FIFTH REPORT

FROM THE

SELECT COMMITTEE

ON THE

Affairs of The EAST INDIA Company

The SELECT COMMITTEE appointed to enquire into the present State of the Affairs of The East India Company, and to report the same, as it shall appear to them, with their Observations thereupon, to the House;—HAVE, pursuant to the Order of the House, examined the Matters to them referred; and have agreed upon the following REPORT:

YOUR Committee, having in their former Reports adverted to the extensive establishments for the internal administration of India, as bearing with considerable weight upon the Revenue, and having in a great degree, contributed to affect the expectations formed of an abundant surplus, have felt it a part of their duty to offer some account of the nature and history of those Establishments, and of the circumstances under which they have been augmented to their present scale; trusting that such an account will be acceptable to the House, not only as shewing the importance and utility of the establishments themselves, to the welfare and order of the country, but as evincing the unremitting anxiety that has influenced the efforts of those to whom the government of our Indian possessions has been consigned, to establish a system of administration best calculated to promote the confidence and conciliate the feelings of the native inhabitants, not less by a respect for their own institutions, than by the endeavour gradually to engraft upon them such improvements, as might shield, under the safeguard of equal law, every class of the people from the oppressions of power, and communicate to them that sense of protection and assurance of justice, which is the efficient spring of all public prosperity and happiness.

These establishments divide themselves into, Political, Military, Revenue, and Judicial. The Political Establishments appear to be sufficiently described by the regulations in the act of 1793, to supersede the necessity of entering into any detailed discussion, on the subject of them: while the nature of those in the Military Department, as well as the causes of their increase, have been explained in the Second Report of this Committee. It is therefore the intention of your Committee

FIFTH REPORT from the Select Committee on the Committee at present, exclusively to confine themselves to the establishments connected with the Revenue and Judicial Departments of the service.

Your Committee will in the first place, submit to the attention of the House those under the BENGAL PRESIDENCY; and, for the sake of greater distinctness, propose to divide their Report on this branch of the general subject, into the three following heads:

Ist.—A Summary of the different systems introduced for the management of the Revenues, and the administration of justice in the East India Company's territorial possessions, noting the successive modifications, they have undergone since the acquisition of the Dewanny in 1765 to the year 1786, when the affairs of British India having been under the view of Parliament, the Directors, in conformity to the requisitions of the act of 1784, transmitted orders to the supreme government in India for enquiry to be made into the condition of the landholders and other inhabitants residing under their authority, and for the establishment of permanent rules for the settlement and collection of the revenue and the administration of justice, founded on the ancient laws and local usages of the country.

II^d.—The Measures pursued in consequence of the foregoing orders, which led to a settlement of the land revenue in perpetuity, and to a code of regulations for the guidance of the courts of justice, formed and established during the government of the late Marquis Cornwallis.

III^d.—An Inquiry into the practical effects of the revenue and judicial systems established by the Marquis Cornwallis, in order to ascertain whether they have in any respects, proved inadequate or defective; whether means have been used to remedy those defects and supply those deficiencies; and whether any, and if any, what further measures may appear necessary for the accomplishment of the professed objects both of the Company and the Legislature, in respect to the subjects of our Indian Empire.

I.

ANTECEDENT TO 1784.

THE Dewanny authority over the provinces of Bengal, Bahar and Orissa, was conferred in perpetuity on the East India Company, by a firman or royal grant in August 1765. The Nawab of Bengal, NUJUM-ool-DOWLAH, had already, as the condition of his succeeding to the musnud, on the decease of his father JAFFIER KHAN, agreed to entrust the administration of the subahdarry to the management of a naib or deputy appointed by the advice of the Governor in Council. By a further agreement, dated 30th September 1765, the Nawab recognized the grant of the Dewanny to the Company, and consented to accept a fixed stipend for the maintenance of himself and his household. Whatever further expense, within certain limits, might be found necessary for the support of the dignity of the nizamat, was to be disbursed through the deputy chosen by the English government.

In the following year, the president of the council of Fort William (Lord Clive) took his place as dewan, or collector of the revenue, for the Mogul, and in concert with the Nawab, who sat as nazim, opened the pooneah, or ceremonial of commencing the annual collections in durbar, held at Moatyghel, near Moorshedabad. From this time, the functions of nazim, as well as of dewan, were ostensibly exercised by the British government, the latter, in virtue of the grant from the Emperor, and the former, through the influence possessed over the naib or deputy; the nawab nazim himself having submitted to become virtually a pensioner of the state.

But though the civil and military power of the country, and the resources for maintaining it, were assumed on the part of the East India Company, it was not thought prudent, either by the local government, or the directors, to vest the immediate immediate management of the revenue, or the administration of justice, in the European servants. It may indeed appear doubtful whether the European servants at this time, generally possessed sufficient knowledge of the civil institutions and the interior state of the country, to qualify them for the trust. A resident at the Nawab's court, who inspected the management of the naib dewan, and the chief of Patna, who superintended the collections of the province of Bahar, under the immediate management of Shetab Roy, maintained an imperfect controul over the civil administration of the districts included in the dewanny grant; while the zemindarry lands of Calcutta, and the 24 pergunnahs, and the ceded districts of Burdwan, Midnapore and Chittagong, which at an earlier period, had been obtained by special grant from the Nawab of Bengal, were superintended by the covenanted servants of the Company.

In 1769, Supervisors were appointed with powers of superintending the native officers employed in collecting the revenue or administering justice, in different parts of the country; and councils with superior authority, were in the following year, established at Moorshedabad and Patna. The Supervisors were furnished with detailed instructions for obtaining a summary history of the provinces; the state, produce, and capacity of the lands; the amount of the revenues; the cesses or arbitrary taxes; and of all demands whatsoever which are made on the cultivators; the manner of collecting them; and the gradual rise of every new impost; the regulations of commerce, and the administration of justice.

The information communicated to the directors in consequence of these enquiries, represent the internal government in a state of disorder, and the people suffering great oppression. These evils were imputed to the nature of the former administration. It is observed that "the Nazims exacted what they could from the zemindars and great farmers of the revenue, whom they left at liberty to plunder all below, reserving to themselves the prerogative of plundering them in their turn, when they were supposed to have enriched themselves with the spoils of the country." The whole system thus resolved itself, on the part of the public officers, into habitual extortion and injustice, which produced on that of the cultivator, the natural consequences, concealment and evasion, by which government was defrauded of a considerable part of its just demands.

With respect to the administration of justice, "the regular course, was every where suspended; but every man exercised it, who had the power of compelling others, to submit to his decisions."

Seven years had elapsed from the acquisition of the Dewanny, without the government deeming itself competent to remedy these defects; when in 1772, authority was conveyed to the president and council of Fort William, which enabled them to introduce a system of reform. This was, the notification of a resolution which the court of directors had come to, "to stand forth as dewan, and by the agency of the Company's servants, to take upon themselves the entire care and management of the revenues."

In pursuance of the orders received on this occasion, the office of naib dewan was abolished, and the efficient administration of the internal government committed to British agency. A committee, consisting of the governor (Mr. Hastings) and four members of the council, proposed a plan for the management of the revenue and the administration of justice in the provinces, and for the regulation and conduct of the public affairs at the presidency.

By the adoption of the plan proposed by the committee, the institutions of the internal government stood as follows:

1st. In the Revenue Department at the Presidency, a board of revenue, consisting of the president and members of council—an accountant general with assistants. The khalsa or exchequer and the treasury were removed from Moorshedabad to Calcutta, to the former of which, native officers were appointed, in number and quality, suitable to the voluminous and important business appertaining to it, which consisted of accounts and correspondence, both in abstract and detail, of every transaction of importance relating to the settlement and collection of the revenue in each district, agreeably to the principles established and forms observed, by the Mahomeddan government. In respect to the provinces vinces, it was resolved, that "the Company having determined to stand forth as "dewan," the supervisors should now be designated collectors, with whom a native officer, chosen by the board, and styled dewan, should be joined in the superintendence of the revenue. With respect to the revenue, a settlement for a term of five years was adopted; and the four junior *members of the committee above mentioned, proceeded on a circuit through the provinces, with powers to carry into execution the purpose of this decision.

2d. Under the regulations framed for the Judicial Department, were instituted two courts for each provincial division or collectorship; "one by the name of "Dewanny or Civil Court, for the cognizance of civil causes; the other named "Foujedary or Criminal Court, for the trial of crimes and misdemeanors." Over the civil court the collector presided, on the part of the Company, in their quality of king's dewan, attended by the provincial native dewan, and the other officers of the collector's court. To this jurisdiction were referred, all disputes concerning property, real or personal; all causes of inheritance, marriage, and cast; all claims of debt, disputed accounts, contracts, partnerships, and demands of rent; but to facilitate the course of justice in trivial cases, all disputes of property not exceeding ten rupees were cognizable by the head farmer of the pergunnah to which the parties belonged, whose decision was to be final. In the criminal court, the cauzy and moofy of the district and two moolavies sat to expound the Mahomeddan law, and to determine how far delinquents were guilty of its violation. But it was the collector's duty to attend to the proceedings of this court, so far as to see that all necessary evidences were summoned and examined, and that the decision passed was fair and impartial. Appeals from these decisions, were allowed to two superior courts established at the chief seat of government; one, under the denomination of Dewanny Sudder Adawlut or Chief Court of Civil Judicature; the other, the Nizamut Sudder Adawlut or Chief Court of Criminal Justice. The former, consisted of the president and members of council, assisted by the native officers of the khalsa or exchequer; and in the latter, a chief officer of justice presided, appointed on the part of the nazim, assisted by the head cauzy and moofy, and three eminent moolavies. These officers were to revise the proceedings of the superior courts; and in capital cases, to prepare the sentence for the warrant of the nazim. Over this court, a controul was vested in the president and council, similar to what was exercised by the collectors in the provinces, in order that the Company's administration, in the character of king's dewan, might be satisfied that justice, so essential to the welfare and safety of the country, was not perverted by partiality or tainted by corruption.

The superintendence and controul over the administration of criminal justice, was by the government particularly entrusted to the president, Mr. HASTINGS; who, at the end of eighteen months, finding the duty too heavy, and the responsibility too dangerous, desired to relinquish his trust; and the court of Nizamut Adawlut was in consequence, removed back to Moorshedabad, and placed under the superintendence of Mahomed Reza Khan, who at the recommendation of the governor and council, was appointed naib nazim. In the course of his and with the concurrence of his council, introduced a new plan of police. The collectors and aumils (or native superintendents) had acted as magistrates; but on the recal of the former, native officers, styled foujedars, were appointed to the fourteen districts or local jurisdictions into which Bengal was divided, with an appropriate number of armed men, for the protection of the inhabitants, the detection and apprehension of public robbers, and for the transmission of intelligence to the presidency, of matters relating to the peace of the country.

The Regulations framed for the guidance of the officers employed in the revenue and judicial departments, which at this time, were printed and promulgated in the languages of the country, manifest a diligence of research, and a desire to improve the condition of the inhabitants, by abolishing many grievous imposts, and prohibiting many injurious practices, which had prevailed under the native government;—and thus, the first important step appears to have been now made, towards those principles of equitable government, which it is presumable the directors always had it in view to establish, and which, in subsequent institutions, have been more successfully accomplished.

But

I.

But the effect of the new arrangements on the department of the revenue, proved less favourable than was expected. The settlement of five years had been concluded under general instructions from the directors, which required that the government "should not, by any sudden change, alter the constitution or "deprive the zemindars, &c. of their ancient privileges and immunities." After due consideration of the different modes which, consistently with these orders, might be adopted, the government gave the preference to the farming system, under which they received offers for each pergunnah, whether made by the landholders, or by speculators and adventurers; and those of the highest bidders were accepted, and engagements entered into with them. At the period this settlement was resorted to, the country was slowly recovering from the effects of a dreadful famine, which desolated the country, and destroyed one third of its population. Whether, owing to the bidders at the settlement having been inattentive to this circumstance, or imprudently led on by the eagerness of competition, to make higher offers than the country could bear, many of them soon failed in the performance of their engagements, and defalcations in realizing the revenue under the five years settlement, occurred to a considerable amount. The little success that attended this settlement, combined with other motives, induced a change of system in 1774, and the European collectors were recalled from the provinces, and Native aumils substituted in their stead.

The superintendence of the collections was now vested in provincial councils, established for the six principal districts into which the country was divided, and stationed at Calcutta, Burdwan, Dacca, Moorshedabad, Dinagepore, and Patna.

The administration of civil justice which had been entrusted to the collector, was on the same principle, transferred to the aumil, from whom an appeal, in all cases, lay to the provincial council of the division in which he was posted; and from the provincial council, an appeal lay, under certain restrictions, to the sudder dewanny court, or the governor in council. The police, which had been entrusted to the collectors, was vested in native officers styled foujedars, appointed by the naib nazim, whose functions and office in the department of criminal justice, were now revived at Moorshedabad.

The foregoing arrangement for the administration of justice continued in force, without any material alteration, until the year 1780. But in the department of the revenue, when the settlement which had been made in 1772 for five years, approached its termination, preparations became necessary, for the formation of a new one. On this occasion, the governor, general observed, "in what"ever manner it may be hereafter determined to form the new settlement of the "province, after the expiration of the present leases, it will be equally necessary, "to be previously furnished with the accurate states of the real nature of the "land, as the grounds on which it is to be formed. To obtain these, will be the "work of much official knowledge, much management, and unremitting labour,
"in compiling and collecting the accounts of the past collections, in digesting
"the materials which may be furnished by the provincial councils and dewans,
"in issuing orders for special accounts, and other materials of information, and
"in deputing native officers on occasional investigations." The government accordingly instituted a temporary office for these special purposes. It consisted of three of the most experienced civil servants, armed with authority to select and depute native agents (aumeens) into each district, for the purpose of entering on a minute local scrutiny of the accounts kept in each village, and of whatever else might best enable them, to procure the most exact information of the real produce or value of the lands.

In 1777, the aumeens were required to repair, with the information they had obtained, to each of the provincial councils in succession, to whom orders and instructions were issued for forming a new settlement. The lands, on the former settlement, appear to have been let to the highest bidder, on his producing security for the amount of the rent. A preference was now to be given to the zemindar, if he consented to engage for the amount of the former settlement, or for such an amount, as the provincial council might deem reasonable; and instead of producing security, it was provided by a stipulation to be inserted in his written engagement, that his lands, in case of failure in payment, should be held liable to sale, to realize the outstanding balance.

Permanent Plan for the administration of the revenues, formed the 20th February 1781, by the Governor General and Council, in the Revenue Department.
Colebrooke's Supplement, page 213.

On the same principles, and by the same agency, the settlement of the districts was made annually during the following three years 1778, 1779, and 1780; but the average produce of this period, under European Superintendents, appears to have fallen short of what it had been, when intrusted to native agency. On this account, combined probably with other causes, a change in the management was determined upon by the supreme government; and a new plan accordingly introduced on the 20th of February 1781. The government stated, that the system lately followed had been only meant as an experiment, to lead by a gradual change, to one of more permanency.

By the new plan, the provincial councils were abolished, and all the collections of the provinces proposed to be brought down gradually to the presidency, to be there administered by five of the most able and experienced of the civil servants, under the designation of a Committee of Revenue, "to be under the immediate inspection of, and with the opportunity of instant reference for instruction to, the Governor General in Council." Though the provincial councils were withdrawn, the president of each, was to remain officiating as collector under the committee of revenue, until further orders, as likewise were the collectors who had been separately stationed in some of the frontier and least civilized districts. The native record office, with some modification, was placed under the committee. A commission on the revenue realized, was allowed and distributed among the members of the committee; and the European officers attached to it, who were bound by oath, to restrict themselves to the avowed official allowances.

Immediately after their entrance into office, the committee submitted to the government a plan for the formation of a new settlement of the revenue. The principle on which this proceeded, does not appear essentially to differ from the rules for the settlement before laid down. The preference was to be given to the zemindars in all cases, where they should agree to the amount of the assessment demanded, and where there appeared no valid objection from minority or notorious incapacity, or any other cause. The amount of the assessment, it was presumed, might be fixed on reasonable grounds, from the experience of former years, joined with the information gained by the recent deputation of aumeens. The settlement was to be for one year only, with an assurance that in instances where the revenue was regularly discharged, the same person should have the option of continuance on the same assessment.

To these propositions the government assented, but with the exception of entrusting the formation of the settlement to the collectors and the native agents of government, in all cases where the committee could not execute that service themselves; deeming it an official inconsistency, that he who was to collect under the settlement, should have any part, in the formation of it. The committee was therefore required to make the settlement by deputation on the spot, subject to the final decision of the government, in all cases where they could not themselves conclude it; and they were directed at the same time, to encourage the practice of paying the rents into the khalsa at the presidency, instead of the provincial treasuries.

In the month of November following, the Committee of Revenue reported to the government, the settlement they had made for the current year's revenue throughout the districts of Bengal; those of Bahar had been already settled by the board of revenue, previously to the entrance of the new formed committee on the exercise of their functions. The general rules for their guidance had been observed, and an increase of more than 26 lacks of rupees effected on the former jumma. It was stated that the occupancy of the lands, and the management of the collections, had in general been preserved to the zemindars and talookdars; and where the reverse had taken place, the cause would be found recorded on the official proceedings.

A short time previous to these new arrangements being made in the department of the revenue, an alteration took place in the constitution of the Dewanny Adawlut, by the establishment in each of the six grand provincial divisions, of a court of justice, distinct from and independent of, the revenue council. Over this court, presided a covenanted servant styled Superintendent of dewanny adawlut, whose jurisdiction extended over all claims of inheritance to zemindarries, zemindarries, talookdarries, or other real property or mercantile disputes; all matters of personal property, with the exception of what was reserved to the jurisdiction of the provincial councils, which were to decide as heretofore, on all causes having relation to the public revenue, as well as on all demands of individuals for arrears of rent, and on all complaints from tenants and cultivators, of undue exaction of revenue by the officers of government or others.

These institutions were introduced in April 1780; and in the October following, the attendance in the sudder-dewanny adawlut, having been found incompatible with the other duties of the Governor and Council, it was determined that a separate judge (Sir Elija Impey) should be appointed to the charge and superintendence of that court; and on the 3d November, thirteen articles of regulations, prepared by the judge and approved by government, were passed, for the guidance of the civil courts, which were afterwards incorporated with additions and amendments, in a revised code, comprising ninety-five articles of regulations, the declared objects of which were "the explaining such rules, orders and regulations, as may be ambiguous, and revoking such as may be repugnant or obsolete; to the end that one consistent code be framed therefrom, and one general table of fees established in and throughout the said courts of mofussil-dewanny adawlut, by which a general conformity may be maintained in the proceedings, practice and decisions of the several courts, and that the inhabitants of these countries may not only know to what courts, and on what occasions, they may apply for justice, but seeing the rules, ordinances and regulations, to which the judges are by oath bound invariably to adhere, they may have confidence in the said courts, and may be apprized on what occasions, it may be advisable to appeal from the courts of mofussil-dewanny adawlut to the court of sudder-dewanny adawlut, and knowing the utmost of the costs which may be incurred in their suits, may not, from apprehension of being involved in exorbitant and unforeseen expenses, or of being subjected to frauds or extortion of the officers of the court, be deterred from prosecuting their just claims."

Under these regulations, which were printed with translations in the Persian and Bengal languages, for general information, and which constitute the principal foundation of the rules now in force, relative to the administration of civil justice, all civil causes, as before described, were made cognizable, as heretofore, by distinct courts of dewanny adawlut, which on the 6th April preceding, had been augmented to the number of eighteen, in consequence of inconvenience experienced from the too extensive jurisdiction of the six before instituted. The judges, thus constituted and appointed, were wholly unconnected with the revenue department, except in the four frontier districts of Chittra, Bauglepore, Islamabad and Rungpore, where, for local reasons, the offices of judge and collector were vested in the same person, but with a provision that the judicial authority should be considered, distinct from and independent of, the board of revenue.

On the 6th April 1781, the establishment of foudars and tannadars, introduced in 1774, which had not been found to produce the good effects proposed by its institution, was abolished; and the judges of the court of dewanny adawlut, were invested with the power as magistrates, of apprehending decoits (a species of depredators who infest the country in gangs) and persons charged with the commission of any crime or acts of violence, within their respective jurisdictions. They were not however to try or punish such persons; but were to send them immediately to the daroga of the nearest foudarry, with a charge in writing, setting forth the grounds on which they had been apprehended. Provision was at the same time, made for cases "where, by especial permission of the governor general and council, certain zemindars might be invested with such part of the police jurisdiction as they formerly exercised under the ancient Mogul government." In such cases, the European collector in his capacity of magistrate, the daroga of the nizamat adawlut, and the zemindar, were to exercise a concurrent authority for the apprehension of robbers and all disturbers of the public peace.

The better to enable the government to observe the effects of the regulations thus introduced, and to watch over the general administration of criminal justice throughout the provinces, a separate department was established at the presidency, dency, under the immediate control of the governor general, to which were to be transmitted monthly reports of proceedings, and lists of prisoners apprehended and convicted by the respective authorities throughout the provinces. To arrange these records, and to maintain a check on all persons entrusted with the administration of criminal justice, an officer was appointed to act under the governor general, with the title of Remembrancer of the criminal courts.

In November 1782, in pursuance of instructions from the court of directors, the superintendence of the sudder-dewanny adawlut was resumed by the governor general and council; and it was declared, that, agreeably to the 21st Geo. III. this court was constituted a court of record, and its judgments to be final, except in appeal to the king in civil suits only, the value of which should be £.5,000. and upwards.

Your Committee have brought the foregoing Summary of the different systems of internal arrangement adopted for the East India Company's territorial possessions in Bengal, down to that period, when the state of their affairs was before Parliament, and when by an act of the legislature, the Company were commanded to institute an enquiry into the complaints which had prevailed, "that divers rajahs, zemindars, and other landholders within the British territories in India, had been unjustly deprived of, or compelled to relinquish or abandon their respective lands, or that the rents, tributes, or services required of them had become oppressive." These grievances, if founded on truth, were "to be effectually redressed, and permanent rules established on principles of moderation and justice, by which their rents and tributes should be demanded and collected in future."

Your Committee deem it inexpedient to load the Appendix with the voluminous documents to which they have had occasion to refer. Most of them will be found annexed to the Reports of former Committees of this House; and the substance of most of the remainder, make a part of the institutions and rules still in force, which are to be mentioned in the sequel.

An attentive consideration of the information which these documents afford, has led your Committee to believe, that the administration of the British government proved at an early period of its introduction, beneficial to the natives of India residing under its protection. By the superiority of the British arms they became at once secured from the calamities frequently experienced in successive invasions of the Mahrattas. Internal commotion was by the same cause, entirely prevented; and if their condition has not sooner attained to that state of improvement, which the character of the nation under whose dominion they had fallen, afforded reason to expect, the delay may be satisfactorily accounted for, on grounds of negligence or misconduct. On this subject, your Committee deem the observations of Mr. Shore (now Lord Teignmouth) so applicable, and of so high authority, as to be worthy of quotation from a minute on the proceedings of the government of Bengal, recorded on the 10th February 1790:—"A period of twenty-eight years has now elapsed, since the Company first acquired a right to the revenues of any considerable part of the provinces, and of twenty four years only, since the transfer of the whole in perpetuity, was regularly made, by the grant of the Dewanny. When we consider the nature and magnitude of this acquisition, the characters of the people placed under our dominion, their difference of language and dissimilarity of manners, that we entered upon the administration of the government, ignorant of its former constitution, and with little practical experience in Asiatic finance; it will not be deemed surprising that we should have fallen into errors; or if any should at this time require correction."

"The Mogul dominion, in the best times, and under the wisest princes, was a government of discretion. The safety of the people, the security of their property, and the prosperity of the country, depended upon the personal character of the monarch. By this standard, his delegates regulated their own demeanor; in proportion as he was wise, just, vigilant, and humane, the provincial viceroys discharged their respective trusts, with zeal and fidelity, and as they possessed or wanted the recited qualifications,

"tions, the inferior agents conducted themselves with more or less diligence and honesty. A weak monarch and corrupt minister encouraged and produced every kind of disorder; for there was no law paramount to the sovereign's will. Few of the officers of government were liberally paid; and property was left to accumulate, from breach of trust, abused patronage, perverted justice, or unrestrained oppression. This description, I conceive to be applicable to all Mahomeddan governments, where practice is for ever in opposition to theory of morals, and a few remarkable instances of distinguished virtue or forbearance form exceptions, which deduct little from the universality of the remark."

"Long before our acquisition of the Dewanny, the vigour of the empire had been irrevocably weakened; and its institutions, as far as they can be traced in the ordinances and practice of its best princes, had been violated. The agents of the Company, when they obtained the grant, had no other guide for their instruction than the measures of a provincial administration, which had assumed an independency of the empire, and had long ceased to act according to its laws."

"If we further consider the form of the British government in India, we shall find it ill calculated for the speedy introduction of improvement. The members composing it, are in a constant state of fluctuation; and the period of their residence often expires, before experience can be acquired or reduced to practice. Official forms necessarily occupy a large portion of time, and the constant pressure of business leaves little leisure for study and reflection, without which, no knowledge of the principles and detail of the revenues of this country can be obtained. True information is also procured with difficulty; because it is too often derived from mere practice, instead of being deduced from fixed principles. Every man who has long been employed in the management of the revenues of Bengal, will, if candid, allow, that his opinion on many important points has been often varied, and that the information of one year, has been rendered dubious by the experience, of another; still in all cases, decision is necessary; and hence precedents, formed on partial circumstances, and perhaps on erroneous principles, become established rules of conduct; for a prudent man, when doubtful, will be happy to avail himself of the authority of example. The multiplication of records, which ought to be a great advantage, is in fact, an inconvenience of extensive magnitude; for in them, only the experience of others can be traced, and reference requires much time and labour."

Your Committee have no reason to suppose, that the intricacy of the subject which the Company's agents had to make themselves acquainted with, is overrated in the foregoing passage, or that in framing new rules of government, and introducing reforms of the rules already in force, the risk of committing error was less, than the author of that passage has stated; but from what is to be observed in the correspondence from home, and on the records abroad, your Committee entertain a confident belief that from time to time, important measures were recommended, and successfully introduced, for the improvement of the internal government, and the amelioration of the condition of the inhabitants at large. The information drawn from the Reports of the Supervisors appointed in 1769, and of the Court of Circuit in 1772, developed the errors of a false and injurious policy, which had prevailed under the native government, as well as practices of pernicious tendency which had crept into the administration of it, subsequently to the subversion of the Mogul dominion. The principal of these, as they affected the department of the revenue, appear to have been noticed and abolished, in the regulations passed upon the formation of the five years settlement. By the rules then established, all nuzzers or salamies (free gifts) which had been usually presented on the first interview, as marks of subjection and respect, were required to be totally discontinued, not only to the superior servants of the Company and the collectors, but to the zemindars and other officers; new taxes, under any pretence whatever, were prohibited; the revenue officers were forbidden to hold farms, under pain of dismissal; zemindarry barriers, erected for the collection of road duties, were abolished, and such only continued, as belonged to the collection of the established revenue. This regulation, as far as related to the unavowed emoluments of the Company's servants, and others, does not appear to have been effectual.

7th Report of Committee of Secrecy, 1773.

With respect to the civil judicature at this time, it may be observed, that although the institutions and rules for this department were framed by persons who had not the advantage of professional experience, the improvement introduced into the system which had prevailed under the native government cannot but be evident, on reference to a description of the latter, which is given in the Report of a former Committee of this House, in the following words: that "so far as the Committee were able to judge from all the information laid before them, the subjects of the Mogul empire in that province derived little protection or security from any of these courts of adawlut; and in general, though forms of judicature were established and preserved, the despotic principles of the government rendered them the instruments of power rather than of justice, not only unavailing to protect the people, but often the means of the most grievous oppressions under the cloak of the judicial character." The Committee further stated it to be the general sense of all the accounts they had received respecting these courts, "that the administration of justice during the vigour of the ancient constitution was liable to great abuse and oppression, that the judges generally lay under the influence of interest, and often under that of corruption; and that the interposition of government, from motives of favour and displeasure, was another frequent cause of the perversion of justice."

The custom of levying as commission, the fourth part of the value decreed, as well as all other similar fees, on the decision of suits, and all arbitrary fines, were for ever abolished; the legal distinctions in favour of Mahomeddians and prejudicial to the Hindoos, were no longer to be attended to; and it was provided, that in all suits regarding marriage, cast, and all other religious usages or institutions, the laws of the koran with respect to Mahomeddians, and those of the shaster with respect to Hindoos, should be invariably adhered to. On all such occasions, the Moolavy or Brahmin, respectively attended to expound the law, to sign the report, and to assist in passing the decree. The rules subsequently introduced in 1781 had the advantage of being framed by professional talents, and, as before observed, are the foundation of those still in use.

In the administration of criminal justice, and in the department of the police, much depravity was at an early period, eradicated; and many salutary reforms introduced. The President and Council of Fort William saw the necessity of their interference to control the sentences of the Mahomeddan judges; and where the sentences of the law founded on the koran, appeared repugnant to the principles of good government and natural justice, to apply such a remedy, as the case might require.

But though much good had been effected, much yet remained to be done, before the institutions of the government and the condition of the people, could be raised near enough to that standard, which might satisfy the enlarged views of such as had formed their opinions, on the principles and practice of European states; and accordingly, in the Session of 1784, the Parliament passed the Act of the 24th of his present Majesty, "for the better regulation and management of the affairs of the East India Company;" by the 39th section of which, the East India Company was commanded "to inquire into the alleged grievances of the landholders, and if founded in truth to afford them redress, and to establish permanent rules for the settlement and collection of the revenue, and for the administration of justice, founded on the ancient laws and local usages of the country."

ON THE REFORMS INTRODUCED BY EARL CORNWALLIS.

Your Committee will next proceed to state the measures, which, in pursuance of the requisitions of Parliament, were adopted, to inquire into the condition of the landholders, with a view of redressing their alleged grievances, and to establish permanent rules for the internal government of the provinces.

The person selected to superintend and direct these important measures, was the late MARQUIS CORNWALLIS, who proceeded to India in 1786. His Lordship was furnished with instructions from the court of directors, in a letter addressed to the governor general and council, dated 12th April 1786. As a reference to this letter, may account for many considerable alterations which have since been made in the system of the internal management of the Company's territorial possessions, and in particular, for the introduction of a permanent settlement of the land revenue, afterwards rendered perpetual; the Committee think it may be proper to notice such parts of it, as relate especially to that measure, and to the code of regulations subsequently established. The disapprobation of the court had been excited by the frequent changes which had marked the financial system of their government in Bengal; and they expressed their preference of a steady adherence to almost any one system, attended with watchful superintendence. They censured the ineffectual attempts that had been made to increase the assessment of revenue, whereby the zemindars (or hereditary superintendents of the land) had been taxed, to make room for the introduction of farmers, sezwulls, and aumeens, who having no permanent interest in the lands, had drained the country of its resources. They disapproved the rule recently established, which prohibited the collector from having any concern in the formation of the settlement of his district; and noticed the heavy arrears outstanding on the settlement of the last four years, which had been formed under the immediate direction of the committee of revenue; and expressed their opinion, that the most likely means of avoiding such defalcations in future, would be, by introducing a permanent settlement of a revenue, estimated in its amount on reasonable principles, for the due payment of which, the hereditary tenure of the possessor would be the best, and in general, the only necessary security. They therefore directed, that the settlement should be made, in all practicable instances, with the zemindar; and that in cases of his established incapacity for the trust, a pre-ference should be given to a relation or agent, over a farmer. They apprehended the design of the legislature was to declare general principles of conduct; and not to introduce any novel system, or to destroy those rules and maxims of policy which prevailed in well regulated periods of the native government. With respect to the amount of the assessment, the directors were of opinion, that the information already obtained might be sufficient to enable their government in Bengal to fix it, without having recourse to minute local scrutinies; and they suggested the average of former years collections, to be the guide on the present occasion; and on this point, concluded their instructions with re-marking, that "a moderate jumma, or assessment, regularly and punctually collected, unites the consideration of our interest with the happiness of the natives and security of the landholders, more rationally, than any imperfect collection of an exaggerated jumma, to be enforced with severity and vexation." Though the amount when determined, and on reference approved by themselves, the directors intended should be considered as the permanent and unalterable revenue of their territorial possessions in Bengal; yet for special reasons, they desired that the present settlement might be concluded, for the term of ten years only. In making choice of the persons with whom to conclude the settlement, they desired the clause of the act 1784, in favour of the landholders, might be attended to; and that in the point in question, as well as in every other particular, "the humane intention of the legislature towards the native landholders might be strictly fulfilled." With a view to the greater precision in effecting these objects, they recommended, that it might, as far as possible, be ascertained, what were the rights and privileges of the zemindars and other landholders, under the institutions of the Mogul or the Hindoo government, and the services they were bound to perform.

On proposing a plan for the civil administration of justice among the natives, the directors stated, that they had been actuated by the necessity of accommodating "their views and interests to the subsisting manners and usages of the people, rather than by any abstract theories drawn from other countries, or applicable to a different state of things;" and on these principles, they ordered, that the superintendence of the courts of dewanny adawlut should be vested in the collectors of the revenue; who were also to have the power of apprehending offenders against the public peace, but their trial and punishment was still to be left with the established officers under the Mahomeddan judicature, who were not to be interfered with, beyond what the influence of the British government, government might effect through occasional recommendations of forbearance as to inflict any punishment of a cruel nature.

On the arrival in India of Lord Cornwallis with the foregoing orders, it was not found that the government possessed information sufficient to enable his lordship to proceed, at once, to so important a step as the conclusion of a settlement of land revenue, for a period of ten years, with a view to perpetuity; constituting, as it did, the principal financial resource of government. Much was yet to be ascertained with respect to the ancient laws and local usages of the country; the nature of the land-tenure was yet imperfectly understood, and the relative situation and condition of the natives concerned in the production of the revenue, had not been fully explained. These several points, it was necessary should be enquired into, before decisive measures could be taken for fulfilling the intention of the legislature, and the orders of the directors, by establishing permanent regulations of internal policy. His lordship therefore determined to continue for a time, the practice of annual settlements for the different districts, through the agency of the collectors, superintended by the revenue committee; while interrogatories were issued to the most experienced of the civil servants, and other practicable means resorted to, by which requisite information might be obtained. The revenue and judicial institutions were, however, immediately revised and regulated, in conformity to the directions from home. The committee of revenue, had already changed its designation to that of, the board of revenue. Its authority and functions were continued, subject to some little variation in the rules prescribed for its guidance. The European civil servants also superintending the several districts into which the country was divided, were, each of them, vested with the powers of collector, judge and magistrate; in which several capacities, their authority was to be exercised, and their proceedings kept distinct; except that all judicial proceedings relative to the collection of the revenue, were to be considered appertaining, as heretofore, to the office of collector. In proposing this union of different authorities in the same person, the court of directors, were influenced by the consideration of its having "a tendency to simplicity, energy, justice and economy;" and the India government, in promulgating their orders on the subject, did not omit to remind the officers selected for this purpose, of the great importance of the trust, and of the good they might have it in their power to dispense, in proportion as they acquitted themselves with diligence and integrity, not confining themselves to a literal and languid discharge of official duties, but directing their attention, with zeal and activity, towards the accomplishment of whatever, in the course of their management, might be found calculated to promote the interests of the government, the prosperity of the country, or the happiness of individuals placed under their authority.

For the administration of justice in the cities of Moorshedabad, Dacca, and Patna, distinct courts were established, superintended by a judge and magistrate; the office of collector not being, in these situations, necessary. From the decisions of the provincial courts of justice, appeals were allowed, within certain limits, to the governor general and council, in their capacity of judges of the sudder-dewanny adawlut; and from the decisions of the collectors, appeals were allowed, first to the board of revenue, and thence to the governor general in council.

The administration of criminal justice remained vested in the naib nazim, or deputy of the nabob; to whose courts, superintended by the Mahomeddan law officers, criminals apprehended by the magistrate, were referred for trial; except on petty charges, which were to be decided on by the collector in his capacity of magistrate, and the punishment within certain limits, inflicted under his inspection. Towards the end of the year 1799, a very important change took place in this arrangement, founded (as it appears by the observations with which it was introduced) on the inefficacy of the different plans pursued from 1772, to the present time, arising principally from the great delay experienced in bringing offenders to justice, as well as to defects in the constitution of the criminal courts. It was therefore declared that, with a view to insure a prompt and impartial administration of the criminal law, and in order that all ranks of people might enjoy security of person and property, the governor general in council had had resolved to accept the superintendence of the administration of criminal justice throughout the provinces. In conformity to this resolution, the nizamat adawlut, or chief criminal court of justice, was again removed from Moorshedabad to Calcutta, to consist of the governor general and members of the supreme council, assisted by the cauzy ul cauzy or head cauzy of the provinces, and two mooftees. Four courts of circuit superintended respectively by two covenanted servants of the company, denominated judges of the courts of circuit, with each a cauzy and moofty to assist the judges and expound the Mahomeddan law, were at the same time, established for the trial of offences not punishable by the magistrates. The judges were required to hold a general jail delivery every six months, at the stations of the several magistrates within their divisions, and to report their proceedings for the confirmation, in capital cases, of the nizamat adawlut in Calcutta. While one judge was employed on the circuit; the other, was required to perform the jail delivery at the city or head station of his division. The regulations in each department of the civil and criminal judicature, and for the management of the land revenue, were revised, considerably enlarged, and printed in the English and native languages, for general information, with modes of appeal prescribed from the provincial authority through each subordinate court, until, if necessary, redress might be sought before the governor general in council, in whose supreme controul the different authorities centered, and whose decision was final, in all cases relating to the administration of justice and internal policy among the natives, except in civil suits, wherein the amount adjudged should exceed sicca rupees 50,000, or £.st^d 5,800.; which were appealable to the decision of the king in council.

Regulations for the sayer revenue, for the opium contract, and the salt monopoly, were at this time, introduced; calculated to promote the interests of the government, as well as to ameliorate the condition of the different classes of the natives to whom they were applicable: But as these, will be more particularly mentioned hereafter, your Committee will now proceed to give an account of the steps taken, in the progress and conclusion of the permanent settlement of the land revenue.

The objects to which the government directed its enquiries, as preparatory and necessary to this measure, were, the past history of the districts, and of the landholders belonging to them; the rights of the different orders of the latter, as they were recognized under the native government; the existing rules by which the revenue was collected, and the ancient usages, as far as they could be traced; the amount of the revenue which it would be proper, under the instructions from home, to demand from each landholder, and the regulations which it might be necessary to establish, with a view of guarding the under tenantry and cultivators from oppression, and of securing to them the enjoyment of their property. The information obtained on these topics is too voluminous and diffuse to be presented to the House. But your Committee is of opinion, that a minute of Mr. Shore (now Lord Teignmouth) delivered on this occasion, should not be withheld, as it appears to them to contain information derived from experience and diligent research, in regard to the character and condition of the natives of India, the past and present state of the country, and the laws and practices of the Mogul government; which may at all times be referred to with advantage, as an authentic and valuable record.

Appendix, N^o 14

On a consideration of the information obtained, it appears, that although great disorder prevailed in the internal administration of the provinces, on the Company's accession to the Dewannee, a regular system of government had subsisted, under the most intelligent and powerful of the Mogul governments, in which the rights and privileges of the different orders of the people were acknowledged and secured: by institutions derived from the Hindoos, which, while faithfully and vigorously administered, seemed calculated to promote the prosperity of the natives, and to secure a due realization of the revenues of the state.

As it was the opinion of some intelligent servants of the Company, that it would, in the approaching settlement, be more advisable to resort to the institutions and rules of the old government, with which the natives were acquainted, than to proceed upon principles and rules in the administration of justice and revenue, derived from a state of society to which they were entire strangers; your Committee

I.
BENGAL.

Committee will proceed to explain the scheme of internal policy in the management of the land revenue; to which it was contended by the persons above alluded to, the preference should be given.

In the extensive plains of India, a large proportion, estimated in the Company's provinces at one-third by Lord Cornwallis, at one-half by others, and by some at two-thirds, of land capable of cultivation, lies waste, and probably was never otherwise. It became therefore of importance to the native governments, whose principal financial resource was the land revenue, to provide, that as the population and cultivation should increase, the state might derive its proportion of advantage resulting from this progressive augmentation. Whatever might be the motive of its introduction, the rule for fixing the government share of the crop, had this tendency. This rule is traceable as a general principle, through every part of the empire which has yet come under the British dominion; and undoubtedly had its origin, in times anterior to the entry of the Mahomeddians into India. By this rule, the produce of the land, whether taken in kind or estimated in money, was understood to be shared, in distinct proportions between the cultivator and the government. The shares varied when the land was recently cleared and required extraordinary labour; but when it was fully settled and productive, the cultivator had about two-fifths, and the government the remainder. The government share was again divided with the zemindar and the village officers, in such proportion, that the zemindar retained no more than about one-tenth of this share, or little more than three fiftieth parts of the whole; but in instances of meritorious conduct, the deficiency was made up to him by special grants of land, denominated namcaur (or subsistence.) The small portions which remained, were divided between the mokuddim or head cultivator of the village, who was either supposed instrumental in originally settling the village, or derived his right by inheritance or by purchase from that transaction; and had still the charge of promoting and directing its cultivation; the pausbaun or gorayat, whose duty it was to guard the crop, and the putwarry or village accountant, perhaps the only inhabitant who could write, and on whom the cultivators relied for an adjustment of their demands and payments to be made on account of their rents. Besides these persons, who from the zemindars downwards, can be regarded in no other light than as servants of the government, provision was made, either by an allotted share of the produce, or by a special grant of land, for the canongoe or confidential agent of the government, whose name implies that he was the depository and promulgator of the established regulations, and whose office was intended as a check on the conduct, in financial transactions, of all the rest. Under the superintendence of this officer, or of one of his gomastahs or appointed agents, were placed a certain number of adjacent villages, the accounts of which as kept by the putwarries, were constantly open to his inspection, and the transactions in which, with regard to the occupancy of the land, and the distinction of boundaries, came regularly under his cognizance, in a form that enabled him at any time, when called upon, to report to the government the quantity of land in cultivation, the nature of the produce, the amount of rent paid, and generally, the disposal of the produce, agreeably to the shares allotted by the rules as above explained. To his office moreover, reference might be had to determine contested boundaries, the use of rivers or reservoirs for irrigation, and generally in all disputes concerning permanent property or local usage within the limits of his official range. Your Committee have been more particular in describing the office of the canongoe, because they find, that although proscribed and abolished (perhaps precipitately) as pernicious in Bengal and Bahar, after the conclusion of the permanent settlement of the land revenue, the same office in the Ceded and Conquered districts, and in the province of Benares, has more recently been pronounced "of great utility, and calculated to render much public benefit," and the several officers found there, continued in the exercise of their functions. A certain number of villages, with a society thus organized, formed a pergunnah; a certain number of these, comprehending a tract of country equal perhaps to a moderate sized English county, was denominated a chuckla; of these, a certain number and extent formed a circar, and a few of these, formed the last or grand division, styled a soubah, of which, by the dewanny grant, the British government had obtained two, the soubah of Bengal and that of Bahar with part of Orissa.

From this concise representation of what appears to have been the provincial organization of the revenue department, your Committee think it may appear that that when the mogul government was in its vigour, if it be supposed that the different offices from the highest downwards, were at any time judiciously filled and faithfully discharged, the rents of the lands might have been collected from the cultivator, without oppression; and the different shares of the produce distributed by the rules described, under a just observance of the rights of the parties concerned; but as this, was scarcely to be expected throughout so extensive an empire, more especially when in its decline, when exaction on the one part, and concealment and evasion on the other, were likely to be practised, the khaz collection, or collection immediately by government, was only occasionally and in particular instances, resorted to. In practice, it was more usual to have recourse to the zemindarry settlement, or to a species of farming system, by the appointment of an aumil or superintendent, who in designation, was no more than an agent, but in practice, was often required to engage for the production of a certain amount of revenue.

To make the settlement which might be for a term of years, but which was commonly annual, the subadar or dewan of the empire, either proceeded into the provinces, or summoned the landholders to his presence. If they agreed to the amount proposed, the settlement was made with them; if not, it was open to a farmer or aumil, who could tender security, if required, for the discharge of his engagements; which included not only the amount of revenue to be paid to the government, but also the due distribution of the allotted shares to the zemindar, and the inferior village officers as before enumerated. The profit to the farmer was supposed to be derived principally from the means which he might possess of extending the cultivation; and the zemindar, besides his established share of the produce, had, when the settlement was made with him, the same advantage. In both cases, this was probably the smallest part of the advantages they really derived; more especially, if situated beyond the reach of control.

On the same principle that the canongoes and village accountants were stationed in the province, a head canongoe and superintendent of the treasury was stationed with the subadar; whence were forwarded the annual revenue accounts to the seat of empire; and whence might at any time, proceed orders or forms of reports to the provincial canongoes and accountants for the minutest particulars relative to the actual state or produce of any one or all of the different villages, contained within the limits of the province over which the subadar presided.

Sufficient traces remained to shew, what was the original state of these institutions, in Bahar; but in Bengal, the disorders which increased as the Mogul empire declined, had destroyed the efficacy of those checks, which had enabled the governing power to acquire an accurate account of the village collections. The office of the canongoe was become little more, than a name; and no better mode appeared for gaining knowledge of the value of the lands, than could be obtained by a comparison of different years collections, or by reference to village accounts, which were liable to fabrication. The difficulty was increased by a difference which had originally prevailed in the mode of forming the assessment in Bengal, from what has been described as the practice in Bahar. In Bengal, instead of a division of the crop, or of the estimated value of it, in the current coin, the whole amount payable by the individual cultivator, was consolidated into one sum, called the aumil or original rent; and provision made for the zemindar, the village accountant, the munsif and the other inferior officers, by other means than by a division of the zemindarry portion of the produce. This was effected, either by grants of land, or by the privilege of cultivating on lower terms than the rest of the inhabitants, and partly in money; a mode which, as it afforded the officers of government no interest in the accuracy of the village accounts, rendered the fabrication or concealment of them, the more feasible. It moreover placed the zemindar in a condition more consistent with European notions of proprietary right in the soil, than could be inferred from his portion of the produce, shared with the officers of government; and was, perhaps, the foundation of much of that difference of opinion, which appeared in the official discussions on that topic, under the supreme government at this time.

Under this view of the Mogul system, as it formerly existed, and of the state into which it had fallen, it was by some suggested as advisable, for the Company to leave open the means of participation in the advantages expected to result from increased population and general prosperity, which might reasonably be expected on, under the British government, by continuing the practice of periodical settlements of the land revenue, under the checks instituted by the Mogul authority. These, it was contended when brought back to their original state of utility, and improved by such regulations as might be superadded by the British government, would, under a just and vigilant administration, unite the liberal policy of an European state with the strength and energy of an Asiatic monarchy, and be altogether better suited to the genius, experience and understanding of the natives, than institutions founded on principles, to them wholly new, derived from a state of society with which they were unacquainted, and the ultimate views of which, they were not able to comprehend. But the leading members of the supreme government appear to have been, at an early period of the transactions now commencing, impressed with a strong persuasion of the proprietary right in the soil possessed by the zemindars, or if the right could not be made out, consistently with the institutions of the former government, that reason and humanity irresistibly urged the introduction of it. In the decision of this question, was contemplated the introduction of a new order of things, which should have for its foundation, the security of individual property, and the administration of justice, criminal and civil, by rules which were to disregard all conditions of persons, and in their operation, be free of influence or control from the government itself. The whole, might be reconciled to a strict observance of the orders from home, which appeared to disclaim all views of an increasing land revenue, requiring only that the amount, at whatever it might now be fixed, should not be liable to fluctuation or defalcation, as it before had been; and that the rules for the collection of it, should be permanent. If any deviations from the established usages of the natives should occur, in what was intended to be done, the advantage was still so entirely on their side, particularly in regard to the landholder, that it was presumed they would at once sufficiently perceive the benefit intended, and prevent any objection, because the mode of introducing it was new, as well as any regret at the abolition of practices, injurious to them, because they were of long standing. Thus, although the intention of the government must have been manifest from the outset, a discussion of the principal points on which the new system depended was invited, and free discussion allowed by the government to its officers, whose sentiments as derived from local experience, might suggest the best means of carrying into effect the intended measures.

Though the servants of the Company had possessed the dewanny authority over these provinces more than 26 years, and especial enquiries had at different times, been prosecuted into the state of the revenues, and the condition of the inhabitants; yet much uncertainty still remained, in regard to the rights and usages of the different orders of people connected with the revenues. But the ability and experience of the Author of the minute, which has been referred to, appears to have supplied what was wanting; and to have enabled the government to proceed without delay, to the formation of a settlement of the land revenue, for a period of ten years, and to publish general orders and instructions for the direction of the collectors of the different districts of Bengal, in pursuance of the orders from home, towards the end of the year 1789, and similar orders for the province of Bahar, in the year following; but owing to unexpected obstacles, and new circumstances that arose in the course of these arrangements, it was not before November 1791, that an amended and complete code of regulations for this purpose, was prepared and promulgated by the government. Nor till the year 1793, that the decennial settlement was declared to be concluded in every district.

As the conclusion of the decennial settlement has led to one of the most important measures ever adopted by the East India Company, both in reference to themselves, by fixing the amount of their land revenue in perpetuity; and to the landholders, in establishing and conveying to them rights, hitherto unknown and unenjoyed in that country; your Committee think the House may expect from them, a particular account of the nature of this settlement.

The first point proposed in the interrogatories, circulated by government, was intended to determine the person with whom the settlement should be made; and here no difficulty occurred; for whatever might be the difference of opinion among those who were officially consulted on the theoretical question of proprietary right in the soil, a general concurrence prevailed in favour of the settlement being made with the zemindar, in all practical instances, where no disqualification from minority, sex, or notorious profligacy of character, presented objections. In such cases, provision was made for vesting the estate, in trust for the possessor; and in instances of the zemindar refusing to accede to the amount of the rent required, the estate was to be farmed, and a provision similar to the zemindarry share, which has been described, provided for his maintenance.

