. The only objection that presents itself against the inheritance of land is, in the use of terms glebe and glebe land: but I think it is very easily explained away. If they are to be understood in the same acceptation as they have been among ourselves, with whom they signify those small allotments of land which belong to the clergy, village maunians, which bear the nearest assimilation to them, must be meant. But when lands are in a state of villainage, that is, divided among the resident tenants, these terms mean each man's particular portion of the lands of the village; and in no other sense than this, can the Gentoo law be made to apply; for the maunians of the meerassadars are often so small as not to be divisible among them, still less to admit of the operation of the law, in other respects.

89. "If a parcel of land hath not been divided among brothers, they all shall receive equal shares." The village of Madranticum consist only of 202 cawnies. Supposing fifty-two meerassadars; and their maunians consist only of 202 cawnies. Supposing the the mecrassee to be equally divided among all, and any one man to have five sons, on his death they would divide a little more than ten goontahs each, or 640 square yards; the next subdivision would leave two goontahs, or 128 square yards, upon the same scale; and in the course of a short time, the property would be indivisible. In many villages, much larger than this, the mecrassee manumiums are not a tenth part, belonging to perhaps a greater number of mecrassadars: so that this kind of property is too diminutive to be an object of legal regulation; and in some, there are none at all: and we cannot suppose a law to be made for a nonentity. Besides, the Gentoo laws prescribe what is to be observed, in cases of the mortgage of "as much land as will serve for the maintenance of one man for a year." Now I don't know an instance where any man's proportion of village manumiums, will do this; and it seems intended for wise purposes, that they should not; otherwise he would cultivate his manumiums, and leave the other lands waste. Rules are also laid down for sons building themselves houses and making gardens "on their father's land," to which uses, manumiums cannot be applied; for they belong to the mecrassadars at large, and are never parcelled out among them individually.

90. But not to weary with anticipating more objections; by mecrassee manumiums, I must be understood to mean only those which belong to the proprietors of the whole lands of the village, and not what are set aside for the various village servants, to whom they are often an adequate subsistence, but which do not come under the law in other respects. These village servants, are respectively mecrassadars of their office, to which the manumiums are attached, and cannot be sold or separated from it. But the first mentioned description of manumiums, I have not found to have any other design, than as tokens or attestations of the right of property in the lands. This may be said to stand in the room of title deeds; for when a man has no other proof, he rests his right upon having received his proportion of the produce of the manumiums, or if there are no manumiums, upon having participated in the cawny semah, which has been explained in my report of the 6th Oct. 1793, and is set apart with the same intent; and such is so evidently the construction among the natives themselves, that although a man by other pursuits, may be induced for a time to relinquish the cultivation of his lands, he will appoint a gomastah or attorney solely to receive his proportion of one or the other, or both, where they exist together, if he means at a future day to resume it. A very extraordinary instance of this occurred, in making the late lease. A man had removed from his ordinary village to some distant part of the country; so long ago, that it became almost a waste, and indeed acquired the appellation of a desolate village. This gomastah appeared, and clearly proved having received the produce of the manumiums and the cawny semah, when any cultivation had been carried on by virtue of due powers; but could give no information of his constituent, whom therefore, after having allowed him a sufficient time to assert his right by public notification, I considered to have renounced it altogether.

91. Under all these circumstances, I think it must be admitted that the mecrassadar has an undoubted hereditary property in the soil; that he derives his right originally from the sovereign, to whom he acknowledges obedience, and the render of a stated proportion of the produce, as the tenure by which he holds it; that under this impression, he uses it, as may be most for his advantage; and that by law, he considers that right sacred and unalienable, so long as he performs the condition annexed to it.

94. Were I called upon to define the term mecrassee, and its properties, I think it bears exact analogy to a fee. I would call mecrassee, a freehold estate of inheritance; and a mecrassadar, a tenant in fee simple, holding of a superior lord, on condition of rendering him service. This lord is the Circar; his estate, the usufructuary right of the soil; and the service he owes, a render of a stated portion of the produce of his labour. This definition applies equally to hereditary officers, to the polijar, curnum and others, as to the proprietor of the land.

96. But even admitting the right of property to the soil, to have been a positive grant from the sovereign to the mecrassadar, it is as well confined to him, as that of the freeholder to his estate in Great Britain; and in the room of the title deeds, his right is supported by a much more lasting evidence, the land itself; which, besides what has been already spoken of, testifies in another way, to his favour; namely, that every native takes one of his names from his family village. If a preference in the cultivation is all that belongs to him, it must so often have been denied, and occasioned his removal, that he could have felt no attachment to his native soil, and there could have been no necessity for the distinction between a mecrassadar and pyacarry; the latter of whom, comes I think nearer to the situation of the tenant of an estate; for he to whom the preference of cultivation was given, became in that case, the mecrassadar. Hereditary residence, however, and a precarious subsistence, do not well coincide: a man continues to live where his father lived before him, only because he succeeds to certain rights and privileges, which constitute his estate, and of which he cannot be deprived, but under those circumstances, which, by the laws of his country, amount to a forfeiture; and he has so well grounded a confidence in the justice of those laws, that the forfeiture is made to be his own act, if it takes place.

97. Lands cannot be alienated without a written instrument; because both the sovereign and the subject have a mutual property in them. Each, however, may alienate his own, and the other is not affected. The sovereign may part with his interest in them, but the usufructuary right remains with the subject; and all that the latter can sell, mortgage, or give away, is the enjoyment of the profit, after paying what is due to the sovereign; and it is a right so well defined, so clear, and so thoroughly established in the mecrassadar, that I must again repeat, without it, the country never could have attained such a pitch of wealth and fertility, as formerly distinguished it. Alienations of land, however, by written written instruments, are not peculiar to the Mahomedan governments; for I have met with patents granted by Hindoo princes. But there is one kind of alienated land, which has its origin entirely in the former, I mean sunnud mauniams, or rather, as they should be called, sunnud enoums; for mauniam is a Shan-crit word, and sunnud, a Persian. They are small portions of land held by sunnud, or order, renewable from year to year; and if they are not so renewed, the title ceases. I conceive them to have been at first given, in are not so renewed, the title ceases. I conceive them to have been at first given, in liquidation of pay to servants and dependents, as well as for the expenses of mosques, and for the subsistence of those who attended them. One man got orders for three or four years successively, on the same village; and hence, establishing a sort of usage, he claimed the issuing of the sunnud, as a matter of right; but to this day, he can receive nothing, without a renewal by some competent authority. Sunnud mauniams are still distinguished in the accounts from turrabuddy mauniams, which include those of all kinds; that is, to mecrassadars, whether of the lands or offices; to pagodas, and whatever was set apart at the original measurement of the lands of the village, as the term denotes.

98. If the mecrassadar has no other interest than is vested in him, according to the acceptance of government, it is in fact none, when examined into. Preference is no more than a priority in choice; and choice implies a power of rejection; so that a preference of cultivation must suppose a competition, open to all offers, and may be given indifferently to any man. Meerassee, therefore, in this sense, is no more than immediate occupancy, and mecrassadar, the present tenant.

99. Change this preference into a right of cultivation, which shall exclude competition, so long as the occupier of the ground has the means, or is willing to cultivate it,—still it is no right, unless the demand upon his labour is defined, so as to leave him a surplus or profit, which shall constitute a certain dependance or estate. This brings the question exactly to what I have laid down; that mecrassee is a right to use the thing, and to enjoy it, so long as the condition annexed to that enjoyment is performed; in other words, so long as the rent is paid in money or in kind.

189. It is a fundamental maxim in the practice of the natives, that a pyacarry is entitled, generally speaking, to one-half of the produce of his cultivation, after setting aside the fees of different kinds, payable out of it. There are different kinds of pyacarries, as I have before shown; but their share is universally higher than that of the mecrassadar in the same village. The word pyacarry, or rather payacarry, is a compound Persian word from pay پای the foot, and karidum, کاریدن to labour; or, as others say, kish, kar, kurdun کش کار کردن to cultivate; signifying, a man who journeys to his work or cultivation. The Hindoo and Malabar word for this description of cultivator, is succowashee, which signifies technically, that not being bound to any particular spot, he may take what belongs to him, and go where he pleases.—In fact, a sojourner, a resident pyacarry, that is, such as I have assimilated to a copyholder in England, usually cultivates and makes his dwelling near them; but having a life estate in them, he receives no more than 45 per cent of the produce, as may be seen by the old accounts which I furnished of Outramalore. The pyacarry who cultivates from year to year, having only a contingent interest, which may expire with the harvest, it is necessary to hold out some additional incitement to him. He is usually brought from an adjoining village, where he has mecrassee, and of course will not bring any part of his labour from that village, unless some extra advantage, which he cannot there have, is given to compensate him for doing so; he therefore receives 5 per cent. more than the resident pyacarry, or 50 per cent. of his cultivation, after setting aside fees. If he receives a higher proportion than this, it is under the sanction of specific agreements for the culture of waste or very poor lands. The mecrassadars having the choice of land, always cultivate that which is nearest to the village, unless select spots here and there are found, whose fertility will repay them for going to a distance.

190. This, therefore, which is an usage established by themselves, becomes a fixed principle and criterion by which to judge of their genuine rights; and it is further established, by the fraudulent practices which I have before had occasion to observe were used in this respect. A man would enter one part of his cultivation in his own name, as mecrassadar, and the other in a borrowed name, as pyacarry; because in the first capacity, besides his share of the crops, he participates in the fees that mecrassadars collect upon the cultivation at large; and in the latter, he receives a higher warum than as mecrassadar he was entitled to. It was no unusual thing to keep the name of a mecrassadar upon the accounts, who had been dead perhaps fifty years, because it gave an opportunity to his successor to claim a higher share, under pretence of being only in trust of his mecrassee, which he cultivated as pyacarry, whilst at the same time, this successor was his son and heir, and being known as such among the inhabitants of the village, lost none of his fees. The excuse given for this was, that it was mamool to keep the name of the deceased upon record.

191. Such a counterfeit, argues that the share of the pyacarry is the highest that can in general be divided; and as most villages had at some time or other, admitted this class of cultivators, so it afforded for the most part, a good rule for establishing that of the mecrassadars; or, if there were any exceptions, villages under the same circumstances, supplied the defect. But as encroachments had been proportioned to the opportunities of making them, so they were various and fluctuating. In some, they had been enormous, in others, moderate, and in a few, there did not appear to have been any; but as the discovery of the old accounts has since shown, always subject to the caprice and favour of the Circar and its servants; so that no degree of encroachment had been so uniformly observed, as to grow into established usage or prescription. When, therefore, the inhabitants laid claim prescriptively to any particular rate of division, their title was destroyed by evidence of a different usage. Being introduced by the voluntary consent of the inhabitants themselves, it must be supposed to have have been regulated, so as to leave him a reasonable compensation, and no more; for if he demanded more, he was not allowed to cultivate the land. There are particular situations in which he receives both more and less; but in the one case, it is by express agreement from year to year, or for the lease, and in the other, in conformity with local customs affecting particular villages. In all other cases, even if he makes no previous agreement, he is always considered entitled to half the produce, after deducting fees.

192. This rule then, with respect to pyacarrs, raises such an implication, and affords so strong a presumption against the just claim of the mecrassadars, to so high a share as they receive, as supersedes the necessity of any other proof. A contingent interest must have some extraordinary compensation to balance the disadvantage, which the termination of it may occasion; and it is for this reason, that a tenant in Europe will be satisfied with a moderate profit upon a long lease, and that the landlord must concede to him higher advantages, for a short one.

193. There can be no doubt that the share of the pyacarry has gradually increased since the days of Saadat Ullah Cawn; for if, generally speaking, the mecrassadar's proportion was thirty-five per cent. at that time, a very little more, may well have been a sufficient compensation to the former. And although I am of opinion that even less than the average of the present times, would both repay his labour and afford him a profit, yet it is the best criterion to follow, as having been determined by circumstances into which no enquiry can now be made; and because it is marked by general acquiescence and contentment. The rule also does not seem to be confined to the Carnatic, for independent of Bengal, it appears, by Tippoo's revenue regulations, to extend to the Mysore country, where the produce of land of a certain description—hissa, is equally divided between government and the ryot;—and it is notorious that Tippoo pays the strictest attention to the situation of the husbandman.

194. By what I have said, it must be very manifest that reference to so distant a period as thirty or forty years, for establishing the just shares of the inhabitants, must either be impossible or inconclusive.—If practicable, as some villages may be supposed to have enjoyed a greater, and others a less degree of the favour of the Circar and its servants, they would consequently have made proportionate encroachments; some ~~also~~ might be labouring under their displeasure, and altogether deprived of the advantages, which by connivance they had once gained; so that so fluctuating a system, in all likelihood, would have been far from giving universal satisfaction. If a further retrospect was had, namely, into the days of Saadat Ullah Cawn, the same shares which they then enjoyed, would in these times, afford them no more than subsistence.—Both therefore, only offer a choice of difficulties; whilst in taking their own practice, as it has grown up and been established by the concurrence of various circumstances, as the basis of their just rights, I have done that which seems the least objectionable, and is the most agreeable to themselves.

195. A mecrassadar, therefore, must be understood, in general to have a right to no more than 45 per cent. of the produce divisible between him and the Circar; except in certain situations, as follow;

196. First,—In lands which are situated under small tanks, holding from one to two months water, where the crops being dependent the first part of the season on timely rains; and the latter, on a sufficiency of water being retained in the tanks till they are matured; disappointment sometimes occurs;—the mecrassadar receives 50 per cent.

197. Second,—In high ground, under large tanks, where small picotahs are used to draw water to the crops, after the rains are over, he receives 55 per cent.

198. Third,—In situations where long picotahs are used throughout, he receives 60 per cent.

199. If he any where gets a higher share than this, it is by virtue of cove granted to him for particular reasons; as, to bring waste land into use.

200. Although it is natural to suppose that encroachments had been pretty general; yet considering the decrease of population, and the privation which the country has suffered of other advantages, particularly in the article of manure, which affect the abundance of the crops, I made no reduction below 45 per cent.; but if I found the customary share less, I allowed it to remain so; for it was fair to presume that the inhabitants thought it sufficient.—It is accordingly, chiefly in those villages which are watered by channels from rivers, and from natural springs, which run more or less, and consequently the cultivation is carried on all the year round, that it varies from 40 to 45, but for the most part, stands at 40.—Below this, it is not found in ten villages throughout the Jaghire, and those mostly in the Ponnary district.

201. These are the general directions which regulate the shares; but a variety of peculiarities may be imagined, which affect particular situations, and cannot be detailed; unless therefore I should be thought not to have carried my researches to the depth that they will admit; and that the matter should still appear to rest upon insufficient proof, a more minute detail will not be required, since every thing material resulting from this principle, is clearly shown by the terwa of the last lease.

202. What I have already noticed, must be always remembered; that besides the portion of the produce which the inhabitants divide with government, their fees of every description are inviolably preserved to them; for without these, I am persuaded that nine-tenths of the produce would not suppress complaint, for the reasons which I have already given, that they are the tests of property; and however complicated they may be, still they are perfectly understood by each inhabitant, and on the receipt of them, his idea of right and justice depends.

203. They form a part of that system with which he is familiar; and however they may seem seem bewildered in inconsistency and confusion, yet, referring to rules and principles with which he is acquainted, he is inspired with confidence, and litigation is obviated.—In a country where the law, in most cases, is determined by the evidence of custom, either as it is practised or preserved in the memory of the natives, the violation of the most trivial usage should be avoided; and however desirable simplicity may be, certainty is of much more importance.—To alter a system to which they have been enured, in all likelihood through a series of several generations, is attended with danger; for, to give it effect and durability, their habits, prejudices and sentiments must be changed; and by far the greater probability is, that in attempting this, diffidence, chicane, and misery, will supply the place, of confidence, honesty and contentment.—Innovation is always impolitic, for men cannot in an instant by any, even the strongest incentives, be reconciled to it; and until they are, both their public affections and their industry will be obstructed.

212. It is not easy to imagine a society without one or more members, who shall take the lead in the conduct of its affairs, still less is it to be expected, where, as in this country, society, united by the bonds of religion, is, by that sacred obligation, independent of the operation of nature. Each sect under the controul of its superior, each, it may have been observed, has its patriarch both in spiritual and temporal concerns, chosen by themselves, and the latter, often hereditary when the son or next heir has, or promises to have, those qualities which befit him for the office. As in every sect, so in every district and in every village, there are leading men who direct the rest; but that ascendancy which was once gained by the reverence of character for the peace and good government of the society, I believe has been often coveted and exercised, for a very different purpose.

213. When the inhabitants saw that the whole scope of the nabob's management tended to prey upon the vitals of the country when justice; was withheld; every degree of extortion practised by himself and his managers, and complaint never heard, but with a view to profit; this ascendancy was often desirable to secure the conveniences of life to the possessor of it, at the expense of his neighbours, and competition became a fruitful source of revenue; as, instead of arising out of the voluntary choice of the inhabitants, it was converted into a sort of dignity conferred by the Circars servants;—the soothing influence of a bribe both procured and preserved it. Thus, it was changed into an instrument of oppression on the inferior classes, for the advantage of a few individuals. Every motive to industry was annihilated, except among the latter; and the reluctant labour of the rest, divested of their rights, and kept in a degraded state of humility, fed the nabob's avarice, paid his whole train of corrupt relations and dependents, and lastly, furnished his scanty revenue, every year diminishing.

214. These superiors, graduating from the head man of a village to that of a district, conformably with the nabob's general system of extortion, became objects of jealousy in proportion to the extent of their influence, and were required to disgorge to him the effects of that oppression, which they had been allowed to exercise over others. However sorely, therefore, their authority might be at first felt, when relinquishing the character of elders, they assumed that of petty tyrants; it soon obtained acquiescence, for the connivance of all, it was seen, was necessary to their common advantage. Upon this principle, the inhabitants at large were easily brought to act in concert with the head men, and persuaded implicitly to entrust the care of their general interests into their hands, and to follow their directions in all things tending to the common cause. Hence the interest of the head man of a village or district, is considered inseparable from that of the village or district at large; and the invasion of one, is a signal to unite the whole. Thus then, the chain of connection was carved on,—the husbandman depended upon the superior of the village, appointed to guard its welfare, as it were, in the general council of the district,—and the superiors of the villages, upon those of the district, who carried on their machinations immediately with the servants of the Circar; and hence it is, that without any previous communication with each other, the whole population of a district are so often, upon the signal of alarm being given, seen to combine for the promotion of one object, which cannot be equally beneficial to the whole, if it is not detrimental to by far the major part.

215. I shall not enlarge upon the conduct of the nabob and of his managers in other respects, as already touched upon; too notorious as it is for a want of faith, and for oppression in all its relations. The evils which it occasioned sprung from the same root, and pervading every part of the Carnatic, it was under the mature growth of such habits as they necessarily occasioned in his subjects; that the Jaghire fell into the company's own hands; but to add to its misfortunes, not until it had been more than half depopulated, ravaged with fire and sword, and its tanks and reservoirs so long neglected, as almost to be effaced and destroyed.

242. I have mentioned before, the dependence of the interior, or fractional, upon the principal, or integral shares, and the custom that prevailed in making the late lease, of the proprietors of the latter only, appearing to enter into engagements; and although I endeavoured to obviate this, by requiring either the personal attendance of all, or that the absentees should furnish the others with written authorities, which were always produced to me, yet for particular reasons among themselves, I afterwards found my precautions were without the effect that I intended. It is indeed probable that the novelty of the thing, might occasion suspicion of a design, that they thought it their interest to defeat. A minute enquiry into the state of property always occasions alarm; and men are, by natural habits of jealousy and mistrust, ever averse to disclose their real worth. But if it produced this consequence in some instances, where there was a mutual reliance among themselves, in other respects, it was beneficial; because, as I signified that the rightful proprietors were on all occasions to have the preference, and held out every encouragement to them to come forward, it gave an opportunity opportunity to great numbers to assert their claims to lands, of which they had been most unjustly dispossessed; and in many districts much more of my time was taken up by investigating these claims, than in renting the villages. I have had occasion to state the iniquitous uses which the dubashes made of their power over the Jaghire, in acquiring property for themselves or their dependents;—the means that they so fruitfully possessed of to remove;—the precarious tenure by which property hence became held, and its constant changes from one possessor to another. The confusion introduced, and the injustice which had been maintained, is hardly to be imagined. A dubash of some description was always the origin of these complaints; and it afforded me a singular gratification to be the instrument of restoring numbers of unprotected sufferers to their rights, who without such an occasion, must still longer have been kept out of them. Hope, however, never dies in a native: the vicissitudes of the country have been too numerous to encourage despair; and although all respect of property was destroyed, yet as favour or corruption was the momentum of the grand machine, it was a chance, almost equal, that every man might at one time or other, come within its influence, and displace to-morrow, the man by whom he was displaced to-day. This consideration, together with a natural attachment to his soil, the river, as it is emphatically called, which bound him to it, often reconciled the ejected meerasadar to the temporary use of that which he could not substantially enjoy; many indeed had withdrawn; but were always at hand, when gladdened by the hope of recovering their rights. Whatever time, therefore, was occupied in this business, was fully compensated by the benefit that it conferred. A simple story, and short enquiry, generally proved the injustice, and occasioned redress; or if the matter of complaint was complicated, and involved a question of law, in regard to the descent of lands, an arbitration in my own presence, by men chosen either by the parties or by myself, if they desired it, speedily and equitably adjusted it.

343. In an account which I have in hand, and will if possible complete to accompany this report, the meerassee of every village is minutely detailed, and its distribution among the respective proprietors by name; but it is a subject of such intricacy as ought to have a further separate enquiry to be accurately ascertained, if indispensable towards any material object that may be in view; but it is also a subject of such delicacy, that, for my own part, I think that further enquiry would only tend, at least at present, to clog that freedom of property which should always be unrestrained, for a suspicion has already been awakened that it would be prudent to allay.

344. By an accompanying abstract account, it will appear that the whole lands of the Jaghire are divided into 17,821 $\frac{1}{2}$ meerassee shares; that the number of existing rightful proprietors amount to 8,387, who hold 15,994 $\frac{1}{2}$ of those shares, and that the remainder, or 1,827 $\frac{1}{2}$ shares, are unclaimed, but occupied by pyacurries. Of these, however, it is to be observed, that a part also belong to the meerasadars, to which, for political reasons, they chuse that their right should lay dormant; and the rest, by the consequences of the war of 1780, and the subsequent famine, are altogether without claimants. The great difficulty which I could not surmount, before leaving the Jaghire, consisted in discriminating between the two latter; for although the actual proprietors of every village, might be supposed sufficiently known to the curums, yet as the former had secret motives for a temporary disavowal of part of their lands, and as there existed no very urgent reason why they should entirely disclaim them, I was cautious of pressing this matter, and chose that it should continue in suspense, until either those motives should die away, or a formal renunciation be required on grounds of public exigency, which cannot well be any other than an increase of population, when every man will gradually assert his right, without any other impulse than his own interest.

345. So much as every subject relative to the Jaghire, as well the eradication of abuse by all classes of inhabitants, as the restoration of their genuine rights, and substantiation of property, stood in need of revision and reform, it ought not to have been expected, that every thing should be accomplished at once. Some things must be left for future completion and gradual attainment; and the actual distribution of the lands is one of them. Considering, also, whatever may be the real character and principles of the British government; that from justice, the inhabitants of the Jaghire have felt but little of its disposition to do them wrong; and that intriguing men have always interposed to prevent the redress of their grievances; it ought not to be wondered at, that any assurance whatsoever, the faith of which they have yet to experience, should fail to establish their confidence of future protection. There are many undoubted symptoms of a better, and, I hope, growing dependence on public faith; but it must ripen spontaneously, by conviction of the actual benefits that are derived from it, or if unnaturally forced, will infallibly be supplanted by suspicion. The transition between the government that they have been accustomed to, and that which it is the object to establish, and by whose principles it is intended that they shall substantially benefit, is too quick for their apprehension, and the change too great to be thought durable.

346. I think it by no means unlikely however, that this collusive concealment or disavowal of property, may in some instances, have been promoted by the new system, that the meerasadars might revert to it, in case of failure in their engagements; and that the pyacurries withhold from accepting of the unclaimed part, in order to avoid participating in the rent of their villages to which they belong. But as this conduct, can proceed only from those doubts which the novelty of the undertaking may have excited, I think that their diffidence may in a great degree be dissipated, by the adoption of judicious measures, on the formation of the next settlement. If by an equal and just assessment, they should be convinced of the advantages of the system, the lands will rise in value; the meerasadars will deem it safer to assert their full rights, than expose any part to the risk of being disputed; and the pyacurries pyacurries will be encouraged to obtain confirmation in that property, which by longer forbearance, they may be compelled to forego. This is a subject of considerable importance to the future success of the system, and every conciliatory measure should be adopted to promote the confidence of the inhabitants.

347. The number 8,360 meerasadars appears, however, small to enjoy so extensive a property as even they avow to belong to them, and pay so large a revenue; but it must be remembered that the heads and principal branches of families only appear as proprietors, in whose name all the members and other branches are included, who perhaps may amount to ten times that number. The law of primogeniture is unknown among the Hindoos; and property is divisible generally in equal shares among the sons, by which, if each had claimed his distinct portion, it would in the course of time, have become indivisible, or at least separately insufficient for his maintenance. In order to correct, therefore, the manifest inconvenience of their laws in this respect, the sons preserve an union, and co-partnership among themselves, which continues perhaps through several generations; a part attend to their inheritance, and the rest seek other employment. Necessity pointed out this remedy, and custom has made it a disgrace not to conform; for they are particularly liable to the censure of their cast, if they separate and divide their estate. Yet inveterate animosities sometimes break out, to the gratification of which, every other sentiment and every interest must give way.

348. It would be superfluous, impracticable, and impolitic to ascertain with greater precision than has already been done, the measured extent of each share, or of each man's proportion of meerassee; because, in the first place, it would strengthen those suspicions which have arisen; and in the next, it could only be done by personal survey, and the most unremitting attention, which I think hardly any one man can give, till the completion of such a work, independent of innumerable variations that would take place while it was in hand; and it would be unwise, because, not only it will be ever the most beneficial mode to let the lands of every village jointly to the inhabitants at large, both with a view to security and to good cultivation; but to let them separately, would tend to create divisions and dissensions, to the undoubted embarrassment of themselves, as well as of the public. No difficulty occurs in fixing the value of all the lands together of one village, but it would be nearly impossible to assign to every small allotment its portion so exactly, and with such due regard to fertility of soil and other circumstances, that some should not benefit and others suffer; yet the latter, would not receive the assistance of the former, in case of failure in their engagements.

349. At present, every village considers itself a distinct society, and its general concerns, the sole object of the inhabitants at large; a practice, surely, which redounds as much to the public good, as to theirs; each having, in some way or other, the assistance of the rest; the labours of all yield the rent; they enjoy the profit proportionate to their original interest, and the loss falls light. It consists exactly with the principles upon which the advantages are divided by a division of labour; one man goes to market, whilst the rest attend to the cultivation and harvest; each, has his particular occupation assigned to him, and insensibly labours for all; but if each, had these several duties to attend to, it is obvious that all the inhabitants must be absent together at those times that are most critical, both to them and to the state; and that many must want those abilities necessary to the performance of the various employments that would arise.

350. If a measurement of lands should be made, with a view to assign to each proprietor what belonged to him, and to confine him to the cultivation of that spot only, it would interfere with another practice, which very frequently prevails, and which I do not know can be surmounted, of each changing his lands every year. It is found in some of the richest villages, and intended, I imagine, to obviate that inequality to which a fixed distribution would be liable.

351. On the whole, I cannot but consider that any reform tending to do away the union, or, if I may be allowed the expression, the unity of the inhabitants, and to fix each exclusively to his property, will be attended with danger. Every man's right and place is well known among themselves; and the customs to which they are attached, as I have before said, are necessary to their contentment and confidence. If it should be observed that they give way to intemperance and abuse, I answer, that the superintending authority placed over the inhabitants; whilst it assures every man of the redress of his wrongs, encourages him to know his rights. If he complains, enquiry is instituted; and if he does not, it is fair to conclude he is contented, and receives justice among his associates; for it is hardly possible to conceive a man, to whom property descends, labouring under such a degree of ignorance, or so destitute of friends and relatives, that he can be egregiously imposed upon, since neither an idiot nor a lunatic can inherit landed property; still less if he succeeds to it by purchase, which argues sufficient natural understanding to know if he receives his just dues.

LETTER FROM MADRAS GOVERNMENT TO THE BOARD OF REVENUE,On the Appointment of a Special Commission for permanently settling the Lands; dated 9th February 1802.EXTRACT Proceedings of the Special Commission at Fort St. George, 9th February 1802.

Diary.

To William Petrie, Esq. President, &c. Members of the Board of Revenue.

Gentlemen,

PARA. 1. The right honourable the Governor in Council having deemed it to be expedient to appoint a special commission, for the purpose of fixing with all practicable dispatch the settlement of a permanent land revenue in the districts at present capable of that necessary improvement; I am directed to acquaint you, that his Lordship in Council has been pleased to nominate William Petrie, Esq. and Messrs. Thomas Cockburn and Josiah Webb, to be the commissioners for that purpose.

2. The appointment of the commission, will be confined to such proceedings as may be necessary to the permanent settlement of the districts under its immediate consideration; and will not interfere in the ordinary transaction of the business of the revenue department.

3. I am directed to assure you, that the Governor in Council has no intention of casting, by this measure, any imputation on the board of revenue; but considerable progress having been made towards the attainment of this most desirable object, his Lordship in Council is anxious that the body of information already collected, should be applied with the utmost practicable degree of expedition to the commencement of the settlement.

4. The state of the valuable and extensive provinces which have been recently annexed to the dominions of the honourable company under this presidency, will require the undivided attention of the board of revenue to the immediate improvement of those territories, and to such arrangements as may be necessary, with a view to the introduction of the permanent settlement of the land revenue, at the earliest practicable period of time.

5. The Governor in Council is therefore desirous of avoiding all further delay in the commencement of this most essential work, by directing it to the constant attention of the revenue department, and at the same time to provide for the efficient execution of the business of the revenue department, by relieving the board from that laborious attention which is indispensably requisite to the progress of the settlement.

6. By these means, the Governor in Council expects to provide for the commencement of a permanent settlement of the land revenue, by the immediate application of the materials already collected; and at the same time, to avail himself of the information, experience, and talents (especially selected by the honourable court of directors) in directing the ordinary administration of the revenue, and in advancing the provinces recently acquired, to that state of improvement which may admit of the settlement of a permanent land-tax, at the earliest practicable period of time.

7. In the absence of Mr. Cockburn from the board of revenue, in consequence of his nomination to the commission, Mr. Oakes will discharge the duties of the senior member of that board; and as the progress of the permanent settlement will occupy a considerable portion of the attention of Mr. Cockburn, during the remaining period of that gentleman's residence in India, the Governor in Council relies on the vigilance and abilities of Mr. Oakes to sustain the duties which will devolve on him.

8. In consideration of the extraordinary labour and responsibility which by these means will be imposed on Mr. Oakes, the Governor in Council permits him to draw a salary equal to that of the senior member of the board of revenue.

9. The Governor in Council has judged it to be necessary to explain the grounds of these measures, as well as for the purpose of removing from the minds of the board of revenue any diffidence of his lordship's intention, as of expressing to you the object of his lordship's wishes and arrangements; for it will be obvious to you, that the execution of these orders, will require the most cordial co-operation on your part with the commission, and the most prompt obedience on the part of the subordinate officers under your authority, to the orders which may be issued by the commission.

10. I am therefore directed to desire that the records of the revenue department may at all times be open to the members of the commission, and that such papers as may be required, shall be immediately furnished by the secretary to the board of revenue. I am further directed to desire, that the collectors and the subordinate officers may be instructed to obey, in the first instance, all orders which may be directed to them, by the authority of the commission. The Governor in Council desires that these orders may be issued to the collectors without delay. We are, &c.

Fort St. George, 9th February 1802.

INSTRUCTIONS issued to COLLECTORS under the Presidency of Fort St. George, as to permanently settling the Lands; dated 15 October 1799.EXTRACT Proceedings of the Board of Revenue at Fort St. George, the 14th October 1799.

READ the following draft of general Instructions, ordered to be prepared in Consultation the 9th September.

INSTRUCTIONS
issued to Collectors
under the Presidency of Fort St. George, in Oct. 1799.

1. The following is copy of the Orders of Government, under date the 4th September last.

To William Petrie, Esquire, President, and Members of the Board of Revenue;

Gentlemen,

We have received your Report on the proposed changes in the Revenue System on the coast, and shall hereafter furnish you with our Orders thereon. In the meantime, we desire that you will prepare materials for forming a permanent settlement with the zemindars, whom it is our intention to constitute proprietors of their respective estates or zemindarries, on the best information which your records and the recent enquiries of your collectors may afford.

You are already fully informed of the principles on which the permanent settlement has been established in Bengal; and we desire, generally, that you will conform to those principles, in all cases in which it may be practicable.

You will also prepare every necessary information respecting the rights of the talookdars and under-tenantry throughout the different districts; that in confirming the proprietary rights of the zemindars, we may not violate the ascertained rights of other individuals.

In the Havelly lands, in which the property in the soil is vested immediately in government, you will prepare to form small sub-divisions or estates of from 1 to 10,000 pagodas annual jumma; and you will apportion the allotment in such estates with a due computation of their actual assets; it being our intention, where it may be practicable, to dispose of or otherwise transfer the proprietary right in all such lands to native landholders.

We are, Gentlemen,
Your most obedient servants,
(Signed)MORNINGTON.
CLIVE.
GEO. HARRIS.
W. PETRIE.
E. W. HALLOFIELD.Fort St. George,
4th Sept. 1799.

2. In order that you may be able fully to comprehend the proposed new system, as resolved upon in the foregoing letter, we shall explain to you the principles of it; which, by pointing out to you the objects in view, will better enable you to furnish the requisite information in the first instance, and ultimately to carry into effect the wishes of government.

3. They may be reduced under the following general heads; viz.
Constituting the zemindars proprietors of their respective zemindarries, as estates. Concluding with them, a permanent settlement:—their estates answerable, by sale and transfer, for any deficiency in the due discharge of the public revenue. The right of talookdars, and of all other description of inhabitants, to be secured against any infringement, by or in consequence of the confirmation of the zemindars or others in the proprietary right in the soil. Respecting persons declining to hold their estates on the jumma which shall be assessed thereon; and disqualified landholders.

Relative to the transfer of estates, in whole or in part, from one proprietor to another, by public or private sale, gift or otherwise, and the apportioning the fixed jumma on each division respectively; regarding native revenue officers to keep the accounts of revenue, and furnish other information for the purpose of government. The disposal of the present havelly lands, the proprietary right in which is now vested in the company.

4. At present, the zemindars hold their zemindarries by a tenure so precarious as scarcely to convey the least idea of property in the soil. It has been considered as hereditary possession, but the public assessment has been fluctuating and arbitrary, and the whole zemindary liable to sequestration, in case of even a partial failure in the lists, at the pleasure of government. Several instances have occurred of this alternative having been resorted to, and the zemindars becoming pensioners; for it has rarely happened that they have been restored, owing to the accumulated arrears of public revenue remaining undischarged from the assets of the zemindary under management of the collector. At this period, several are in the predicament here described.

5. This

5. This system having been found delusive to government, and at the same time, incompatible with the general interests of the country, it has been resolved to adopt the reform introduced some years since into the Bengal provinces, by constituting the several zemindars and other landholders having individual claims to such distinction, actual proprietors of the soil or lands composing their estates, subject to such conditions as will be hereafter noted; and secured to them, under strict adherence to those conditions explained by regular established courts of justice;—the principles of these, will be also hereafter explained.

6. When the possession of land no longer subjects the proprietor to the disgrace he is at present liable to; and when the tenure is known to be secure, as long as the fixed public dues are regularly discharged; and first whilst they conform to the laws to be administered by the courts, there is no power in the country that can infringe their rights or property, or oppress them with impunity; there can be little doubt but land will be every where coveted, and that a considerable portion of the wealth possessed by the inhabitants, which now lies dead, or is employed in other channels, will be applied to the improvement of it.

7. In order, however, more effectually to secure this great desideratum, by giving property its chief value, by the limitation of the public demand thereon, it has been further resolved to form a settlement with each estate on a principle of permanency, calculating the same upon equitable moderate terms, according to the resources of the district; combining its present state and probable improvement in the course of a short period under the system of property and security about to take place.—The jumma, or land tax which may be deemed adequate upon this principle, to be fixed in perpetuity, and declared unalterable.

8. The object of government distinct from the consideration of the public revenue, is to ascertain and protect private rights; and the limitation of the public demand upon the lands is obviously the most important and valuable right that can be conferred on the body of the people, who are in any respect, concerned in the cultivation of the land. The necessities and oppressions of amins, farmers and other officers necessarily employed to collect the public dues: when they are liable to frequent and arbitrary variations, it involves the happiness of the cultivators of the soil, who cannot expect to experience moderation or encouragement from their landlords, whilst they themselves are exposed to indefinite degradation of it; as trade and manufactures must flourish in proportion to the quantity of raw materials produced from the lands. It will render the situation of proprietor of land honourable instead of disreputable, and land will become the best, instead of the worst of property; and what is of equal importance, it will enable us to perpetuate to the people, a government of law and security, in the room of one founded on temporary expedient, and which must be either beneficial or destructive, according to the character of the individual appointed to superintend it.

9. We are aware that the landholders and cultivators on this coast, have not been accustomed to the more regular form of government which has been gradually established in Bengal; but security of property, and the numerous advantages connected with it, are benefits, of the importance of which they must soon be fully sensible, although they may not be immediately able to comprehend the causes from which they are derived.

10. We quote for your information, the following observations of the honourable court of directors, on a permanent settlement applied to Bengal, viz. "We find it convincingly argued, that a permanent assessment, upon the scale of the present ability of the country, must contain in its nature, a productive principle; that the possession of property, and the sure enjoyment of the benefits derivable from it, will awaken and stimulate industry, promote agriculture, extend improvement, establish credit, and augment the general wealth and prosperity. Hence arises the best security, that no permanent diminution can be expected to take place, at least to any considerable amount. Occasional deficiencies may occur for a time, from the mismanagement of particular landholders; but it cannot be supposed that any of the lands will permanently be less productive, than at present; and as we have every reason to believe that the jumma now formed, is moderate in its total amount and properly distributed, the lands themselves will, in most instances, ultimately be a sufficient security for the proportion charged upon them, with respect to losses from drought, inundation, and other casualties. These occur also in the present system, and usually fall upon the company themselves; but it will hereafter be different; because the advantages of proprietary right and secured profits in the landholders, will on his part, afford means to support, and excite exertions to repair them. The deficiencies of bad seasons, will on the whole, be more than counterbalanced, by the fruits of favourable years. There will thus be a gradual accumulation, whilst the demands of government continue the same; and in every step of this progressive work, property becomes of more value; the owner of more importance; and the system acquires additional strength.—Such surely appears to be the tendency and just consequences of an equitable fixed assessment."

11. "With respect to the objections drawn from the disorder and confusion in the collections; the uncertainty of their amount; the variable indefinite rules by which they are levied; the exactions and collusions thence too prevalent; the intricacies in the details of the revenue business; and the ignorance and incapacity of the zemindars. Lord Cornwallis charges these evils, so far as they exist, (and we think with great justice) upon

"upon the old system, as a system defective in its principle, and carrying, through all the gradation of the people, with multiplied ill effects, that character of uncertain arbitrary imposition which originated at the head. He therefore very properly contends, that reform must begin there; and that in order to simplify and regulate the demands of the landholders upon their tenants, the first step, is to fix the demand of government itself."

12. "Having thus explained our opinions on the several points which have arisen, we conclude, by stating to you, that important and arduous as we consider the measure of a perpetual settlement, and irreversible as it is in its nature, we think ourselves bound, from considerations of duty to all the interests which it concerns, to proceed to it. No conviction is stronger upon our minds, than that instability in the mode of administering our revenues, has had the most prejudicial effects upon the welfare of the provinces, upon our affairs, and the character of our government; and of all the generated evils of unsettled principles of administration, none has been more baneful than frequent variation in the assessment;—it has reduced every thing to temporary expedient, and destroyed all enlarged views of improvement. Impolitic as such a principle must be at all times, it is peculiarly so, with respect to a dependent country paying a large annual tribute, and deprived of many of its ancient supports: such a country, requires especially the aid of a productive principle of management; and it is with solid satisfaction that we look to the great resources which it yet has, in its uncultivated, though excellent lands; but these lands, must be opened;—and what have all the attempts of nearly thirty years to this end produced?—what are we to expect from still leaving room for the principle of fluctuation, which has prevailed during that period, though we may profess to place succeeding change at a remoter distance?—Long leases, with a view to the equal gradual establishment of a permanent system, though recommended upon the ground of safety, we must think, would still continue, in a certain degree, the evils of the former practice. Periodical corrections in the assessments, would be, in effect, of the nature of a general increase, and tend to destroy the hope of a permanent system, with the confidence and exertion it is calculated to inspire. Had such a system been adopted twenty years ago, and fairly followed, it is not to be doubted that the produce, manufactures and commerce of the country, would at this time, have been in a more flourishing state than they are; and the people, sensible of a new order of things, of privileges, and prosperity unenjoyed before, would have risen in their character, and felt real attachment to the government from which those blessings are derived."

13. The assessment on the zemindaries is to be fixed exclusive and independent of all duties, taxes, and other collections known under the general denomination of sayer, which includes that of the abkary, or tax on the sale of intoxicating liquors and drugs.

14. This assumption of the sayer, is however not meant to include the rent derivable by the proprietor, for orchards, pasture grounds, and fisheries, or for warehouses, shops, or other buildings, the same being for the use of the ground, or, in other words, ground rent; though these have been sometimes classed under the general denomination of sayer, such rents being properly the private right of the proprietor, and in no respect, a tax or duty on commodities, the exclusive right of government.

15. It is also to be fixed exclusive of the salt revenue, and independent of all existing alienated lands, whether exempt from the payment of public revenue, with or without due authority, (the village maniams, or lands held by public and private servants in lieu of wages, excepted;) the whole of which, are to be considered annexed to the Circar lands, and declared responsible for the public revenue assessed on the zemindary.

16. All allowances of cauzees and government revenue officers, (curnums excepted,) heretofore paid by land-holders, as well as any public pensions hitherto paid through the landholders, are to be added to the amount of jumma, and to be provided for by government, under prescribed regulations.

17. With respect to the amount of the permanent settlement to be concluded on these principles with the zemindars, you will observe that government have desired us to prepare materials for that purpose, on the best information which our records, and the recent enquiries of our collectors, may afford. In reference to the former, it has been resolved to adopt the statements of the committee of circuit, as the general standard; that is, after deducting the amount of the revenue derived from sayer or internal duties, and salt included therein, which, as already noticed, are to be resumed entirely into the hands of government, the latter, to be placed under the management of the collector, and the former, to be at their pleasure, collected, suspended, or abolished; taking two-thirds of the remaining gross collection upon a general calculation, as the average estimate of the fixed land-tax. We do not mean by this, to lay it down as a fixed principle, that each zemindary shall be assessed according to this ratio, from the accounts of the committee of circuit, as in that case, we might proceed to form the settlement, without further delay; but it is expected that the amount of the permanent settlement will not fall short in the gross of the aggregate two-thirds of the committee's statements, after the deduction of the sayer and salt as above mentioned.

18. Some variation may be necessary, with respect to particular zemindaries, arising chiefly from local considerations: and it is on this account, that we wish to avail ourselves of any information you may be possessed of, or may be able to procure, in addition to what is already on record, since the date of the committee of circuit's reports.

19. In allusion to these reports, it will occur to you that the accounts which accompanied them, were collected under circumstances which leave no doubt of their having considerably under-rated the value of the districts at that period; the committee themselves admitted that the revenue officers from whom they were obtained, were the actually Circar servants under the

the control or influence of the zemindars or others, whose interests rendered it an object of the first consequence, to conceal the real resources of the country, and consequently to corrupt the channels through which the committee were seeking the required information. In some instances, indeed, they were obliged to take the accounts from the zemindars themselves, and in all others, there was equal reason to believe, from the above-named cause, that they were fabricated to serve the interested purpose of the principals, who naturally regarded the enquiry that was going forward with a jealous eye, and made it a common cause among all gradations of people, to depreciate their resources as much as possible. In some situations, subsequent experience of the collections has incontrovertibly established this fact; and where this has been the case, there can be no hesitation in increasing the jumma beyond the two-thirds of the committee's statement, whilst in others, particular circumstances may render it politic to demand less, though the actual value of the districts should even exceed, as we have concluded, the committee's accounts;—such as Frontier Hill zemindaries, which may be difficult for internal management, and not easy of access; but great responsibility will attach to the opinions you may give, in recommendation of any such exceptions; and it will be expected that you fully and specifically state the grounds of them; as government will not recede from the demand, according to the general standard before stated, but on the most satisfactory explanation of its expediency.

20. In the consideration of the proposed settlement, we have not been unmindful of the famine which has intervened since the committee of circuit's reports; but above seven years have elapsed since that calamity, during which, the country has been gradually recovering from its effects; and though a further lapse of time will be necessary to its complete recovery, the fact we have noticed of the districts having been considerably under-valued by the committee, and the great advantages to be derived by the proprietary land-holders under a permanent settlement, satisfy us that they will be in general fully competent to the proposed assessment. That you may be at no loss as to the general standard we have resolved upon, we shall transmit you herewith, Extract from the Committee of Circuit Accounts, including the zemindaries in your division, shewing the deductions to be made on account of salt and sayer, and the two-thirds of the remaining gross collections.

21. The amount of sayer and salt being deducted from the gross collections before the two-thirds, (forming the last column,) are taken, the only claim to remuneration which the zemindar could advance, would be on account of the one-third which would have been left to him, had the collection of the sayer been continued in his hands; but deducting therefrom the charges, collection, the net profit, or income, supposing it to amount to even two-tenths of the sum stated by the committee of circuit, would be so inconsiderable, that we deem it to be amply provided for in the favourable terms of the permanent settlement, notwithstanding the sacrifice of revenue to be made by the company, by abolishing the numerous internal chokies, and to all the advantages connected therewith. You will therefore understand that the settlement is to be formed on the principle of excluding the zemindars from all interference with, or participation in the collection, or disposal of the sayer, which government assumes to itself as its indefensible right; but allowing them a deduction in their jumma of one-tenth of the net produce from the salt, as estimated by the committee of circuit.

22. It is further to be understood, that government will impose such assessment, exclusive of the permanent settlement, as they may deem equitable, on all lands at present alienated, and paying no public revenue, which may have been, or may be proved to be held, under illegal or invalid titles, and the revenues of which, is not included in the committee's accounts. Rules will be prescribed for trying, in the regular judicial courts, the validity of the titles of persons holding, or claiming a right to hold such lands, and for determining the amount of the annual assessment to be imposed thereon by government, if exceeding a certain extent, otherwise to be considered the property of the zemindar.

23. Further rules will also be enacted in regard to all lands paying no revenue to government (the titles to which may be confirmed) in case of the grants, some of which are for life only, expiring and escheating to government, when they would also be liable to additional assessment by government, forming no part of the present resources of the district on which the permanent jumma is calculated. It is to be presumed great progress has been made, in ascertaining all alienations, in consequence of the board's orders under date 23d May 1795.

24. You will hereafter be furnished with a publication respecting these lands, requiring all grants to be registered within a specific period, and in default thereof, to be thenceforward declared invalid, and resumable without enquiry, unless in very peculiar cases, wherein sufficient cause can be shown for the omission; and to prevent all future alienations, as well as for the information of the local authorities, of the number and extent of these lands, a regular register will be formed in the first instance, and hereafter kept, of all existing grants and mutations, noting progressively those which may be resumed, or otherwise cease.

25. All private lands at present appropriated by the zemindars and other land-holders to the subsistence of themselves and families, as well as all lands held by private servants and dependants, will be considered as forming part of the circular land, and therewith responsible for the public jumma.

26. All police allowances in land or money, at present appropriated for the support of this department, is to be considered exclusive of and unconnected with the permanent settlement, and resumable by government, should they take the conduct of it, into their own hands; but in that case, to be solely applicable to that purpose.—And we desire you will take the necessary measures for ascertaining the particulars of each, and report them for our

our information, explaining fully at the same time, the establishment kept up, and the regulations under which this duty has been performed by the zemindars: this is not meant to include the fees and manumias of village talliers or watchers.

27. It is well known that in the Circars there are very extensive tracts of uncultivated, sterile, and waste lands, forming part of every zemindary. These are to be given up in perpetuity to the zemindars, free of any additional assessment, with such encouragement to every proprietor to improve his estate to the utmost extent of his means, as is held out by the limitation of the public demand for ever, and the institution of regular judicial courts to support him in all his just rights, whether against individuals or the officers of government, who may attempt in any respect to encroach upon them. The advantages which may be expected to result, in the course of progressive improvement, from these lands, will, or ought to put the zemindar upon that respectable footing as to enable him with the greatest readiness to discharge the public demand, to secure to himself and family every necessary comfort, and to have besides, a surplus to answer any possible emergency.

28. There may be instances of a zemindary having so little recovered from the effects of the famine, and subsequent mismanagement, as to be unequal at first to bear the full amount of the proposed assessment. In such case, it is our wish to be fully informed on the subject; premising, however, that nothing but the most satisfactory documents will be admitted, as the grounds for any temporary abatement on this account: but should such documents be laid before us, we shall consider within what time, under the new system, it may be reasonably expected the districts will arrive at a state of improvement competent to bear the full assessment, and in the interim, require a rassud, or gradual rise, until it reach the full assessment; the several progressive demands to be specified in the sannuds conferring the proprietary right in the soil, together with the dates, so that the proprietor may be equally at a certainty as to the extent of the public demand to be ultimately made upon him, as if a permanent settlement was to be concluded, at once for a specific sum. In all such cases, we shall expect the opinion of the collector, which it will be of the most material consequence to himself as well as to the public, not to offer on light grounds, but on the most diligent enquiry and personal investigation, explaining from what sources his information is derived.

29. Having constituted the zemindars proprietors of their estates, their land becomes the security to government for the due realization of the public jumma assessed thereon: instead, therefore, of the practice which has hitherto obtained, of dispossessing the zemindar of his whole zemindary, and putting it under the management of the collector, in the event of any material failure in the public payments, such portion thereof as may be adequate to produce at the public sale, a sum equal to the deficiency, will be separated from the estate of the defaulting proprietor, a proportionate quota of his fixed jumma be attached thereto, and after due public notice, (as well to give the said proprietor a reasonable time to avert the loss of his property by the liquidation of the arrears, as to do him justice, should he persist in withholding it, by affording an opportunity of selling the lands to the best advantage,) it will be put up at public auction, and sold to the highest bidder, who with the land will purchase the right of property in the soil, and from thenceforward be considered the legal zemindar or proprietor, paying to government the quota of the public land-tax transferred therewith, while the defaulting proprietor will cease from that date, to have any right or title thereto. Specific regulations will be laid down for the guidance of the public officers in all such cases; and if the zemindar or other land-holder thinks himself, in any respect aggrieved; the courts will be at all times open, to grant him redress. As the lands improve under the new system, arrears will be less frequent; at the same time, the tenure under which it is proposed the proprietors shall hold their property, will render it daily a better security for the discharge of any balance. The industrious land-holder, sensible of the advantages placed within his power, by the improvement of his estate to whatever extent beyond his fixed permanent jumma, being effectually secured to him, will never expose himself to the above consequence, while the more dissipated and careless will feel the effects of their folly, and prove a useful example to others, at the same time, that their lands being transferred to more thrifty proprietors, the prosperity of the country will increase in proportion.

30. Rules will be established to enable the proprietors and farmers of land to realize with promptness what is justly due from their under-tenants and ryots; at the same time, they will be subject to prosecution and damages for the abuse of this authority. These rules will be substituted for the undefined power now exercised by the zemindars and farmers in the collection of their rents from their ryots; and will be enforced by the regular courts.

31. Government, you will observe, have directed that every necessary information be procured respecting the rights of the talookdars and under-tenantry throughout the different districts, that in confirming the proprietary rights of the zemindars, they may not violate the ascertained rights of other individuals.

32. That you may fully comprehend the rights of talookdars, as well as of certain other descriptions of inhabitants here alluded to, we transmit you herewith copy of parts of the Bengal Regulations, to which we desire your particular attention, it being of the first importance that the information you may furnish with respect to any similar descriptions of tenures on this coast, shall be well founded. You will therefore direct your enquiries accordingly, and render your report as complete as possible; accompanying it with all the documents which may be produced to you in support of any such claims, and with your remarks as to their validity, or otherwise, annexed to each.

33. In the event of any talookdars or others being rendered independent of a zemindar, their talooks forming a part of his present zemindary, a proportionate abatement will be allowed in the jumma of the latter; and if he thinks himself aggrieved, he may thereafter prosecute the holder of such talook or other land in the court, with a view to recover it.

24. Distinct

See Enclosure [A.]

See Enclosure [B.]

34. Distinct from these claims, are the rights and privileges of the cultivating ryots, who though they have no positive property in the soil, have a right of occupancy as long as they cultivate to the extent of their usual means, and give to the circar or proprietor, whether in money or in kind, the accustomed portion of the produce.

35. To ensure the dues of the circar or proprietor of the estate, it has been already observed, that rules will be prescribed and administered by the judicial courts; and that the same rules will also extend protection to the ryots and under-tenants. But in order that there will be obliged to enter into specific written agreements or pottahs with the ryots and under-tenants. The rents to be paid, by whatever rule or custom they may be regulated, to be specified in the pottah, which in every possible case shall contain the exact sum to be paid. In cases where the rate only can be specified, such as where the rents are adjusted upon a measurement of the lands after cultivation, or on a survey of the crop, or when they are made payable in kind, the rate and terms of payment, and proportion of the crop to be delivered, with every condition, shall be clearly specified.

36. Every zemindar, independent talookdar, or other actual proprietor of land, will be required to prepare the form of a pottah or pottahs, conformably to the rules above prescribed, and adapted to the circumstances and usages of his estate or talook, and after obtaining the collector's approbation of it (to be signed by such officer, superscribing the form with his name and official appellation) to register a copy thereof in the adawlut of the district, and to deposit a copy also in each of the principal cutcheries in his estate or talook. Every ryot will be entitled to receive corresponding pottahs on application, and no pottahs of any other than the prescribed form, will be held valid.

37. A ryot, when his rent has been ascertained and settled, may demand a pottah from the actual proprietor of land, dependent talookdar or farmer, of whom he holds his lands, or from the person acting for him; and any refusal to deliver the pottahs, upon being proved in the court of adawlut of the district, will be punished by the court, by a fine proportioned to the expense and trouble of the ryot, in consequence of such refusal. On the other hand, it will be required of the zemindar or farmer to cause a pottah for the adjusted rent to be prepared, according to the form prescribed and tendered to the ryot, either granting the same themselves, or instructing their agents to grant them, under their special authority; and the necessary rules will be enacted to afford redress to the party acting in conformity hereto, in all cases of resistance on the part of the ryot. In all cases of farmers granting pottahs, they must of course be limited to the period of their own leases, and as estates are liable constantly to division, and partial transfer to different proprietors, some limitation of leases to be granted by proprietary landholders will also be expedient, and will probably be fixed at ten years.

38. Every proprietor of land, dependent talookdar, or farmer of land, of whatever description, and their agents of every gradation, receiving rents or revenues from dependent talookdars, under-farmers, ryots or others, are to give receipts for all sums received by them; and a receipt in full, on the complete discharge of every obligation. Any person to whom a receipt may be refused, on his establishing the same in the adawlut court of the district, will be entitled to damages from the party who received his rent or revenue and refused the receipt, equal to double the amount paid by him; and they are to adjust the instalments of the rents receivable by them from their under-renters and ryots, according to the time of reaping and selling the produce; being liable to be sued for damages for not conforming to this rule.

39. It is to be hoped, that in time the proprietary landholders, talookdars and farmers, and the ryots, will find it for their mutual advantage to enter into agreements in every instance for a specific sum, for a certain quantity of land, leaving it to the option of the latter to cultivate whatever species of produce may appear to them likely to yield the largest profit; and in the interim, to protect them against any new taxes, under any pretence whatever: the person discovered to have imposed them, will be liable to a very heavy penalty for the same. Indeed we wish to direct your attention to the impositions they are already subject to, which from their number and uncertainty, we apprehend to have become intricate to adjust, and a source of oppression. It would be desirable that the zemindars should revise the same in concert with the ryots, and consolidate the whole into one specific sum, by which the rents would be much simplified, and much inconvenience to both parties be thereby obviated in future.

40. In the event of any proprietor declining to engage for the permanent settlement of his lands at the jumma proposed to him, the collector will have to report the objections offered, with his opinions respecting them. The board will then order any further enquiry they may think necessary; and having finally determined on the proper assessment, the objecting proprietor will be required to engage for it, without further delay; and in the event of his refusal, which is to be given in writing, his lands are to be let in farm, or otherwise disposed of, as the board of revenue may in each instance, think most expedient.

41. Proprietors who may thus finally decline the jumma, will receive malikanah (an allowance in consideration of their proprietary right) at the rate of 10 per cent. on the net amount, for which their lands may be rented, if let in farm; or at the same rate on the net collections, if under annance, viz. on the net amount realized by government, after defraying the malikanah, as well as other charges, out of this allowance; however, a provision to be made for such persons belonging to the families of the proprietors, as may be entitled thereto.

42. It is not meant by this regulation, to exclude the proprietors for ever from their estates; but on their consenting, at any subsequent period, to pay the stipulated jumma, and and after the expiration of any existing leases to farmers, if their lands are let in rent, or satisfactory arrangement being made between them and the latter, whose leases are guaranteed by government, it will be at their option to be restored, and to be in every respect on the same footing with other proprietary landholders.

43. The exception to the general regulation for the conclusion of the permanent settlement with the actual proprietors of the soil, include the following descriptions of persons: females (excepting those whom the Governor in Council may judge competent to the management of their estates), minors, idiots, lunatics, or others rendered incapable of managing their lands, by natural defects or infirmities of whatever nature, and persons whom the Governor in Council may deem disqualified, on account of their contumacy or notorious profligacy of character; provided however, with regard to the whole of these descriptions, that they are not partners in the zemindaries, independent talooks, or other estates held by them, with others of a different description; in which case, themselves or guardians will be allowed with their partners to engage for the settlement of their lands, and elect a joint manager, under certain restrictions to be provided.

44. The lands of disqualified proprietors coming within the above descriptions, are to be managed for the benefit of the proprietors by the board of revenue, under prescribed regulations, including the provision to be made for the support of the proprietors.

45. While the lands of proprietors of the foregoing description, as well those who decline the jumma proposed as those disqualified, may be under the company's management, they will be exempt from sale and transfer on account of any arrears or deficiency in the collections.

46. Besides the transfer of landed property from one proprietor to another, by the sales on account of arrears of the public jumma, as before explained, the decrees of the courts of adawlut in questions of property between the proprietary landholders and individuals, when given against the former, may also attach a part of the estate, proportionate to the demand, and sell it at public auction, for the benefit of the complainant, to the entire exclusion of the original proprietor, but subject to its due proportion of the fixed jumma.

47. Estates will be further subject to division, by the privilege which will be allowed to all actual proprietors of land to transfer to whomsoever they may think proper, by sale, gift, or otherwise, their proprietary rights in the whole, or any portion of their respective estates, without applying to government for its sanction to such transfer; and all such transfers will be held valid, provided that they be conformable to the Mahomedan or the Hindoo laws (according to the religious persuasion of the parties to each transaction), may render the validity of it determinable by the former or the latter code, provided they be not repugnant to any existing regulation.

48. Proprietors of a joint, undivided estate, who may be desirous of dividing it into two or more separate estates, will be at liberty to do so, on application to the collector; or any individual may, by the same mode, have his share separated from the rest.

49. Rules will be prescribed for apportioning and adjusting the fixed jumma, in all the cases above described and the jumma so adjusted, will be declared fixed for ever; and in order to enable the officers of government to carry these rules into complete effect, and for affording government the means of discovering every deviation from them, a register will be kept of all estates paying revenue to the company, the annual revenue charged upon each of them, the names of the proprietors, and also of the transfer of estates, or of the portions of estates, of the allotment of public revenue upon such portions, and of the union of any estates which may have originally formed parts of the same zemindary, talook, or other property; and that every such union and all such transfers, divisions, and allotments of the public revenue, may be traceable with facility at any future period. It being also requisite for financial purposes, and for the information of the courts of judicature, from or to whose jurisdiction any districts or lands may be transferred or annexed, that there should be a record of the transfer of all districts or lands from the jurisdiction of one division to another; complete quinquennial registers will be formed from the register of intermediate mutations in landed property, forms for which will be prescribed.

50. Whilst the revenue was liable to frequent variation, it was absolutely necessary that the ruling authority should have officers on the spot, to keep accounts of the produce, and to furnish information to the persons occasionally appointed to collect the revenues. The same necessity, under the circumstances of a fixed revenue, a regular code of regulations embracing and defining every matter in respect concerning the rights or property of the people and courts of judicature, for the administration of them, will not exist; an accurate register of the lands, and of the jumma assessed on them, will be sufficient for the collection of the revenue and all financial operations. As to general or local customs, which have had the force of law, they will be included in the code; and with regard to the usages of particular places or districts, the testimony of creditable inhabitants appears far better evidence of them, than the information of an individual, liable to be uninformed, or ignorant, or influenced by corrupt or other motives.

51. Under these circumstances, it is resolved to abolish all the revenue offices of the description above alluded to, except the village cumums or putwarries, to be on the same footing in every respect as those of Bengal; and the proprietary landholders to be in like manner, responsible with regard to them. The accompanying copy of the Bengal Regulations relating to them, will fully explain their duties, as well as the obligations on the part of the landholders.

52. That we may have complete information of all the cumums at present in employ, we desire to be furnished with a register of all those in your division, showing the village or villages to which they respectively belong, and the allowances made them, whether in money,

53. Though it is the resolution of government to abolish all other revenue officers intermediate of the collector and curnum, it is their intention to have due consideration for the present holders, who with their families have depended on their stations for subsistence. With this view, they mean to constitute them the proprietors of the lands now held by them, subject to a fixed adequate assessment. You will therefore prepare and lay before the board, an accurate statement of all such lands, showing the extent thereof, and distinguishing the nunja, punja, arable and waste lands, and the annual gross produce for the last five years: this information to be arranged opposite to the name and official designation of each of the parties respectively, and an explanation to be annexed thereto in a column for remarks of the nature of his office, and of the length of the time he has held it, as well as of his age and general character and conduct therein. Their original sunnuds of office to be transmitted with your report, you giving them a receipt for the same, and an attested copy.

54. A proclamation will be hereafter made on similar principles to that noted in the margin, and which is copy of the one published in Bengal, upon the annunciation of the permanency of the settlement, declaring those the conditions under which it was made, and other matters connected therewith, particularly the principles on which the fixed jumma is to be apportioned, in the event of the division of any estate from whatever cause. Without such a public pledge and explanation, the terms on which the lands are to be held would be uncertain, and consequently the inducements to improvement, considerably lessened.

55. A Regulation will likewise be framed, containing all the general rules and principles of the settlements to be concluded; and which will be the standard for determining the rights of those with whom the settlement may be made, and also all disputes between the land-holders, farmers, and ryots.

56. There will of course be many subsidiary regulations, which it is unnecessary to mention particularly, at this time. In the present stage of the matter, we only aim to give you a general idea of the principles of the permanent settlement, and of the objects intended by it, trusting that you will furnish your report on the zemindarries, with all practicable expedition.

57. The arguments which have been advanced in support of the good policy of constituting the zemindars actual proprietors of their estates, and of concluding with them a permanent settlement of jumma, will equally apply with respect to the lands now denominated havelly, inasmuch as that vesting the property in the soil in the natives, and limiting the public demand thereon to an ascertained permanent jumma, will tend more to the general prosperity of the country and happiness of the people, than any mode of management hitherto adopted, being the substitution of a system, which is calculated to call forth all the energy and resources of the country, by making it the interest of the native inhabitants to carry cultivation and every other improvement to the utmost extent of their means, for the uncertainty, and consequent discouragement attendant upon constant fluctuation in the public assessments, and no uniform plan of internal administration, but all resting on temporary expedient.

58. Under this consideration, government has come to the resolution of transferring to native landholders, in all practicable cases, the property which they now hold in the havelly lands; and with this view, it is their intention to parcel it out into lots competent to bear a fixed annual jumma of from 1 to 10,000 pagodas each, and to put them up to public sale, exclusive of the salt and sayer revenue, which include the abkary, or tax on the sale of intoxicating liquors and drugs, which are to be retained in the hands of government, as already explained with respect to the zemindaries: varying the lots between the above two sums, will enable a greater number of bidders to come forward adapted to the circumstances of all classes of inhabitants, above the cultivating ryots; for where one is not competent, it is most probable, such is the desire to possess landed property, that one or more will join to make the purchase; at the same time, we are rather inclined to lean to estates above than below an annual jumma of 5,000 pagodas, as being more likely to give better security for a permanent revenue; as tending more to encourage extensive improvement, and enabling the proprietor to make up deficiencies, in some, from advantages derived in villages, more favourably situated.

59. In forming the lots, you will of course pay attention to local circumstances, such as including all villages watered from one tank in one estate; each estate to be compact, not formed of dispersed villages, as mootahs or pergunnahs sometimes are in this country. It is the wish of government to leave the construction and care of the tank and watercourses entirely to the proprietors, who will however, to encourage improvement, be assisted with loans from the treasury, repayable with interest at 12 per cent. on security of their estates, and under prescribed regulations for ensuring the objects for which such advances are made. Where works may be of great general importance to the country, or too extensive to be intrusted to the charge of individual proprietors, or where there may in your opinion be other causes which would make it advisable for government to reserve the care and repair of them, you will state your reasons at large, at the same time apportioning the jumma so, as to indemnify the company, as far as possible, for the expenses thereby incurred.

60. The conditions of the purchase will be the same as those prescribed to the zemindars becoming becoming proprietors of their estates, and the purchasers will be to all intents and purposes on the same footing, as well in regard to their under-tenants and ryots, as to all other regulations which will be contained in the general code; having equally in view the protection of all descriptions of inhabitants, proprietary land-holders, and those residing under them, in their just rights and privileges, and the due enforcement of the legal demands of the

61. One of the conditions above alluded to, and the principal security of government for the due realization of public revenue, is the lands being held answerable, by sale and transfer, under specific rules, for any deficiency thereof. This, as regards the interests of the company, is an object of the first importance in the new system; it will therefore be obvious to you, that in order to render this security efficient, the most diligent attention must be given to apportioning the allotment of public revenue on the several quotas or divisions, with a due computation of their actual assets.

62. In pointing out this duty to you, we shall not attempt to prescribe any particular line of conduct by which you are to accomplish it; for as the responsibility for the accuracy of your report, will attach entirely to yourself; and as time will evince the degree of attention you may have given to the subject, by showing the adequacy, or otherwise, of each estate, to the jumma fixed thereon; we wish to leave you at full liberty to adopt any mode of enquiry or investigation that may appear to yourself most likely to obtain the required information, only explaining the same fully to us, and forwarding any authentic documents you may procure, when you transmit your report.

This 63d paragraph not being applicable to the collectors of the Jaghire, Salem, and Kistnagherry, the following paragraphs were inserted in the general instructions to them:

To Mr. Hodgson.

To Mr. Hodgson.

In proposing the assessment on the several lots, you will no doubt avail yourself of the information to be derived from the able reports of your predecessor, and the complete revenue accounts of the produce kept for the last six years, compared with the value of the villages, when delivered over by his highness the nabob to the company. Under the permanent arrangement now resolved upon, the advantages will be so much extended, that there can be little doubt the resources of the estates will soon far exceed the present or any former state of the country. It is not however the wish of government to exceed a moderate equitable jumma.

To Captain Macleod.

To Captain Graham.

To Captain Graham.
Of the Baramahal, or other districts in your division, which lately composed part of Colonel Read's charge, you possess the fullest information, and can have no difficulty in forming the division, and proposing the assessments to be paid thereon. In regard to those recently placed under your management, we can only hope you will exert yourself to obtain it, with as little delay as possible.

To Mr. Hurd. Collector at Dindigul. residence in

63. The information derived since your residence in the Dindigul district, as well as from the survey carrying on under your direction, will we trust furnish sufficient data for you to proceed upon, in forming the divisions and proposing the assessment to be fixed thereon; as we cannot consider the average of collections since our possession of the district, a criterion for a permanent settlement on the principles proposed. In some situations, they may have been excessive, though we apprehend this has been rarely the case (we speak of the collections brought to the public account) and in general, we conceive they have been short of the actual resources, had they been all properly applied; but under the permanent arrangement now resolved upon, the advantages will be so much greater, and the cultivation be in consequence so much extended, that there can be little doubt of the resources of the estates in a very few years far exceeding the present or any former state of the country. It is not however the wish of government to exceed a moderate equitable jumma. In regard to the conquered countries, recently placed under your authority, we request you to procure, with as little delay as possible, the information necessary to enable you to propose a permanent settlement thereof.

equitable jamma. In regard to the necessity, with as little delay ity, we rely on your exertions to procure, with as little delay, necessary to enable government to proceed to a permanent settle-64. Some of the lots will of course contain a larger extent of uncultivated, arable, and waste lands than others; while some may possess peculiar advantages, from local causes favourable to cultivation, and the disposal of the produce, such as having a plentiful supply of water, and being near to the sea-coast or large towns :—all these and other circumstances affecting the value of a lot you may apportion for sale, must be ascertained and duly estimated, in fixing the assessment.

65. It is very probable that in some instances, the improvement in the value of the property may make it advisable not to demand the permanent summa, which may be proportionate to its computed value when in an improved state, until favourable circumstances of future avail, may make it advisable to demand the permanent summa, which may be proportionate to its computed value when in an improved state, until a future a future date; but nevertheless, that it may derive all the benefit of permanency in the assessment, we think, where this is the case, it would be advisable to fix a reduced jumma at the commencement, and gradually to rise to the full assessment the progressive increase, and the periods thereof to be all specified in the bill of sale, that the purchaser may know the bounds of the demand to be made upon him in perpetuity.

66. Again, in other instances where villages may be fully cultivated, and little room for improvement left, it may be necessary to grant some abatement, and perhaps to assess comparatively at a reduced rate in perpetuity certain villages in the vicinity of hills in jungles, from which depredations have been often committed; and though it is to be expected these will in a great measure be checked, as the country becomes better regulated under the change of system, we apprehend they may never be so entirely subdued, as not to operate on the fears of the inhabitants, and to keep such villages thinly populated.

67. Reflecting on the very serious responsibility which attaches to you in the execution of this highly important duty, involving on one hand, permanent interests of your honourable employers, and on the other, the most critical consequences, as affecting the future prosperity of the country and welfare of its inhabitants; we trust that every exertion will be called forth on your part, to do justice to all parties; and we strongly recommend to you to give your personal attention in carrying on the necessary enquiries and investigations, that you may possess yourself of local information of the havelly lands under your charge, of the actual situation of each village, and the lands dependent thereon, with all their advantages and disadvantages; so that when you make your report, you may be enabled to speak with that confidence which can never be derived from the mere communications of native agents, upon whose information, in such a case as the present, we should be reluctant to place much reliance. Indeed we cannot too strongly caution you against dependence on information coming through this channel; so much is it their interest to mislead you, either in concert with others or for their individual benefit, perhaps in the hope of making collusive purchases when the lands shall be offered for sale. This is not of course meant to preclude you from the assistance of native agents, as we are aware of the necessity of employing them, but to guard you against their impositions, and to impress you with the necessity of satisfying yourself personally, of every point of information.

68. It is not intended that the actual measurement of lands shall be resorted to, except in very particular cases; and these, must be reported to us with your reasons, for our previous sanction. It not being the wish of government, as before-observed, to demand more than a moderate equitable jumma, it is hoped that this may be generally ascertained with a due regard to the assets present and to come of each lot, without the necessity of incurring the expense and delay of measurement.

69. That we may be making a gradual progress in the settlement and disposal of the lands in question, you will forward your report on each pergunnah as you complete the allotment and proposed assessment, with copy of all your proceedings and investigations relative thereto; that we may submit them to government; if approved, the extent of the estates, and the jumma assessed, will be advertised for sale, under the prescribed conditions, and sealed proposals invited for the purpose.