The next consideration was the amount of the assessment to be fixed on the lands. This, as it was subsequently to become the limit of the resource which the government could ever in future derive from the land, it was necessary should be fixed, with the utmost accuracy; but it appears that means adequate to so desirable and important a purpose, were not to be found. The lights formerly derivable from the canangoe's office, were no longer to be depended on; and a minute scrutiny into the value of the lands by measurement and comparison of the village accounts, if sufficient for the purpose, was prohibited by the orders from home. Under these circumstances the attention of the government was excited by an estimate of the resources of the country, extracted from the antient records, by Mr. James Grant, the officer in charge of the Khalsa or Exchequer office. By this document it was endeavoured to show that the real value of the lands had been concealed, and the confidence of government abused by the native officers, entrusted, during the early part of the dewanny grant, with the management of the land revenue; and that the aggregate assessment ought to be above half a million per annum, estimated in English money, more than had at any time been collected. The performance alluded to is in many respects, meritorious and interesting, and the Committee have been induced to insert it in the Appendix, as explanatory of the antient rules and tenures, under the Mahomedan dominion; and of the state of the revenues: but in regard to the amount of the assessment suggested for Bengal, the misconceptions of the author, appear to have been sufficiently explained, in a minute of Mr. Shore, already given in the Appendix; and a medium of the actual produce to government, in former years, drawn from the scanty information which the collectors had, the means of procuring, was the basis on which the assessment on each estate, whether large or small, was ultimately fixed, with a reference to the principle suggested by the directors, namely, that a moderate jumma "if regularly and punctually collected, unites the consideration of their interest, with the happiness of the natives and security of the landholders, more rationally than any imperfect collection of an exaggerated jumma, to be enforced with severity and exaction." The collectors to whom the task of adjusting the assessment on the lands, and of forming engagements with the landholders was entrusted, under such stipulations as the government deemed necessary for the protection of the lower orders of landholders and cultivators, reported their progress in detail to the board of revenue; upon whose recommendation, when approved by government, the settlement was finally concluded with the landholders for the term of ten years. The whole amount of Land Revenue, by these means, and by this agency, obtained from the provinces of Bengal, Bahar, and Orissa, ultimately proved, for the year 1197, corresponding with the year 1790-1 to be sicca rupees 2,68,00,989. or £. sterling 3,108,915.; and from the province of Benares sicca rupees 34,53,574. or £. sterling 400,615.

In the progress and conclusion of this important transaction, the government appeared willing to recognize the proprietary right of the zemindars in the land; not so much, from any proof of the existence of such right, discernible in his relative situation under the Mogul government, in its best form, as from the desire of improving their condition under the British government, as far as it might be done consistently with the permanency of the revenue and with the rights of the cultivators of the soil. The instructions from home had warned the government against the danger of delusive theories; and the recent enquiries had disclosed a series of rights and privileges, and usages, admitted in the practice of the Native government, from the principal zemindar down to the actual labourer in husbandry, which it was necessary should be attended to, before the zemindar could be left to the uncontrolled management of his estate. The talookdar, the chowdry, the mundul, the mokuddim, had each his distinct right admitted, under under the native government. Although they might be subject to exaction and oppression of various kinds, yet their rights, under the existing mechanism of a malguzarry or assessed village, did not appear liable to be called in question; and these, were sufficiently distinguishable; but the case with regard to the lower and more numerous class of the natives (the cultivators or ryots) was more multifarious and intricate; particularly in the Bengal province, where the village records, from the neglect of the canongoe's office, could no longer be relied on, and where the practice of granting pottahs or leases had fallen into irregularity and confusion, and in some places, almost into disuse, from the same cause. The necessity which hence arose, of leaving many of these points unsettled when the engagements were concluded with the zemindars, created a doubt of the expediency of rendering those engagements irrevocable, before it could be experimentally ascertained whether the different objects which led to their introduction were attainable under them. The fear of confirming, under a perpetual settlement, abuses which might not have yet come to light, or if discovered, were not of a nature to be at once obviated, seems to have suggested a trial of the decennial settlement through the whole or even a part of the term engaged for, before any assurance should be afforded the zemindars that their assessments were to be fixed for ever. The objections arising on these grounds, against any intimation being given to the landholders of an intention to render their settlements permanent and irrevocable, without a previous reference to the court of directors, are ably urged in the proceedings of the supreme government at this period; and were replied to by the governor general, in a minute dated 3d February 1790, which proved satisfactory to the directors. At the present time, when your Committee are informed that settlements of the same nature, are in progress in the recently acquired territorial possessions of the East India Company, your Committee are of opinion that the minutes recorded on the above occasion should be printed for the information of the House, and they accordingly are to be found in the Appendix.

Appendix, No. 5.

From the proceedings alluded to, it appears, to have been determined by the governor general in council, that the notification in question should immediately be made to the zemindars, that if approved by the directors, to whose decision the point was to be referred, the settlements which had just been concluded, should be rendered perpetual, or be fixed for ever.

Appendix 12 (A.) to 4th Report of Select Committee, 1810.

The directors in their reply (dated 29 September 1792) to the reference which was made to them on the progress of the settlement, and to the proposal of rendering it perpetual, expressed themselves in high terms of approbation of what had been done; and of assent in regard to what was further proposed to be accomplished. They seemed to consider a settlement of the rents in perpetuity, not as a claim practice of the native government, but as a grace, which it would be good policy for the British Government to bestow upon them. In regard to proprietary right to the land, the recent enquiries had not established the zemindar on the footing of the owner of a landed estate in Europe, who may lease out portions, and employ and dismiss labourers at pleasure; but on the contrary had exhibited, from him down to the actual cultivator, other inferior landholders, styled talookdars, and cultivators of different descriptions, whose claim to protection, the government readily recognized, but whose rights were not, under the principles of the present system, so easily reconcilable, as to be at once susceptible of reduction to the rules about to be established in perpetuity. These, the directors particularly recommended to the consideration of the government, who in establishing permanent rules were to leave an opening for the introduction of any such in future, as from time to time might be found necessary, to prevent the ryots being improperly disturbed in their possessions, or subjected to unwarrantable exactions. This, the directors observed would be clearly consistent with the true practice of the Mogul government, under which it was a general maxim that the immediate cultivator of the soil, duly paying his rent, should not be dispossessed of the land he occupied; "and this" (they further observed) "necessarily supposes that there were some limits, by which the rent could be defined, and that it was not left to the arbitrary determination of the zemindar; for otherwise, such a rule would be nugatory; and in point of fact, the original amount seems to have been anciently ascertained and fixed by an "act of the sovereign." Subsequent enquiries, particularly in the Deccan, and more southern part of India, have confirmed these observations. The division of the crop or produce taken in money or in kind, fixes and limits this demand, and as long as the ancient rules were scrupulously observed, the state and its subjects derived a mutual advantage from the increase of cultivation, while the rate of taxation remained fixed and invariable. Notwithstanding the foregoing reservations, the advantage actually to be conferred, in rendering the amount of revenue, which the landholders had recently entered into voluntary engagements to pay, perpetual or fixed for ever, and thereby securing them from any further demand of rent, or tribute, or of any arbitrary exaction whatsoever, was so new, so unexpected, and of such inestimable value to the landholders, as led the directors to believe would induce them assiduously to employ themselves in improving their estates, and on the other hand, would place the security of the public revenue on a solid basis, founded on the growing prosperity of the country.

On a point so singularly interesting to the East India company, as the amount of the land revenue, which was now in Bengal to be fixed for ever, the directors, after lamenting the want of better data than the experience of a series of past years, joined to the recent enquiries, had afforded, expressed themselves satisfied in its appearing likely to prove equal to what they had, after consideration of the exigencies of government, and of a reserve proper for extraordinary services, already had it in view to obtain; and they did not wish to expose their subjects to the hazard of oppressive practices, by requiring more; yet on consideration of the extent of land which lay waste throughout the provinces, and adverting to what had formerly been the practice of the native government, in participating in the resources derivable from its progressive cultivation, they would be induced to acquiesce in any arrangement which might be devised, with a view to secure to the East India company, a similar participation in the wealth derivable from such a source, provided it could be effected without counteracting the principal object of encouraging industry, and be reconciled with the principles of the system, which was about to be introduced; and they concluded their letter with observing, that "the demand from the land, the great, and now almost the only source of revenue, is fixed, with the exception of any addition which may be made from resumption, or what may arise from uncultivated lands (if that resource should be available) it is fixed for ever; a most serious argument, for strict economy in the expenditure of what is so limited; for the utmost care on our part, that our known resources being on the one hand restrained from increase, they may on the other, be preserved from diminution." On the authority of the orders conveyed in this letter, Lord Cornwallis proceeded without loss of time to notify by proclamation, bearing date the 22d March 1793, to the landholders, the permanency of the settlements which had just been formed, as well as of those which were yet in progress, whenever they should be completed. The terms of the first three articles of the proclamation are as follow:

Letter from the Directors, 29 Aug. 1792; par. 56.

Reg^d I. 1793.

[Art. 1st. "In the original regulations for the decennial settlement of the public revenues of Bengal, Bahar and Orissa, passed for these provinces respectively on the 18th of September 1789, the 25th November 1789, and the 10th February 1790; it was notified to the proprietors of land with or on behalf of whom a settlement might be concluded, that the jumma assessed upon the lands, under those regulations, would be continued after the expiration of the ten years, and remain unalterable for ever; provided such continuance should meet with the approbation of the honourable court of directors for the affairs of the East India Company, and not otherwise."

Art. II. "The Marquis CORNWALLIS, knight of the most noble order of the garter, governor general in council, now notifies to all zemindars, independent talookdars, and other actual proprietors of land, in the provinces of Bengal, Bahar and Orissa, that he has been empowered by the honourable court of directors for the affairs of the East India Company, to declare the jumma, which has been or may be assessed upon their lands under the regulations above-mentioned, fixed for ever."

Art. III. "The governor general in council accordingly declares to the zemindars, independent talookdars, and other actual proprietors of land, with or on behalf of whom a settlement has been concluded under the regulations

"above-mentioned, that at the expiration of the term of the settlement, no alteration will be made in the assessment which they have respectively engaged to pay, but that they and their heirs and lawful successors will be allowed to hold their estates at such assessment for ever."]

During the time that the settlement of the land revenue was in progress, and until an answer to the reference for rendering the decennial settlement perpetual, could be obtained from England, the government was occupied in devising remedies for the imperfections and abuses which prevailed in other departments of the internal administration. The next in importance to the land revenue, as presenting an object for reform; was the Sayer or inland customs, duties and taxes, or generally whatever was collected on the part of government and not included in the mehaul or land revenue. This department, comprehending whatever was calculated to bear an impost in towns or markets, in places of fixed or of occasional resort, or on the roads, being less susceptible of reduction to fixed rules, was more open to imposition and abuse, and consequently the scrutiny introduced on the present occasion, presented an object of peculiar interest for the government to reform. The more effectually to accomplish this purpose, it was by advertisement on the 11th June 1790, notified that (with an exception of the tax on tenements, which appeared derivable from the land thus occupied) the management and collection of the sayer revenue, would in future be separated from the zemindary charge, and placed under the authority of officers to be appointed directly on the part of government. But in proceeding to act upon this resolution, the good conduct of the natives, who were now to be placed in this charge, under the immediate control of the officers of government, appeared as little to be depended on, as when they acted under the control of the zemindars. The advantage therefore to the public interests was doubtful, while the additional expense to be incurred in salaries, was certain and unavoidable; and therefore, as the shortest way of getting rid of the embarrassment, which the resolution for the resumption of the sayer had occasioned, the government determined that it would be advisable to abolish this class of collections altogether, and to allow the zemindars a compensation for the loss, which it should be made to appear they respectively had suffered thereby.

The tax on spirituous liquors was reserved out of the abolition, and has since been regulated and rendered more productive than formerly; and Your Committee observe, that the abolition of the tax has not been final, or under any such declaration, as should preclude the government at any future time from the option of restoring the collections in question, in whole or in part, under such regulations and restrictions as they may deem expedient.

Your Committee will next proceed to notice the reforms introduced into the rules established for securing the Company a revenue derivable from the monopoly of Salt, and for improving the condition of the natives employed in the manufacture of that article.

The Salt with which the inhabitants of the populous provinces of Bengal and Bahar are supplied, is obtained from the earth found impregnated with sea salt at the mouths of the Ganges, in the tracts contained between Ballasore and Chittagong. On the acquisition of the Dewanny, the inland trade in salt, beetle nut and tobacco, was vested in an exclusive company, for the benefit of the European servants; who enjoyed the profits of the concern, in lieu of salary. The regulations of the 31st September 1766, fixed the price at which salt should be sold, in lots to the natives, at two hundred rupees per hundred maund; and prohibited the sale of it, on these terms, to any but the natives. Other restrictions, calculated to secure the natives from the injurious effects of a monopoly, were likewise introduced, which lasted till the January following, when the society above-mentioned of trade, was abolished by orders from the court of directors; but, owing to the time necessary to terminate the contract, which had been entered into for the supply of salt, this society was not finally put an end to, till October 1768. The advantage to the government, had been a duty of 50 per cent. on the value of the salt manufactured, which, together with fifteen per cent. on beetle, was estimated to produce an annual revenue revenue of twelve or thirteen lacs of rupees. On the abolition of the society of trade, the manufacture appears to have been thrown open to the native merchants, who might employ the manufacturers; and to such of the zemindars as by their situations, possessed the convenience, and by their sunnuds the right, of making salt within their limits: but restrictions were still imposed, to prevent the opulent natives from entering into combinations for the purpose of monopolizing the sale of salt in the interior, and from oppressing the manufacturers.

In the year 1772 it was determined, 1st. "That the salt in every part of the province should be on the same footing:—2d. That the salt should be made for the company:—3. That the colluries or manufactories in each district, should be let in farm for five years." By the conditions of the farm, a certain quantity of salt was to be delivered at a stipulated price, which was then to be dealt out at a fixed price to the native conductors of the inland trade, who had agreed beforehand to aid the farmers by advance of money for the payment of the labourers or lower classes of manufacturers.

In July 1777, the practice of farming the mahauls or manufactories was continued; but the salt produced, was left to the farmer's disposal.

As the revenue accruing to the Company up to this time, from the manufacture of salt, did not appear equal to what might, under a more judicious management be derived from it, a new system was introduced in September 1786, "for the provision of salt by agency, under which all the salt of the provinces was to be manufactured for the company, and sold for ready money, at moderate fixed rates, to be ascertained and published at the beginning of every season by the governor general and council." The European agents employed in this department, were restricted by oath to their avowed allowances: but, exclusive of a salary, they were allowed a commission of ten per cent. on the profit which should accrue to the Company under their management; and by public advertisement, the manufacturers of salt were required to place themselves under their direction. This plan was strenuously opposed in Council; but the result appears to have justified the expectations formed by the governor general, Mr. HASTINGS, who proposed its introduction; for the net average amount of revenue brought to account in the first three years following the new mode of management, was sicca rupees 40,00,500. or £. 8,464,060, and the same, for the three years preceding the arrival of Lord Cornwallis, £. 45,03,900. or £. 8,522,450.

The regulations introduced by Lord Cornwallis, do not alter the general plan of the monopoly as above introduced; but are calculated to remove all compulsion from the manufacturers, and to guard them from the impositions of the intermediate native agents, standing between the covenanted European servants of the company, and the labourers in the manufactory. Your Committee have the satisfaction of observing, that under these rules, the revenue derived from salt has largely increased, and that the net advantage to the Company, from this and improved sales, has risen to sicca rupees 11,725,700. or £. 8,136,0180. on an average of the last three years.

Regulations recorded on 10th Dec. 1786.

The monopoly of the Opium, produced from the culture of the poppy, is the third principal branch of the East India Company's territorial revenue in India. In considering this as a financial resource, it appears that the practice of the Mogul government has been adopted; under which the opium was farmed out, on an exclusive privilege for a peiscush or annual payment in advance.

In 1773 the contract, or exclusive privilege for providing opium, was granted to Meer Munbeer, in preference (as it was stated by government) to any one else, because being the person who had been employed by the gentlemen of "Ratna in that business, he was the best acquainted with the proper mode of managing it; and would account for any outstanding balances." He was to deliver the Bahar opium at 320 rupees; the Oude at 350 rupees per maund. In the notification made by the government on this occasion, wherein the zemindars and others were required to afford their assistance, it was added, that the purchases of opium would be made, to the satisfaction of the cultivators, and no oppression would be committed.

On a renewal of the contract to these persons in 1775, on the same terms, the contractors engaged "to carry on their own business without oppression to the ryots, and would not force them to prepare the lands for the cultivation of the opium poppy, nor force them to cultivate the opium poppy, but leave them to till the lands as most agreeable to themselves." In the same year, it was notified, that the next contract for the supply of opium would be made on proposals to be tendered to the government for that purpose; and the proposals received, were renewed and accepted for the following year. The government having heard of forcible means used with the cultivators, strictly enjoined the provincial council to attend to the orders, they had before received, to prevent force or compulsion being used to oblige the ryots to cultivate the poppy in preference to any other article.

The terms of this last contract, appear to have furnished the rule on which the contract was conferred by special favour, without any additional provision for the protection of the cultivators, for the subsequent years, until 1785; when the government determined that the contract should be exposed to public competition, and for a term of four years, be disposed of to the highest bidder.

On the conclusion of the engagement entered into, the government reserved to itself the appointment of inspectors to superintend the provision and manufacture of the opium; and declared it to be the duty of "the collectors of the several districts to hear all complaints of the ryots against the contractors and their officers, and to grant such redress, according to the former practice and usage of the respective districts, as may be required; and that this provision be publicly notified by advertisement throughout the districts where opium is manufactured, with this condition, that the contractors may appeal to the board from the decision of the collectors, provided such appeal be made within one month from the date of such provincial decision; which is in the mean time to be in force and obeyed, till the judgment on the appeal shall have been passed."

Before the expiration of the last-mentioned contract, Lord Cornwallis had arrived in India; and the same scrutiny which was carried on in the other departments, appears to have been extended to the means which had been used for the supply of opium. Though the mode of supply by contract was not discontinued, but on the contrary, renewed by advertisement for another term of four years, many new conditions were required from the contractors; the particulars of which your Committee do not deem it necessary to enter into, farther than to explain, in what respects they were calculated for the relief and protection of the cultivators and manufacturers. The government, as long as it had assumed the monopoly of opium, must have had an interest in keeping down the price paid to the cultivators; at the same time that policy suggested the necessity that the price they received should be reduced to so low a rate as to discourage the cultivation, and thereby diminish the quantity produced. These considerations, produced the establishment of a medium rate, at which, by weight, the cultivator had, from a remote period, been accustomed to deliver his crude opium to the person, whether agent or contractor, who, on the part of government, was appointed to receive it. Upon this rate, which appears in the village account as the assul, or originally established rate, certain ahvabs or cesses, had subsequently become imposed, in the same manner as practised in the land rents. The principal part of these impositions, were abolished under the present contract; and the rate stated at which the contractor was required to purchase the crude opium from the cultivator.

Your Committee cannot but notice the singular principle on which these contracts must have proceeded, wherein the government, on contracting for the price at which they were to receive the opium, at the same time prescribed the price at which it should be purchased by the contractor; more especially when it appears, that as the latter, was to exceed the former, it might be supposed that the contractor agreed to supply opium to the East India Company, at a lower rate than than he could purchase it himself. Though the result will sufficiently demonstrate the erroneous tendency of these contracts, yet the mistakes committed in them, were not discovered soon; and the present contract for four years had its course, and another contract for the same period was entered into, and had continued to the end of its term, before the ill consequences discovered themselves, in the depression in the trade, which, under judicious management, was calculated to be, and which has since shewn itself, to be a very considerable financial resource.

The Settlement of the land revenue having been effected, in the manner which has been described, and rendered perpetual by the court of directors, with the concurrence of the board of commissioners for the affairs of India, Lord Cornwallis proceeded without delay to perfect the system of internal administration, which he had undertaken to introduce. For this purpose, the regulations framed at different periods of his administration, were revised and printed, for the guidance of the officers of government, and translated into the native languages for the information of the inhabitants at large. This example has been subsequently followed by the presidencies of Fort St. George and Bombay; and the code of regulations thus framed, may be considered as the statute book of the British government; the nature and importance of which, will appear from the preamble of Regulation XLI. of 1793, where it is stated to be, "essential to the future prosperity of the British in Bengal, that all regulations which may be passed by government, affecting in any respects the rights, persons or property of their subjects, should be formed into a regular code, and printed with translations in the country languages; that the grounds on which each regulation may be enacted should be prefixed to it; and, that the courts of justice should be bound to regulate their decisions by the rules and ordinances which those regulations may contain. A code of regulations framed upon the above principles, would enable individuals to render themselves acquainted with the laws upon which the security of the many inestimable privileges and immunities granted to them by the British government depends, and the mode of obtaining speedy redress against every infringement of them; the courts of justice will be able to apply the regulations, according to their true intent and import; future administrations will have the means of judging, how far the regulations have been productive of the desired effect; and when necessary, to modify or alter them, as from experience may be found advisable; new regulations will not be made, nor those which may exist be repealed, without due deliberation; and the causes of future decline or prosperity of these provinces, will always be traceable, in the code, to their source."

Your Committee will now proceed to give an account of the system of internal government as modified by Lord Cornwallis, and established by the code of regulations above-mentioned, beginning with the department of the revenue, which stands first in the code.

THE REVENUE DEPARTMENT.

IT has been already stated, that the superintendence of the settlement and collection of the revenue, and the controul over the conduct of the collectors, was agreeably to orders of the court, of September 1785, vested in a board of revenue, consisting of a president (who is always one of the members, selected from the civil service of the supreme council) and four members, each of whom are under the restraint of an oath prescribed by the act. Besides its ordinary functions, the board was originally constituted a court of review, and of appeal, from the decisions of the collectors acting in their capacity of judges of adawlut, in all causes relating to the public revenue, which appertained to the mahal adawlut, in contradistinction to all other suits which came under the jurisdiction of the dewanny adawlut. Lord Cornwallis, deeming it incompatible with the principles of the system he was about to introduce, that the officers of the revenue should decide on suits, the cause of which originating in their own department, might render them not wholly disinterested in the decision, annulled the judicial powers of the officers in the revenue department, and transferred the cognizance of all matters wherein the government might be concerned to the same court of dewanny adawlut, which was to dispense justice among the inhabitants in general.

general. The board of revenue being thus relieved from the exercise of judicial functions, would, it was understood, have more time to bestow on the various duties assigned to its members, which duties are recited in regulation the II^d of 1793, enacted for their guidance. The board of revenue is held at the seat of government; it has a secretary, with assistant translators, and other subordinate officers, European and native. In this board, is vested the general controul over the collectors of the land revenue, with authority to superintend their proceedings, and to suspend them from their offices, if negligent in the performance of their duty. Their own proceedings are, in like manner, subject to the superintendence of the government; and the orders of the government in this department, are circulated, through the board of revenue to the collectors. The board of revenue is constituted a court of wards, with powers to controul the conduct and inspect the accounts of those who manage the estates of persons disqualified by minority, sex, or natural infirmity, for the administration of their own affairs. The board make periodical reports to government on the state of the revenues; and their proceedings in detail, are transmitted through the government to the court of directors.

The only instances in which the collectors are allowed to retain any of their judicial functions, are such as relate to the continuance of the provincial pensions, and the separation of the talooks or small estates from their dependence on the zemindarries to which they are attached. It had been the practice of the native government, to grant pensions to various descriptions of Mahomeddians and Hindoos. The greatest part of these, were small stipends granted in reward of merit, or through motives of devotion and charity to Brahmins, to Faqueers, and to Mahomeddan families, in a state of decline. Some were for a fixed term, and others in perpetuity; but all were chargeable, either on the revenue or on the sayer collections; and many had probably been held, without an adequate authority. Without entering into a scrupulous examination of the rights by which these pensions were enjoyed, the British government had been accustomed to authorize the payment of them; and on the conclusion of the decennial settlement and the abolition of the sayer revenue, provision was made for the continuance of all such as should, on investigation, be found duly authorized under rules which were enacted for the purpose. This investigation being on a subject declared to be gratuitous, is entrusted to the collector, subject to the revision of the board of revenue, and to the ultimate determination of the governor general in council. The collector also decides in the first instance, on talookdarry claims for separation, it being a point in which his office is supposed to contain the best information, but the appeal in this case lies to the courts of justice, the subject being a private right, over which the government profess to exercise no controul.

The collectors being divested of their magisterial authority, it became necessary to provide, by other means, for the collection of arrears of land revenue. This has been done by a regulation conveying ample powers for the enforcement of all such demands, by attachment and sale of the defaulter's property, and by imprisonment of his person, where the property should prove inadequate to answer the demand. The government, solicitous to prevent the recurrence of corporal punishment, which had under former systems been practised, in the regulation enacted on this occasion, avoids all personal restraint beyond what may be necessary to establish the justice of the demand, but is precise in its form of process prescribed for the collector to follow, and peremptory in regard to a sale of the land, in the last resort. The same regulation affords to the zemindar the means of obtaining redress, by a suit for damages against a collector for acts of unauthorized severity, or for the enforcement of an unjust demand, or for any unauthorized proceeding in his official capacity, whereby the party may sustain damage. It discriminates also the cases, in which the suit is to be considered as virtually prosecuted against the government, and against the collector individually. The functions of the collector are to assess the tax imposed on spirituous and fermented liquors, and intoxicating drugs; to superintend the division (by sale or by decrees of the judicial courts) of landed property paying revenue to government; to apportion the public revenue on land, ordered to be sold for the discharge of arrears of revenue; to procure land for the native invalid soldiers; and he is required to dispose of the amount of his collections, as may be directed by the accountant general; to keep and transmit his periodical accounts.

Regⁿ XXIV. 1793.

accounts, in the forms prescribed to the board of revenue, and generally to perform whatever duties may be required of him, by a public regulation, or by special orders from the board of revenue. These officers act, under the restraint of the oath prescribed by act of Parliament. In their establishments are included one or more European assistants, taken from the junior part of the covenanted servants; a dewán appointed by the board of revenue, and other native officers, agreeably to the list of establishments contained in No. 60 of the Appendix to the second Report of this Committee; a copy of which list is by Act of Parliament, required to be laid annually before this House.

The division of the provinces into collectorships, remained nearly as before; no further alteration being made, than such as was more convenient in defining them by rivers, or other natural boundaries, where any such occurred.

Officially subordinate to the collectors, are the tehsildars, or native collectors, posted in a few instances, where the extent of the district or the great number of petty landholders, renders assistance necessary to the European collector. In Bengal and Bahar, their functions are limited to the receipt of the revenue, in the division of the district where they are posted; in Benares, and in the Ceded and Conquered provinces, the situation and employment of the tehsildars, will be explained, in the account to be given of the settlement of those provinces.

It must have appeared, from what has been stated, that the inhabitants of the Company's territorial possessions, whose condition was considered to be the most improved, by the introduction of the new system, were the class of landholders or zemindars. Under the native government, the zemindars were liable to an annual requisition for such an amount of revenue or tribute, as a minute local scrutiny of the village accounts, aided by a measurement of the land, if necessary, might warrant, leaving them simply their russoom or established proportion of the produce, and their nauncaur or special grant of land, where such existed, joined with the advantage derivable from an extension of cultivation, or what might be obtained by reletting the land in parcels to under-renters, as a compensation for the trouble and risk of the charge; and subject to imprisonment, corporal punishment, and dispossession, in case of failure in the performance of their engagements. If they declined entering into engagements on the plea of excessive demand, they were restricted to their allowance of russoom or nauncaur; while the land was liable to be farmed, or committed to the immediate management of an officer of government. [By the terms of the perpetual settlement, no farther demand is to be made upon the landholder, whatever may be the augmentation of his resources, by increased cultivation, or any other means, than the amount of the jumma or revenue which he has already voluntarily engaged to pay. On the other hand, he is declared not entitled to remissions, on the plea of loss from unfavourable seasons, inundation, or any other natural calamity; and in the event of his falling in arrear of the regular payment of the revenue, his land is liable to be sold, in liquidation of the balance outstanding.]

Thus far, the present tenure and condition of zemindar may appear similar to that of a freeholder in this country; but in India, as already has been mentioned, subordinate rights were found to exist, which justice and humanity required should be protected, before the privileges of the zemindars, under the new system, were declared fixed for ever. These were, the rights of the talookdars, or inferior zemindars, and of the ryots or cultivators. The former were of different descriptions; some of them, already entitled to separation from the zemindar's authority, or to make engagements with and pay their revenue directly, to the ruling power; others, by former custom, were dependant on the zemindar, as on a liege lord. The hand of power had so often and so variously controlled the right, as to render the real extent of it, doubtful; and hence it became difficult to frame such rules for the separation of talooks, as might in all instances, be free of objection. The collectors, therefore, on concluding the settlement, after separating such of the talookdars, whose right to that condition was unquestionable, left all others subject to future investigation, under the rules and regulations established for trying and determining the rights in question, which rendered all such claims cognizable in the first instance by the collector, from whose decision appeals were to be had, to the courts of dewanny adawlut. The effect of the regulation, authorizing the separation of talooks, must have appeared consonant to the sentiments of the directors, who, in their letter of 19th September 1792, suggested the inconvenience, venience, if not danger, which might arise from the great extent of some of the principal zemindaries; and the regulation alluded to, continued in operation till 1801, when, from the great number of separations into minute portions of land which had occurred under it, and from the opportunity it afforded for practices injurious to the revenue, it was deemed necessary to establish a limited period, beyond which no further separations should be allowed. Other inconveniences resulting from the encouragement held out to application for separation by the rules alluded to, and the obscurity of the rights to be determined under them, were observable in a few instances, wherein considerable zemindars found their estates in portions wholly taken from them, and themselves reduced to the condition of pensioners of government. In some other instances, the purchasers of land at the public sales, held for the liquidation of balances of revenue, were left in a similar predicament, and compensation for the loss sustained, claimed by the purchaser, and allowed by the government. Your Committee are enabled to state, in proof of the uncertainty which must have attended the decision of the right in question, that though the mokuddims, noticed in a former part of this Report, sued and established their right to separation before the judge of the provincial court of Bhaglepore, they lost their cause in an appeal which was made from that decision to the superior court at Moorshedabad.

Regⁿ VI. 1807.

A similar inconvenience, resulting from the rule established for selling land in portions to realize arrears of revenue, has induced the regulation, which restricts those divisions to portions which shall not bear an assessment of revenue, under sicca rupees 500 per annum. But the Mahomeddan and Hindoo laws of inheritance, still in force for the division of hereditary property, may probably carry this inconvenience to an extent which, will oblige the government to apply a remedy, by enacting a restrictive regulation in those cases likewise.

Regⁿ VIII. 1793.

With respect to the cultivators or ryots, their rights and customs varied so much in different parts of the country, and appeared to the government to involve so much intricacy, that the regulation only provides generally for engagements being entered into, and pottahs or leases being granted by the zemindars, leaving the terms to be such as shall appear to have been customary, or as shall be particularly adjusted between the parties; and in this, it is probable that the intentions and expectations of the government have been fulfilled, as no new regulation yet appears, altering or rescinding the one alluded to. It is moreover to be expected, that the parties, on experiencing the inconvenience, expense and delay, combined with the uncertainty attendant on decisions in the newly constituted courts of justice, will come to a reasonable agreement between themselves; the zemindars, for the sake of retaining the cultivator, by whose means alone his estate can be rendered productive; and the cultivator, for the sake of gaining a subsistence on the spot where he has been accustomed to reside.

Regⁿ VIII. 1793.

The village accountant, or putwarry, whose duties have been described, it was deemed necessary to retain under the new system; but he is, by the regulations, placed in the situation of a servant to the zemindar, for the purpose (besides keeping the village accounts) of furnishing information respecting the lands which may at any time, be ordered for sale by the collector, or by the courts of justice. But for the canongoes, whose functions have also been described, no employment appearing necessary, the office was, by the government, declared abolished, and the lands which they possessed in right of office, and some of them by inheritance through many descents, were pronounced resumable, on the principle of the possessors being merely the servants of the state, and removable at pleasure. The severity of this decision was afterwards so far mitigated as to leave the principal canongoes a maintenance; but the office and the rassoons, or income derivable from it, have not been restored to them, in Bengal and Bahar.

In determining to abolish this ancient institution, it may be doubted whether the Government did not proceed hastily on the evidence of abuses in the administration of it, and without sufficient regard to its utility, under wholesome rules. What tends to confirm this appearance of precipitancy, is the necessity that has since arisen for preserving the office in Benares, and the Ceded and Conquered districts, under a subsequent introduction of the Bengal regulations for the government of those provinces. By Regulation V. of 1808, it is provided, that "the office of canongoe having been found of great utility under former govern"ments in the Ceded and Conquered provinces, and being calculated to render "much public benefit in those provinces, and in the province of Benares, under "proper rules and restrictions," is accordingly continued; but on a footing somewhat different, as it is no longer hereditary, nor the salary payable by rassoos, but immediately from the government treasury.

To supply the want of the office of canongoe, in recording the changes of landed property, and other local circumstances, which the new system could not conveniently dispense with, a quinquennial register of landed property, with an intermediate register of changes, was established, and ordered to be kept by native officers, under the inspection and superintendence of the collector of each district, with translations of the same in the English language. Provision appears to have been made for verifying the leaves of the register by the signature of the judge of the district, and by other precautions for rendering it authentic and complete, as a record to which reference might be had by the officers of government and by the courts of justice, for information respecting the assessment of the revenue in particular divisions of land, and for determining boundary disputes, and other circumstances, wherein the demands of the government and the rights and property of individuals, are concerned. But as it does not appear, that these registers have yet been finished, it may, perhaps, after a lapse of so many years, admit of a doubt, whether they ever will be completed. A circumstance that seems to countenance this conjecture, is the necessity recently felt of re-establishing the canongoe's office in the upper provinces, which your Committee have reason to believe the registers in question, were meant to supply.

Your Committee have been induced to mention these and other circumstances of a similar nature, from an impression, that in settling the revenue, and introducing regulations of a permanent nature, into the new acquisitions of territory under the different presidencies, in which important service the India government is now actually employed, the operation of the new system, introduced into Bengal, should be kept constantly in view; in order that any errors which may have been committed, through inadvertency or precipitancy or want of experience, in those possessions, may be avoided on future occasions.

The only regulations remaining under this head, which your Committee think, it necessary to mention, are those which provide for the resumption, by government, of land held exempt from the payment of revenue either, surreptitiously or under invalid titles.

The circumstance of land, to a considerable extent, existing under the general denomination of bazee zemeen, or land exempt from the payment of revenue, appears noticed in the proceedings of the government of Bengal in the year 1782; when it was remarked, that "partial attempts had been made at different "periods, to ascertain the extent and annual amount of these lands." But no general register had yet been formed; and the records of former investigations, were either lost or dispersed, and what existed, were too inaccurate to be relied on. Although means had been used in 1772, to prevent the practice of alienating land without authority, there was reason to believe the abuse on the part of the zemindars still continued, and that the institution of an office, to be denominated the bazee zemeen Duffer, was necessary to check it. The Superintendent of the bazee zemeen duffer, assisted by a competent establishment of native officers, was authorized to traverse the provinces of Bengal and Orissa, for the purpose of collecting information, and forming a register of the lands in question; and, as an incitement to diligence in the discharge of his duty, he was, in addition to his salary, allowed a commission on all the resumptions of land which might, by his means, be brought on the rental of government. The province of Bahar was exempt from this enquiry; it being presumed, that the provincial council had already made the necessary enquiry on the subject. The records contain no account of any material service having been performed, in consequence of this institution. On the contrary, it appeared to the government, to be a source of great abuses, by protecting fraudulent alienations of the public revenue; and in 1786 the bazee zemeen duffer (or registry of lands exempt from the payment of revenue) was abolished; and a part of the duties, under other regulations, committed to the charge of the collectors of revenue in their respective districts. No further alteration in it appears to have been introduced, till the year 1790, when Lord Cornwallis brought forward the regulations, which were afterwards included in the code published in 1793, "for trying the validity of the claims of persons holding or claiming a right to hold lands, exempt from the payment of revenue to government." The object of these regulations, is to define the circumstances under which the titles to the different descriptions of grants therein cited, shall be deemed valid; such as, proof of possession prior to the company's accession to the dewanny, or of competent authority since that event; and to empower the collector of the district to prosecute suits on the part of government in the dewanny adawlut for resumption, where the title to possession cannot be maintained. But it does not appear that any considerable resumptions have been made. Indeed the effects of the first miscarriage of a plan, intended to discover the vast alienations which had been made of the public possessions, are still sensibly felt, and the recovery of them is now, perhaps, from continued enjoyment, become impracticable.

To the account which has already been given of the revenues derivable from the monopoly of salt and opium, little is necessary to be added here. The regulations passed for securing the monopoly of those articles; for preventing smuggling in the former, and adulteration in the latter; for preventing the officers employed on the part of government from compelling persons to engage in the manufacture of either; for ensuring a due performance of engagements, when voluntarily contracted by the manufacturers, and for affording them redress, through the means of the courts of judicature, when aggrieved by the agents of government; were revised, and introduced into the code published in 1793. No material alteration appears to have been made in this regulation relative to the salt, since that time, except the establishment of chokeys, under the superintendence of covenanted servants, to prevent smuggling; and a reduction in the rate of commission allowed to the salt agents.

In regard to the Opium, the revenue arising from it having considerably diminished, and the trade in it declined, owing to the debasement of the article by adulteration, the mode of provision by contract was discontinued; and in 1799 the agency of a covenanted servant of the company adopted instead. This change in the management of the opium monopoly, has answered the expectations formed of it, in every particular; and the net revenue arising from it, which on an average of the last four years of the contract, was S^r R^r 8,19,400, or £. S^r 95,050. has on an average of the four years, of which the latest accounts have been received, proved, S^r R^r 59,80,100 or £. S^r 693,700.

The Agents appointed for the provision of salt and opium, previously to entering on their office, are required to take and subscribe an oath, which restricts them from deriving any advantage themselves, or knowingly from permitting any other person to do so, beyond the avowed allowance from the government.

THE CIVIL COURTS OF JUSTICE.

Your Committee have already described the state of the judicial department in Bengal, previous to the introduction of the new system; when, in each of the districts into which the provinces were divided, a European servant presided, and exercised the functions of collector of the revenue, judge of the adawlut, and superintendant of the police; under rules which kept his proceedings distinct and separate, in each of those departments.

This was, the constitution of the internal government which the court of directors had chosen for their territorial possessions in India, when in 1786, Lord Cornwallis was appointed to carry into effect the improvements which they had determined, for the administration of those possessions. On that occasion, the directors accompanied their orders with the following observations:

"We are actuated in all our ideas concerning the preservation and government of our possessions in India, by the necessity of accommodating our views and interests to the subsisting manners and usages of the people, rather than by any abstract theories drawn from other countries, as applicable to a different state of things. We have therefore, upon a full view of the subject, adopted this conclusion, that it will tend more to simplicity, energy, justice and economy,

"economy, to reinvest the provincial chiefs or collectors with the superintendence of the courts of dewanny adawlut."

It must be acknowledged that the proposed establishment of an individual authority in each district, was consonant with the practice of the native governments, in which, from the monarch, in gradation to the inferior village officer, the authority of the immediate superior was absolute, and commonly regarded with implicit obedience, till injustice or oppression forced an appeal to an higher power. It is moreover evident, that the advantages and disadvantages, the good or evil, attending this system, would depend more on the qualities of the individual agents presiding in it, than in any regulations that could be framed for their guidance. In proportion as the European chief or collector, stationed at a distance from the seat and immediate superintendence of the government, should be active, vigilant and upright, or indolent and corrupt, it might be expected that the conduct of his inferior officers, stationed throughout the district, would be found to partake of the same qualities; and that the welfare of the inhabitants would thus in a certain degree, depend on the choice to be made of the person who was to be placed, in authority over them. The uncertainties which might attend on such a selection, and other reasons, which are stated at large in the minute of Lord Cornwallis, for rejecting this system, and in the room of it, to introduce one which he proposed should be "upheld by its own inherent principles, and not by the personal qualities of those who would have to superintend it." A system under which it would no longer be necessary for the people to court the patronage of individuals, or to look beyond the laws for security to their persons and property. In conformity to these principles, the public regulations in various passages, inculcate the free access that may be had to the courts of justice for redress, not only from grievances arising from the infringement of rights on the part of individuals, but from the abuse of authority in the officers of government; and have in Regulation III. of 1793, pointed out a mode whereby the government may be brought to account, and may be compelled to answer for any injury done to the meanest of its subjects, by the authorized conduct of its officers, or by an act of its own, passing rules in anywise injurious to the rights of individuals. The preamble to Regulation III. of 1793, contains the following passage:—"The government have resolved that the authority of the laws and regulations lodged in the courts of justice, shall extend, not only to all suits between native individuals, but that the officers of government employed in the collection of the revenue, the provision of the company's investment, and all other financial or commercial concerns of the public, shall be amenable to the courts, for acts done in their official capacity, in opposition to the regulations; and that government itself, in superintending these various branches of the resources of the state, may be precluded from injuring private property, they have determined to submit the claims and interest of the public in such matters to be decided by the courts of justice, according to the same manner as the rights of individuals."

The preamble to Regulation II. of 1793, which separates the judicial and financial functions, assigns the following reasons for that measure:—"The collectors of the revenue preside in the courts of mahal adawlut, as judges, and an appeal lies from their decisions to the board of revenue; and from the decrees of that board to the governor general in council in the department of revenue. The proprietors can never consider the privileges which have been conferred upon them as secure, while the revenue officers are vested with those judicial powers. Exclusive of the objections arising to these courts from their irregular, summary, and often ex parte proceedings, and from the collectors being obliged to suspend the exercise of their judicial functions, whenever they interfere with their financial duties, it is obvious, that if the regulations for assessing and collecting the public revenue are infringed, the revenue officers themselves must be the aggressors, and that individuals who have been aggrieved by them, in one capacity, can never hope to obtain redress from them, in another. Their financial occupations equally disqualify them from administering the laws between the proprietors of land and their tenants. Other security therefore must be given to landed property, and to the rights attached to it, before the desired improvements in agriculture can be expected to be effected." Guided by the foregoing principles, and for the reasons reasons above stated, Lord Cornwallis proceeded to divest the revenue board of its powers as a court of appeal, and the collectors of their authority to decide in causes relative to the collection of the public revenue; and to refer the decision of such matters, in common with all suits falling under the cognizance of civil judicature, to a new court of adawlut, which was now established in each provincial division, under the superintendence of an European covenanted servant, of higher official rank than the collector; in whose person were united the powers of judge and magistrate, and to whom was to be entrusted the superintendence of the police within the limits of his division.

Bengal printed
Regulations.

The courts of justice thus constituted, a register and one or more assistants were appointed from the junior branch of the European covenanted servants; and those of the best qualified among the natives were selected and appointed to each court, a Mahomedan and Hindoo law officer, to expound the koran and shaster, in causes which might be referable to the determination of those authorities. To each court was allowed a competent establishment of ministerial officers; and for the assistance of the parties in suits, vackeels, or native pleaders were nominated to act, when constituted on special authority for that purpose, in conducting the proceedings under the established rules; which as to the forms of proceeding in the courts, differed little from those introduced in the same departments in the year 1781.

The local jurisdiction of the several courts extends to all places included within the limits of the zillahs or cities, in which they are respectively established. All natives as well as Europeans and other persons not British subjects, residing out of Calcutta, are amenable to the jurisdiction of the zillah and city courts. But British subjects, whether in the service of his Majesty, civil and military, or otherwise, are placed under the operation of rules suitable for that purpose, and consistent with the jurisdiction of the supreme court in Calcutta, as applying to that description of the Company's subjects. British subjects not in a public employment, if allowed to reside 10 miles beyond the limits of the latter jurisdiction, are required to subject themselves under penal obligations to the authority of the zillah courts, in civil suits, wherein the amount sued for shall not exceed 500 sicca rupees; precautions are likewise observed in the regulations, to prevent that interference among the domestics and dependants of his excellency the Nawab at Moorshedabad, which in the discretion of the court which it concerns, may be avoided, "taking care at all times and in all matters, to pay every proper attention to the dignity and long established rights of the Nawab."

To prevent the time of the zillah and city judges from being occupied with the trial of petty suits, and thereby to enable them to determine causes of magnitude with greater expedition, they are empowered to authorize their registers to try causes for a value not exceeding 200 rupees. But this power being originally allowed the judge, under restrictions and obligations for his revision, which by defeating the object of saving his time, rendered it nugatory, the objectionable part of the regulation was rescinded, and the registers decree to a certain amount made final, unless the judge himself saw cause to revise and reverse it. To a greater amount than the above, the register's decisions were made referrible to the court of appeal; but the appeal has since been changed to the judge of the city or zillah court. With the same view of relieving the judge, he has more recently been allowed the discretion of referring causes of a larger amount occasionally to his register's decision, but the decrees of the latter, are no longer final in any case, an appeal lying from them to the judge, who is, moreover, empowered at any time to take a suit out of his register's hands, and try it himself.

As a farther relief to the zillah and city courts from the trial of petty suits; for the convenience of parties residing at a distance from the seat of justice; and to promote by additional subordinate judicatures, the speedy administration of civil justice, a regulation has been enacted, authorizing the appointment of native commissioners to hear and decide, in the first instance, on suits of personal property not exceeding the value of 50 rupees. These are of three descriptions; namely, aumeens or referees; salisam or arbitrators; and munsifs or native justices. The titles sufficiently designate their functions, which have undergone undergone such modifications, as appeared expedient since their first institution. The cauzecs of the four cities and other towns, are referees and arbitrators by virtue of their office; and by a regulation dated in 1803, proprietors and farmers of land, tehsildars and creditable merchants, are eligible under the discretion of the judge, for the same trust; but the munsif, or native justice, is required to be selected with peculiar care, and reported for appointment to a higher authority. These natives act, under the obligation either of an oath, or a declaration in writing to the same effect, and under restrictions devised to ensure a faithful discharge of the trust reposed in them. Their powers do not extend further than to suits for personal property of the value of 50 rupees, and from their decision an appeal may be had to the zillah or city judge, who alone has authority to enforce their decrees. The native commissioners receive no salary, nor are they allowed any establishment; but as a full compensation, receive the institution fee of one anna per rupee, or something more than 6 per cent. on the amount of all causes investigated by them, or settled before them by agreement of the parties.

In all well regulated governments, it has been deemed expedient to provide against the possibility of unjust or erroneous judgments in the courts of primary jurisdiction, by constituting tribunals of review or appeal. To render them efficient, it is necessary they should be easy of access; but previously to the year 1793, as already has been noticed, the only courts of appeal under the Bengal presidency, were at Calcutta. In suits concerning rent or revenue, which were excluded from the jurisdiction of the dewanny adawluts, and cognizable in the first instance by the collectors, the appeal lay to the board of revenue, and ultimately to the governor general in council. In causes decided by the courts of provincial dewanny adawlut, appeals lay to the governor general and the members of the supreme council, before whom (to prevent more of their time being occupied in appeal, than could be spared from the other departments of the government) the amount appealable was restricted to one thousand sicca rupees. But under this restriction, it was found that the greater number of causes decided by the provincial courts, were not appealable; moreover, the distance and expense of travelling, in many cases operated as an exclusion from the court of appeal. To remedy these defects, which were experienced in the former judicial system, the governor general in council, by Regulation V. of 1793, instituted four provincial courts of appeal; one in the vicinity of Calcutta, one at the city of Patna, one at Dacca, and the fourth at Moorshedabad; each court to be superintended by three judges (covenanted servants) styled "the first," "second, and third judge of the court, to which they were appointed;" a fifth court of appeal constituted in like manner for the province of Benares, was established in 1795, and a sixth court, for the Ceded and Conquered provinces, has been instituted in 1803. A register, with one or more assistants from among the European civil servants, is attached to each of these courts; also three native law officers (a cauzee, moofy, and pundit) with a competent number of native ministerial officers. After various modifications of the rules and restrictions, under which recourse might be had from the inferior tribunals to the provincial courts of appeal since 1793, in subsequent regulations passed in the years 1794, 1795, and 1803, it appears that an appeal now lies to the provincial courts of appeal in Bengal, Bahar, Orissa and Benares, in all causes whatever that may be tried by the judges of the city and zillah courts in the first instance; but the decrees of the latter, on appeals from the native commissioners, are final, and likewise from their registers, except for real property, where the decision of the latter is reversed; in which case, an appeal lies to the provincial court of appeal. But the latter court is allowed a discretion to admit an appeal in any case, wherein it may see special reasons for so doing. The provincial courts are empowered to take further evidence, as they may think necessary for the just determination of the suit before them, or to refer the suit back to the court in which it originated, with special directions to the judge, regarding the additional evidence he is to receive, as may be deemed most conducive to justice, recording in every case the reasons for exercising the powers thus vested in them. The provincial court, in common with the city and zillah courts, are prohibited from corresponding by letter with the parties in suits, or with each other, on matters within their cognizance. All official intercourse is by certificate or precept in writing under the official seal and signature; and every process, rule and order, limits a certain time for the execution and return being made to the same: disobedience or negligence in an inferior court, being reported to the sudder dewanny adawlut at Calcutta, which has power to suspend the judge from his office, notifying the same for the determination of the governor general in council. "If any person shall charge the judge of a city or zillah court before the provincial court of the division, with having been guilty of corruption, in opposition to his oath, the provincial court is to receive the charge, and to forward it to the sudder dewanny adawlut; provided the complainant shall previously make oath to the truth of the charge, and give security, in whatever sum the court may judge proper, to appear and prosecute the charge when required." On such a charge, the sudder dewanny court proceeds, in a manner which will be hereafter stated. By these rules, which restrict the provincial court from the exercise of any personal authority over the judges of the city and zillah courts, the respect due to official character is meant to be maintained; while a strict observance of the regulations, and the subordination requisite for the public service, is preserved by the authority delegated to the sudder dewanny adawlut, under the control of the governor general in council. But the principles on which these rules have been established, may be best explained, by an extract from the minute of Lord Cornwallis, by whom they were introduced, dated 11 February 1793. "To prevent the characters of the judges being wantonly aspersed, rules should be laid down to deter people from making groundless accusations. The provincial courts should not be permitted to make enquiries in the first instance, into the charges that may be preferred against the zillah or city judges, but should be directed to forward them to the sudder dewanny adawlut. This court shall issue a special commission to the provincial court to make such enquiries, and to take such evidence respecting the charges, as it may think advisable. The observance of this formality will be essential; it will not obstruct the bringing forward of well founded complaints; at the same time, it will operate to deter people from making groundless charges. To delegate to the provincial courts of appeal a power to enquire into such charges, without a previous reference to the sudder dewanny adawlut, would in fact be making the judges of the city and zillah courts personally subject to their authority. This would even deprive the city and zillah judges of all weight and consequence in the eyes of the people, and lessen that respect with which it is necessary they should look up to their decisions. The judges of the provincial courts should possess no authority over the judges of the city and zillah courts personally; their control over them should be only that of a superior court empowered to revise their decrees, when regularly brought before them in appeal."