70. It is proposed to appoint judges throughout the company's districts on this coast, vesting in them the entire judicial authority within their respective jurisdictions. Provincial courts of appeal and circuit will also be instituted, at the most convenient situations relative to the zillah or district courts, to which an appeal will lie from the latter; and the Governor and Council at the presidency, in their executive judicial capacity, will compose the sudder, or supreme civil and criminal courts, to whom a further appeal will lie from the provincial courts; and ultimately, in civil suits, an appeal lies to the king in council, certain limitations and rules being in all these cases, provided to be contained in a general Code of Regulations.

71. Each judge will be also constituted the magistrate of the same jurisdiction, and in that capacity take cognizance of all criminal cases; and the court of circuit above alluded to, will at prescribed periods, make the circuit of the stations within their respective jurisdictions, for the purpose of general jail deliveries. For the conduct of this department also, the necessary rules will be provided in the general Code of Regulations.

72. It is sufficient at this time to have explained generally the constitution of these courts, referring to the future, for the detail. The regulations or laws to be comprized in our general code, are meant to extend to all probable occurrences founded on the laws and usages of the country, with certain modifications; and may be altered, rescinded, or added to, as experience shall point out to be necessary, thereby preserving all that will tend to the permanent good of the country, and gradually working out and remedying all defects.

73. Every provision will be made, as far as our political situation will allow, that all regulations shall be formed upon principles of justice, and with a due regard to local circumstances; and the faithful administration thereof will be best secured, by its forming the sole duty of judges, liberally rewarded, and bound under a most solemn oath, to a strict observance of them, and to dispense them impartially; being at the same time, liable to prosecution, if charged with having been guilty of corruption in the execution of their offices.

74. The judicial power of government delegated to these courts, making them competent to take cognizance of all civil and criminal matters whatever, will render it, together with its officers employed in all financial and commercial concerns of the company, amenable to the courts for all acts done in their official capacity, in opposition to the existing regulations, to be decided in the same manner, as suits between individuals.

75. Where your own credit and responsibility are so deeply involved, we need not further press upon your mind the very great importance of the objects herein pointed out, whether as they relate to the permanent prosperity and happiness of the people, or the honour and interests of the English government on this coast. Where so much depends upon intelligent activity, we can only express an earnest hope, that your most strenuous endeavours will be exerted to fulfil the wishes and expectations of government, as conveyed in these instructions; and that your first consideration will be how to overcome any difficulties that may present themselves in the progress of your labours. We at the same time, feel it an indispensable duty to communicate, for your information, a recent order from the Governor General in Council, alluding to the introduction of the system in view.

76. "The conduct of the collector on this occasion, forcibly evinces the impossibility of introducing a permanent system, either of revenue or judicature, unless the collectors shall be disposed to a zealous and cordial discharge of their duty; but as the public prosperity and welfare absolutely require the introduction of that system without delay, we are determined to guard against the failure of it, by the removal of those collectors who shall be found either incapable or unwilling to execute our orders through your board; instead, therefore, of allowing much valuable time to be sacrificed in the consideration of indolent or negligent excuses, we enjoin you to point out, without hesitation, the instances in which it may become necessary to apply this effectual remedy."

We are, Sir, your obedient servants,
Fort St. George, 15 Oct. 1799. (Signed) William Paine, &c. Members.

A. D. 1793, REGULATION VIII.

V. First, The talookdars to be considered the actual proprietors of the lands composing their talooks, are the following:

Second, Talookdars who purchased their lands by private or at public sale, or obtained them by gift from the zemindar, or other actual proprietor of land to whom they now pay the revenue assessed upon their talooks, or from his ancestors, subject to the payment of the established dues of government; and who received deeds of sale, or gift of such land from the zemindar, or sunnuds from the Khalsa, making over to them his proprietary rights therein.

Third, Talookdars whose talooks were formed before the zemindar, or other actual proprietor of land to whom they now pay their revenue, or his ancestors, succeeded to the zemindary.

Fourth, Talookdars, the lands comprized in whose talooks were never the property of the zemindar, or other actual proprietor of the soil to whom they now pay their revenue, or his ancestors.

Fifth, Talookdars who have succeeded to talooks of the nature of those described in the preceding clauses, by right of purchase, gift, or inheritance from the former proprietors of such talooks.

VI. The proprietors of talooks, however, who now pay the public revenue assessed upon their lands through a zemindar, or other actual proprietor of land, and whose title deeds contain a clause stipulating that their revenue is to be paid through him, shall continue to pay their revenue through such zemindar or other actual proprietor of land, as heretofore.

VII. Talookdars whose talooks are held under writings or sunnuds from zemindars, or other actual proprietors of lands, which do not expressly transfer the property in the soil, but only entitle the talookdar's possession, so long as he continues to discharge the rent, or perform the conditions stipulated therein, are considered as leaseholders only, not actual proprietors of the soil, and consequently are not entitled to be rendered independent of the zemindar, or other actual proprietor of land, from whom they derive their tenures, provided they now pay the rent assessed upon their talooks to him.

VIII. Talookdars also whose tenure is denominated junglebroory, and is of the following description, are not considered entitled to separation from the proprietors of whom they hold. The pottahs granted to these talookdars, in consideration of the grantee clearing away the jungle, and bringing the land into a productive state, give it to him and his heirs in perpetuity, with the right of disposing of it either by sale or gift, exempting him from payment of revenue for a certain term, and at the expiration of it, subjecting him to a specific assul jumma, with all increases, abwabs, and whatoots imposed on the pergunnah generally, but this for such part of the land only as the grantee brings into a state of cultivation; and the grantee is further subject to the payment of a certain specified portion of all complimentary presents and fees which he may receive from his under-tenants, exclusive of the fixed revenue. The pottah specifies the boundaries of the land granted, but not the quantity of it, until it is brought into cultivation.

IX. The rules in Section V. respecting talooks, have also been extended to ayma lands liable to the payment of a fixed quit revenue, denominated Malguzarry aymas; and agreeably to the distinctions laid down in that Section, it has been ordered that such Malguzarry ayma tenures as are held under grants of the Mahomedan government, previous to the company's accession to the Dewanny, or which have been since granted by proprietors of estates for a consideration received by them, are to be separated from the proprietors to whom their revenue is now paid, as coming within the spirit of the rules for the separation of talookdars, who are proprietors of the lands composing their talooks. But Malguzarry ayma tenures which may appear to have been bona fide granted for the purpose of bringing waste lands into cultivation, shall continue included in the estates to which they are now annexed, as coming within the rules in Section VIII. respecting junglebroory talooks.

INSTRUCTIONS
issued to Collectors
under the Presidency of Fort St. George, in Oct. 1799.

Enclosure.

X. The rules contained in the following Section have been prescribed for the guidance of the collectors in carrying into execution the rules relative to the separation of talookdars, who are the actual proprietors of the lands composing their talooks, and are declared entitled to separation.

XI. Every talookdar being considered as the rightful possessor of his talook, until a better title is established against him by due course of law; the point to be ascertained by the collectors, in carrying the above-mentioned orders into effect, is not, whether the holders of the several talooks under their authority, are the lawful possessors of the talooks held by them, but whether the nature of their tenure is such as to entitle them to separation under the rules contained in Sections V. and IX.; to ascertain which, they are to call upon the talookdars to produce their title deeds; and after having examined them, those who may appear to them to be actual proprietors of the lands composing their talooks, as described in those Sections; continuing the remainder under the zemindars, or other actual proprietors, as heretofore. If a talookdar should have no title deeds to produce, the collector is to make a summary enquiry into his right to separation; and after attending to such proofs and documents as may be produced by the talookdar in support of his title to separation, and by the zemindar or other actual proprietor, in objection thereto, is to decide, according to the best of his judgment, whether such talookdar be entitled to separation or not, and conclude the settlement accordingly.

XII. The collectors are to acquaint the talookdars, whom they may adjudge not to be actual proprietors of the lands composing their talooks, and consequently continue under the zemindars or other actual proprietors, as heretofore, that if dissatisfied with their decision, they are at liberty to sue such zemindars or actual proprietors of land in the court of Dewanny adawlut of the zillah, for the right of property in their talooks; and that in the event of their establishing such right, they will be separated from such zemindars, or other actual proprietors, and allowed to pay the revenue assessed upon their talooks, to the public treasury. They are also to acquaint the zemindars, or other actual proprietors, from whose estates talooks may be separated, and who may be dissatisfied with such separation, on the grounds of the holders of such talooks not being the V. and IX., that they are at liberty to sue such talookdars in the court of Dewanny adawlut, for the right of property in their talooks; and that in the event of their establishing such right, the talooks will be replaced under them, as heretofore. The right of property in every talook, in cases where it may be disputed, will thus be tried and decided upon according to law in the court of Dewanny adawlut of the zillah; and either party dissatisfied with the decision of the judge, will have an appeal therefrom to the provincial court of appeal, and from the decision of that court to the sudder Dewanny adawlut, in cases that may be appealable to the last-mentioned court.

XIII. Talookdars ordered to be separated, are not to be permitted to pay the revenue assessed upon their lands through the zemindars, or other actual proprietors of estates, as heretofore.

XIV. Talookdars who, in consequence of the rules in Sections V. and IX., may be separated from the zemindars, or other actual proprietors of estates, through whom they heretofore paid their revenues, are to pay their revenue in future, immediately into the collector's treasury; except in districts where, from the number of talooks, or other causes, this mode would be attended with considerable inconvenience; in which case, tehseldars or native collectors are to be appointed to receive the revenue of the talooks in such districts.

XV. Zemindars or other actual proprietors of land, from whose zemindaries or estates, talooks may be separated, shall not be appointed tehseldars to receive the revenue of the talooks so separated; but the office of tehseldar shall in every instance be given to some other person of character and responsibility, and the whole expense of it, is to be defrayed by government.

XVI. Mocurrey leases to persons not the actual proprietors of the lands included in such leases, if granted or confirmed by the supreme government, or obtained previous to the company's accession to the Dewanny, are to be continued in force during the lives of the lessees, subject to an abatement of the fixed jumma for the authorized sayer resumed or abolished; but on their death, the settlement is to be made with the actual proprietor of the soil, agreeable to this Regulation.

XVII. Mocurrey grants to the actual proprietors of the soil, made or confirmed by the supreme government, are also to be continued in force, subject in like manner to an abatement of the fixed jumma on account of the resumption or abolition of the authorized sayer. The rules contained in this Section, and Section XVI. are to be considered subject to the future confirmation or revocation of the honourable court of directors.

XVIII. Mocurreydar holding lands of which they are not to be the actual proprietors, and whose mocurrey grants have been obtained since the company's accession to the Dewanny, and never received the sanction of the supreme government, are to be disposed of, and the settlement is to be made with the actual proprietors of the soil, under this Regulation. In cases, however, where such mocurreydar have been in possession of their mocurreys for a term exceeding twelve years, they are to receive during their lives (subject to the pleasure of the honourable court of directors) the difference between the jumma at at which they held the lands, and that which may now be agreed to by the actual proprietors, added to the real produce of the authorized sayer resumed or abolished.

XIX. Istemrardars, however, who have not got possession of their lands to the exclusion or without the consent of the actual proprietors, as the mocurreydar mentioned in Section XVIII. are supposed to have done, but hold them of the proprietors on pottah or lease, to be considered as a species of pottah talookdars, and the settlement is to be made with them as hereafter specified.

LXII. First, The annual revenue to be paid to government from the estates of the proprietors of land with whom a settlement has been established with powers to pro-declared fixed for ever, and courts of justice having been established with powers to protect them against all demands exceeding that fixed revenue, whether made by the officers of government or other persons, or by the authority of government itself, and on the other hand the grounds on which deductions and abatements were heretofore occasionally obtained by proprietors of estates when their jumma was liable to frequent variation, no longer existing, neither their rights nor the value of their property can be affected in future by the real produce of their estates being known. The rules therefore, hereafter prescribed, regarding putwarries, which are framed solely to facilitate the decision of suits in the courts of judicature between proprietors and farmers of lands, and persons paying rent or revenue to them, and to guard against any diminution of the fixed revenue of government, or injustice to individuals, by enabling the collectors to procure the necessary information and accounts for allotting the public jumma upon estates that may be divided agreeably to the principles prescribed in Regulation I. 1793, can be objected to by those proprietors only who may have it in contemplation, in the event of the division or transfer of a portion of their estates, to deprive government of a part of the fixed revenue, or defraud some of the partners in their estates, by obtaining a disproportionate allotment of the public assessment on the several shares, or to oppress the persons paying rent or revenues to them with impunity, by withholding from the courts of justice the documents necessary to enable them to afford redress to the complainants. It being essential to the security of the public revenue, as well as of private rights and property, and at the same time, consistent with the ancient usages of the country, and the declarations in the Proclamation announcing the public assessment on the lands fixed for ever, that government should have the means of counteracting such unjustifiable views; the following rules have been adopted:—

Second, Every proprietor of land who may not have established a putwarry in each village in his or her estate, to keep the accounts of the ryots, as required by the original rules for the decennial settlement of the three provinces, shall immediately appoint a putwarry in each village for that purpose. All proprietors of estates are to deposit in the Dewanny adawlut of the zillah, the collectors cutcherry, and the principal cutcherry in each mehau or pergunnah, a list of the putwarries in their respective estates, and the names of the villages, the accounts of which they may be severally appointed to keep. The proprietors are to notify every three months to the court and the collector, all vacancies that may occur, and the names of the persons whom they may appoint to fill them. The board of revenue are empowered to authorize any proprietor to reduce the number of putwarries, in such proportion as they may think proper, in cases in which it may appear to them unnecessary to entertain a separate putwarry for each village.

Third, The putwarries in every estate are to produce all accounts relating to the lands, produce, collections, and charges of the village or villages, the accounts of which may be kept by them respectively, and to furnish every information and explanation that may be required regarding them, whenever they may be required by any court of justice to adjust any suit that may be depending before the court, between the proprietor or farmer of the estate and the ryots, or any persons paying rent or revenue to them, or any other suit.

Fourth, The putwarries in each estate shall also produce the accounts specified in the preceding clause, and furnish every explanation and information that may be required respecting them for the allotment of the public revenue, agreeably to the principles laid down in Regulation I. 1793, in the event of the whole or any portion of the estates being directed to be disposed of at public sale, or being transferred by any private act of the proprietor or proprietors, or of the estate being ordered to be divided pursuant to a decree of a court of judicature, or where it may be a joint estate, in consequence of the request of one or more of the proprietors. But no collector is to require a putwarry to attend him, and produce his accounts, but for the purposes above mentioned, or in any other cases in which they may be expressly empowered to require them by any regulation printed and published in the manner directed in Regulation XLI. 1793. If any collector shall require the putwarry of any village or villages to attend him, and produce the village accounts for purposes or in cases in which he may not be authorized to inspect them, the court of Dewanny adawlut, upon the circumstances being represented to it by the proprietor of the estate, is empowered to make an order to prohibit the collector requiring the accounts, and in the event of his repeating the requisition, to adjudge him to pay a fine to the proprietor of the estate, of such sum as to the court may appear proper, and to levy the fine in the mode in which the courts are empowered to levy fines from the collectors in the suits described in Section XXXIII. Regulation XVI. 1793.

Fifth, When a collector shall require the attendance of a putwarry for the examination of his accounts, either before him or any officer whom he may depute for the purpose, he is to serve such putwarry with a written notice under his official signature and the seal of the zillah, to attend with the accounts required, which are to be particularized in the notice.

Enclosure.

If he shall omit to attend with the accounts by the limited time, and shall not show good cause to the collector for the omission, the collector is authorized to represent the circumstances through the vakeel of government to the court of Dewanny adawlut of the zillah, the judge of which, provided there shall appear to him sufficient cause for so doing, may order such putwarry to be committed to close custody, until he produces the accounts. The courts are to observe the same process with putwarries who may omit to attend with their accounts when required, for the adjustment of any matter or dispute depending before the courts.

Sixth, Putwarries shall be required to swear to the truth of the accounts they may produce, when deemed necessary; and in the event of the collector having occasion to proceed in person, or to depute an officer to examine any village accounts on the spot, the judge, upon application being made to him for that purpose by the collector, through the vakeel of government, may grant to him or to such officer, a commission to swear the several putwarries whose accounts are to be inspected, inserting in the commission, the name of each putwarry to be sworn. If the collector shall have occasion to examine the accounts of a putwarry at the station at which the court may be established, he is to cause him to be sworn before the court, if he shall judge it necessary to require him to make oath to the truth of his accounts.

Seventh, If a putwarry who shall have sworn to the truth of any account that he may have been required to produce before a court of justice, for the purpose of deciding any matter before the court, and the accounts shall afterwards be found to have been fabricated or altered, or not to be the true accounts, the judge of the court is empowered to commit him to be tried for perjury before the court of circuit.

Eighth, If a putwarry shall have been sworn before a judge, or before a collector, or the officer of a collector, to any accounts that he may have been required to produce before the collector or his officer, in a case in which the collector may have been empowered to require him to produce such accounts, and the accounts shall afterwards appear to have been fabricated or altered, or not to be the true accounts, the collector is empowered to employ the vakeel of government to prosecute such putwarry for perjury, in the case specified in this and the preceding clause. If it shall be proved to the satisfaction of the court, that the accounts were fabricated, altered, and exchanged by the orders, or with the knowledge or connivance of the proprietor or farmer of the estate, the court shall impose such fine upon the proprietor or farmer so offending, as may appear to it proper, upon a consideration of the case, and the situation and circumstances of the offender.

Ninth, Upon the accounts of any village being ordered to be produced, if it shall be found that no putwarry has been appointed to keep the accounts of the ryots in conformity to the rules prescribed in clause second, the court, provided it be a case in which the requisition of the accounts may be authorized, shall fine the proprietor for the first offence, in such sum as it may judge proper, upon a consideration of his or her situation and circumstances, and the nature of the case; and for the second offence, twice the amount of the fine for the first; and for the third and every subsequent offence, double the amount of the preceding one. If the accounts shall have been required by the collector, he is to order the vakeel of government to sue the proprietor on the part of government under this section, for a breach of the rule in clause second.

Tenth, The rules contained in this section are hereby equally applicable to dependent talooks as to estates paying revenue immediately to government.

A. D. 1793, REGULATION I.

A REGULATION for enacting into a Regulation certain Articles of a Proclamation, bearing date the 22d March 1793:—Passed by the Governor General in Council on the 1st May 1793; corresponding with the 21st Bysaak 1200, Bengal era; the 6th Bysaak 1200 Fusily; the 21st Bysaak 1200 Willaity; the 6th Bysaak 1850 Sumbut; and the 19th Ramzaan 1207 Higeree.

The following Articles of the Proclamation relative to the limitation of the public demand upon the lands, addressed by the Governor General in Council to the zemindars, independent talookdars, and other actual proprietors of land paying revenue to government, in the provinces of Bengal, Behar, and Orissa, is hereby enacted into a Regulation, which is to have force and effect from the 22d March 1793, the date of the Proclamation.

II. Proclamation, Art. 1.—In the original Regulations for the decennial settlement of the public revenues of Bengal, Behar, and Orissa, passed for these provinces respectively on the 18th September 1789, the 25th November 1789, and the 10th February 1790, it was notified to the proprietors of land, with or on behalf of whom a settlement might be concluded, that the jumma assessed upon their lands under those Regulations, would be continued after the expiration of the ten years, and remain unalterable for ever, provided such continuance should meet with the approbation of the honourable Court of Directors for the affairs of the East India Company, and not otherwise.

III. Art. 2.—The Marquis Cornwallis, knight of the most noble order of the garter, Governor General in Council, now notifies to all zemindars, independent talookdars, and other actual proprietors of land paying revenue to government, in the provinces of Bengal, Behar, and Orissa, that he has been empowered by the honourable Court of Directors for the affairs of the East India Company, to declare the jumma which has been or may be assessed upon their lands, under the Regulations above mentioned, fixed for ever.

IV. Art. 3.

IV. Art. 3.—The Governor General in Council accordingly declares to the zemindars, independent talookdars, and other actual proprietors of land, with or on behalf of whom a settlement has been concluded under the Regulations above mentioned, that at the expiration of the term of the settlement, no alteration will be made in the assessment which they have respectively engaged to pay, but that they and their heirs and lawful successors will be allowed to hold their estates at such assessment, for ever.

V. Art. 4.—The lands of some zemindars, independent talookdars, and other actual proprietors of land, having been held khas, or let in farm, in consequence of their refusing to pay the assessment required of them under the Regulations above mentioned, the Governor General in Council now notifies to the zemindars, independent talookdars, and other actual proprietors of land, whose lands are held khas, that they shall be restored to the management of their lands, upon their agreeing to the payment of the assessment which has been or may be required of them, in conformity to the Regulations above mentioned, and that no alteration shall afterwards be made in that assessment; but that they and their heirs and lawful successors shall be permitted to hold their respective estates at such assessment, for ever; and he declares to the zemindars, independent talookdars, and other actual proprietors of lands, whose lands have been let in farm, that they shall not regain possession of their lands before the expiration of the period for which they have been farmed (unless the farmers shall voluntarily consent to make over to them the remaining term of their lease, and the Governor General in Council shall approve of the transfer); but that at the expiration of that period, upon their agreeing to the payment of the assessment which may be required of them, they shall be reinstated; and that no alteration shall afterwards be made in that assessment, but that they and their heirs and lawful successors shall be allowed to hold their respective estates at such assessment, for ever.

VI. Art. 5.—In the event of the proprietary right in lands that are or may become the property of government, being transferred to individuals, such individuals and their heirs and lawful successors shall be permitted to hold the lands at the assessment at which they may be transferred, for ever.

VII. Art. 6.—It is well known to the zemindars, independent talookdars, and other actual proprietors of land, as well as to the inhabitants of Bengal, Behar, and Orissa in general, that from the earliest times until the present period, the public assessment upon the lands has never been fixed; but that according to established usage and custom, the rulers of these provinces have from time to time, demanded an increase of assessment from the proprietors of land; and that for the purpose of obtaining this increase, not only frequent investigations have been made to ascertain the actual produce of their estates, but that it has been the practice to deprive them of the management of their lands, and either to let them in farm, or to appoint officers on the part of government to collect the assessment immediately from the ryots. The honourable Court of Directors considering these usages and measures to be detrimental to the prosperity of the country, have, with a view to promote the future ease and happiness of the people, authorized the foregoing declaration; and the zemindars, independent talookdars, and other actual proprietors of land, with or on behalf of whom a settlement has been or may be concluded, are to consider these orders fixing the amount of the assessment as irrevocable, and not liable to alteration by any persons whom the Court of Directors may hereafter appoint to the administration of their affairs in this country.

The Governor General in Council trusts that the proprietors of land, sensible of the benefits conferred upon them, by the public assessment being fixed for ever, will exert themselves in the cultivation of their lands, under the certainty that they will enjoy exclusively the fruits of their own good management and industry; and that no demand will ever be made upon them, or their heirs or successors, by the present or any future government, for an augmentation of the public assessment, in consequence of the improvement of their respective estates.

To discharge the revenues at the stipulated periods without delay or evasion, and to conduct themselves with good faith and moderation towards their dependent talookdars and ryots, are duties at all times indispensably required from the proprietors of land; and a strict observance of those duties, is now more than ever incumbent upon them, in return for the benefits which they will themselves derive from the orders now issued. The Governor General in Council therefore expects that the proprietors of land will not only act in this manner themselves, towards their dependent talookdars and ryots, but also enjoin the strictest adherence to the same principles, in the persons whom they may appoint to collect the rents from them. He further expects, that without deviating from this line of conduct, they will regularly discharge the revenue, in all seasons; and he accordingly notifies to them, that in future no claims or applications for suspensions or remissions, on account of drought, inundation, or other calamity of seasons, will be attended to; but that in the event of any zemindar, independent talookdar, or other actual proprietor of land, with or on behalf of whom a settlement has been or may be concluded, or his or her heirs or successors failing in the punctual discharge of the public revenue which has been or may be assessed upon their lands under the above-mentioned Regulations; a sale of the whole of the lands of the defaulter, or such portion of them as may be sufficient to make good the arrear, will positively and invariably take place.

VIII. Art. 7.—To prevent any misconstruction of the foregoing Articles, the Governor General in Council thinks it necessary to make the following declarations to the zemindars, independent talookdars, and other actual proprietors of land.

First, It being the duty of the ruling power to protect all classes of people, and more particularly particularly those who from situation are most helpless, the Governor General in Council will, whenever he may deem it proper, enact such regulations as he may think necessary for the protection and welfare of the dependent talookdars, ryots, and other cultivators of the soil; and no zemindar, independent talookdar, or other actual proprietor of land, shall be entitled on this account, to make any objection to the discharge of the fixed assessment which they have respectively agreed to pay.

Second, The Governor General in Council having on the 28th of July 1790, directed the sayer collections to be abolished, a full compensation was granted to the proprietors of land for the loss of revenue sustained by them in consequence of this abolition; and he now declares, that if he should hereafter think it proper to re-establish the sayer collections, or any other internal duties, and to appoint officers on the part of government to collect them, no proprietor of land will be admitted to any participation thereof, or be entitled to make any claims for remissions of assessment on that account.

Third, The Governor General in Council will impose such assessment as he may deem equitable, on all lands at present alienated, and paying no public revenue, which have been, or may be proved to be held under illegal or invalid titles. The assessment so imposed, will belong to government, and no proprietor of land will be entitled to any part of it.

Fourth, The jumma of those zemindars, independent talookdars, and other actual proprietors of land, which is declared fixed in the foregoing articles, is to be considered entirely unconnected with and exclusive of any allowances which have been made to them in the adjustment of their jumma, for keeping up tannahs or police establishments, and also of the produce of any lands which they may have been permitted to appropriate for the same purpose; and the Governor General in Council reserves to himself the option of resuming the whole or part of such allowances, or produce of such lands, according as he may think proper, in consequence of his having exonerated the proprietors of land from the charge of keeping the peace, and appointed officers on the part of government to superintend the police of the country. The Governor General in Council however declares, that the allowance or produce of lands which may be resumed, will be appropriated to no other purpose but that of defraying the expense of the police, and that instructions will be sent to the collectors, not to add such allowances, or the produce of such lands, to the jumma of the proprietors of land, but to collect the amount from them, separately.

Fifth, Nothing contained in this Proclamation shall be construed to render the lands of the several descriptions of disqualified proprietors, specified in the first article of the Regulations regarding disqualified landholders, passed on the 15th July 1791, liable to sale, for any arrears which have accrued or may accrue on the fixed jumma that has been or may be assessed upon their lands under the above-mentioned Regulations for the decennial settlements of the 15th July 1791. It is to be understood, however, all or any of the descriptions of disqualified landholders, specified in the first article of the last-mentioned Regulations, shall be permitted to assume or retain the management of their lands, in consequence of the ground of their disqualification no longer existing, or of the Governor General in Council dispensing with, altering, or abolishing those Regulations; the lands of such proprietors will be held responsible for the fixed jumma that has been or may be assessed thereon from the time that the management may devolve upon them, in the same manner as the lands of all actual proprietors of land, who are declared qualified for the management of their estates, and also of all actual proprietors who are unqualified for such management, by natural or other disabilities, but do not come within the descriptions of disqualified landholders specified in the first article of the Regulations of the 15th July 1791,—are and will be held answerable for any arrears that are or may become due from them on the fixed jumma, which they or any persons on their behalf, have engaged or may engage to pay under the above-mentioned Regulations for the decennial settlement.

IX. Art. 8.—That no doubt may be entertained whether proprietors of land are entitled, under the existing Regulations, to dispose of their estates without previous sanction of government, the Governor General in Council notifies to the zemindars, independent talookdars, and other actual proprietors of land, that they are privileged to transfer to whomsoever they may think proper, by sale, gift or otherwise, their proprietary rights in the whole or any portion of their respective estates, without applying to government for its sanction to the transfer; and that all such transfers will be held valid, provided that they be conformable to the Mahomedan or the Hindoo laws (according as the religious persuasions of the parties to each transaction, may render the validity of it, determinable by the former or the latter code), and that they be not repugnant to any regulations now in force, which have been passed by the British Administrations, or to any regulations that they may hereafter enact.

X. Art. 9.—From the limitation of the public demand upon the lands, the net income, and consequently the value (independent of increase of rent, attainable by improvements) of any landed property, for the assessment on which a distinct engagement has been or may be entered into between government and the proprietor, or that may be separately assessed, although included in one engagement with other estates belonging to the same proprietor, and which may be offered for public or private sale entire, will always be ascertainable by a comparison of the amount of the fixed jumma assessed upon it (which, agreeably to the foregoing declarations, is to remain unalterable for ever, to whomsoever the property may be transferred) with the whole of its produce, allowing for the charges of management.—But it is also essential that a notification should be made of the principles upon upon which the fixed assessment charged upon any such estate will be apportioned on the several divisions of it, in the event of the whole of it being transferred, by public or private sale or otherwise, in two or more lots, or of a portion of it being transferred in one, or in two or more lots, or of its being joint property, and a division of it being made amongst the proprietors; otherwise, from the want of a declared rule for estimating the proportion of the fixed jumma with which the several shares would be chargeable in such cases, the real value of each share would be uncertain, and consequently the benefits expected to result from fixing the public assessment upon the lands, would be but partially obtained.—The Governor General in Council has accordingly prescribed the following rules for apportioning the fixed assessment in the several cases above mentioned; but as government might sustain a considerable loss of revenue by disproportionate allotments of the assessment, were the apportioning of it, in any of the cases above specified, to be left to the proprietors, he requires that all such transfers or divisions as may be made by the private act of the parties themselves, be notified to the collector of the revenue of the zillah in which the lands may be situated, or such other officer as government may in future prescribe, in order that the fixed jumma assessed upon the whole estate, may be apportioned on the several shares, in the manner hereafter directed; and that the names of the proprietors of each share, and the jumma charged thereon, may be entered upon the public registers; and that separate engagements for the payment of the jumma assessed upon each share, may be executed by the proprietors, who will thenceforward be considered as actual proprietors of land; and the Governor General in Council declares, that if the parties to such transfers of land; and the Governor General in Council declares, that if the parties to such transfers or divisions, shall omit to notify them to the collector of the revenue of the zillah, or such other officer as may be hereafter prescribed for the purposes before mentioned, the whole of such estate, will be held responsible to government for the discharge of the fixed jumma assessed upon it, in the same manner as if no such transfer or division had ever taken place.—The Governor General in Council thinks it necessary further to notify, in elucidation of the declarations contained in this article (which are conformable to the principles of the existing Regulations) that if any zemindar, independent talookdar, or other actual proprietor of land, shall dispose of a portion of his or her lands as a dependent talook, the jumma which may be stipulated to be paid by the dependent talookdar, will not be entered upon the records of government; nor will the transfer exempt such lands from being answerable, in common with the remainder of the estate, for the payment of the public revenue assessed upon the whole of it, in the event of the proprietor, or his or her heirs or successors, falling in arrear, from any cause whatever; nor will it be allowed in any case, to affect the rights or claims of government, any more than if it had never taken place.

First, In the event of the whole of the lands of a zemindar, independent talookdar, or other actual proprietor of land, with or on behalf of whom a settlement has been or may be concluded under the Regulations above mentioned, being exposed to public sale by the order of the Governor General in Council, for the discharge of arrears of assessment, or in consequence of the decision of a court of justice, in two or more lots, the assessment upon each lot shall be fixed at an amount which shall bear the same proportion to its actual produce, as the fixed assessment upon the whole of the lands sold, may bear to the whole of their actual produce. This produce shall be ascertained in the mode that is or may be prescribed by the existing Regulations, or such other regulations as the Governor General in Council may hereafter adopt; and the purchaser or purchasers of such lands, and his or her or their heirs and lawful successors, shall hold them at the jumma at which they may be so purchased, for ever.

Second, When a portion of the lands of a zemindar, talookdar, or other actual proprietor of land, with or on behalf of whom a settlement has been or may be concluded under the Regulations before mentioned, shall be exposed to public sale by order of the Governor General in Council, for the liquidation of arrears of settlement, or pursuant to the decision of a court of justice, the assessment upon such lands, if disposed of in one lot, shall be fixed at an amount which shall bear the same proportion to their actual produce, as the fixed assessment upon the whole of the lands of such proprietor, including those disposed of, may bear to the whole of their actual produce. If the lands sold be disposed of in two or more lots, the assessment upon each lot shall be fixed at an amount which shall bear the same proportion to its actual produce, as the fixed assessment upon the whole of the lands of such proprietor, including those sold, may bear to the whole of their actual produce, the actual produce of the whole of the lands of such proprietor, whether the portion of them which may be sold be disposed of in one, or in two or more lots, shall be ascertained in the mode that is or may be prescribed by the existing Regulations, or such other regulations as the Governor General in Council may hereafter enact; and the purchaser or purchasers of such lands, and his or her or their heirs or successors, will be allowed to hold them at the jumma at which they may be so purchased, for ever; and the remainder of the public jumma, which will consequently be payable by the former proprietor of the whole estate, on account of the portion of it that may be left in his or her possession, will continue unalterable for ever.

Third, When a zemindar, independent talookdar, or other actual proprietor of land, with or on behalf of whom a settlement has been or may be concluded, shall transfer the whole of his or her estate in two or more distinct portions to two or more persons, or a portion thereof to one person, or two or more persons in joint property, by private sale, gift, or otherwise, the assessment upon each distinct portion of such estate so transferred, shall be fixed at an amount which shall bear the same proportion to its actual produce as the assessment upon the whole of the estate of the transferring proprietor, of which the whole or a portion may be so transferred, may bear to the whole of its actual produce. This produce shall shall be ascertained in the mode that is or may be prescribed in the existing Regulations, or such other regulations as government may hereafter adopt, and the person or persons to whom such lands may be transferred, and his or her or their heirs and lawful successors, shall hold them at the jumma at which they may be so transferred, for ever; and where only a portion of such estates shall be transferred, the remainder of the public jumma, which will consequently be payable by the former proprietor of the whole estates, on account of the lands that may remain in his or her possession, shall be continued undivided for ever.

Fourth, Whenever a division shall be made of lands, the settlement of which has been or may be concluded with or on behalf of the proprietor or proprietors, and that are or may become the joint property of two or more persons, the assessment upon each share shall be fixed at an amount which shall bear the same proportion to its actual produce, as the fixed jumma assessed upon the whole of the estate divided, may bear to the whole of its actual produce. This produce shall be ascertained in the mode that is or may be prescribed by the existing Regulations, or such other regulations as the Governor General in Council may hereafter adopt, and the * shares and their heirs and lawful successors shall hold their respective shares at the jumma which may be so assessed upon them for ever.

XI. Art. 10.—The following rules are prescribed respecting the adjustment of the assessment on the lands of zemindars, independent talookdars, and other actual proprietors of land, whose lands are or may be held khas, or let in farm, in the event of their being disposed of by public sale, or transferred by any private act of the proprietor, or of their being joint property, and a division of them taking place amongst the proprietors.

First, If the whole or a portion of the lands of a zemindar, independent talookdar, or other actual proprietor of land, who may not have agreed to the payment of the assessment proposed to him or her, under the Regulations above-mentioned, and whose lands are or may be held khas, or let in farm, shall be exposed to public sale, in one, or in two or more lots, pursuant to the decree of a court of justice, such lands, if khas, shall be disposed of at white-purchasers of such lands, and his or her or their heirs and lawful successors, shall hold the lands at the assessment at which they may be purchased, for ever; if the lands, at the time of their being exposed to sale, shall be held in farm, and shall be put up in one, or in two or more lots, they shall be disposed of under the following conditions: The purchaser or purchasers shall receive, during the unexpired part of the term of the lease of the farmer, rights, on account of the lands so purchased; and such purchaser or purchasers shall engage to pay, at the expiration of the lease of the farmer, such assessment, on account of the lands, as government may deem equitable. The sum to be received by the purchaser or purchasers, during the unexpired part of the term of the lease of the farmer, and the jumma to be paid by such purchaser or purchasers, after the expiration of the lease, shall be specified at the time of the sale, and such purchaser or purchasers, and his or her or their heirs and lawful successors, shall be allowed to hold the lands at the assessment at which they may be so purchased, for ever.

Second, If a zemindar, independent talookdar, or other actual proprietor of land, whose lands are or may be held khas, or let in farm, shall transfer by private sale, gift, or otherwise, the whole or a portion of his or her lands, in one, or in two or more lots, the person or persons to whom the lands may be so transferred, shall be entitled to receive from government (if the lands are held khas) or from the farmer (if the lands are let in farm) the malicau-nah to which the former proprietor was entitled on account of the lands so transferred. Per-sons to whom such lands may be so transferred, will stand in the same predicament as the zemindars, independent talookdars, or other actual proprietors of lands mentioned in the fourth article, whose lands are held khas, or have been let in farm, in consequence of their refusing to pay the assessment required of them under the before-mentioned Regulations for the decennial settlement, and the declarations contained in that article, are to be held applicable to them.

Third, In the event of a division being made of lands that are or may become the joint property of two or more persons, and which are or may be held khas, or let in farm, the proprietors of the several shares will stand in the same predicament, with regard to their respective shares, as the zemindars, independent talookdars, and other actual proprietors of land, specified in the fourth article, whose lands have been let in farm or are held khas, in consequence of their having refused to pay the assessment required of them under the before-mentioned Regulations for the decennial settlement; and the declarations contained in that article, are to be considered applicable to them.

Approved; and ordered, that each collector be addressed accordingly.

Appendix, No. 19.

LETTER from Lieut. Colonel Barry Close, to Captain Alexander Read, Superintendent of the Revenues in the Barahmah Country, dated 31st March 1792.

Sir,
LORD Cornwallis conceiving it doubtful whether it may be altogether convenient for the Madras government to appoint collectors immediately, for the management of the ceded countries, has formed the intention of having them placed under your immediate charge, not only from the experience you have had in that branch of business, but from the convenience that attends the measure, on account of your being already desired to march with the necessary force, and take possession of the posts ceded in the Barahmah. In pursuance therefore of the intention above mentioned, his lordship hereby nominates you to be collector and manager, on the part of the Honourable Company, of all the revenue concerns in the ceded districts, contained in the Barahmah and the Salem country, including the Nameul, from the 16th day of the present month, which is the date of the treaty of peace concluded with the nabob Tippoo Sultaun, until the end of the present year, when it is proposed that collectors shall be appointed by government for the said year, from the list of civil servants.

When you proceed to the Barahmah therefore, agreeably to former instructions, his lordship wishes you to be prepared and provided to enter on the office in the best manner possible, prepared with such authentic information as can be gathered together, respecting the real annual produce of the districts that are to come under your management:—a point that you must spare no pains to ascertain with precision, and without delay; and provided with such number of accountants and subordinate instruments from amongst the natives, on whose integrity you can place reliance, as the effectual execution of your arrangements may require.

The officers attached to you at present as assistants, his lordship is in hopes will contribute largely to your aid. However, as you will have concerns of a wide extent to arrange and settle, his lordship proposes to send you from head quarters, to be employed under your directions in the revenue branch, Lieutenant William Macleod, whose merits are not unknown to you, and who, from having long maintained a constant intercourse with the natives, in which he has become familiar with their languages, customs and manners, promises to afford you the fullest satisfaction.

In nominating you to an office of such high trust and importance, and so difficult to execute with propriety and success, as that now conferred upon you, his lordship thinks it unnecessary to advert to the reliance he places in your zeal, integrity and abilities; the ready selection he has made of you on the present occasion, being a sufficient proof of the opinion he entertains of you, in those respects.

In entering upon your charge however, he desires you will hold it constantly in view, as a leading principle never to be departed from, that neither the Company nor Tippoo Sultaun has any claim on the ceded countries, for arrears of any denomination, connected with any period previous to the 16th of the present month, the date of the treaty of peace as aforementioned; and his lordship is the more particular in marking this circumstance to you, from thinking it not improbable but since that date, persons subject to Tippoo's government may have driven off, or shown themselves desirous of driving off, cattle or inhabitants, or removing the implements of husbandry from the ceded districts.

Such a conduct on their parts, his lordship wishes me to intimate, it must be your particular care to ascertain and resist; referring cases of doubt or difficulty to the head quarters or to government.

Under the change of government that is occasioned by the cession, it is but natural that the inhabitants should be for a time, impressed with doubts and fears.

On similar occasions amongst the native governments, the old master generally exacts what rapacity suggests, and the new one, seldom fails to insist, with a rigorous hand, on the discharge of long arrears. The villagers therefore, ignorant of the just and moderate intentions of the English government towards them, may from apprehension, be disposed to abandon their habitations, and keep aloof amongst the hills, to the great detriment of the districts, till they can inspect the system of your management, and receive encouragement from it, to draw them from their retreats; while, on the other hand, some of the poorer class of inhabitants, may be willing to subject themselves to imposition, rather than fly their homes.

On these accounts, his lordship enjoins you to use the earliest and most effectual means possible, to inspire the inhabitants at large, and particularly the villagers, with an adequate confidence in the English government, giving them such explanations yourself, or through your European assistants, as may tend to remove every ground of apprehension on the above points; and taking every precaution that none of your native followers may avail themselves of the diffidence and timidity of the villager, to subject him to the payment of sinister demands.

Appendix to the REPORT from The Select Committee on [No. 16.]
These matters of regulation, his lordship has little doubt, your own experience would have suggested to you. However, his solicitude for the welfare and improvement of our new acquisitions, in which the credit of government and the interest of the company are so materially concerned, would not permit him to refrain from having them detailed.

Major Cuppage is directed to receive charge of the posts ceded in the Salem and Namcul districts; and you will be informed when he gets possession of them, that you may proceed to settle those districts accordingly.

To the above, his lordship has at present, little to add. He has directed me to repeat his former instructions to you, to correspond with government and head quarters on every material circumstance that may occur connected with your employments; and to subjoin his exertions in the revenue branch; your knowledge of the languages; and the qualifications of your European assistants, you will not only be able to regulate a just and effectual system of revenue management for the districts under your charge, but that principles of improvement may be derived from your regulations hereafter, for the better management of other countries subject to the company's government.

EXTRACT of Letter from Governor General to Court of Directors; dated 2d May 1792.

Important as our late acquisitions are, in every point of view, I am exceedingly anxious that no means should be omitted to introduce and establish a system for their management, which shall be calculated to promote the happiness of the people, and to secure to the company all the substantial advantages of their revenue and commerce.

Being well acquainted with Sir Charles Oakeley's public spirit and zeal for your service, I know that I can depend upon him for doing his utmost to fulfil my wishes and expectations; but I cannot conceal from you, that from many circumstances which have come under my own observation, as well as from the present wretched state of the company's Jaghire, and of the Northern Circars, that have been so long under the management of the government of Fort St. George, I am not without my apprehensions of his meeting with some difficulty in finding gentlemen amongst the company's civil servants at that pre-sidency, possessed of all the qualifications that could be wished for discharging properly the duties of collectors and managers of the newly acquired countries that will be annexed to their territorial possessions. I must however, in justice to the civil servants at Madras, declare that those apprehensions are not founded upon my entertaining any doubts that a number of them, are men of great private honour and good talents. But unluckily, few of them are acquainted with the country languages, and are therefore obliged, both from habit and necessity, to allow the management of their official as well as their own private business, to fall into the hands of unprincipled masters, and even people in the Carnatic, who, with very few exceptions, are calculated for being the most cruel instruments of rapine and extortion in the hands of unprincipled masters, and even of rendering (by the artifices and the ascendancy that they acquire over men who are forced to depend implicitly upon them for transacting their business) the most upright and humane intentions on the part of masters of different characters, perfectly useless to the interests of the company, and to the unfortunate natives who happen to be within the reach of their power or influence.

I am sorry to say, that as your Bombay servants have had no experience in the management of revenue, or in superintending the administration of justice amongst the natives in the country, my expectations are still less sanguine that gentlemen will be found at that presidency, properly qualified to manage to advantage our newly acquired possessions on the coast of Malabar. But I can rely upon General Abercromby for selecting men, on whose honour and good intentions he can depend; and who at the same time, possess the greatest share of the other necessary qualifications.

REPORTS, AND EXTRACTS OF REPORTS, FROM COLLECTORS,
On the mode of conducting a RYOTWAR SETTLEMENT; and explanatory of SURVEYS and ASSESSMENTS.

Extract Proceedings of the BOARD of REVENUE, at Fort St. George, the 5th January 1807.

To the President and Members of the Board of Revenue.

Gentlemen,

Par. 1. I HAD, some time ago, the honour to receive your letter of the 9th September last, with a copy of an extract from the honourable Court of Directors, dated the 6th November 1805, and of the minutes of government thereon, dated the 1st August 1806; and I shall now, agreeably to the orders of the Board, give as circumstantial an explanation of the manner in which the kulwar, or individual settlement, is made, as the subject seems to require.

2. This kind of settlement, though it appears intricate and laborious, is so greatly facilitated by a variety of causes, as to render the execution of it easy, to any person of common attention. It is the ancient and universal practice under all the native governments; and hence the collector has no trouble of introducing a new system, but has only to follow that which he finds already established.

Districts are divided into villages under the management of potails, or head farmers, who are, from long habit, perfectly capable of making the settlement of their respective villages; and the ryots, from having been long accustomed to be guided by them, readily agree to what they fix or propose, as it is usually what they themselves know to be the proper rent.

In all villages, the ryots are in the habit of meeting and debating upon the subject of rent; but there are many villages in which they settle among themselves the exact proportion of the whole rent that each individual is to pay; these, are called, Veespuddi, or fixteenth villages, from the land and rent being divided into fixteenth shares; and they compose a considerable part of the Cuddapah province, which is about one third of the Ceded Districts, besides being scattered, though more thinly, over other parts of the country. When the season of cultivation draws near, all the ryots of the veespuddi village assemble to regulate their several rents for the year. The pagoda is the place usually chosen for this purpose, from the idea that its sanctity will render their engagements with each other, the more binding. They ascertain the amount of the agricultural stock of each individual, and of the whole body, the quantity of land, to the culture of which it is adequate; and they divide it accordingly, giving to each man the portion which he has the means of cultivating, and fixing his share of the rent; and whether his share be one or two fixteenths, he pays this proportion, whether the whole rent of the village be higher or lower, than last year.

Every village is, in fact, a small collectorate; and where the potail does his duty, the collector has only to confirm what he has already done. From all these circumstances, together with the aid which is derived from the tehildars and their cutcheries, the kulwar settlement, which on the first view, might appear to be an endless task, is so much simplified, that it may be accomplished by any person of ordinary talents and exertion.

3. The chief obstacles in the way of it, arise from false accounts, from doubts concerning the rate of assessment, and from the difficulty of ascertaining the condition of the poorer ryots. There is perhaps no curnum, who in any one year, ever gives a perfectly true statement of the cultivation of his village; and it is only the fear of removal or suspension, that can make him give such accounts as are tolerably accurate. The proper rate of assessment is found either by reference to the accounts of former years, or by comparison with the rent of lands of the same quality which have long been nearly stationary; and the condition of the poorer ryots is learned, from the concurring testimony of their neighbours, who at the same time, will not exaggerate their poverty, lest the remissions which may in consequence be granted, should fall upon themselves. A short explanation of what takes place in the kulwar settlement of a single district or tehildarri, will equally apply to the whole number of districts forming a collectorate. I shall here speak of a district, in its ordinary state of prosperity, not of one that has been reduced below it, by war, or any other calamity.

4. A district paying a revenue of fifty thousand pagodas, usually contains about a hundred villages, differing greatly in extent and produce; some of them, not paying more than a hundred pagodas, and others, as much as five thousand annual rent. Every village has within itself, a complete establishment of hereditary revenue servants; a potail to direct the cultivation, and realise the rent, and manage its affairs in general; a curnum to keep the accounts, and a certain certain number of peons to act under the potail, in collecting the kists from the ryots. When the ploughing season begins, the potail ascertains what land each ryot can cultivate; he permits those who may have met with losses to relinquish a part of their land, which he distributes to others, who may be willing to take it; and to such as require none, he continues the season is so far advanced that a judgment can be formed of the crop; but he assures them, that their respective rents will continue the same as last year, only making allowance for such alterations as may become unavoidable, from the total revenue of the village being somewhat raised or lowered by the collector: they are satisfied with this promise, receive betel from him, as a confirmation of it, and yoke their ploughs. Specific written engagements cannot be made with them at this early period of the year, because, as in annual settlements, where the failure of the crop is great, remissions must be allowed; so where the produce is uncommonly abundant, increase must be taken to balance such failures, because the potail having relations and friends in the village, to whom he would be partial, could not safely be engaged with the power of fixing rents, and because the ryots themselves, will not in this year agree to pay the same rent in the ensuing one, lest they should meet with losses, which would be aggravated by a rent which they might then be unable to bear. The tehsildar goes round his district, in the early part of the season. His business is chiefly to regulate cultivation in those villages where it is mismanaged from the incapacity of the potail, or impeded by disputes among the principal ryots, and to make advances to the poorer sort for the purchase of seed, ploughs, or cattle. He also ascertains what land each ryot has already cultivated, or engaged to cultivate during the year, which he does, by assembling the ryots in their respective villages, and examining them in the presence of the potails and curnums; and accounts of the land occupied and unoccupied are taken by his cutcherry, which accompanies him. He goes round again when the crops are ripening, to see their condition, and to ascertain whether the quantity of land actually cultivated is more or less than that which the ryots had engaged to take.

5. The collector sets out on his circuit, in September or October, when the early crops begin to be reaped, and the late ones, to be down. On arriving in a district he assembles all the ryots of the four or five nearest villages. The first business is, to learn how far the cultivation of the present year, is more or less than that of the last. This is soon done, by the help of the tehsildars and curnums accounts, compared with the reports of the potails and ryots. Where there is a decrease, it is commonly owing to deaths, emigrations, or loss of cattle. Where there is an increase, it is usually derived from new settlers, or additional lands being occupied, by the old ones. In the case of decrease, the rent of the lands thrown up, is deducted from the settlement of last year. In that of increase the rent of the land newly occupied is added; and in both cases, the rent of the remaining lands remains the same as before. The rent of the land newly occupied is determined by the accounts of what it was in former times, or, if such accounts cannot be procured, by the opinions of the most intelligent ryots; but the full rent of waste land is not exacted, until it has been in cultivation from two to seven years. The number of years, and the gradational rise in each year, depend upon the nature of the land, and the custom of the village. They are known to all parties, and all doubts are removed, by their being detailed in a proclamation or cowle namah, under the collector's seal, circulated to every village.

If the cultivation is the same as last year's, and no failures occur among the ryots; the rents remain unaltered. If the crops are bad, and it appears that some of the poor ryots must have a remission; the loss, or a part of it, is assessed upon the lands of the rest, where it can be done, without causing any material inconvenience. This assessment never exceeds ten or twelve per cent; and is much oftener relinquished, than carried into effect. In cases where it can be easily borne, it is frequently agreed to without difficulty; and if opposition is made, it is generally soon got over, by the mediation of the ryots of the neighbouring villages present. These, discuss the point in question; with the ryots of the objecting village; tell them that it is the custom of the country; use such other arguments as may be applicable to the subject; and never fail in persuading them to accede to the demand, unless it is really too high, in which event it is lowered. Wherever individuals, or villages, object to their rent, it is always the most expeditious and satisfactory way of settling the dispute, to refer it to the ryots of other villages, who do more on such occasions, in half an hour, than a collector and his cutcherry, in a whole day.

6. The great number of ryots assembled, and the publicity of every operation, are of great use in expediting the settlement. If failures of crops are to be remitted to needy ryots, those who claim indulgence on insufficient grounds, cannot succeed, because their neighbours, who are present, object to it; for they will not allow a remission to be given in which they do not themselves partake, unless it is absolutely necessary; and in the same manner, if rent is any where raised too high, the parties on whom it falls, by appealing to the judgment of the ryots of other villages, get an abatement; so that, as much aid is derived from the ryots themselves, as from accounts, in making the settlement.

7. When the land in cultivation and its rent, has been ascertained, the collector gives every ryot a puttah, with his signature, in which every field he holds, and its rent for the year, are inserted. In most villages, the greatest part of the ryots hold the same fields several years, so that among fifty individuals, there are not perhaps ten whole rights require alteration. When the collector has finished the first four or five villages, he moves on a few miles, assembles the ryots of the adjacent villages, and having settled their rents, proceeds in the same manner, until he has finished the whole district, which usually requires a month or five five weeks. The sub-collectors, who have only four or five districts each, make the whole kulwar settlement personally. My own division, is too extensive to be annually settled in detail by one person; and I therefore leave what I cannot accomplish myself, to the district servants. I make the village settlements of every district, and also the kulwar settlement of one district, in some years, and of one village in each district, in others, and direct the rest to be done, by the tehsildars. The tehsildar having one village as a model, is easily enabled to settle the rest, in the same way. The rent of each village having been settled by me, he can only add to it, by including lands which may have been met with great losses. If he lowers it can only lower it, where some of the ryots may have met with great losses. If he lowers it without cause, the ryots who do not share in the remission, object to it, and complain; or if, without altering the rent of the village, he lowers that of one ryot and raises that of another unjustly, the ryot on whom the extra rent is thrown, complains. Even where the ryots neglect to bring the grievance forward immediately, they hardly ever omit to state it, when assembled for the settlement of the ensuing year; and the tehsildar, knowing that gross negligence or partiality will be attended with the loss of his place, seldom ventures to make an unfair settlement. There are, however, cases in which he does so, either from ignorance or corrupt motives; but where the collector is vigilant, they are not frequent. There is, indeed, no possibility of preventing them altogether; for the collector, when he makes the settlement in person, may be deceived occasionally by the servants of his own cutcherry, who may be dishonest as well as the tehsildar. The business of a collector is not properly so much to labour through all the details of the settlement, as to make those do it, who can do it best. The potails, and curnums of villages, are the persons most capable of making the settlement correctly; but they cannot be trusted, because they are cultivators themselves, and have always friends and enemies among the ryots. It therefore becomes necessary to employ a tehsildar, who, not being a native of the district, is not so liable to be influenced by partialities. As his attention too, is confined to a single district, he will be better qualified to state of its cultivation, better than the collector or his cutcherry, and will be better qualified than them, to make the settlements properly; and hence I have found that the settlements of tehsildars, have usually been better adapted than my own, to the circumstances of the ryots.

8. I have described the kulwar settlement, as it is made in a country in its ordinary state of cultivation; but in one, which has suffered from invasion or internal disturbances, and in which a part of the land formerly cultivated is waste, and the remainder held at a rent considerably below the ancient standard, the process is more tedious and difficult, because it is requisite, not only to increase or diminish the rents of such individuals as occupy or throw up land, but to raise the rent of every ryot, by raising the rent of all land, gradually to its former level, following cautiously the improving condition of the ryots. This was done throughout the Ceded Districts for some years; but they have all now, with a very few exceptions, reached their standard assessment. The same mode is followed, in raising the rent of whole villages and districts, as the particular rent of a few individuals. It is effected by the means of accounts; of the opinions of intelligent revenue servants; and more than all, by the assistance derived from the ryots of one village, in assessing those of another.

9. When a district has been surveyed, and the rent of every field permanently fixed, the kulwar settlement becomes extremely simple; for all that is required, is to ascertain what fields are occupied by each ryot, and to enter them, with the fixed rents attached to them, in his puttah; their aggregate, constitutes his rent for the year. He cannot be called upon for more; but he may obtain an abatement, in case of poverty or extraordinary losses. The exact advantage of knowing in the beginning of the season, when he ploughs his land, the exact amount of what he is to pay; he knows the fixed rents of the different fields which he cultivates, and that the demand upon him, cannot exceed their total amount; he knows the utmost limit of his rent, not only for the present, but for every succeeding year; for it cannot be raised, unless he takes additional land, and he is thereby, the better enabled to provide for the regular discharge of his kists, and against the losses of bad, by the profits of good seasons.

10. The kulwar settlement, though it may appear tedious, when compared to the village one, is however not only better calculated to realize the revenue, but is on the whole, a saving of time, because when it is once made, there is no further trouble; but in the village settlement, there is so much room for malversation; so many disputes between the potails, and ryots about extra collections, on the one hand, and the withholding of rents on the other, that more time is consumed in enquiring into those matters, than in the original settlement.

11. The honourable Court of Directors seem to be apprehensive that too much must be left in the kulwar settlement to the agency of native servants; but it does not appear to me, that such agency can be dispensed with, or that, when properly controuled, any serious evil can result from its employment. Without it, the Company's servants could do little or nothing. The most experienced collector, could hardly make the settlement of ten villages, in a whole year; and after all, it would most likely be done very indifferently. The native servants are restrained, as far as men with inadequate allowances can be restrained, by the same considerations as the public servants in other countries; by the fear of detection, of losing their situations, and of punishment. In all provinces that have been permanently settled, their agency has been used, and it had then a much wider field for abuse than in the Kulwar settlements; because such provinces, having been previously settled for some years, by villages, talooks, or other large tracts, without descending lower into detail, and being then disposed of for ever, an enquiry was at an end; so that, if the revenue settlement took place, the danger of and concealed for a short period, till the permanent settlement took place, the danger of discovery discovery was over; whereas, under the Ryotwar system, the minute process that is gone through every year, renders the most trifling abuse, liable every moment to detection. When the rent of every field has been fixed by survey, there is little room for abuse; it cannot be vated land as waste, or by obtaining remission on false pretences of poverty; but it has already been shown, that from the public manner in which the kulwar settlement is conducted and the contending interests of the ryots, either of those modes of injuring the revenue, can never reach to any extent, or be long concealed. There can be no doubt that the kulwar settlement is better calculated than any other, to bring to view the whole resources of the country; but whether it is equally well adapted to improve them, can, perhaps never be certainly known, but by a long trial of its effects in an extensive district.

P^r Collector.

Extract of Proceedings of the Board of Revenue at Fort St. George, the 19th May 1803.
To the Collectors of the Ceded Districts.

Gentlemen,

Letter from the Principal Collector of the Ceded Districts to his Assistants, 25 Aug. 1802, on Remissions.

Para. 1.—WHEN remissions are required, it is generally owing to some one or more of the following causes:—1st. Peculation of the amildar and other district servants;—2d. Peculation of the potails and curmums;—3d. Improvidence of the ryots;—4th. Bad crops and other accidents;—5th. Over-assessment.

2. The amildar's peculations arise, either from the public revenue, or from a private assessment. The amildar usually wishes that rents should be low, because the lower they are, the higher he can make his private assessment, and the less probability there is, of its being soon discovered; because the potail and ryots, partaking in the benefit, are averse to informing against him. While he confines himself to his private assessment, he may carry on the public collections, without leaving any balance outstanding; but, whenever he appropriates any part of them to his own use, he raises a proportionate balance against the district; and the cause of it, will very soon be discovered, unless the division servants are concerned with him, and the collector is himself very indolent. If he is pressed for payment, and attempts to raise the money by an extra assessment, the transaction will certainly be brought to light by some of the inhabitants, either by complaining, or by talking so much of it, that it becomes known every where, and is carried to the collector's catchery by some person who wishes to recom-mend himself for employment. The amildar, sensible of the danger of an extra assessment, seldom ventures upon it, but usually prefers the safer mode of fabricating stories of loss of crops and other accidents, and of the inability of the inhabitants to discharge the balances. When such excuses are received, it ought invariably to be concluded, unless the facts are very fully established, that there is something wrong in his conduct, and his removal from office, ought to follow without delay. His successor will find no difficulty in ascertaining the real state of the balances; for, on pressing the villages by which they are reported to be due, the inhabitants, if they have already paid them, will, in order to save themselves, inform against the late amildar.

3. The potails and curmums, when they know that the amildar diverts a part of the public revenue to his own emolument, always follow his example, and thereby augment the out-standing balance. They frequently go further; and levy additional sums from the more substantial cultivators, because they are conscious that the amildar, being himself guilty of malversation, will not dare to bring them to punishment. These last impositions, though they do not affect the balance of the current year, will most likely increase that of the next, or, what is the same thing, diminish the settlement. The potails and curmums can hardly ever make away with any of the public money, without the knowledge of the amildar. If, in any case, they do; it is a proof that he is either very careless or very ignorant, and that he is unfit for his situation. Their influence, particularly when they have obtained by their exertions, a favourable assessment for their village, is usually sufficient to make the cultivators conceal the demand for a small private assessment, which is always, on such occasions, made upon them, provided that, together with the public one, it does not exceed what their rent ought to have been; but, when they attempt to make an extra assessment, to supply any deficiency of the public revenue which they may have embezzled, the cultivators never pay it, without opposition: and they will always complain of it to the amildar, unless they suppose that he is a party himself, and will not hear them.

4. The mismanagement of the cultivators is not so frequent a cause of failure, as might at first sight be imagined. When they have money sufficient to pay their rents, but do not apply it to that purpose, it is usually expended upon a marriage, or in discharging a debt: but as the ryots, when left to themselves, always pay their rent in preference to every other debt, it may generally be suspected, when they act otherwise, that the district or village servants are concerned in the transaction. Many potails and curmums having, under the late government, embezzled a part of the revenues of their villages, and been forced to make it good, by borrowing money from soucars, upon bonds running in the names of themselves and their villages, they frequently employ the money collected as revenue in paying these bonds, on pretence that all the ryots were answerable, as well as themselves, for the debt. They

They call upon them again for the rent, which they have already paid; but, as some of them are unable to comply, an outstanding balance appears against the village. Besides the general debts of the village, the ryots are often so much pressed for their own private debts, as to be rendered incapable of discharging their rents. These debts, are frequently nothing but the accumulation of exorbitant interest, which the ryots would never pay, if they were not afraid of being compelled. When private creditors are permitted to seize the property of the ryots before their rents are paid, it is always to be inferred that they have bribed the amildar; and when the potails are allowed to assess them on account of general bonds, it may be concluded that the amildar has been guilty of peculation, and that he cannot support the cultivators, lest the potail should inform against him.

5. Bad crops are the chief cause of failures, and consequently of remissions; and they are also frequently brought forward as a plea for obtaining remissions, without any absolute necessity. All complaints regarding them, should therefore be received, with very great caution. Were an investigation to be ordered, whenever a cultivator thought proper to solicit an indulgence for his loss, claims would soon become so numerous, that all the revenue servants in the country, would not be able to examine one-half of them. The cultivators would likewise have no difficulty, even in a favourable year, of showing a real loss of 8 or 10 per cent. of the whole revenue; because, in every village, in every season, there are a few fields whose produce is not equal to their rent; and these fields only, would be mentioned as the cause of distress and failure; while those, whose crops had been more abundant, having probably been already reaped, there would be no means of determining how far the deficiency of produce, in the one case, was counterbalanced by the excess, on the other. Were it even possible to estimate exactly the actual loss in every year, it would not follow that it ought to be remitted; for the same cultivators who have lost this year, may have gained last, and, as no extra assessment was then laid upon their profit, no remission can now fairly be claimed for their loss. Whatever may have been the crop, should it have been even less than the seed, they should always be made to pay the full rent, if they can; because good and bad seasons being supposed to be equal in the long run, the loss is merely temporary, and the making of it good, is only applying to the deficiency of a year of scarcity, the funds which have arisen, from one of abundance. Though there is no rule by which a positive judgment can be formed whether or not a ryot who asks a remission, can pay his rents, it may, in most cases, be discovered, by ordering the amount of his failure to be assessed upon the village; for, as the other inhabitants are usually well acquainted with his circumstances, if he has any means of answering the demand against him, they will point them out, in order to exempt themselves from being burthened with it. In the same manner, when a village fails, if the balance upon it, is assessed upon the neighbouring villages, the desire of saving themselves from additional taxation will induce the ryots of those villages to find out and give information, how far the failing village may be able to pay the whole, or a part of its balance. When individual balances are to be levied upon the village by which they are due, great care should be taken, lest the rigorous exaction of them should so much distress the inhabitants, as to disable them from cultivating their usual quantity of land, the ensuing year. The amount of this second assessment, ought seldom or ever to exceed ten per cent. of the rent of the ryots of the mouza, or inferior village on which it is imposed. If a balance still remains, it should be assessed upon all the muzeras which constitute the mouza, but not in a greater proportion than 10 per cent. of the rent. Should a part of the balance yet remain unextinguished, it ought to be remitted; because the inhabitants are extremely averse to contributing to the losses of any village but their own, and because, if more than an additional 10 per cent. is raised upon the mouza in whose mouza the failure has arisen, there is great danger of its occasioning a considerable decrease of cultivation, the following season. When individuals are pressed for balances, the extent of the consequent loss, can never exceed the sum of their particular rents; but when a whole village is laid under a greater second assessment than it can bear, it may hereafter cause a very serious diminution of revenue. Whenever the failure of the crop gives reason to apprehend that there will be a balance against any village, the amildar ought to repair to the spot without delay; ascertain, with the assistance of the inhabitants of it, and the neighbouring villages, what sum it will be necessary to raise by a second assessment; and, after making known to every ryot, the additional amount he is to pay, take measures for its being collected with the last, or two last kists. When the loss, however, appears in a village whose inhabitants are able to make it good, the amildar ought to take no notice of it, but proceed with his collections in the same manner as if there had been a plentiful crop; for the necessity of making remissions is much lessened, by giving the ryots no encourage-ment to expect them.

6. When over-assessment is the cause of an outstanding balance, it ought to be remitted; for it would be unjust to exact more from the cultivators, than their lands can possibly yield. Cases of failure from over-assessment alone, are however, very rare; because the potails at the time of the settlement, always refuse to take their puttas if it is too high, and always obtain a reduction, when they show clearly that it is over-rated. Their own enmities, are the most common source of over-assessment; for one potail often exaggerates the produce of the village of another, or offers more for it, than it is really worth, with the intention of supplanting his rival, and making the ryots pay the loss. He ought to be obliged to pay it himself, as far as his means go; and, if they are not sufficient, the difference ought to be remitted. If, by any mistake or false information, one mouza in a mouza, is rated too high, and another too low, a second assessment ought to be laid upon the underrated mouza, and applied to the discharge of the balance.

Letter from the Principal Collector of the Ceded Districts;
30 Sep. 1802, on the modes of conducting a Ryotwar Settlement.

Gentlemen,

To the Collectors of the Ceded Districts.

Para. 1. IN making the annual revenue settlements, there are three ways which are usually followed, and which have each, according to particular circumstances, their claim to preference. The first is, to make the mouzawar, or village settlement of a whole district at once, and then to proceed to the kulwar, or individual settlement, with every inhabitant of each village. The second is, to make the village settlement of one village, and then the individual settlement of it, before beginning with another; and the third is, to begin by settling with each individual of one village separately, and then, by adding their rents together, to make the village settlement.

2. The first mode, that of beginning with a general village settlement of a whole district, is that which I always observe myself, not only because it has in itself many advantages, but because no other would answer, in a division so extensive as mine. It is much more expeditious, and is also frequently as correct, as the others. By assembling all the potails and curnums of a district in one place, there is a better chance of obtaining speedy and even accurate knowledge of its actual state of cultivation, than there is by meeting them in their respective villages; because, besides the usual information to be derived from the curnums' accounts, there is always a great deal obtained from discharged curnums who wish to be restored, and from persons without employment residing in the different villages, who are desirous of renting them. By drawing intelligence from so many different sources, it usually happens, that the produce of some villages is more fully brought forward, than that of others. But, as the potails and curnums of such villages, are averse to being higher assessed than their neighbours, they seldom fail to disclose whatever they know of their concealed resources; and, in this manner, the total actual produce of the district is soon known; and after the gross amount of the assessment is once fixed, should it still fall too heavy on any particular village, it is easily equalized by the potails themselves, with the assistance of the cutcherry. When neither the accounts of the curnums, nor any other information, raise the revenue so high, as there is reason to think that it ought to be; and when it is, therefore, thought advisable to try the dangerous experiment of increasing the assessment, not from the accounts of the current year, but from the presumption that the produce, being known from authentic documents to have been much greater some years ago, cannot possibly be now, so much diminished as it is represented to be, the additional rent which may be imposed upon the district on such an occasion, is in general, very readily partitioned by the potails and curnums among their respective villages. It is, however, very hazardous to attempt to raise the revenue upon such uncertain foundations; for there is often more mischief done, by one year of over-assessment, than can be remedied, by seven of moderation. Revenue servants who have had much experience, can easily ascertain, from the manner in which the potails and curnums proceed in distributing the extra assessment, whether or not there be really a corresponding extra produce. When they divide the extra assessment in a certain proportion among all the villages, in them all; but it is no proof that it is too low. When they divide the extra assessment unequally, it is a strong indication that at least those villages in which the greatest additional weight is thrown, had before been under-rated. The chief objections to making a settlement of all the villages of a district at once are, that it is sometimes detrimental to cultivation, by keeping the potails and curnums away from their villages when their presence is wanted to promote it, and that by bringing the heads of villages together, it enables them to form combinations to prevent the raising of the assessment, which they would not otherwise have thought of. Their being assembled is, however, much more frequently attended, by a contrary effect; for private quarrels, and their jealousy of any of their neighbours obtaining more favourable terms than themselves, most commonly urge them, rather to exaggerate the value of each others villages, than to form any concert for their mutual benefit. In my division, the settlement of all the villages composing a district is always made at once, and the kulwar or individual settlement, is afterwards made by the amildar; but, as few amildars, who have not before been in the Company's service, have ever seen a kulwar settlement, people are sent from the cutcherry to carry it into execution in all those districts, where it is thought that it cannot be safely entrusted to the amildar.

3. The second mode, that of making the settlement of each village separately, is a very common one. It is less liable to be either too high, or too low, than the district settlement; because the state of a tank, or of the cultivation of particular fields, about which there may be a dispute, can be readily ascertained, by sending some person to the spot; because those who are to make the settlements, have also an opportunity of observing the general state of agriculture among the lands of the village; because it can be easily discovered, whether those ryots, who are reported by the curnums to have emigrated, are present or not; and because the amount of the mouzaf, or taxes on trades, can be more accurately determined at the village itself, than any where else. When the village settlement is once fixed, that of the different cultivators is greatly facilitated; because the potail and curnum, knowing that a certain sum must be levied, give every assistance, except perhaps in the case of a few of their own relations, to make a fair distribution of it;—and because the cultivators, for the same reason, agree without much difficulty to their several proportions; and as the discovery of every unauthorized enaum or cultivated firear field, not brought to account, lightens their particular assessment, a regard for their own interest encourages them to give information of many frauds of this nature, which could not otherwise have been, so readily detected. Though an amildar may visit and settle every village separately, a collector, who has the management of five or six districts, must settle two, three, or more villages, in one place; for, were he not to do so, the season would be over, before he could finish his settlement. He has in this way, more people to give him information of the state of these villages, than he could have had, by going to each of them separately.

4. The third kind of settlement, the kulwar or individual settlement; if the curnums' accounts could be depended upon, would naturally be the best, because the stock of cattle, and the quantity and quality of land belonging to each cultivator, being known, it would be easy to fix his rent; and that of all the cultivators added together, would form the land rent of the village. But, as the curnums' accounts are always false, to begin with fixing the rents of the cultivators, would not only be the most tedious, but the most unequal of all settlements. Every single cultivator objects to his own assessment. When the cutcherry servants, by stating the quantity of his land, and the rent that had been drawn from it in preceding years, endeavour to convince him that the assessment is moderate, and that he ought to agree to it; he urges all the excuses commonly brought forward by that class of men; that grain is now, very cheap; that some of his cattle, are dead; that he is poor, and cannot cultivate his land, without an abatement of rent. He is privately encouraged by the potail and principal farmers, to give as much opposition as possible; because they all in their turns, intend to do the same, and the hope that, if he can obtain a reduction of his rent, they may also, under the same pretences, expect the same indulgence. Every ryot is usually sufficiently careful of his own interest to dispute about his rent, whether it is high or low; but should there even be some among them who, being satisfied with it, have no thoughts of starting objections, the fear of the potails' displeasure, and of the reproaches of the other ryots, for deserting the common cause, induces them to raise as many difficulties as any of the rest. Much time is consumed, in thus debating upon the rent of every individual; and if the revenue servants, either believing their representations of their distress, or wishing to expedite the settlement, allow some abatement of rent to those who are reckoned the poorest, they find that the aggregate of these remissions, not only causes a considerable loss of rent, but increases the difficulty of settling other villages, by encouraging the ryots to insist on a similar or perhaps a greater reduction. The ryots who dispute the most obstinately, even though their rents are already too low, are the most likely to get a further abatement; and those who are less noisy and litigious, are most liable to have their rents, perhaps already too high, raised still higher. It may be thought that the ryots being collected together in one place, no one would allow the land of another to be more favourably rated than his own, without complaining. This usually takes place in villages where none of the ryots are very poor; where there are few in number, and nearly on a footing with regard to property. In such cases, they generally insist upon a fair division of the assessment; but in most other villages, in which both the poorest and the most substantial ryots are found, the assessment is for the most part, unequal, and is always most favourable to the relations of the potail, and to such other ryots as hold out the most stubbornly.