From all decrees of the provincial courts, in cases where the value of the thing decreed exceeded one thousand rupees, an appeal was originally allowed to the sudder dewanny adawlut, consisting of the governor general and members of the superior council, with the cauzy ul cauzant, or head cauzy, two moosties, two pundits, a register, assistants, and other ministerial officers: but the appeals preferred being found to occupy too much of the court's time, the limitation for appeal was, in 1797, extended to suits for money or personal property not exceeding, in amount or value, five thousand rupees. This limitation proving insufficient for the intended purpose, it was in the following year, extended likewise to real property of the same estimated value.

Notwithstanding these alterations in the rules for limiting appeals, the accumulation of undecided causes so far increased, as to require more time for their decision, than could conveniently be spared from the various duties which the governor general in council had to perform. The same observation was applicable to the proceedings in the nizamat adawlut, or superior court of criminal jurisdiction; which court also was composed of the members of the supreme government, assisted by the law officers and ministerial officers before mentioned. Moreover it was deemed essential, by Lord Wellesley, "to the improvement of the persons and properties of the native inhabitants of these provinces, that the governor general in council, exercising the supreme legislative and executive authority of the state, should administer the judicial functions

"functions of government by the means of courts of justice, distinct from the legislative and executive authority." It was accordingly determined that the government should relinquish the jurisdiction of the sudder dewanny and of nizamat adawlut, and place it, in courts especially instituted; over which were to preside, three judges, denominated the chief, second and third judges; the chief judge to be one of the junior members of the supreme council, and the other two, to be selected from among the covenanted civil servants, not being members of the supreme council. By a subsequent regulation of the government, however, the sudder dewanny and nizamat adawluts were made to consist of three judges, neither of whom was a member of the supreme council: But this arrangement was annulled in the year 1807, and a new one, adopted; by which the number of judges was augmented to four, the chief justice being a member of council, as formerly. Since that period, a regulation has been passed, for augmenting the number of puisne judges, according as from time to time, may appear necessary for the dispatch of business.

The power of admitting special appeals in all cases which the provincial courts of appeal possess, is likewise vested in the sudder dewanny adawlut; and in all these courts, the rules for receiving, trying and deciding appeals and suits, originally instituted, are, as far as circumstances would admit, founded on the same principles. The judgments of the court of sudder dewanny adawlut are final in all cases within the limitations prescribed by the statute of 21st Geo. 3d. cap. 70. sec. 21. namely £.5,000. at the medium rate of 50,000 current rupees; beyond that limitation, an appeal lies to his Majesty in council, in conformity to the statute above referred to. But no rules having been prescribed by that statute for the admission of appeals, the governor general in council has established the following to be in force, until his Majesty's pleasure, be known thereupon:—"All persons desirous of appealing from a judgment of the sudder dewanny adawlut to the King in council, are required to present their petition of appeal to the sudder dewanny adawlut, either themselves, or through one of the authorized pleaders of that court, duly empowered to present such petition in their behalf, within six calendar months from the date in which the judgment appealed against may have been passed. In cases of appeal to his Majesty in council, the court of sudder dewanny adawlut may either order the judgment passed by them to be carried into execution, taking security from the party in whose favour the same may be passed, for the due performance of such order or decree as his Majesty his heirs or successors may think fit to make on the appeal; or to suspend the execution of their judgment during the appeal, taking the like security in the latter case from the party left in possession of the property adjudging against him; but in all cases, security is to be given by the appellants to the satisfaction of the sudder dewanny adawlut, for the payment of all such costs as the court may think likely to be incurred by the appeal, as well as for the performance of such order and judgment as his Majesty his heirs or successors shall think fit to give thereupon."

It remains to notice such general provisions relative to the whole of the civil courts, as have not been mentioned, in describing them separately.

For the convenience of suitors in the courts of civil judicature, and to obtain for them the assistance of natives of character and education, better qualified than their private agents formerly employed could be supposed to have been, a regulation was enacted for the selection and appointment of native pleaders, or vackeels, in the zillah and civil courts, and in the courts of appeal, and sudder dewanny adawlut, under the rules and restrictions calculated to secure to their clients a diligent and faithful discharge of their trust. The great number of regulations at this time, and subsequently enacted; and the form and precision required to be observed in the judicial proceedings, has rendered it indispensable that the natives, who are in general represented as illiterate, should have guides to conduct them through the intricacies of the new institutions. Previously to their practising, the pleaders are required to take and subscribe an oath, binding them to a faithful discharge of the duties they undertake; and (in consequence, as it is understood, of the greater obligation of a retrospective oath upon the conscience of Mahomeddars) pleaders of the Mahomeddan faith are directed to be sworn sworn half yearly, to the truth and fidelity of the duties they have actually discharged. To afford the pleaders and all other persons the means of gaining a knowledge of the regulations introduced by the British government, printed copies and translations are ordered to be kept for public inspection upon a table expressly allotted for that purpose, in every court room, where any person may refer to them, and take copies. Each court is moreover furnished with a considerable number of copies of the regulations, for distribution among the vacceels of the court and others, as far as they will go. The pleader is engaged by a small retaining fee, and ultimately rewarded by a per centage on the amount sued for, which is awarded to him to be received from his client, or from the opposite party, as determined by the decree. Many rules and restrictions for the guidance of the public pleaders, and to ensure their fidelity towards their clients, are provided, which it would be superfluous to insert here, but which are detailed in the code of regulations printed by the government.

The choutahy, or fourth part of the value of property recovered in a court of judicature, seems to be considered in most parts of the Indian peninsula, as the compensation or fee due to the ruling power, for the administration of justice. The early abolition of this exaction, on the accession of the British power to the government of Bengal, and in lieu of it, the introduction of a small per centage on the institution of the suit, has been noticed. This institution fee, under subsequent modification, continued to be received until the establishment of the courts of dewanny adawlut and courts of appeal, in 1793, under the new system; when, with a view of affording the readiest possible means of relief to such as should be compelled to have recourse to judicial process, it was provided, that no expense whatever beyond the fee of the pleaders, whom the parties might choose to entertain, and the actual charge of summoning their own witnesses, should be incurred in the prosecution of any civil suit, or in the appeal. But this indulgence, arising from motives of humanity, misapplied to a community peculiarly disposed to litigation, was soon found to be productive of such an inundation of suits, as was likely, by overwhelming the provincial adawluts with business, to put a stop to the course of justice altogether; and the government was obliged to have recourse again, in 1795, to an institution fee, as well as to fees on exhibits, established at rates, such as might render law more expensive, without discouraging recourse to it, where the cause of action might be well founded. As a further discouragement to litigation, and with the view of increasing the revenue derivable from stamps, the pleadings in civil suits tried by the judges and registers of the civil and zillah courts, and by the courts of appeal, as well as all miscellaneous petitions presented to these courts, are required to be written on stamped paper, of a certain size and description, bearing a duty in proportion to its magnitude. But with a view to afford more speedy decisions in the first instance, on claims for rent, or for possession of land, than the forms and deliberate proceedings of the courts could afford, which was become more necessary in consequence of the removal of all such suits from the collector's office into the courts of justice, a regulation was enacted for a summary mode of proceeding, to be exempt from the usual fees and expenses incurred in other cases. The same exemption from expense is allowed in case of poverty; but the plaintiff or appellant in forma pauperis is required to establish his pretensions by witnesses, and to find bail for his appearance on requisition from the court, and is placed under such other restrictions as appear calculated to check unnecessary or vexatious litigation. Rules are established for the prosecution of charges of corruption or extortion preferred against the ministerial officers, European or native, attached to any of the civil or criminal courts of judicature; and likewise for the investigation of any similar charge against a city or zillah judge or judges of any court of appeal, and for a reference of the case at discretion for trial by special commission, or to the sudder dewanny adawlut, or before the supreme court of judicature, under the provisions made by act of parliament in the latter case.

Besides the forms and mode of procedure prescribed for the several courts, in receiving, trying, and deciding causes, subsidiary rules of various kinds have been established, for the security and benefit of the natives; among which perhaps the most important is, that for preserving to them their own laws and usages, in certain cases, originally introduced by the plan for the administration of justice in 1772, and continued continued in the existing regulation, in the following terms:—"In suits regarding succession, inheritance, marriage and cast, and all religious usages and institutions, the Mahomeddan laws, with respect to Mahomeddians, and the Hindoo laws with regard to Hindoos, are to be considered the general rules by which the judges are to form their decisions;" for the assistance of the European judges, the Mahomeddan and Hindoo law officers, attached to each court, expound the law of their respective persuasions by written answers put to them for that purpose, quoting the books of authority which they follow. It is not usually deemed necessary to subject the proceedings to the delay which would ensue from a reference to the law officers, in all matters of contract and dealings between individuals; but, in all cases of an intricate or special nature, not expressly provided for by the regulations or when the parties themselves particularly desire it, it is customary, and obviously consonant to the general rule, that the matter, in contest, should be determined by the law of the parties. In one instance, wherein the custom of succession to a zemindary differed from the law of succession to landed property, the government has interfered in favour of the latter, since the acknowledgment of proprietary right by the Company in the zemindars. This custom, which accords with the general law of England, had been established from immemorial usage in Bengal, Bahar and Orissa, whereby zemindaries of great extent, on the death of the possessor devolved entire to the heir, in exclusion of his relations, who were entitled to a suitable maintenance only from the produce of the estate. This custom has been abrogated by Regulation XI. of 1793, as tending to prevent the general improvement of the country.

Reg. III. 1793.

Harington's Analysis of Bengal Laws and Regulations.

See Reg. X. 1800.

The regulations above cited, with another, for supplying ascertained defects in the Mahomedan laws relative to loans and interest, with provisions for defining and securing the rights of landlords and tenants, appear to be the whole of the rules which the British government has yet found it necessary to prescribe, in amendment of the established laws and usages of the country, upon matters of private contract and inheritance. But the right has been reserved, and declared, by which the government may, at any time, introduce remedial or supplementary laws, such as further experience may suggest to be expedient and necessary for the benefit of the inhabitants at large. These, whenever the necessity for them occurs, are required to be printed and submitted for previous inspection and approbation at home, in the mode prescribed by act of parliament.

For the purpose of preserving the records of the courts of judicature, and to facilitate the means of reference to them, two native keepers of the records are appointed for each of the city and zillah courts, civil and criminal, the provincial courts of appeal, and the sudder-dewanny and nizamat adawlut. In the several courts of civil justice, is likewise required to be kept a diary of proceedings, in which every order or act of the court is to be minuted in the language in which it is issued, with references to the pleadings, depositions, exhibits, and other papers, read and filed in each cause; and for the information of the sudder-dewanny adawlut, the zillah and city judges are required to furnish a monthly report of causes decided by themselves, their registers, and the native commissioners in their respective jurisdictions.

The provincial zillah and city courts, are allowed to adjourn annually during the Hindoo festival called dussarah, which is fixed, and occurs in parts of the English months of September and October; and during the Mahomeddan fast, which is moveable. The court of sudder dewanny has a discretion allowed for its adjournment.

THE CRIMINAL COURTS OF JUSTICE.

IT has already been noticed, that the introduction of the new system of internal government in 1793, divested the collectors of the office of magistrate, as well as of judge; and transferred these functions to the zillah and city judges. Previously to entrance on his office, the magistrate takes an oath, binding himself to perform the duties required of him by the public regulations, to the best of his ability, to act with impartiality and integrity, and not to accept himself, or knowingly allow any one acting under him, to accept, any fee or reward, or any emolument, beyond what government authorize. His local jurisdiction as magistrate is co-extensive with his jurisdiction as judge; and all persons, Europeans as well well as natives, not being British subjects, are amenable to his authority. Natives residing within the town of Calcutta, or within the local jurisdiction of the supreme court of judicature, are not of course included in the rule cited. To obviate the ill consequences which might result from the exemption in favour of European British subjects remotely situated, the magistrates are required to qualify themselves by oath, taken before one of the judges of the supreme court of judicature, to act as justices of the peace; and rules are specially provided for the apprehension and conveyance to Calcutta, of persons of the above-mentioned description, who may render themselves liable to criminal prosecution in the supreme court.

Reg. IX. 1793.

It is declared to be the duty of the magistrate, "to apprehend murderers, robbers, thieves, housebreakers, and persons charged before him with crimes and misdemeanors;" and in certain cases, such as abusive language, calumny, assaults or affrays, he is authorized to pass sentence himself, though subject to the controul of the courts of circuit and nizamat adawlut, and to punish the offender with corporal chastisement, imprisonment or fine, within certain limits. These powers have been since enlarged, by regulation the IX. of 1807, whereby the magistrates are authorized to pass sentence on petty thefts, and other offences, not exceeding 12 months imprisonment, or a fine not exceeding 200 sicca rupees. A discretion is, by the same regulation, allowed to the magistrate, in regard to the rank and condition in society of the person accused, whom he may have to summon or apprehend, lest, by implicitly following the original mode prescribed for his guidance in such cases, he should violate the rules of decorum so scrupulously observed among the natives, and thereby inflict unmerited disgrace, or provoke new crimes. The same consideration for the customs and deep-rooted prejudices of the natives, has suggested various modifications of the rules originally established for compelling appearance before the magistrate, in cases which require it, or for proceeding to confiscation of property, and proclamation of outlawry, in the event of incorrigible contumacy or resistance to process on the part of the accused; and it is not altogether improbable, that towards the inhabitants of the provinces recently brought under the British dominions, still farther relaxation may be required from the strictness of the original rules founded on the practice of European judicature, than may be necessary in Bengal and other parts of the country which have been longer under the British dominion, where the inhabitants are consequently better qualified to comprehend the reasonableness of a system, which disregards rank, and in the dispensation of justice, nearly confounds all distinction of society.

The registrar of the city or zillah adawlut, and his assistants, are assistants to the magistrates. The services, likewise of the native law and ministerial officers, are common to both courts; to which also, in some instances, are attached schundy, or provincial corps of native troops, especially embodied to guard the jail, and applicable to any service the magistrate may require.

The jails appear to have been, formerly, any building in the vicinity of the court of justice, which could conveniently be hired or appropriated for the purpose. Under the new system, prisons have been erected, at a great expense, on plans, separating the debtors from the criminals, and prisoners under sentence from those detained for examination, or for further evidence. In these prisons also, the women are kept apart from the men, and every attention is paid to the health and suitable accommodation of the prisoners. The European surgeon of the station is required to afford his medical aid with that of a native physician acting under him; and, to ensure a strict observance of the rules established for these purposes, a report is required by the nizamat adawlut from the judge of circuit, of his having visited the prison in person, and of the state in which he found it.

Depositions before the magistrates are written commonly in the Persian and Bengal language and character, on separate papers, signed, attested and arranged according to their respective dates. But the original regulation still in force, requiring a record of all complaints, and the orders upon them to be kept in the English language, has been found to be burdensome and useless, as to have become obsolete in practice. This is very much to be regretted. It appears to your Committee, that a body of English records would be found, in the course of time, highly valuable to British India, and to the learned and philosophical in Europe, as opening new views of society and manners.

When the magistrate has satisfied himself as to the nature of the case before him, he either releases the prisoner, admits him to bail, administers the punishment within the limits of the power delegated to him, or commits him for trial before the court of circuit.

The magistrates, on receiving notice of the time when the judges of circuit are expected to arrive, require, by public advertisement, the attendance of all persons admitted to bail, as well as of all prosecutors and witnesses bound over to appear before the court of circuit. On the arrival of the judges of circuit, the magistrates lay before them a calendar of the prisoners committed or held to bail, specifying, besides the names of the prosecutors and prisoners, a brief statement of each case. The calendar is accompanied by the proceedings of the magistrates on each charge, and all material documents relative thereto. A second calendar, containing the particulars, and accompanied by proceedings, in all cases, of prisoners apprehended on charges cognizable by the court of circuit, but discharged for want of evidence; and a third calendar, of persons tried for crimes and misdemeanors, cognizable by themselves and their assistants, specifying the charge and the sentence.

Reports are made monthly by the magistrates to the nizamat adawlut; 1st, of persons apprehended, specifying the name, date of charge, and the order passed thereupon for punishment, committed for trial before the court of circuit, or released: 2d, of casualties by death, removal to other stations, or escapes, and of prisoners released: 3d, of prisoners sentenced by the court of circuit in each month: 4th, a report of prisoners whose trials are under reference to the nizamat adawlut: 5th, a report of sentences received from the nizamat adawlut in the present month: 6th, a report of prisoners under charge of the magistrate to be tried by the court of circuit. The magistrates also transmit to the nizamat adawlut, half-yearly reports of convicts in confinement under sentences, within twenty days after termination of session, by the court of circuit;—And in the month of January, two annual reports are, by a late regulation, to be furnished, of all criminal cases depending before the magistrate and his assistants, specifying the name of the accused, and the particulars concerning his case: 2d, an abstract statement of the number of robberies, and other crimes of a heinous nature, reported by the police officers to have been committed within their respective jurisdictions, in the course of the preceding English year; the number of persons supposed to have been concerned in the commission of such crimes, and the number apprehended and convicted, or committed for trial, before the courts of circuit. The object of the last report appears to be for the information of the government, of the crimes which may be prevalent in the different districts, and of the efficiency of the measures adopted for the suppression of them.

When the numerous duties required of the magistrate, in his double capacity of judge and magistrate, together with the precision and strictness of the rules under which he acts, are considered, it will not appear unreasonable that he should be allowed to delegate a portion of his magisterial functions to his assistant; accordingly, the magistrate may empower his assistant, when he shall have taken the prescribed oath, to decide on petty charges and misdemeanors, to the same extent that he himself is authorized, by the original regulation of 1793. But these powers are delegated only in cases of necessity from want of time, and then under restrictions, which would render the magistrate censurable, were errors frequently committed by his assistant. Before an explanation be given of the mode of procedure in the courts of circuit, it may appear necessary to say a few words on the nature of the laws by which those courts are guided.

In making the Mahomeddan law the rule for the administration of criminal justice, the British government has followed the practice of the Mogul government, reserving to itself, the right of introducing such alterations and modifications, as reason and humanity may suggest. The koran is commonly understood to be the standard of the Mahomeddan law; but, containing few passages applicable to the ordinary occurrences of life, the deficiency is supplied by numerous numerous commentators, not only on the text, but on the traditional accounts, precepts, actions and decisions of their prophet. These writings are the productions of eminent lawyers, from among the two religious sects which divide the Mahomeddians all over the world—the Shya, followers of Alee; and the Souces, or more general traditionalists. The authoritative writings of Aboo Haneefa, and his disciples Aboo Yousuf, and Imam Mahommud, who were of the latter sect, govern judicial decisions in India. When no precedent can be found in these authorities, but in the decisions of subsequent lawyers, the cauzee is by the Mahomeddan rule, directed to abide by the judgment of the latter; and in the want of precedent altogether, the cauzee may exercise his own judgment. The principal distinctions of the Mahomedan penal code are classed, as follows: 1st, Kissas, or retaliation, including disjut, or the price of blood. 2d, Hoodud, or prescribed penalties. 3d, Tazeer and Sedsut, discretionary correction and punishment. The nature of the first may alone be sufficient to suggest the necessity which the British government, at an early period of its administration, felt, for interfering to controul the futwas, or sentences of the nazim, when given on the principle of retaliation, or of the fine for blood. In 1772 some additional rules were introduced, for the punishment of a particular description of public gang robbers, termed Decoits, concerning whom more will be noticed under the head of Police. But on the assumption of the nizamat, or administration of criminal judicature in 1790, and the reform of the courts of circuit, and formation of the new code of regulations in 1793, a wider range was taken in modifying and supplying the defects of the Mahomeddan law, for the government of decisions to be passed in the provincial criminal courts. The most important and necessary of these alterations were, in overruling the distinctions made by Aboo Haneefa, and directing, that in determining on the punishment to be inflicted for the crime of murder, the intention of the party, rather than the mode or instrument used, should be considered; in controlling the sedsut, or discretionary correction, and introducing a remedy to the obstruction of justice, arising either from interference or neglect on the part of the heirs of the person murdered, and in commuting sentences of mutilation to imprisonment and hard labour. The deficiencies of the Mahomeddan authorities were supplied, in regard to what might be deemed an adequate punishment for perjury and forgery, or subornation of either of these crimes, which have a peculiar prevalence among the natives of India; and to this intent, in addition to the ordinary punishment, the gross offence is marked in characters indelible on the offender's forehead.

For the punishment of gang robbery, the government found it necessary, in 1807, to enact special rules; the Mahomeddan code not furnishing any thing sufficiently applicable to the peculiar character and practice of the banditti, termed Decoits, who infest the lower provinces of Bengal, and appear to carry on their depredations more frequently and to a greater extent of late, than in former times. The latest measures to which the government have had recourse, for the suppression of decoits, will be noticed in the III^d division of this Report.

The right existing in the government, to alter the Mahomeddan law, appears to have been virtually recognized in the Act of the 13th George III. chap. 63. sect. 7. vesting in it, authority for the ordering, managing and governing, "in like manner (as the Act recites) to all intents and purposes whatever, as the same now are, or at any time heretofore might have been exercised by the president and council in select committee;" because it was then before the legislature, that the president and council had interposed, and altered the criminal law of the province in 1772. Such alterations, and all future necessary amendments thereof, appear, by the above clause, to be legally sanctioned; and it may be observed, that the alterations in question, are sufficiently justifiable on the principles of reason and humanity.

The government has also deemed it expedient to take measures for putting a stop to the barbarous practices of certain Hindoos, not sanctioned by their shaster, in devoting the life of infants to the sacred waters; of certain Hindoos of high cast in Benares, who, on a prospect of inability to provide suitably for their female children, were induced not unfrequently to put them to death; and of other casts of Hindoos, who, with a view to deter the execution of legal process, or in revenge for a supposed injury, would murder their females or their children, under under a persuasion that by such means, they could command and direct spiritual vengeance against their adversaries. But in regard to immolation in the various modes practised by self-devoted victims, who are invariably Hindoos, no further interference is permitted to take place, on the part of the magistrate, than may be necessary to ascertain from the party, that the resolution taken has been voluntary, and in nowise influenced by improper means.

The public Regulations in 1799 and 1804, provide for the trial of persons charged with crimes against the state; and in the event of war and open rebellion existing in any part of the British provinces, the governor general, by a special regulation of 1804, may suspend the ordinary functions of the criminal courts, and authorize the introduction of martial law. And the government, "for reasons of state," has reserved to itself, the power of ordering into confinement, and retaining there, any persons whatever, where the exigency of the case may appear to require it.

Originally, there were four courts of circuit, each consisting of the three judges, who composed the provincial courts of appeal, with the native law officers attached to those courts. The same registers and the same native officers are attached to both courts. They act under the obligation of an oath specially prescribed; and the native law officers of the court of circuit take a retrospective oath every six months, for the reasons before stated, in the case of the native pleaders. In 1795, a fifth court was established for the provinces of Benares, and in 1803, another court of circuit for the provinces obtained by treaty from the Nawab of Oude. Under the jurisdiction of the latter, was afterwards (in 1805) placed the territory conquered from Scindeah in the Doab and on the right bank of the Jumna; and in 1806, an adjustment of the zillah and city jurisdictions, (comprehending the entire provinces under the Bengal presidency) being made, the whole were included in the divisions of the courts of circuit, according to the following arrangement:

CALCUTTA DIVISION:

" 1. Burdwan;—2. Jungle Mohauls;—3. Midnapore;—4. Cuttack;—5. Jessore;—6. Nuddea;—7. Hoogly;—8. Foreign Settlements of Chinsurah, Chandernagore, and Serampore;—9. Twenty-four Pergunnahs."

DACCA PROVINCE:

" 1. Mymensing;—2. Sylhet;—3. Tipperah;—4. Chittagong;—5. Backergange;—6. Dacca Jellalpoore;—7. City of Dacca."

MOORSHEDABAD DIVISION:

" 1. Bhanglepore;—2. Purnea;—3. Dinagepore;—4. Rungpore;—5. Rajshahy;—6. Beerbhoom;—7. City of Moorshedabad."

PATNA DIVISION:

" 1. Ramghur;—2. Bahar;—3. Tirhoot;—4. Sarum;—5. Shahabad;—6. City of Patna."

BENARES DIVISION:

" 1. Mirzapore;—2. Allahabad;—3. Bundelcund;—4. Juanpore;—5. Goruckpore;—6. City of Benares."

BAREILLY DIVISION:

" 1. Cawnpore;—2. Furruckabad;—3. Etawah;—4. Agra;—5. Allyghur;—6. South Saharunpore;—8. Mooradabad;—9. Bareilly."

The jail deliveries at the four principal cities are held monthly; that of the 24 pergunnahs (in the vicinity of Calcutta) quarterly; those of the other zillahs, half yearly. By the original regulation of 1793, the judges of each division formed courts for the circuit; one consisting of the first judge, accompanied by the register and moofy; the other of the second and third judges, attended by the second assistant and cauzy. As this necessarily closed the provincial court during during the absence of the judges, it was ordered, in 1794, that two of the judges should hold the two courts of circuit; while the third in rotation remained at the latter station, to execute the current business of the civil court; but this too much obstructed the decision on appeals, for which the presence of two judges was necessary. It was therefore, in 1797, enacted, that instead of two judges holding a jail delivery, one of the two junior judges should proceed in turn on the circuit; while the senior, with the other, remained for the decision of appealed civil causes at the sudder or chief station. This rule remains still in force, with the exception (by a regulation in 1806) of the senior judge being now required to take his turn on the circuit, in common with the other two.

The judge of circuit holding the half-yearly jail delivery, proceeds to the residence of the magistrates of each zillah, within his division, and remains there till he has gone through the calendar, which the magistrate lays before him on his arrival. The proceedings of the court of circuit are ordered to be conducted in the following manner: "The charge against the prisoner; his confession, which is always to be received with circumspection and tenderness if he plead guilty; the evidence on the part of the prosecutor; the prisoner's defence, and any evidence which he may have to adduce, being all heard before him; the cauzy or moofsty (who is present during the whole of the trial) writes at the end of the record of the proceedings the futwa or exposition of the Mahomeddan law, applicable to the circumstances of the case, and attests it with his seal and signature. If the futwa of the law officers acquit the prisoner, and the judge, after attentively considering the evidence and circumstances of the case, concurs in such acquittal; or if the futwa declare the prisoner to be convicted of the charge, or of any part of it, and the judge concurs in such conviction, and be by the regulations empowered to pass a final sentence on the case without reference to the nizamat adawlut, he is to pass sentence accordingly, and to issue his warrant to the magistrate for the execution of it. If the judge of circuit disapprove the futwa, and have not by any regulation been authorized to pass sentence, then, notwithstanding such futwa, whether for the punishment of the prisoner or for his acquittal or discharge, if the prisoner be duly convicted, and liable to a sentence of perpetual imprisonment or death, the proceedings upon the trial are to be referred for the sentence of the nizamat adawlut. If the judge of circuit concurs with the law officers in the conviction of the prisoner or prisoners, and none of them be liable to a sentence of death, the judge is empowered to pass sentence; but the sentence, in all cases referable to the nizamat adawlut, is not final until confirmed by that court. In all trials referred, the judges are required to notice, in their letters accompanying the proceedings, the particular cases, which under the public regulations are deemed proper to incur capital punishment, imprisonment for life, or extension or mitigation or remission of punishment; stating at large the grounds of their judgment, whether for or against the prisoner."

If the judge of the circuit disapprove the opinion of the law officers, on any reference to them on points of law, or on any question arising in the course of the trial, not especially provided for in the public regulations; he is nevertheless to be guided by it, but he may withhold passing sentence, until the proceedings in the case, together with his own objections, have been referred for the consideration of the nizamat adawlut.

In the mode prescribed for the attendance of the witnesses and taking their depositions, care is taken to preserve the decorum due to sex and condition, according to the customs of the country.

As soon as practicable after the conclusion of each trial, a copy of the record is transmitted to the nizamat adawlut, accompanied with an English letter, stating the opinion of the judge on the evidence adduced. The record includes the whole of the proceedings, with every examination and material paper taken by or delivered into court, and Persian translations of all examinations which may have been taken down in any other language. The whole of the papers and proceedings received by the magistrate upon the case referred, are also transmitted.

On the return of the judges from their circuit, they are required to make a report to the nizamat adawlut, containing such observations as they have made during during the circuit, touching the effects of the present system in the prevention and punishment of crimes; the state of the jails, the treatment and employment of the prisoners, and whatever matters appear to deserve the notice of the Court.

These reports are forwarded to the government by the nizamat adawlut, accompanied with their observations upon them, containing, as they are understood to do, the most authentic representations of the state of the country, and the operation and effects of the internal government. These documents are of great importance, and highly merit the attentive consideration of the superior authorities in this country.

The court of nizamat adawlut or superior criminal court, as constituted by the regulations of 1793, consisted of the governor general and members of the supreme council; but for reasons before stated, it was in 1801 enacted, that the court of nizamat adawlut should thenceforth consist of three judges, to be denominated respectively, chief judge, and second and third judge of the nizamat adawlut, assisted by the head cauzy of Bengal, Bahar, Orissa, and Benares, and by two moofsties; the chief judge to be one of the two junior members of the supreme council, and appointed by the governor general in council, and the other two, to be selected and appointed by the same authority from among the covenanted servants of the Company, not being in council. The regulation constituting one of the members of the council the chief judge, was in 1801, rescinded by Regulation X. of that year, which provided that the chief judge should be selected, like the other two, from among the covenanted servants, not being of the supreme council. This provision was however altered by a Regulation of 1807, already referred to, which directs that the court of sudder dewanny adawlut and nizamat shall revert to what they were in 1801, with the addition of a fourth judge in each court, to be chosen as the other two judges are, from among the covenanted civil servants of the Company; and a regulation was passed in 1811 for empowering the government to extend the number of judges, as occasion might require.

The judges of the nizamat adawlut, or superior criminal court, take and subscribe the oath taken by the judges of circuit: the register and law officers are also sworn in like manner, as the same officers in the courts of circuit. The mode and order of proceeding, and the execution of process, are alike in all the criminal courts, except that lately, owing to increase of business in the nizamat adawlut, the judges may hold separate sittings, and pass sentence; except in cases where the single judge so sitting does not concur with the judge of circuit before whom the trial took place, in which case the presence of another judge must be had before the sentence can be passed; and a similar provision has likewise been made, enabling one law officer to do, what it originally required two to perform.

The court of nizamat adawlut takes cognizance, and submits to the governor general its observations on all matters relating to the administration of justice in criminal cases, and to the police, and exercises the general powers intrusted to the late naib nazim, the Nawab Mahomed Reza Khan; but its authority, and the exercise of its functions are more defined; and by the Regulations printed in the country languages, are meant to be made generally known. In cases of life and death, as well as in all cases of corporal punishment, fine and imprisonment, the sentences of the nizamat adawlut are final. A power of remission or mitigation of punishment is however reserved to the governor general in council, whereby any unreasonable rigor, or any other objection observable in the futwa, as proceeding from the peculiar quality of the Mahomeddan law, may be obviated.

THE POLICE.

From the description which has been given of a zemindarry under the native government, it will appear that, aided by numbers of inferior officers, maintained in the different villages, the zemindar must have possessed considerable power within his limits, more especially when his zemindarry was of great extent. It has also been noticed that the Asiatic governments inclined to the establishment of individual authorities, in gradation from the sovereign downwards to the village village mockuddum or mundul. It was consistent with this principle, that the zemindar exercised the chief authority, and was entrusted with the charge of maintaining the peace of his district or zemindarry. In his official engagement, he became bound to apprehend murderers, robbers, housebreakers, and generally all disturbers of the public peace. If he failed in producing the robber, or the thing stolen, he was answerable to the injured person for the amount of the loss. If the zemindarry was farmed, the farmer who possessed the authority, incurred the same responsibility: and when committed to the charge of an officer on the part of the government, the same responsibility, and the means of supporting it, devolved on that officer. The means thus provided, were ample for maintaining the peace; and when properly directed, could not fail of efficiency, from the great number of individuals who might at any time, be called forth in defence and for the security of the inhabitants, consisting not only of the pausbauus or village watchmen, whose special duty it was to be always in readiness for that purpose, but all those likewise over whom the zemindarry authority extended. But this institution had, under the old government, fallen into a state of disorder; and it was not thought expedient to attempt its re-establishment. The reasoning upon this, as upon some other topics at this time, proceeded, as in the preamble to the Regulation XII of 1793, more on the abuse, that had been experienced of the authority in question entrusted to the zemindars, than on the means which might have been found for restoring and applying it, to the public benefit: and concluded with a declaration of the expediency of calling on the zemindars to discharge their police establishments, and of prohibiting them from entertaining any such establishments in future. Divested of the power, they were of course relieved from the responsibility, in regard to robberies committed within their limits, unless it should be proved that they connived at, or were accomplices in the offence, or "omitted to afford every assistance in their power to the officers of government for the apprehension of offenders."

*The new scheme of Police introduced by the Regulation alluded to, has divided the country into police jurisdictions of ten coss or twenty miles square. Each division is guarded by a darogah with an establishment of armed men, selected and appointed by the magistrate of the zillah. The darogah is empowered to apprehend on a written charge, and to take security for appearance before the magistrate, when the offence is bailable. In other cases, he is required to send the prisoners to the magistrate within a limited time, unless for petty assaults and the like, in which cases the magistrate himself may decide, and wherein the parties themselves agree to drop proceedings. Under such circumstances, the darogah is allowed to receive a written testimonial of conciliation termed razenamah, and to discharge the prisoner.*

The pausbauus, pykes, and other descriptions of village guards, who still have their subsistence from the village establishment, are, by the regulation above cited, placed under the authority of the darogah, who keeps a register of their names, and on a vacancy occurring in their number, calls on the zemindar, to whom the privilege still appertains, to fill it up. As an encouragement to vigilance in the darogahs, they are allowed ten rupees from the government on the conviction of every decoit or gang robber apprehended by them, and ten per cent. on the value of stolen property recovered, provided the thief be apprehended.

The cities of Patna, Dacca, and Moorshedabad, are divided into wards, guarded by darogahs and armed parties; the whole, subject to the superintendence of an officer retained from the former system, denominated cutwal, to whom the general police of the city, and regulation of the market, was entrusted. It does not appear that any oath of office has been required from the darogahs and cutwals; but being appointed on the recommendation of the magistrate, he may be considered to a certain extent, responsible for their general good conduct; they moreover all give security for their good behaviour, and are further declared punishable in the event of their violating the trust reposed in them. For the city and province of Benares, a deviation was allowed from the system in Bengal, in compliance with the recommendation of the resident, on his carrying into effect the settlement of the revenue in that district, in the manner which will be hereafter noticed. The resident was probably aware of the powerful means, when when called into action under suitable superintendence, which the zemindar possessed, of maintaining the peace of the country; and therefore, instead of annulling his authority, he proposed to render it efficient, by regulations adapted to that purpose. The zemindars and tchisildars were accordingly vested with the functions of police officers under the responsibility imposed upon them by the former system, with rules for their guidance, similar to those established for the police darogahs of the lower provinces. In the city of Benares, and in the principal towns, Jewanpore, Ghazepore, and Mirzapore, the local experience of the resident appears to have justified the introduction of regulations for the police, differing in some particulars from the system established for the principal cities in Bengal and Bahar, and better adapted to the circumstances of those places, and the temper of the people, than the latter would have proved.

An establishment of police similar to the one above described for Benares, was in 1803 introduced into the provinces of Oude, lately obtained by treaty from the Nabob; and in the following year into the more recent acquisitions of territory obtained by conquest from Dowlat Rao Scindeah, and by cession from the Peshwa. The regulation by which the latter introduction has been made, expressly provides, "that the zemindars, farmers and other holders of land, shall not be exonerated from the duties and responsibilities imposed on them " by the terms of their existing engagements, or by the ancient and established " usages of the country, for the prevention of robberies and other disorders, and " for the maintenance of peace and good order within their limits."

The systems of police thus established for the territorial possessions held under the presidency of Bengal, continued in force till the year 1807, when a considerable alteration of them was found to be expedient.

Experience had made it evident to the government that the system of police introduced in 1792, and confirmed by the printed regulations of 1793, was inadequate to the purposes proposed; and that a necessity existed for again calling in zemindarry aid, to the assistance of the police darogahs. The measures taken on this occasion by the government, for a partial recurrence to the former system of police, will be stated in the next division of this Report, where the Committee propose to enquire into the practical effects which have been experienced from the new system of internal government introduced in 1793.

Before they proceed to the third general head of their Report, on the practical effects of the foregoing system, the Committee propose to notice the measures which have been pursued by the Bengal government, for introducing the same system of internal government into the province of Benares, and into the territory more recently acquired by treaty from the Nawab Vizier, and in commutation of subsidy, and by conquest from the Mahratta states.

BENARES.

The strong objections entertained by Lord Cornwallis against the principles and the practice of the native Asiatic governments in India, induced his Lordship, at an early period of his administration, to direct his attention to Benares, with the view of extending to that province, the same reforms which he was preparing to introduce into Bengal. To effect this, it was necessary to prevail on the Rajah to relinquish the exercise of those zemindarry functions, combined with a degree of regal authority, which, if the British government did not acknowledge him by right to possess, they always allowed him to exercise; and to consent to the restoration of those landholders whom the severities of his ancestors had either driven from the province, or compelled to descend to the station of cultivators. The negotiations and preparatory measures for these purposes were conducted, under instructions from the supreme government, from the years 1787 to 1794, and ended in the conclusion of an agreement, dated 27th October 1794, whereby the Rajah relinquished the administration of his zemindarry concerns into the hands of the British government, with the exception of what related to certain lands of inconsiderable extent, which had been hitherto the patrimony of his family, when inferior zemindars, or enjoyed as jagheers or regal grants from the Mogul government. Over these lands, the Rajah retains some share of his former authority; but in all other parts of the province,

The systems of police thus established for the territorial possessions held under the presidency of Bengal, continued in force till the year 1807, when a considerable alteration of them was found to be expedient.

BENARES.

The strong objections entertained by Lord Cornwallis against the principles and the practice of the native Asiatic governments in India, induced his Lordship, at an early period of his administration, to direct his attention to Benares, with the view of extending to that province, the same reforms which he was preparing to introduce into Bengal. To effect this, it was necessary to prevail on the Rajah to relinquish the exercise of those zemindarry functions, combined with a degree of regal authority, which, if the British government did not acknowledge him by right to possess, they always allowed him to exercise; and to consent to the restoration of those landholders whom the severities of his ancestors had either driven from the province, or compelled to descend to the station of cultivators. The negotiations and preparatory measures for these purposes were conducted, under instructions from the supreme government, from the years 1787 to 1794, and ended in the conclusion of an agreement, dated 27th October 1794, whereby the Rajah relinquished the administration of his zemindarry concerns into the hands of the British government, with the exception of what related to certain lands of inconsiderable extent, which had been hitherto the patrimony of his family, when inferior zemindars, or enjoyed as jagheers or regal grants from the Mogul government. Over these lands, the Rajah retains some share of his former authority; but in all other parts of the province, province, it was agreed that the governor general in council should "introduce the same system and rules for the administration of justice, and for the concerns of the revenue, as were, in 1793, established within the provinces of Bengal, Bahar, and Orissa."

Notwithstanding this explicit relinquishment of all interference in the revenue concerns of the province, the second article of the agreement endeavours to preserve the semblance of authority for the Rajah, in a mode so peculiar, as to induce the Committee to insert it. Article 2d. "The revenue settlement made of the lands within the rauge of Benares, &c. having taken place with the privity and approbation of Rajah Mohipnarrain Behauder, the pottahs or leases, and farigh khutties or acquittances thereof, are passed under the seal and signature of the said Rajah to the aumils, zemindars, and farmers; and the duffer or office, and kezanchee or treasurer of the said Rajah having always remained for the carrying on of the country (i. e. revenue) business, the said signature, seal, office and treasurer, are to remain in force and be continued as usual."

How the collector of the revenue has been able, consistently with his obedience to the constituted authorities in Calcutta, "to continue the Rajah's said signature, seal, office and treasurer, in force as usual," may appear difficult to conceive, unless it has been under the influence of that authority to which it is probable the Rajah has found it prudent on all occasions to submit, without entering into those contests, which the ambiguity of the terms quoted, might otherwise give rise to. By this agreement, the istemerary pottah or permanent grant made by the governor general in 1781 was recognized, whereby the revenue of the zemindary of Benares was fixed in perpetuity at 40 lacs of rupees; and as all above that amount which the province might and probably would produce under the new management, would be an excess on the fixed revenue, which the government could not, consistently with its engagement appropriate to its own advantage, it is provided, that one lac of rupees, out of this surplus, shall be enjoyed by the Rajah; and that the remainder, to whatever amount it may arise, after defraying the expense of the new judicial revenue and police establishments, together with that of a Hindoo college instituted for the study of the vedas and shasters, "shall be applied under the authority of the Company's government to the repairing of roads, the construction of bridges, the promotion of the cultivation, &c."

The resident, Mr. Jonathan Duncan, to whom was assigned the important duty of modifying the Bengal code of regulations to the circumstances of Benares, had already, by an attentive local investigation, and by temporary arrangements made during the eight years that he had superintended the affairs of the province, prepared the way for the proposed reforms. On the 27th May 1795, the settlement he had made of the land revenue was, by a regulation of the government, declared perpetual; and the whole code of regulations, as modified by his recommendation, was at the same time extended to Benares.

Under these regulations, the city of Benares, with a certain extent of country round it, formed a judicial division, and the rest of the province was distributed into three other divisions. To each of these jurisdictions, was appointed an European covenanted servant as judge and magistrate, with an establishment of European assistants and native officers, similar to what has been described in the lower provinces. A court of appeal and circuit was established at the city of Benares, for the administration of criminal justice throughout the province; the chief judge of which was constituted agent to the governor general in political concerns. The land revenue of the entire province was placed under the superintendence of one collector, and the whole of these officers, were placed under the authority and control of their respective heads of departments at the seat of government in Calcutta.

The principal points to which it was found necessary to direct the attention of the resident, in modifying the Bengal code to the circumstances of Benares, appear to have been the following:

On the relinquishment of the rajah's functions as zemindar, and in the course of the president's investigation of the affairs of the province, the landholders with whom the settlement was to be made, appeared to be on a footing somewhat different different from the zemindars of the lower provinces. They are officially designated "for the most part as *village zemindars, paying the revenue of their lands "to government jointly with one or more putteedars or partners, descended from "the same common stock;" the designation adds, that "some of these putteedars "have had their interior puttees or shares, rendered distinct; whilst those of the "major part, still continue annexed to, and blended or in common, with the share "or shares of the principal of the family, or of the headmen among the brethren, "being either one or more, whose names have been usually inserted in the "pottahs, cabooleats, and other engagements for the public revenue." There are others denominated "talookdars, who have depending on them a greater or "less number of village zemindars, many of whom, retain the right of disposing "by sale of their own estates, subject of course to the payment of the usual "jumma to the talookdar." These talookdars, by the terms of the perpetual settlement, "are left to assess their village zemindars, either in proportion to "their own sudder jumma, with some addition for the charges of management, "or according to the extent and value of the produce, as local custom or the "good will of the parties may direct." It should appear from this, that more distinct traces of the ancient Hindoo revenue system remained in Benares, than existed in Bengal, during the enquiries which were prosecuted, preparatory to the introduction of the permanent settlement of the land revenue in that province.—The village zemindar of Benares appears to be the mockuddim found in certain parts of Bahar, and the potail of the Carnatic, both of whom are head men of villages, who are responsible to the government, for maintaining and promoting the cultivation of the land, and who in the first-mentioned portions of territory possessed the right of disposing of their situations by sale or gift to others, who might enter upon them under the same obligations of service, and might enjoy the same advantages as their predecessors, either in a distinct share of the produce, or in having the settlement or farm of the village made with them, on such terms as might be agreed to, on the part of the government. The division of the crop between the government and the cultivator, in proportions which varied in a small degree in different parts of the country, appears to have furnished the rule for estimating the assessment of revenue, in the settlement which was rendered permanent. This settlement, after the best endeavours of the resident to accommodate it, to the principles of proprietary right in the land, has left many points in the code of regulations, scarcely reconcilable with such a tenure, and still to be referred to the ancient local usages, and the records of the canongoe's office. The canongoes, whose functions were abolished in Bengal, were continued in Benares under the permanent settlement, and the support of them "in the full exercise of their functions," made an express condition, in the written engagements entered into on the part of government with the landholders. The turbulent habits prevalent among the newly restored zemindars, rendered it expedient to continue them for a limited period, under the same native officer who had been employed during the former administration, termed aumil. The functions of this officer (who was and is employed under most of the native governments) partook of the joint nature of farmer and tehsildar or collector of the revenue. He was made answerable, under personal and collateral security, for the payment into the collector's treasury of the full amount of the public assessment on the lands comprised in his division, though he engaged not to collect from the landholders more than their stipulated shares of that assessment; and therefore, as a compensation for the trouble and risk, and in reimbursement of the expense of the undertaking, he was allowed a salary, computed at 11½ per cent. on the amount he collected. Under the native governments it is not unusual for the aumil to exercise the whole authority, civil and military, within his division, and to be the arbiter in cases of life and death. In Benares, after the introduction of British influence, he had been restricted to the exercise of his functions, as an officer of the revenue and police; the expense he unavoidably incurred in the latter department was understood to be provided for, in the salary above-mentioned. Provision was made for the gradual abolition of this office, by a regulation which permitted the emancipation of a landholder from the aumil's authority, whenever he should apply for, and be found deserving of that indulgence, and for the payment of his revenue directly into the treasury of the collector.

The sale of land by auction, or in any other way, for realizing arrears of land revenue, appears to have been unusual, if not unknown in all parts of India, before its its introduction by the British government into the Company's dominions. In the present settlement, it appears introduced into the cadolets or voluntary agreements of the landholders, in the following terms: They bind themselves to "pay the stipulated annual revenue punctually, and agree, in case of failure, that their property real and personal, shall be sold to make good the deficiency." In the lower provinces, the zemindars had been relieved from the charge, and prohibited from taking any concern in the police. In Benares, the resident deeming the authority, information and influence naturally acquired by the aumils or tehsildars and landholders, the strongest foundation on which the efficiency of police could be established, prevailed on the government to allow a deviation from the Bengal system, so far as to commit the charge of the police to the aumils jointly, and subordinate to them, to the landholders and farmers of land, under the responsibility for robberies or thefts committed within their respective limits, which they had been subject to, under the Rajah's government. The whole were placed under the magistrate's control, with rules for their guidance, similar to those which had been established in the lower provinces.

The code of regulations for Bengal, Bahar, and Orissa, has, with little alteration been extended to Benares, and the civil and criminal laws administered are the same, in both those parts of the Company's dominions; but in consideration of the high respect paid by the Hindoo inhabitants to their character, the Bramins of Benares have received some special indulgencies, in the mode of proceeding against them, on criminal charges; and it has been further provided in their favour, that in all cases where by the law, a Bramin would be adjudged to suffer death, the sentence shall be changed to transportation, or otherwise mitigated at the discretion of the government. On the other hand, it having been discovered that the Bramins residing in certain parts of the country, occasionally converted the reverence paid them into the means of distressing individuals, and of evading the laws, the government has interfered to suppress these practices:—among these, were the holding out the threat of obtaining spiritual vengeance on their adversaries, by suicide, or the exposure of the life, or the actual sacrifice of one of their own children or near relations. Occurrences of this nature, were not on any pretence in future, to be exempt from the ordinary cognizance of the magistrate, and the usual course of the criminal law. Another tribe of Hindoos, designated Rajekoomars, were accustomed to destroy their female infants, in consequence, as it has been understood, of the difficulty experienced in procuring matches for them in marriage, suitable to their high cast. The resident having prevailed on the Rajekoomars formally to renounce this custom, under penal obligations, any future observance of it, subjects the party offending to the ordinary punishment of murder.

Subsequently to the introduction of the foregoing regulations into Benares, the judicial establishment at Ghazepore was withdrawn; and the province is now divided between the jurisdictions of the provincial courts of Juanpore and Mirzapore and the city court of Benares. The police, established at the recommendation of the late resident, has also undergone a material change, by being withdrawn from the tehsildars (native collectors of the revenue) and the landholders, and entrusted to the charge of darogahs, or native justices of the peace, on small salaries, as in the lower provinces of Bengal, Bahar and Orissa. —The inexpediency of this alteration in the system first established, your Committee will notice hereafter, when they come to treat on the present state of the police under the Bengal presidency.

THE CEDED AND CONQUERED PROVINCES.

The Committee have next to notice the acquisition of an extensive and populous tract of Country, obtained by treaty, in the Soubahdarry of Oude; and to explain the system of internal administration introduced into those valuable provinces, which are officially designated the Ceded Districts in Oude.