5. When a country has been surveyed, the individual, supercedes both the village and district settlement, because it is then no longer necessary to waste time, in endeavouring to persuade the cultivators to accede to the assessment. The rent of every field being fixed, each cultivator takes, or rejects, what he pleases, and the rents of all the fields occupied in the course of the year in any one village, form what is called the settlement of a district. But where no survey has been made, either the settlement with all the villages of a district at once, or that with three or four at a time in succession, must always be adopted. Besides the reasons already mentioned, the various accidents that affect the crop, render it convenient to make the village, precede the kulwar settlement, because, though the general state of cultivation in a village may be known early in the season, the particular lands on which the crop may thrive or fail, can never be ascertained, until it is pretty far advanced: and as the assessment of individuals must, in some manner, be regulated by the produce, the more advanced the harvest season is when their rents are fixed, the more likely are they to be proportioned to their means of discharging them. This system operates, no doubt, in many cases, as a tax upon industry, and an encouragement to idleness; but as there is at present no other method of securing the realization of the public revenue, it must be continued until the country is surveyed, when every man will be made to pay, not according to the quantity of his crop, but of his land.

6. Though the crop should be considerably advanced before the individual settlement is begun, yet it ought not to be delayed beyond this period; and the sooner it is then finished, the better. If it were possible, it would be of great benefit to the inhabitants, that it could be effected by the time the first kist becomes due; because every cultivator, knowing the full amount of his rent, and having the whole of his crop on hand, would see at once how far it was likely to answer the demand upon him, and would thereby be the more enabled to turn it to the greatest advantage. If it was more than sufficient, he would lay up a part to sell late in the year, when the price had risen to its highest pitch. If it was inadequate, he would still endeavour, by selling it only by degrees in proportion to his kists, and by curtailing his expenses, to pay his rent. But when his rent is not settled, till after most of the kists have been collected; it is sometimes higher than he expected. He has probably not been so careful or economical as he would have been, had he known the amount of it earlier; and he is, therefore, unable to make it good. On the other hand, while he remains in this state of uncertainty, he sometimes suspects, without cause, that his rent will be raised higher than is actually intended. He perceives that his grain will not equal the demand against him; and he sells it off in a hurry at a low price, and absconds with the produce. It is, therefore, of importance that the individual settlement should never be longer delayed than is absolutely lately necessary; for the same bad consequences often ensue from uncertainty, as from a higher assessment.

7. Whenever the individual settlement of a district is completed, pottahs for every ryot paying rent to government, should be made out by the curnums, according to the form prescribed in my letter of the 30th August, and transmitted to the catcherry, to be signed by you, after having been compared. You should give them yourself, to the inhabitants of the villages, near the spot where you happen to be at the time; in all other places they may be delivered by the amildar. It is proper that every pottah should have your signature, because the inhabitants have more confidence in it, than in that of the amildar or potail. They know it is intended to guard them against extra demands; and they will be more likely to refuse compliance with them, when they have such a voucher in their possession. It likewise teaches them to look up to you, instead of the native servants; and, though they may not have courage to resist the demand in the village, to come forward afterwards with the complaint. They have always been so much accustomed to arbitrary exactions, that it is very difficult to prevail upon them, at least upon the poorer classes, to oppose them. But nothing tends sooner to convince them that there is a limit to assessment, and to encourage them to reject all extra impositions, than the general distribution of pottahs by the collector.

I am, Gentlemen,

Your obedient servant,

THOMAS MUNRO,

Collector.

Chitweyl,
30th September 1802.

Instructions of Collector of Southern Division of Arcot, to his Sub-Collectors, on the mode of conducting a Ryotwar Settlement; enclosed in his Report, dated 1st July, 1806.

Gentlemen,

Instructions of Collector of Southern Division of Arcot, to his Sub-Collectors, on the mode of conducting a Ryotwar Settlement.

Para. 1. YOU were some time since furnished for your general guidance with my instructions to Tehsildars, relative to repairs of tanks, the distribution of tucavay, and the jummahbundy of the current Fussy. On the two former subjects, I have already offered such remarks as appear to me most necessary. My present object is to furnish you with a few, on the latter, and some other points.

2. From all I can learn, which is corroborated by all I have seen, no doubt remains in my mind but that the assessment in this foubah, is in most cases, far too high; and that the revenue realized from the country since it was ceded to the honourable Company, has very materially injured its permanent resources, and reduced the lesser inhabitants to a state of poverty, very much to be deplored.

3. The lamentable influence of the gramatans of villages over the lesser ryots, from whom they have always been in the habit of extorting considerable sums above the circar demand, was a ruinous evil under the late government; and the continuance of it in this, has certainly contributed to reduce the ryots to their present state.

4. The great difficulty of collection; the desertion of villages in part, and wholly; the artifices practised by the inhabitants to avoid payment of their rents, and conceal the public revenue; the miserable appearance of most villages, a great portion of the inhabited houses of which are without roofs, and of the inhabitants, a great number of whom are clothed in the garb of extreme misery, with many other marks which strike the eye of a traveller, and must touch the heart of one who has any spark of sensibility or feeling for his fellow creatures; are sufficient proofs of the opinion before urged, on the state of the country.

5. That many inhabitants, of comparatively affluent circumstances, have seceded, and others have joined in the frauds lately committed, merely with the view of profiting by the confusion created thereby, and avoiding the payment of their rents, I have no doubt; and where is the country in which there are not such people, always ready to support a popular cause of complaint, in the hope of aggrandizing themselves? The lesser inhabitants, as is always the case, have profited less than their leaders; but that they have profited is equally certain; and it is only thereby, that many of them have found means to pay the revenue that has been realized from them.

6. Wherever a tax is such, that the thing or property it is levied on, will not yield a sufficiency, after paying the tax, to recompence the owner for all expense incurred in taking care of it, and yield him a fair remuneration for his trouble; he must either give it up altogether, or supply the deficiency by fraud.

7. The mode of making the settlement last year (and nearly the same has, I believe, been observed in all former ones) is not calculated in my opinion, to correct existing evils; to ascertain the actual resources of the country, the circumstances of the inhabitants; or to do justice to the lesser ryots, who are so much in need of it.

8. In a new unsettled country, the assembling the curnums of four or five talooks at one place, for the purpose of drawing out the jummahbundy accounts, even if they are superintended by the collector, cannot prevent the exercise of many abuses, which might otherwise be checked; but when the superintendence is left to a native, in whom little or no confidence can be placed, the plan will rather tend to perpetuate, than extirpate existing evils. The recurrences of last year, sufficiently prove the latter position.

9. The corrupt and fraudulent conduct of the curnums is well known; and yet it is on the word of these people only, that the settlements have hitherto been grounded. It is true, surveyors have been employed to check their accounts; but it is equally true, that where they have proved false, in the proportion of more than 150 per cent. the surveyors have not discovered, one per cent.

10. The

REPORTS, &c. from Collectors, on a Ryotwar Settlement.

Instructions of Collector of Southern Division of Arcot, to his Sub-Collectors, on the mode of conducting a Ryotwar Settlement.

10. The plan is equally injurious to many of the ryots; for as the curnums accounts of cultivation are too frequently written from memory, instead of on the spot, I have found in numerous instances, many more cawnies entered than were actually cultivated; many as reaped, that never were; many as nanjee, that have turned out punjee, and many totalcal, which have turned out nanjee.

11. The tehildars, with their catcheries, instead of being a check on the curnums; instead of being caused to make regular circuits of their villages to excite the ryots, to extend their cultivation, to ascertain their circumstances, to alleviate them, to learn the resources of their districts, and how they can best be improved; instead of causing the curnums to accompany them on their village tour, and take the cultivation accounts on the spot, the correctness of which the tehildars would then have the best opportunity of ascertaining by inquiry among the ryots, or by ocular demonstration if necessary, have hitherto been confined to the mere business of collection.

12. Hence arises that want of energy, that deplorable negligence, shameful ignorance, and, in some cases, corruption, for which the generality of the tehildars and other native servants are so remarkable in this foubah. I have met with very few who know any other village than their cusbah, who know any thing of the resources of their districts, or who can give a satisfactory answer to any question relative thereto.

13. Till the survey and valuation of all the lands in the country are finished, we must content ourselves with correcting the most prominent evils, by such means as are afforded us.

14. The instructions lately sent to the tehildars have been framed, with this view. They are thereby, you will perceive, strictly enjoined to do every thing I have remarked in the 11th paragraph, that they have hitherto neglected to do. They ought now, taking engagements from a circuit, distributing tucavay according to the wants of the ryots, and performing such other duties as are enjoined them, before the Huzzoor Catcherry proceeds on circuit; they are directed to make a second circuit, in order to see how far the ryots have fulfilled their engagements.

15. When they have thus prepared their accounts, I propose (and wish you, to do the same) to make a circuit of every talook under my immediate management only, however diligently they may have been superintended by the tehildars; but I mean to check them by the presence of every cultivator in the talook, who will be examined as to the quantity of land he has agreed to take, and who will be told at the time what he is to pay; therefore, if he has then any fair objections to make, they will be attended to, but not afterwards.

16. Such is the present indolence, as well as ignorance of the generality of tehildars, that I have little hope of their executing the orders sent them with any degree of vigour, unless they are stimulated thereto, by your presence in the talooks. I wish you, therefore, with that view, to make a tour of your districts without loss of time; and when you have finished it, to report the progress the tehildars are making, with any other remarks you may deem worthy of communicating.

17. The plan of making a distinct settlement with every individual cultivating land, appears, at first, a most arduous undertaking. It is so on its introduction; but the benefits arising from it are so numerous, that in the end you will find it save much trouble. I speak of it from experience, having practised it for five years.

18. It tends more than any thing, to give the lesser ryots a confidence in those who govern them, and to render them independent of the curnums and heads of villages, at whose mercy they have hitherto lived. It gives them an opportunity of stating any injustice which may have been practised towards them by those people, either in the classing or assessing their lands; the truth or otherwise of which, can be ascertained immediately, by confronting the parties, and examining the accounts. It gives the fairest opportunity of proving the zeal and other merits of the tehildars; and what is by no means the least material benefit, it gives us, as collectors, a greater insight into the actual state of the country and circumstances of the inhabitants, than can be obtained, in any other way.

19. The lesser ryot, by learning at the time what he is to pay to government, will soon learn to resist any extra demand made on him; and by knowing that a settlement will be made with him in the collector's presence, when he will have an opportunity of stating any fair objections thereto, will enter on the labours of cultivation with a degree of confidence and pleasure, he has never yet experienced in this foubah.

20. The frauds hitherto practised by the tehildar, who, if he does his duty (which it is their business, to cause him to do) will be able to detect most abuses on the spot; but such as our business, will most probably be discovered by the collector's catcherry, with the assistance of a few examiners, who should be sent to every suspected village. Persons discovered in consequence to have committed frauds, should meet with instantaneous punishment, which will tend more than any thing to prevent their repetition.

21. By the cowle namah circulated through the country, the teerwa on all cultivated land, at present so highly assessed, will be reduced to a standard that will at least give the ryot a trifling interest in the cultivation of it, though not so great a one, as he ought to have. The terms, however, on which he will thereby be permitted to cultivate waste land, will render his interest on the whole, better than it has ever yet been; and will, I have no doubt, tend to cause a very considerable increase of cultivation, in this at present desert country.

22. The satisfaction this cowle appears already to have afforded, satisfies me that the effects of it, will be extremely beneficial to government, as well as its subjects. The latter, seeing our attention to their circumstances, and our wish to render the country prosperous, will have reason reason to rejoice in the change of government, and finding they can exist without it, will cease in a great measure, from resorting to those artifices lately practised by them.

23. The cowle namah is meant for your general, rather than your particular guidance; many instances will probably occur in which you may see reason to deviate from it. In any of it may not be materially altered, without a reference to me.

24. I most particularly exhort you to let moderation be your guide, in the whole progress of your settlement. In a case of doubt, as to what ought to be a ryot's assessment, your decision should incline, if any thing, in his favour. The numerous arguments to be urged in favour of a moderate assessment are, to my judgment, incontrovertible. The flourishing state of those few districts that are blessed with one, sufficiently prove its benefits.

25. The effects of our inclining to moderation, will be beneficial to the circumstances of the ryot; and which are better, he will increase his cultivation, and thence the revenue of government. There can never be any difficulty in drawing any exuberance of wealth from him, should he ever be so fortunate as to possess it; on the contrary, by being too hard on him, we may most materially injure the resources of the country: by over assessing him one year, we may prevent his contributing to government, for many afterwards. How frequently this has been the case already in this foubah, you must well know. Increase of revenue, from increase of cultivation, not from an enhanced assessment, and increase of happiness and prosperity to the inhabitants and the country, should go hand in hand. If the former is obtained by a sacrifice of the latter, we defeat our aim, and prove ourselves most unworthy labourers, in the field we toil in.

26. At the same time I wish you to incline to moderation, I cannot sufficiently warn you against the artifices practised to deceive us. I am satisfied that frauds will decrease, as the circumstances of the people improve. But wherever they do happen, it will be our business to discover them; and not to punish the whole, on account of the misconduct of a few.

27. In concluding these remarks, I must remind you, that success depends more on our vigilant superintendence, than any thing else. The most unexceptionable orders that can be framed will have little effect, without it. The native officers in this foubah in particular, either cannot or will not act under them, with any degree of activity, unless they know they are diligently watched, and that their continuing to hold their situation, depends on their success, and the consequent approbation of their superiors. Much is expected of us. The result of our exertions, which we realize our jumabundy, and the improvement, or otherwise, which at the same time, takes place in the revenues of the country, and its general prosperity; will prove with what degree of ability, we have made it.

I am, &c. &c.

Extract of the Proceedings of the BOARD of REVENUE, Fort St. George; 25th June 1804.

Extract Mr. HURDIS's Report relative to the permanent Settlement of the Dindigul Province dated 16th Feb. 1803.

Para. 1. IN bringing before your board the Schedules for the permanent system of revenue in the Dindigul province, I shall, with leave of your board, endeavour to show, with as much conciseness as possible, the mode the survey has permitted me to form in settling the zemindaries, and the detail thence arising, from the lowest ryot, with the value of his farm, to the first zemindar, and the value of his zemindary.

2. This extent, I propose shewing in its full detail, as settled from the survey; and its jumma, as collected during the several fully years that have passed since its formation; and that the land rent may be solely and wholly seen, I have exhibited that only, in the statement, to tally subtracting all enams, shotrium and devastanum lands, and all lands of founardiem, each particular branch of which will be separately treated on, hereafter.

3. This statement shews the Dindigul districts and the sequestered pollams, converted into forty zemindaries; the number of villages composing each zemindary; the resources in water for the cultivation; the census of the population; the agricultural property of the ryots, and the immediate resources of the zemindary, in its number of looms, shops, and houses.

4. It enumerates the grants from the Cirkars, distinguishing the number of those who inhabit one zemindary or village, from those who inhabit the neighbouring zemindary or villages; the numbers under the head Oolcoody, being the actual number of ryots, viz. 16,146, who chiefly possess the actual cultivating property mentioned in the preceding columns, whereas the number noted as pyacoodies, are of those same people, but possessing lands in zemindaries or villages, within the precincts of which, they do not reside.

5. It shows also the numbers paying founardiem to the Cirkar, which will in its own place be separately explained.

6. The first part of the abstract that demands attention after the preceding columns, is the total tyacut or land, with one exception only, exclusively the property of the Cirkar, which is distinguished by the survey, under its appropriate designation of poonjee and nunjee, giving in the forty zemindaries, goontahs 13,69,820. 12. or cawnies of Madras measurement, 5,95,449. 5 $\frac{1}{2}$.

Extracts from REPORTS of Collectors, on Surveys and Assessments.

Mr. Hurdis, on Permanent Settlement of the Dindigul Province.

7. The land in dispute, forming the above-noted exception, will be an addition merely as land, to the zemindary, or to the polygar with whom the dispute is or may be settled. The detail as regarding what is not productive, is now wholly deducted from the Cirkar land, in order that the investigation may be made without difficulty.

8. It however happens that in several of the lands under dispute, the sequestration of the pollams renders the whole the Cirkar property. What therefore was the contest with the polygars, is now simplified to the dispute between villages, and on the evidence given, there will be little cause for future dispute.

9. This deduction, thus made, leaves to the Cirkar, as its own exclusive right in poonjee and nunjee, 13,57,203. 7 $\frac{1}{2}$. or in Madras measurement, cawnies 5,89,766. 9. from which must be deducted the land classed as porempoco, or what is wholly uncultivable; and this deduction made, the remainder of poonjee 10,75,989. 3. or cawnies 4,67,566. 11. $\frac{9}{10}$; and the remainder of nunjee 54,326. 2 $\frac{1}{2}$. is the land on which both the real and probable value of each and every zemindary is either fixed at, or may be expected to be, as agriculture may extend itself.

10. The valuation by survey of this tract of poonjee, viz. 10,75,989. appears on the average at 3. 4 $\frac{1}{2}$. per goontah, per cawney 20. 4. and comprehends the rents of the cultivated poonjee lands of the districts as it is, together with the probable profit of intelligent and diligent zemindaries. The valuation of the nunjee in like manner, is at 1. 4. 10 $\frac{1}{2}$. per goontah, or per Madras cawney, 3. 3. 12 $\frac{1}{2}$. and includes, as in the poonjee, both actual rents and probable improvement.

11. The average value on the total lands, poonjee and nunjee, viz. 11,39,315. or cawnies, 4,91,171. is on the same mode of calculation, 3. 13 $\frac{1}{16}$. giving an apparent gross revenue of 4,31,264. 4. 12. on the Ain tyacut of the Dindigul province.

12. But from this apparent revenue, the whole of the terrace, or waste cultivated lands on which a valuation has been placed, must be deducted; the respective zemindaries show the valuation of it on each, both on poonjee and nunjee, and the total average per goontah appears on the aggregate of goontahs, 7,30,380. 7 $\frac{1}{2}$. cawnies 3,17,388 $\frac{1}{2}$. to be 2. 15. per goontah, or per cawney 6. 12 $\frac{1}{2}$. making as a jumma, 2,14,594. 2. 1. which estimated value of lands neglected, deducted from the gross jumma of 4,31,264. 4. 12. leaves, as the real land revenue of the district, 2,16,670. 2. 11.

13. I have thus far trespassed on the indulgence of your board, presuming that any other detail of lands, which are at present unproductive, would, at the present part of the report, be unnecessary. They will be noted on when the advantages which may arise to the zemindar from extended cultivation, are discussed.

14. The part of the statement now to be noticed, is that which begins to show the value of the lands under cultivation; and the first of those are such, as come under the description of garden lands. (Bajyhut.)

15. The explanation of the particular rates of assessment on the aggregate, would give too large a detail; I have therefore (and I trust your board may not disapprove) thought it best to exhibit the detail of the Toddycomboo zemindary, the whole of which applies to the whole of the forty zemindaries.

16. With this view, I beg leave to request the attention of your board to the mouzawar, or village statement of the zemindaries; in which No. 2. will show the principal villages composing the zemindary of Toddycomboo, the total lands and assessment on which are formed the line entered in the abstract statement of zemindaries, and show the total goontahs, 582. 5 $\frac{1}{2}$. and cawnies, 252. 8. under the head of garden lands (bajyhut) in the zemindary, their average value per goontah, 2. 4. 4 $\frac{1}{2}$. and per cawney, 5. 6 $\frac{1}{2}$. both villages, and their gross fixed value 1,414. 1. 6 $\frac{1}{2}$. which constitutes the present assessment on those lands.

17. The statement, however, shows only the separate and collective value of each village, on the average of their respective and whole contents, under this express sort of cultivation. It therefore becomes necessary to show, from the statement of the hamlets depending on this zemindary, the quantity and quality of the land giving the assessment, which shows the present average in each, and on both.

18. Hence in the detail quantity of land rated to its quality and situation, and according to the opinion and agreement of all concerned, your board will please to perceive in the total for Toddycomboo village and its hamlets, the number of goontahs, 278. 9 $\frac{1}{2}$. assessed at the gross sum of C^r 634. 7. 15 $\frac{1}{2}$. as noted in the Mouzawar statement, and in the totals of the same statement for Chittenaigputty, previously noting the several rates of assessment, the number of goontahs, 303. 11 $\frac{1}{2}$. assessed at the gross sum of 779. 3. 7 $\frac{1}{2}$.; these particular lands of these villages and hamlets, separately and collectively, composing this branch of cultivation, as before noted in their respective villages and zemindaries.

19. In the formation of the statement of hamlets depending on this zemindary, it was necessary, to the proper examination of the lands, to enter into the most minute possible detail of the farms composing the hamlets. The farms are mentioned rather than the villages; because the convenience of the inhabitants of the hamlets drew them for their culta, that they might be nearer to the lands they cultivated.

20. These are all lands belonging to the culta, but although each hamlet has its name, it does not partake of the distinction of villages, as it has not the fixed bounds in respect to other villages, that its culta possesses in respect to other cultas.

21. Thus the statement of the ryots holding farms (the culta statement) became necessary to show the detail on which the statement of the hamlets was founded, each individual farmer farmer being therein noted, with the quantity of the land he holds under grant from the collector, and to each quantity the specific assessment made by the survey, and agreed to by the ryot. 22. In the detail of Camawaputty in Toddycomboo ceshah, your board will please to see an abstract statement of each ryot's farm, and the rate of assessment on the lands each respectively holds, under the head garden land (bajyhant) and in the total of that head, will be seen the number of goontahs, 15. 3. classed under that head of cultivation, and the assessment thereon, 32. 9. 2. which quantity and assessment is carried into the statement of the hamlets, and is one part of the general estimate average value of the garden lands (bajyhant) of the village.

23. The same statement, viz. the coolwar statement of Chittanaigputty, applies in like manner to the statement of hamlets for the same village, as the one before noted for Toddycomboo; the various rates of assessment for garden lands, giving on the various holders of the 129. 13. an assessment of 343. 8. 13. which also is one part of the general average value of the village, and which, with its own remaining hamlets and Toddycomboo Proper, forms the average of assessment for this description of lands, in the zemindary.

24. But as this detail would be insufficient to bring before your board, the specific field on which the specific terwa is put, and which, through the claim I have before noted, gives the result already mentioned, I have added the field account, composing the respective farms of the different ryots.

25. This detail shows the fields, by name each ryot possesses; their measurement, and the rate of assessment on each field, and on each goontah. This rate of assessment is formed, as well from the judgment of the surveyors, as from the content of the ryots of the village, who, with the proprietor of the land, were always present at every valuation, and fully canvassed every rate of terwa, ere the rate itself was made.

26. From this detail the farm of Tilla, No. 1, in the culwar statement, appears first in the village, and the garden land attached to his farm, under the name of the pelemunnam (tamarind tree) garden, appears to be one field containing three goontahs, eleven and a half anas, rated and settled at thirty fanams per goontah, giving as its total assessment, 11. 1. 9. as already entered in the culwar statement.

27. The remaining garden lands of this village, stand each as they were rated in the putwa accounts, each garden bearing its own particular name, so given either from its situation, trees, or buildings on it, or remarkable rocks near it.

28. The statwa account of Chittanaigputta culba, shows the Nautanenur Nachyputta garden land (exhady and tholocum) its quantity, rate of terwa and fixed assessment, in like manner as for the same description of land in the culba of Toddycomba.

29. In requesting the attention of your board to these details, my especial object is to show, that the general rate of assessment is easy, and that if the particular rate of particular fields appear heavy in account, the locality in respect to consumption of produce, or the quantity of the land, in respect to the quantity of the produce, is the general cause. On these subjects, I shall hereafter have the pleasure of remarking. At present, I wish to carry your board through this detail, that should any error have occurred, I may avail myself of the full assistance of your board, in rectifying it.

30. The next division of resource in cultivation, is that which arises from the poonja, or dry land, the quantity of which, distinct from garden land, in fields and under cowle, is 33,75,841. 12 $\frac{1}{2}$. averaging 3. 14. $\frac{81}{210}$. per goontah, and making cawnies, 1,46,692. 2. averaging per cawney, 815. $\frac{144}{16}$. and yielding as its fixed assessment, 1,31,940. 5 $\frac{1}{2}$. or fit pag^s 79,963. 42. 46.

31. The detail of this average, I beg to follow up in the same zemindary, the same villages composing the zemindary, the same hamlets composing the villages, the same coolwar statement for the hamlets, and the same putwar statement for the coolwar account, as noted on in respect to the garden lands.

32. Hence the total and particulars of the poonjee in the culwar accounts of Toddycomboo, will show the particular assessment, and the total poonjee in the culwar statement, and the particulars and total of the culwar will show the separate and assessed rates of the fixed present value of the village (mouza).

33. The reference to the detail in Chittanaigputty, as in like manner the same mode of applying the field account (putwar) upwards, to the culwar statement, that to the mouzara statement of hamlets, that to the mouzara statement of villages, and thence to the zemindary, as appears in the statement.

34. The two divisions of garden lands and fields of the poonjee, show the total dry grain land under cultivation, to be goontahs, 3,51,879. 5 $\frac{1}{2}$. giving an average of 4. 5 $\frac{23}{10}$. per goontah, or cawnies, 1,52,902. 5 $\frac{1}{2}$. averaging 9. 15 $\frac{1}{8}$. or 27. 10. per cawney, as the fixed rent of the forty zemindaries.

35. With permission of your board, I shall again recur to the Toddycomboo zemindary, to show as distinctly as possible, that the rent as fixed, is proper both on that zemindary, and by the application of the same general reasoning, on the whole of forty zemindaries.

36. It will doubtless occur to your board, that the average rate of rent per goontah for the garden lands in Toddycomboo and Chittanaigputty, comparatively in the abstract statement, differ much; that the average rate on the poonjee rate (or fields of dry grain) in the two villages, differ more; that the comparative average of both descriptions of lands, are still further further in value each from the other, and that the average of both, partially constituting a zemindary, exceeds the total average value of the forty zemindaries.

37. And first, for the difference obtaining in the garden lands, those for Toddycomboo rating on the average 2. 2. 12 $\frac{1}{2}$. and those for Chittanaigputty, rating 2. 5. 10 $\frac{1}{2}$. giving in favour of the latter, an apparent increase in value on the former, of 12 $\frac{11}{16}$. 14 $\frac{1}{16}$. per cent.

38. This difference arises, from the different rates of assessment in each village. Rates in Toddycomboo are from 35 fanams to four fanams per goontah, comprising with and within these extremes, fourteen different rates of assessment, which are specifically placed on the total garden lands, 278. 9 $\frac{1}{2}$. according to its quality and situation.

39. In Chittanaigputty, the rates vary from 35 fanams to 8 fanams per goontah, containing twenty-one different rates of assessment, which also are placed on the total garden land, 303. 11 $\frac{1}{2}$. according to its quality and situation; the average of the higher rates of terwa in this village, on its own greater number of goontahs of garden lands, gives a higher value than the lower rate of terwa, on the lesser of goontahs of this description, in Toddycomboo.

40. In regard to the difference in the poonjee lands, on comparison it will appear, that the land of Chittanaigputty is better than the land of Toddycomboo. In these villages, the rate of assessment is made from 13 to 2 fanams per goontah, containing ten different rates of assessment.

41. In Chittanaigputty, the rate of assessment is from 15 fanams to 2 fanams, containing fourteen rates of assessment, according with the quality of the soil in this as well as in Toddycomboo.

42. The general average value of the poonjee fields in Toddycomboo, is 3. 7 $\frac{1}{2}$. goontahs; in Chittanaigputty, is 5. 7 $\frac{1}{16}$. per goontah, yielding an increase of the latter on the former, of about 56 $\frac{1}{2}$. per cent.

43. That such difference should be, in villages joining each other, will at first view surprise; but the conclusion must not be drawn from these columns, a reference being had to the details of the poonjee fields. It will appear, that the greater part of the land of Chittanaigputty bears an higher rate of assessment, than the land of Toddycomboo.

44. This rate of assessment in Chittanaigputty, when averaged on the total poonjee fields cultivated in its village, gives a far greater rate of average value, in comparison with Toddycomboo, in consequence of its average being taken on a much less number of goontahs, the total poonjah cultivated in Chittanaigputty, being 2,880. 7.; and in Toddycomboo the greater number of 9,386.

45. Of this land in Chittanaigputty, viz. 2,880. 7. goontahs, 1,684. 10. are assessed at from 15 to 5 fanams per goontah, and of the poonjee fields in Toddycomboo, viz. 9,386,1464. 2 $\frac{1}{2}$. only are assessed at those rates; the proportion this land of Chittanaigputty bears to its total, equals about 58 $\frac{1}{2}$. per cent. whereas the land thus assessed in Toddycomboo, viz. 1,464. 2 $\frac{1}{2}$. equals, on its total, about 15 $\frac{9}{16}$. per cent. only.

46. The lands of inferior rates, from 4 fanams to 2 fanams per goontah, in Chittanaigputty, are 1,195. 13. to its total poonjee fields cultivated, 41 $\frac{1}{2}$. per cent. and the lands thus assessed in Toddycomboo, are 7,922. 5 $\frac{1}{2}$. bearing on its total poonjee field cultivation, about 84. 6 $\frac{7}{16}$. per cent. Thus the difference appearing on the average of each village is easily explained, and perfectly corresponding with the reason already given.

47. The average value of the garden lands and poonjee fields together, is according to the rates before noted, apparently 82. 10. per cent. more in Chittanaigputty than in Toddycomboo; the details in the rates of assessment already remarked, bring it to this difference of rate of terwa, and the explanations, whilst showing how it happens, fully confirm its consistency with them.

48. The proportion of each description of land in Toddycomboo and Chittanaigputty, to the cultivated poonjee, is in each, as follows; the total of Toddycomboo comprising 9,665. 2. and the total of Chittanaigputty, 3,184. 2 $\frac{1}{2}$. goontahs only.

Toddycomboo:		Goontahs.	Chittanaigputty:		Goontahs.
Garden	- - - -	278 9 $\frac{1}{2}$	Garden	- - - -	303 11 $\frac{1}{2}$
Field's poonjee	- - - -	9,386 8 $\frac{1}{2}$	Fields	- - - -	2,880 7
		9,665 2			3,184 2 $\frac{1}{2}$
Average on total		2 14 $\frac{1}{16}$	Average on total		9 8 $\frac{3}{8}$
D ^o	- - D ^o	97 1 $\frac{1}{16}$	D ^o	- - D ^o	90 76 $\frac{1}{16}$
		100 -			100 -

49. Hence, in the great difference of 82. 10. per cent. noted in the distinct average terwa value of the two villages will be seen, an additional reason for such average in the larger number of goontahs of garden lands, independent of higher rates being calculated on

Mr. Hardis, on Permanent Settlement of the District of the Madras Province.

This remainder is divided with the sirkar, and that division fixed the rent of 5. 5. on the lands giving such produce.

68. The same mode in settling is observed, on the lands less productive; the charges are the same, and I may say, from my own investigation of them, fair, truthfully favouring the ryot. The lesser quantity in produce arises from a decrease in weight, rather than apparent bulk, but the value by measure and weight is generally the same, and the division with the sirkar less in proportion to the weights; which division, at the former rate, fixes the value of the goontah.

69. The rate of estimating the sugar-cane gardens is in this zemindarry as follows:—The produce of the canes equals per goontah, on the first sort of land, on full investigation, one hundred tolas of jaggery.

This valued at 5½ fa¹ per tola gives

Charges on cultivation, &c.	35	—	—
	25	—	—

Leaving as remainder 10 — —; which is divided between the ryots and the sirkar, as the rent, custom has ever authorized should be paid and received.

70. In lands of inferior quality, or when the command of water is less, the size of the canes diminishes; and that diminution giving a less quantity of jaggery, lessens also the sirkar share, and consequently the value of the land it is grown from.

71. The plantain gardens in this zemindarry, for this fruit alone, are the next head; and are settled as follows:—One goontah contains 500 trees; each tree yielding a produce of ⅓ of one cully fanam, or 68 Madras cash, gives for the whole, as the yearly produce, 15 6 4

Charges thereon for plants and labour	8	6	4
---------------------------------------	---	---	---

Leaving as remainder 7 — — which, when divided with the ryots, gives the sirkar its fixed rent on the garden per goontah as noted; and this rate progressively, descends as the quality and situation of the land, in respect to water, appears to warrant.

72. The rates for plantain gardens, so settled, are only equal to the average rent of the better sort of paddy land yielding two crops, and the better sort yielding one crop. They are, however, seldom made in places like this, for sale of the produce, so much as for household consumption; and, generally speaking, if the lands laid in these gardens, were sown as paddy fields, the produce to the sirkar would probably be the same. The several rates of the lands which compose these gardens give the rate 43. 4½. on goontahs 92. 3½. as before noted.

73. The lands in paddy fields, yielding two crops, are ascertained to be 562. 5½. goontahs; and giving per goontah from 28 to 44 fa¹, as the sirkar rent, the highest of which is as follows:

The first crop of the best of wet lands	17	—	—
The 2 ^d crop from the same ground	8	6	—

Ryot's share	24	3½	—
Sirkar share	11	1½	— the fractions being let go to the ryots, gives at the rate of 4 fanams per cullum, 44 fa¹ per goontah.

74. The lowest rate of the lands giving two crops, is thus settled:—

1 st crop produces	10	6	—
2 ^d crop	5	4	—

Sotundrum, &c. of 12½ per cent.	Total produce	16	—

Ryot's share	14	—	—
Sirkar share	7	—	—

which, at the same price, gives the lowest rate noted 28 fa¹.

75. The intermediate rates depend wholly on the quality of the lands, and their situation for water. The first sort of land, giving one crop only, approaches very near, in point of value, the last sort of that which gives two; but its quality as land, is very superior, as the produce of the former arises almost wholly from the water, rather than the soil.

76. The lands yielding one crop are rated from 26. 4. to 13. 15.; the whole produce of the first sort at four fanams per cullum, is 13. 15. as noted. In this, as in the land giving two crops, the intermediate rates depend on the quality of the lands, and their situation for water. The average value in both instances, if taken from the division of the value of the highest and lowest rated lands, is less than the average value noted; and this arises from the various rates of assessment on the intermediate lands, being generally of the higher rate.

77. The total average produce on the lands giving two crops, is as follows:—

Whole average produce per goontah	22	2	—

which, at 4 fanams the cullum, gives 20. 8½. as the average before noted.

79. The last description of nunjee land in this zemindarry, is designated as nunjeetenum poonjee, to distinguish it as land that is uncertain of water, and thence the least valuable of the nunjee, as well as to show that the chance of a dry grain crop is preferred to be taken from it. A very small quantity of this land appears in this zemindarry, and is valued on its produce at 12 fanams per goontah.

80. Thus, in bringing before your board the variations in the nunjee land, and the proportionate assessment levied thereon in the Malmungalum zemindarry, I trust I have shown these lands equal to the rent fixed on them. In showing that placed on the Allynagrum zemindarry, I shall reduce the detail as much as may be consistent with the necessary explanation.

81. It may perhaps be proper to give a short account of this zemindarry. The villages composing it are Allynagrum, Woonjampetty, and Coonoor. When I took charge of the Dindigul revenues in September 1796, these villages were nearly desolate, as well from the rapacity of former managers, as from the incursions of the Collieries.

82. Allynagrum and Woonjampetty gave a small rent each, but the lands of Coonoor had not given any for many years; and the site of the village could hardly be ascertained, from its being covered with jungle. I gradually induced the inhabitants to extend their cultivation, and partly rebuilt Coonoor, which, from being totally unproductive, gives a rent of 302 CC. per annum; increased the cultivation and rents of Allynagrum 335½ per cent; and of Woonjampetty 385½ per cent. above what they had been, since the Company's government had obtained in the district.

83. The industry of the few people in Coonoor (about ten houses) has however been ill repaid, as the lands are so very inferior in soil, and so very uncertain of water, that a half crop is never raised. Ryots have refused to settle there, and the lands which have been brought into cultivation have been those conveniently situated on the bounds of Allynagrum and Woonjampetty, and thence occupied by the inhabitants of those villages.

84. Much as may be said on this subject, the chief reason of the low rate on the nunjee of this zemindarry, arises from the proportion of low-rated, and consequently bad lands, being much greater than that rated on the better sort of lands therein; and the better sort of lands in it, collectively and generally, being less productive and valuable than any lands in Malmungalum.