By the treaty alluded to, bearing date the 20th November 1801, his excellency the Nawaub Vizier, in commutation of subsidy, ceded to the honourable the East India Company in perpetual sovereignty, the provinces above-mentioned, yielding, according to the schedule, an annual gross revenue of Lucknow Sicca Rupees 1,35,23,474. or about £. 1,600,000. sterling.

On

On the removal of the nawaub's officers, the affairs of the Ceded districts in Oude were placed under the superintendence of a lieutenant governor and board of commissioners, to whom were confided the settlement of the revenue and the formation of a temporary scheme of internal administration, which was intended to continue, till sufficient information should be acquired of the circumstances of the country, to warrant the establishment of a more permanent system. Under this temporary provision, the European civil servants of the Company acting under the orders of the lieutenant governor, and stationed in the districts into which the acquired territory was divided, possessed individually the entire civil authority, officiating as collectors of the revenue and judges and magistrates within their respective limits. The functions of the commissioners were more laborious, and of yet greater importance than those of the judges of appeal and circuit in the lower provinces; their duties requiring them to assist the governor general in council, and the lieutenant governor, in the formation of laws and regulations adapted to the state and condition of the dominions recently obtained; and in their capacity of a court of circuit and appeal "to superintend the administration of the laws over a great extent of country, and over a race of people, unaccustomed to any regular system of order or law, and habituated to commit the utmost excesses of violence and oppression."

The duty of the collectors combined the labour and difficulty of ascertaining the resources of a new country; of settling a system of law and revenue in all its details, and of collecting that revenue, with the arduous charge of administering the offices of magistrate and judge to a people, such as has just been described.

The affairs of the Ceded districts in Oude, continued under the administration thus formed, till the beginning of the year 1803; when a settlement of the land revenue having been concluded for a period of three years, and the other purposes of the lieutenant governor's appointment being accomplished, the lieutenant governor resigned his office; and the commission for the provisional government of those provinces, was dissolved.

Though the proceedings of the commission had been regularly submitted for the approbation of the governor general in council, the lieutenant governor, on his resignation of office, delivered in a Summary of the arrangements which had been made in the Ceded districts; from which the following particulars have been obtained:

The collection of the land revenue for the year in which possession was received from the vizier's officers, proceeded on the existing engagements with the landholders and aumils or native collectors: but on the expiration of that year, the foundation was laid for a permanent assessment, by the conclusion of a settlement for three years with the landholders, in all instances where it was found practicable, on the terms proposed. In other cases, the lands were let to farm, and in a few instances, the collections were left to be made from the cultivators, by the officers of government. These engagements for the land revenue proceeded in some instances, on russud or annual augmentation, founded on the expectation of increased cultivation; and the increase thus obtained for the third year of the settlement over the estimate at which the lands had been received in commutation of the subsidy, appears to have 32,99,589 Lucknow sicca rupees, or an advantage gained by the cession, of more than 19 per cent. on the Vizier's rent roll. In addition to this, a prospective augmentation of the revenue was expected by the lieutenant governor from a new regulation of the customs, from a duty imposed on the sale of spirituous liquors, and from an extension to this part of the Company's dominions, of the monopoly of salt; which, altogether would, after deducting the expenses of establishments necessary for the administration of an improved system of government, augment the financial resources of the East India Company, by a considerable excess in their nett receipts from Oude, over and above what had ever yet been obtained from the vizier, on account of subsidy. The actual amount thus stated in prospect, by the lieutenant governor, was 56,38,012 Lucknow sicca rupees, or more than half a million sterling per annum; and although the expectations thus formed, have not in every instance been fulfilled, the revenue realized since the cession, has, under the disadvantages of an unfavourable season, and after temporary incursions of cavalry in the course of the late Mahratta war, exceeded the amount formerly received, as subsidy. The advantages, however, which the supreme government had in view, from the acquisition of these provinces, were chiefly of a political nature, to be derived from internal arrangements calculated for the security of property, and the tranquillity and happiness of the native inhabitants.

The internal administration to which the servants of the East India Company succeeded in Oude, appears to have been of the worst form of those described in the former part of this Report. The nawab Vizier having divided his territorial possessions among aumils or native collectors (who entered into agreements for the payment of a stipulated amount of revenue) committed the entire authority and control, civil and military, over the inhabitants, to their discretion. The landholders were chiefly of the class which has been described in Benares, as village zemindars; but there were others of higher rank, who bore the title of rajah, and appear rather, in the condition of tributaries than of subjects. While these persons discharged their assessment of revenue, they were left to the exercise of absolute dominion within their limits. They possessed strong holds, garrisoned by their adherents, and not unfrequently withheld the revenue, till compelled to the payment of it, or to a compromise, by the approach of a military force. The negligencies, defects and abuses, which prevailed in the government of Oude, are forcibly stated in many documents which have been laid before the House, and particularly in a paper addressed by the late MARQUIS CORNWALLIS, when governor general, to the late nawab Vizier, dated the 12th August 1793. In this paper, Lord Cornwallis earnestly exhorted his excellency to exert himself in effecting those reforms in the internal administration of his affairs, which appeared indispensable, not less for his own ease, than for the introduction of order and regularity among his subjects. His lordship did not propose an introduction of the system which had been recently applied to Bengal; but a reform of the system which properly belonged to the Vizier's dominions; a recurrence to which, in its more perfect state, under a just and vigorous administration, would in his opinion, have been sufficient to restore the affairs of Oude to the flourishing condition in which they had been left by Sujah ul Dowlah, at whose death, his lordship reminded the Vizier, that he succeeded to "a full treasury, disciplined troops, a regular revenue, and sub-missive subjects."—It may have been in consideration of these circumstances, and of the inexpediency of a sudden and violent change, that LORD WELLESLEY was induced, on the acquisition of these provinces, to frame his first institutions for the management of them, more on the model of the native governments, than on the system introduced into the lower provinces. Hence, the entire authority for the collection of the revenue, the administration of justice, and the preservation of the public peace, was centered in one individual civil servant, appointed to superintend each provincial division. The checks upon the collection of the land rents, existing in the putwarries or village accountants, and in the canongoes or public notaries, were left untouched; and the police was entrusted to the landholders and native collectors, under the responsibility to which they had been always accustomed.

The same considerations which influenced the adoption, might have induced, a continuance of this mode of internal administration, till the natives should have had the benefit of a longer acquaintance with their European rulers; but the strong encomiums which had uniformly been bestowed on Lord Cornwallis's institutions, had probably influenced the determination, by which the Bengal regulations were introduced into the Ceded provinces of Oude, with a degree of precipitation, that appears, on no other grounds to be intelligible.

The application of the Bengal code of Regulations to the provinces ceded by the nabob Vizier, bears date the 24th of March 1803. The regulations are printed and published for general information, as in the lower provinces; and such modifications have been added, as the condition of the natives of the new country rendered advisable.

The Ceded provinces are divided into seven zillahs or districts; in each of which, are stationed a civil servant, exercising the functions of judge and magistrate, and another civil servant exercising the functions of collector of the revenue. A court of appeal and circuit is established at the town of Bareilly, and and the establishments of registers, assistants, and native law and ministerial officers to these departments, are such, as have been described in Bengal.

In the department of the police, the system introduced into Benares has been adopted in preference to that of Bengal; and the tehsildars or native collectors, and principal landholders, are accordingly vested with powers for the apprehension of all robbers and other disturbers of the public peace, under the obligation of either producing the offender, or of making good the loss.

In the department of the revenue, a regulation was enacted recognising and confirming the triennial settlement of the land revenue, made by the board of commissioners, and approving the separation of the sayer or impost duties, from the mehaul or land revenue, made at the same time, notifying also, that at the expiration of the triennial term, another settlement would be made, with the same persons (if willing to engage) for three years, "at a fixed equal annual jumma or assessment, to be formed by taking the difference between the annual amount of the first lease, and the actual yearly produce of the land at the time of its expiration, and adding two-thirds of such difference to the annual rent of the first lease;" at the expiration of this term, a settlement for four years would be made, "with the same person, if willing to engage, at a fixed equal annual jumma, formed by adding to the annual rent of the second three years, three-fourths of the net increase of the revenue during any one year of that period." It was further notified, that at the end of the last mentioned term of four years (completing altogether the term of ten years, from the first settlement) a permanent settlement would be concluded "with the same persons (if willing to engage, and if no others with a better claim should come forward) for such lands as might be in a sufficiently improved state of cultivation to warrant the measure, on such terms as the government should deem fair and equitable." In these terms, the supreme government pledged itself to the landholders for the introduction of a permanent settlement of the land revenue, at the expiration of a period, such as originally was proposed as experimental for the same purpose in Bengal; but without the reservation then observed, of the approbation of the court of directors to confirm the agreement. It may however be presumed that this omission was an oversight; which a subsequent regulation repaired, when the government had to determine on the system of internal administration, which it might be proper to introduce into another extensive acquisition of territory, more recently annexed to the dominion of the East India company, in the same part of India.

The provinces alluded to are those which were conquered from the Mahratta chieftains, Scindia and the Berar rajah, and others, which about the same time, were ceded to the East India company by his highness the Peshwah, in commutation of subsidy. The former comprehend the principal part of the Dooab or tract of country confined between the rivers Ganges and Jumna, the country situated on the right bank of the latter river, from its leaving the mountains of Cashmeer to near its confluence with the Ganges; and the province of Cuttack, situated westward of Midnapore, and uniting, by the course of the sea-coast, the provinces subject to the Bengal presidency to those under the presidency of Fort St. George. The latter acquisition or ceded territory consists of the province of Bundelcund, situated on the right bank of the Jumna, above Allahabad.

These provinces, with the exception of Cuttack and Bundelcund, were, during the continuance of the Mahratta war, placed under the general control of his excellency the commander-in-chief, the late LORD LAKE; whose orders, the civil servants entrusted with the immediate charge of them, were directed to obey; but in 1805, after the conclusion of peace between the British government and the Mahratta chieftains, the lands in the Dooab, and on the right bank of the Jumna, with the exception of the city and vicinity of Delhi, were formed into five districts, under the administration of judicial and revenue officers, and placed under the controul of the superior authorities at the presidency, in the same manner as the Ceded provinces in Oude, to which these are contiguous. The city of Delhi, and a tract of country round it, have been continued under the nominal authority of the Mogul; but are really under the government of the British resident.

FIFTH REPORT from the Select Committee on the

I.
BENGAL.

Reg. IX. 1805.

The government determined to extend to these provinces the code of regulations which had recently been introduced into the ceded districts of Oude and the vicinity; and similar habits of the people, rendered little modification of the regulations necessary. On this occasion, the British government notified to the landholders in these provinces, the plan which it was intended to adopt for the settlement of the land revenue. This plan was precisely the same as that which has been described, in reference to the Ceded districts in Oude, namely, the sayer or impost duties, to be separated from the mehaul or land revenue; and settlements of one, three, and four years in succession, to be concluded; the last of which settlements was to become permanent, if agreed to by the landholders.

Sect. 5. Reg. X.

These terms, though promulgated in a printed regulation of the government, could not in every part, be rigidly adhered to; a severe drought had diminished the produce of the harvests in a degree that rendered remissions of the current revenue unavoidable; and it seems at length to have occurred to the government, that in the promise of a settlement in perpetuity, at the expiration of the term specified, they had exceeded their authority, and gone beyond the powers assumed on a former occasion by LORD CORNWALLIS, who promised such a settlement to the landholders in the lower provinces, only on the condition of the future approbation of the court of directors. The government accordingly, in Regulation X. 1807, supply this omission, by informing the landholders, that the settlement for the term of four years, being fixed in perpetuity, will depend on the confirmation of the court of directors being obtained to that arrangement.

When the settlement made for three years approached to a termination, and it became necessary to prepare orders for the settlement of four years, which might, in consequence of the notification, become permanent, the government deemed this a measure of so much importance, as to require the superintendence of a special commission, which was therefore appointed. The commission consisted of a member of the board of revenue, and another experienced civil servant, with a secretary, accountant and assistant, and a competent establishment of native officers. In this commission, was vested the general control of the revenue affairs of the Ceded and Conquered districts, with the exception of the territory assigned for the support of the royal family at Delhi, and the province of Cuttack; the powers and authority delegated to the commissioners being the same, as those which before had been exercised in these provinces, by the board of revenue.

Revenue Letter to Court of Directors;
dated 31st July 1807.

In communicating to the court of directors the establishment of a commission for the above purpose, the government observed, that the distance of the Ceded and Conquered provinces from the presidency; and the difficulty of obtaining accurate information respecting the actual resources of the land, had demonstrated, that the control of the board of revenue (in whom that duty had been vested from the time of the dissolution of the subordinate government of the Ceded provinces) was less efficient in the formation and adjustment of assessments, than was desirable, considering the great importance of the duty, both to the government and the landholders; and that these, and other local reasons, had rendered the commission necessary.

Revenue Letter to Court of Directors;
dated 15th Sept. 1808.

Having entered on the execution of their commission, it appears, that doubts began to be entertained, of the expediency of concluding a permanent settlement, in the newly acquired territory; and it was deemed advisable to call for the opinions of the collectors, which were accordingly given in answers to queries, circulated by the commissioners on the various points connected with the measure in question.

It is to be regretted, that the detailed proceedings of the government, and the commissioners, on this subject, are not yet arrived from India; the copies originally sent having been lost with the ships which conveyed them; but the result is collected from the general correspondence of the Bengal government.

The commissioners, in their final report on this interesting and important subject, under date the 13th April 1808, stated their opinions to be adverse "to the immediate conclusion of a permanent settlement in the territories subject to their control;" and as they were probably apprised of its being the fixed determination of the government to carry through the proposed arrangement, at all events, resigned their offices, rather than be the instruments of measures measures, which their judgment, founded on local observation, could not approve.

It is impossible to suppose, the commissioners in delivering their opinions, could have been actuated by any other motive than a consciousness of the inexpediency of the measure; nor is any other motive imputed to them by the government. It is therefore to be regretted that their proceedings are not yet before the Committee, as it is probable, that their reasons, adduced against the immediate introduction of a permanent settlement, will be found to proceed on local circumstances, presenting obstacles to an arrangement, which, on general principles, the commissioners themselves might be ready to approve. The government letter of the 15th September 1808, which announces the resignation of the commissioners, refers to their report, and to the minutes recorded in council, which are stated to be in answer to it. The letter itself, contains no further argument in support of the measure, than an appeal to the discussions which led to the permanent settlement in the lower provinces; and to the experience which has been had of its favourable effects, in that part of the country. In a subsequent dispatch, of the 31st August 1810, the government avoid entering into any detailed discussions, "because" (as they observe) "the principal reasons which can be assigned a priori, for the measure, have already been submitted; and because the reports and information which they were from time to time, receiving from the new board of commissioners (appointed in the room of those who had resigned) would probably when complete, establish the expediency and sound policy of the measure, beyond a question."

It is not at all surprising that the court of directors should not have been convinced by arguments founded on general principles, when the propriety of the measure proposed to be adopted in these provinces, depended altogether on local reasons, or a knowledge of the resources of the country recently acquired, and on the actual fitness of the people to receive the benefits which might be intended for them. In all these particulars, the prevailing weight of evidence is decidedly against the immediate conclusion of a perpetual settlement in these provinces; and accordingly, the directors, in their reply, stated it to be not their intention to proceed immediately to the introduction of such a settlement in the Ceded and Conquered provinces, "because it would be premature to fix in perpetuity the land rents of those countries, at so early a stage of their connexion with them, when their knowledge of the revenue actually derived from them by the zemindars, and of their capability must be necessarily imperfect, and when the people are yet, so little habituated to their government." They further proceed to observe, "that the mistakes committed in the settlement made of the lower provinces, under all the advantages that a long experience of their resources afforded, and the inconveniences which were felt from it, though the natives, had been so much longer under the British government, suggested the danger of precipitancy in the measure proposed, and point out the propriety of great caution and deliberation being observed, in proceeding to a measure, which is to be irrevocable."

para. 45 & 46.

The court of directors were not at this time, in possession of the report of the commissioners, which had been forwarded to England on one of the lost ships. A copy of it, was afterwards received; and having been taken into consideration, a letter was dispatched to India at the latter end of last year, in which the court adopted a still more decided language against any immediate or early measures for permanently settling the Ceded and Conquered provinces; and restrict the government abroad from entering into leases, for a longer period than five years. In this dispatch, they defer giving any opinion upon the system of administration which it may eventually be proper to introduce into those provinces, the revenues of which have not been definitively fixed, intending at an early period, to convey their sentiments fully on the subject: and state their impression, as produced by the perusal of the document above referred to, "that the proposed final settlement of the revenues of these territories would be premature, supposing the arrangement otherwise to be completely unexceptionable: that it would be attended ultimately, with a large sacrifice of revenue; that they were by no means sufficiently acquainted, either with the resources of the country, or with the rights and ancient customs of the different classes of landholders, to venture upon a step of so much importance, and in its nature, irrevocable; and "that whether the measure may be eligible at a future period, and what modifications it may be prudent to apply to it, are questions, which will remain open for discussion." The intention of the Bengal government to proceed to the conclusion of a permanent settlement was announced to the inhabitants of the Ceded and Conquered provinces, in a Regulation, bearing date so long before, as the 24th March 1803, wherein the approbation of the court of directors, as a condition, is omitted. This omission, as the Committee have already stated, was supplied by a subsequent Regulation.

Though the two commissioners appointed in the room of those who resigned, will probably be more compliant than their predecessors, and proceed to execute the orders of their superiors, without waiting to enquire into and discuss the expediency of them, yet it may be presumed, that, on the receipt of the foregoing instructions, the Bengal government will postpone the proposed settlement, to give time for more ample information being transmitted to the court of directors, than has yet been furnished, respecting the nature and resources of the new acquisitions; the extent of the land cultivated, and of that capable of being made so; the quality and value of the produce, the land tenures; the mode of collecting the rent, whether in money or by a division of the crop, with the proportions of the latter, allotted to the government, its officers, and the cultivator; the recent history of the revenue administration, and the local usages; the character of the inhabitants, with other objects which might suggest themselves in the course of a local enquiry. All these particulars, the court of directors will naturally desire to be made acquainted with, before they proceed to give their sanction to arrangements, which are to define and establish the land tenures, and fix, in perpetuity, the amount of territorial revenue to be derived to the state.

The Committee have now reported on the system of Internal Government, introduced by LORD CORNWALLIS, and established by a code of Regulations promulgated in 1793; and have, in each department of Revenue, Judicature and Police, noted such modifications as were soon after adopted, to render those regulations more perfect.

The Committee have also stated the manner in which the same system has been extended to the province of Benares, and to the territories lately acquired by treaty from the Nawaub Vizier, and by commutation of subsidy and conquest from the Mahratta states.

The Committee will next proceed to explain the practical effects of the New System, from the period of its introduction, down to that of the latest advices received from India.

III.

ON THE PRACTICAL EFFECTS OF THE NEW SYSTEM OF INTERNAL GOVERNMENT.

THE REVENUE DEPARTMENT.

UNDER the Native Government, and, to a certain extent, under the British administration of the Indian provinces, previous to the late change of system, it had been customary for the landholders of distinction, and other principal inhabitants, to maintain, in proportion to their rank, an intercourse with the ruling power; and in person, or by vakeel (or agent) to be in constant attendance at the seat of government, or with the officer in authority over the district, where their lands or their concerns were situated. To establish an interest at the durbar, and to procure the protection of some powerful patron, were, to them, objects of unceasing solicitude. This intercourse and these pursuits, were at an end, or had become useless, under the new system; the zemindar was become vested with proprietary right in the land: the assessment on it, to which he had voluntarily tarily acceded, was permanently fixed, and he was referred to the Code of Regulations, as the only protection longer necessary to maintain him, in the possession and enjoyment of these benefits. As long as he should conform strictly to the rules therein laid down for his guidance, he would have nothing to fear; but might with confidence look to the administration of the laws for his security; on the other hand, it behoved him, with diligence and accuracy, to inform himself fully in regard to what those laws were, lest he should expose himself to the penalty to be incurred by a breach of them.

The improvement of the country, and the security and happiness of the inhabitants, which the government expected would follow gradually from this change of system, equally depended on a due conformity throughout the community, to the regulations introduced; and it was rendered of importance, therefore, that the operation of the regulations, whether favourable or otherwise, should be distinctly known.

To this end, general encouragement was given to the European servants employed in the different departments; and it was declared by Regulation IX. of 1793, to be a point of duty for the judges of circuit, to report officially their observations on the subject: and a form was provided, for bringing under the notice of the government, any imperfections in the existing Laws, and for proposing a remedy, in the form of new ones. The first exercise of this duty, appears to have occurred, on the following important occasion.

The new system had abolished, under severe penalties, the exercise of the power formerly allowed the landholders, over their tenantry and cultivators, and of the collectors of the revenue, over the landholders; and had referred all personal coercion, as well as the adjustment of the disputed claims, to the newly established courts of justice.

The Regulation which, in pursuance of these principles, provided for the liquidation of the dues of government, by the sale of the defaulter's lands, was sufficiently brief and efficient; but the rules for the distraint of the crop or other property, founded on the practice in Europe, and intended to enable the zemindars to realize their own rents, by which means alone they could perform their engagements with the government, were ill understood, and not found to be of easy practice. In the courts of civil judicature, the accumulation of causes, undecided, had proceeded to such an extent, as almost to put a stop to the course of justice; or, at least, to leave to a zemindar little prospect of the decision of a suit, instituted to recover payment of his rent, before his own land, by the more expeditious mode of procedure, established against him by government, was liable to be brought to sale in liquidation of an outstanding balance. These circumstances, were brought under the notice of government so early as the year 1795, by the board of revenue, in consequence of representations which had been made to them from different parts of the country; and particularly from the extensive and populous district of Burdwan, where the number of civil suits, pending before the judge, was stated to exceed thirty thousand; and where, by computation, it was shewn, that in the established course of proceeding, the determination of a cause could not, from the period of its institution, be expected to be obtained, in the ordinary course of the plaintiff's life.

The government in their answer to the board of revenue, and in their observations addressed to the court of directors, appeared unwilling to admit that the evils and grievances complained of, arose from any defects in the public regulations; and in regard to some particular instances which were stated, the government ascribed them chiefly to the mismanagement, which had long marked the conduct of many of the principal zemindars; a correction of which, might be looked for from time, and the operation of the principles of the regulations. The very grounds of the complaints which had been brought forward, the government farther observed, namely, those whereby the tenantry were enabled to withhold payment of their rents, evinced that the great body of the people employed in the cultivation of the land, experienced ample protection from the laws, and were no longer subject to arbitrary exactions. It appears, however, that the evils complained of did not affect the cultivators, but the zemindars; who now in their turn, suffered oppression from the malpractices of the former, and from the incompetence of the courts of justice to afford them redress; and as a further progress of them, was likely to affect the interests of the government, by exposing exposing portions of the land sold, to the hazard of a reduction in the rates of the assessment, as well as the property of the zemindars, it became indispensable that a remedy should be applied. The government accordingly proceeded, first to modify the rules for restraint; the object of which, as far as they were meant to afford the landholders the means of enforcing payment from the tenantry and cultivators, were found to be counteracted by some of the restrictions under which they were to operate. The objectionable clauses were therefore repealed, and a new Regulation introduced for remedying those defects. Additional courts of adawlut were established; and the number and powers of the natives entrusted with the decision of suits of small amount, were immediately increased and enlarged; but, with respect to the delay which had been ascribed to the established forms of proceeding, the government did not think any alteration necessary, observing that "forms were equally essential to the due administration of justice," and to the quick decision of causes." The efficacy of the reforms thus introduced, the government observed, would appear from the operation of the regulation, which required periodical reports to be made by the judges of circuit; and in regard to the state of the business in the courts of justice, a new regulation was enacted, requiring monthly and half yearly reports to be made, of the decision of causes, as well as of the number remaining on the file in the several courts of justice throughout the country.

In announcing to the court of directors these measures of reform, it was stated, that the discussions which led to the adoption of them, would evince the beneficial operation of the new system of internal administration; in which it was provided, that in the event of any of the regulations being found inadequate to the end proposed, or productive of inconvenience, the evil would become immediately forced upon the notice of government, in a shape, which, while it marked its nature and extent, would suggest the application of a proper remedy.

The experience of the four following years, did not justify the expectations formed with regard to the efficacy of the remedies applied; but shewed, that the inconveniences and grievances complained of, still prevailed. The revenue was not realized with punctuality; and lands to a considerable extent, were periodically exposed to sale by auction, for the recovery of outstanding balances. In the native year 1203, corresponding with 1796-7, the land advertised for sale comprehended a jumma or assessment of sicca rupees 28,70,061. In the extent of land actually sold bore a jumma or assessment of sicca rupees 14,18,756.† and the amount of the purchase money sicca rupees 17,90,416.‡ In 1204, corresponding with 1797-8, the land advertised was for sicca rupees 26,66,191. The quantity sold was for sicca rupees 22,74,076. and the purchase money sicca rupees 21,47,580. Among the defaulters, were some of the oldest and most respectable families in the country. Such were, the rajahs of Nudda, Rajeshaye, Bishenpore, Cossijurah, and others; the dismemberment of whose estates, at the end of each succeeding year, threatened them with poverty and ruin, and in some instances, presented difficulties to the revenue officers, in their endeavour to preserve undiminished the amount of the public assessment.

It was however remarked, that during the period which had now passed since the introduction of the permanent settlements, although the revenue had not been realized with the punctuality which might have been expected, yet neither the assets nor the amount realized, had fallen below the amount of former periods, but had even exceeded that standard of comparison. In proof of this, the government, in a letter of 31 October 1799, refer the directors to their orders of 12 April 1786; wherein their expectation of an assessment was stated at sicca rupees 2,60,00,000. whereas the average of the actual collections, since the conclusion of the settlement, had exceeded that amount by more than five lacks of sicca rupees annually, besides an available balance, which remained at the end of the preceding April, of sicca rupees 29,00,000.

The government farther observed, that this had been effected, though the personal coercion formerly practised, had been abandoned, and the most scrupulous punctuality observed, in maintaining inviolable the public engagements; that whenever a deviation had taken place, it had never been with a view to augment the resources of the government, but on the contrary, to relieve the individual, by a sacrifice of the public interest.

These

These observations were probably made, with a view to reconcile the directors to what might otherwise appear an unfavourable state of affairs in the revenue department; for, besides the distresses, which as before-mentioned, had befallen a large portion of the principal zemindars, and the continual advertisements which were made in the public newspapers, of land on sale for the recovery of arrears, the territorial revenue was so far from being realized with the facility and punctuality deemed necessary, that some of the members of the board of revenue, in consequence of the heavy balances which at this time occurred, went so far as to recommend and strongly to urge a recurrence to the former practice of confining the landholders, for enforcing the payment of arrears. This, the government declined adopting, on the ground that it would have a tendency to degrade the characters, and weaken the authority and respectability of the landholders, and thereby deprive them of the influence derivable from personal exertion, at a moment when the state of their affairs rendered personal exertion, most necessary for their relief. The government was of opinion, that the fear of losing their estates which were liable to sale to liquidate the balance of revenue, would operate more powerfully with the zemindars, than any considerations of personal disgrace; and they deemed it essential to strengthen, rather than adopt any measure which might reduce, the power of the zemindars over their under-tenantry, who, it appeared had, under the general protection afforded by the courts of justice, entered into combinations, which enabled them to embarrass the landholders in a very injurious manner, by withholding their just dues, and compelling them to have recourse to a tedious and expensive process, to enforce claims which ought not to have admitted of dispute.

In explaining to the court of directors this state of affairs, it was observed, that the licentiousness of the tenantry, although its effects, as involving the zemindars in ruin, were in particular cases to be regretted, indicated nevertheless a change of circumstances which ought to be received with satisfaction, inasmuch as it evinced the protection intended to be afforded by an equal administration of justice, to be real and efficient; and shewed that the care and attention which the directors, with so much solicitude had urged the government to observe for preventing the oppression formerly practised by the more powerful landholders, had not been exerted in vain; and that in the success of those exertions, a foundation had been laid for the happiness of the great body of the people, and in the increase of population, agriculture and commerce, for the general prosperity of the country. On a minute entered by a member of the board of revenue, respecting the ruin of some of the principal zemindars, and a great proportion of the landholders, the government observed, that it was unnecessary to refer to any other than the ordinary causes of extravagance and mismanagement, to account for what had happened in the instances in question, which were not such, as in a series of years, should excite any surprise; that "it had been foreseen, that the management of the large zemindaries would be extremely difficult, and that those immense estates were likely, in the course of time, to fall into other hands, by becoming gradually subdivided, an event which however much to be regretted, as affecting the individual proprietor, would probably be beneficial to the country at large, from the estate falling into the possession of more able and economical managers." On the same subject, in a subsequent dispatch, wherein the government notice the ruin of the rajahs of Dinagepore and Rajeshaye, whose estates had been at different times attached, and at length wholly sold, it is remarked, that it would be a satisfactory reflection, that what had happened to these large zemindaries, would place the lands in the possession of better managers, who might be expected to improve the country, and with their own interest to promote those of the industrious cultivators of the soil, and to extend the general prosperity of the country.

It was thus, in explaining to the authorities at home, the effects and tendency of the new system, that the government generally found something to commend. When the operation of the regulations proved adverse to their expectations, in one respect; in another, something had occurred to console them for the disappointment; by shewing that some different, but equally desirable end, had been attained. Thus, though the rules for restraint of property, instead of supplying the exercise of power formerly allowed the zemindars, had enabled the tenantry and cultivators to combine (as it is asserted) and ruin their landlords; yet this circumstance, it was observed, evinced that the great body of the people experienced rienced ample protection from the laws, and were no longer subject to arbitrary exactions. Thus too, when the sale of estates, and the dispossession of the great zemindars were, to be announced, it was remarked that however much the ruin of these defaulters was to be regretted, the directors would perceive with satisfaction, that the great ends were obtained by it, of dividing their estates, and of transferring the lands which composed them, into the hands of better managers.

These remarks your Committee cannot but notice, would appear inconsistent with the sentiments of liberality and benevolence, which are displayed through many parts of the India correspondence, and might suggest a doubt in regard to the sincerity of the intentions expressed by the ruling authority, for the prosperity of the principal zemindars, were it not certain that at the time they were written, the government and its principal officers were assiduously employed, in devising remedies for the evils complained of. This appears in the ample discussions which took place on the subject, and in the enactment of new regulations which were introduced on the occasion. But before the Committee proceed to explain these measures, they propose offering a few remarks on the apparent causes which reduced the landholders to a condition as above exhibited, so different from what might have been expected, under the operation and influence of the new system.

The principal cause of the distresses alluded to, appears to have grown out of the condition introduced into the permanent settlements, which declared, that the land should be held, as a security for the amount of the revenue assessed upon it, combined with the circumstance under which that condition was enforced, for the recovery of arrears of revenue.

Under the native governments, the recovery of arrears from defaulters was sometimes attempted by seizure and confiscation of personal property, or by personal coercion. The zemindar might experience the mortification of having the administration of the zemindary taken out of his hands, and entrusted to a sezawul. He might be imprisoned, chastised with stripes, and made to suffer torture, with the view of forcing from him the discovery of concealed property. He was liable to expulsion from the zemindary. He might be compelled to chuse either to become Mussulman, or to suffer death. But under whatever degree of adversity the zemindars might fall, or whatever might be the extremity, or injustice, or cruelty practised on them, they had still the consolation of preserving their rank, and of being considered as zemindars. They themselves might come under the displeasure of the government, and experience its severities; but their families would still maintain the consideration due to their station in society, with the chance of recovering, in more favourable times, possession of their zemindaries. The policy of those governments, was adverse to the dispossession of a zemindar, who, by means of his family connexions and cast, might return and disturb the possession of his successor. Hence it appears, that even in cases where the zemindar, from rebellion or other misconduct, was deemed deserving of death, the succession of a near relation, or of an infant son, or of a widow placed under tutelage, was generally deemed preferable to the introduction of a stranger to the possession of the zemindary.

Under the British administration, down to the period of the introduction of the permanent settlement, and the new code of regulations, it had not been usual to resort to the sale of land for the recovery of the arrears of revenue; and in a minute recorded on the proceedings of the board of revenue in July 1799, it is asserted, "that from the Company's acquisition of the ceded lands (consisting of the 24 pergunnahs, the districts of Burdwan, Midnapore and Chittagong) comprehending, until the formation of the permanent settlement, a period of thirty years; and from the accession to the Dewanny until the above mentioned time, there had hardly an instance been found of the property in landed estates having changed hands, by cause of debts, either public or private; certainly of the large ones, none." Although the engagements entered into for the five years settlement, contained a clause subjecting the land to sale for the recovery of arrears, it does not appear that the measure was any where resorted to for that purpose, although heavy balances occurred, which to a considerable extent, proved irrecoverable. The landholders were, therefore, compared by any experience they could have had under the former governments, whether native or British, for the rules which were, by the terms of the permanent ment settlement, introduced for the recovery of arrears of revenue from defaulters, and were perhaps not aware of the necessity, which the nature of the settlement imposed, for a rigid enforcement of them.

These rules in their original form as they stand in the code of 1793, rendered the zemindar liable to imprisonment, and his lands subject to attachment, if the whole or portion of any monthly instalment (in which the revenue was payable) should remain undischarged, on the first of the month following. At the close of the year, if the arrear was not by that time discharged, the whole, or a due proportion of the estate was to be exposed to sale by public auction, for the recovery of the balance due, together with interest at the rate of 12 per cent. per annum, which was to be charged upon it.

In the following year 1794, the governor general being, as it is stated in the preamble to Regulation III^d of that year, solicitous "to refrain from every mode of coercion not absolutely necessary," an alteration was introduced, which exempted the landholders altogether from imprisonment; but, in other respects, rendered the rules for the recovery of arrears of revenue, much more rigid and severe, by empowering the revenue officers to bring the land to sale at any time in the course of the year, on the failure in payment of any monthly instalment; instead of waiting for that purpose, until the close of the year.

It was probably foreseen that this regulation altogether, but more especially the modification as above introduced, though it spared the person, would put the property of the zemindar to considerable hazard. The proportion of the produce of a zemindary, fixed as the government share at ten elevenths of the rent paid by the tenantry, though it had not in all cases, been fixed with minute exactness, sufficiently shews that it must have been in most cases, a large proportion; and that the most attentive and active management was indispensably necessary, to enable a landholder to discharge his instalments, with the punctuality required by the public regulations. In cases therefore, where any inequality unfavourable to the zemindar occurred, in fixing the amount of his assessment at the permanent settlement, the danger of his falling in arrear, must have been enhanced; and if once in arrear, and his estate placed under the management of a native agent, deputed by the collector to hold it in attachment, and collect the rents, the dismemberment of his estate, and sale of his lands, must for the most part, have been inevitable. When the characters of the natives in general, and in particular of the zemindars of high rank, as given by Lord Teignmouth, are adverted to, and when it is considered that the latter description of persons are not in the habit of personally transacting their own concerns, but of entrusting them to their servants, who were accustomed to seek for the means of extricating themselves from difficulties, in intrigues with superior authorities, more than in their own individual exertions; the events which have been stated in the sales of land, and in the ruin of a great portion of the landholders, will appear to be no more than the necessary consequences of the regulations above-mentioned, operating in some cases, on persons who had not yet qualified themselves to act with safety under them, and in others, operating in a manner contrary to what was the object of their enactment. With respect to the latter position, the admission of the government may be taken as authority, wherein in the correspondence above quoted, they acknowledge, that under the operations of the regulation for distraint of the crop, the tenantry had found it practicable to withhold the payment of their rents, the consequences of which could have been no less in all cases than the distress, and in many, it may be presumed, the ruin of their landlords.

In addition to these disadvantages, which the zemindars laboured under, the slow progress may be noticed of suits through the courts of judicature, to which they were referred for redress, against defaulters; though their own payments to the government admitted of no delay, but might be promptly enforced by exposure of the land to sale by auction. The hardship which these circumstances imposed, in some instances, was strongly displayed, in an address from one of the collectors to the board of revenue, in behalf of the zemindar of Burdwan. The collector observes, that he (the Rajah) begs leave to "submit it to your consideration, whether or no it can be possible for him to discharge his engagements to government, with that punctuality which the regulations require, unless he be armed with powers, as prompt to enforce payment from his renters, "renters, as government had been pleased to authorize the use of, in regard to its claims, on him; and he seems to think it must have proceeded from an oversight, rather than from any just and avowed principle, that there should have been established two modes of judicial process under the same government; the one, summary and efficient, for the satisfaction of its own claims, the other, tardy and uncertain, in regard to the satisfaction of the claims due to its subjects; more especially in a case like the present, where ability to discharge the one demand, necessarily depends, on the other demand being previously realized."

Under the circumstances which have been explained, it may not appear extraordinary if the landholders in contemplating the new system, were more struck with the inconveniences they experienced, from its introduction and early progress, than they were, with any advantages which they could promise themselves from its ultimate operation. The following passage will in some measure elucidate this point. It is extracted from a Report made to the government by one of the collectors, in answer to an enquiry as late as the year 1802, in regard to the operation of the regulations for collecting the revenue from the zemindars.

"All the zemindars, with whom I have ever had any communication, in this and in other districts, have but one sentiment, respecting the rules at present in force for the collection of the public revenue. They all say, that such a harsh and oppressive system was never before resorted to, in this country; that the custom of imprisoning landholders for arrears of revenue, was in comparison, mild and indulgent to them; that though it was no doubt the intention of government to confer an important benefit on them, by abolishing this custom, it has been found by melancholy experience, that the system of sales and attachments, which has been substituted for it, has, in the course of a very few years, reduced most of the great zemindars in Bengal to distress and beggary, and produced a greater change in the landed property of Bengal than has perhaps ever happened, in the same space of time, in any age or country, by the mere effect of internal regulations." In another part of the same report, the collector, after commenting on a regulation then recently introduced, observes, "Before this period, 1799, complaints of the inefficiency of the regulations were very general among the zemindars, or the proprietors of large estates; and it required little discernment to see, that they had not the same powers, over their tenants, which government exercised, over them. It was notorious, that many of them had large arrears of rent due to them, which they were utterly unable to recover; while government were selling their lands for arrears of assessment." The collector adds, "farmers and intermediate tenants were till lately, able to withhold their rents with impunity, and to set the authority of their landlords at defiance. Landholders had no direct control over them; they could not proceed against them, except through the courts of justice; and the ends of substantial justice were defeated, by delays and cost of suit."

The Committee conceive it has now been shown, that the great transfer of landed property, by public sale and the dispossession of zemindars, which were observed to take place in an extreme degree, during several years after the conclusion of the permanent settlement of the land revenue, cannot be altogether ascribed to the profligacy, extravagance, and mismanagement of the landholders; but have, to a certain extent followed, as the unavoidable consequences of defects in the public regulations, combined with inequalities in the assessment, and with the difficulties, obstructions, and delays, with which the many nice distinctions and complex provisions of the new code of regulations were brought into operation, among the very numerous, but for the greater part, illiterate inhabitants of the Company's provinces, who were required to observe them.

The disadvantages to which the interests of the Government were subjected, during the period which has been alluded to, arose from the difficulty and uncertainty there was found, in duly apportioning the demand of revenue on the subdivisions of the estates, which for the recovery of arrears of revenue, it became necessary to expose, in parcels from time to time, to sale. The public faith was pledged, not to increase the amount of revenue assessed on the land, and the great proportion which the revenue bore to the produce, rendered a correct adjustment indispensable, to prevent diminution in the established receipts; for the part of an estate estate sold might, if over rated, prove unequal in produce, to defray its assessment; the consequence of which would be, a loss to the purchaser; terminating in another sale for the recovery of an unavoidable balance, and ultimately obliging the government, either to assume possession of the estate, with its resources reduced below the scale of its assessment, or to render the proprietary right in it, worth possessing to a new purchaser, by diminishing its assessment of revenue.

By such a transaction, the portion of the original estate left with the zemindar, would be benefited, in the exact proportion in which the assessment had been unequally distributed and over-rated, on the part sold: and the government would thereby be subjected to a permanent loss of revenue, in the manner above stated.

To prevent any such inequality, the rule for assessing the divisions of landed property into two or more lots, was clear and precise, in the following terms, as it stands in Regulation I. 1793: "The assessment upon each lot shall be fixed at an amount, which shall bear the same proportion to its actual produce, as the fixed assessment upon the whole of the lands of such proprietor, including those sold, may bear to the whole of their actual produce." The exact adjustment of the revenue on lots of estates exposed to sale, would have been by this rule extremely easy, had the data been procurable with sufficient exactness: but the actual produce of the whole, or of the part of an estate, could now be known only to the zemindar and his own servants. The means which the former governments possessed, and might have exercised for this purpose, were relinquished, on the conclusion of the perpetual settlement. The directors had already prohibited the practice of minute local scrutinies: the canongoe's office was now abolished; and the putwarry or village accountant, declared to be no longer a public officer, but the servant of the zemindar. Under these circumstances, the real produce of the whole, or any part of an estate, could be known only to the proprietor; whose interest it was to represent, for the reasons above stated, the produce on the part distrained for sale, as great as possible; by which means, he might procure a diminution in the rate of assessment, on the part remaining. Deceptions of this nature would be unavailing, in cases where the whole estate was exposed to sale, in one lot; but, in the gradual dismemberment of some of the great zemindaries, they appear for a time, to have been successfully practised by the confidential servants of the Rajahs of Jessore, Nuddea, Burdwan, and other defaulters of that rank; sometimes, with a view to their own emolument, at others, to that of their employers; but in all cases, with an effect injurious to the revenue of the state.

The prevalence of these bad practices, and the imperfections in the regulations are recognized in the preamble of Regulation VII. of 1799; which acknowledges, that the powers allowed the landholders for enforcing payment of their rents, had in some cases, been found insufficient; and that the frequent and successive sales of land, within the current year, had been productive of ill consequences, as well towards the land proprietors and under-tenants, as in their effects on the public interest, in the fixed assessment of the land revenue. It further notices the purchases which it was believed some of the zemindars had made of their own lands, in fictitious names, or in the names of their dependants; the object of which, was to procure, by the indirect means which have been described, a reduction of the rate of assessment. The regulation alluded to was enacted, with the view of removing these evils and imperfections, by rendering the means allowed the landholders, more brief and efficient than they before were, for realizing their rents; and by postponing the sale of their land, for the realization of arrears of the public revenue, until the close of the current year. The power of the collector over defaulting landholders, is strengthened by the discretion allowed him to arrest, and for a limited time, to imprison their persons, without any reference to the judicial authority presiding over his district.

These alterations, as far as they depart from the rules originally introduced, appear to be, in the same degree, a recurrence towards the system which was in former practice: but however that may be, they are acknowledged to have proved highly salutary; and if their operation may be judged of, from the improved state into which the affairs of the revenue department have subsequently been brought, their efficacy for the purposes proposed, must be fully acknowledged.

It appears, from the correspondence with India, subsequent to the introduction of the improvements in question, that the balance outstanding at the close of each succeeding year, down to the latest advices, has greatly diminished; and the ultimate balances, part of which are still recoverable, become less than one-half per cent. upon the whole amount of the public assessment. The exposure of land for sale, for the recovery of arrears, has of course been, in proportion, less frequent; and it seems reasonable to infer, that the value of land has risen, in consequence of its coming less abundantly to market for sale. These are incontestible proofs of the regularity, with which the different parts of the revenue system are at length, become adjusted; and of the ability of the country to produce the amount of revenue which was assessed upon it, under the permanent settlement.

ADMINISTRATION OF CIVIL JUSTICE.

IN proceeding to describe the operation of the judicial system established in the East India Company's territorial possessions, your Committee could have wished to advert to the population of those provinces, with a view to indicate how far the means provided may appear adequate to the distribution of justice among the people, under the forms of practice prescribed by the code of regulations framed in 1793. But the enquiries of your Committee do not enable them to state, with any precision, or with much confidence, the amount of the population, even of the old territories of the Company, consisting of the provinces of Bengal, Bahar and Orissa, with that of Benares, afterwards annexed to them. The government of Bengal called for information on this head, from the collectors and judges stationed in the districts; but the returns were so imperfect, and where they were made by those two descriptions of officers, so contradictory, that no general conclusion could be drawn from them. An actual enumeration of the inhabitants of those provinces, or a calculation founded on data, promising a high degree of certainty, is still a desideratum. Nothing more has yet been produced, than the estimates of ingenious men, who differ considerably among themselves. The first opinion promulgated after the Company's acquisition of the Dewanny, concerning the population of the three provinces, was, that it amounted to ten millions. Subsequent observations led to a persuasion, that this estimate was far too low. SIR WILLIAM JONES, about five-and-twenty-years ago, thought that the population of Bengal, Bahar, Orissa, and Benares, amounted to twenty-four millions: and MR. COLERIDGE, about ten years ago, computed it to be thirty millions. If any opinion were now to be offered on a point, which has not yet been subjected to strict investigation, perhaps there would be no danger of exceeding the truth, in adopting a medium between the two last calculations, and supposing the population of the four provinces to be not less, than twenty-seven millions.

It is not to be supposed that the suits arising in such a population as this, could have been enquired into and adjusted, in a formal manner, by the collector alone; who, as exercising the functions also of judge and magistrate, presided, and was the only agent in whom authority for that purpose, was vested, prior to the introduction of the new system. Suits of importance, or such as involved property to a considerable amount in the civil department, or such as materially affected the resources of the government, or the rents of individuals in the revenue department, it is probable were investigated and reported by the collector himself, in the mode prescribed by the regulations then existing: but by far the greater part of those petty claims, which must continually have arisen between individuals possessed of little property, and spread over so great an extent of country as the districts in question, it is reasonable to suppose, were either settled by the collector or his officers, in a summary manner, or obtained adjustment among the people themselves, by modes peculiar to their tribes or caste, or by reference to their gooroots, or spiritual guides.

The principle on which LORD CORNWALLIS proceeded, to introduce a new and more perfect system of judicature, required, that means should be provided for a regular determination of suits, however small the amount, without any impediment, from the distance the complainant would have to travel for redress; and that the file of the European judge should not be encumbered with a greater number of suits of this description than he might be able to decide, without neglecting those of more magnitude.

With a view to these purposes, a selection was made from among the principal natives, of persons duly qualified; who were authorized, under regulation XL. of 1793, to receive and decide on complaints in the first instance, where the amount in dispute did not exceed the value of 50 rupees; and to these authorities, the judge was allowed to refer for decision, as many complaints that came before him, under fifty rupees, as he might think proper.

In order to afford the readiest access to the new courts of justice, it was ordained, that the deposit fee on filing a suit, should be abolished; and that in every case, an appeal might be obtained from the original decision, however small the amount sued for, to two distinct courts of appeal.

But the means thus taken to facilitate, if not to encourage litigation, by affording law proceedings at little or no expense, were soon found to defeat their own purpose, by producing such an accumulation of causes on the judges' file, as threatened to put a stop to the course of justice. In one district, the number on the file, was said to be thirty thousand; and the probability of decision to any suit, estimated to exceed the ordinary duration of human life.* The settlement of revenue disputes being now removed from the collector's office, and confined to the courts of justice; this delay equally affected the revenue of government, as it did, the interests of individuals, and rendered the application of an immediate remedy indispensable. The measures resorted to for this purpose, in the revenue department, have already been stated. In the judicial department, an additional court was established in the district alluded to; but the most effectual relief from the inconvenience sustained, was the enactment of regulation XXXVIII. of 1795, which revived the deposit fee, or commission paid on the institution of each suit, and in other respects, rendered the proceedings costly to the party cast, or nonsuited. The imposition of this expense, was expected to repress litigation in future; and with respect to the causes already instituted, they were, for the greater part, got rid of, by a requisition for the deposit fee to be paid on them, within a limited time. The suitors in general being, from local distance, uninformed of what was intended to be done, or from want of confidence in their cause, indifferent to it, or from poverty, unable to avert it, by the payment required; no greater number of suits remained on the file, when the period for dismissing them arrived, than appeared to be manageable; and the judges recommenced the exercise of their functions, so far disencumbered, as allowed them to entertain a better prospect than had yet been enjoyed, of their being able to fulfil the objects of their several appointments.

From 1795, when the above regulation was introduced, down to 1802, farther provisions were resorted to, with the same view of expediting the decision of causes, and of keeping down the number of them on the file. Thus, the registers of the provincial and city courts were, in 1796, authorized to officiate occasionally in the absence of the judge; in 1797, the commission, or fee paid on the institution of suits, was considerably augmented, and extended to the proceedings of the head native commissioners. A farther limitation was assigned to appeals; and in the same year, the expenses of process in the sudder-dewanny adawlut, in the provincial courts of appeal, and in the zillah and city courts, was farther considerably enhanced, by a regulation, which required that all law proceedings should be written on stamped paper provided for the occasion, and bearing an impost to the government.

Notwithstanding these measures, which were adopted with the view, principally, of checking litigation, and affording those who had reasonable grounds for resorting to the courts, an early decision of their suits; it appears, that in the year 1801, the number of causes undecided was again so great, as to attract the notice of the court of directors, who, in their letter dated the 23d March of that year, expressed their desire to the government of Bengal, that steps might be taken for reducing the number. The Committee have enquired into the number of causes actually depending, on the file, about this time, in the several courts, and before the native commissioners; and have given, in the Appendix, a particular statement of the same. By this statement it appears, that the number of causes depending on the 1st January 1802, before the five courts of appeal, was 682; before the judges of the 28 city and zillah courts 12,262; before the registers of the last-mentioned courts 17,906; and before the native commissioners commissioners 131,929. It appears further, that the number of causes, which had been decided in the course of the preceding period, was, in the five courts of appeal, 667; by the 28 judges of the city and zillah courts, 8,298; by their registers 14,124; and by the native commissioners, 328,064. It is to be remarked, that these numbers include the causes which were referred to arbitration, and such as were withdrawn by mutual consent of the parties; which will considerably reduce the number of those causes which underwent investigation; and, perhaps account for the almost incredible number, which must otherwise be supposed to have been decided by the judges and their registers. With respect to the suits decided by the native commissioners, though these must have consisted of petty claims, the greatest of them not exceeding the value of fifty rupees, or less than seven pounds sterling, and determined probably in a summary manner; the number is, nevertheless, such as may excite surprise, and sufficiently evinces the magnitude and difficulty of the undertaking, which proposed to administer justice by formal process, and in petty cases, to so numerous and litigious a population.