85. In Allynagrum the average of the paddy lands, 245. 5½. goontahs, is 12. 15½; but to this must be added nunjee tenum poonjee 6 goontahs, at 5 fanams, which increases the quantity of goontahs to 251. and lessens the average value to 12. 12½. and this average arises from rates at 20½ to 5 fa¹ per goontah.

86. In Coonoor, the nunjee lands are 653. 24½. of which 236. 11. only can be said to be properly paddy lands: these, average 6. 9½. which arises from rates of 7½ to 5 fanams per goontah; adding to the general average the nunjeetenum poonjee goontah to 416. 7½. at 4. 1½. making the number 653. 2½. it gives, as the general average of Coonoor, 4. 15½.

87. Hence it appears that the nunjee lands in the zemindarry are 482. ½. which average as entered in the deshwar statement.

88. This abstract of Allynagrum, in comparison with Malmungalum, will, I trust, show your board that the difference arises from the difference of land; the total average in Malmungalum, 9 L.

Extracts from REPORTS of Collectors on Surveys and Assessments.

Mr. Hurdie, on Permanent Settlement of the Dindigul Province.

Appendix to Vol. REPORT from The Select Committee on [No. 20.]

lum is 2. 6. 13. per goontah, in which average there is not one goontah below the rate of 12. 6. in 1,988. goontahs. The total average in Allynagum is 7. 2½ per goontah, or 904. 8½ being from 25 4. to 12. fanams per goontah; and of that quantity 131. 15½ goontahs only inferior in many respects to those on well cultivated poonjee lands.

89. Having thus substantiated that the value of the land has been properly placed in respect to its quality and situation, and according to the specific agreements of the individuals concerned, I beg leave to call the attention of your board to the total cultivation, and to the general modes used in assessing its value.

90. The total sagnally or cultivated land, amounts to 387. 948. 5¼. making 16,854. 2½ cawnies, calculating the goontah at square feet, and at 2. 4. 6½ as equal to 15. 15. per goontah, or 34. 75. per cawney.

91. That the general mode of fixing the assessment may clearly be shown, it is necessary to note the rates in the first instances, levied on the poonjee gardens (or banjhut); this part gives in the general cultivation 14,294. 9¼. averaging 1. 4. 1¾ and yields a revenue of 20,144. 9¼. or, fit pagodas 12,208. 23.

92. In rating the land giving this income, the assessment is at ¾ds to the ryots, after deducting the generally estimated charges of 3 f. colly per goontah, the prescriptive allowance for manure; hence 66¾. per cent. are for the ryots, or 17d or 33½d per cent. only to the circar. This rate is the same on all lands of this description, and in whatever situation they may be placed.

93. The poonjee fields, or kate, gives on the general assessment of the quantity of the land noted under this head, viz. goontah 337,584. 12¼. total of 131,940. 5¼. or fit pag 79,963. 42. 46. averaging at 3. 14. 10. per goontah, or 24. 42. per cawney.

94. This average equally arises from the assessment being made at ¾ths, or 60 per cent. to the ryots, and ¾ths, or 40. per cent. to the circar from the average total produce. These two descriptions of land give the total poonjee, viz. 3. 51,879. 5½.

95. The nunjee pounmalee goontahs 254. 8¼ are but a small part of the revenue; the average is 5. 7. 13. 14½ giving a total 14½. 9. 15½; this average and total is produced from the various assessments on these gardens according to their situation.

96. The best situated give, after deduction of all charges cultivation, ¾ds to the ryot, or 66¾d per cent. and ¼d or 33½d, to the circar, and are watered in constancy from rivers, or nullahs.

97. The second sort give ¾, or 75 per cent. to the ryot, after deducting all charges of cultivation, and ¼, or 25 per cent. to the circar; these lands are watered from tanks by nullahs, and partly from wells, whence the uncertainty of the crop and increased labour causes the deduction.

98. The third and last description of these lands gives ¾ths, or 80 per cent. to the ryots, after deducting the proper charges of cultivation. These lands are always watered from wells alone, and thence the crop generally less certain, and the labour always greater.

99. The general assessment on the nunjee paddy lands is made on the customary division of the crop after deducting the sotundrum, which cover all the proper expenses that the circar should attend to, and which amount to 12½ per cent.; hence, including the sotundrum, the ryot's share is ⅙, or 56¼ per cent. and the circar share ⅘, or 43¼ per cent. The garden produce of turmeric, sugar cane, &c. are, after deducting charges, shared in equality with the circar, and the nunjee terim poonjee, is on the whole produce 60 per cent. to the ryot, and 40 to the circar.

100. The general rates applied to the total goontahs 35,814. 7½. or cawnies 15,560. 2½ gives the sum of C C. 62,513. 4. 4½. on the former, averaging per goontah 1. 7. 7½ and on the latter S.P. 37,886. 40. 75. averaging 2. 19. 45. per cawney.

101. The remaining land in the abstract is entered under the head Pillwany, and is let for the grafs to the proprietors for their cattle. This land bearing a real value, was not included in the fuslee; neither is it entered in the average value of land, as the entry would fallaciously reduce the average value of the land under cultivation.

102. It did not appear right to me to give it to the ryots, at their discretion; the cowle is for it, as grafs land, but if cultivated, it will give the rent the survey has fixed on it. This land has been made a specific head in the statement, both on account of the distinction with the ryots, and because, in the conquered countries south of the Noyel, a very considerable rent is derived from lands, which custom has given long since, on such cowles.

103. Your board will please to observe, that this custom obtains in the sequestered poligars of Pylney and Verapatchee only. The origin of the tax is the arbitrary imposition of the poligars on their ryots, and the assumption of power to themselves in their own pollams, similar to that of the circar on its own provinces.

104. This custom, if properly defined, as a rent for right of commonage, might perhaps be productive of general utility; but great abuse proceeded from it in the Sultaun's country, during his government, which has partially only been corrected by the specific entry of the land so used, in the particular cowles to the inferior ryots.

105. The rent for the quantity herein noted, is trifling; but the consequences of the sacrifices of this would probably have taught the ryots in the Sultaun's country bordering on these these pollams, to expect the same favourable exemptions; and those would have been a sacrifice too important of the revenue of the country, to have been made with propriety.

106. Hence it remains for the determination of your Board. If added to the Teerley land, it will increase the valuation placed thereon; but if remaining to the ryots for the year, according to their cowles, there is the probable advantage of an extended cultivation on this land, in the ensuing year, to the zemindar, at the rate of its worth according to the survey.

107. Thus the whole assessment on the lands under cultivation of the forty zemindaries amount to 216,670. 2. 11. or fit pag 1,31,315. 14. 12. which is settled on a progressive increasing cowle for three years, as hereafter mentioned.

108. The zemindars, from No. 1. to No. 13. exclusive, were settled previously to, in, and from, Fully 1210; the fixed bariz of these zemindaries, and for permanency, is that in Fully 1212, and amounts to 71. 233. 9. 3¼. This amount, is an increase on the settlement of these zemindaries previously to survey, which was 49,090. 3. 9. equalling 45. 1½. per cent.

109. The progressive settlement of these zemindaries, to completion of the fixed bariz, is as follows:

Zemindaries 1 to 13. in Coll. 13. 14. & 106.	Progressive fixed Bariz.		Soubay Bariz on which the fixed Bariz is calculated.	Decrease.	Increase.
	1210	- 54,209 1 10	- - -	- - -	5,11,881 10 6½.

110. The increase thus laid, was cheerfully agreed to by the ryots. The assessment had full respect to the preceding seasons, as well as to the individual circumstances, and, as made, has hitherto been fully and regularly collected.

111. The zemindaries, from No. 14. to 36. inclusive, were settled from 1211 to 1213; the fixed bariz for these zemindaries for permanency is that of 1213, and amounts to 1,23,411. 9. 9. This amount is an increase on the settlement of these zemindaries previously to survey, which was 1,03,364. 3. 7¼ equalling 19. 6½; the progress from Fully 1211, to the completion in 1213, is as follows; was 1,03,364. 3. 7½ equalling 1213, is as follows;

112. It may appear strange that a decrease on the previous bariz should be made in the first year of a progressive increasing settlement; but the reason was, that the seasons of 1209-1210, were very unfavourable in the zemindaries that were lowered, and that many ryots gave up partially their lands, which, previously to the survey, were too highly assessed, and which, on being equalized by the survey, caused the decrease on the previous settlement, the deduction of which I judged were more salutary to the ryots to be made on the first year of the settlement, than in division on the 3 years.

113. Added to this, the rents before the settlement on the survey, were gradually increasing on the lands, from the time I took charge of the district to the time of settlement in Fully 1211. Hence the ultimate increase of 19. 6½. per cent. by the survey, was less than on those lands settled one or two seasons before, and which on that account, did not show the increase on them, viz. from No. 1. to 13. as the delay in settlement has made it appear in these.

114. The zemindaries, from No. 37. to 40. inclusive, were settled in permanency in and from Fully 1212, and are progressive until 1214 Fully, the amount of which is the permanent bariz; or 22,024. 3. 14½. This amount is an increase on the settlement of these zemindaries from 1211 Fully, which was 18,149. 9. 11¼. equalling ultimately 21. 5. 8½. per cent.

115. The progressive settlement of these zemindaries to the completion of the fixed bariz is as follows:

116. The decrease in Fussy 1212 in this settlement, has reference to the causes before noted on, and your Board will remark that these zemindaries relate wholly to what formerly com- posed the Verapatchee pollam, the assumption of which took place in Fussy 1210, and when the cultivation for that year was made and ascertained.
117. The prons of the polygar, who held lands, and whose cultivation in that season, 1210, enabled the nautumcars to pay the partial settlement, left partly those lands in 1211, and several of them wholly, in 1212, following their inclination generally as to their place of re- sidence; this deficit thence partially arising in Verapatchee pollam is compensated ultimately in other places wherein those people have settled; and the increase of 21. $\frac{24}{100}$ per cent. on the full settlement, shows that their emigration was very trifling in its effect, on the revenue of these zemindaries.
118. The total of this settlement, for permanency on the lands absolutely the property of the cirkar, is CC^h 2,16,670. 2. 10. or fr^{p} 1,31,315. 14. 12 being an increase of the average value of the six first years of this district, from 1200 to 1205 inclusive, or 59,180. 14. 48. equal to 121. 14. $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent.; and if calculated on the average of the cirkar collections, or what from the existing accounts was brought to the cirkar account, viz. 43,543. 39. 24. equals 201. 9. per cent.
119. Having shown the value and settlement of the cirkar lands under cultivation, the next addition to the jumma will arise from the assumption of such enaums as are directed by orders to be annexed to the cirkar lands, and declared responsible for the public revenue assessed on the zemindary.
120. The total lands that were in enaums in the forty zemindaries equal 68,254. 5 $\frac{1}{2}$. being 61 $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. on the total cirkar cultivable lands, the value of which, amounts to CC. 35,788. 3. 10. equalling 8. 4 $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. on the gross value of the total cirkar cultivable land.
121. The deductions in waste cultivable land of 23,020. 5. valued at 18,975. 15 $\frac{1}{2}$. leaves as the enaum cultivable lands 45,234. $\frac{1}{2}$. valued at 26,813. 2. 10 $\frac{1}{2}$ which number of goon- taks and valuation, as well totally as partially, are shown in two separate statements, as they belong to their particular zemindaries.
122. The enaum list shows the total extent, and explains the cause of the enaum. I have not found funnuds for any. All, with some exceptions which I shall point out, have been retained by the incumbents, under the prescriptive right of long possession.
123. The statement of the enaums which should remain in their possession, compre- hend those solely of a religious nature, and some few of such as the prejudices and super- stition of the natives require, should be given up to them; these are found as Davadyen Bumadya, and some fees of the Chitta (or fundry enaums) the explanation of which in the general list, shows their use, and which explanation will, with the leave of your board, be the cause of their confirmation.
124. This confirmation, if given, will extend to cultivable land for the enaum-dars, equal to 35,173. 4. valued at 16,484. 59 $\frac{1}{2}$; giving on the gross cirkar cultivable land, 31 $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. and the value of the cirkar cultivable, 3. 13 $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent.
125. Of this land thus valued, the quantity of 17,215. 11 $\frac{1}{2}$. only are cultivated, giving 10,160. 2. 6 $\frac{1}{2}$. being on the gross quantity of the cirkar cultivated land, 4. 7. per cent. and on the rent of the cirkar cultivated land, 4. 11 $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent.
126. The enaums thus noted on, are, exclusive of the villages in enaum to the pagodas, which will be noted hereafter; and whether taken in their most extended or most confined view on their accounts, are submitted to your board, as most moderate.
127. These explanations, may perhaps not be thought to have been necessary in this place; but as the display of all the resources of revenue here, may make your board more decisive on what is ultimately to be fixed, I thought it necessary to show all, notwithstanding I have not added these items to the fixed barizes. Part of the assumed enaums, and those added into the jumma, are the Woolija enaums; these, comprehending the sibbendy, public and private, of the village, are under the directions of the board of revenue, solely responsible for the assessment of the zemindary.
128. The remainder of the assumed enaums, are those given by the heads of villages, or by amildars and renters to dancing girls, poets, musicians, heroes and others, contributing to the pleasure of their immediate employers, and which never having had positive claims on the cirkar, have generally been assumed and formed part of the extra revenue account, although they have been distinguished separately in account, that, under reference to the board, an ultimate decision might be obtained on them.
129. To these enaums clandestinely bestowed, are to be added usurpations and alienations of the polygars for the cawel; those as heretofore obtaining, are under the orders of the board of revenue, added to the zemindary estates; and though the increase is small, to each respectively, the measure has certainly given the final blow to polygar authority, and promises under the future police, safety to the ryot, and the traveller.
130. The cawellies of Gollupanaig, Gopiannaig, and Poojamynaig, were assumed with their pollams; but have always been kept distinct in account. The proceeds from them, have hitherto always been entered in the extra revenue account. Those lands entered under the name of Amanaigur, are recovered usurpations of that polygar, from an original alienation of Cuppianandy from the lands of Autoor; the income of this also has heretofore, since recovery, been carried to the extra revenue account.
131. These descriptions of enaums assumed, viz. the Wooliga enaum, the fundry (chiller) enaums and cawelly, amount wholly to 33,081. 1 $\frac{1}{2}$. giving the estimated value of 19,303. 8 $\frac{1}{2}$. being manent Settlement of

- being on the gross number of firkar gontaks, 2. 14 $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. and value being 4. 7 $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. on the gross estimated value of the firkar cultivable land.
132. The reference to the cultivation is far greater in its rating, than in the enaums pro- posed to be let go, the cultivated of the whole being 28,018. 5 $\frac{1}{2}$. giving on the cirkar cul- tivated land, a quantity equal to 7. 3 $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. and in real value, 16,653. 4. being on the cirkar rents, for its cultivated lands, 7. 11 $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent.
133. Of the amount quantity of total enaum lands, viz. 68,254. 5 $\frac{1}{2}$. it appears that the land proposed to be permitted to remain with the present incumbents, viz. 35,173. 4. equals 51. 8 $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. of the total, and the amount proposed to be assumed and added to the estate, viz. 53,081. 1 $\frac{1}{2}$. equals 48. 7 $\frac{1}{2}$ of the total, both giving the amount 68,254. 5 $\frac{1}{2}$.
134. Included in the above 35,173. 4. proposed to be free, but deducted in the total value, because belonging to founadyem, are those which pay a fixed tribute of 92. 3. 8. pooroopa to the respective zemindaries; these enaums, it is reported, were originally free-gift by the Gentoo and Mysore governments, but after the war with Chundah Saheb, and about 50 years ago, the present pooroopa was assessed by the amildars and renters, and remained so until this day. These deductions, in value 92. 3. 8. thus made from the total value of the cul- tivated land before noted, there remains with the enaum-dars, 10,067. 8. 14 $\frac{1}{2}$. which bears 4. 10 $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. on the total fixed bariz of Fussy 1214.
135. Thus, these severally previously noted additions of assumed lands, enaums to the cirkar jumma on the lands, give a total for Fussy 1214, of 2,33,323. 2. 15. or fr^{p} 1,41,408. 2. 46.
136. The taxes that are derivable by the proprietor of the land, and belonging to the branch of revenue known in these districts under the name of founadyem, literally gold col- lection, because they are not subject to any charge under an aumeeny management, are wholly shown opposite each zemindary to which they respectively belong.
137. In the particular statement, your board will observe, the different heads under which this revenue is derived. The poncando, literally hill fields, contain a number of spots of land, called corookums; these are cultivated by the Momooly billbook and richaxe; no settled measurement is given for the rent, but several corookums, are cultivated at the will of the labourers, and paid for by an usage rent as cultivated.
138. The tax on topes is assessed according to the produce of the trees, which chiefly is affected by their age and situation; there are sixteen forts which are usually productive to the cirkar, the assessment on which is noted in the detail on each fort specifically.
139. The pooroopa, 92. 3. 8., before noted, deducted in the enaum statement, is by usage added to the founadyem; the detail of this also is entered on the statement, explanatory of this kind of revenue.
140. The total hence arising from what under this head belongs to the zemindaries, equalling 2,383. 5 $\frac{1}{2}$. or fr^{p} 1,444. 24. 34. to which must be added the founadyem of the cawelly, arising from a tax on topes, and equalling 14. 2. or 8. 27. 33. with the former, making a total of 2,397. 7 $\frac{1}{2}$. or fr^{p} 1,453. 6. 57. is added to the former total, making, as the revenue of the district, specifically explained, the sum of CC. 2,35,720. 9. 15 $\frac{1}{2}$. or fr^{p} 1,42,861. 9. 23.
141. Having thus brought forwards the founadyem belonging to the cirkar exclusively; that which belongs to the enaums proposed to be left with their possessors, stands next for explanation. This your board will perceive, on reference, to be entirely made up from taxes on topes, amounting to 344. 7. 15. which sum, added to 10,067. 8. 14 $\frac{1}{2}$. gives to the enaum- ders the total amount of 10,412. 6. 13 $\frac{1}{2}$.
142. The taxes in this statement, I deem to be such as do not, under the orders for the formation of the permanent settlement, belong to the land, but that, as being wholly pro- fessional, are retainable by government, and subject to such future alterations, as its judg- ment may choose to make.
143. The number of shops are noted, and the taxes thereon. They are regularly fixed, in proportion to the estimated value of the trade each individual carries on.
144. The house tax is improperly so called, as it is in fact a sort of shop tax, levied in manner similar to that called the shop tax. The customary mode of settlement is by estimate, on the probable trade of individuals; viz. the wurtucks, or manufacturer who carries on his trade at home, is fixed on the proportion to this trade and profit; the dyers and silversmiths, in proportion to their income derived from their trade; the anicoody, or people who work in trade as common workmen, in proportion to their respective estimated income.
145. The loom tax is assessed by long usage on the produce of the loom, rather than on the loom itself. Thus, those weavers who have three or four people in a family, put out more work from the loom than those who have a lesser number, and the number of pieces, as well as quality, determine the rate of assessment.
146. In other instances, the looms of the dhans are taxed, in proportion to the time they work at their looms, and the produce of their time; since, in the months of cultivation, they leave their craft to attend on that particular business. Hence, by so much the less as they may in proportion with other weavers, appear to pay for their looms, they by a much greater proportion assist the revenue of the cirkar in cultivation.
147. The tax on oil mills is fixed on the proportionate estimated at the mills. The tax on iron-founders is fixed on the furnace, according to the labour of the founders, in bringing the ore from different distances; and that on the indigo makers, is levied in proportion to the labour, in bringing the leaves of the vippal trees, the produce of the vats.

148. The puller wury is a tax which has its rise in the aumeeny management, but which has been improperly continued as part of the founardyeem, even after the lands have been held to the cirkar, from the privilege they have, of dividing the main or different fees they get in reaping, and threshing the crops in the fields.

149. The honey-rent, or gootto, is a licence by custom paid for as much of that article and the wax of bees, as may be found by the renter, in particular jungles or mountains.

150. The tax on the Patna Chitty and Bogamy, has its rise from the custom of the right and left hand cast, each having an head or chief. The one of the right hand cast, was called the Patna Chitty, and of the left, Bogamy. Each respectively by prescription collected from their cast, certain impositions authorized by the servants of government.

151. The office of each, was that of censor on their respective casts and dependants; and the tax was originally supposed to have been gratuitous, and in compensation to them for their trouble.

152. The Mussulman government destroyed partly the power of these people, which was very dangerous, inasmuch as they swayed their casts to their inclination, and ever were the sentiments of the right and left hand casts generally; the assembly of each being always under them, and influenced by their advice, which in many instances stayed not at murder.

153. On my arrival at Dindigul, in Sept. 1796, several tumultuous assemblies were made which determined me to suppress the power of the chiefs of these factions; and as my appointment gave me the power of judging, I thought it right the casts should continue the payment to the cirkar they had before made to the Patna Chitty and Bogamy.

154. The ghee goota is a sort of village monopoly; the renter has the exclusive right of buying and selling ghee in retail; and, on the computed profit of this monopoly, the tax is levied.

155. The tax on carriage bullocks is levied, on the proportion of income to the owner derived from their use; those working in and near the residence are said to be less profitable, but that may be from the mode of barter among the natives, whence real profit is neither so easily defined or so minutely settled; but for those going far, the profit is easily known from the general regulations for hire; and, on the estimated union of these different modes of labour, the tax is fixed.

156. These several taxes, amount to 8,330. 5. 9. or star pag^s 5,048. 37. 12. and though belonging to the jamma of the district, do not, for the reasons before stated, belong to the zemindar. To these also must be added the founardyeem of the enaumdars, proposed to be permitted to enjoy their enaums, amount to 64. 4. 6. or star pag^s 39. 3. 51. making in toto, 8,394. 9. 15. or star pag^s 5,087. 39. 43. These, as assumptions of privilege by the enaumdars, I have entered with taxes that belong exclusively to the cirkar; conceiving, under the present orders, that the enaumdars are not to have the privilege of bringing taxes so properly devoted to the zemindars.

157. This statement will exhibit to your board at one view, the increase in land brought forward by the survey; and from the inaccuracy of the curnum accounts, prove the necessity of the measure. In justice however to the ryot, it is proper to remark, that those places in which the difference is very enormous, have been very generally desolate, from either the unhealthiness of the climate, the frequent inroads of banditti, or the rapacity and deception of former managers.

158. The total increase appears to be 109. $\frac{9\frac{1}{2}}{16}$ per cent. on the ain cultivable land; the decrease in baltalagointa, I have not been able to account for; the increase in the tersey of
141. $9\frac{11}{10}$ is enormous, more in quantity than the total amount of the number of goontals given in by the curnums on the ain cirkar land.

159. The accounts of the curnums were delivered in at the cutcheree, as the survey proceeded; and the falsity of them was proved before the village. In what manner, the accounts were made up by the curnums, or on what measurement, I cannot find out; but the survey has restored order, and the accounts now with the curnums, are those made by the survey.

160. The increase in the cultivated lands in several zemindaries, appears very large. This arises from the actual increase on survey, and from the deceit of the nautamears and curnums in concealing and fabricating accounts, which, though highly culpable in itself, was the only means they had of combating the extortions of the venal servants of the cirkar.

161. Hence arose an irregularity of assessment, and great inequality of rent. Those ryots who were able to interest the curnums, held their lands for almost a nominal rent; whilst those who were not so fortunate, although possessing lands equally productive, were under-fold in the markets, and ultimately ruined. Their lands were taken into the general cultivation of the village by the curnum; but usually entered as waste in the accounts given to the cirkar; and so long as the spoils derived from this conduct were equally distributed, the act was not noticed. On this assumption, it will appear, that the general increase equalling $67\frac{1}{10}$ per cent.
does not press hard on the ryots.

162. In bringing the increase of land before your board, I must advert to the report of Nov. 24th 1795; on the Dindigul district, by Mr. Wynch, and extract his reported measurement of the nyacret, or total cultivable land, exclusive of enaum, of what in the schedules now rent composes the Toddicomboo zemindary, as follows:

	Chuc ^s .	Mr. Wynch's Report.	Curnum's Account previous to Survey.	Present Measurement.
Toddicomboo Village.	Poonjee - - - - -	12,020 11	17,221 3	21,473 14
	Nunjee - - - - -	479 12	740 6	1,060 154
		12,500 7	17,961 9	22,534 134
	Poonjee - - - - -	2,427 54	2,520 —4	4,726 54
	Nunjee - - - - -	23 10	33 11	58 124
		2,450 154	2,553 114	4,765 2
TOTAL Zemindary -		14,951 64	20,515 44	27,299 154

163. From this, it will be easily seen that his accounts were incorrect; first, in being less than the curnums account by 37. $\frac{3\frac{1}{2}}{16}$ per cent.; and secondly, less by the present measurement 82. $\frac{9\frac{1}{2}}{16}$ per cent. which is an increase of 33. $\frac{1\frac{1}{2}}{16}$ per cent. on the former accounts of the curnums.

164. By the incorrectness, in the first instance, is shown the proof of what has been previously urged in respect to the deceit of the nautamears and curnums, and of their fabrication of the village accounts, which was partially corrected by my promulgating the intention to survey, as the work was commenced on.

165. I do not mean by this, so much to condemn the sources of information on which Mr. Wynch's report of 24 November 1795, was founded, as to endeavour to show that the great increase observable in the statement of the curnums account, arose more from their own fabrication of them, with the view of procuring means to satisfy venality, than from the ignorance of the actual extent of lands, and its positive increase on their accounts by survey.

185. In the resources of the founardyeem, as belonging to the zemindars, at present, little improvement can be expected; even that which may arise from planting of topes or extension of the ponicando cultivation, can hardly be held out as an object for immediate speculation.

186. On the founardyeem, which as professional, commodities in detail, I have not included in the resources of the zemindary, a very great increase may be expected under proper regulations of excise; but as partial innovation might injure rather than improve the revenue, I have not attempted to alter what custom has established, and which cannot effectually be regulated, but under some general system for excise on the whole country.

187. In every act of my management, I invariably adhered to the customs of the natives in cultivation, and made the extension of agriculture the first object; the very great increase of revenue also shows the increase of agriculture, and I am so well convinced of the resources of this province, from my own inspection, that I cannot doubt, but that under a vigilant superintendence, and firm yet almost imperceptible guidance of the labours of the inhabitants, if peace continues, the revenues from the increase of population, and the habits of industry which may be then expected to be confirmed in the ryots, will, in the course of ten years, be nearly doubled.

188. But as agriculture must be considered as the foundation of what must, in the most essential manner contribute, to the prosperity of the country, it is necessary that its particular effects should be encouraged; the rents on the land must soon exhaust the district, unless its manufactures be encouraged, and those, only, can bring back to it, the sums exacted from it by taxation.

189. Hence it is necessary for the prosperity of the country, that commerce should in some degree, more powerful than at present, partially restore to the industrious ryots, the sums which the various settlements of the country have collected from it; and that the circulation of revenue so derived, if not made beneficial by its confinement to circulation in the province from whence it may be drawn, should not in its consequence, become pernicious to it.

190. I beg to apologize for this digression, but in observing the drafts on this treasury for the factories of Salem, Tinnevely, and Rammad, it cannot but be seen that, the prosperity of those countries must be better established, from the more extensive circulation of cash within them than this, which, notwithstanding the value it now bears, must fall, if its numerous looms be not regularly and fully employed, and its internal commerce more sought after, and more firmly established.

Extract Letter from Mr. W. M. GARROW, Collector of Coimbatore; dated 30th November 1806.

6. The object of the survey being to equalize the land-rent throughout, it was necessary to refer to the mamool rents then existing. Their diversity however, and the disproportion found between the recorded area of land, and the quantity ascertained after measurement, rendered much consideration necessary before an average rate could be found to be generally adopted to the country as to avoid (in the act of equalizing individual assessments) the two extremes of rendering the total jumma of the country too high, or too low, compared with that of the preceding.

7. The Andoor and Erood talooks were the first upon which the experiment was tried; and from them, were obtained the data upon which were founded the subsequent general assessment for the other districts. In these two talooks, the rents differ considerably from those obtaining in the remainder of the division; the reason is, that, being the two first which were assessed, village by village, and field by field, the regularity which appears in the rents of the other districts, was impracticable with regard to them; for that regularity in the latter, was produced by the data obtained, and final arrangement resulting from the detailed assessment of Erood and Andoor.

8. Previously to the survey, the different gradations of land was unlimited. Properly speaking, the gradation did not depend upon the land; capricious assessments were made upon the soil, and it frequently happened that the pecuniary circumstances of the owner, was the principal criterion by which his field was assessed. As an example of the diversity of rates obtaining, your board will find in the Appendix, a statement of the former rates of assessments in nine villages of the Andoor, and a similar number of the Erood talooks. The gradations will be observed in the village of Chadayampolliam, to amount to sixteen. In Talleannellore, to be only five. In Guttylomoodram, of the latter talook, they in poonjee, are fifteen, and garden, two in number. I shall add but one more example in the instance of Sankarampolliam, which has twenty kinds of assessments. Had these classes of land been attended with an equitable progressive decrease of assessments, the rents of the ryot would have been tolerably moderate; but, as I have before remarked, the assessment paid by the owner gave rank to the soil in the scale of gradations, instead of the soil proving the standard of assessment.

9. This will be the better observable, if the description paid by the ryot is taken into consideration.

9. This will be the better observable, on a reference to the first sort of land, where the same description paid 8 chuckrams in Guttasamoodram, and 3. 5. only in Coomarayanoor. The same difference exists, more or less, in the inferior sorts of land. Those whose farms were most highly assessed, were generally those who were thought, best able to pay it. They in return, imputed upon the cinker by concealing the real extent of those farms. This struggle between rapacity on one hand, and fraud on the other, had totally confounded the real and equitable assessment of the village.

10. Experience, and the information consolidating the

10. Experience, and the information of the ryots themselves, confirmed the necessity of consolidating the different classes into a definitive number, which was fixed by the consent of the people themselves, in conjunction with the surveyors, at the following rates; viz.

For Poenjee	-	-	-	-	-	-	Twelve :
For Gardens	-	-	-	-	-	-	Four :
For Nunjee	-	-	-	-	-	-	Four :

which number was found to embrace all the descriptions of the lands of the division. In course of classifying the lands, the quantity recorded by the curnum, differed, as may be supposed, from the measurement now made. The mamool butta exceeded in double and triple proportions, the measured area. The various high rents produced by the curnums, less than the land actually possessed by the ryot, as it may be supposed that the adaptation of the mamool rent per butta, &c. upon the farms cultivated in 1200, would not answer on the same land. After measurement, it was next necessary to ascertain the proportion that should now fall on the land, and to equalize it, with as great a degree of accuracy as possible. The proportion of the mamool rent upon the land thus ascertained to exceed the butta rates obtained in every village. The detailed accounts, at length afforded the necessary reference to the rents of the other talooks of the division, and to the actual produce, charges, cultivation, and the ryot's share, the enclosed, D. was found to be as follows:

11. The averaged mamool rent, estimated upon the actual produce, charges, and the ryot's share, the enclosed, D. was found to be as follows:

11. The averaged mamool rate of the former measurement having been formed, a scale of the affluents, after rejecting fractions, was fixed upon as a standard; in order to judge of the proportionate remission that ought to be made in consequence of the reduced area of the buttas, &c. after measurement.

12. On

12. On advertng to the Scale of Affessment, D. the third column will show the averaged inamool rate per butta, alluded to. In column four, will be found the proportionate rent as it now stands, on each field.

13. After the formation of this scale, little further labour was necessary. The quantity and quality of land being furnished from the surveyors in the districts, the assessment was applied to each class of land, as it corresponded with the class in the scale.

14. The next point was the comparative state and situation of the villages.

15. It is evident that lands, though first, second, and so on, in the order of their fertility, correspond invariably, with similar classes in other villages. Independently of this circumstance, local causes throw some villages of equal, or even superior quality of soil, into an inferior scale to others, either from their remoteness, which has an effect upon the scale of their produce, the unhealthiness of the climate, and the depredation of wild animals; besides various other impediments to agriculture, which it is needless to enumerate.

16. These considerations, held out the propriety of subdividing the villages, in reference to their relative prosperous circumstances and local advantages, into four kinds; and in order to form the distinction, it was fixed that the first sort of land, in the second class of villages, should be assessed on a par with the second sort of land, in the first description of villages, and the calculation so continued, until the rents of the four description of villages were equalized.

17. The talooks also are affected in a similar degree, in respect to their remoteness and other cause; a further remission was granted on this account also, as will be observed on reference to the note at the foot of the scale.

18. In order to convey an idea of the effect which the operation of this scale of assessment has had upon the revenue, I have, in the statement E. instanced two villages. It bears example of the increase and decrease of the revenue by its introduction, and shows the remissions found necessary to be made.

19. The village of Veillacanar will be observed to have been a Ch. f. bullas of poonjee, for which at various rates, it paid a revenue of 920. 7. making an average Ch. f. 8. By the survey, the quantity of the land was increased to 275 buttas, and the gradations of land, as affixed by the bullas of poonjee, for which at various rates, 10 p.

 of 4. 3. 2. per butta. By the survey, the quantity of the land was increased to 275 buttas, the whole of which was included, in five of the twelve gradations of land, as affixed by the ryot and surveyors in conjunction. It will be recollected, that 32 fanams per mamool butta, was found to be the highest poonjee, when averaged upon a particular number of villages in Eroad and Andoor, with the progressive deduction of 2 fanams in every inferior class in succession. Upon this principle, the first sort of land containing 100 buttas, at 32 fanams, would have paid 320.; the second sort, containing 87 buttas, and assessed at 2 fanams less than the first, viz. 30 fanams, would have afforded 261; and progressively, until the total cultivated land-rent was reduced to 814. 4. 0. by paying even according to the averaged mamool scale in D. but, by the general application of the scale of remission,

20. Gardens, by mamool, formerly paid, not for the soil, but chiefly upon the productions cultivated in them; and, as I have mentioned before, generally upon reference to the circumstances of the holder. It was difficult to obtain any criterion to fix the assessments upon them. By the correctest average that could be obtained from the gardens of Erood and Andoor, the highest assessment was found to be between eight and thirteen, and the lowest from about 1. 8. to 5. conty chukkrums the butta.

21. In the same manner as it had been applied to poonjee, the average mamool teerwa was adopted, as a scale of assessment for gardens, also in order to ascertain the possibility of its being generally fixed for all the districts, with the intention, should it be found that the increase of revenue was too great, to reduce it considerably.

22. The mamool scale of assessment made it from 8. to 6. 5. per butta; the average rent, was comparatively easy in the village of Vellacinar, would have fallen heavy on others, if generally adopted, it was necessary to reduce it still further, by remitting 30 fanams on the first, 22 fanams on the second, and 20 fanams on the third class of garden; as being a more equitable difference between the garden and poonjee rent. By this means, the permanent average rate is reduced from 7. 5. 6½. (the mamool teerwa) to 4. 9. per butta.

23. Such a reduction, would scarcely appear warranted, unless the permanent average rate is reduced from 7 to 6 per cent. The villages of Dargun contained 977 villages; the addition, by measurement, classed as permanent, would be 1000, and the average mamool rate of affluence, but the gross bariz rate are adverted to.

24. The Northern Division contained 977 villages; the gross bariz rate was 10½ annas, and the average mamoolikah or assessment was 6½ annas, which was reduced by remission to 5½ annas, and by calculating (for experiment) by the average mamoolikah or assessment of 6½ annas, chiefly by the increase of assessment in nanjee, of which hereafter the gross bariz rose to chuckrums, 5,15,326. 3. 10½. exceeding the bariz of the Fully 1209, by chuckrums, 1,59,432. 5. 5½. This increase was by no means an object desired, as the consequence of the new assessment; it served only to point out the mode of equalizing and moderating the land-rent throughout the country, without incurring the danger of depreciating the revenue.

25. Between the averaged rate of 32, and the remission of 6 annas, there was a difference of 26 annas, which was brought into account, lightening the land-

25. While the reduction between the averaged rate of 32, and &c. was prosecuting, the increased quantity of land brought into account, proved, in general, more than equivalent to the fall, by their remissions; so that the cirar, in lightening the land-rent of every ryot too much below its former rate, was gaining, by the greater quantity of land brought into account.

26. While,

Q N

26. While, owing to this circumstance, the gross bariz of some villages in one talook actually was made to exceed that of the preceding year, it mattered little whether, by the operation of the remission, the revenue fell in other villages, as in the instance of Vellacannar; for so long as the total bariz of the talook, was found to maintain its level with that of the year before, there existed no ground for apprehension, that government could suffer even a temporary loss of their usual receipts, as I have more than once repeated. The object of the survey was not to occasion a rise of the revenue, further than by the beneficial effects of its operation, at a future period.