Subsequent reports are not calculated to shew, that the difficulty of keeping down the number of causes, depending on the file, has at all diminished; or that the means, resorted to for that purpose, have been as successful as was expected. A letter from the Bengal government, of the 30th September 1803, states, that although the aggregate number of suits depending throughout the provinces, on the 31st December 1802, was considerably less than the number depending on the 31st June preceding; yet "it had been found impracticable to reduce the number of depending causes, at some of the courts, sufficiently for the purpose of ensuring to the parties a prompt decision on their claims; and that this accumulation of business had taken place, in the zillah courts of Tirhoot, Dacca, Jellalpoore, and Bahar; where it appeared, that the number of causes depending, exceeded the number which had been decided, or dismissed from the file, in the course of the five preceding years." Under these circumstances, an early decision of suits was not to be expected in the courts alluded to; and the government resolved on instituting the office of assistant judge, in cases where the state of the file might render it necessary to resort to that measure: the appointment to cease, when the arrear of causes, should be sufficiently reduced. The judges were at the same time empowered to refer causes of greater amount, to the decision of the native commissioners, than had before been allowed; and additional provisions were made, for expediting the decision of causes of small value. These measures, the governor general expressed his confident expectation, would have a material tendency to expedite the decision of civil suits throughout the country. It is yet doubtful, how far this expectation has been fulfilled, or how far the court of directors have been relieved from the solicitude they appear to have felt on this subject; when in their remarks, addressed to the Bengal government, on the 14th September 1803, having noticed the almost incredible number of suits undecided, they observe, that "to judge by analogy of the courts in Europe, they would be induced to think so great an arrear would scarcely ever come to a hearing." Noticing in another letter of a recent date*, the accumulation of suits under the Presidency of Fort St. George, the Directors have expressed the following sentiments, which in the opinion of the Committee are just, and applicable to both Presidencies; "We should be very sorry, that from the accumulation of such arrears, there should ever be room to raise a question, whether it were better to leave the natives to their own arbitrary and precipitate tribunals, than to harass their feelings, and injure their property, by an endless procrastination of their suits, under the pretence of more deliberate justice." In justice, however, to the assiduity of the European civil servants, entrusted with the administration of the laws, it must be observed, that however great the number of causes in arrear may appear to be at any one period, to which the remark of the court of directors can be applied, the number of decisions passed in the course of the year preceding, will be found to have been proportionably great; so that a fair inference may thence be drawn, that the suitors had not, in general, a period of unexampled length to wait for a decision of their claims; and that, in comparison with what is commonly experienced in Europe, the advantage, in point of dispatch, would probably be found to be in favour of the courts of India. In the course of the year 1804, the number of decisions were as follow:—In the court of sudder-dewanny adawlut 51 suits decreed and dismissed; in the five provincial courts of appeal 726 suits decreed and dismissed, and 29 withdrawn or adjusted between the parties themselves: by the 29 zillah and city judges 6,940 suits decreed and dismissed, and 725 adjusted between the parties: by the four assistant judges 879 suits decreed and dismissed, and 45 adjusted between the parties: by the 29 registers 6,433 suits decreed and dismissed, and 1,347 adjusted by the parties: by the sudder aumeens, or head native commissioners, 6,387 decreed and dismissed, and 2,439 adjusted by the parties: by the other native commissioners, 95,208 decreed and dismissed, and 155,971 adjusted by the parties. The total number of causes thus discharged from the file, by European agency, being 15,029; by native agency, 101,595.

Although the foregoing circumstances evince the solicitude with which the Bengal government have endeavoured to afford the natives of those provinces, a ready decision of their suits, and to enable the judges of the different courts, to keep down the number of causes on the file, within moderate limits; yet it must be confessed, that these objects are by no means so nearly attained, as to render their further exertions unnecessary. With respect to suits of small amount, the native commissioners to whom they are referable, may be indefinitely increased in number, at no expense to the state; and a regulation has been enacted, with a view to this measure; but an augmentation of the number of European judges, adequate to the purpose required, would be attended with an augmentation of charge, which the state of the finances is not calculated to bear; and the same objection occurs to the appointment of assistant judges. In the mean time, the evils arising from the delay of justice appear in a variety of shapes, according to the nature of the suits instituted, and the character of the people among whom they arise. To this cause, in Bahar, the judge of circuit ascribes numerous commitments for the breaches of the peace: His words are, "the commitments for breaches of the peace (arising from boundary disputes and other contests concerning landed property) are ascribed to the great, though unavoidable arrear, of untried causes pending in some of the courts; since by necessarily protracting for years, the decision of suits, it frequently drove the suitors to despair; and induced them to run the risk of taking justice into their own hands, by seizing the object in dispute, rather than to await the tardy issue of a process, which threatened to exceed the probable duration of their own lives."

Report of Mr. Seton, Judge of Circuit for Patna, dated 20 June, 1798.

THE ADMINISTRATION OF CRIMINAL JUSTICE.

THE Regulations of the Bengal Presidency have provided, that each judge of the criminal courts shall, at the conclusion of his circuit, besides the ordinary report of his proceedings, communicate, through the sudder-dewanny adawlut, such observations as may occur to him, on the operation of the public regulations, and on the general condition of the people in the provinces through which his circuit lies.

It is obvious, that communications of this nature, from intelligent persons, must be of the greatest public utility, by apprizing the government of any mistakes, which may have been committed in the enactment of the laws; and of any existing evils, which it might require the interference of the legislative authority to remove. It is hardly to be supposed, that, in describing the effects of the new system of internal administration, any of the public servants would lean to the unfavorable side; or, without sufficient foundation, transmit accounts which would prove disagreeable to the government to receive. A communication of this nature, might be rather suspected of painting things in colours, pleasing to the government, with the view of bringing the writer into favourable notice; but no motive can be assigned for a wanton provocation of resentment, in a quarter where it must always be the interest of a public servant, to stand on favourable ground, by misrepresentation, or by any statement of facts and opinions, which the writer does not believe to be accurate and well founded. The Committee are, therefore, induced to think, that the Reports alluded to, are entitled to attentive consideration; more especially in instances, where defects are stated to exist, and and evils are represented to prevail, in the administration of the Company's territorial possessions.

In addition to the periodical Reports above mentioned, the Committee have to notice the recourse they have had to very voluminous documents of the same nature, which describe the condition of the provinces, and the state of the administration of justice in the year 1802. These papers consist of answers to interrogatories, which were circulated among the judges, magistrates, and the collectors of the several districts, by LORD WELLESLEY, on the occasion of a tour which his Lordship proposed making through the provinces under his immediate government; and are described, by the Bengal government, as "containing a valuable body of information, on the internal state and resources of the Company's provinces; the administration of civil and criminal justice; the protection to persons and property enjoyed by all descriptions of Company's subjects, under the existing laws; and the encouragement afforded by the present system, to the improvement of agriculture, and to the extension of commerce." The government of Bengal, on transmitting these reports to the court of directors, requested, that the court would refrain from founding any order on them, until they should be in possession of a digest of the information conveyed in them, which SIR GEORGE BARLOW was about to furnish. It does not appear that any such digest, has yet been received, or that any order, founded on the reports in question, has been passed by the court of directors.

Governor General to Secret Committee,
28 Sept. 1801.

The Committee have made a selection of such reports above mentioned, as appear to them to be of the most importance, and they will be found in the Appendix. They were made by the judges, in answer to the interrogatories circulated by Marquis Wellesley, or at the conclusion of their circuits.

Appendix, N° 10
Appendix, N° 11.

From an attentive consideration of these several documents, the Committee are enabled to submit the following Observations to the notice of the House, on the administration of Criminal Justice, and on the state of the Police throughout the provinces under the presidency of Bengal.

The judges of the criminal courts, attended by the native law officers of their establishment, proceed on their respective circuits every six months. On their arrival at each judicial station, the calendar of offences is laid before them, containing a list of the prisoners, the crimes laid to their charge, and the names of the witnesses on both sides. These preliminaries having been observed, the trials commence, and are conducted on the principles, and in the mode, which have been detailed in a former part of this Report.

The offences which are observed chiefly to prevail in the upper provinces, including Benares and Bahar, are burglaries, effected by breaking through the walls of houses; murder, from various motives; robberies attended with murder and manslaughter.

In Bengal, in addition to the foregoing crimes, must be noticed decoity, or gang robbery, attended often with murder; perjury and subornation of perjury, practised for the most atrocious purposes. These crimes are not unfrequent, in many parts of the country; but the Bengal provinces appear to be more than any other characterized by them, as will more particularly be explained, under the head of Police.

The charges of these descriptions, which the judge of circuit has to investigate, and with the assistance of the law officers, to acquit or pass sentence upon, or to refer to the review and determination of the nizamat adawlut or superior criminal tribunal, are not in the upper provinces more numerous than are commonly dispatched, in a few weeks; but in the Bengal provinces, the judge seldom returns to his station before it is time for his successor, to commence his circuit; and it has happened in the Dacca division, that the circuit has, in its duration, considerably exceeded six months. During all this time, excepting what may be required by the judge in passing from one station to another, he is incessantly employed in the most arduous and important duties that can be confided to a public servant; that of conducting the trials of persons charged with capital crimes. The perplexities he meets with, and the intricacies he has to unravel, in the course of this service, are such as arise, partly out of the simplicity of character prevalent among certain classes of the inhabitants, and partly out of their peculiar peculiar habits of depravity; and may be judged of from the following extract, which is taken from one of the most able, intelligent, and interesting expositions that has appeared on this subject. It is the Report of Mr. (now Sir Henry) Strachey, on his completion of the 2d sessions of 1802, for the several districts in the Calcutta circuit. On this occasion, the number of persons tried, are stated to have been about 1,000, and the number convicted 446. A great portion of the charges, appears to have been decoity or gang robbery; to the trials for which crime, the following observations more particularly apply, than to any other.

Appendix, N° 11.

"In the course of trials, the guilty very often, according to the best of my observation, escape conviction. Sometimes an atrocious robbery or murder is sworn to, and in all appearance clearly established, by the evidence on the part of the prosecution; but when we come to the defence, an alibi is set up, and though we are inclined to disbelieve it, if two or three witnesses swear consistently to such alibi, and allude every attempt to catch them in prevarication or contradiction, we are thrown into doubt, and the prisoners escape."

"Very frequently the witnesses on the part of the prosecution, swear to facts, in themselves utterly incredible, for the purpose of fully convicting the accused; when if they had simply stated what they saw and knew, their testimony would have been sufficient. They frequently, under an idea that the proof may be thought defective, by those who judge according to the regulations, and that the accused will escape, wreak their vengeance upon the witnesses who appear against them, and exaggerate the facts in such a manner, that their credit is utterly destroyed."

"Witnesses have generally, each a long story to tell; they are seldom few in number, and often differ widely in character, casts, habits and education. Thrice over, viz. to the darogah, the magistrate, and the court of circuit, they relate tediously and minutely, but not accurately, a variety of things done and said. Numerous variations and contradictions occur, and are regarded with cautious jealousy, though in reality they seldom furnish a reasonable presumption of falsehood."

"But who shall distinguish between mistake and imposture? What judge can distinguish the exact truth, among the numerous inconsistencies of the natives he examines? How often do those inconsistencies proceed from causes, very different from those suspected by us? How often from simplicity, fear, embarrassment in the witness; how often, from our own ignorance and impatience."

"We cannot wonder that the natives are aware of our suspicious and incredulous tempers. They see how difficult it is to persuade us to believe, a true story; and accordingly endeavour to suit our taste, with a false one."

"I have no doubt, that previously to their examination as witnesses, they frequently compare notes together, and consult upon the best mode of making their story appear probable to the gentleman, whose wisdom it cannot be expected should be satisfied with an artless tale; whose sagacity is so apt to imagine snares of deception, in the most perfect candour and simplicity."

"We cannot but observe, that a story, long before it reaches us, often acquires the strongest features of artifice and fabrication. There is almost always something kept back, as unfit for us to hear; lest we should form an opinion, unfavourable to the veracity of the witness. It is most painful to reflect how very often witnesses are afraid to speak the truth, in our outcherries."

"We cannot study the genius of the people, in its own sphere of action. We know little of their domestic life, their knowledge, conversation, amusements; their trades, casts, or any of those national and individual characteristics, which are essential to a complete knowledge of them. Every day affords us examples of something new and surprising; and we have no principle to guide us in the investigation of facts, except an extreme diffidence of our opinion; a consciousness of inability to judge of what is probable or improbable."

"Sometimes we see the most unfair means taken by informers and thieftakers, to detect and apprehend the accused. We find confessions extorted and witnesses suborned; at the same time, we think the accused guilty; and the prosecution fails, merely because the unfair play used against them, leads us to suspect more."

"When we recollect the extreme uncertainty to us, of every fact which depends on the credit of the natives, to support it, who can wonder, that a very slight

"slight circumstance, should turn the scale in the prisoner's favour, and that while we think innocence possible, we hesitate to condemn to death or transportation?"

"I do not speak of these things, with any view of proposing a remedy. If the mind is not convinced of guilt, an acquittal must follow; and we have nothing left to do, but to lament that a robbery, or a murder, took place, and that justice has failed to overtake the offenders."

"I have no new rules to propose, for the conduct of trials in the criminal courts, or for admitting or believing evidence. I am inclined to think, no new rules of evidence can serve any purpose; but to embarrass the courts and create new obstacles to the conviction of the guilty."

"The evil I complain of is extensive, and, I fear, irreparable. The difficulty we experience, in discerning truth and falsehood, among the natives, may be ascribed, I think, chiefly to our want of connexion and intercourse with them; to the peculiarity of their manners and habits; their excessive ignorance, of our characters; and our almost equal ignorance, of theirs."

A Report from the circuit judge of the Patna division, made about the same time, contains the following remarks:—"Few of the murders, and only one of the robberies charged, really occurred: the rest are merely fictitious crimes, brought forward to harass an opposing litigant, or revenge a quarrel. The criminal court is the weapon of revenge to which the natives of this province, resort on all occasions. Men of the first rank in society, feel no compunction, at mutually accusing each other of the most heinous offences, and supporting the prosecution with the most barefaced perjuries; nor does the detection of their falsehood create a blush."

The number of persons tried on the circuit, at the conclusion of which the former of these reports was made, is stated to have been about 1,000, and the number of persons convicted and punished 446. The circuit comprehended the districts of Midnapore, Jessore, Nuddea, Hooghley, Burdwan, and the twenty-four pergunnahs. In the same year the Moorshedabad circuit, comprehending the five judicial stations of Bhānglepore, Purneah, Dinagepore, Rungpore and Rajeshaye, presents 477 criminal charges, and 1,274 persons tried. That of Patna presents 78 charges and 203 persons tried. That of Dacca containing six districts, presents 173 charges, and 567 persons tried. So that in the six months to which these reports refer, the whole number of charges tried in the four circuit divisions, comprehending the provinces of Bengal, Bahar, and Orissa, amounted to 1,728, and the persons tried to 2,490. The subsequent six months present the following numbers: On the circuit of Calcutta, 335 charges, 1,182 persons tried: Moorshedabad, 446 charges, 1,096 persons tried: Patna, 146 charges, 387 persons tried: Dacca, 165 charges, 512 persons tried: in all, 1,092 charges, and 3,177 persons tried.—The number in the whole year 1802 being 2,820 criminal courts in some degree increased, the number of persons tried being in 1803, 5,866; in 1804, 5,610; in 1805, 6,196; in 1806, 5,798; and in 1807, 5,713; the average of the five years being 5,831.

On a supposition of the business of the above year 1802, being equally divided between the judges of the four courts of circuit, for any of the half-yearly gaol deliveries, each judge would, on the above average, have more than 700 persons to try, and he might dispatch the business, at the rate of somewhat more than four trials per diem, if the whole six months were employed on the circuit with little time allowed for travelling from station to station. But in the foregoing instance, the Calcutta division presents the unequal numbers of 335 charges, and 1,182 prisoners, augmenting the business of the judge in a degree, which on the average, must have required him to try more than seven persons in a day, one day with another, in order to get through his circuit in the time allotted, before the commencement of the circuit following.

It may serve to explain the practicability of a judge getting through this share of business, to observe, that on certain trials, and more particularly in cases of decoity or gang robbery, the same evidence may serve to convict or acquit all the persons, of whom there may be many concerned, in the same offence; and that the fate of more than one person is thus determined by the same process, and and at the same time. But even on this ground, though the remark be applied in every case, and the business be thereby considerably reduced, enough will remain, in addition to what has besides been remarked, to evince the unremitting attention that is required in a judge of circuit for the performance of the duties of his office, and the acquirements which an European civil servant must possess, to qualify him for the same.

The uncertainty of the evidence arising from the depravity of the people, among whom perjury is reckoned a light offence, and attended with less obloquy than the most trifling violations of cast, renders the duty of the judges on criminal trials, particularly arduous. The selections for this important office are probably made, from among the most able and experienced of the civil servants, who have served long enough to be acquainted with the language and habits of the people. Of the integrity of the persons thus employed, there can be no reason to entertain any doubt; and when it is recollected that they have the assistance of natives learned in the laws, and experienced in the manners of the people, who attend them officially on the circuit, it may perhaps be fair to assume, that the criminal laws are as well administered, as could have been expected when the new system of government was introduced.

With respect to the delay experienced, in bringing persons charged with crimes to trial, although it is probably not so great as when formerly it was the subject of objection to the then existing system, it appears still to occur, in a degree productive of evil, and which it should be an object with the government, to remove.

The gaol delivery is made once in six months; and though this may appear sufficiently frequent in a well regulated community, as in Great Britain, the commitment of offenders for the purpose of investigating the charges against them, at a future period, is productive of inconvenience to the natives, and of expense to the government in India, from the necessity it imposes of summoning the witnesses, and maintaining them, while in attendance a second time. But the greatest objection noticed by some of the judges of circuit to this delay, is the advantage it gives for conspiracy, either to involve the innocent, or to shelter the guilty, by artifices, in the practice of which, some of the depraved classes of the natives, more especially in the districts round Calcutta, have acquired a proficiency, that threatens to turn the administration of justice into a scourge to the rest of the inhabitants.

But the Committee have to notice the delay in the administration of criminal justice in some of the districts, arising from another cause, which is of more pernicious tendency than that experienced by those committed for trial; inasmuch as it affects those against whom no evidence has yet been taken, and may therefore involve the innocent as well as the guilty. The delay here alluded to, is that which frequently occurs at the office of the magistrate, where, from the press of business or other causes, months are represented to elapse, before the person apprehended can be brought to a hearing; during which time, he is lodged in a crowded prison, where, not unfrequently, death overtakes the prisoner before the cause of his apprehension can be enquired into. The stations to which these observations particularly apply, are Dacca, Burdwan, Jessore, Hooghly, Nuddea, the twenty-four Pergunnahs, or Calcutta; and the evil seems to arise, from the European civil servant presiding at those stations, having more business on his hands, than it is possible for one person to transact. If as judge, he is impressed with the necessity of making an exertion for the reduction of the civil suits on his file, the business of the magistrate's office, is in danger of falling in arrear; and if he employs himself sufficiently in the latter, to prevent the detention of witnesses on criminal charges continually coming before him, and to commit or discharge the persons accused, the file of civil causes must of course increase. Expedients have been resorted to, for the purpose of relieving the judge, by enlarging the limits of causes referable from him, to his register, and to the native commissioners, and by limiting the term for appeal to his decision. Something however is yet wanting, to complete that system of speedy justice, both civil and criminal, which Lord CORNWALLIS was so desirous of introducing; but which has not yet attained to that degree of excellence, of which it may still be hoped it is susceptible.

THE POLICE.

THE establishment of an efficient Police, though an object of the first importance, appears to be a part of the new internal arrangements, in which the endeavours of the supreme government have been the least successful. The difficulty of the undertaking, proceeds partly from the nature of the country, intersected by rivers, and abounding in woods and wastes, which afford a ready means of escape to robbers; but more perhaps, from the depravity of certain classes of the natives, who do not wait till driven by want to commit outrages, but follow robbery as a profession, descending from father to son. These are the decoits, or gang-robbers, who, though occasionally appearing in most parts of the country, are stated to infest in a peculiar degree, the lower or Bengal provinces.

The committee of circuit, as long ago as the year 1772, described the decoits of Bengal to be, "not like robbers in England, individuals driven to such courses by sudden want; they are robbers by profession, and even by birth; they are formed into regular communities, and their families subsist by the spoils which they bring home to them." This description of the decoits was given, to account for some measures of unusual severity, which it was at that time proposed to resort to, for the purpose of suppressing the offence in question, but which, if ever put in force, do not appear to have proved effectual; on the contrary, the depredations committed by decoits on the property, and the cruelties practised by them on the persons of the inhabitants, have been the subjects of much complaint down to the present time, and appears of late years, to have increased in those provinces to a considerable extent. One of the causes to which this may be ascribed, is the difficulty which has been experienced in obtaining the specific evidence which the practice of the courts of circuit requires to convict the offenders, and to the facility with which they in consequence escape punishment and recommence their depredations. On this point, the Committee are induced to quote the following passage from a report made to the government by the magistrate of Dacca Jellalpoore, in 1802:—"Decoits glory in the dread their names inspire; they therefore take no pains to conceal their names; they become from these reasons, publicly notorious; their names and characters are familiar to all the inhabitants, even to those who have never seen them. Witnesses against men of this description, risk their lives, if they speak to any specific charge; if they only describe them as notorious, in general terms, notice is not taken of it; because mere public notoriety, without a specific charge, is not deemed legally sufficient to convict them; and, in the opinion of the prisoner, it is rather an addition to his reputation. Those who volunteer to apprehend them, equally risk their lives. Professional goyendas (or informers) are not, in the same predicament; their spies watch the motions of the decoits, and they avail themselves of this information to raise contributions, by making arrangements with the sirdars (or leaders) as the price of their silence. The difficulty of convicting these sirdars, is in proportion to their notoriety; the greater their reputation for robbery and murder, the more difficult it is to get witnesses to come forward against them. There are in my jail, many sirdars of this description, whose release from confinement would be dangerous to the society at large, and certain death to those who had any share in apprehending them. If public notoriety (such as I describe) was deemed sufficient to subject them to transportation for life, I think it would be of the utmost benefit to the community, as the object of their ambition (an extended notorious name) would, with propriety, be made the cause of their punishment; I think it would contribute much to check the evil."

"No magistrate who is attentive to his duty, can be long without knowing the characters of notorious sirdars. In the very course of business, he must become familiar with their names; and although he has it not in his power to substantiate legal and specific charge against them, for the reasons above assigned, he feels it his duty to apprehend them; but is unable to convict them, for want of that direct proof which the atrocity of the prisoner's character prevents his obtaining."

But although the necessity of specific proof against these hardened offenders, may have been one of the occasions of the outrages which they perpetrate in the exercise of their depredations; there are others, which are equally deserving of notice.

A comparison

A comparison of the abundant means afforded by the former establishments, with the scanty provision made by the present system, for suppressing gang robbery, may farther account for its recent prevalence in the Bengal districts.

Besides the usual establishments of guards and village watchmen, maintained for the express purpose of police, the zemindar had, under the former system, the aid of his zemindarry servants, who were at all times, liable to be called forth for the preservation of the public peace, and the apprehension of the disturbers of it. The officers employed in the collection of the sayer or impost duties, before the abolition of them, and stationed at the gunjes, or commercial depôts of grain, in the bazars or markets, and at the hauts or fairs, possessed authority and officiated for the preservation of peace, and the protection of the means possessed by frequenters of those places. To convey an idea of the means possessed by a principal landholder for the purposes above-mentioned, it may be sufficient to notice the case of the zemindar of Burdwan: This zemindarry, on a rough estimate, may be taken at 73 miles long, and 45 broad, comprehending about 3,280 square miles; nearly the whole of which was in the highest state of cultivation, and well stocked with inhabitants. His police establishment, as described in a letter from the magistrate of the 12th October 1788, consisted of tannahdars acting as chiefs of police divisions, and guardians of the peace; under whose orders were stationed in the different villages, for the protection of the inhabitants, and to convey information to the tannahdars, about 2,400 pykes or armed constables. But exclusive of these guards, who were for the express purpose of police, the principal dependance for the protection of the people probably rested on the zemindarry pykes; for these, are stated by the magistrate to have been in number no less than nineteen thousand, who were at all times, liable to be called out in aid of the police.

The whole of this last-mentioned numerous class of pykes, are understood to have been disbanded, in compliance with the new police regulations; and their lands, allowed them in lieu of pay, resumed. The amount of revenue brought to the account of government on this head, being trifling for their extent, it is probable that the greatest part of the number of pykes retain them, under convenience from the zemindar; but however this may be, the services of the pykes are lost to the police, while such of those persons as were really disbanded, are supposed to have had recourse to thieving for a livelihood. With respect to the darogahs, or head police officers, who have taken place of the tannahdars under the new system, it is observed of them, that they are not less corrupt than the tannahdars their predecessors, and that themselves and the inferior officers acting under them, with as much inclination to do evil, have less ability to do good, than the zemindarry servants employed before them. The darogah placed in a division of the country comprehending four hundred square miles, is, with fifteen or twenty armed men, found to be incompetent to the protection of the inhabitants. The village watchmen, and such as remain undismitted of the zemindarry servants, are, by the public regulations, required to co-operate with the darogah; but a provision of this nature, without the means of prompt enforcement, has not been attended with the desired effect; the influence of the zemindar as it existed in former times, being wanting to bring forth these aids into active exertion; while the darogahs who are represented as insulated individuals, are in their respective divisions, viewed with fear by some, with jealousy by others, and neglected by most of the inhabitants, possess not that personal consideration, in the public mind, so necessary to aid them, in the efficient performance of their duty.

If the foregoing comparison be just, it must appear that the former establishments, were more ample and better constituted for the purposes of police, than those which have since been introduced, had their services been actively put forth, and properly directed; but the enquiries made by LORD CORNWALLIS, induced him to believe, that the zemindars had misapplied the authority confided to them, as officers of police; and that the union of the functions of revenue and police in the same person, was a radical error, from which the evils prevailing in the latter department, had in a great measure sprung. His lordship accordingly proceeded in the manner detailed in a former part of this report, to change the system which existed, and to introduce a police entrusted under the European magistrates, to native officers, named darogahs, selected for the purpose, and maintained on fixed salaries. The defectiveness of this system of police, is explicitly acknowledged knowledge in the preamble to regulation XII. of the year 1807, which states "that the police establishments maintained by government in several districts of Bengal, Bahar and Orissa, had been found insufficient for the purposes of their appointment." Amendments had before this period, been made to the police rules; and additional means devised for the suppression of crimes, by rendering the punishment of them more exemplary and severe. Public outrages nevertheless increased, more especially in the Bengal provinces: and the government at length, deemed it expedient to introduce the above regulation; for the purpose of granting to the zemindars, tehsildars, farmers of land, and any other principal inhabitants who might be deemed qualified for the trust, authority to act as aumeens or commissioners of police.

The aumeens of police are, under this regulation, appointed by a sunnud, or commission from the magistrate, with the approbation of the governor general in council. Their authority is concurrent with that of the police darogah, for the suppression of crimes, and the apprehension of public offenders; and for these purposes, the rules for the conduct of both are the same; but the aumeens are restricted from taking any cognizance of those petty offences and disputes, which the latter is allowed to enquire into and adjust. The aumeen is required to deliver over his prisoners to the darogah of the district or division in which he resides; instead of sending them, as the darogah does, direct to the magistrate.

Thus it appears the government have found it necessary to recur to the practice, which, in 1792, was so much disapproved; namely, of combining, in any case, the functions of revenue and police; and have again called forth the exercise of those powers, which the landholders, native collectors of the revenue, and other respectable inhabitants possess, for the protection of the people, and the apprehension of public offenders.

Of the propriety of this principle, no doubt can be entertained; the most intelligent reports of the judicial servants, for some years previously, having represented the agency of the landholders, as essential to a salutary improvement in the police, though there is reason to regret, that the situation of things has so much changed since the zemindars were deprived of the authority thus restored to them, as to have afforded less promise of success from the measure, than might have been otherwise expected. The dismemberment of the principal zemindaries, by the sale of land, to realize arrears of revenue, and the separation of talooks, or small estates (noticed in a former part of this report) have reduced the efficient influence of the landholders, who, for the greater part, approach nearer now, than they did formerly, to the condition of mere cultivators. The dismissal of the zemindary pykes, and of the establishment formerly maintained for the collection of the sayer duties, have contributed to the same end. It may therefore appear doubtful, whether it would now be practicable in Bengal, to restore the efficiency of the old system of police, were it even in the view of the government, to attempt it; or whether, if restored, it would answer any useful purpose, clogged with the numerous and complicated rules and restrictions under which the zemindar would now be required to officiate. It indeed appears, that the regulation already referred to, as enacted in the year 1807, has since been rescinded, as far as it related to the appointment of aumeens of police, by regulation VI. of 1810. That the state of the police, in the lower provinces, in regard to decoity, had not experienced any amendment, under the operation of the first-mentioned regulation; appears from the following passage of a letter, addressed by the governor general to the court of directors, of a date so recent as the 29th May 1810, describing the state of the police, as it was in the Bengal districts, a little before that period. "The evidence lately adduced, exclusive of a multiplicity of other proofs, establishes, beyond a question, the commission of robberies, murder, and the most atrocious, deliberate cruelties; in a word, an aggregate of the most atrocious crimes: nor let it be supposed, that these offences were of rare occurrence, or confined to particular districts; they were committed with few exceptions, and with slight modifications of atrocity, in every part of Bengal."

The letter from which this extract is taken, was written to justify certain measures, which it had been judged necessary to resort to, for the purpose of restraining and preventing these evils, and which had been arraigned by Mr. Erskine, one of the magistrates, as objectionable, and as being calculated to introduce introduce greater mischiefs among the people, than the evil which it was to remove. The dispatches which have more recently been received relative to this discussion, appear of considerable interest; not so much on account of the subject to which they specially relate, which had been set at rest by the submission of the magistrate, afterwards made judge of circuit, who, having apologized for the warmth or disrespect of his expressions, was restored to his office, as from the information which they afford respecting the actual state of the police in the provinces under the presidency of Bengal.

The information to which the Committee more particularly allude, is contained in a Report on the state of the police, with suggestions for its improvement, by the Secretary to the government in the judicial department, entered on the consultations of government of the 29th September 1809. This document is particularly intended for the consideration of the authorities in this country: The writer observes, that were this report "intended solely for the consideration of the local government in India, it would be superfluous to enter into details regarding the inefficiency of the police, as unhappily, occasions have too frequently arisen, to arrest their attention on this important subject; but as the arrangements suggested, may possibly attract the attention of the honourable the court of directors to whom these evils may not be so familiar, a brief exposition of them must be deemed a necessary introduction to any plan which may be suggested for the general improvement of the police."

In this Report, are detailed the cruelties suffered by the inhabitants in the districts for the most part round the seat of government, from decoits or gang-robbers, and the total inefficiency of the police, as it then stood, to suppress or restrain them; and it is endeavoured to justify the measures recently introduced, and to propose others, with the view of removing the evils complained of. In illustration of the cruelties commonly practised by the robbers, the evidence on some late trials is given, and the general prevalence of those cruelties, is proved by a reference to the reports of the circuit judges transmitted from different parts of the country. It is observed moreover, that though the evils in question "were in some instances to be ascribed to the supineness of the local magistrates, they were much more generally imputable, to the defects of the existing system."

The Committee cannot forbear expressing their surprise, at the statement made in Mr. Secretary Dowdeswell's report, that the government were not enabled to discover in a shorter period than that alluded to, what is now unequivocally acknowledged on their proceedings, namely, "that the existing system of police had entirely failed in its object." But the letters from the Bengal government to the directors, down to April 1806, represent the commission of crimes, particularly perjury, to be increasing rather than the contrary; although indeed there is nothing said to excite any particular apprehension for the security of person and property enjoyed by the natives under the British government, or to create any doubt in regard to the new system of police, having secured to the natives the benefits which were intended for them, by its introduction.

It is therefore, with the greater concern that the Committee find, in the recent dispatch, so strong a manifestation of the great inadequacy which has been experienced of the establishments introduced in 1793, for the protection of the people from public robbers, and the ascendancy acquired by decoits in the provinces surrounding the seat of government.

It is stated in the report in question, that "the principal cause why the measures hitherto adopted for the protection of the people against robbery by open violence, have been ineffectual; is, the very defective information which government, and the principal authorities under government, possessed respecting the actual state of the police."—"The defect here noticed (says the writer of the report) may arise, either from the very imperfect information which the local magistrates themselves possess, respecting the state of the police, or from an ill judged, but not an unnatural solicitude, to represent the districts in the most favourable state possible." Your Committee must here express their opinion of the dangerous tendency of indulgence in the disposition alluded to, of representing districts or things to be in a more favourable state, than they really are; as this may lead, first, to a postponement of the communication of unpleasant circumstances; next, to the suppression of information; and, finally, to the misrepresentation of facts. In the present instance, the Committee mittee have adverted to the information actually before the government and the nizamat adawlut, for some years prior to the date of the report above quoted; and it appears to them that the reports of the circuit judges, made through the nizamat adawlut to the government, at the conclusion of each session, evinced the prevalence of gang robbery, not only in a degree sufficient to attract the notice of the government, but to call forth its endeavours to suppress it.

Its endeavours, from 1801 down to the period in question, for the improvement of the police, and for the suppression of gang robbery, appear in the new regulations, and in modifications of those already in force. The general object of these enactments, was to render the criminal law more severe, and the officers of police more vigilant; and, as has been also before stated, to call in the aid of the landholders and other principal inhabitants, for the protection of the people against decoits, and other depredators. But notwithstanding these measures, the disorders which they were intended to subdue, still increased; and towards the end of 1807, had acquired such a degree of strength, as to oblige the government to resort to measures, much more forcible than had hitherto been tried, for the deliverance of the country from this growing and intolerable evil.

It does not therefore appear to have been, from any want of information in regard to the imperfect state of the police, that the government was unable to prevent its becoming worse; but rather, as your Committee should suppose, from the difficulties which presented themselves to the application of an efficacious remedy.

Reg. X. 1808.
28 Nov.

The measures above referred to, are those which appear to have been commenced in 1808, with Regulation the tenth of that year; "for the appointment of a superintendent of police, and for defining his jurisdiction and authority." The preamble of the Regulation states, that "by concentrating information obtainable from different parts of the country in a particular office at the presidency, a successful plan of operations might be devised and executed, when the efforts of the local police officers would be unavailing;" and "that measures conducive to the discovery and seizure of the gangs of decoits, which still continued to infest many of the districts in the province of Bengal, might especially be promoted, by the appointment of a superintendent of police." A power was accordingly vested in this officer, to act in concert with the zillah and city magistrates, or independently of them, for the detection and apprehension of persons charged with or suspected of decoity and other offences. His warrant or other process was, as he might determine, to be executed, either by his own officers, or through those of the local authorities. The government, moreover, upon the present occasion, deeming the urgency of the case to justify the measure, resolved to countenance the regular organization and official employment of public informers, for the purpose of discovering the haunts, and pointing out the persons of the most notorious of the decoits, or of any of their associates. The circumstance which led to this step, was the successful co-joint operation which had been afforded by one of the Calcutta magistrates, acting as free, that district from decoits. Mr. Blacquiere, who had resided in Bengal from his earliest years, possessed a perfect knowledge of the language and the manners of the natives; had recommended himself so far to the government by this service, that, although he was not a covenanted servant of the Company, it was determined to vest him with the powers of magistrate in such other districts, as, like Nuddea, had been overrun with decoits. The mode in which Mr. Blacquiere proceeded was, by the employment of goyendas, or spies and informers; some of whom, having themselves been principal robbers, it was understood would be particularly expert in detecting others who were still acting in that capacity. To these, were added the services of girdawars or overseers, or superintendents. The spies were to point out the robbers, and the overseers were to apprehend them.

As the employment of these agents, in the manner thus sanctioned, has given rise to much discussion between the government and some of the judicial officers, on the merit and success of this expedient, the Committee think it may be proper to state the information on these points, which the latest advices from the Bengal Presidency afford. The following account of the origin and employment of goyendas is taken from a minute, recorded on the 24th Nov. 1810.

1810, by one of the members of the government, who was an advocate for the measure, and desirous of shewing that the employment of goyendas was not new in the police of Bengal.

"Under no arrangement hitherto tried, has the efficiency of the police, been independent of the agency of informers and spies. Pecuniary rewards for detecting and bringing to justice decoits and other offenders, were offered as early as 1772, when the serious attention of the government was first drawn to the alarming prevalence of the horrid offence of decoity. But without going further back than the period when the regulations of the government began to assume generally the form, which they have since retained, the offer of a specific reward of ten rupees for every decoit, payable on the conviction of the offender, was authorized in 1792, and continued to be payable in the same mode, until recently modified in pursuance of the arrangements, which we resolved to adopt two years ago, for the reform of the police."

"Under the encouragement of head money offered by the regulations of 1792 above quoted, the profession of a goyenda first took its rise, and speedily spread itself over the country. The subsequent introduction of police tahsils had no tendency to check the employment, or control their proceedings. Every tannah soon had its set of goyendas plying for occupation, with the avowed countenance and support of the darogah, who shared with them the head money for decoits, convicted on evidence marshalled by them; and the specious offers of professed goyendas occasionally induced incautious magistrates to entrust them with general warrants and indefinite commissions, for the apprehension of criminals, in places particularly infested by robbers, or sometimes, in consequence of the perpetration of a peculiarly heinous decoity. — That abuses have been practised by goyendas or informers, but still more by girdawars, or those entrusted with power to apprehend, is unquestionable. Seeking a livelihood by the profession in which they had engaged, but not always able to procure it, by the slow means of the detection of crimes and proof of guilt, they have no doubt resorted but too often, to various modes of extortion; sometimes, from persons of suspected character, and at other times, from the honest part of the community, under threats of accusation; and have occasionally proceeded to prefer groundless charges, and even to support them by false evidence; and instances have actually occurred, where there has been too much reason to believe, that the goyenda himself devised the robbery, of which he convicted the unhappy wretches reduced by his arts, to a participation in the crime."

There can be little doubt of the existence of spies, wherever the laws hold out rewards to informers; and the increase of this class of people in Bengal, is satisfactorily traced to the pecuniary reward offered for every decoit, who might be convicted on information brought before the magistrate. The bad practices used by goyendas, your Committee find noticed strongly in the answer to the interrogatories circulated in 1801; but the abolition or rather the modification of the head money, for decoits, was not effected until 1810. There must consequently have been a wide field for the goyendas to move in, from their first appearance (according to the foregoing minute) in 1792, until the period referred to in 1810, where the modification of the reward, or head money, considerably narrowed the ground on which they had been accustomed to practise their atrocities.

The proceedings of the courts of justice, and the reports of the judges of circuit, furnish a strong confirmation of what has been stated with respect to the unprincipled practices of that description of people, and of the evils resulting from a combination between them and the darogahs or head police officers; for the purpose, as stated in the foregoing minute, "of sharing with them the head money for decoits."

The employment of persons of the above description, as instruments of police, might appear to require explanation, more especially as it has been objected to, by some of the most experienced servants in the judicial department. In the correspondence last received from Bengal, the reasons are adduced, which dictated the expediency of employing those persons under the police; and they are as follow; 1st, the necessity which arose for the adoption of some strong measure, to check or suppress the outrages committed by decoits, which had long been prevalent; and on a sudden, had acquired a most alarming height in those districts districts particularly, which were most adjacent to the seat of government. 2d. The good state of the police within the limits of the town of Calcutta, where goyendas had been employed by the magistrates, and particularly under the direction of Mr. Blacquiere. 3d. The benefit experienced in the district of Nudda, from the employment of Mr. Blacquiere with goyendas, for the discovery and seizure of decoits, which suggested the employment of the same means, more extensively. 4th. The rules under which goyendas were directed to be employed, which prohibited their receiving general warrants, and restricted them to the employment of pointing out persons accused of crimes, to the girdwars, or officers, who attended to apprehend them.

The institution of the new office of superintendent of police, and the extension of Mr. Blacquiere's functions, with authority to employ goyondas, is represented to have been attended with early success, in the discovery and apprehension of many gangs of decoits, and the seizure of some of their most notorious sirdars; or leaders; one of them at the distance of 500 miles from the part of the country from which he fled to avoid detection. But the satisfaction which this must have afforded the government, underwent probably some abatement, on the discovery which was made, that some of the goyondas thus employed, had, in concert with the girdwars, actually been committing depredations on the peaceable inhabitants, of the same nature as those practised by the decoits, whom they were employed to suppress. These persons were convicted before the court of circuit; and suffered the punishment due to their crimes. The government admit, that there were probably more of these enormities committed by these instruments of police, than had come to light; but they nevertheless deemed it expedient, that the smaller evil should be endured, rather than the agency of goyondas, in freeing the country of decoits, should be relinquished.

The court of directors, it may be presumed, will be anxious to learn the issue of these measures, under the great solicitude they must feel, for their proving ultimately successful in the object of their introduction. What has appeared in the latest intelligence on this subject, affords assurance, that after about two years experience of the efficacy of the new measures, decoity or gang robbery, had met with a check; and had been reported by some of the circuit judges, to have happened less frequently in most, and to have ceased in some, of the Bengal districts, where antecedently it had prevailed, in the greatest degree. It is earnestly to be hoped; that these assurances may be confirmed by experience.

CONCLUDING REMARKS.

Although the view given, in the foregoing part of this Report may show, that certain imperfections are still found in the system of internal government in the Bengal provinces; yet it can, in the opinion of your Committee, admit of no question, whether the dominion exercised by the East India Company has, on the whole, been beneficial to the natives. If such a question were proposed, your Committee must decidedly answer it, in the affirmative. The strength of the government of British India, directed as it has been, has had the effect of securing its subjects, as well from foreign depredation, as from internal commotion. This is, an advantage rarely experienced by the subjects of Asiatic states; and, combined with a domestic administration more just in its principles, and exercised with far greater integrity and ability, than the native one that preceded it, may sufficiently account for the improvements that have taken place; and which, in the Bengal provinces, where peace has been enjoyed for a period of time, perhaps hardly paralleled in Oriental history, have manifested themselves in the ameliorated condition of the great mass of the population; although certain classes may have been depressed, by the indispensable policy of a foreign government. The nature and circumstances of our situation, prescribe narrow limits to the prospects of the natives, in the political and military branches of the public service; strictly speaking, however, they were foreigners who generally enjoyed the great offices in those departments, even under the Mogul Government;—but to agriculture and commerce every encouragement is afforded, under a system of laws, the prominent object of which is, to protect the weak from oppression, and to secure to every individual the fruits of his industry.

The country, as may be expected, has, under these circumstances, exhibited in every part of it, improvement on a general view, advancing with accelerated progress in latter times.

FORT ST. GEORGE.

YOUR Committee having furnished the House with as correct a view as the official records of the East India Company has enabled them to afford, of the past history and present state of the extensive possessions under the Bengal Government, with reference to the immediate objects of this Report; they will now lay before it, a similar detail respecting the territories subject to the presidency of Fort St. George.

In the prosecution of this further purpose, their attention will, in conformity to the arrangement which they have pursued in the preceding branch of their Report, be directed, in the first instance, to the revenues of that presidency: And, in stating the information which they deem necessary, with a view to the elucidation of this extensive topic of enquiry, your Committee will report upon it, in the following order:

I".—They will give an account of the measures and systems which have been progressively resorted to, for the administration of the revenues in the ancient possessions of the Company under the government of Fort St. George, down to the period when the system of permanent zemindary tenures was established therein.

II".—They will furnish the same kind of information, with respect to the modern possessions subject to that government, into which the system of permanent zemindary tenures has hitherto been introduced only to a limited extent.

ANTIENT POSSESSIONS.

OF the antient possessions under the presidency of Fort St. George, the Committee will first call the attention of the House to those denominated the Northern Circars.

They originally formed part of the antient kingdoms of Oris and Telinga; having, with the whole of those kingdoms, been brought, in the thirteenth century, under the mussulman dominion of Beder. In 1687, they were conquered by Aurungzebe; by the issue of successful rebellion they passed, in 1724, from the descendants of that emperor to Nizam ul Mulk, the soubah or viceroy of the Deccan, who still retained that title, though he had established for himself a distinct, though tributary kingdom, of which the city of Hyderabad was the capital. He was succeeded by his third son, Salabut Jung, who, being greatly indebted for his elevation to the intrigues and military assistance of the French East India Company, rewarded their services, in 1752, by a grant of the circar of Condavir or Guntoor, which was soon afterwards followed by the cession to that Company, of the other circars. They did not however long remain in the hands of the French. The capture of Masulipatam, in 1759, by the British arms, having deprived them of all real power and influence; these territories reverted to the government of the Nizam, with the exception of the acknowledged dependencies of the town and fortress of Masulipatam, which were retained by the English East India Company. This course of policy on the part of the British power would seem to have been dictated by the pressure of other concerns, and by the fear of engaging in an undertaking, apparently beyond its strength. Deprived of the support of the French, Salabut Jung, whose resources were as feeble as his conduct was irresolute, was soon superseded in his authority, by the influence of his brother Nizam Ali. It is not necessary for your Committee to enter into the history of an offer made by the new soubah to the East India Company, of the Northern circars; or of the circumstances which put an end to the negotiation on that subject. It is sufficient to state, that the discovery of an intention on the part of the Nabab of Arcot, of eventually adding the sovereignty of the circars to his dominions in the Carnatic, induced Lord Clive, in 1765, to obtain from the Mogul a grant of four of them, namely, Cizeole, Rajahmundry, Ellore and Condapilly; which in the following year was confirmed by a treaty entered into with the Nizam.

The remaining circar of Guntoor was at that time, in the possession of Bazalet Jung, the brother of the Nizam, by whom it was held as a jaghire. It was contingently stipulated for in the treaty with the Nizam, subject to the life of Bazalet Jung; but did not devolve to the East India Company, till the year 1788. A treaty had indeed been been most improperly concluded with Bazalet Jung, in the early part of the year 1779, by the government of Fort St. George, without the consent of the Nizam, for the cession of this circar; and in a few months afterwards, it was granted by the same government to the Nabob of the Carnatic, on a lease of ten years; but the whole transaction was annulled in the following year, by the authority of the government of Bengal.

As on the acquisition of the four circars, two of them only had acknowledged the authority of the company, and as their servants were of necessity, but very imperfectly informed of the usages of the people; there was every reason to believe that the first arrangements to be made, would be attended with great difficulty. It was therefore judged expedient, to administer the government for a time, in the manner which had been found established. The local management of the circars of Rajahmundry, Ellore and Condapilly, was consequently committed, under a lease for three years, to a native, Hussein Alli Khan, who had before governed the country in the name of the Nizam, and who, as deputy of the British government, was invested with all the power and splendor of a viceroy. The circar of Cicacole was placed, under another

On the discontinuance of this native administration in 1769, the Circars were placed under the charge of provincial chiefs and councils, into which the Company's commercial factories were then converted. To the chief and council of the factory at Masulipatam, was entrusted the management of the districts of Condapilly, Rajahmundry and Ellore. The southern division of Cicacole was placed under the chief and council at Vizagapatam; and as the factory at Ganjam had been formerly abandoned, a chief and council was established for conducting the affairs of that part of the country. This system of internal government, as your Committee have shown in the former part of this Report, obtained in the Bengal provinces; and, as will be explained in a subsequent part of it, was continued in the Northern circars until the year 1794. On these provincial boards, devolved the whole political, civil and revenue administration of the country. Your Committee find, that a few years after the establishment of the provincial chiefs and councils, measures were taken by the court of directors, to investigate the state of the Northern circars. Their instructions to the presidency of Fort St. George on that occasion, are contained in a letter dated the 12th of April 1775. In these instructions, which form No. 5. of the Appendix to the Second Report of the Committee of Secrecy, appointed by the House of Commons in 1782, "to inquire into the causes of the war in the Carnatic, and the condition of the British possessions in those parts," the court of directors represented, that one object of the Madras government must be to acquire a competent knowledge of the territories under their charge, and to establish a judicious and permanent system for their future management; and they therefore directed that a committee of circuit, to be composed of five members of the council at Fort St. George, should be appointed to inquire into the state of the Northern circars and the Jaghirs, by ascertaining, with all possible exactness, the produce of the respective countries, the number of inhabitants, the state of the manufactures, the expense of his household and that of his troops, and the means he had of defraying those expenses; the gross amount of the revenues, the articles from which they arose, the mode by which they were collected, the charges of collection, the specific proportion to the cultivator, as the reward of his labour; and that which custom or usage allotted to the cultivator, as the reward of his labour. The Court at the same time, intimated that it was not their wish to deprive zemindars of their annual income; that on the contrary, they desired to secure it to them, without leaving them under the necessity of keeping an armed force to collect it; and that it was also their earnest desire to deliver the inhabitants from undue exactions and oppressions, as far as might be in their power. They further directed that the committee should particularly inquire what security the natives had for their property; what courts there were, for the administration of justice; and how far regulations similar to those recently established in Bengal, might with propriety be introduced into the northern circars.

A Committee was accordingly appointed for these purposes; but it was abolished by the government of Fort St. George, in 1778, very soon after it had commenced its labours. The history of this proceeding, which it is unnecessary here to detail, is explained in the Second Report of the Committee of Secrecy, of 1782; from which it will appear that it met with the strong censure of the court of directors.

The committee of circuit was revived in 1783; and it continued to prosecute the objects of its inquiry, until the year 1788. The reports which were from time to time, received from this temporary board of inquiry, furnished the government with a fuller and more particular view of the state and affairs of the Northern circars, than had been before received, from the local authorities in those districts: but the knowledge which they afforded, of the amount of the revenues actually collected from the lands, and of the value and resources of the lands themselves, was necessarily in a great measure, hypothetical; for besides the opposition which the committee of circuit received from the provincial councils, few of the members of whom the committee was composed, appear to have been acquainted with the native languages; and, as it is stated by themselves, they depended wholly, for what intelligence they obtained on those subjects, on the zemindars and the native officers in the villages, the very persons most interested to conceal the truth, and to impose upon them false information. It appears indeed that the zemindars, in several instances, refused to furnish the committee with any information, respecting the points to which their investigations were directed. The government, it is to be observed, had not yet exercised any active interference in the business of the revenues; and as the authority of the zemindars was little less than regal, it was not to be expected that the researches of such a committee, invested too as it was, with but very limited powers, could have led to any thing like accurate results.

While the committee were pursuing their inquiries, the court of directors transmitted to Fort St. George, in 1786, a political survey of the Northern circars, by Mr. James Grant, a senior merchant of Bengal, which had been brought under the notice of the court, and which the court, deeming well worthy of the serious attention of the Madras government, strongly recommend to their notice. This gentleman, to whose enquiries on the subject of the Bengal revenues, the committee have had occasion to allude in the former part of their Report, had been public minister at the court of the Nizam. While resident at Hyderabad, he cultivated an intercourse with an eminent and experienced native statesman, and thence obtained access to valuable public records, which had been hitherto closed with cautious jealousy, against foreign inspection. Of these, and other sources of knowledge respecting the affairs of the Northern circars, Mr. Grant's acquaintance with the Persian language, enabled him to make the fullest use. The result of his inquiries is contained in the Political Survey. Though the opinions and doctrines of Mr. Grant, on the subject of landed rights, do not in all points, agree with the more correct information which has since been acquired on that subject, his Survey throws so clear a light on the Mahomeddan system of revenue economy in the Northern circars, and in other parts of India, that the Committee have inserted it, in the Appendix to their Report.

Appendix, No 13;

From the information furnished by the work in question, by the reports of the committee of circuit, and by other official documents, your Committee are enabled to lay before the House, the following general view of the internal state of the Northern Circars.

These territories, when acquired by the Company, consisted of zemindarry lands and havelly lands.

The zemindarry lands are situated in the hill country of the western frontier, and in the plains between the hills and the sea. The hill zemindars, secure in the woody and unwholesome heights which they inhabited, and encouraged by the hope of an eventual asylum in the dominions of the Nizam, or of the rajah of Berar, had often furnished examples of successful depredation and unpunished revolt. They were surrounded by military tenants, whose lands were held, on stipulations of personal service; and whose attachment to their chiefs was increased, by the bond of family connection. These zemindars consisted of three classes: First; The Velmas, of Telinga origin, who were driven from the Carnatic in the year 1652, by the Mahomeddan arms, and who established themselves on the borders of the Kistna. Second; The Rachewars, of the race of the ancient sovereigns of Orissa, who were also compelled by the Mahomeddians to relinquish the plains of the circars, and retired to the highland woods, that formed their western frontier. Their possessions are principally situated to the north of the Godavery. Third; The Wooriars, being petty chieftans of the military tribe, who, after the overthrow of the empire of Orissa by the Mahomeddians, were enabled, from their local situation, to acquire an independent jurisdiction. Their possessions are chiefly situated, in the high lands in the northern division of Cicacole.

80 FIFTH REPORT from the Select Committee on the employed by the Mussulman conquerors, in the management of their new acquisitions, and who appear to have first acquired lands and influence, after the conquest of Aurangzebe, and during the distracted administration of his children.

The military force of the zemindars, like that maintained by the Poligars in the modern possessions under the Madras government, consisted of three descriptions.
First; The common Peons, who were paid in money, and whose constant attendance was expected. Secondly; The Mocassa Peons, who were paid by grants of land, subject to a quit rent only. Thirdly; The Munnoverty Peons, who consisted of military tenants of a higher order, and who were bound to bring their adherents with them to the field. At the time the Circars came into the hands of the Company, the zemindars were, for the most part, in a very irregular state of subjection to Nizam Ally. During the weakness of his government and that of his predecessors, they had embraced every opportunity to extend their power, and to assume a degree of independence, incompatible with any other character than that of tributary chiefs. In the pursuit of these views, they were assisted by the successive wars and contentions for empire, which followed the death of Aurangzebe in 1707. Amidst these convulsions, arose a dispute for the succession to the soubahship of the Deccan, in which Nizam ul Mulk, by maintaining himself, in opposition to the orders of the Mogul, excited the zemindars to disregard an authority, which then possessed not the means of enforcing their obedience. During the period of Nizam ul Mulk's usurpation, little progress was made in restoring these countries to a state of order; and a second contest for the government of the Deccan, arising upon his death in 1749, the confusion of the internal government was continued and increased. Such was the state of the northern circars when obtained by the French. At the commencement of their administration, they made the zemindars feel the weight of their power; but being called upon to march their troops into different parts of the country, for the purpose of supporting Salabut Jung, before their authority was established, they were soon driven to the necessity of temporizing with those they had attempted to subdue, and disorders ensued, which prevailed from the time the French were expelled the circars. They reverted to the government of the Nizam, under whom they continued, that interval, the whole system of internal management had become disorganized.
Not only the forms, but even the remembrance of civil authority, seemed to be wholly lost. These circumstances, to which the Committee have thus thought it necessary briefly to advert, will account to the House for the state of power and influence in which the zemindars were found by the Company, when they received the sovereignty of the Circars.

The hill zemindars, who were descended from the rajahs of the kingdom of Orissa, and who were entrusted with the protection of a district from the incursions of robbers and wild beasts, and with the suppression of internal commotions, were on account of the difficulty of keeping them in strict subjection, allowed by the Mussulmen conquerors, to retain their former habits, and to enjoy the government share of the produce from their mountainous but fertile lands, on condition of paying a tribute, and the performance of the duties of protection above-mentioned, which they had been accustomed to discharge. [But the zemindars in general, whom it does not appear could be made to submit to the Mahomeddan authority, were never acknowledge by their rulers as independent or tributary chiefs, or as even having any property in the land. On the contrary, it would seem from the process which the Mussulman government observed, when capable of vigour, in realizing the revenues of the districts, as well as from the constitutional checks established through every part of them, (checks similar to those which the Committee have described, as having existed in the Bengal territories) that zemindaries were offices of trust, and that the possessors of them, were accountable managers and collectors, and not lords and proprietors of the lands; that the money they paid to government, instead of being, in the nature of a tribute or more acknowledgment of subjection or fealty, was no other than a jumma or revenue, annually calculated upon the produce of the several zemindaries; that, as a check upon the conduct of the Zemindars, there were officers appointed by the state, to keep an account of the cultivation and produce, and whose duty it was to furnish the foudar or governor of the country, at the proper season, with accounts and statements of the past and present state of its produce, who thereupon, formed the jumma or revenue settlement of the year, which was variable in its amount, and in general, proportionate to the estimated value of the harvest.
The duty of the zemindar, as declared in his sunnud of appointment, was to superintend intend that portion of country committed to his charge, to do justice to the ryots or peasants, to furnish them with the necessary advances for cultivation, and to collect the rent of government; and as a compensation for the discharge of this duty, he enjoyed, as did the zemindars of Bengal, certain allotments of land, rent free, termed sacerum, which were conveniently dispersed through the district, so as to make his presence necessary every where, in order to give the greater effect to his superintendence. He was also entitled to receive certain russooms or fees on the rents of houses. These personal or rather official lands and perquisites, amounted altogether to about ten per cent. on the collections he made in his district or zemindarry. The office itself was to be traced, as far back as the time of the Hindoo rajahs. It originally went by the name of Chowdrie, which was changed by the Mahomeddars for that of Crorie, in consequence of an arrangement, by which the land was so divided among the collectors, that each had the charge of a portion of country yielding about a crore of dams, or two and a half lacs of rupees. It was not until a late period of the Mahomeddan government, that the term crorie was superseded by that of zemindar, which literally signifying a possessor of land, gave a colour to that misconstruction of their tenure, which assigned to them an hereditary right of European soil. It accordingly appears that in the year 1769, on the establishment of European agency in the management of the Northern circars, the zemindaries were described by the presidency of Fort St. George, "as lands held by certain rajahs or chiefs, as " their hereditary estates, paying a certain tribute to the government, and being " subject to suit and service, in a manner very similar to the antient feudal tenures."

An idea was also entertained in 1771, by the chief and council at Masulipatam, that " the zemindaries were no other than feudal districts, for which the rajahs, who were
" the proprietors of them, paid a tribute to government, in proportion to their value;
" and if called upon, ought to attend in time of war with a certain number of troops."
And in subsequent years, it would appear that a very close adherence to the tributary system was observed in the conduct of the British government towards the zemindars; until the general investigations of the committee of circuit, and the more particular researches of several enlightened servants of the Company, established the fallacy of the construction which had been, at least, tacitly admitted with respect to zemindary rights, and set them forth, in their true character. While the strength of the Ma-homeddan government was entire, and indeed whenever it was afterwards enabled, on occasions to exert it, the conduct of the zemindars was subject to a rigid control, and many instances of punishment, the most severe, are recorded in the annals of the country. It appears that they were in general, continued hereditarily in the management of the lands, but not necessarily so; for it was no very uncommon practice to remove them for acts of misconduct and disobedience; and an instance is on record, In the early period also of the French government, the greater part of them, were dismissed from their employments, but permitted to enjoy their sauverum lands, and the other privileges or fees which, as has been shown, constituted the authorized emoluments attached to the office of a zemindar.]

The practice of our Government in the zemindary lands, (and which was found to exist when the circars came into its possession) was to allow the zemindars to appropriate the revenues of the districts to their own use, in consideration of paying a certain sum to the government, stipulated in the written engagements they entered into; which sum was denominated jumma, or rent. These resources, they realized, by collecting them from the ryots or actual cultivators, either in kind or money, or, as was almost universally the case, by farming them to persons, on annual or longer leases; the contracts including one or more villages, districts, or larger portions, and sometimes entire zemindaries.

By the custom of the Hindoo government, the cultivators were entitled to one half of the paddy produce (that is, grain in the husk) depending on the periodical rains. Of the crops from the dry grain lands, watered by artificial means, the share of the cultivator was about two-thirds. These, were the proportions which generally obtained; but particular casts were allowed a larger share, as well as strangers, that is, those ryots who were not fixed residents in the villages. Before the harvest commenced, the quantity of the crop was ascertained in the presence of the inhabitants and village servants, by the survey of persons unconnected with the village, who from habit, were particularly skilful and expert, in judging of the amount of the produce, and who, in the adjustment of this business, were materially aided by a reference to the produce of former years, as recorded by the accountants of the villages. The cultivators were at liberty, if they thought it necessary, to make another survey by people of their own; and if any material difference appeared in the two estimates, a third account was taken, under the orders of the village officers. The quantity which belonged to the government being thus ascertained, it was received in kind or in money. Before the division took place, certain deductions were made from the gross produce, which the Committee will hereafter explain. Of the plantation or garden culture, which was of greater value than the other descriptions of produce, no larger portion was demanded from the ryots than one-fourth to one-eighth of the entire yearly crop, according to the additional expense, trouble and time required, in bringing such articles to maturity, and the distance and hazard of carrying them to market. The rule with respect to these superior articles, as well as small grains, was to assess them with a fixed money rent, not liable to fluctuation, as the produce might be more or less.

Such were the rights of the ryots, according to the ancient usage of the country. In consequence, however, of the changes introduced by the Mahomeddan conquest, and the many abuses which later times had established, the share really enjoyed by the ryots, was often reduced to a sixth, and but seldom exceeded a fifth; for instead of the former usage, the expedient of an impost originally founded on a measurement of the arable land, and of additional assessments in proportion to that impost, was generally adopted, and the amount of such additional assessments had no bounds, but those which limited the supposed ability of the husbandman. In those parts of the country where the practice of receiving the rents in kind, or by a money valuation of the actual produce, still obtained, the cultivators were reduced to an equally unfavourable situation, by the arbitrary demands and contributions to which they were subjected, beyond the stipulated rent. The effects of this unjust system, were considerably augmented by the custom which had become common with the zemindars, and to which your Committee have already alluded, of sub-renting their lands to farmers, whom they armed with unrestricted powers of collection, and who were thus enabled to disregard, whenever it suited their purpose, the engagements they entered into with the ryots; besides practising every species of oppression, which an unfeeling motive of self-interest could suggest. If they agreed with the cultivators at the commencement of the year, for a rent in money, and the season proved an abundant one, they then insisted on receiving their dues in kind. When they did take their rents in specie, they hardly ever failed to collect a part of them, before the harvest time had arrived, and the crops were cut; which reduced the ryots to the necessity of borrowing from money lenders, at a heavy interest of 3, 4 and 5 per cent. per month, the sums requisite to make good the anticipated payments that were demanded of them. If from calamity or other cause, the ryots were the least remiss in the discharge of their rents, the officers of the renters were instantly quartered upon them, and these officers they were obliged to maintain, until they might be recalled, on the demand being satisfied. It was also a frequent practice with the renters, to remove the inhabitants from fertile lands, in order to bestow them on their friends and favourites; and to oblige the ryots to assist them, when they happened to be farmers, in the tilling of their lands, and to furnish them gratuitously with labourers, bullocks, carts and straw.

In addition to the assessment on the lands, or the shares of their produce received from the inhabitants, they were subject to the duties levied on the inland trade, which were collected by the renters under the zemindars. These duties which went by the name of Sayer, as they extended to grain, to cattle, to salt, and all the other necessities of life passing through the country, and were collected by corrupt, partial, and extortionate agents, produced the worst effects on the state of society, by not only checking the progress of industry, oppressing the manufacturer, and causing him to debase his manufacture; but also by clogging the beneficial operations of commerce in general, and abridging the comforts of the people at large. This latter description of imposts, was originally considered as a branch of revenue, too much exposed to abuses, to be entrusted to persons not liable to restraint and punishment. It was therefore retained under the immediate management of the government: The first rates were easy, and the custom-houses few; but in the general relaxation of authority prevailing in the circars, this mode of raising revenue for the support of government, was scandalously abused. In the course of a little time, new duties were introduced under the pretence of charitable and religious donations, as fees to the chokidars or account-keepers, guards, and other officers at the stations; as protection money to a zemindar, or as a present to those who farmed the duties. Not only had the duties been from time to time, raised in their amount, and multiplied in their number, at the discretion of the zemindars, and the renters under them; but they were at length, levied at almost every stage, and and on every successive transfer of property. Uniformity in the principles of collection was completely wanting; a different mode of taxation prevailing in every district, in respect to all the varieties of goods and other articles subject to impost. This consuming system of oppression had, in some instances, been aggravated by the Company's government, which, when possessed of a few factories, with a small extent of territory around them, adopted the measure of placing chokies or custom stations in the vicinity of each, for the purpose of ascertaining the state of trade within their own limits, as well as to afford them a source of revenue. Under the head of Saver Revenue, was also included a variety of taxes indefinite in their amount, and vexatious in their nature, called moterpha; they consisted of imposts on houses, on the implements of agriculture, on looms, on merchants, on artificers, and other professions and casts.

With respect to the Havelies of the Northern circars, they appear to the Committee to have consisted of the demesne or household lands of the circar or government. They were composed of districts in the vicinity of each capital town, which were originally resumed by the Mahomeddan government, and had been annexed to those towns, for the supply of the garrisons and numerous establishments both civil and military of the Mussulmans. This arrangement appears to have been founded on considerations of policy; for it not only exempted the landed interest in general, from the licentious demands and arbitrary interference of military officers, but it likewise secured to the garrisons a supply, that was equally independent of the interested combinations of zemindars, and of the casual fluctuations of the market. Those under the chief and council at Musulipatam were very inconveniently situated, consisting of detached districts widely separated from each other. Some of the Havelies had been taken from the zemindary lands, on account of their fertility, but these were few; some were rendered such, by the French; and considerable additions were made to them, after the establishment of the Company's government, by the assumption of lands in the possession of the zemindars, on account of rebellion or other misconduct; or by the immediate management of such lands, reverting to the ruling power, in consequence of failure of heirs in a zemindar. The Havelies constituted a large part of the Northern circars; and since the establishment of the British government they may be correctly described, as being portions of territory, which were not, in the hands of zemindars, but in those of the government, and in which it was therefore optional, to adopt any system of management for collecting the land revenue from the ryots, that might be preferred.

The government possessed the right to certain proportions of the crops, after making the customary deductions for the use of the pagodas and other local purposes, which were regulated by the same principles, as in the zemindary lands. The mode in which the land revenues of the Havelies were collected by the Company's government, was by renting those of a whole circar to one individual, though it would appear they were at first, for some years, let in smaller farms. The persons to whom they were thus rented, were the dubashes, who were stewards or agents, or to such as derived their influence from characters of that description, belonging to the different chiefships and councils; being strangers, soucars who advanced money, or others who made that kind of farming their profession. The unqualified conveyance by the government itself, of most of its powers to these large speculating renters, necessarily conferred upon them, the most ample means of oppression; and appears to have occasioned, but in a still greater degree, the unjust and vicious system of internal administration, which existed in the zemindary lands.

The sayer duties were farmed out, either to those who rented the lands, or to other persons under separate leases.

There were other sources, from whence a public revenue was derived in the Havelies. These consisted of the sea and land customs, collected at the different ports, on imports and exports; and of exclusive rights of manufacture and trade, in certain articles, such as salt, arrack, beetle nut and tobacco, for which an annual payment was made to the government: These latter, went under the denomination of farms and licences. The duties on imports and exports appear to have been at some periods, also rented; but were in general, retained under the management of the subordinate local authorities of government.

It was only by an active and faithful discharge of duty, on the part of those officers of inspection, whose business it was to keep an account of the territorial produce, and of every thing connected with the rights, both of the ryots and of government, ment, as arising from the land; that the abuses and irregularity of the zemindars, renters and managers, and of the inferior agents employed in making the collections, could be prevented or restrained. It had been anciently provided by the Hindoo government, that there should be a public officer in each village, who was required to keep an exact register of the quantity of land held by each ryot, the part of it cultivated, his means of cultivation, the actual produce, the proportion he was entitled to receive from the crop, whether by agreement or usage, the shares actually received from him, or the payments made by him, as well as an account of every other circumstance or transaction in his village, that respected the tenures under which the lands were held. The appointment of this officer, was intended as a check on the conduct of the collector of the village, whose duty consisted in assigning land to new settlers, in receiving the rent due from each occupant, and in forwarding the general business of cultivation within the limits of his petty jurisdiction. The accounts of each village thus taken in detail, were transmitted to another officer appointed in each district or division of a province, who formed therefrom abstracts of the state of cultivation, of the produce, and capacity of the several villages within his district. The accounts of this officer, operated as a check on the collector of the district, to whom those in the villages, were the subordinate agents. These accounts, were again reduced by the provincial or head accountant, whose duty it was also to register all sunnuds and territorial grants of every kind. There was also a head or provincial officer, who superintended the department of collection and receipt. By the means thus described, the government was regularly and constantly furnished with every necessary information respecting its land revenues and other territorial rights. These aboriginal appointments, though going under different names, except as to the curnum or village accountant, and potail or village collector (whose titular designations still remain unchanged, in the greater part of the country) appear to have been retained by the Mahomeddan governments, and to have been confined to Hindoos. The curnum was in general, and still is, a Bramin.

The excellence of this system appears to have consisted, in the operation of mutual checks on personal agency; and in the simplification of forms and accounts. Its efficiency depended scarcely less, on the degree of superintendence and controul which was exercised by the ruling power over its officers engaged in letting out the lands, and in settling and receiving the rents; than over its official registers. It will accordingly be found, that as the zemindars or district collectors acquired an undue influence in the country, as they became more free and less shackled by the authority of government, and as the practice gained ground of allowing them to farm for a stipulated sum, the revenues of the countries under their charge, instead of accounting to the state for the collections they made; the officers of inspection lost their efficacy, and gradually became themselves, the instruments of abuse. When the committee of circuit reported on the state of the Northern circars, the official registers, instead of being checks on the zemindars and renters, had by acceding at first to their views and encroachments, from weakness or venal motives, fallen into contempt, and lost not only their authority, but their emoluments also. Some contenting themselves with the allowance attached to their offices, continued to hold them, as sinecures; while on the other hand, a few who were rich and aspiring, acquired a footing of power and consequence, little inferior to that of a zemindar; and it was the practice with many of them, to act as renters, sometimes as subrenters, and as agents under the renters; thus combining the inconsistent functions of a collector and a comptroller of the revenues. Instances also existed of the duty of the village accountants having been performed by the district register. Hence it was, that an attention to original institutions, and the necessary means of preserving the public revenue, and the rights of individuals, were entirely neglected.

Among the various abuses which had arisen from the want of an efficient inspection on the part of the government, and which prevailed both in the zemindaries and the Havellies, were the alienation of lands, and the collection of russoms or perquisites. It was the custom of the Hindoo government to grant small allotments of the soil, free of rent, or at low rents, for the support of the pagoda establishments, and their priests; for charitable uses, such as keeping up choultries for the accommodation of travellers, and for the subsistence of the Bramins and other favoured inhabitants. Similar territorial appropriations were also made to the revenue officers of the state, as well as to the public officers and servants of the villages, or individuals employed, in conducting the general concerns, and administering to the public wants and necessities of those petty communities, into which the whole country is divided.

Of their internal form and constitution, the committee of circuit have afforded only an imperfect account: but later and more particular enquiries have clearly shewn, that they do not differ in their nature, from those existing in the modern territories in the peninsula. A village, geographically considered, is a tract of country comprising some hundreds or thousands of acres of arable and waste land: politically viewed, it resembles a corporation or township. Its proper establishment of officers and servants consists of the following descriptions: The Potail, or head inhabitant; who has the general superintendence of the affairs of the village, settles the disputes of the inhabitants, attends to the police, and performs the duty, already described, of collecting the revenues within his village: a duty which his personal influence and minute acquaintance with the situation and concerns of the people renders him best qualified to discharge. The Curnum; who keeps the accounts of cultivation, and registers every thing connected with it. The Talliar and Totie: the duty of the former, appearing to consist, in a wider and more enlarged sphere of action, in gaining information of crimes and offences, and in escorting and protecting persons travelling from one village to another: the province of the latter, appearing to be more immediately confined to the village, consisting, among other duties, in guarding the crops, and assisting in measuring them. The Boundaryman; who preserves the limits of the village, or gives evidence respecting them, in cases of dispute. The Superintendent of the Tanks and Watercourses distributes the water therefrom, for the purposes of agriculture. The Bramin, who performs the village worship. The Schoolmaster, who is seen teaching the children in the villages to read and write in the sand. The Calendar Bramin, or astrologer, who proclaims the lucky or unpropitious periods for sowing and threshing. The Smith and Carpenter, who manufacture the implements of agriculture, and build the dwelling of the ryot. The Potman, or potter. The Washerman. The Barber. The Cowkeeper, who looks after the cattle. The Doctor. The Dancing Girl, who attends at rejoicings. The Musician and the Poet. These officers and servants, generally constitute the establishment of a village; but, in some parts of the country, it is of less extent, some of the duties and functions above described being united in the same person; in others, it exceeds the number of individuals which have been described.

Under this simple form of municipal government, the inhabitants of the country have lived, from time immemorial. The boundaries of the villages have been but seldom altered; and though the villages themselves, have been sometimes injured, and even desolated, by war, famine, and disease; the same name, the same limits, the same interests, and even the same families, have continued for ages. The inhabitants give themselves no trouble about the breaking-up and division of kingdoms; while the village remains entire, they care not to what power it is transferred, or to what sovereign it devolves; its internal economy remains unchanged; the Potail is still the head inhabitant, and still acts as the petty judge and magistrate, and collector or renter of the village.

In addition to the portions of land appropriated to the pagoda establishment, to the local officers of government, and to the village servants, they each were entitled to certain small shares or perquisites from the crops of the villages; which were allotted to them, generally before, but sometimes subsequently, to the division of the produce between government and the cultivators. Provision appears to have been also made, in the mode last described, for the maintenance of public servants incapacitated by age or accident from the discharge of their duty. The fund of these disbursements, in which the several classes of revenue officers and village servants likewise participated, as one of the sources of their official emoluments, was the sayer or inland duties, and the sea and land customs.

The practice of allotting lands free of rent, or at low rents, and of applying shares of the agricultural produce, and of the customs, to the uses and purposes above explained, was followed by the Mahomeddan government; with whom it was also a frequent custom to provide for their relations, and to reward the higher ranks of their officers in the military and civil departments, by large grants of land, under the name of Jaghires. The territorial grants to the religious institutions of the country, and for charitable purposes, bear the name of enauins; those to the revenue officers and servants in the villages, are called mauniuns; but both descriptions generally pass under the former name, in the official records of the Company. The perquisites from the crops are denominated russoms or marahs.

Of the different descriptions of land, which have been enumerated, those attached to the revenue officers in the department of inspection and account, descended from one family to another, in consequence of the offices in question being hereditary in their principle. Those also may perhaps be considered as permanent alienations of land which were bestowed on public institutions, and likewise those enjoyed by the different classes of government officers employed in the business of collecting the revenues; for though these officers were not, under the Mussulman rule, necessarily hereditary, the offices themselves, were neither temporary nor occasional, but constituted an integral part of the government. With regard to the jaghires granted by the Mahomeddars, either as marks of favour, or as rewards for public services, they generally, if not always, reverted to the state on the decease of the grantee, unless continued to his heir, under a new sunnud; for the alienation in perpetuity of the rights of government in the soil, was inconsistent with the established policy of the Mahomeddars, from which they deviated only in the case of endowments to the religious establishments and offices of public duty, and in some rare instances, of grants to holy men and celebrated scholars.

It appeared to the committee of circuit, from the best information they could obtain, that in numberless instances, lands of considerable extent were enjoyed by individuals on the tenures above described, and entered, either in the village or district register as such, which had been conveyed, without sufficient authority; perhaps granted by an amildar, a zemindar, or a temporary renter; or not granted at all, but obtained through the collusion of the agents employed in making the collections or the registers, either at the price of a bribe, or as a mark of favour to their friends. One of the latter descriptions of officers, who, as has been explained, formed an established part of the constitution of every village, was the carman or register of the lands situated within its boundaries, who made his return to the despandehs or district registers, acting under the canongee or register of the province. In many parts of the circars, there were no less than three or four persons passing under that description in one village, who were in the possession of rent-free lands, without discharging any duty. The clandestine appropriation of land, and the acquirement of it, under fictitious tenures, were carried to the greatest extent by the zemindars, and by the renters in the Havellics; but more particularly, by the former, who, in addition to the spots which they had at their own discretion, allotted for the support of their armed retainers, had contrived to possess themselves of whole villages in the Havellics bordering on the zemindarries, which they held as suaverums or lands attached to their offices, but which in fact, were mere usurpations, effected by them, when they were allowed to rent the Havellics, or, in times of weakness and disorder, when the inhabitants were glad to connive at any innovations on the part of a zemindar, so long as he extended the promise of that protection, which the authority of the amildar was inadequate to afford them. It also appears that the zemindars had surreptitiously annexed to their zemindarries not only villages that were havelly, but entire pergunnahs: and one instance was discovered of a zemindarry jurisdiction, which consisted altogether of lands, thus secretly and illicitly converted. From these causes, a large proportion of the produce of the soil, and of the soil itself, had been fraudulently or irregularly alienated from the government, and to the extent of such alienations, the rights of the ruling power had been encroached upon, and its territorial revenues diverted into private channels.

It does not appear that any regular or settled administration of justice had existed in the Northern circars, since the Mahomeddan power ceased to be a controlling authority in that quarter. There were, during the former period, four courts of justice in the circars, where cauzees officiated chiefly in criminal causes; the foujdars or the amildars reserving to themselves the infliction of capital punishment, and the determination of causes of magnitude. The Hindoos generally had recourse to their own laws, through the medium of arbitration, in preference to an appeal to the Mahomeddan tribunals. The arbitrators on these occasions, were, for the most part, the head men or collectors of villages; to whose decision it was the practice, in the other parts of India, from the most ancient times, to leave the settlement of all petty matters of dispute, occurring among the inhabitants.

On the dissolution of the Mahomeddan rule in the Northern circars, the zemindars, or their principal servants, exercised the powers which formerly belonged to the amildar or provincial governor of the country, when it formed a part of the territory of the Nizam; but unrestrained by any superintending authority.

All that was done by the zemindars and renters, was rather tolerated by the British government, from the necessity of the case; than formally recognized, by it. The only courts of justice under the Madras government, whose powers extended to the Northern

Northern circars, were those of the quarter sessions and oyer and terminer at the presidency, established under his Majesty's charter of 1753; and the jurisdiction of those tribunals, as far as respected the natives of the circars, was limited to Vizagapatam and to the other factories on the sea coast established by the Company, when that charter was obtained. The chiefs and councils, indeed, were allowed to exercise a power in cases of heinous offence; but it extended no further than the confinement of the culprit's person, who, after an imprisonment, longer or shorter, was released; but without a previous trial of the offender. The provincial boards appear also to have taken a concern in the adjudication of civil disputes, but unrestrained by any forms, and, as it should seem, in hardly any matters but those of a revenue nature. It also appears, that the commandants of the sepoy battalions not unfrequently assumed to themselves the right of deciding disputes and causes in the districts; nor was it uncommon, for military officers to bring natives to summary trial for crimes, and to order at their discretion, the infliction of punishment.

The reports of the committee of circuit afford but little information on the subject of police in the circars. It may, however, be collected from other official sources of intelligence, of a later date, that little more than the traces of regular police establishments existed in those districts; though it would appear that at some period, not very remote, the same municipal institutions there prevailed, which are found to exist in other parts of the territories of Fort St. George. This conclusion is supported by the partial existence of village watchers, similar to those who go by the name of tallars and tolies, in other parts of the country, where the original constitutions of the Hindoos have been better preserved, and who acted under the superintendence of the head men of villages. Where these remnants of the old establishments had no existence, the duties of police were performed by the revenue servants of the zemindars or the renters, who in the former case, were aided by the military of the zemindars, and in the latter, by the peons of the revenue servants. In some of the principal towns, a distinct establishment, of a cutwal and peons was entertained; but it is said to have differed entirely from those kept up under the Hindoo government, and was of Mahomeddan origin. These establishments were merely local, and not connected with the general police of the country.

Such was the state of internal administration in the Northern circars, when the committee of circuit reported on that subject.

It has been seen, that in the instructions sent out from England for the guidance of that committee, they were required to state their sentiments as to the expediency of introducing into the Northern circars, regulations for the administration of justice, similar to those which then existed in Bengal; but upon this subject, they did not feel themselves competent to give an opinion, and contented themselves with recommending, that in any arrangement which might be made, particular attention should be paid to the laws of the Hindoos, and that the process should be rendered as simple, and the charge for fees as moderate as possible.

Your Committee however find, that in the Appendix to one of their Reports on the Havelly lands of Cossimcottah and Cicacole, are contained the minutes of two of the members, in which they take occasion to record their respective ideas, as to the mode of administering justice, which appeared to them best adapted, to the existing state of that part of the circars. It was proposed by one of them, that a court should be established at Vizagapatam, consisting of six natives of the Bramin cast, whose decisions should be according to the shastries, on questions of inheritance, marriage, cast or other religious matters; that in cases of debt and disputed accounts, they should sit as arbitrators, or recommend the complaining parties to choose or appoint others, whose decrees should not be binding, unless approved by a superintendent of justice (being as your Committee conclude, an European) who should have the same powers, as were then possessed, by the judges of the adawlut in Bengal. It was farther proposed that appeals should, in certain cases, lie to the chief and council. The authority of the court in regard to public offences, was to extend to corporal punishment, imprisonment, working on the roads, and moderate fines. The plan proposed by the other members of the committee was, that the chief and council should be constituted, a court of justice at the subordinacy; to which all descriptions of persons should be amenable, in cases of private or public defalcation, and oppression: that, for the administration of justice in the remote parts of the country, the principal inhabitants of an extent of territory producing two lacs of rupees, should be directed to chuse a person properly qualified to be the judge among them; that the Hindoo law should be attended to, rather than that of the Koran; and that a register of the proceedings of the courts should be regularly kept, as was likewise proposed under the former plan.

proposed duty should be confided; appointed Mr. Oram to the office of superintendent, with two European assistants. Their powers were limited to the havelly lands, but with the intention to extend them to those of the zemindars, on a more favourable occasion.

The office of superintendent of revenue inspection, was of but short duration: the necessity for its continuance being, as it was thought, rendered unnecessary by the appointment in April 1787, of European collectors and assistants to the management of the havelly lands, who acted under the immediate authority of the board of revenue. This measure, while it superseded the functions of superintendent of revenue accounts, excluded the power of the provincial chiefs and councils from the havellys; but in respect to the latter, it was intended to be experimental only, and on that principle it was approved of by the court of directors, who thought that the "authority of the chiefs and councils ought to be permanent," whenever a fixed plan of revenue should be established.

In this fluctuation of measures and authorities, little progress could be expected in the removal of abuses, or in the attainment of correct information; but while the havellys were under the superintendent of revenue accounts, some reforms were made in regard to the sayer duties and the russooms, or fees collected by the renters and revenue officers, from the merchants and other traders passing through the country; although the general objects of his appointment had been, but in a very limited degree, accomplished.

The havellys continued in a state of separation from the authority of the provincial boards, until the middle of 1792, when it was resolved by the Madras presidency, agreeably to their original intention, to re-annex them to the respective chiefships, the collectors being still left in the subordinate management of the revenues.

The policy of this change, appears to have been very questionable. The financial system of Bengal, proceeded on the principle of giving to the board of revenue a distinct and accurate view of all revenue transactions. On this account, the several collectors were ordered to correspond immediately with them, and were directed to record and transmit in full detail, the circumstances of their own conduct, and the particulars of every occurrence that was connected with disbursement or receipt. The appointment of collectors in the havellys of the Northern circars, appears to have been formed on the same views, and on nearly the same plan; but the alteration adverted to, tended to augment the authority of the provincial councils, in proportion as it deprived the board of revenue of a part of its efficient controul, and lessened its means of information. The records of the Company accordingly present, at that period, continual collisions of authority and of opinions, between the board of revenue, and the provincial establishments; and notwithstanding the promulgation of new regulations full of equity and justice towards the inhabitants, yet no real progress was made to a vigorous establishment of the Company's authority, or a regular system of revenue management, in the Northern circars, until Lord Hobart took upon himself the responsibility of abolishing the provincial councils, and of appointing throughout the country, collectors directly amenable to the authority of the board of revenue.

This important reform, had indeed been brought under the consideration of the board of revenue, by successive members of that board, in minutes; which whilst they reflect great credit on the intelligence and abilities of their authors, afforded undoubted evidence of the imperfect administration of the Northern circars, and of the necessity of a fundamental change. The two minutes of Mr. Charles Nicholas White, which immediately preceded this change, dated the 14th February and 25th March 1793, are added in the Appendix; and are amongst the proofs given by that gentleman, of the intelligence and ability which distinguished the long course of his honourable services to the Company.

It appeared that the zemindars still kept up their large military establishments, which were on frequent occasions, employed in resisting the orders of government; while they were attended with an enormous expense, and were extremely burthen-some to the inhabitants; that they neglected the cultivation and improvement of their districts, trusting to interested and rapacious managers; that the ryots were still exposed to great distress, from exorbitant demands and additional assessments; that the provincial councils possessed little experience of the interior management and detail of the collections in the zemindaries, which, added to their distant and stationary situations, in a manner disqualified them from judging, with any correctness or precision, of the real condition of the districts; that any enormities committed within the limits of the respective zemindaries, were not considered a matter of enquiry at the subordinates, or if known, were apparently disregarded; that the chiefships had constantly represented the inconvenience resulting from any attempts to interfere with the internal controul of the zemindars, which impressed them with ideas of their own independence, and encouraged them to frequent acts of resistance. Their interference indeed, when it was exercised, generally speaking, extended only to the zemindars themselves, with whom they formed the settlements; and but seldom to the interior business of the revenues, except in a few cases of sequestration, which were considered as temporary expedients, and which more usually proved unsuccessful.

It appears to your Committee, that boards, like those of the provincial councils, fixed as it has been stated at one place, and from their constitution, calculated rather for deliberation than for action, whose discussions and whose dissensions, often interested, impeded instead of accelerating public objects; the members of those boards being but seldom acquainted with the country languages, and trusting the management of affairs to their native dubashes, or principal agents and interpreters; were but ill qualified to gain that accurate knowledge of the revenue concerns, and the customs and usages of the country, which could enable them (even had the authority of government been better established) to apply a remedy to prevalent abuses and defects. Those boards could, indeed, be considered only as commercial councils, upon which by accident, the whole political, financial, and revenue administration had fallen; and it was a system, without any defined responsibility; for a great part of the business before it, was transacted by the chief alone, the council receiving his report of all personal interviews with the zemindars and others. The prevalence of native duplicity and counteraction, in the servants of the different members, and the commanding influence unavoidably possessed under such a system, and under such masters, by the head servant of the chief, operated in themselves, as insuperable obstacles to a just and efficient administration of the revenues, by defeating every wholesome measure that might be adopted for that purpose.

Before the Committee explain to the House, the steps which were taken for the abolition of the provincial councils, they will add a brief account of the different settlements which had, from time to time, been formed in the zemindaries and in the havellys, during the continuance of those establishments. To enable the Committee to furnish this information, they have been under the necessity of referring to many voluminous records; but they were very materially assisted in the prosecution of this research, by a report of the board of revenue, dated the 3d of September 1799, to which they shall have occasion to refer, in a subsequent part of this Report.

Those concluded with the zemindars appear to have been annual, till 1778; in which year, all the zemindars, except those in the northern division of Cicacole, were summoned to the presidency by Sir Thomas Rumbold, who formed a settlement for five years with those of Masulipatam, to yield 12½ per cent. above their jummas or rents for the preceding year, in consideration of the extended period of the leases. But the payment of this addition, was not then enforced; on the contrary, the zemindars were permitted to withhold it, on granting obligations to discharge the amount, in the event of the committee of circuits declaring that their zemindaries were able to bear it; and at the close of these leases in 1783, very considerable balances had accrued. The conduct of Sir Thomas Rumbold in this transaction was brought under the notice of the House in the year 1782, and became the subject of particular investigation and report by a Committee of this House. From 1783 to 1786, when the board of revenue was instituted, annual settlements, on the terms of the expired leases, were resorted to; and the balances on the average, annually decreased. It was found by the board, that great irregularities had prevailed, both in the accounts and payments. No proper distinction had been preserved between the current revenue and the balances; the former was permitted to fall back, so that the jumma of the current year was not discharged, until the succeeding one, and then only apparently; credit having been often given to the zemindars for their kists or instalments, under the head of "bills receivable;" which bills were not paid for a long period, if at all. The board of revenue appear to have given their attention to correct these irregularities; and they recommended a settlement for three years, to commence from the 25th September 1786; and having received the opinion of the committee of circuit, as to the ability of the zemindars to pay the increase of 12½ per cent. their report was submitted to the chief and council at Masulipatam, as the guide by which that body were to be regulated, in their assessment of the new jumma. A settlement was accordingly concluded for that period. The current revenue was the same as fixed by

CIRCARS.

Sir Thomas Rumbold; but the settlement provided for the liquidation of a considerable amount of the balances, and such portion of the arrear of 12½ per cent. as the zemindars were considered respectively able to bear; and although this period was not without its irregularities, it appears that the general balances continued to decrease.

The next settlement concluded was for three, and eventually five years, commencing with the 25th September 1789; and the zemindars, with a few exceptions, were assessed at two-thirds of the gross collections from their respective districts, according to the estimate of the committee of circuit, which was declared by the board of revenue and by the government, to be an equitable rate of assessment; and this principle accordingly received the approbation of the court of directors. The realisation of this settlement was greatly affected by the famine in 1791 and 1792, which rendered considerable remissions necessary; and in consequence of the injurious effects of this calamity, and the hope of deriving useful information from the investigations of the collectors, it was resolved to continue the same rate of assessment.

The circar of Guntoor, as your Committee have stated in a foregoing part of this Report, did not come into the Company's possession until 1788. It consisted of zemindary lands; and the ancient mode of adjusting the annual settlements with the zemindars, appears to have prevailed; that is, the probable value of the standing crop was ascertained by surveyors, and by that computation, the sum paid by the zemindars to the government was principally regulated. The settlement for the first year, was made under the superintendence of the chief of Masulipatam, on the principle of a survey valuation of the crop, conducted by persons employed by the chief; the authority of the zemindars being suspended, until the value of the produce should by this means be ascertained. In the following year, the circar was placed in the hands of a collector, who entered into an engagement with the zemindars, for a pecuniary equivalent for the estimated government share of the produce. The unfavourable result of this settlement led, in the next year, to the formation of one with the head inhabitants of the villages, which proving equally unsatisfactory, a committee was appointed to investigate the causes of the deficiency, and the actual state of the country; which continued with greater success under the charge of this committee for 1790-1, and until it was dissolved, in the middle of the following year; when the circar was again placed, under the management of the chief and council of Masulipatam. The zemindars were then restored to their lands, and assessed on the principle of two-thirds of their gross revenue, agreeably to the statements of seven years gross collections, taken chiefly from the accounts of the村uns or village registers. The settlement was for three years, so as to expire at the same period with those of the other zemindars under the chief and council of Masulipatam; but the cowles stipulated for its extension two years longer, provided the zemindars were punctual to their engagements. This extension was granted to one of the zemindars only, who had alone adhered to his engagements; and, at the expiration of that period, his jumma was augmented to what was considered to be two-thirds of the gross produce of his zemindary.

In the southern division of Cicacole, which was dependent on the chief and council of Vizagapatam, by far the greater part of the zemindary lands were in the possession of Vizieram Rauze; whose zemindary had been considerably enlarged in consequence of his predecessors and himself having seized on the possessions of other zemindars in the division, who had either perished in the defence of their lands, had become exiles, or were languishing in confinement. It also appears, that the zemindars, who retained possession of their lands, had, as the result of conquest, become tributary to the zemindar of Vizianagrum. Till the year 1778, this zemindar was assessed by the provincial council at Vizagapatam, at a fixed sum, very inadequate to his receipts. In that year, his rent was raised, and continued the same till 1788, when the annual demand upon him, was further increased; but was still much less than the proportion of the revenue paid to the state, by the zemindars under the chief and council at Masulipatam.

With respect to the zemindars in the northern division of the Cicacole circar, dependent on the chief and council at Ganjam, since the annulment in 1781 of a ten years lease granted in 1779 by Sir Thomas Rumbold to the late Ballakistna, (the dubash and interpreter of the chief and council,) for the whole of the division, including both zemindary and havelly lands, the practice was to make annual settlements with the zemindars, providing for a reduced current revenue and a proportion of old balances; but the lands were assessed on no fixed principle. The Committee find, that the practice of taking the security of money lenders for the revenue, had long obtained in this district; originating nating in the little dependence to be placed on the zemindars for the payment of their rents, and the desire of thereby avoiding the occasion for employing troops, in a country so unhealthy and difficult of access, in the event of a zemindar's failure: but this practice had latterly been discouraged, as well from not having answered the professed purpose, as because it was the means of introducing a class of people who employed the temporary authority which they had purchased on speculation, to the greatest possible advantage for themselves, without regard to the inhabitants, or to the welfare of the country.

The settlements of the Havellies of the Northern circars, were also made by the provincial chiefs and councils, until the appointment of collectors in 1787; the whole lands of a circar being farmed out for a certain period to a renter, and generally in consequence of an advertisement for proposals. Of the sort of persons with whom these engagements were concluded, your Committee have given some account, in a former part of this Report. The last contract of this description in the havellies under the chief and council of Masulipatam, was made for ten years, with the public interpreter at that subordination.

The havellies dependent on the chief and council of Vizagapatam, and situated in the southern division of Cicacole, were let in 1777 for ten years, to Sitteram Rauze, the brother of the zemindar of Vizianagrum.

In 1779 a ten year's lease was entered into for the havellies dependent on the provincial council of Ganjam, with Ball Khistna; who, it has been already seen, had also contracted for the income arising from the payments of the several zemindaries under that board; and whose contract was annulled by the court of directors, at the end of the second year.

On the establishment of collectors in the Havellies in 1787, two different modes of collecting the dues of government, arising from the produce of the lands, appear to have been practised. The one, was called an aumance settlement, according to which the produce was divided between the cultivator and the state, or in other words, government received its share in kind. It had long been resorted to in the circars, both in the zemindaries and the havellies, on temporary and accidental occasions; such as when a zemindary was sequestered, but not forfeited, or when a difficulty was experienced in letting out the lands, in consequence of an unfavourable season, or from any other cause. This principle of revenue management was adopted, on the appointment of collectors to the havellies, as the best means then within their reach, of ascertaining the value of the lands, and the amount of produce which they yielded. Though well adapted to secure the rights of the government in that produce, it was of all kinds of settlement the most open to abuse, and was frequently attended with great loss and inconvenience, both to government and to the cultivator. It was necessary under this system, to keep up a large establishment of native officers, who generally formed a combination with the inhabitants against the state, in order to defraud it of its rights; and to check and bring to light these artifices, was extremely difficult, while so many facilities to the practice of deception existed; and as the crops could not be taken in by the ryots, until their value was estimated by the servants of government, they were often suffered to remain so long on the ground, as to be greatly damaged, and during that time, were unavoidably liable to depredations. The other mode, which was resorted to by the collectors in the havellies, for realizing the public dues from the cultivators, was to farm out the lands for a stipulated rent, in portions containing a whole pergunnah, or in less divisions, instead of letting out the lands of a whole circar or province to one individual, as was before the practice.

By the introduction of these more detailed methods of collecting the territorial revenues, the abuses and irregularities which had been practiced by the renters under the old system, were, to a certain extent, removed, and the situation of the ryots proportionably ameliorated; while a considerable increase of revenue appears to have been derived, which partly arose from the resumption of lands which had been granted by the sole authority of renters, usurped under their management, or enjoyed by persons for the performance of services, which were considered to have become useless. The want, however, of an adequate knowledge of the country languages, necessarily rendered it impracticable for the Company's servants, then employed in the havellies, if otherwise qualified, to enter into those enquiries, and to collect that information, respecting the affairs of the districts committed to their charge, upon which alone any regular or beneficial system of internal arrangement could be founded. It is stated on this subject, by Mr. White, in his minute of the 25th March 1793, already referred to by the Committee, "That hitherto he did not remember to have heard of any Company's servant, who had obtained such a knowledge

CIRCARS.

"ledge of either of the two prevailing languages in the southern and northern divisions of the coast, as to enable him to undertake with success any enquiry in order to ascertain what writings or records were existing of the learned casts relating to the laws, customs or history of the country; or to trace with any correctness former usages, the increase or decrease of the revenues for any length of time, and the cause of any variation." It therefore followed, that depending, as in a great degree they must have depended, on their dubashes; they could not but be, as they are represented to have been, constantly exposed to interested combinations among the natives, to thwart their views and measures; and through artful machinations, to deceive them, were too frequently made the instruments of some fraud or scheme of oppression.

There was another cause, beside the neglect of so essential a requisite of qualification (and to which indeed that neglect was also, in a great degree, to be ascribed) which, from its sensible effect in retarding, in the hands of the provincial councils and of the collectors, the progress of revenue administration, not only in the northern, but also in the other parts of the Company's antient possessions on the coast, deserves to be noticed by the Committee. They here refer to the very slender and insufficient allowances to those employed, in that line of service. It is true that this state of things was, in part, imputable to the low condition of the Company's finances, which unavoidably prevented them from placing the revenue, or any other department of the public service, on a suitable scale of remuneration. It was not, however, the less an evil; nor perhaps was its consequences so unfavourable, on any line of the service, as on those to whom was confided the collection and management of the revenues; for, as it is justly observed by Mr. White in his minute from which your Committee has just quoted, "while men are vested with a considerable trust, and so inadequately rewarded, with various temptations around them, few would refrain from improper channels of gaining advantages; and still fewer, who would exert themselves with zeal and ardour for the prosperity of the country."

On this subject, Lord Cornwallis had expressed himself to the court of directors in the same year, with a zeal and energy, which placed in the strongest light the nature of the evil, and the necessity of reforming it. "I consider it" (he said) "a duty to you and my country to declare, that the best rules and regulations that can be framed either by yourselves or by the governments in India, will prove totally nugatory and useless, unless you adopt, as a decided and fixed principle, that liberal salaries shall be annexed to every office of trust and responsibility, at all the presidencies; that all perquisites shall be abolished, and that the most rigorous checks shall be established to prevent your servants from attempting to acquire fortunes, by means that are often practised, though never publicly avowed: but for the pursuit of which, many of them find an almost unanswerable apology, by representing the impossibility of their even existing, on their narrow and wretched public allowances. The system that has been so long and so fatally pursued in this country, of granting trifling salaries to men employed in high trust, and who are surrounded with great temptations, and of leaving them to look for their subsistence and future hope of retirement, to perquisites and unavowed emoluments, is as cruelly destructive of the morals of individuals, as it is ruinous to the interests of the Company."

The Madras government were induced to call the attention of the court of directors to the proceedings of the board of revenue, respecting the proposed change in the form of local administration in the ancient territories of the Company, in a letter dated the 9th of May 1793, in which, after referring to those proceedings, they express themselves as follows: "On reviewing the system of administration for the revenue department, we cannot help being forcibly struck with the defects subsisting, in the subordinate or executive parts. The board of revenue at the presidency, is very properly confined to the single duty of superintending and regulating the details; but in the subordinate departments, we find various mixed and incompatible duties. Your chiefs and councils in the circars, are both superintending and executive officers. In their former character, they direct the civil, commercial and revenue concerns of the Company within their respective districts; in their latter character, they act as collectors, settling and receiving revenue, and performing such other duties of detail, as their stationary situations would permit. It is easy to perceive that these establishments are not calculated to reach the objects of an executive authority. The business of a collector requires, among other essential qualifications, great intelligence and activity; to execute his orders with the necessary dispatch, he must be totally unfettered; to execute them with propriety, he must make himself acquainted with the language, dispositions and circumstances "of the people; the various descriptions of landed tenures; the sources from which the public revenues are drawn, and the means by which they may be most effectually secured and improved. If his attention be dissipated by other employments, or his motions restrained by useless forms, he can never attain this knowledge; and without it, the warmest zeal and the best intentions will succeed, but in a very limited degree."