27. The village of Veerabaundy will show the reverse, by the adaptation of the same principle of assessment. It contained in the mamool account, 198 $\frac{5}{8}$ buttas of poonjee, paying 508. 6. 5. at the average rate of 2. 5. 10 $\frac{1}{2}$ per butta; the measurement multiplied the number of buttas to 363, which composed eight different classes of soil, upon inspection. By calculation at the rate of 32 fanams for the first sort of soil, and 2 fanams less in the classes in succession, there occurred the very great increase of 441. 5. 11. upon the same land that was bringing the gross revenue nearest to the level of the bariz of 1209. The very highest poonjee assessment now established, excepting Erood and Andoor, does exceed 20; the difference between that, and the mamool average rate, was remitted; being 6 annas, or 12 fanams for the first sort, 11 for the second, and in the successive remission of 1 fanam, in every class.

28. Still, there was a rise in the gross bariz of that village. But this may be attributed, to the greater quantity of land in cultivation which had not paid its fair rent, or had been altogether a fraudulent tenure.

29. The same remarks that have been made on the garden lands of Vellacannar, apply to those of Veerabaundy; and upon the same principles of assessment and remission, there is an increase in this village of Conteroy, chuckrums, 32. 7. which, with its poonjee increase, shows again, in consequence of the survey, of 126. 2. 11.

30. The foregoing examples attach chiefly to poonjee; by which it is clear, that by the adoption of one uniform scale, there can be no loss; since the fall on the rents of one village may be always expected to be counterbalanced by the additional acquisition of land in another. It may now be necessary to add a few words on the subject of nunjee assessment. The measurement and classification took place at the same time, and in the same manner, as in the former.

31. The most considerable tract of land of the former, is situated under the watercourses of the Myar and Bhovany rivers, in the talooks of Danaigun, Cottah, Sateemungalum, Gopaulchetty pollam, and Erood.

32. On reference to the nunjee lands of Gopaulchetty pollam, and of Erood, there appeared a very great disparity in the assessments. The average rate of the former, was 5 $\frac{1}{2}$ annas only per goonty, or 3. 6 $\frac{1}{2}$ per cawney. In Erood, the same land paid 13 $\frac{1}{2}$ annas per goonty, or 3. 2. 13. per cawney. The reasons assigned for this fraudulent difference were, servants. As the uncertainty of money payments from the sirkar was a plausible excuse, so they availed themselves of it, in paying themselves in land at a low rent, which they underlet to the lower ryot. Their friends and relations were, in course, not forgotten in these mis-appropriations.

33. Another reason assigned was, that the apprehension of paying double rent, prevented their raising a second crop; and that they paid only in reference to a single one. There is, however, little justice in the excuse.

34. The nunjee lands of Erood were cultivated by the common class of ryots. They always raise two crops, in which that talook differs from Gopaulchetty pollam. It borders on the Salem districts, where a speedy sale is effected of the produce. These advantages, of course tended to advance the Erood assessments. The Gopaulchetty pollam nunjee, did not however, so far fall short of these advantages, as to be entitled to the very great indulgence in rent. The produce of a single crop in the latter, was nearly equal, from the fertility of the soil, to the double crops of Erood; and the superiority in quality, in a great measure, counterbalanced any casual deficiency in quantity. It became necessary to assimilate the rents of the land of the two districts as much as possible; and they are fixed, as will be observed, in the scale of assessment, taking, in average of the five of the highest assessed villages of the Erood district, the mean highest rent per goonty will be found to be 1. 2 $\frac{1}{2}$ per cawney, 11. 6. 6 $\frac{1}{2}$. In reference to this and other local circumstances, the permanent rent for the first description of land, in the first class of the village of Erood, was fixed at 1. 1. or 10. 6. 4. per cawney, with a deduction of 1 and 2 annas for the class of land immediately below it, and a progressive decrease of one anna between each of the remaining inferior gradations.

35. The above paragraphs, will be more particularly explained by a reference to the scale of nunjee assessment, in Statement D. wherein is comprehended a distinct account of every description of land, from the rent of the first description of soil of the most favoured village, to the worst class of the most inferior village. It may scarcely be necessary to remark, that the gradation of nunjee assessments must depend less upon the quality of the soil, than upon the contiguity of its situation to the stream. By this statement, it will appear that the Gopaulchetty pollam lands, are assessed on more equal terms with Erood; but as the high assessment of the latter, arises mostly from its double crop, the deduction of 1-4th of the assessment is allowed, when the land of Gopaulchetty pollam bears but one crop, to be paid in full on raising a second.

36. The rent of lands watered by tanks, were settled, in a similar way. Reference was had to the quantity of water, and the period for which they would hold it on an average of seasons.

seasons. The highest rent, per cawney, of such lands, has been fixed at 5. 6. 4; and the lowest at 4. 11. as will be seen in Statement D.

37. It is only necessary to make one remark further; that whatever the description of land may be, and whatever the assessment, one-third of that rent is demanded, when invetted as pasture.

38. The land-rent having been thus settled, the fournydyem, or money-rent, was the next object of attention. I have, on a former occasion, fully entered upon the subject. It will be necessary, therefore, to say but a few words in addition to my address, under date the 9th May 1805, in explanation of the mode in which this description of revenue was taxed. It must be first premised, that they were divided into two classes; the one called Hyum or fixed fournydyem, which is not subject to much variation, such as the production of trees (the ground on which they stand not paying land-rent) the rent of the collections made of ginger, &c. in the hills; this is a solitary instance only in the talook of Coimbatore; and the jodiga, or quit rent paid by bramins of Bramhadain enam lands possessed by them. The second class of fournydyem is the taxes on bazars, professions, &c. &c. For a more particular explanation, I beg to refer to my letter of the 9th May, 1805, with its references.

39. The mode adopted in classifying the bazars, and indeed oppressive, to have formed the assessment of the land. It would have been hard, and indeed oppressive, to have formed the merchants by a scrutiny into the private profits on the extent of commerce in which the merchants were concerned; and even were the attempt made, there was every probability that the inquiry, would have been defeated, by the reserve of those to whom it was directed. It would have been desirable to have made one single defined tax answer for every bazar in the place; but it would have been at variance with the system of equalization, which it was the intention to introduce; and certainly the lower retail dealers, would have had considerable room for complaint, in being obliged to bear the unequal burden with their more substantial competitors.

40. It was, therefore, left to the merchants, in conjunction with the surveyors, to fix their own gradations of rank. This left them no room to complain; and indeed the result was more advantageous to the revenue, for many who may, on scrutiny, have avoided coming forward; would, from a principle of vanity, assert their situations, rather than be placed, in point of consequence, below their inferiors. The bazars are therefore formed into four distinct classes; the highest paying four chuckrums, and the lowest one, throughout the country. The remainder of taxes on professions, houses, &c. is detailed in statement E.

41. I trust, that in endeavouring to explain the foregoing mode of survey and assessment, I may have been sufficiently clear. The accounts have been, as far as practicable, formed to avoid diffuseness; and at the same time, to retain their simplicity and perspicuity, for the purpose of enabling your board to observe, at one view, the innumerable and undefined mamool rents reduced to a collected state, by an average made upon those of two talooks. In the next instance, the reduction made upon that average, in consequence of the relative superiority of the recorded quantity of land to the butta and gooly adopted as the standard, the progressive decrease made in the different classes of land; and finally, the further remissions granted to the villages and talooks, on consideration of their local and accidental inferiority.

42. By this simple mode of assessment, the equality throughout the division is general. No ryot can complain of his rents being unjustly higher, than those of his neighbour. The assessments are acknowledged to be equitable upon the different classes of ground; and the only room for complaint must originate in the erroneously placing the land in a class superior to its quality; a mistake which ought to have been avoided by the ryots, who, in conjunction with the surveyors, classed their own field; where others have been found, they have been immediately rectified, and in all instances, to the advantage of the ryot. I am therefore confident in offering, that the arrangement, as it now stands, will be found to have been formed with a precision, which will obviate much future trouble.

Extract PROCEEDINGS of the Board of Revenue, at Fort St. George; dated 24th July 1806.

Extract Report from Mr. WALLACE, principal collector in Tanjore and Trichinopoly; dated 15th June 1806.

2. ALTHOUGH the board is in possession of the general grounds on which the present settlement is formed, it will be still proper to recapitulate briefly those grounds, as well as to offer, more at large, some remarks and observations regarding the result of them, in order that a just opinion may be formed of the nature and effect of the plan which has been adopted for the realization of the revenues of those districts, particularly of Tanjore.

3. I shall bring the settlement of Tanjore and Trichinopoly under the consideration of the board separately, and I shall commence with that of the former district.

TANJORE.

4. The nunjah lands of Tanjore have been assessed in the present year, in the following manner:

5. The average produce, per valy, of each village, in Fussy 1210, 11, and 12, has been taken at a medium standard produce for all the lands of each village, and the standard produce has been allotted on each cutta or field, of each village, by the general consent of all the the mecrassidars of each village, where there was more than one landholder, and where there was only one landholder in one village, the allotment on each field was made by himself. In some villages, at the eastern extremity of the Cavery, in the Mayavaram district, where there was not any nunjah produce in Fully 1212, owing to the entire failure of the river, the produce of one of the two subsequent years formed part of the average.

6. The proportions of this medium produce liable to taxation, which forms the foundations of the land revenue of this province, were allotted according to the plan submitted by my predecessor, in his report to the board of 20th December 1803.

7. It varies from 50 to 60 per cent. of the standard gross produce, after deducting the usual sotundrums and maniums; and its variety depends on the facility or difficulty of irrigation, which the different rivers and large channels of Tanjore are known in general to present.

8. The rate at which the taxable proportion of the standard produce of the lands have been valued, are the results of the averaged prices which the grain of each particular district yielded to the carcar, during the three last years of the rajah's administration, and the three first of that of the Company's.

9. The foregoing plan has been adopted for the settlement of the revenues of the nunjah lands of 4,081 villages; the adoption of it, has been found impracticable in 595 villages, for reasons which will be hereafter explained.

10. The extent of nunjah land brought under cultivation in the 4,081 villages above-mentioned, amounts to valies 72,653. The land revenue arising from this extent of land, amounts to Tanjore chuckrums, 1,74,105, or star pagodas, 7,27,960. This amount divided on the lands assessed in this year, makes the average tax, per valey, 10. 0. 66. or per Madras cawney, 1. 40. 35.

11. Before I proceed to remark on the degree of permanency which may be allowed to the assessment thus fixed, on a considerable portion of the nunjah lands; I shall state such further particulars regarding the settlement of the land revenues of Tanjore for the present Fully, as are to be considered entirely of a temporary nature.

12. The plan alluded to in the foregoing paragraphs having for its principal object the establishment of a fixed land tax, could not, at the season of the year when the settlement was commenced on, be introduced universally into the districts. As in the arrangement for fixing the jumma, the future welfare and happiness of the landholders were particularly consulted, it was of importance that it should be received by them, not as the expedient of the day, but as a permanent measure calculated to insure to them all the benefits arising from the fixation of a moderate defined land tax, and from future increased industry in the cultivation of their lands, and in the disposal of the produce of them.

13. It was further necessary to the successful operation of the plan, that no restraint or compulsion should be used in introducing it; but that those who were not sensible of its advantages should be gradually led to its adoption by a practical comparison of the benefit it held forth, with those of plans adopted on former occasions, for the realization of the revenue.

14. The circumstances under which the general plan could not be introduced into the nunjah lands of Tanjore, are to be considered as arising from two causes; the one where the season had operated so very unfavourably as to counterbalance in the opinions of the landholders, by its present evil effects, the future advantages derivable from the plan: the other, where the landholders, notwithstanding timely rains and abundant freshes in the rivers, were either too indolent to profit by them, or influenced by a desire to have their lands assessed at a low rate; and thinking that this desire could be easily accomplished by impoverishing their crops (a practice not at all novel in Tanjore) want only neglected to do justice to the fertility of their lands and to the bounty of the seasons.

15. Between the unavoidable calamity of the one class, and the wanton neglect or indolence of the other, it was just to make a wide distinction.

16. Accordingly, where drought or inundation were known to have occurred, either the actual produce of the lands, or a correct estimate of the crops was taken, and the taxable proportion thereof was calculated, and its value commuted, as in the lands where the land-inhabitants were instructed to consider it as an indulgence, which they were in no case to expect a repetition of.

17. The situations where the season had the unfavourable effect here alluded to, are in the southern parts of the provinces. In the Talacaud and Munnargoody talooks, 75 villages were overflowed at different periods, as well from the rivers as by heavy rains, so as in some places to reduce the crops below one quarter of the ordinary produce of these lands which are some of the lowest of the province, which are situated close to the rivers, and which, besides, are so near to the sea as to feel the bad effects of heavy monsoon rains.

18. The villages in Puttacottah, which suffered from the extreme drought, which many parts of the southward experienced during last year, are at the southern extremity of Tanjore, on the borders of Shevagunga and Tondiman. These villages, situated on a high level, are entirely dependant on lakes for their cultivation; and the want of heavy rains having left the lakes almost without water, the cultivation was not only reduced in extent, but the crops were quite impoverished. A few villages, likewise, on the high lands of Munnargoody Trivady and Talacaud, suffered from the same cause. The total number that suffered from drought was 89, of which 74 are in Puttacottah, and 15, the remainder, in the other three talooks just mentioned.

19. The number of villages, the nunjah lands of which, in consequence of the badness of the season, were thus temporarily taxed, are in number 164; their extent of nunjah land is 4,934 valies

4,034 valies, and the amount of the assessment on them is Tanjore chuckrums 46,670, or star pagodas 19,146.

20. In those cases where the season was avowedly favourable, but where the landholders insisted on rejecting the assessment arising from the average produce and commutation price, without assigning any sufficient reasons for their lands not being fully able to pay as much as the lands which had been under exactly similar circumstances, it appeared necessary that the landholders should not have advantages superior to, or the same as were conferred on those who, by paying proper attention to their cultivation, were enabled to accept the new mode of settlement, or who, disregarding any trifling temporary loss which it might occasion them, embraced with satisfaction, the future and permanent advantages which it held out. Were not some marked distinction thus made, the introduction of a permanent land-tax into the district would have been impossible; for none of the inhabitants would have acceded to the risk which the payment of fixed revenue renders indispensable, if they saw the full advantage a warum and price held out by the plan of settlement granted to those who insisted on the actual state of their crops as the basis of the settlement.

21. Besides, great expenses have been incurred by the government to secure to the district where these villages, in particular, are situated, the full effect of good seasons; and very large successive advances had been made to the landholders. In consequence of these measures, the mecrassidars had full and sufficient supplies of water, as well as ample means for profiting thereby.

22. Notwithstanding these advantages, the inhabitants of 595 villages alleged that the crops on their lands were, in the present year, unequal to the proposed assessment, and disregarding the permanent advantages held out to them, they preferred a settlement calculated on the actual state of their crops.

23. Had it been practicable to have fixed the assessment previously to the commencement of the cultivation, these objections would, of course, have been disregarded; indeed they could not have been urged. But as it appeared that the crops in these villages did not, from the indolence or wanton neglect of the inhabitants, promise to yield crops so large as the medium produce gave, it became necessary to make a temporary arrangement, which, while it would secure the landholders from all loss, should still show the people at large, that the superior benefits of the new mode of assessment would be granted only to those who would likewise take the risk of seasons on themselves.

24. A reduction of the untaxable portion of the ascertained or estimated produce appeared best calculated to attain this end; accordingly, the warum of the inhabitants of the villages under consideration, was reduced 10 per cent. lower than that which was allowed in the settlement of the other villages in the same district, where the general plan had been received; and the remainder of the ascertained or actual produce was commuted, as in the other villages of the district.

25. The number of villages in which this temporary settlement was made, I have before remarked, amounts to 595; the extent of nunjah lands in them is 10,959 valies, and the amount of the jumma 1,69,182, or 70,492.

26. The whole extent of nunjah land thus brought under cultivation within the year was 83,612 valies, and the amount of the fixed and temporary assessments thereon is 19,16,287; or 7,98,453.

27. The other principal head of revenue is Punja, payable on the high lands of the province. Under this head, I shall class all lands not yielding paddy; they are as follows:

1. Nunjah land cultivated with dry grain, called vail punja.
2. Baugayut, or garden land, formerly called fouradyum; the two former are watered from the rivers by picotahs, or from wells and tanks.
3. Punjah land, particularly called teddul punja, being the highest land in the country, and dependent entirely on the falling rains.
4. Topes.

28. Where nunjah land was temporarily brought under punjah cultivation, on account of the want of water in the rivers, it became necessary, of course, to form a temporary assessment on it. On a consideration of all circumstances, it was calculated that these lands generally could bear one-half of the assessment on lands of the same description, in the same village, but which were cultivated with nunja or paddy crops, which were more abundant and valuable than those of dry grain. This was the general principle adopted for these lands; but where, after due enquiry, it appeared that the assessment thus given was too high, or too low, the necessary augmentation or reduction of it was made.

29. There were 2,878 valies of vail punja land brought this year under cultivation, the total amount of the assessment on it is 23,007, or 9,586.

30. The baugayut land has been assessed, not with reference to the articles with which it was actually cultivated; but on a consideration of the different degrees of fertility which it possesses, and which it would have shown under ordinary cultivation, with wet or dry grain. Accordingly nunjah land, which had been converted into baugayut, has been charged with the average nunjah assessment of the village in which it may be situated. Where lands under baugayut cultivation are watered by picotahs, or wells, they have been assessed according to their different degrees of fertility, arising as well from the nature of the soil, as the manner in which they are watered, and where, as in some few instances, the baugayut productions are cultivated cultivated on the high teddul punjah lands dependant solely on the rains, they have been assessed with reference to the soil only, the same as all other teddul punja lands.

31. The extent of land brought under baugayut cultivation amounts to 2,029 valies, and the assessment thereon yields a total of 25,713, or 10,713.
32. The teddul punja land, dependent wholly on rains, has been assessed entirely with reference to the degree of fertility which the soil possesses, ascertained by classification, and by reference to the produce of former years.
33. The extent of teddul punjah land brought under cultivation in this year is valies 29,478.
and the assessment thereon yields a total of 1,43,010, or 59,587.
34. The tope tax, as levied according to the number and nature of the trees composing each tope, has been abolished, and the land on which the topes are situated, has been assessed according to its fertility, and with reference to the same class of teddul punjah land under grain cultivation; the extent of tope land is 1,025 valies, and the assessment thereon 4,467, or 1,861.
35. In fixing the assessment on all the different descriptions of land brought under the general head of punjah, the taxable proportion of the produce has been taken at two-fifths, and the value thereof has been calculated on an average of the prices of the different sorts of punjah grain in the last three years.
36. The total extent of punjah land brought under cultivation, is 35,412 valies, and the assessment thereon yields a total of 196,199, or 81,749.
37. The total extent of nunjah and punjah land brought under cultivation in the present year is 1,19,024 valies, and the total amount of the land revenue arising therefrom is chuck' 21,12,487, or ft' pag' 8,80,203.
38. For the details of the foregoing general results, as they affect the divisions and talooks of Tanjore, I beg leave to refer to the statement, No. 3.
39. Before entering on the few remaining heads, under which the revenues not arising directly from the lands, are classed; I shall proceed to offer such remarks regarding the arrangements which have been adopted for the realization of the land revenues, as appear to me necessary to enable the Board to judge how far the establishment of a defined, moderate, and fixed land tax, has been attained in the present settlement.
40. The general plan for the assessment of nunjah lands was detailed at considerable length in the propositions which I had the honour of submitting to the board, under date the 8th September last. The instructions of government and the board, on the subject of warrum, and the mode of taxing garden and tope land, I had the honour of receiving in a letter from the board under date the 3d of January last, and the approval of my propositions on the point of warrum, &c. on the 16th of January.
41. Thus the instructions of government and the board, on the subject of warrum, and my propositions regarding the average medium produce of the lands, and the valuation to be set on the taxable proportion thereof, form the basis of a settlement, which has for its chief object the establishment of a fixed land tax.
42. Out of the whole number of nunjah villages, 4,676, containing an extent of nunjah land of 83,612 valies, brought under cultivation in the present year, it has been found practicable to introduce the plan in question into 4,081 villages, and to extend it to 72,653 valies of land, being 83 $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. of the whole arable nunjah land, cultivated and uncultivated, in Tanjore.
43. From the badness of the season, it was found impracticable to establish the plan in 232 villages, containing 5,573 valies, being 6 $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. of the total nunjah land, the plan in 363 villages, containing 5,385 valies, being 6 $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. of the total nunjah land, and could not be introduced, from the neglect of the meerasadars, without exciting a repugnance to it, which, at the season of the year when the settlement was commenced on, it would have been improper to give room for, and which general policy rendered it necessary, in every case, making together an exception of 12 $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. of the whole nunjah lands of the districts, have been explained in paragraphs 16. and 34.
44. The board will have observed, that the plan in question has been first applied to the lands of each village in general. The assessment payable on each kutlai has been left to the joint determination of all the meerasadars of each village, who doubtless are best acquainted with their different degrees of fertility; the amount, thus allotted as the tax payable on each field, is entered in a register signed by the meerasadars and curums of each village, and deposited in the division cutcherry, as well as in the villages.
45. Where a meerasadar holds one or more kutlais in one village, the extent of each kutlai, and the tax on it, are inserted in the pottah which has been granted to him; where a meeral-sadar holds only a portion of a kutlai, or portions in several kutlais, the proportion of the tax on such kutlai or kutlais is allotted on its portion or portions, and the amount thereof, with the extent of such portion, is inserted in the individual pottah. Every meerasadar in Tanjore has been furnished with a separate pottah for the land held by him in each village; and each pottah is regularly stamped, numbered, and registered. For the information of the Board, I transmit a translation of the registers of kutlais, proprietors and teerwas, in one village.
46. I have much pleasure in stating to the board, that the plan adopted for the establishment of a fixed land tax on the nunjah lands has been received, with marked satisfaction, by the the landholders of the very large portion of Tanjore into which it has been introduced. They regard the ground on which the medium produce of their lands has been taken, as a just and moderate standard of their fertility; the proportion of this produce, which forms their untaxed share, is extremely favourable to them; and the rates at which the government right in that produce has been commuted, are universally allowed to be as low as they ought to be. The arrangement having been calculated for each village on actual facts, both in regard to produce and price, and not on theoretical statements, has secured, as far as was practicable, the impossibility of the tax on the lands being oppressive, and the degree of permanent benefit which the plan offers to enterprise and industry; indeed, the ready acceptance of it, even in cases where its immediate effects were not so advantageous as could have been wished.

47. Measures are taking for the extension in the ensuing Fusly, of the plan of settlement above described, to the 595 villages, which, for reasons before mentioned, have had a temporary jumma assessed on their lands in the present Fusly.
48. In regard to the punjah lands, although a classification of them has taken place, which in some instances has been attended to in the present settlement, I still think that a more correct survey of them by persons specifically nominated for that purpose, will be necessary previously to the tax on each field of this description being declared. Fixed measures have accordingly been taken for a revival of the late classification of the punjah lands, which, as their extent is comparatively inconsiderable, can be completed fully in about three months.
49. It is likewise my intention, that an immediate examination shall be made into the details of the allotment on each kutlai by the meerasadars, of the teerwa arising from the present plan of fixed assessment. This examination I propose establishing, not with a view to any alteration of the ground-work of the plan which has been adopted; but entirely with a view to remedy any defects or inequalities which may have occurred in the detailed application of it.
50. After this examination has been concluded for the nunjah lands, and the revival of the classification and assessment of the punjah land has been finished, both of which can be effected before the close of the year, the object of establishing a tax on each field of Tanjore will, I think, be satisfactorily obtained, and its permanency secured, as far as practicable.

Extract PROCEEDINGS of the Board of Revenue at Fort St. George, the 18th Sept. 1806.

To the Subordinate Collectors in Tanjore.

Gentlemen,
YOU will be pleased to commence on the settlement of the revenues of your respective divisions without delay, and on the following grounds:

NUNJAH.

- Par. 1.—You will first take the produce of each village in Fusly 1210-11 and 12, and ascertain therefrom, the average produce per valy; this average you will consider as the medium standard produce of the village.
2. The average produce per valy, you will apply to all the lands at present under cultivation in each village; and the produce thus given, you will consider as the ground-work of the settlement of the present year.
3. From the total produce thus calculated, you will deduct the sotuntrums and mooniuns, as in the last year's settlement.
4. The rates of warrum will be determined according to the pauchel of each village; the particular warrum allotted to each pauchel in each talook is stated in the accompanying enclosure, No. 1. to which you will pay strict attention.
5. The commutation rates at which the government share is to be calculated, are mentioned in the inclosed paper, No. 2. for each talook. They are taken on a medium of the prices of six years; the three last of the rajah's management, and the three first of that of the Company.
6. The government share of the average produce of a village being thus commuted, the whole demands upon each village will be ascertained; the object then will be, to fix the proportion of the total demand payable for each field or kutlai. This can best be done, by the body of the meerasadars of each village themselves, as they alone can have a perfect knowledge of the degrees of fertility which different parts of their lands possess.
7. It will therefore be expedient, that when the total demand on a village is fixed, the teerwars assemble all the meerasadars, and the curnum of such village; and that after due consideration by them, the tax payable for each kutlai be fixed. This arrangement can take place, after the settlement of the demands on each village of a talook is completed.
8. In the event of any disputes arising among the meerasadars of a village, as to the amount to be paid for each kutlai, the point in dispute is to be referred to the teerwar, who shall immediately call on the parties in dispute to nominate, each, two meerasadars of the neighbouring villages, and one conjointly, who shall form a punjayet for settling the assessment on the land, relative to which the dispute may arise.
9. The amount payable for each kutlai in a village, must, when concluded, be registered in the village by the curnum, in the talook cutcherries, and in the division cutcherries.
10. When the total and proportionate assessment are thus ascertained, the amount payable by each individual meerasadar, can readily be fixed. When sadjan pottahs, prepared

pared in the talook cutcherries by the curnum of each village, and which must be sent to you for the purpose of being stamped with your names, must be issued to each merassadar.

BAUGAYET LANDS.

11. The principle hitherto observed, of assessing Baugayet lands according to the articles produced on them, is to be entirely done away in the present rent; and these lands are to be taxed solely with a reference to the various degrees of fertility which they possess. If there-fore, any portion of the nunjah lands of a village have been recently brought under garden cultivation, such land will be assessed as nunjah, on the general ground laid down in the preceding paragraphs. In the event of lands hitherto classed as baugayet or soornadayum, having not been cultivated within the last five years with punjah, you will, in such cases, regard them as punjah lands, and assess them as such, according to their different degrees of fertility, according to the principles hereafter laid down. Under this arrangement, the head of baugayet will be henceforward discontinued in the accounts.

PUNJAH LANDS.

12. The accounts of classification of the punjah lands already received in your cutcherries, together with the accounts of the produce thereof, in 1210, 11, and 12, will be your guide in assessing these lands.

You will be pleased to observe, as a further principle, that 3-5ths of the produce of these lands, ought to be considered as the right of the merassadar or cultivator, and the commu-tation of the remaining 2-5ths, should form the tax on them; both to be calculated after deducting the sotuntrums, as in last year.

13. In commuting the government share in these lands, you will be pleased to observe, the prices of the different sorts of punjah grain set down in the enclosure, No. 3, which have been ascertained by the average price current, received from different parts of the pro-vince, in the three preceding years.

14. The defining the tax on each kutlai, or field of punjah lands; the registering thereof in villages by the curnums, and in the talook and division cutcherries; and the issue of individual pottahs, are all to be conducted in the same manner as has been directed for the nunjah lands.

15. It will be necessary that the fixed sotuntrums and mauniums be deducted as well in Nunjah as in Punjah, previously to the calculation of the tax; but a portion of these deductions, equal to 3 per cent. of the gross produce adopted as the basis of the settlement, must be con-solidated with the rent, and accordingly apportioned on the tax on each field, in order to defray the fixed charges mentioned in the margin †, and which the cirkar will hereafter take upon himself to discharge.

16. The tax levied last year on topes was taken according to the number of fruit-bearing trees in each village. That mode must in the present settlement be modified, by fixing a moderate tax on the lands occupied by topes; all assessment on single trees, and on all trees of the kind mentioned in the margin, being abolished, in establishing the tax on tope land. You will be guided by the information you may acquire, regarding the nature of the trees planted on it, or the fitness of the land for cultivation with other produce beside trees.

17. In regard to the periods at which the kists are to be paid, I enclose a statement shewing the proportion of the total rent which may, I think, be paid in each month. It is desirable to give the merassadars every possible indulgence, so as to allow them a fair market for their grain; but the regular and easy collection of the revenues, as well as the attention necessary to be given by the merassadars to the cultivation of their lands, renders it expedient that the whole of the kists should be paid in by June. The periods mentioned in the enclosed statement will, I think, embrace the objects of the merassadars and of the cirkar, in this particular point, and you will therefore be pleased to arrange the kists according thereto. Any prolongation of the payments of the kists, which may appear abso-lutely necessary, can at all times be granted, by a specific application for that purpose.

18. You will observe, that a principal object in the mode of settlement now proposed, is the establishment of a moderate defined tax on the land under cultivation, and the ascertain-ing with precision the amount payable on each field, and by each individual merassadar. These objects will, I trust, be satisfactorily attained by you, under the instructions which have in the foregoing paragraphs been laid down for your guidance. Should you deem any further information on points connected with the rents, necessary; I shall expect that you will, with-out reserve, address me regarding them.

I have the honour to be, Gentlemen, your most obedient servant,
(Signed) J. WALLACE,
Principal Coll. of Tanjore and Trichinopoly.

To the Subordinate Collectors of Tanjore.

Gentlemen,
Par. 12.—In assessing the punjah lands in the present year, you have been directed to take the average produce of Fusly 1210, 1211 and 1214, of each class of soils in each village, and to apply that average, to the whole extent of land of each class brought under cultivation. It appears, that in some villages during one or more of the years in question, proportions of the land, forming a distinct class of the lands of the village, have not been cultivated; for instance, in the village of Combaconum the land classed as sheval, was not cultivated in 1211. When cases of this kind occur, it will be necessary for you to ascertain by inquiry, what the produce of that class of land in the village, regarding which the difficulty arises, has generally been; and, according to the judgment which you may in consequence form, you will arrange the assessment on that class.

2. In

2. In lands distinguished hitherto by the appellation of taddul Punjah lands, it would appear that there is a considerable portion of garden land watered by wells, tanks, or from rivers, by picottahs. According to the instructions formerly sent to you, these lands should be classed as punjah lands, a name which is strictly applicable only to lands watered by the falling rains; I think, therefore, that it will be necessary to make some distinction between the former and the latter lands in the settlement, and accounts of the present Fusly; you will consequently be pleased to bring all garden lands included in the taddul punjah lands, but watered by tanks, wells, or rivers, under the head of punja terrum nunja, and assess them at double the average of the taddul punja teerva of the village in which they may be situated. The foregoing is laid down, as a general rule for your guidance: wherever you may find it necessary to deviate from it, you will deem yourselves authorized to make such modifications as you shall be satisfied will be proper.

3. I believe that the instructions contained in this letter, and in those addressed to you under date the 22d ultimo, will be found sufficient to enable you to proceed in the rent, without difficulty. I could wish you further to understand, that the rules which I have laid down for your guidance, are considered by me, as generally applicable to Tanjore; and, as uniformity of plan in the management of that province is most desirable, I could wish those rules to be deviated from as little as possible; in cases, however, where you think the welfare of the inhabitants, or the interests of government, will be materially consulted by a departure from the strict letter of the rules laid down for you, or where local circumstances may render it necessary, you will consider yourselves authorized to modify the inferior details of the rent, in such a manner as to you may appear proper; in all such cases, giving me the earliest possible notice of your having done so, and not delaying such notification until the conclusion of the settlement.

4. The average punjah prices to be observed in farming the settlements on the punjah lands, are forwarded herewith.

I have the honour to be, Gentlemen,
Your most obedient servant,

(Signed) John Wallace,
Principal Coll. of Tanjore and Trichinopoly.

(A true copy.)

To the subordinate Collector in the Manargoody Division of Tanjore.

Sir,

Par. 1. I HAVE just received your letter of the 4th instant. The soornadayum lands alluded to by you, are what yield baugayet, or garden produce; and as such, are not to be taxed according to the value of the article proposed, but according to the fertility and means of irrigation possessed by the land. With this view, in the second paragraph of my letter of the 3rd, you were directed to assume double the average taddul punja teerva of each village, as the rate which these lands in each village can, generally speaking, bear; but which you were instructed to modify, by increasing or diminishing that rate, in such proportion, as on investigation should appear necessary.

2. In regard to the coolally cultivation, it should, I think, be classed as punjah and taxed as such.

I have the honour, &c.
(Signed) John Wallace,
Principal Collector of Tanjore and Trichinopoly.

Trichinopoly,
5th February 1806.

The subordinate collectors will, as far as may be practicable, attend to the following rules regarding tauladdy lands in the formation of the settlement.

1st. When there are lands yielding a modelady and tauladdy nunjah crop, such lands will of course bear an assessment in the present rent, in proportion to their produce.

2d. When there are nunjah lands yielding one nunjah and one punjah crop, an additional assessment for the latter crop is to be levied on them, equal to one half of the nunjah teerva.

3d. In nunjah lands, the accounts of the standard produce of which, in the Fuslies 1210, 11, and 12, shew a tauladdy nunjah produce, but which have not yielded two nunjah, but one nunjah and one punjah crop in the present year, no additional assessment is to be levied for the punjah crop, but the produce, according to the accounts, is to be taken.

4th. In viel punjah lands, yielding a double punjah crop, it will be proper that an assessment equal to double the amount of the tax ordered to be levied on the viel punjah lands (which was, in general terms, one half of the average nunjah teerva of the village) be assumed as the teerva.

5th. Where nunjah, or viel punjah lands have been, for the first time in the present year, cultivated with a tauladdy crop, the teerva on such lands to be augmented in proportion to the augmentation of the produce.

6th. Where nunjah or viel punjah lands have formerly been cultivated with tauladdy crops, but in the present year have yielded, or will yield only one crop, such lands will be assessed as bearing only one crop.

7th. Where taddul punjah, or punjah tarumh nunjah lands, have yielded two crops in Fuslies 1210-11 and 14, the produce, of course, will have been inserted in the accounts; and such lands, if cultivated in the present year, with two crops, will be assessed accordingly; but if not

To the subordinate Collector in the Mayaverum division of Tanjore—Combaconum.

Sir,
In reply to your letter of the 12th, just received, I have to acquaint you, that in such of the villages in your division as have not yielded any produce in Fuslies 1210-11 or 12, you will form the settlement with reference to the present state of the crops, and the produce of former years.

2. The inhabitants of the Keertimaun Panchal appear to me to be justified in their objection to the general standard produce which you had been directed to assume for your division, as the work on that panchal, which was executed for the relief of the very extensive cultivation dependent on the Nautum Vaickol, has doubtless been detrimental to them. It will be proper, therefore, that you should, in the present settlement of those villages, adopt such grounds regarding the grain standard, as you may think just. It will be likewise proper that you should consider the expediency and justice of augmenting the warum in the Keertimaun Panchal, in remuneration to the meerassadars, for the losses they have sustained by the work above alluded to.

3. In any other villages of your division, to which, from particularly unfavourable circumstances, the general grain standard may not be strictly applicable in the present year, you will consider yourself authorized to make such modifications as you shall be satisfied are necessary. Confiding in your judgment, and in your attention, as well to the welfare of the inhabitants as to the public interests, I feel no hesitation in committing to you the discretionary power above mentioned.

Tanjore,

To the subordinate Collectors in Tanjore.

Letter from Mr. Wallace to the subordinate Collectors of Tanjore; 23 Feb. 1806.

Gentlemen,
Par. 1. It has occurred to me, that in the settlement of your respective divisions, the accounts of the measurement of the lands lately received, may, unless some instructions on the subject are given for general observance, lead to an increase of the teerva on the lands. I have, therefore, laid down the following rules, which you will observe in the villages not yet settled; and which, should you be aware of any considerable increase in the jumma occasioned by the late measurement, in any of the villages already settled, you will apply to them previously to your closing your jumma-bundies.