"It has been urged, we believe, in favour of the establishment of chiefships, that their constitution gives them a degree of power and respectability, which may be useful in curbing the independence, and subduing the refractory spirit of the zemindars. But as far as we are able to determine, no such effect has been produced by their exertions. It is now near thirty years since the Company became possessed of the circars; and at this moment, their influence is very little, if at all better established, than it was the first day. The zemindars still keep the same troops, and exercise the same authority, within their respective districts. The oppressions they commit are, we believe, in no degree abated; and their engagements to the Company are as ill performed, as they have been at any period."

"Judging then from the trials of experience, as well as from the principle itself, we do not hesitate to offer it as our opinion, that the establishment of chiefs and councils should be abolished; and that the Northern circars, like every other part of your possessions, should be divided into collectorships, and the administration of the whole conducted, exactly upon the same plan."

"This reform must necessarily be accompanied by another, which has been long wished, but never yet attempted; we mean, an entire reduction of the military power and independence of the zemindars; whose condition at present, is utterly incompatible with all views of improvement, under any system."

"Your honourable court, justly aware of the expediency of such a measure, has repeatedly given orders that the zemindars should be required to surrender their forts, and dismiss their armed followers; and such requisitions have, in a variety of instances, been made; but as your servants were unwilling to take upon themselves the responsibility of any attempt to enforce obedience, no vigorous efforts were ever tried for that purpose, and of course the object remains still to be accomplished."

"We think this point, however, of so much importance, that we take the liberty of suggesting, whether it might not be advisable to authorize your administration, at once to complete the reform, with the concurrence of the governor general in council, and under such other precautions, with respect to time and arrangement, as may appear to him necessary."

"There is nothing in the proposed measure, which is inconsistent with the just rights of the zemindars; and we cannot suppose therefore that any formidable resistance will be made to it; but admitting that the attempt should even produce some temporary inconvenience and loss of revenue, these are small considerations, compared with the benefit of establishing an authority, which will enable you to protect the inhabitants, and to cultivate the prosperity of so valuable and extensive a part of your possessions."

In the following year, Lord Hobart succeeded Sir Charles Oakley in the government of Fort St. George. One of the first objects which engaged his lordship's attention, was the state of the circars, to which it had been especially called by the disturbed condition of the Vizagapatam district, occasioned by the contumacious conduct of the zemindar of Vizianagum, and which, at that time, required an energy of proceeding on the part of government, and knowledge of its real situation, incompatible with the existing system of administering the affairs of those provinces. On the proposition of his lordship, the government of Fort St. George therefore, without waiting the result of the reference they made, in the preceding year, to the court of directors, but having previously obtained the sanction of the governor general in council to the measure; abolished the chiefs and councils, and appointed collectors in their stead, to the management of the country; who were declared subject to the authority of the board of revenue, in the same manner as the collectors in the other part of the Company's possessions on the coast, then consisting of the Jaghire, the lands round Cuddalore, and the territory but recently acquired, of Baramahl and Dindigul. The chief and council at Ganjam had already been discontinued in 1790, and a resident with two assistants appointed in their place. When this change was made in the internal government of the circars, a proclamation was issued, dated the 10th November 1794, declaratory of the particular objects it had in view. It, in the first place, notified the change of system, and required all zemindars, talookdars, and other landholders, to pay due obedience to the collectors, as the regular constituted representatives of the Company. It next proceeded to explain, the nature of the information which the collectors would be expected to furnish, namely, every information relative to the actual state of the country, its population and resources; the mode of assessment and collection by the zemindars and other landholders; the shares of the produce allotted to the inhabitants, and by what means secured to them; the state of the tanks, reservoirs and watercourses; the number of sibbendy or military employed in each district, of which each zemindar was especially required to deliver to the collector a true and correct statement, and how armed, upon pain of forfeiting their zemindari; all particulars respecting eniums, mocassa and other lands exempt from tax, or paying a reduced rent to the circar; the number of revenue officers employed; the nature of their respective duties, by whom paid, and whether in money or land; the chokies established, with the rules and rates of customs, and upon what principle assessed and collected. It called upon the zemindars and other landholders to aid the collectors in procuring the above particulars of information, warning them that government was fully resolved to support the authority of the collectors, and that any person or persons who might be detected in throwing obstacles in their way, or attempting to fabricate or impose upon them false statements or accounts of the public revenue, should be rigorously punished for every such offence. It prescribed, that the collectors should attend to the general adjustment of all differences and disputes; and they were positively directed to prevent any persons, whether European or native, in the civil, commercial, or military departments, from using any improper influence in purchasing in the bazar or any other place, where grain, cattle or provisions of any kind were sold, otherwise than as individuals; and it strictly forbade all persons on pain of the severest displeasure of the government, from making use of the name of the Company upon any occasion, unless authorized so to do; a practice which under the feeble and imperfect exercise of the superior authority of the government, had been but too often resorted to by individuals with impunity, and had been attended by consequences, as injurious to the natives, as they were disreputable to the British administration. It declared that no zemindar or landholder had the right to assume to himself the power of inflicting punishment, extending to death or mutilation; but that in all cases of capital offences, he was required to apprehend the offenders, and to send them, with a statement of their crimes, and every written and personal evidence that could be obtained in proof of their guilt, to the collector; who was to take charge of the prisoners, to make a regular and due examination and enquiry, and transmit his proceedings to the presidency, for the final decision of the governor in council. It further declared, that in establishing a regular system for the management and collection of the revenue, through the medium of collectors, there was no intention on the part of the government to deprive the zemindars and landholders of their just claims; but on the contrary, the change was equally intended to preserve their privileges, and to guard them against undue exactions, as it was to secure the happiness of the people, and the peace, prosperity and improvement of the country; and was to be considered as introductory to a permanent settlement of their jumina or rents, upon a just and equitable principle of assessment. The proclamation concluded by repeating to the zemindars, a communication made to them by government in the month of November 1786, that the Company's servants were under the most solemn and positive obligations, not to accept of money or any valuable thing, as a gift or present from persons paying revenue to the Company.

Instructions, of a nature correspondent with the terms of this proclamation, were at the same time, given to the collectors; who had been already furnished with certain regulations for the guidance of such officers, which were framed and adopted in the year 1791. They were also required by these instructions, to make it a part of their duty to attend to the adjustment of all differences and disputes; to ascertain if any, and what prisoners were then kept under restraint by the zemindars, the period of their imprisonment, and on what account confined, and to transmit a list of such, with their remarks, for the information of government. It was likewise signified to the collectors, that as every means hitherto devised for securing the due payment of the public revenue from the zemindars, had failed in effect, they were, in order to provide for its more certain realization, to prepare a statement of each zemindar's possessions, divided into as many quotas as there were to be kists; and each quota as near as possible, to the proportionate value of the above distribution; so that in case of non-payment of any one kist a month beyond the fixed period of its having fallen due, due, that portion of the zemindarry mortgaged as security for its payment, should be forthwith assumed, and become havelly or government land, for ever; and a proportionate deduction be made from the annual jumina, payable by the zemindar. The collectors were further instructed, in the event of any lands falling under the immediate management of the Company, or in settling those of the havellics, not let out on lease, that it was the wish of government, that the inhabitants should be induced by every reasonable encouragement, to rent their own villages in preference to any other mode of management; and if possible to divide the landed property in the villages into several farms, to be let out to the first and even second class of ryots, as the best means of extending individual property, and of securing the improvement and prosperity of the country, by placing the renters more under the immediate protection of government, and thereby securing them from the many vexations and exactions to which they were necessarily subject, from intermediate renters, and their numerous dependants and servants. The government were aware, that it would be attended with more labour to the collector, and that he would perhaps even at first, have the prejudices of the people to encounter; who, either mistrustful of the real object of the system, or fearful of entering into immediate engagements with government, which they knew must be punctually fulfilled, had hitherto been with difficulty, made sensible of the advantages it held out to them. They trusted, however, that it would be the care of the collectors to satisfy and remove those prejudices and doubts, by the fullest explanations; by assuring them of the support of government, and of advances being made to aid the industry of those, who might stand in need of it; and by pointing out to them in the clearest manner, that not an anna beyond their fixed rent would be demanded of them; and that the produce of their labour beyond that sum, would be their own profit; the only security required, being, that of the inhabitants of each village becoming jointly and severally bound, for the rent to government.

This more detailed principle of revenue collection and management, here recommended to the collectors of the Northern circars, of letting out the lands of a village to the first and even second class of ryots in separate allotments, appears to have been for the first time adopted in the Baranahal country, constituting a part of the possessions under the Madras presidency, obtained in the year 1792, and was there introduced by Captain Read, the able and experienced person placed in charge of that division of territory; and whose success suggested the extension of the same system to the Northern circars, where the lands were under the immediate management of the Company's servants.

In the following year, the court of directors replied to the reference made to them in 1793, on the subject of the Northern circars, by authorizing the adoption of those measures for correcting the defects of the internal administration therein, and as inseparably connected with those measures, a reduction of the military force of the zemindars; the former of which, as your Committee have explained, had already been adopted, and the latter of which, had been put in a train of accomplishment. The court on this occasion, observed, that "the only thing on which they could rely with certainty, was, that under the existing system, no hope could be entertained of any amendment; that they were sensible with the Madras presidency, that any effectual plan for reforming the revenue system, must necessarily be accompanied with the entire reduction of the military power and independence of the zemindars; that hitherto, clemency and forbearance seemed to have encouraged the perpetration of crimes, and a spirit of revolt against the authority of the Company; that they were convinced of the impolicy of any longer receding from their just demands, from an apprehension of danger in the prosecution of them; that sensible as they were, of the accumulated evils which had arisen from any other military force than that under the immediate authority of the Company being maintained in the circars, they authorized the Madras presidency, in concurrence with the governor general and council, and under such precautions with respect to time and arrangement, as might appear to them necessary, to take effectual measures for accomplishing its entire reduction."

Although this change of internal government in the Northern circars, which was effected in the year 1794, followed up, as it soon after was, and as will be presently explained, by the decisive line of conduct pursued during the administration of Lord Hobart, with respect to the great zemindar Vizieram Rauze, appears, in a great degree, to have broken that spirit of independence and refractoriness among the zemindars, which any pretence would call into action, and which it was of the first importance to the interests of the Company to extinguish; yet it can only be considered sidered to have opened the way for the introduction of a settled government: for, except in the instance of the zemindar above alluded to, it does not appear that any decisive measures were taken to oblige the great landholders to reduce their military retainers. Stipulations were indeed made in the cowles, or leases, granted to the zemindars, for a limitation of the number of armed people maintained by them; but they proved nugatory in their effect.

The settlements in the zemindarry lands, continued to be formed much on the principles which were formerly practised, except in those situated in the southern division of Cicacole. The Committee have already alluded to the extinction of the dangerous influence and power of the principal zemindar of that division; who had opposed arms to the authority of government. On that occasion, his son was appointed to the zemindarry, on a lease for three years, which expired on the 12 July 1799, and under which a considerable increase of revenue was stipulated for; and all the hill zemindars found in confinement, were restored to the lands of which they had been unjustly deprived by the Vizianagram family, on leases of a similar description. The settlements were afterwards made with the zemindars of the division, from year to year, except in the cases of the zemindars of Jeypour and Belgaum, whose rents had been fixed in perpetuity.

The general plan adopted by the collectors in the havellics, was, to form their settlements with the head inhabitants, for the whole of their respective villages, who subrented every field; and arranged with each cultivator for the rent he was to pay; or, as was most agreeable to the usage of the country, left it to the community of the village, to settle among themselves the amount of their respective rents; the inhabitants in this case, becoming jointly and severally responsible for the aggregate demand upon the village. This mode of renting out the villages singly, had been strongly recommended to the collectors on their first being appointed to the havellics in 1787; but various difficulties prevented them from carrying it into effect at that period.

These village settlements were formed on the produce; that is, the share of the produce which belonged to government was commuted for a money payment, regulated with reference to the market price of grain, or, with reference to its price, on the average of a certain number of years. This was called a Grain rent. The settlements here referred to, were nevertheless of a very imperfect kind. They were not founded on a survey of the lands, nor does it appear that the renters granted pottahs to the ryots, or that any other systematic precautions were attended to, for preventing the head inhabitants from oppressing the inferior cultivators, by defining the payments they were to make to the renters; or for gaining a particular insight into the rights and privileges of the ryots; or for ascertaining the real dues of the government, to which only, the renter was entitled. The collectors appear to have left the minutiae of revenue investigation to their native dewans and dubashes, as was the practice of the provincial chiefs and councils; for the acquirement of the native languages was still a pursuit to which but few of the Company's servants had applied themselves. The first encouragement held out to the study of the native languages, was confined to the Persian, and consisted in the offer of a reward of five hundred pagodas to those who should attain a knowledge of it; but the advance of money to a teacher, absorbing nearly one half of his yearly salary, proved inconvenient to the young servants; and the expense necessarily incurred in the acquisition, was not reimbursed by the reward offered, even in the very few instances in which it was bestowed. In the year 1791, it was therefore resolved to allow each of the junior servants as might be disposed to learn the Persian, Malhatta, Gentoo or Telinga, and Malabar tongues, to draw a monthly allowance for a moonshee to instruct them; and it was, at the same time, notified to them, that their diligence and attainments would be properly noticed, and that all promotion in the revenue and other lines of the public service, would be made with a particular regard to such attainments and qualifications. The experience, however, of five years, evinced the insufficiency of this plan; for it was found, that but few who received the language money, were able to transact business without the intervention of a native. The moonshee allowances were discontinued; and the measure was adopted, of granting handsome rewards of not less than 1,000 pagodas to such of the Company's servants, who could pass a fair examination before a committee at the presidency. A resolution had previously been passed in the year 1794, that on the expiration of two years from the 1st of January 1796, no Company's servant should be considered eligible to the office of collector, unless he should have made a proficiency in some one or other of the country languages; and to give greater effect to this regulation, the court of directors, in the year year 1797, gave directions, that in failure of meeting, in the civil department of the service, with persons qualified in the above respect as collectors or assistants, a selection was to be made from the military list, of persons so qualified for those situations. The grant of this discretionary power appears to have been suggested by the ability and success of several military officers, who were then, and had been for some years, employed in conducting and settling the revenues, in the new possessions of the Company obtained in 1792. Though the pecuniary remuneration and other incitements which were held out to the civil service, to acquire a knowledge of the languages, appear, in some cases, to have been productive of the best consequences; yet it was not for several years, that the desired effect was experienced on the writers in general; for in 1799, a circular notification appears to have been sent to the collectors of districts by government, signifying, that "having great reason to be dissatisfied with the general want of industry in the junior part of the civil service, and particularly with their inattention to the study of the native languages, which were essential to the faithful discharge of their duty;"—they directed that each collector should make quarterly reports of the industry of each of his assistants, and of the progress made by them, in the country languages. The collectors were further informed, that they were to make it their particular care to give constant employment to their assistants, in such manner as they might judge most for the public advantage; and they were strictly enjoined and held responsible for instructing them in every branch of revenue duty, and the local usages of the districts connected therewith. The government, at the same time, declared that "they were willing to hope that a generous spirit of emulation and a sense of public character, would stimulate them to an efficient discharge of their duty; but that should they prove indolent or ignorant, they were to be removed." And that it was their unalterable determination, not to promote any gentleman in the revenue department, unless he should possess a competent knowledge of the administration of the revenue and of the country languages." It was about this period also, that the college at Calcutta was established, to which the writers at Fort St. George were sent. These measures, a vigilant attention on the part of the board of revenue to the due observance by the collectors of the orders they had received from government, respecting their assistants, and the rewards afforded for the encouragement of the native languages, had visibly a very beneficial operation on the junior part of the service, as appears from a report of the board of revenue, made to the government, on that subject, in the beginning of the year 1802. But a very small proportion of those who had by their abilities and attainments thus distinguished themselves, were or could be promoted to the principal charge of districts in the Northern circars at that period; since the actual possession of those offices by senior servants, and the provisions of the act of parliament, regulating the allowances of the service, restrained the government from selecting the junior servants of the Company, except under very extraordinary circumstances of merit, or of local succession.

These circumstances will account for the little progress made subsequent to the abolition of the provincial boards in the circars, in dividing the landed property in the village into several farms, to be let out to the first and even second class of ryots, which, as your Committee have shown, was pointed out to the collectors of the Northern circars, in the instructions issued to them in 1794, as the best means of extending individual property, and of securing the improvement and prosperity of the districts. During this latter period, the revenues were collected with greater regularity; and some further regulations were made, for introducing a partial reform of the abuses in regard to the sayer duties.

It appears to your Committee, that from the time when the intermediate agency of Hussein Alli Cawn was discontinued in the Northern circars, and provincial councils were established, and until the country was assessed in perpetuity between the years 1802 and 1804, there was no fixed principle of revenue management; the mode varying according to accidental circumstances; sometimes conducted agreeably to the sentiments of the existing government or board of revenue, both subject to a frequent fluctuation of members; at other times, the local authorities left them no option or choice, having, under various pretences, delayed the transmission of the necessary information, till the season had been too far advanced to allow of further delay, without the risk of an immediate loss of revenue; which reduced the revenue board to the alternative either of incurring that risk, or of yielding to the recommendation of the chiefs and councils, or collectors; and rather than subject themselves to the former, the latter had been resorted to. It appears also, that the conduct of the zemindars and renters had thrown a constraint on the measures of the board; it being the practice with them, them, which was generally successful, to withhold their periodical payments at the close of their leases or settlements, in order to induce the government to renew them, on the condition of discharging the arrears thus occasioned; but in the latter years, from experience of the fallacy of this mode of settlement, the government were compelled to dispossess the defaulter of the lands in his occupation, even though at the apparent sacrifice of a long continued balance.

It appears also, that remissions of rent were constantly demanded, from some cause or other: that if they were not granted, and the stipulated payments were withheld, the balance was added to the future jumma or settled rent of the zemindar. But in cases so hopeless as to induce the assumption of the zemindarry, an immediate loss of revenue necessarily ensued; for every resource in the country, was usually drained before it was sequestrated, and not unfrequently the revenue of the current year anticipated. The collector, therefore, succeeding to the charge of the districts, could only be expected to collect what might remain due from the inhabitants on the grow-discharge of his arrears; and all attempts to discover it, proved fruitless. The hope of recovering balances, especially those of long standing, from the collections, exceeding the annual jumma and allowance for the zemindar, was generally found delusive; especially when there was a want of energy and exertion in those employed in the district. Of this, the large amount appearing on the books as desperate, at the time of permanently settling the lands, was a strong confirmation.

Your Committee also find that, in some instances, it was the custom to take security for the payment of the Company's demands. In these cases, the securities became the managers of the country, collected the revenues, and exercised all the authority of zemindar or renter; while the latter, used all the influence they possessed, as principals, to make private collections.

There were also other causes, which concurred to delay the benefits of the system introduced by Lord Hobart in 1794, into the Northern circars. These were, the frequent changes of collectors; the too general want of that local vigilance and knowledge of revenue concerns, upon which the success of every system of internal government must depend; and the great misconduct of some of the collectors. Many of them, represented that they had experienced great obstacles in obtaining correct statements of the revenue, through the intrigues of the native servants, and their combinations with zemindars and landholders, to falsify accounts: others, are stated to have pleaded the unsettled state of the country, the attention required for the introduction of village rents, the variety of detail connected with the collection of the revenue, including the customs, attending to the condition and repair of tanks, and the adjustment of complaints and disputes among the inhabitants.

It must, however, be allowed, that since the abolition of the provincial councils, a considerable improvement had taken place in the general character and efficiency of the revenue department of the service. By the arrangements then made, a new sentiment appears to have been excited in the individuals belonging to it, which may in a great degree, be attributed to the collectors having been taught to look for reward to avowed salaries, instead of remunerating themselves by unauthorized emoluments, or those commercial speculations, which, besides withdrawing their attention from the immediate objects of their public duty, and rendering them a secondary consideration, not unfrequently placed the pecuniary interests of the Company's servants, and of those whom they were appointed to govern, directly at variance. To Lord Hobart it is owing that a new impulse was infused into the service. During the government of his successor, Lord Clive, the same careful attention was continued to the merits and qualifications of those selected, either for conducting the important duties of the board of revenue, or for administering under their control the revenues in the interior of the country. Such as were found to have corruptly abused the power with which they were entrusted, were disgraced and punished, whilst those who had upheld the authority of the Company, and had adhered to the obligations of honour and of law, were distinguished by the approbation of government, and pointed out to the protection of the court of directors. This wise and liberal policy, appears to have given birth to a better order of things; and to have established throughout the service an honourable feeling of public virtue and of laudable ambition.

Such was the state of the Northern Circars, when the system of internal administration, already established in the ancient territories under the Bengal government, was introduced into these districts.

FORT ST. GEORGE.

YOUR Committee will next report on The Jaghire, which surrounds the Presidency of Fort St. George; and which is, of the Company's ancient possessions, next in point of importance to the Northern Circars.

The JAGHIRE.

The Jaghire appears to have been obtained in the years 1750 and 1763, from the Nabob of Arcot, in return for the services rendered him and his father, by the Company.

It was rented to the Nabob on renewed leases, principally from year to year, until a short time before the war in 1780, when the presidency of Fort St. George took the management of it, into their own hands.

The Committee of Secrecy appointed in 1782, were, among other things, led to examine into the history of letting out the Jaghire to the Nabob; and in their second Report to the House, will be found a particular account of the circumstances, under which this territory had been so long left in his possession; of the different leases entered into with him; and of the correspondence which took place, between the governments abroad and at home, on this subject.

The Jaghire was twice invaded by Hyder Alli; in 1768, and in the war of 1780, when he entered it with fire and sword. On the termination of the latter war, in 1784, hardly any other signs were left in many parts of the country of its having been inhabited by human beings, than the bones of the bodies that had been massacred, or the naked walls of the houses, choultries, and temples, which had been burnt. To the havoc of war, succeeded the affliction of famine; and the emigrations arising from these successive calamities, nearly depopulated the district.

The system of management in the Jaghire, while it was rented by the Nabob, was of the same oppressive and unjust character, which marked the administration of affairs in his own territory, the Carnatic. It exhibited throughout a scene of boundless exaction and rapacity, on the part of the government and its officers; of evasion, on that of the inhabitants; or of collusion between them, and the public servants; while the revenue diminished every year with the cultivation. The husbandman was entitled to a certain standard share of the crop, but a considerable proportion of it was extorted from him under the varied devices of usual assessment, fixed assessment, and additional assessment, darbar-khirsch, and by the private contributions levied by the revenue officers, for their own use. When the court of directors issued instructions in the year 1775, to the presidency of Fort St. George, to appoint a committee of circuit to investigate the state of the Northern Circars; they directed, in the same instructions, that such committee should extend its enquiries to the Jaghire, stating that many considerations induced them to keep that territory in the Company's immediate possession: that, unless the Nabob agreed to such arrangements as the Company deemed necessary for mutual advantage, they would no longer consent to his renting the Jaghire; and that the committee of circuit should have full liberty to explore the country, so as to ascertain its real produce and revenue. On the appointment of that committee, it was proposed by the Northern Circars. On the appointment of that committee, it was proposed by the governor, that it should first proceed to the Jaghire; but this proposition was overruled. The committee, as has been stated in a former part of this Report, was abolished in 1778; and, when it was revived in 1783, it was not required to report on the Jaghire. During the time it was held by the Nabob, Mr. Barnard was employed in making a survey of the lands, which he completed in 1776. This survey may be considered to have thrown much more light on a very intricate subject of investigation, than a first attempt could be expected to afford, under similar circumstances; and it was highly creditable to the industry of Mr. Barnard. He possessed no authority in the districts, to aid him in the prosecution of his enquiries; difficulties were thrown in his way, by the Nabob; and the only sources of intelligence to which he could resort, were the statements of the cumrums and inhabitants, which, of course, fabricated to serve their own views. The survey was in fact, rather a view, rather of forming some tolerable idea of the value of the country, than of ascertaining with precision, affairs of revenue detail.

The JAGHIRE.

On the assumption of the Jaghire by the Company's government, it was placed under the charge of the committee of assigned revenue, which was appointed on the breaking out of the war of 1780, to manage the Nabob's possessions in the Carnatic.* This Committee, in 1783, let out the country in fourteen large farms on leases of nine years, at increasing rents. In the following year, a Company's servant was appointed at the instance of the Committee of assigned revenue, as resident in the Jaghire, in order to see that the several stipulations contained in the leases, were put into execution; and, on the dissolution of the Committee with a clerk, being also a Company's servant, the resident still continuing to discharge the duty formerly allotted to him. The districts were soon afterwards placed under the sole charge of the superintendent. In 1788, the Jaghire was formed into two divisions, and each placed under a Collector; and, in the following year, it was divided into three collectorships, and the office of superintendent was abolished. At this time, the renters, with a few exceptions, had repeatedly failed in their payments under the leases for nine years. Their estates were sequestrated; and several of them, put into confinement.

From 1783, when the leases were granted, to 1789, the net receipts into the treasury had not, on an average, exceeded one-fourth of the sum at which they were valued in the grants of the Nabob. The districts were let by the collectors, appointed in 1788, to the inhabitants, in smaller portions than formerly, on leases for three years.

In 1790, the Jaghire was formed into two collectorships, called northern and southern; and the settlements yielded a considerable increase of revenue for the years 1791-2, beyond that of the preceding year's settlement. The amount at which it was rented, was however much below its former value.

In 1793, assistants were appointed to the collectors; and in November 1794, the country was placed under the management of Mr. Lionel Place.

From the time the Jaghire was taken out of the hands of the Nabob, until the administration of its affairs by Mr. Place, very little had been done for improving its condition; nor had any steps been taken, with the exception of Mr. Barnard's survey, for obtaining any real information of its concerns.

The renters to whom it was farmed in 1783, were men of very low origin, needy, and ignorant of the business in which they had engaged. When the committee of assigned revenue received proposals for renting it, they were not possessed of any lights or materials that could properly guide their judgement, in fixing the rents. After, therefore, rejecting such offers as appeared extravagantly high, they were under the necessity of accepting those of such bidders, whose proposals were equal to the supposed value of the lands. The extreme necessities of government obliged them also, on renting out the Jaghire, to call upon the lessees to deposit sums of money in the treasury, by way of advance, on account of their rents, which, in addition to the supplies, which they were under the necessity of raising for the relief of the inhabitants, and for the cultivation of the country, threw many of them into great distress, at the very commencement of their engagements; and being wholly unversed in the intricacy of revenue affairs, they were lost in confusion; because, subject to all the impositions which the experienced artifice of the inhabitants could put upon them.

These evils appear to have been much augmented by the extension of a species of influence over the renters, which the Committee have had occasion to notice as existing in the Northern Circars, which had long produced its mischievous effects in the provinces of the Carnatic and Tanjore, then under native rulers, but which appears to have had a much more active operation in the Jaghire, under the administration of the Company, than while it was leased out to the Nabob.

The calamities of the war of 1780, occasioned the resort of almost the whole surviving population of the Jaghire to Madras, and induced many of the inhabitants to dispose of their interest in the land, for perhaps a month's subsistence, and often less. When peace was restored, the same inhabitants were allowed to cultivate the lands they had thus sold, on the condition of the most unqualified dependence on the purchasers. These purchasers, were the dubashes or their agents; and under this denomination, was included the principal domestic in the service of an European. Through the means of these relations, they continued to retain the property which they had acquired in the villages; and by the pretended importance which they were enabled to assume, through their intercourse with Europeans, they kept the inhabitants in complete subjection. Some individuals, the most intriguing and aspiring of the dubashes, attempted to set themselves, in the place of the Nabob. They found means to introduce their own amildars, and other servants, into the management of the country; fomented quarrels between the inhabitants and the renters; and thus, established an authority, far more effectual, than that of the government of Madras. After a little time, these quarrels subsided, or at least, reached not the ears of government; whose principles were so little known, or so easily misrepresented to the inhabitants, that their complaints were addressed to the dubashes themselves, who became the arbiters of all disputes.

Towards establishing their authority, the dubashes thought it necessary to give way to the pretensions of the inhabitants, regarding their share of the crops; as any thing like an enquiry into their rights, would have defeated their project of supplanting the power of government, and thereby making the Jaghire a property to themselves. This, gave rise to various animosities among the inhabitants. One man advanced pretensions for himself, and precluded the rest; property having been once thrown into confusion, was easily invaded. In this state of things, the dubash was pampered by both parties. His cows were sent to feed and fatten at the expense of his clients, and their carts and servants employed in his service, for whatever purposes he pleased, his favour being the only return expected.

The underling dubashes played the same part, on a lesser scale; so that, when the Company's civil servants were sent to the management of the Jaghire, the junto had become so formidable, that no one would venture to provoke its wrath. In the progress of this odious system, the former leaders of the inhabitants, in a great measure, lost their influence, or maintained it only, by showing a deference to a set of upstart dubashes, who but the other day were subservient to them; for many of them, had risen from being common ryots. Nothing could be more irksome to the head men of villages, than this humiliation; but it was impossible in such a state of things, they could resume their proper place in society.

The general description, which your Committee have here given of the dubash influence in the Jaghire, is taken from the reports of the collector; in which it is particularly developed, in all its baneful tendencies and effects: As long as it existed, a powerful obstacle presented itself to any effectual measures being adopted by the Company's servants, for placing the revenue management of the country, on a proper footing.

It was an evil to eradicate which, both in that district, and in the Carnatic, formed a leading object of the administration of Lord Hobart. On the appointment of Mr. Place to the collectorship of the Jaghire, his particular attention was therefore called to the necessity of accomplishing so salutary a purpose, in that portion of territory. His efforts, accompanied as they were, by a vigor and firmness of proceeding which could alone ensure them any success, appear to have had the effect of liberating the inhabitants from the power of a faction, whose views and machinations were alike hostile to their welfare, and the general prosperity of the country.

During the administration of Mr. Place, which continued till 1798, his attention was particularly directed to its internal improvement, to an investigation of the land revenues, to the discovery of abuses in the collection and management of them; and to the acquirement of information respecting the situation, the rights and privileges of the ryots. In the neglected and confused state in which the country had long been, the revenue accounts and other documents, of which the collector could avail himself, afforded him but little information: With respect to the former, they were by no means, regularly kept up; and where they were to be met with, they were found to be mere fabrications, intended to conceal the peculations and irregular practices, as well of the accountants themselves, as of those employed in the collections. The services of the canongoes were discontinued by the Nabob; but they were allowed to enjoy their emoluments unimpaired. As to the curmish or village officers of record, many of them had been obliged to mortgage their lands before the war in 1780, in order to retrieve their distresses, and to seek other means of livelihood.

livelihood. They had a short time returned to their villages, when Mr. Place was appointed collector; others, from misfortunes and poverty, were compelled to seek relief among the ryots, on whom they became so dependant, as to prevent them from asserting, if they were disposed, the privileges of their office, or of representing the abuses that were going on. Those who still retained their authority in the villages abused their trusts, in every way that could serve their private views, or promote those of their superiors in the districts.

The measures adopted by the collector, with respect to the different descriptions of offices here enumerated, were as follows:—He abolished altogether the office of canongoe, and instituted in its stead, a department of record and account, consisting of a sheristadar and a suitable establishment of gomastahs, to act in the pergunahs or districts; their duties being exactly the same as those which attached to the former offices, whose privileges were converted into a fund for defraying the expenses of the new establishment, which was placed under the immediate controul of the collector, and the individuals belonging to it, rendered liable to dismissal for improper conduct or neglect of duty. He also restored to its original efficiency, the office of curnum, by obliging the creditors of those whose lands were mortgaged, but who had recently returned to their villages, to come to a reasonable settlement, and re-establishing them in their perquisites, as well as those who, through their poverty and dependence on the ryots, had been unable to discharge their duty; and at the same time, removing those who had wilfully neglected, or corruptly violated it. The office of desmook he altogether did away.

The obvious expediency of availing himself of the services of the head inhabitants, in forwarding the business of agriculture, and in aiding in the settlement and realization of the revenues, within their respective boundaries, induced Mr. Place to put them on their original footing as collectors, acting under his servants employed in making collections in each district.

There was also in the Jaghire, a description of persons called Nautwars; who are represented to have been of ancient standing, and who were the head men of larger subdivisions, including a circle of villages, the cultivation of which, they superintended on the part of government. They were not confined to the Jaghire, but were to be found in most parts of the Carnatic; though their services do not appear to have been continued, when that territory was annexed to the British government. Their dignity and reputed wealth, rendered them an early object of the Nabob's rapacity; who had either dismissed them, curtailed their privileges, or deprived them of such privileges altogether; occasionally restoring or removing them, as they furthered or resisted his views. The precariousness of the tenure, therefore, by which they held their office, was the means of destroying its utility, and it degenerated into an instrument of oppression. Impatient as they were under the dominion of the dubashes, which had reduced them to the level of common ryots, and eager to be emancipated from it, they evinced to Mr. Place a disposition to return to their duty. They were accordingly restored to their former footing; and again called into action, under such restraints as were best calculated to prevent the abuse of their authority.

By the aid of the curnums, potails and nautwars, of district collectors and accountants, and of the persons immediately employed about him, over all of whom he exercised a strict inspection and control; and by such other means as suggested themselves to the collector, in the close and constant intercourse he kept up with the inhabitants in the different parts of the country; he succeeded in obtaining a statistical knowledge of the Jaghire, far more accurate, and far more minute, than had ever been afforded, with respect to any part of the Company's old possessions.

The Cultivators of the land appear to have consisted of two descriptions, namely, Meerassadars, and Pyacarries or Paracoomies.

When the Jaghire came under the Company's management, in 1780, great difficulties were experienced in laying down a rule for the division of the crops, each party claiming to himself the largest share, which he had at any time, enjoyed; which led to much dispute between the renters and the ryots; and as a reference could not be had to those documents of account, which would have cleared up those points, the inhabitants were allowed to recur to the mamool warum, as it was called, or customary division; settling among themselves, in what it consisted. It was was reducible to no fixed rules; but every year varied, according to the interested purposes of one or the other. A new mode of apportioning and regulating the shares, was accordingly introduced by Mr. Place, in lieu of the mamool warum, as being more equal and just. It was founded on the principle which formerly obtained over the greater part of the peninsula, before additional assessments had been added to the public demand, of an equal division of the crop, taking one description of produce with another. The dry grain and horticultural produce had always been assessed, as in other parts of the country, at a fixed money rent, and continued to be so.

Besides their meerassce lands, these cultivators enjoyed a certain portion of prescriptive registered lands, wholly exempt from any government tax or rent. It appears also, that the meerassadars enjoyed certain russooms or maralis, from the produce of the other lands cultivated by pyacarries.

The pyacarries, who are termed strangers by the meerassadars, are those who were called in by the latter to cultivate such lands belonging to them, as they did not chuse to cultivate themselves. Some of these, appear to have had a sort of life-estate in the meerassce lands they cultivated. They were called resident pyacarries; and they received no more than 45 per cent. of the produce. There was another description of pyacarry, who not being permanently fixed in any village, sometimes cultivated in one, and sometimes in another. He was a kind of sojourning husbandman, who generally cultivated, from year to year. Having only a temporary interest in the lands he occupied, and generally having meerassce lands of his own in the adjoining village, the cultivation of which, he was necessarily obliged to commit to other persons; he was allowed five per cent. more than the resident pyacarries, or fifty per cent. of the produce, after setting aside fees. It had been the practice of the government, to allot also to the pyacarries, certain portions of the lands of the meerassadars, when, either from inability, from want of hands, or any other cause, this was necessary. The shares of the produce allowed by the state, was, in like manner as in the former case, higher than those allowed to the meerassadars; but this difference was more than compensated to the meerassadars by their hereditary mauniums and russooms, neither of which the pyacarries enjoyed. The pyacarries, whom the meerassadars themselves allowed to cultivate their lands, paid a certain russoom or share to them, for that privilege.

Your Committee find, that, in an early period of Mr. Place's management, a discussion of considerable length arose, between the board of revenue, and the government, as to the rights of this denomination of ryot in the soil. This discussion was occasioned by a proposition, made by the collector, to remove certain meerassadars from their meerassce lands, who had refused to agree to his terms of settlement; and to appoint others to them, who were willing to cultivate, on the terms proposed; the board of revenue, who objected to their being deprived of their lands, considered them to possess a proprietary right in such lands; that whatever might have been the origin of their rights, they were regarded by the people, as hereditary rights; that they were certainly not introduced by the English government, and that, according to the assertions of the Hindoos, were far more antient than the Moorish conquest; and that the term meerassce, which was introduced by the Mahomedans, conveyed the idea of the tenure of property, or hereditary right. It had, throughout the discussion, been maintained by the government, that the actual property in the soil was vested in the state, which alone had the power of making an absolute sale of the land; and any sale by the meerassadars, whether with or without the consent of government, was defined to be "a gratuitous recompence for the alienation of arable lands."—The claims advanced by the board in favour of the meerassadars, appeared to the governor in council inconsistent with the rights which they admitted to belong to the government; and it was accordingly decided, "that the occupants of land in India could establish no more right, in respect to the soil, than tenantry upon an estate in England can establish a right to the land, by hereditary residence;" and the meerassce of a villager was therefore defined to be, "a preference of cultivation derived from hereditary residence, but subject to the right of government as the superior lord of the soil, in what way it chuses, for the cultivation of its own lands."

This question, as the Committee have stated, was agitated soon after Mr. Place was appointed to the Jaghire. He was subsequently led to inquire more particularly into the rights of the meerassadars; and communicated his sentiments on that subject to the board of revenue, in his final report respecting the Jaghire, dated 6th June

II.
FORT ST. GEORGE.
The JAGHIRE.

June 1799. From this document it appears, that although he had formerly concurred in great part, with the government, in the definition of a meerassac, his ideas had undergone a material change. It is not deemed necessary to follow the collector through the train of elaborate reasoning, and of new facts which led him to view this matter in a different light, from what he had formerly done. It is thought sufficient to state, that he had become convinced that the meerassadar had an undoubted hereditary property in the soil; that he derived this right originally from the sovereign to whom he acknowledged obedience, and the rendering of a stated proportion of the produce, as the tenure by which he held it; that he sold, mortgaged, gave away, and left his lands to his posterity; which the pyacarry could not; that until the term meerassac was employed by the Mahomedans to denote the lands of a meerassadar, they were described by a compound word in the Malabar language, Caniatchy; cani signifying land, and atchy heritage; and that this was the term employed by the natives themselves, to designate that particular description of lands; that though the exorbitant collections made from the land during the Nabob's government, had greatly diminished, and in many parts of the country, destroyed the value of this property; yet it was so cherished by the meerassadars, that they never failed to assert their claim to them, when they felt it to be their advantage so to do. It further appears, that when Mr. Place first went to the Jaghire, he found the lands of many villages without meerassadars; the parents, children, and relations being extirpated; and that the idea of permanent property was such in the minds of the natives, that they declined cultivating any fields thus appropriated, unless under the meerassac tenure, except such as would yield them the quickest and largest profit; and that by granting them cowles for lands "to them and their heirs for ever, so long as they continued in obedience to the circar, and paid all just dues, he was enabled to convert the most stubborn soil and thickest jungle into fertile villages."

Extracts from Report of Mr. Place, dated 6 June 1799, on Land
Tenures in the Jaghire:
Appendix, No. 16.

Though these further facts and opinions, and the measures which were in consequence adopted by the collector, for the establishment of the rights of the meerassadars, did not lead to a new discussion of the question, it has nevertheless been thought proper to advert to the claims, which were advanced on behalf of the meerassadars in the Jaghire; because it appears to have furnished the first instance of any such claims being brought forward, in favour of that description of ryots; and because the Committee will have occasion, in a subsequent part of this branch of their Report, to show that the revenue servants, in other parts of the Company's possessions in the peninsula, have since brought to light similar rights, as belonging to the meerassadars.

The mode of settlement introduced by Mr. Place into the Jaghire, was that of village rents, on the produce, being commuted for a money payment. The parties who entered into engagements for the rents of the villages, were those who held the principal shares of land, and these jointly; leaving it with those who possessed fractional shares, or in other words, those who were entitled to a portion of the shares, to adjust their rights among themselves; each man's right and place being well known to one another; the collector contenting himself with the exercise of that superintending authority, which enabled him to redress disputes on this subject, when prepared, in the form of complaints. He could easily fix the value of all the lands together of one village; but he did not feel himself competent to assign to every small allotment, its portion, with sufficient exactness and regard to fertility of soil and other circumstances. The next two settlements in the Jaghire were also on the principle of village rents; the last of which, was left for the successor of Mr. Place to complete.

The revenue derived from the Jaghire, during the four years it was under the management of Mr. Place, was far greater than had ever been received from it, since it had been granted by the Nabob.

It appears, that annual village settlements, on a still more accurate estimate of the produce, continued to be successfully made, until the lands were permanently assessed in 1802-3.

The administration of justice, both civil and criminal, was left in the hands of the amildars and renters, during the continuance of the Jaghire in the hands of the Nabob;

Nabob; but without any defined jurisdiction or authority, or any fixed rules to guide them. When it came under the management of the Company, the revenue servants in charge of the country, settled such disputes as were brought before them, more particularly since the adoption of the Regulations for the guidance of the collectors, which were passed in 1791. They either decided the matter themselves, or if any difficulty occurred, or if it related to the rules of cast, it was referred to arbitrators, named by both parties. The Committee, under the preceding head of this report, have adverted to the impediment which existed, on the score of legal competency, to the establishment of judicial courts in the territories under the Madras government. Though the idea was in consequence abandoned, of establishing any such, in the Northern Circars, until that impediment should be removed, by an express legislative authority; it nevertheless appears, that with regard to the Jaghire, instructions were sent out to Fort St. George, in 1785, to suggest a plan for the administration of justice; and that in the beginning of the following year, before those instructions could have been taken into consideration by the government, a scheme for instituting a civil and criminal court in that portion of territory, which had been recommended by the committee of assigned revenue, and formed on the principles of the Bengal Regulations of 1772 and 1781, was transmitted to England. In the year 1788, it received the sanction of the court of directors, and was ordered to be carried into effect. But an interruption to any progress in the adoption of that arrangement, was occasioned by the difficulty of finding natives of independence and character, to officiate as judges, by the breaking out of the war with Tippoo Sultan, and, not improbably, by the objections which had been urged by the collectors, against the introduction into their districts, at that time, of any authority independent of their own, as calculated to impede the realization of the revenues. On the termination of hostilities in 1792, the proposed regulations were again brought under consideration, and instructions were issued to the board of revenue, to adapt them to the Bengal Regulations, as revised in 1787; with an intention to adopt them in the districts, then recently acquired from Tippoo Saheb, as well as in the Jaghire. The Regulations, to which they were to be assimilated, vested the offices of collector, judge, and magistrate, in one person. In the latter end of 1792, the board of revenue underwent a complete change in its members; so that it devolved upon the new board, to amend the Regulations, as had been proposed. Their report on that subject, was made in the following year; and was approved. It has been seen, that about this period, the Bengal government were engaged in modifying the Regulations, for the administration of justice in those territories, by separating the revenue from the judicial authority; a circumstance which led the board of revenue of Fort St. George, to state their reasons, why it was not advisable to apply the same principle to the Jaghire and the ceded districts. They observed, that the ideas and circumstances of the inhabitants under the Madras presidency, compared with those of Bengal, exhibited such a striking difference; that, however much they might admire the principle, they must lament the impracticability of adopting, at that time, the proposed regulations of the Bengal government: that those regulations separated the revenue authority from the judicial; that, independently of the advantages possessed in Bengal, on the first institution of their adawlut courts, they had been progressively extended and reconciled to the natives: that the complete subordination, which in those provinces, might admit of an authority distinct from that of the collector, did not exist on the coast; but that, on the contrary, it had been found, that a collector required every support, to give him the influence necessary to the realization of the revenues; and that they looked forward to a period of greater regularity, when the situation and tenures of the landholders and others, would allow of adopting the humane and liberal plan of Lord Cornwallis. It appears, that the regulations, as preferred by the board of revenue, were translated into the Persian and Gentoo languages. The court of directors were informed of these preparatory arrangements, in a letter dated the 20th February 1794; in which the Madras government stated, that they only waited for the Malabar translation to give orders for the institution of the proposed court of adawlut. And in a subsequent revenue letter of the 14th February 1795, they stated, that when the final arrangements were made, they would be communicated to the court. The adoption of the measure appears to have been abandoned, until all doubts should be dissipated, as to the powers of establishing courts of justice within the Company's possessions on the coast, by a parliamentary enactment on on that subject: nor were any further steps taken to reform the administration of justice in the Jaghire or ceded districts, until the introduction of a general system of judicature for the whole territory under Fort St. George.

The Home Farms, which are situated in the immediate vicinity of the presidency, formerly composed part of the Jaghire. The rights of government in these lands, had long been neglected. It appears, that a few years past, the board of revenue directed their particular attention to them, principally with a view to define the tenures of those, in whose occupation they were, and to ascertain their extent. The unauthorized alienations of a territorial nature, were found to be numerous, and the soil thus obtained, had deprived the Company of their just share of the produce, or of what had been commuted for it, a money payment, under the denomination of quit rent. Those who held no document from government, were required to take out a grant, before they could be considered lawful proprietors of the land. The territorial revenue chiefly arises from spots of ground, in the white and black town, and from gardens.

With respect to these lands, which form the remaining part of the Company's old possessions, under the presidency of Fort St. George, they are but of small extent, and are appendages to the collectorships adjoining to which they are situated. They have generally been partly rented out on longer or shorter leases, and partly retained in aumance; and the revenues still continue to be thus realized, except in the territory round Cuddalore, which has been of late years permanently settled. Cuddalore, or, as it was formerly called, Fort St. David, was the seat of the Madras Government; and, at no distant period, there was a chief and council there. These, and the lands contiguous to them, suffered much during the war of 1780, having been nearly desolated. The inhabitants had either perished or emigrated, and the villages were mostly in ruins: but a happy change has since taken place in the state of the country: Its improvement has been great and rapid.

In concluding this head of their Report, your Committee will submit to the House, some account of the measures which have been adopted for introducing into the territories above described, those systems of revenue and judicial regulation, which were established in the Bengal possessions in the year 1793.

It has been seen, that the adoption of some permanent system for the collection of the revenues under the government of Fort St. George, as well as the institution of a regular system of jurisprudence, had, from an early period, been in the contemplation of the court of directors.

It has also been seen, that the causes which principally retarded the accomplishment of this important design, were the imperfect manner in which the authority of the Company had been established in the country; the little progress made by the local authorities, in the acquirement of revenue knowledge; and the want of legislative authority, for the introduction of courts of justice.

The first express intimation of a desire on the part of the court of directors, to see the Bengal revenue and judicial system established within the territories of Fort St. George, was conveyed in their letter to that presidency, dated the 21st April 1795; in which they authorized the abolition of the provincial councils, and the disbandment of the military followers of the zemindars, in the Northern circars. In that letter they stated, "that being thoroughly sensible of the propriety and expediency of the late revenue and judicial regulations established in Bengal, they directed the Madras government to consider the expediency of adopting similar plans for the Northern circars, including the Jaghire and the Ceded districts (consisting of the Barahmahal, and Dindigul, then recently acquired) further stating that, "should that government be of opinion, after mature deliberation, that the Bengal arrangements might be extended with equal promise of general advantage to the districts under their superintendence, they (the court) confided in their wisdom, "and

* and discretion to carry the same into effect, by such degrees and in such manner, "and at such times, as local circumstances might appear to warrant."

In their reply to this letter, the Madras government informed the court of directors, that so much remained to be acquired in knowledge, and reformed in practice, that they should use great caution in introducing the Bengal judicial regulations, to the extent allowed by the court; "that they were aware that the establishment of the judicial system, on its present footing, did not take place in Bengal, until various other modes for the accomplishment of an effectual administration of justice, had been attempted; and that although that which had been adopted, was the result of the experience of the defects of the former systems, improved by the liberal, sagacious and benevolent mind of Lord Cornwallis, they were induced to think that imperfect as that system was, it had the effect of preparing the people for that which had been subsequently introduced; and that, whatever they might find it expedient and advisable to do, for the attainment of so important an object as the effectual administration of justice, could only be progressive, having always in view the establishment of a system founded on similar principles to that in Bengal, and ultimately conformable to it, in every particular."

A plan had been, as the Committee have stated, actually prepared, though it was not carried into effect, for the establishment of courts of justice in the Jaghire and in the ceded districts. It has also been shown, that the board of revenue assigned reasons, of a similar kind to those which have just been quoted, for not framing such plan agreeably to the principles of the Bengal code.

It appears, that the supreme government, who had been apprized of the instructions conveyed by the Madras government of the 21st April, 1795, thought it proper in the following year, to direct that government to furnish them with their sentiments on the subject of those instructions, and to inform them whether they had taken any measures for carrying them into effect. The presidency of Fort St. George was at the same time, furnished with a copy of the Bengal regulations. The Bombay government appears also to have been furnished with a copy of them; with a view to the eventual settlement of the province of Malabar, then under its charge. Both governments had been previously supplied by Lord Cornwallis, before he left India with the papers containing the discussions respecting the decennial settlement of the lands in Bengal, and the regulations for the administration of justice.

The court of directors, in answer to the dispatch from the supreme government, of 23d May 1798, expressed their desire to see the Bengal system of internal administration extended to the coast of Coromandel and Malabar; and stated that they were sensible the defective knowledge of the resources of those countries, and the little progress that had been made in establishing the public authority, so as to make it felt and esteemed, rendered it improbable that the completion of that object would be obtained, as soon as it were to be wished: that they nevertheless approved of the Bengal presidency having made this a subject of correspondence with the other presidencies; and that they relied on the zealous co-operation of that presidency with the subordinate governments, for its gradual accomplishment.