2. In some instances, by the re-measurement, in whole or in part, of a village, the extent of the lands will have been apparently increased, although the whole of the produce of the lands have been inserted in the accounts; and the increase will have been caused merely by the mode of measurement. In such cases, it would be obviously unjust to apply the averaged standard produce to the excess of lands which appear in the accounts, and to commute that amount for the purpose of adding it to the jumma. For example; the extent of land in a village, according to the accounts of former Fuslies, is 10 valies; the averaged standard produce 200 cullums per valy; or, for the whole village, 2,000 cullums, in the accounts of re-measurement; it would appear that there are 12 valies in the village, 2,000 cullums divided on which give 166. 8. per valy, which is the rate that should be taken in the settlement.

3. But from what I have observed in some instances, I am apprehensive that the Mahratta accountants may have drawn out the village accounts in a different manner; for instance, that they have taken 200 cullums for the 12 valies, thereby increasing the standard grain amount of the village to 2,400, being 400 more than the average, according to the real produce, has been.

4. In cases, therefore, where there is an increase of the lands by re-measurement, and where you shall feel satisfied that this increase is caused only by the mode of re-measurement (which by the rod, must always vary somewhat) and that the produce of the lands in Fusly 1210-11 & 12, has not been kept out of the accounts; you will divide the whole standard produce given by the three years revenue on all the land, which, according to the late accounts of re-measurement and cultivation, are under tillage, as in the example given in the second paragraph.

5. The same reasoning which applies to an increase in the lands by re-measurement, when the whole of the produce has been brought to account, will be also applicable where a decrease in the extent of lands appears by re-measurement. In the former case, the extent being increased, the average per valy will be diminished; in the latter case, the extent extent being increased, the average per valy will be increased; but the whole produce of the lands being brought into the accounts, the standard grain produce for all the lands will not be affected by the re-measurement; and the village, consequently, will pay the same as if no alteration in the extent of its lands, took place in the accounts.

6. In some cases the Mahratta accountants have, I am apprehensive, included for the whole lands of a village, an increase or decrease proportionate to the increase or decrease of only part of its lands on re-measurement; the orders for re-measurement, only directed one third of a village to be re-measured, for the purpose of ascertaining, in a general way, the correctness of the accounts which had previously been got, of the extent of the lands; the increase or decrease found in this portion, should not be applied to the whole of the village lands, as, in cases where any great difference was observed, the whole village should have been measured, and its real extent ascertained as nearly as possible.

7. The foregoing remarks apply to the nunjah lands; an attention to the rules which they have given rise to, may not be generally necessary in the punjah lands, as the measurement of the latter is not liable to the variation almost inseparable from the measurement of the former; and the punjah cultivation is not confined to particular spots, as the nunjah cultivation is. It is therefore concluded that the increase in the extent of punjah lands, or re-measurement, is real, and not fictitious; and consequently you will consider it as such, unless it shall appear to you on full proof that the increase has been occasioned merely by the mode of measurement, in which case a reduction in the jumma should of course be made.

I have the honour, &c.

Tanjore,
23d February 1806.

To the subordinate Collectors in Tanjore.

Gentlemen,

Para. 1. ENCLOSED I send two forms of registers, which must be kept as well in your respective catcheries as in those of the tehsildars, and in each village by the curnum.

2. The form, N^o 1, is merely an abstract of the pottahs to be issued to each individual, shewing the detail of the settlement as affecting each individual in particular, as well as the whole village in general.

3. The form, N^o 2, is meant to show the proportion which each nunjah kutlai in each village bears of the whole nunjah jumma, now fixed for each village, as settled among themselves by the meerassadars; it is the intention that this register should form a document whereon to ground the future settlement of the nunjah lands, it answering in this respect, the purpose of a registered classification of the soil. This register is confined to the nunjah lands brought under cultivation this year. The dry lands of every description in each village, it is my intention to have regularly surveyed, classed, and the assessment on them fixed, as soon as the business of the settlement of the present year's settlement which period also, a teerva can be set on the principle of the present year's settlement on the nunjah lands, which for the last four years have been uncultivated; which teerva will be paid on them whenever circumstances may admit of their being brought under cultivation.

4. I trust that you have taken steps for issuing pottahs to each individual meerassadar at the earliest possible period. This is a measure which will best establish in the minds of the people the advantages which they individually and generally will derive from the establishment of a defined money rent on their respective lands. A form of the pottah which I have issued, I transmit herewith for your guidance.

I have the honour, &c.

Sir,

Para. 1. As in some cases the obstinacy of the inhabitants, and in others their ill fortune, may render it impracticable to establish the rent of the current Fusly, on the basis stated in my letter of 22d January; and as to force the measure on the inhabitants, must in all cases be avoided; I have deemed it proper to communicate to you the following instructions for all such cases of difficulty, aware, that although the rent is far advanced, the settlement of villages, where opposition may have been made, is deferred until that of those where no difficulty have been experienced, has been concluded.

2. The difficulties to the entire establishment of the rent on the proposed grounds, may arise—1st, from obstinacy, without the plea of inability, arising from negligence, wilful or otherwise, in the cultivation.—3dly, from inability, arising from calamities incidental to agriculture, which could not have been either foreseen or prevented.

3. Between the last and two first supposed cases, every distinction which there is between unavoidable ill fortune and premeditated mischief, or unaccounted for objections, to a plan calculated for the general good, should be observed in the rent. The former is liable, in the present present instance especially, to every proper indulgence; the two latter, in a manner equally special to justice, without indulgence.

4. The adoption of the settlement is now so far advanced, that we may safely, I think, conclude that its basis is satisfactory to the inhabitants in general; they regard the advantages conferred on them by it, not as confined to the present year, but as permanently settled, as far as permanency is consistent with the possibility of great fluctuation in the seasons; and they, on the other hand, seem to understand very well that the advantages which they derive are granted to them in consideration of their taking on themselves the risk of trifling and casual fluctuations of season, unattended by any marked or great calamity. They feel that the advantage is reciprocal to themselves, and to government.

5. In the two first cases which I proposed, and particularly in the first, reciprocity is not looked for; the merassadars are desirous that all the advantage should be on their side; they wish either for an aumanie division of the crops, which would throw the revenue of government at their discretion, or to make a settlement in which they shall derive every possible advantage, without any one possible risk. The security of the revenue; the establishment of a uniform regular mode of management, as well as justice to those who have taken moderate risk and considerable advantages together, demand that views of the kind should be defeated; for this purpose, you will be pleased to observe the following instructions.

6. I think, that in the first case, viz. where the merassadars object to the proposed plan of settlement, although it appears that their grain produce in the present year is nearly 10 or 15 per cent. what the averaged produce of the three years adopted in the plan of settlement amounts to, the actual and past selling price of grain certainly higher than the commutation price, and an increase probably in the warum; in this case, I would recommend your adopting, without hesitation, a division of the crops, allowing to the merassadars a warum of 40 per cent. on the produce of their lands, and charging them with all the expenses of a rigid aumanie management of their villages; they to be in all times, held responsible to produce the government share, or to pay the current selling price thereof.

7. In cases where the produce of the present year may, from negligence, have been so far reduced, from 15 to 20 per cent. below the nunjah produce, as to cause an inability on the part of the merassadars to accede to the average produce in their lands, a reduction of their warum equal to 10 per cent. should be made in the actual or estimated produce of their lands, and then a settlement formed with them on the basis of actual or estimated produce, and the commutation prices adopted for the district in which villages thus circumstanced may be situated, should be made with the merassadars.

8. Where the calamities of drought or inundation shall, on full and sufficient proof, appear to have fallen, it will be proper to ascertain the produce of the lands in the present year, and to establish on them a temporary rent, formed on the produce accounts and the warum, and commutation rates, allotted to the districts where the temporary plan may be necessary.

9. In carrying the above arrangements into execution, you will inform the inhabitants that they are entirely temporary, and you will assure them, that they are not to expect (in the two first cases) any future departure from the plan of management which has been adopted, except on the very best grounds, it being the intention that the amount assessable on each field shall be clearly defined and made known before the season of cultivation; and that the person asserting a merassy right in it, will be chargeable with such amount, whenever the land may be brought under cultivation, without adverting to its produce.

I have the honour to be, Sir,

18. The villages of each talook have been divided into three classes, and each village has been included in one or other of these classes, according to its distance from, or contiguity to, market towns, and consequent difficulty or facility of its grain meeting with a sale.

19. The same proportion of marah, or fees in kind, which has prevailed for a long period back in each village, has been admitted in the present assessment, with the exception of the marah of monigars and curmums of villages, which was assumed by my predecessor. In the Chittoor assumed pollums, however, it is still continued; and it may become the subject of a future letter, whether it would be expedient to restore the marah in the other districts, or grant some compensation in money to those who have been deprived of it. Statement No. 3. explains the proportion of marah in each district.

20. It is now necessary to point out the proportion which the present rate of assessment (Fusly 1215) bears to the assessment established by my predecessor in Fusly 1213. With this view is drawn out the accompanying Statement No. 4. It is here assumed, for the sake of comparing the rates of assessment, that the extent of cultivation in the two years was the same; that is, the account of cultivation for Fusly 1215, is adopted for the two Fuslies. This statement results from a comparison on each field; that is, the number of goontahs, or cawnies, which the curmums reported each field to contain in Fusly 1213, and the assessment it then bore, are contrasted with the actual extent according to measurement, and the amount of rent fixed, by inspection of the quality of the soil.

21. Where fields were cultivated in Fusly 1215, which were waste in 1213, the curmums accounts of measurement, and the average rent of the whole of the lands in the village, which was the rent fixed by my predecessor for waste lands, are taken to compare with Fusly 1215.

22. It appears that the average rent of nunjah and punjah lands was higher in Fusly 1213 than in 1215, but that the garden lands bear a heavier assessment in the latter, than in the former year; that notwithstanding the decrease in the rate of assessment in 1215, there is a net increase, in the same reputed extent of land, of star pagodas 7,162.32.23. in 1215, above 1213, in consequence of lands to the value of star pagodas 32,332.24.12. (according to the present rate of assessment) being brought to light by measurement, which were not registered by the curmums in Fusly 1213.

23. It may be objected, however, to this mode of comparison, that though the lands now brought forward by measurement were not registered by the curmums, the ryots were yet in the actual possession, and enjoyed the produce of them; whilst, in forming the average of Fusly 1213, they are not considered as belonging to them.

24. I have therefore drawn out another Statement, No. 5, in which the number of unregistered cawnies, discovered by measurement, are added to the number of cawnies acknowledged by the curmums in Fusly 1213. To the aggregate of those two numbers, is applied the aggregate amount rent of Fusly 1213; and the average is deducted therefrom.

25. This causes the average assessment in most talooks to be somewhat higher in Fusly 1215; but I do not conceive that it falls heavier on the country, as it bears a better proportion to the value of each man's land than that of 1213, and is, on the whole, therefore, more regular and equal.

26. It is nevertheless by no means improbable, that many lands have been over-rated in quality; but all such inequalities shall, if possible, be corrected in the course of this year.

27. On the subject of the survey, it is only requisite to add further, that the expense of it has been very considerably exceeded by the amount of rent of the concealed lands which it has brought to light.

Extract Letter from the Collector of Zilla Chingleput; dated 12th July 1804.

ALTHOUGH my state of health has not permitted me to report to the Board on several subjects which require to be brought under their consideration, I am desirous, as the Fusly year has expired, of communicating to them the result in abstract of the survey of the district of Sativaid, and the introduction of individual rents into that district; hoping that the board will be satisfied with the abstract till such period as it may be in my power to detail the principles of the survey, and of the rent.

The board are in the knowledge that the district of Sativaid was under aumanie in the last year, a mode of management, which although in general inadvisable, became expedient for that district, where the poverty of the people was extreme, and their want of confidence great; evils which required to be remedied previously to introducing money rents among them. An immediate and early division of the crop to the full extent of their manool warum secured their confidence, while a patient explanation of the principles which I intended to establish for the Fusly which has expired, secured their concurrence in the plan I had formed for establishing a defined system of rent, founded on the basis of individual interest.

Extract Letter from the Collector of Zilla Chingleput; 12 July 1804.

In consequence of the foregoing arrangements, and the completion of the survey, land to the following extent was, at the commencement of the season, voluntarily taken in farm by the cultivators, and held under

It will occur to the board, that although the moderate value which may be supposed to be set on the land, and the nature of the settlement, may require that the rents of all land actually engaged for, should be paid, that it is not advisable, at least on the first introduction of this system while the resources of the people are contracted, to insist on the strict performance of their engagements. In conformity to a previous promise, therefore, that no man should pay for land he had not cultivated, I compared, after the season of cultivation had passed, the account of land originally occupied, with the account of land actually cultivated; and finding that in consequence of the river which runs by Peddapollam not coming down, that the finest villages had been deprived of their usual supply of water, and that no exertions of industry had been wanting where other deficiencies of cultivation had occurred; the following deductions were in consequence made:

Garden land d°	-	-	-	-	1,360

On the other hand, in some villages where the inhabitants found the season would permit of an extended occupation of land, they engaged for the following additional number of cawnies:

The value of the land originally farmed being cawnies 15,557, stands valued on the books of the survey at the sum of - S^r pag^a 14,781 5 70 and the value of the difference between the land engaged for, and the quantity cultivated, being cawnies 1,671, was, by the same valuation - 1,238 10 8

Leaving the jumma of the land revenue of Fusly 1213, at the sum of - S^r pag^a 13,542 41 62

The comparison of the jumma above stated, with the aumanie collections of last year, will stand as follows:

The collections on account of Fusly 1212 in that year, and in the subsequent year, was - Star pagodas 10,920 22 20

Deduct road duties, not collected under the present regulations - 905 30 73

If the preceding result shall prove satisfactory to the board, I have much pleasure in assuring them it has been satisfactory to the people also; for having invited representations from those who might experience any difficulty from an inequality of assessment, or other cause, I only received one complaint, and that from a ryot who had taken 5 cawnies of land, but whose only pair of bullocks dying at the season of cultivation, had rendered him unable to fulfil his agreement; while the readiness and punctuality with which the amount of the jumma has been realized, is, I hope, evidence of their ability to pay it.

Principal Collector of CEDED DISTRICTS to Board of Revenue, on the survey of that country; dated 30th November 1806—&c. &c.

Gentlemen,

Para. 1. THE survey of the Ceded Districts being now completed, it becomes my duty to report to the board the manner in which it has been conducted; the result of it, in exhibiting the extent and assessment of all the various descriptions of land in the country, whether cultivated or waste; and the expense with which it has been attended, from its beginning to its conclusion.

2. It was begun in June 1802, by four gomastahs of my cutcherry, who were at that time, the only persons in the Ceded Districts who understood land measuring. It proceeded very slowly at first, from the want of hands; but several of the inhabitants being instructed every month, the number of surveyors, by the end of the year amounted to fifty, and was in the course of the following one, augmented to a hundred. The surveyors were at first formed into parties of six, but afterwards of ten, to each of which a head surveyor or inspector was appointed. With the exception of hills and rocks, all land, of whatever kind, was measured. All roads, sites of towns and villages, beds of tanks and rivers, wastes and jungles, were included in the survey. Ancient wastes were usually measured in extensive lots to be subdivided hereafter, as they may be occupied; but when it could be conveniently done, they were also frequently divided into fields of the ordinary size. As all fields that have ever been cultivated have names, they were distinguished in the survey registers by these names, and also, by a particular number, affixed to each, in the order in which it was measured. The surveyors used every where the same standard measure, a chain of thirty-three feet; forty of which, made an acre. They were paid by the acre at such a rate as it was supposed would enable them, with diligence, to earn about six pagodas monthly. They were encouraged to be expeditious, by the hope of gain; and deterred, at the same time, from being inaccurate through haste, by the fear of dismission; for no false measurement beyond ten per cent. in dry land, and five per cent. in wet, whether proceeding from negligence, from haste or design, was ever excused; and the frequent instances of loss of employment in this account, that occurred during the early part of the survey, soon rendered the surveyors so cautious, that their measurement was afterwards in general sufficiently correct. The vacancies that were continually happening among them from dismission, and more frequently from sickness, were at all times easily filled up from among a number of persons who always attended them, with the view of being instructed and employed; but these persons, on being appointed, were, in order to guard against partiality, sent to the party of a head surveyor, different from that by whom they had been reported as qualified.

3. The head surveyors, or inspectors, examined the measurement of the surveyors placed under their charge. They were paid by the month. To have paid them by the acre, would have defeated the end of their appointment, by preventing them from examining carefully and deliberately, the operations of the under surveyors. But to guard against remissness, and to leave them at the same time sufficient leisure for investigation, they were required to measure monthly one tenth of the quantity of land fixed for a surveyor. They were not permitted to make this measurement all at once, in the course of a few days; but were obliged to make it gradually and uniformly, throughout the month, by taking a few fields every day. The whole of the inspectors were frequently removed from one party to another, because by remaining too long with one party, they were apt to entertain partialities and enmities, and to pass over the false measurement of some surveyors, while they exaggerated the trifling errors of others; and for these causes, many inspectors were at different times, dismissed. Both inspectors and surveyors were at first allowed a share of the produce of all extra collections, and unauthorized enaums, which they brought to light; but as they often earned more in this way, than by the survey, and with less labour, it was soon found that the survey was impeded by these investigations, and it therefore became necessary to confine them to the single object of measuring the land.

4. The surveyors were followed by assessors, two of whom were allotted for the assessment of the land measured by each party of ten surveyors. The assessor, on arriving in a village, went over the land with the potail curnum and ryots, both wet and dry, had from classes, according to its quality. In all villages, the land, both wet and dry, had from ancient custom been divided into 1st, 2d, and 3rd sorts, agreeably to their supposed respective produce; but these divisions not being sufficiently minute for a permanent assessment, the classes of wet land in a village, were often increased to five or six, and those of dry, to eight or ten. The classification was made rather by the potail curnum and ryots than by the assessor; for he adopted their opinion, unless he saw evident cause to believe that it was wrong, when a reference was made to the head ryots of any of the neighbouring villages, who fixed the class to which the land in dispute should belong. The quality of the land, where all other circumstances were equal, determined its class; but allowance was made for distance from the village, and every other incident by which the expense of cultivation was augmented. The ryots were directed to be careful in classing the land, as the whole of any one class would be assessed at the same rate; but they were not told what that rate would be, because it was apprehended that they would be induced by

REPORTS of Collectors, on Surveys and Assessments.

Principal Collector of Ceded Districts to the Board of Revenue; dated 26 July 1807.

by such information, to enter a great deal of the better sort of land in the inferior classes. It was discovered, however, after a trial of a few months, that by following this mode, the potails and ryots, not seeing immediately the effects of classification, were not sufficiently impressed with its importance, and sometimes by entering too much land in the higher classes, and sometimes in the lower, the assessment of some villages became more than they could possibly pay, and that of others, much less than they had ever paid before. To obviate this mischief, the lands were both classed and assessed, at the same time, by which means, the ryots perceiving at once the effect of classification in raising or lowering their own individual rents, felt the necessity of making it with care. After this principle was adopted, the classification was in general sufficiently accurate, except that, in some instances the land of potails curnums, and a few head ryots, were inserted in too low a class. These irregularities, however, were usually corrected, either on the spot by the assessor, with the advice of the ryots of the adjacent villages, or afterwards, by persons appointed to revise his assessment.

5. As the assessors did not always rectify fraudulent classification, but sometimes remained ignorant of it, from negligence, or connived at it, from bribery; and as it was impossible to ensure from so many individuals, a punctual observance of the same method of proceeding, it was thought advisable, for the sake of preserving uniformity, and of checking abuses, to appoint five head assessors selected from the most intelligent of the ordinary assessors. Each head assessor had four ordinary ones, under him; his business was particularly to the classification of the lands of such persons, as he suspected might have been favoured by the assessors; and where he was convinced, both from his own opinion and that of the principal ryots of the neighbouring villages, that partiality had been shown, he transferred such lands to higher classes; and in the same manner, when he found that the lands of any ryots were classed too high, he removed them to their proper classes. If he saw no occasion for changing land from one class to another, he examined whether whole classes were not assessed too high or low, and raised or depressed them to different rates, wherever it appeared that an alteration was necessary; but he was not permitted to make any alterations in the accounts of the ordinary assessor: such alterations as he thought requisite were entered in those accounts, in columns left for that purpose; so that when the settlement came to be finally made in the collector's cutcherry, all alterations might be seen, and the reasons examined, upon which they were grounded. As an interval of one or two months usually elapsed between the investigation of the ordinary assessor, and that of the head one, there was full time for every ryot to ascertain, whether his own land was properly classed: and if he thought that it was not, he had an opportunity of stating his objections to him on his arrival in the village; and as the ryots of all the neighbouring villages were assembled, the head assessor, by means of arbitrators from among them, easily determined all complaints of this nature.

6. If entire dependence could have been placed on the judgment and impartiality of the head assessors, nothing more would have been required in fixing the assessment than to have adopted their estimates; but as these estimates were sometimes incorrect, and as they would have been still more so, had the assessors been relieved from the fear of a future examination, the whole of the classification and assessment underwent a complete investigation in the collector's cutcherry. On this occasion, all the potails, curnums, and principal ryots of every village in the district to be settled, were assembled at the cutcherry. The business was begun by fixing the sum which was to be the total revenue of the district. This was usually effected by the collector in a few days, by comparing the collections under the native princes, under the Company's government from its commencement, the estimates of the ordinary and head assessors, and the opinions of the most intelligent natives; and, after a due consideration of the whole, adopting such a sum as it was thought would be the fair assessment of the district, in its present state, or what the inhabitants, in similar circumstances, under a native government, would have regarded as somewhat below the usual standard. The amount fixed by the collector, was usually from five to fifteen per cent. lower than the estimates of the assessors; for it is the nature of assessment, proceeding from single fields, to whole districts, and taking each field at its supposed average produce, to make the aggregate sum greater than what can be easily realized. After fixing a certain sum for the districts, it next remained to determine what share of this sum, was to be imposed on each village. Had the detailed assessment been perfectly correct, it might have been done at once, by an uniform remission of 5 or 10 per cent. to every field; but as this was always objected to by many of the inhabitants, who thought their lands were not so favourably assessed as those of their neighbours, either in the same or other villages, it therefore became necessary to examine again the assessment of every village: such villages as claimed more than the average remission, were investigated by the principal ryots of other villages; and the extra remission thus granted to one set of villages, was to be deducted from another; and what proportion of the whole remission was to be allowed to each village, it still was necessary to ascertain whether, or not, any alteration was requisite in the classification of lands. In some villages where none appeared to be necessary, and where no objections were made, the classification of the head assessor was confirmed, and the rent of each class, and consequently of each field, determined at once, by lowering their assessment by the rate of remission granted to the village. In those villages where complaints were made of the classification, the objections were examined; and if they were allowed to be just by ryots not interested interested in the matter, the necessary alterations were made. Complaints of whole classes being rated too high, or too low, were much more frequent than those of particular fields being entered in a wrong class; because each ryot, knowing the produce of his own and his neighbour's lands, took care to see, where their qualities were equal, that his own were not placed in a higher class by the assessors; but he was not so anxious about the rate at which the class was assessed, as he considered, that whatever it was, it would be as favourable to him as to others. Where some classes were rated too high, or too low, it was usually owing to the potail and curnum of the village contriving to make the assessor under-rate the class which contained most of their own land, and over-rate some other one, composed principally of the land of the inferior ryots. But as the collector's cutcherry always inquired minutely into the assessment of the lands of the leading men in each village, and as the whole district was present at the discussion, and every man ready to prevent another from obtaining an advantage in which he did not himself share, no fraudulent assessment of any consequence could possibly be concealed.

7. The classification and assessment of the land having undergone three several investigations, by the assessor, head assessor, and collector's cutcherry; and all objections having been heard, and admitted when well founded, nothing remained but to ascertain and register the rent of every field. This was an easy operation; for as each class of land had been already rated according to its quality, it was only to calculate the number of acres in the field by 2, 3, or 4 fanams, as the rate of the class might happen to be, to which it belonged. As this was a mere arithmetical process, it was performed by persons hired for the purpose, who were paid at the rate of one and a half cantary fanams, for a hundred fields. They were superintended by two gomastahs from the cutcherry; and when they had made out two copies of the register of fields, one for the collector, and the other for the tehsildar, the survey of the district was closed for the time. It still, however, remained to ascertain by experiment, whether the assessment might not be too high in some cases. In the course of collecting the first year's survey rent, a list was made of such fields as were asserted by the cultivators to be over-rated. Their rent was, at the end of the year, again examined in the presence of the principal inhabitants, and either lowered, or confirmed, as circumstances appeared to require. This was the last operation of the survey; and it usually occasioned a reduction of from one half, to one and a half per cent. on the assessment. The equivalent might easily have been made up from lands which had been under-rated, for the assessment was as often below as above the proper point; but it was thought better, in this case, to make no alterations, lest it should weaken the confidence with which it was wished to impress the inhabitants in the permanency of the survey rent. The final correction above mentioned has been made in all the districts which were settled by the survey rent in 1215; but in those districts where the survey rent was not established till 1216, and in those where it will not be introduced till 1217, the correction cannot be effected until 1217 in the one case, or until 1218 in the other. It will occasion a decrease of about ten thousand (10,000) pagodas, in the total assessment of the land inserted in the statement. The mode of measuring and assessing the land has been explained at so much length, that it can hardly be necessary to say more upon the subject; but should any further information be required, it will be more easily gathered from the accompanying copies (Nos 1, 2, 3, 4.) of Instructions to surveyors and assessors, than from any description whatever.

8. The accompanying statement, No 5, contains an abstract of every thing that seems to be necessary in an agricultural survey. It shows the population, the number of cattle and sheep, and the extent and value of all land, cultivated and waste, and though unavoidably somewhat long, it is so plain, that it may be easily understood from the slightest inspection; and I shall, therefore, have occasion to make only a few remarks upon the principal heads.

9. When I transmitted to the Board, on the 24th August 1802, an abstract of the population of the country, I was convinced that it was greatly under-rated; but I took no immediate measures to ascertain the fact; because I was aware that the inhabitants at that time, would have suspected that the inquiry was instituted merely with the view of introducing a general capitation tax, and would have endeavoured as much as possible, to suppress information. But as I knew that whatever apprehensions they might formerly have entertained on this point, had been dispelled by the abolition of many old taxes within the last four or five years, and by the limitation of the land rent by the survey, I thought the conclusion of the survey, a proper time for obtaining a more accurate account of the population than had hitherto been done. Instructions were therefore circulated in August last, to make out new returns of the number of inhabitants in every village, founded, as far as it might be practicable, upon actual muster, except in the case of those casts who secluded their women from public view. The returns were prepared by the curnums of the different villages, assisted by the potails, from muster where that mode could be adopted; and where it could not, as among Mussulmen, or of their neighbours. The paper, No 7, has been drawn up from these returns, and probably exhibits as accurate a statement of the population of an extensive province, as can in general be procured in any other part of the world. The total number of inhabitants is 1,917,376, which is 689,263 more than the return of 1802; a part of this excess, perhaps one fourth, arises from the increase of population during a period of five years of tranquillity, a small part is also owing to the return of inhabitants who had emigrated under the Nizam's government; but the remainder must be attributed to the falsity of the former returns. There is every reason to believe that the total is rather below than above the actual population, for the number of females ought ought to be greater. It is according to the statement, one tenth less than that of males; but if the same proportions exist here as in Europe, the difference cannot be more than one in a hundred; and the whole number of inhabitants would, upon this principle, be 2,014,294. It should, however, be observed, that it is a general opinion among the inhabitants that the number of males is actually always one tenth greater than that of females. I was at first inclined to believe, that the difference might have arisen from the seclusion of females; but it is not particularly great among those castes who follow this practice, but extends to every caste, and every district. I examined the details of several villages in different parts of the country, and though in one village the females were more numerous than the males, and in a few others, nearly equal in number to them; yet the average result was the same as in whole districts. The coincidence of so many unconnected accounts is certainly a strong argument in favour of the popular notion, of males being one tenth more numerous than females.

10. Accounts were also taken in the course of the last Fusly of the number of cattle and sheep in the country, but they cannot be expected to be so accurate, as those of the population; not only because the owners are averse to giving true reports, but because herds and flocks move frequently from one part of the country to another for the sake of pasture, and many herds are almost wild; and their numbers must therefore be taken, upon the word of their keepers. After making allowance, however, for these obstacles, the actual does not, I imagine, exceed the estimated numbers of cattle and sheep above one tenth, or at most one eighth. The number of black cattle is 1,198,613; and that of buffaloes, 493,906; although a considerable proportion of both perished during the severe droughts of 1212 and 1213, the stock of both has increased within the last five years.

11. The number of sheep, according to the returns, is 1,147,492, and of goats 694,633. The actual number of both is probably one-eighth more, because from their being kept chiefly in the fields or jungle, and from the owners having a superstitious prejudice against their being counted by others, or even by themselves, it is more difficult to obtain correct statements of sheep and goats than of black cattle and buffaloes.

12. The quantity of cirkar land in cultivation, according to the survey, is 3,203,850 acres; of which the assessment or fixed rent is star pagodas, 17,08,115; and the quit and extra rent S. Pag. 1,44,840; in all, S. Pag. 18,52,955. (N^o 5.) The cultivation in the state-ment, is not that of any one year, but of several; that of each district is entered for the year in which its survey was made, from 1213 to 1216: but as the best cultivated districts were first surveyed, and afterwards those in which the greatest increase has taken place, the total may be considered, as the average cultivation of ordinary years. It is exceeded only by the cultivation of Fusly 1215. The various products from which the land rent is drawn, and the proportions of each, are shown in the statement N^o 8. It was made out in 1211, since which period, the proportions of some of the more valuable articles, as indigo and sugar, have greatly augmented. Indigo to the value of star pagodas 1,05,000, paid duty in 1215; and it is supposed that the export to the Carnatic, for which no duty was paid, was equal to star pagodas, 20,000. The quantity would have been nearly doubled in 1216, had not the crops been destroyed by the drought. The coarse sugar, or jaggery, of these articles, is occasioned by the addition of an extra land-rent, amounting to twice or three times the ordinary rate, to which all land employed in their culture was subjected; and this increase is likely to go on progressively, as the demand for them is great. Cotton, one of the chief products of the Ceded Districts, has not increased in a similar degree, because the demand for it is not greater than usual, and because, from its being a common article of cultivation, and never having paid more than the ordinary land-rent, it has obtained no advantage, from the equalization of rent by the survey. Its estimated produce in Fusly 1215, is shown in the statement N^o 9, which was last year transmitted to the board of trade. This produce is not likely to increase, in a greater rate than the general cultivation of the country, because cotton is hardly more profitable than grain to the ryots. But should any considerable supply be required for the Company's investment, the rise in the price which must in consequence take place, will occasion a greater quantity to be grown upon the land now occupied. The augmentation, however, will not be so great as might be expected, because it will be limited by the more substantial ryots being seldom being able to raise it at all. This does not proceed from any particular difficulty of expense attending the cultivation, but from the necessity of raising, in the first place, grain for themselves, and straw for their cattle; and from their rarely, after providing these articles, having the means of raising any thing else; so that not one fifth of the cotton land now in cultivation is employed in rearing that article.

13. The waste land is the great source from which an additional supply of cotton may be obtained; but this can only be effected, by lowering the present assessment. A reduction of 25 per cent. would, in the course of ten or fifteen years, bring into cultivation from a million to a million and a quarter of acres; and cotton could be grown to any extent that could possibly be required. The price would rise at first, by the purchase for the investment, but it would fall again to the ordinary standard, whenever the increased produce bore the same proportion to the increased demand, as the present produce to the present demand. The time which might be required for the price to fall, would depend upon the quantity of cotton which might be wanted for the investment, but it could hardly exceed eight or ten years; because more additional cotton might be raised within that period, than the investment could demand. The waste which has been in cultivation within the last twenty years, amounts to 2,133,363 acres; and that which has either not been cultivated within that time, or never, amounts to 4,129,953 acres, making in all above six million of acres, of which about one sixth is fit for cotton.

14. The total enaum land in the Ceded Districts, contains 2,599,747 acres, of which the estimated rent is star pagodas 12,35,458; about six tenths ($\frac{6}{10}$) of the whole is waste. The land held by Bramins under the denomination of Dhirmadey (Statement N^o 6.) is chiefly cultivated by ryots, who seldom pay the enaumdar more than a fourth or a fifth of the rent. In many villages, these enaums are divided among the ryots, who allow the enaumdar only a small quit rent, and regard the rest as their own, from long possession. The enaums of potails and curnums amount to 64,701,138 acres, of which, the estimated rent is star pagodas, 3,02,587. 21. 33.; about four fifths of the whole are cultivated. These enaums are in many villages, thirty or forty per cent. of the revenue, but in others, not more than two or three per cent. In general, all above five per cent. may be regarded as unauthorized. The frequent changes of government, and the loss or rather concealment of accounts, at the during a long course of years, facilitated the fraudulent extension of these enaums, to the expense of the cirkar lands. Many additions have in this manner, been made to them under the Company's government, and even at the moment of the survey, as it was feared that no opportunity might afterwards offer, for such practices. In some cases, a portion of these extra enaums arises from grants for building small forts or digging wells, for public use. In others, they pay a quit rent; but they ought all to be examined hereafter, and be subjected, where excessive, to resumption or assessment. The whole of the cirkar and enaum land capable of cultivation, amounts to twelve million and sixty-six thousand and nine hundred and twenty-three acres (12,066,923) of which the rent, as fixed by the survey, is star pagodas 39,54,417.

15. The last description of land in the statement, is what is called Purrapoke. It comprehends all land that is utterly unproductive; sites of towns and villages; beds of rivers, and in some cases of tanks, roads, and extensive tracts of rocky and stoney ground where no plough can ever go.

16. I reckoned at the commencement of the survey, that it might be finished in four years, and that the expense would be about four per cent. of the revenue of one year. The average revenue has been about sixteen lacs of pagodas, which, at four per cent. gives 64,000 pagodas. But the survey has already cost 80,000 pag^a, and will cost about 3,000 more. This increase, is occasioned by its having occupied nearly five years instead of four, owing to my attention having been partly diverted from it, to the business of supplies, while the army was in the field, and to its having been necessary to survey, a second time, a great part of the lands on the banks of rivers, in order to ascertain how much of them had been carried away, by the inundation in October 1801.

I have the honour to be, Gentlemen,
Your most obedient and humble servant,

No. 1.—Instructions to Surveyors.

1. ALL your measurements, of every description of land, wet and dry, are to be made with a chain of thirty-three feet.
2. Your accounts are to be kept in acres, goontas, and anas. One square chain is one goonta, and forty such goontas, are one acre.
3. When you arrive in a village, you will, previously to beginning the measurement, take a muchulka from the potail and curnum, according to the form which has been delivered to you.—N. B. This form states, that the curnum's account of cirkar and enaum land, house and shop tax, and every article of revenue, is true; and that if it is found to be false in any point, he will forfeit his office.
4. The curnum and potail of the village must attend you, during the measurement; and you must give timely notice to the ryots, in order that they may be present at the measurement of their own fields.
5. In measuring a village, you will begin at one side, and proceed regularly, on marking the field first measured No. 1, the next No. 2, &c. These numbers, will serve to distinguish the fields, when there are several of the same name in one village. After measuring the dry fields, you will measure the wet land, and number the fields in the same manner, beginning again at No. 1; 2, &c.; and the same rule must be observed, with respect to baghayet or garden land.
6. The name of every field, must be entered in your accounts. Where fields, whether cultivated, uncultivated, or waste, have a name, you will insert that name: where they have none, you will, in concert with the potail and curnum, give them one.
7. In the account of the measurement of every field, whether wet or dry, you will always specify the names and numbers of the fields by which it is bounded.
8. In dividing fields of red land, you will mark the division by a bank of earth or stones; but in black land, you will always mark the division by setting up boundary stones; because the polli or bank of earth would injure the black land, by over-running it with long rooted grass.

9. You will pay the hire of the coolies employed, in marking boundaries, either by stones or banks of earth.
10. If a field, not being larger than may be cultivated by one plough, is ploughed in part only, and the rest waste, you will not divide it, but measure it as one field.
11. If a field is too large to be cultivated by one plough, you will divide it into two or three fields, as may be necessary. As the extent of land cultivable by one plough depends upon the nature of the soil, you will be guided by the custom of the village, and the opinion of the potail, curnum, and principal ryots, in regulating the size of fields.
12. In the measurement of dry land, you will class black and red land separately.