A few months after the date of the Court's letter, Lord Wellesley, the governor-general, issued instructions to the Madras government, in consequence of the pecuniary distress of that presidency, (as represented to him during his visit there, on his way to Bengal) to institute an inquiry into the state and condition of all the branches of the public expenditure and resource, in order to effect every just and salutary reduction of the one, and every practicable improvement and augmentation of the other. In these instructions, it was signified to be the wish of the supreme government, that, with this reform of the civil establishment at Madras, should be connected the introduction of the same system of revenue and judicature on the coast, as had been established in Bengal; a measure, which it was thought, no time should be lost in effecting. For the purpose of carrying these orders into force, the presidency of Fort St. George, in the month of September following, appointed a committee for the revision and reform of the establishments of the civil service. To the commander-in-chief, it was committed to suggest retrenchments in the military department, and to the board of revenue, to report on the extension to the Madras territories, of the system of revenue and judicial administration in Bengal.

The board of revenue were furnished with the papers respecting the decennial settlement in Bengal, containing the discussions which took place, as preliminary to the permanent assessment of the lands, and with the regulations prescribing the rules and principles of the system.

In the latter end of 1799, they delivered in to the government, an elaborate report on the arrangements necessary for the introduction of the proposed plan of internal government; comprehending the administration of the revenues, and the administration of justice. It was stated by the board, in relation to the former branch of this important subject, and to which the Committee here propose to confine themselves, that, strongly impressed as they had been, from experience, with the necessity of some change that should substitute system for that mode of management, which had hitherto rested on temporary expedient; if regard to their own convenience ought to have determined their minds as to the period for recommending this change, it would have been proposed long before; but reflecting, that in a permanent settlement of all the land revenue, not only the interests of the Company, but those of the land-holders were, in a most important degree, involved by the amount to be assessed on the latter, as it bore a just proportion, or otherwise, to their actual means, they had been induced to enter into a very laborious undertaking, with the view of ascertaining, as nearly as might be practicable, the real resources of the several districts; and, though disappointed in this object, they had at least established, as they conceived, the improbability of arriving at that knowledge which they wished to acquire; inasmuch as their endeavours for that purpose, however they might, in their progress, have produced partial information, and corrected much abuse, had ultimately failed in attaining their end. As the situation and description of those connected with the lands in the Northern circars, and in the other territories then subject to the presidency of Fort St. George, were thought to bear a great affinity to the state of things in those respects, in the Bengal possessions, when an assessment in perpetuity was applied to those possessions, it was considered by the board, that the necessity was thus obviated, of discussing anew the subject. They, therefore, contented themselves with quoting from the documents which had been received from Bengal, and from the general regulations of that government, such parts as served to convey a connected idea of the systems themselves, compared with the evils which they were intended to correct, and of the arguments on both sides, in regard to their adoption; as equally evincing, in the opinion of the Board, the policy of extending those systems to the Madras territories. The propositions of the board of revenue, were therefore fundamentally and substantially the same, as those which had been reduced to practice under the supreme government, as far as relates to the land revenues; subject to one exception, which it is proper to mention.

Under the Bengal government, nearly the whole lands were in the hands of zemindars, at the time of the permanent settlement, and it only remained to establish those zemindars on the footing intended by the rules of that settlement. But in the territories subject to the Madras presidency, a very large portion of them, was neither in the possession of zemindars nor poligars; but was under the immediate management of the Company's servants. It therefore became a question in what mode and under what form, an assessment in perpetuity should be carried into effect in those parts which came under the latter description; and as the zemindarry principle was deemed the most expedient by the board of revenue, they recommended that such lands should be formed into estates, consisting of mootahs or divisions of land, yielding a revenue from about 1,000 pagodas to 10,000 pagodas per annum, so as to constitute zemindarries of a convenient size, which should be either granted to individuals in proprietary right, or sold to such, by public auction.

When the board made their report on this subject, the East India Company had possessed the Paramahl and Dindigul countries about seven years, and had just acquired the provinces of Canara and Coimbatore, and the pollams of Balghaut. The Malabar country was not then transferred from the Bombay presidency; nor had the Company obtained the Carnatic, Tanjore, and the districts ceded by the Nizam; but arrangements were in progress, for the annexation of those territories, to what at that period, constituted the possessions under the government of Fort St. George.

On the receipt of this report by the Madras presidency, they directed the board to prepare the materials for forming a permanent settlement of the lands, on the principles principles they had laid down, from the best information which their records and recent enquiries might afford; and the board of revenue in the following month, issued their instructions to the collectors of districts in which they explained the principles of the intended new settlement and system of internal administration, in order the better to enable the collectors to furnish the requisite information in the first instance, and ultimately to carry into effect the wishes of government. In these instructions are also detailed, the data on which the assessment of the lands was to be founded; and the collectors were directed to prepare every necessary information, respecting the rights of "the talookdars, and under-tenantry throughout the different districts, that in confirming the proprietary rights of the zemindars, they might not violate "the ascertained rights of other individuals." It does not appear that the local authorities were on this, or on any previous occasion, required to state their opinions on the policy or fitness of the measures, then in contemplation; and in the above mentioned instructions, the attention of the collectors was called to an order, which had been recently passed by the Madras government, which stated, that as the public prosperity and welfare absolutely required the introduction of the new system without delay, such of them would be removed, who should be found either incapable or unwilling to execute such orders as they might receive on that subject.

The sentiments of the supreme government, on the subject of the report of the board of revenue, with which they had been furnished, were transmitted to Fort St. George, in a letter dated the 31st December 1799; and a further communication on the same subject, was made by Lord Wellesley to Lord Clive, the governor at that presidency, dated the 8th January 1800.

On a reference to these documents, it will be found, that the principles on which it had been proposed to assess the lands, received the approbation of the Bengal government; and authority was given to form a decennial settlement for the districts on those principles, under a conviction entertained that no benefit would arise from a delay in the adoption of them in the Northern circars, in the expectation of obtaining more accurate statements of their natural resources. This decennial settlement was eventually to be rendered permanent, if approved of by the court of directors. The governor general in council, on this occasion, distinctly informed the Madras government, that the acknowledgment of a proprietary right in the zemindars existing, or those to be created, was not to be allowed in any respect, to affect the rights of the ryots or others, who had hitherto been, in any respect, subject to the authority of the zemindars or other landholders; nor was it to be construed to preclude government from passing any laws or regulations, which might occasionally be deemed expedient, for the protection of the rights of the ryots, or of other persons, or for any other purposes, which might be deemed essential to the good government of the country. The authority thus given to the Madras presidency, was not confined to the Northern circars, but extended to the other ancient possessions on the coast of Coromandel, as well as to the territory since acquired. The reservation which provided for a reference to the government at home, previously to the definitive conclusion of an assessment in perpetuity, would appear to have been made, in consequence of a similar clause having been inserted in the original settlement of the land-revenue in Bengal; but on a reconsideration of the subject, the supreme government were of opinion that such a restriction would be productive of prejudicial consequences to the public interests; for that unless the assessment (to use the words of that government) "was to be made final in the first instance, it was impossible not to suppose "that many of the zemindars, with reference to the fluctuating principles on which "the settlements of the land-revenues of the Northern circars had been hitherto "made, would entertain doubts of its permanency; and that this impression would "necessarily operate to retard the conclusion of the settlement; and would probably "affect the terms of it." This observation, they proceeded to state, "applied with "greater force to the havelly lands, which formed a large proportion of the "Company's territories on the coast. These lands (they added) which are now the "property of the Company, are to be disposed of at public sale, as estates subject "to a fixed revenue: And it is obvious that the value of the estates cannot be estimated, until the amount of the revenue at which they should be assessed in perpetuity, shall have been finally determined; and it cannot be expected that individuals will embark their property in the purchase of these estates, while a possibility shall remain, of the public demand on them being augmented."

FIFTH REPORT from the Select Committee on the

* Lord Wellesley took occasion to address a separate letter on this point, to the chairman of the Court of Directors; from which it appears, that he had acted on information from Madras, which convinced him of the expediency of the measure on which he had determined.

† The Madras government had, a few months before, apprized the court of directors of the receipt of the report from their revenue board, and of the transmission of it, to the supreme government; as well as of the measure in the mean time adopted, for collecting the necessary materials for permanently settling the lands.

‡ In the early part of 1801, the court of directors took into consideration the proceedings which had taken place on that subject, in a revenue letter to Fort St. George, dated the 11th February 1801; in which they stated that they had perused with attention the report of the revenue board of Fort St. George, and their subsequent instructions to the collectors; that they approved of their industry and abilities in the investigation and elucidation of the important and complicated subject to which their report related, and particularly of their having availed themselves of the information contained in the minutes and proceedings of the Marquis Cornwallis and Lord Teignmouth, at the time when a similar arrangement was under the consideration of the supreme board at Calcutta: that, upon mature reflection, they had determined to concur in the instructions of the governor general, for proceeding, at once, to the permanent assessment of the lands on the coast; that particular cases might occur, in which the court might regret that the final correction of error did not remain with them; but that this inconvenience, should it prove one, was much more than counterbalanced by the danger which might accrue to the whole system, if a doubt of its permanency should, in the early stage of its execution, be created in the minds of the natives, with whom these transactions were to be carried on: that two other considerations had operated to produce the decision of the court on this subject; that, in the first place, the subject was not a new one; that the leading principles of the measure, had already received the sanction of the court; that the general principles therefore being recognized, it was only the detail and execution of those principles, which were to be left in the hands of the Madras presidency; and that detail could, with infinitely more advantage, be conducted on the spot, than by the ablest investigation that could be given to it, at home: that although the court vested the Madras government with full power to proceed in the final execution of a permanent arrangement, there were a few general principles of caution, which it was necessary to point out to their attention; that the first which naturally presented itself was, that although the court would sincerely rejoice to see the measure finally completed, they did not expect that the government abroad were to proceed in it, with a precipitancy inconsistent with full and accurate investigation; that it should always be borne in mind, that they were concluding a settlement, which good faith, and the honour of government required, should be held, for ever, sacred and inviolable; that it was a measure, on which was to rest for ever the extent of the Company's interest in the extensive landed property entrusted to the care of the presidency of Fort St. George; that in proportion therefore, as the decision they were to pass, was permanent and irrevocable, in the same proportion, ought their previous enquiry to be accurate, and their information complete:—that in the next place, it behoved them to attend, in a particular manner, to the different situations of landed property, not only of different provinces and districts, but of different estates, in the same province and district; that they would certainly err, if it was supposed to be necessary that whole provinces and districts should be settled with, at the same time; that the information respecting one estate in a district, might be so complete, while that of a neighbouring estate, might be so imperfect, as to create great irregularity; that not doubting that the Madras government would give to the subject their unremitting attention, the court could only in general say, that they should be much more satisfied to learn that it was well done, than that it was quickly done; that it was impossible to peruse the report of the board of revenue, without being satisfied that the detail of the business, was of a most extensive and complicated nature; and that, impressed with that reflection, it was equally impossible for the court to indulge any impatience, under the lengthened period to which the necessary investigation might extend: that there was a material difference, as noticed by the board of revenue, between the state of the several provinces in the Carnatic, and those of Bengal, where the measure of a permanent settlement was first taken into consideration; consideration: that the Bengal provinces were infinitely farther advanced in the habits of order and subordination to Government, than most places in the Carnatic, and certainly much more so, than in the generality of the Poligar provinces, or the districts of the Northern circars: that they were not so ripe for the reception of those benefits and blessings, intended for them, as if they were accustomed to the habits and feelings of civilized society: that there was a material circumstance to be attended to, in the conduct of this important measure; viz. that any attempt to introduce a regular system of order, or just sentiments, respecting the value of permanent rights, would be idle and nugatory, till their minds were to a certain extent prepared, to feel the importance of the benefits they were about to receive: that the first object therefore was, to establish the authority of government itself, in the different zemindarries, before they were invited to participate in the advantages to be conferred on them: that this never could be effectually done, till that spirit of rebellion and insubordination, which was so conspicuous in the Northern circars, was suppressed: and that it was of the first importance to the attainment of that object, that all subordinate military establishments should be annihilated within the limits then subject to the dominion of the Company: that the countries to which this observation applied, must be brought to such a state of subjection, as to acknowledge and submit to the principle, that, as they must be indebted to the beneficence and wisdom of the British government, for every advantage they were to receive, so, in like manner, they must feel indebted solely to its protection, for the continuance and enjoyment of them: that the court held these truths to be so incontrovertible, as to preclude all expectation of any benefit to be derived from an attempt to introduce either a permanent system of land revenue, or the exercise of a regular judicial authority, till this essential preliminary was secured: that from the nature of the business to be executed, it was obvious, that the successful execution of it, must ultimately rest on the accuracy and integrity of the enquiries to be conducted by the collectors, and other officers subordinate to the board of revenue: that, if any of the Company's servants, then in those situations, were, from a defect of talents, or circumstances, unequal to the extension of the duties they were called upon to perform, they were to be removed, and others capable of doing the duty, substituted in their room.

In the following year, a special commission was appointed by the government of Fort St. George; to whom was delegated the important business of arranging the settlement of a permanent land revenue in those districts, which then admitted of it, by an application of the materials which had been collected for that purpose, by the local authorities, under the orders which were issued to them on the 15th October, 1799. This commission was limited, in its powers, to such proceedings as were necessarily connected with the immediate object of its institution, so as not to interfere with the ordinary line of duty which attached to the board of revenue. The progress made by the commissioners in the important undertaking committed to their charge, having rendered their further services unnecessary, they were discontinued; and the extension of the permanent settlement to those districts into which it had not been introduced, was left to the superintendence of the board of revenue.

The new system was established in the different districts, composing the Northern Circars, within the years 1802 and 1804.

The lands already in the hands of zemindars, were confirmed to them in perpetuity, on the prescribed conditions. The assessment on each zemindary necessarily varied, according to the local extent: in some, it considerably exceeded a lac of star pagodas; in others, it was under 1,000 star pagodas.

The havelly lands having been parcelled out into mootahs of a convenient size, yielding from 1,000 to 5,000 Star pagodas annual rent, but in some instances, more; were sold at public auction, subject to the terms of the permanent zemindary tenure.

The assessment on each zemindary was fixed, exclusively of the revenue derived from the sale and manufacture of salt, from the sayer and all other duties, whether by sea or land, from the abkarry or tax on the sale of spirituous liquors and intoxicating drugs; and from all taxes personal and professional (except in a few instances where these taxes were included among the assets on which the assessment was calculated) or duties on market places and fairs; the government reserving to itself, the entire exercise of its discretion, in continuing or abolishing, temporarily or permanently, these respective sources of public supply.

The holders of maunions and shotrunns, that is, of lands which were exempted from the payment of rent, or were held at favourable rents, as well as those who enjoyed russooms were allowed to remain undisturbed in those tenures and privileges; except in so far as they should be pronounced to have been irregularly obtained by a court of justice, on any inquiries instituted for that purpose. An exception was however made, with respect to the russooms of chowdries, carriers, and despoundals, and such other native revenue officers, whose services had become useless; these fees having been resumed, and the amount of them included in the jummahs of the zemindars, and pensions granted to the individuals, in lieu of them.

Provision also appears to have been made, that all russooms, or lands hitherto appropriated to the support of police establishments, should be disposed of, in such manner as the government should think fit; and that no lands should be considered as held on the condition of performing police duties, unless specially stipulated in the deeds of settlement exchanged with the zemindars. This provision was dictated by the determination to which the government had come, of taking upon itself, the charge and management of that branch of municipal regulation; and of relieving the zemindars from all responsibility in this respect, except that of being generally bound to aid and assist the officers of government in apprehending and securing public offenders.

The general standard, by which the jumma or land rent to be paid by the zemindars, was regulated, appears to have been two-thirds of the gross collections from the cultivators, as estimated in former years, by the committee of circuit; but as the accounts of that committee were, under the circumstances in which they were prepared, naturally considered to have greatly under-rated the value of the country, and to have been in other respects uncertain and defective; recourse was also had, to averages of the collections actually made, since that period.

The Guntoor circar having come under the Company's government, subsequently to the enquiries of the committee of circuit, was assessed with reference to the average collections during the thirteen years it had been subject to the British authority; and such other information as could be collected of each zemindarry, according to its extent of arable land.

The permanent settlement of the Jaghire took place in 1802, the lands having been divided into sixty-one estates, bearing an assessment of from 2000 to 5000 star pagodas, and sold to individuals in the same manner, as the havelies of the Northern circars. The data on which the land-tax payable by the zemindars to government was calculated and determined, were the actual state of the resources, and certain accounts of the produce and gross collections in preceding years.

The remaining part of the antient possessions which have been settled in perpetuity, are the district of Trevendaporam, and the two Jagheer villages adjoining it; the former having been formed into six lots, and sold; the latter having been conveyed to the renter, in zemindarry right, without purchase.

In both the old and the newly formed zemindarries, particular estates were assessed at encreasing rates of rent, which were to become fixed, after a certain number of years. This principle was observed in cases where the lands were of a particularly improveable kind, or the state of cultivation had been reduced by adventitious causes of temporary operation.

It would be superfluous, in your Committee, to enter into any circumstantial explanations of the different rules and provisions, relative to the new system of revenue, which has been introduced into the above-mentioned territories, and some other districts, under the government of Fort St. George; or of the nature of those rights, which it has either created or confirmed, whether affecting the Government, the zemindars, or the ryots; as they are fundamentally and substantially the same in principle, as those which have been described to exist, under the land revenue system of the Bengal provinces. Referring the House, therefore, for general information on that head, to the instructions issued to the collectors in the year 1799, as containing a practical application of the principles, according to which the arrangement was progressively adopted, your Committee deem it sufficient here to state, state, that the zemindars are declared to be the proprietors of the soil, both waste and cultivated, within the limits of their respective zemindarries; and the ryots or cultivators, their tenants or under farmers, holding their fields from year to year under pottahs or leases, which specify the rent they are to pay to the zemindar, or the share of the crop he is to receive, who is prohibited, under penalties enforced by the courts of justice, from demanding more than the ryots paid or accounted for, at the time of concluding the permanent settlement, or than is agreeable to custom. Of the revenues or share of the crop received by the zemindar from the ryots, which was calculated to be about one-half the gross produce, he stipulated to pay to the government, as jumma or rent, about two-thirds; retaining for his own use, the remaining one-third, or about 15 per cent of the gross produce. On the failure of a zemindar, in his payments to government, which he is required to make by periodical instalments, his lands become liable to attachment, and if necessary, to be sold, in order to realize the deficiency; or, more correctly speaking, such a portion of his interest in the soil, which, as it has been stated, consists of his 15 per cent. of the gross produce, more or less, and the waste lands, are disposed of at public auction, and the proceeds applied to the liquidation of the balance outstanding against him. In the case of the failure of a ryot, in his payments or dues to the zemindar, his personal property is liable to be distrained by the latter; and if not sufficient to make good the arrear of rent, he can be ousted from the occupancy of the land cultivated by him; and the zemindar is at liberty to put another ryot into the possession of it, on the usual terms. The proprietary right of the zemindar, as it is termed, does not give him the power of selling the land of his zemindarry, any more than the government is empowered to sell any part of it, when he fails in the discharge of its demand upon him. He can only dispose of his interest in the soil, viz. his 15 per cent. of the gross produce, and the waste land; which he can also, on the principle of a proprietary right in both, bequeath, mortgage, or alienate.

On the establishment of this system of perpetual rents, under a zemindarry tenure, it was made a fundamental condition, that the zemindars or landholders should no longer be suffered to keep up any military force; the preservation of internal order and tranquillity in the respective zemindarries being henceforth vested solely in the government, and in the civil authorities, to whom, under its controul and direction, the public safety was entrusted.

It has been explained in the foregoing part of this Report, that in the antient possessions, the collections from the ryots were chiefly realized, except in as far as regarded the dry grain and garden culture, by taking a share or division of the actual produce, or by commuting such share of the actual produce for its computed value in cash. In the territories since acquired, a money rent had been fixed on each field, having reference only to the quantity and quality of the soil, and not to the varying produce of each year. The public demand on the ryots, which before consisted of several items, and was annually the subject of troublesome and minute adjustment, by being thus, not only consolidated and simplified, but also limited in its amount, appears to have contributed in a great degree, to the improvement of their condition, and to have relieved the government as well as themselves, from those various abuses and peculations, which were before practised on them, by the natives employed in collecting the public dues, as well as by the more powerful ryots. It was probably a conviction of the advantages which had been found to attend this measure, which induced those who were employed in superintending the formation of a permanent settlement of the Northern circars and the Jaghire, to urge the expediency of encouraging the zemindars to adopt the same measure of a fixed money rent. Your Committee think it proper to quote a passage from a letter of the secretary to the board of revenue, on this subject, addressed to the collector of Guntoor: "It has been almost universally observed, that where a moderate money rent prevails, there is found a better agriculture, and a more industrious and substantial class of cultivators, freed from the oppression of the superior ryots, the trammels and speculation exercised by the estimators of the crops, the framer of the dowle (estimate) and the whole phalanx of circar servants; instead of waiting the orders for cutting their fields, long exposed to waste, for the want of it. The ryots sow and reap when best suited to their interests; they feel that every hour of extra labour, every basket of manure carried into the field, is adding to their store, and to the comfort of themselves and families. All is their own; but the amount specified in the sunnud. It simplifies the whole concerns of the country, and establishes

"establishes the clearest data on which, in all cases of dispute or oppression, the courts could act; for all sunnuds are to be registered by the curnum.
 "The arguments used against this species of commutation, are the diversities of the seasons, the chances of markets, and practices on the ryot's fears, that by engaging for a given sum in money, when they may have no produce, he will be ruined. It is carefully concealed, that if the season be bad, he is sure of a higher price for his produce; and, in fact, would receive much more, than if the produce was shared when the high price would prove a spur to the head inhabitants and circar servants, to extract from him, a double portion. It besides, in bad seasons, stimulates the utmost individual exertion, most important to the general welfare; and which ought if possible to be encouraged, especially now that the agreements between the proprietors and ryots can be enforced."

The board were aware, that there was a strong prejudice against this mode of creating a kind of independent property in the villages; inasmuch as long as the division of the produce was continued, and the village concerns were carried on, as it were, on a joint account, so long would the principal cultivators have an opportunity of preying upon the share of the poorer ryots, of sparing their own, and by their influence, depriving the proprietor of his just rights.

It appears, that one of the estates into which the Jaghire was divided, was retained in the hands of government, for the express purpose of introducing the principle of money rents on the cultivation of each field, by way of example to the other inhabitants; but whether in this district, or in the Northern circars, the principle has been brought, into any extensive or general practice, your Committee have not been able to ascertain.

MODERN POSSESSIONS.

Your Committee having thus shortly stated the history of the land revenues, in the ancient territories under the government of Fort St. George, to the period when an assessment in perpetuity of the lands in those territories was introduced; They now proceed to a similar view of the administration of the land revenues, in the more recently acquired Possessions, under the same presidency; previously noticing the periods at which they respectively came under the British government.

The districts of Salem and Kistnagherry, comprizing the Baramahl, and the provinces of Dindigul and Malabar, were ceded to the Company by Tippoo Saheb, under the treaty of peace concluded at Seringapatam, on the 18th March 1792. The Malabar country was, at first, placed under the charge of the Bombay government, and so continued until 1800. The Company were before possessed of the fort and dependencies of Tellicherry, Mylan, and Durmapatam, which yielded only a trifling revenue.

In 1793, the settlement of Pondicherry and its adjacent lands, were acquired in consequence of the war with France; and in 1795, in consequence of the same war, which involved the Company in hostilities with the Dutch, they obtained possession of Pulicat and Sadras.

In 1799, the province of Canara and the districts of Soondah and some other districts, were, according to a schedule annexed to the treaty of partition with the Nizam and the Peishwah, dated the 22d June, in that year, transferred to the Company, as their share of the dominions of the late sultan of Mysore; and by the same treaty, the Company also acquired the province of Coimbatore, the circar lands and pollams of Ballaghaut, and the island of Seringapatam. It was also in the same year, that the province of Tanjore, was by treaty with the Rajah, made over to the Company.

In 1800, under a treaty with the Nizam, dated 12th October, all that tract of country situated south of the rivers Tungbuddra and Kistna, which the Nizam acquired by the treaty of Seringapatam of 1792, and by the treaty of Mysore of 1799, together with the talook of Adoni, and all other of his Highness's talooks south of these rivers, were ceded to the Company. This large portion of territory is what is now called the Ceded Districts; and to these districts, two-thirds of Punganoor and part of Goodiput were added, having been exchanged for certain districts which had been reserved by the treaty of Mysore in 1799, as the eventual portion of the Peishwah; but which, by the supplementary treaty of Mysore, dated 29th December 1803, fell into the possession of the Company. Other districts were were also obtained in exchange, which were attached to the Malabar and Carnatic territory.

In 1801, the whole of the possessions of the Nabob of Arcot, situated in the Carnatic, with the exception of a small portion retained by him as the household lands of himself and family, were transferred to the Company, by treaty. Of the Pollams situated in the southern part of the Carnatic, commonly called the Southern Pollams, consisting of the Tinnevely, and Manapara Pollams, and the two Marawars, Ramnad, Shevagunga, and of those situated to the westward, called the Western Pollams, the Company had collected the peshcush or tribute, since 1792, under a treaty with the Nabob in that year. In 1795, the Pollam of Ramnad, of which the Company collected the peshcush since 1792, came under their sole and absolute charge and management. The remaining part of the Carnatic acquired by the treaty of 1801, consisted of the districts of Palnaud, Nellore, and Ongole, the province of Arcot, the Pollams of Chittoor, the districts of Satevaid, Tinnevely and Madura.

The papers which have been at different times, laid before the House, have already furnished it with information of the circumstances under which these extensive acquisitions came into the possession of the Company.

A considerable portion of them, consisted of districts held by Poligars or military chieftains; but the remaining, and by far the largest part, had been under the immediate management of the native governments, who collected the revenues, and administered the local affairs, in such manner as they thought proper.

Your Committee will first detail the principles of revenue administration, progressively adopted by the Company's government, in the latter description of territory, generally distinguished by the name of Circar or Havelly lands.

The interest in the soil was generally found to be divided between the government and the cultivator. The established or understood share of the former, in the crops, from paddy lands, or wet, designated by the term nunjah, was generally received in kind, at rates varying from 40 to 60 per cent. of the gross produce; subject to a deduction of certain portions distributed mostly before, but sometimes after the separation of the grain from the husk, among the servants belonging to each village community; and appropriated to charitable uses, the repair of tanks, or the maintenance of the pagodas. The government share of dry grain culture, called punjah, which of the pagodas. The government share of dry grain culture, called punjah, which was considerably less than in the nunjah lands, was mostly received in money, at so much for a fixed measure of land, or so much for the same measure, but varying with the produce. A fixed money rent was also collected on the lands yielding the most valuable articles of produce, termed garden and plantation produce, on which the public demand was still less than on the last mentioned description of culture.

The nunjah lands depending on copious irrigation; and the fall of the rains being uncertain, the produce was necessarily rendered precarious also; and this is considered to be the cause of the practice having continued, of the government share being taken in kind. The punjah culture requiring only partial supplies of water, were not so frequently exposed to failure; and the risk incurred by the ryot, in engaging for a rent in specie, was consequently less, while the varieties of produce cultivated on the same ground, ripening at different periods of the year, opposed a great obstacle to a division of the crops. The fields allotted to the more valuable articles of garden and plantation produce, were generally secured against a failure of water, by artificial means. The responsibility therefore which attended the payment of a money rent, was still less. This explanation is equally applicable to the Northern circars, and every other part of the British possessions on the coast. The demand on the cultivator was however, by no means confined to the established rates of land tax or rent; for besides the sayer duties and taxes personal and professional, the ryot was subject to extraordinary aids, additional assessments, and to the private exactions of the officers of government, or renters, and their people; so that what was left to the ryot was little more than what he was enabled to secure, by evasion and concealment.

To detail the different abuses, both public and private, which prevailed in the extensive possessions to which the present head of the Report relates, would be only a repetition of those facts which have been stated, in the preceding branch of it. They appear

HAVELLY LANDS.

FIFTH REPORT from the Select Committee on the

H.
FORT ST. GEORGE,
HAVELLY LANDS.

appear to have been of the same character and description, in every part of the Company's territories. As long as the prince was supplied by his amildars, with as much money as he wanted, he seldom enquired into the means that were used to obtain it, or cared by what breaches of duty and irregular practices they enriched themselves. As they in general purchased their posts, by a bribe to some one, at the seat of government, and as their continuance in office was uncertain and precarious, they suffered no opportunity to pass, of adding to their illicit gains. The amildars were actuated by the same feeling, in regard to those employed under their authority, as long as an amount of revenue was forthcoming, that would satisfy the government; and so it was, in like manner, throughout all the intermediate gradations of public servants, or persons standing in their place in the character of renters, or sub-renters, down to the lowest person, invested with any authority. All received their private advantages; all, in a greater or less degree, in collusion with each other, prostituted the authority with which they were clothed, to serve their own private views. The public accountants, both in the villages and districts, who constituted the official checks on the conduct of those engaged in making the collections, or in superintending those employed in that duty, influenced by the same motives, naturally played into the hands of the latter;—so that the government, under this relaxed and corrupt system of administration, were deprived of all means of ascertaining the oppressions practised on the husbandmen, or the frauds committed on their own rights.

It has been seen, that such parts of the old possessions of the Company as were havelly, were, for many years after they became subject to its rule, let out in large portions, or by districts, to individuals, on longer or shorter leases, who, for the duration of such leases, stood in the same situation as the zemindars; it being left to them, in their districts, as it was to the zemindars, in their zemindaries, to settle with the ryots or cultivators, without any interference in this respect, on the part of the Company's servants; whose concern and intercourse with the natives, from causes which have been explained, seldom extended further in regard to the revenues of the country, than was necessary for making the requisite engagements with the zemindars and renters: that when the provincial councils were abolished in 1794, and collectors appointed throughout the country, it was let out in villages, or in single villages to the head inhabitants, the settlements being made on an estimate of the produce, converted into a money rent; and that it was only in the Jaghire, that any material progress was made under this mode of settlement in reforming abuses, or in ascertaining the resources of the lands; and that the Jaghire and the other havellys continued under village settlements, until they were permanently assessed under zemindary tenures.

Nearly the same system prevailed in the modern possessions of the Company, which were not in the hands of poligars; for it was much the practice of the native Mahomeddan governments, and quite general under that of Mahomed Ally, the Nabob of the Carnatic, and his Son, to farm out the lands in extensive tracts, often whole provinces, for a certain number of years, to individuals; who sub-rented them, by villages to the pottails, or head men, who were left to collect from the other cultivators, as they pleased. The oppression of the under-renters principally consisted, as they did in the Northern circars, in levying private contributions on frivolous and unwarrantable pretences; in under-assessing the lands in the occupation of themselves, their relations and friends, making up the difference by an over-assessment of the other village cultivators, more especially on those who were the poorest, and therefore the least able to protect themselves; in forcing the inferior ryots to cultivate their lands, and perform for them, free of charge, various other services; in monopolizing the produce of the several villages, which they afterwards disposed of at an advanced price: and in applying to their own use, the allowances and perquisites of the pagodas and village servants, by which the parties were deprived of their rights, or the inhabitants as was often the case, were obliged to make good the loss. One of the greatest abuses which was found to exist, as more immediately affecting the interests of government, was the undue and irregular alienations of land.

From the impracticability of at once entering upon a detailed plan of management, the lands, in the first instance, were farmed out on the principle which generally obtained in the country; but as soon as circumstances would admit, engagements were entered into for the rents of each village, with its head inhabitants, who again sub-rented each field or fields, and settled with each ryot, or with the community of the village, who were to arrange among themselves the land they were respectively to occupy and pay for. The renters were required to grant pottahs to the ryots, specifying the payments they are to make for the particular fields they cultivated, beyond the amount of which, they were prohibited from collecting. As long, however, as this system of farming out the collections of each village to the head inhabitant, for a specific sum, continued, (leaving to these renters, as was necessarily the case, the whole conduct of affairs in their respective villages) a bar existed to any effectual investigation into the defects and abuses in the land revenues. The records of the Company abound with proofs of the great deceptions and frauds practised by the village renters, in conjunction with the curnums, in order to conceal the value of the lands, and the actual quality and kinds of cultivation; and also of the serious and extensive injuries inflicted on the cultivators by the former; by which the interests of the bulk of the people, were sacrificed to the injustice and extortionate demands, of comparatively a few individuals. The agency of renters, intermediate between the government and the cultivators of a village, was no longer adhered to, than until the European local authorities had acquired that knowledge, by which they could see their way sufficiently to enable them to adopt a more scrutinous system of management, calculated, in its detailed operations and progress, to furnish them with a full insight into the whole minutiae of the revenue affairs of the country, and of those various abuses which had grown up under the native administration, for the collection of the revenues, either as they immediately affected the welfare of the people, or the interests of the state. The mode which it appears to have been the settled and uniform policy of the Madras government to adopt, for the accomplishment of these necessary and important purposes, was for the collector, instead of renting the lands of a village to the head inhabitant of it, to enter into direct engagements with every ryot or cultivator situated within its boundaries, for the revenue he was to pay, on account of the land he occupied. This mode of renting, has generally been called a ryot-war settlement. The head inhabitants foreseeing that this change would be attended with the downfall of that power and oppressive influence, which they had long exercised over the common cultivators, and by which they enriched themselves at their cost and that of government; on its first introduction, naturally threw every obstruction in the way, which artifice could suggest, or self-interest stimulate, to embarrass and retard its operation. They left their villages, carrying with them their dependants, and such others, as from connexion or promises they could seduce; but when they found, from their cultivation being engaged for by those whom they could not influence, that their design of bringing the collector to terms, was not likely to be successful; those in the Carnatic country, and to whom the foregoing observations are more particularly intended to apply, appear, in frequent instances, to have repaired to the presidency in numbers, in the hope of compassing their purpose, by bringing discredit on the collector; endeavouring to interest the board of revenue and the government, by false representations of over assessments, and abuse of authority. Such was the ascendancy which they possessed over the minds of the ryots, and the dread entertained of their power, that it was with difficulty, that those helpless people could be prevailed upon to acknowledge or state their grievances, and divulge their distress.

By a firm and steady conduct on the part of the collectors, aided by the sanction and support of the government, the confederated opposition of the pottails was subdued; and their concern with the revenues of the villages to which they belonged, was confined to the duty originally assigned them under the Hindoo governments, of collecting on the behalf of the government, the rents from the ryots, under the orders, and subject to the control of the Company's collector, and the servants employed more immediately under his authority. In some of the territories acquired since 1792, ryot-war settlements were at once made with the cultivators, without previously having recourse to village settlements.

As connected with this detailed mode of management, and in order to secure all the advantages to be derived from it, a regular survey of the lands was undertaken; by which it was ascertained what was the real extent of land cultivated, the different descriptions of it, both with reference to the tenures by which it was held, and the kinds of produce which it yielded; what quantity a given portion of seed would yield of a particular produce; what was the extent of land, either uncultivated or waste, and also, what was the share of the produce to which, according to the unadulterated usage of the country, the government was entitled. It was one great recommendation in favour of this mode of settlement, that it was most favourable to the prosecution of such a survey; and it was for this reason, that the Madras presigency in 1805, when the supreme government directed the introduction of village leases for three years similar to those which had been formed in the territories ceded by the Nabob Vizier of Oude, objected to the abandonment of the existing principle of collecting the dues of the state from the ryots, immediately through its own officers; and prevailed on the Bengal presidency to allow of its continuance.

The use of these surveys, appears to the Committee to have consisted, not only in the means which they furnished the collectors of detecting false returns respecting lands actually cultivated, and which therefore ought to have paid rent, and of adjusting the demand on the ryot, on uniform principles; but it also laid the best foundation for introducing a fixed money rent on the land itself, according to its extent and value, instead of a pecuniary commutation for the government's share of the actual produce of the year, which, where a division of the crop in kind did not take place, had been heretofore generally adopted by the Company's collectors, under the plan of village settlements. In those districts, therefore, in which the lands had been surveyed and engagements were contracted with the actual cultivators, the extent and value of the lands being determined by the survey, reference being also had in most cases to the average produce of past years, the share of the produce, thus considered to belong to the circar, was converted into a fixed money rent, regulated by the price of grain in the market, for a certain number of years. The cultivator thus enjoyed exclusively, without any participation on the part of government, the benefit of whatever additional labour, or additional improvements, he might bestow on the land; while the demand on him, being simplified and defined, was calculated to relieve him, as well as the state, from those frauds and impositions which the native officers of revenue were at all times disposed to practise, when opportunities offered for doing so, without detection.

Where individual settlements had been adopted, but a survey of the land had not been effected, the money assessment was nevertheless made on the land, and not on the actual produce; being framed on an average of the returns of one year with another; but it appears, that, in almost every district, the assessment was subsequently corrected by a survey.

In order that the general rules and principles, by which the assessment on the different sorts of produce were regulated, should be made known, as well for the public information of the inhabitants, as a general guide for the native servants on all occasions of dispute, a corolhama, or proclamation, was circulated, announcing and explaining such rules and principles. Besides which, the collectors or their assistants granted to each cultivator a pottah, or lease, for the year, specifying the extent and quality of his land, and the sum he engaged to pay for it, as rent. The rent was for some years liable to those variations in particular cases, which were necessary for the purpose of correcting any errors which might have crept into the survey, and any irregularities in the assessment, founded on such survey, which the annually returning process of the ryot-war settlement naturally brought to light. Alterations in the assessment were also occasioned by the gradual encrease made to it, as the circumstances of the cultivators, and the state of agriculture improved, in order to raise it to what was considered the standard rent: but having reached that point, it remained at the same amount, unless the ryot, under his yearly settlements, either threw up part of his land, or extended his cultivation, by engaging for a larger quantity. If he undertook to cultivate additional fields that were unoccupied or waste, the rent of such fields, furnished an encrease of land revenue to the government; and if he this year, declined to engage for as much land as he did, in the last, a diminution in the amount of rent to be paid by the individual was occasioned thereby, and a consequent diminution of the revenue of government; unless the land given up by one cultivator, should happen to be engaged for by another. A decrease of revenue might also arise by reason of a remission or reduction of the public demand, on a particular portion of land, in consequence of bad seasons, or other unavoidable calamities, which might disqualify the cultivator from paying the full assessment on his land.

The survey valuation, regulated on the principles which have been described, rather constituted the maximum of assessment, than the absolute demand upon the cultivator for that rate of assessment, though regulated with reference to the fixed rules which had formerly been observed by the native governments, but which had in later periods been infringed upon to a considerable extent by extra demands, or additions to the original assessments; yet the proportion which, in most of the districts, it bore to his means, often rendered him incapable of paying it, in a very unfavourable season, season, or under any accidents of a particularly untoward kind, without impairing the resources of the country. The first thing, therefore, done under a ryot-war settlement, was, for the collector, or his assistants, or both, attended by the tehsildars or native collectors of districts, and by some of the servants immediately employed in their cutcherries or offices of business, to make a tour at the period for commencing the labours of agriculture of the country under their respective charge, for the purpose of learning from the ryots, whom they assembled at convenient situations, their engagements for cultivation. This being ascertained, it was then settled with them what should be the utmost demand to which they were liable for the year. If the country was in an ordinary state of prosperity, that is, if no circumstances of so adverse a nature had occurred, in the year which had expired, as to render the ryots unable, with reference to the productiveness of their lands, to answer for an amount of revenue equal to the survey or standard rent; that amount was declared to be the demand: on the other hand, if the districts had by any calamity been reduced to a state of distress, and the circumstances of the ryot were not adequate to the payment of the standard assessment, it was accordingly lowered; and to such as stood in need of it, tuccarvee, or advances of money were made, to purchase seeds and implements, and to hire labourers. The assistance afforded for these necessary purposes, was regulated by the tehsildars and potails, under the eye or control of the collectors; whose duty it also was, during the progress of cultivation, to stimulate their industry, and guide their labours, to the advantage of themselves and to the increase of the public revenue. When the season became sufficiently advanced, to enable the collector and his assistants to judge from the appearance and state of the crops, as to the means of the ryots to pay their rents, they made a second tour of their districts for that purpose. The reports of the potails were then received, and the accounts of the curnums examined. Each case of alleged injustice or error in classing or assessing the lands, was ascertained by confronting the parties, investigating the accounts, and consulting the other ryots of the village; and when the complaint was not an individual, but a general one, by calling in the aid of those belonging to the neighbouring villages.

An equal assessment throughout a district is necessarily advantageous to the great body of the ryots. Those residing in contiguous villages are well acquainted with each others circumstances, and with the proportion of the public demand to which they are properly liable, and that which they actually account for to the government. If a particular village was considered to be under-assessed by the cultivators of another village in their vicinity, the adjoining villages were found ready to give information on the subject; either from jealousy at finding their neighbours thus favoured, or from a hope of obtaining, by this means, a reduction of their own burthens. If the rents of the village exceeded the just standard, they felt it to be their interest, when called upon, to give evidence of the fact; lest in the event of being themselves placed in the same unfavourable circumstances, they should not be fairly dealt with by those of the adjacent communities. In some districts, the inhabitants were made jointly and severally responsible for the payment of their rents, by which they were made liable to an additional assessment, in case of the failure of particular individuals, in order to supply the deficiency which there would otherwise be in the realization of the public dues. But this principle of joint security was but seldom enforced. Its utility consisted in creating an interest among the ryots, to give correct information of each others situation and circumstances, in aid of the collector's proceedings; but it appears to the Committee to have been better calculated to secure the public revenue from failure, than to render individual justice to the people.

If remissions were thought necessary, the signature of the collector, or his assistants, final arrangements, in writing, under the signature of the collector, or his assistants, were entered into for the exact amount each ryot would be required to pay, and for which his property was made answerable in case of failure. This is what was called, the conclusion of the settlement; which, having been effected, it only remained to collect, through the medium of the tehsildars and potails, the rents thus definitively settled.

Under this mode of adjusting the rents of a village, the ryot knew before he set his oxen to the plough and dropped his seed into the ground, what was the utmost limit of rent that he could be called on to pay; and that the advantage of additional labour employed upon his fields would be all his own, as well as the advantage of additional produce in an abundant season. He also knew, that in an unfavourable season, an abatement of that demand would be made in his favour, if his diminished means rendered him unable to satisfy it. He further knew, that if the potail required him to to pay more than the sum at which his rent was finally fixed by the collector, he had only to prefer his complaint. His pottah, or lease, not only specified the land he occupied, but also the rent he was to pay; while the receipt which the pottah or village collector was required to grant him for every payment he made, was evidence of what he had actually accounted for as rent. If, therefore, more was exacted from him than was fairly due, he had only to represent the matter to the collector, or his principal servants, and to produce his pottah and receipt; and then what had been unduly wrested from him would be immediately restored. The pottahs and cummums on the other hand, well knew that the door to complaint being thrown wide open by the collector, and access to him by the ryot being easy, they were constantly liable to exposure, if they acted oppressively, unjustly, or corruptly; that the penalty bonds, in which all the revenue servants entered, would be enforced against them, and that a fine, a suspension, or dismissal, was, on the detection of their improper proceedings the consequence they were to expect. Under the system which has been thus briefly explained, and in due conformity to the Hindoo revenue institutions, a regular establishment was kept up of sheristadars, or district accountants, as a check upon the village cummums, and through whom their annual statements were forwarded to the chattri of the collector, where they underwent the examination of a head sheristadar.

Habituated as the ryots were under their native governments to arbitrary imposts and private exactions, it was not to be expected that, on the first establishment of a ryot-war management, they would immediately raise the voice of complaint against their oppressors. On the contrary, they evinced a reluctance to come forward and make known their grievances. It is not by the instantaneous effect of any system, that an extensive and complicated evil of long continuance, can be removed or remedied. By learning, however, that the ruling authority in the collectorship, had not only limited and defined the payments they were to make, but acted upon the principle which they had thus announced, and required all other persons employed under their authority in the business of the collections, to do the same; they soon became emboldened to resist all extra demands, whether in the shape of public impost or of individual extortion. They also, by becoming freed from those rapacious demands to which they were formerly a prey, and secured in the protection and enjoyment of their rights, no longer had that motive for resorting to the practices of evasion, chicanery, and corruption, to which they were before impelled, in order to save themselves, in some degree at least, from the effects of such injustice.

It appears to your Committee, that the practice of entering into engagements with each cultivator of the soil, and of fixing the assessment on a survey valuation, was first adopted under the Company's government, in the Baramahal country.

This portion of territory was ceded, as the Committee have stated, in 1792; and, as the little improvement which had at that period, taken place in the administration of the revenues in the ancient possessions of the Company, rendered it difficult to find among the civil servants of the presidency of Fort St. George, individuals possessed of those qualifications which were necessary for the proper and efficient discharge of the duties of a collector, more especially in a territory newly obtained, the successful management of which would greatly depend on the measures that were in the first instance adopted; Lord Cornwallis entrusted the districts in question, to the charge and superintendence of Captain Alex^r Read and three other military officers; all of whom were well acquainted with the native languages, and with the habits and manners of the people; and at the same time, possessed that activity, zeal, and ability, which were so requisite to ensure success to their labours. They applied themselves to an enquiry into local usages, as the only ground on which they could rightly proceed in framing and settling a revenue system for the country. Their earliest investigations related to the customary divisions of the crop, the nature of the produce, and the manner of keeping the revenue accounts; tracing, as they proceeded in their enquiries, the origin and progress of every civil institution in the country; and connecting therewith, not only a particular examination into the theory, practice and operation of the revenue management, which they found to exist under the Mahomeddan rule of Hyder Ali and Tippoo Sahib, but also during the preceding period, when the Baramahal was governed by its native Hindoo princes.

The principle on which Captain (afterwards Colonel) Read, administered the revenues of the territory, and the regulations which he established for the guidance of his assistants and of all other officers in the discharge of their respective duties, as well as the manner in which the business of European superintendence was carried on, appears to have become the general guide of the revenue authorities in the other parts of that territory. In the districts of Dindigul and Coimbatore, in the province of Canara, and in the Ceded districts, the system of Colonel Read was introduced by *collectors, who had served under that gentleman; who were not only the active instruments by which he was enabled to carry his arrangements into effect; but by whose talents and local knowledge, he was most materially aided, in devising a system of revenue administration for the country under his charge.

It was by means of the mode of collection to which the Committee have thus particularly referred, sanctioned as it appears by the ancient Hindoo practice; which Colonel Read had the merit of establishing in the districts originally placed under his superintendence; and which was in almost every instance, progressively carried into effect in the other parts of the Company's modern possessions on the coast, as they became subject to the British authority; either by those who had acted under that collector as his assistants, or by such as were afterwards trained and instructed in the business of revenue management by those assistants, when they were themselves appointed to collectorships; that a body of information has been collected, with respect to the resources and value of the lands, and of the actual situation of those connected with the soil, far more accurate and minute than had ever before been obtained in regard to any of the Company's possessions in the East, or than it appears to your Committee practicable to acquire in any Indian country, without those facilities peculiar to this system.

For the better information of the House, as to the manner in which the ryot-war settlement of a district is conducted, from its first stage of progress to its ultimate conclusion, the Committee have inserted in the Appendix to this Report, a communication on that subject, which was delivered into the Madras government in the year 1806, by Lieutenant Colonel Thomas Munro, while in charge of the Ceded districts, and which furnishes the clearest explanation of the principles and process according to which this plan of revenue administration is carried on, that is to be found on the records of the Company. It was prepared by Lieutenant Colonel Munro, at the desire of the court of directors. They have added the instructions issued by that collector to his assistants, as to the different modes of forming a ryot-war settlement in the first instance, where a survey valuation of the lands has not been made, and as to the considerations which should guide a collector's judgment, in granting remissions of rent; and also the instructions of Mr. Ravenshaw, the collector of the southern division of Arcot, to the European servants employed under his authority, relating to the subject of conducting a ryot-war settlement, which, though not so full and particular as the communications of Lieutenant Colonel Munro, are considered to be documents proper to be laid before the House, as illustrative of general principles. There will also be found under the same head of the Appendix, Extracts from some of the Reports of the collectors, explanatory of the surveys and assessments of the districts, to which your Committee have referred, as forming the basis of the ryot-war rents.

A mode of collection, so detailed in its principles as that which the Committee have described, must necessarily be in its commencement a difficult and troublesome undertaking; but when once the survey-rent is accomplished, and has been adjusted by the information and experience afterwards acquired on the occasions which annually occurred of making the settlements; and by the aid it receives from a variety of other co-operating causes, among which the assistance of the inhabitants themselves is not the least important, it becomes a less arduous and comparatively simple operation, the success of which principally and almost wholly depends on an active, uniform and unrelaxed exercise of superintendence and personal controul and inspection on the part of the collectors, over the different gradations of public servants employed under their authority; in seeing that those servants do their duty; not in attempting to do it for them. Very fortunately, all the gentlemen selected by Lord Cornwallis to serve with Colonel Read, were highly qualified in all the attainments and talents required for this unceasing labour. A practical knowledge of languages, pure intentions, clear understanding, and active habits of body and mind, were all indispensable to make the ryots feel the pervading care and vigilance of a collector, under such a system. All these qualities, were eminently possessed by Colonel Munro, Captains Macleod and Graham, and by Mr. Hurdie, who was appointed by Lord Hobart.

It appears to the Committee, from the examinations which they have made into the effects of the ryot-war principle of settlement, throughout the modern possessions of the Company under the Madras presidency, that it has greatly improved the situation of the cultivator, by limiting the bounds of the public assessment, and adjusting the actual demand on each person subject to such assessment, according to his ability to satisfy satisfy it; by relieving him from the oppressive exactions of the native revenue officers, and securing him in the protection of his property and rights. So favourable a change in their condition, has necessarily excited a confidence among the ryots, in the equity and justice of the Company's government; and this confidence, has derived material strength, from having periodically and frequently opened to them, a ready and direct channel of communication and intercourse with the immediate representatives of government, on all matters connected with their interests and grievances; which has had the effect of binding them, as it were to it, and of rendering them the real instead of nominal subjects of the Company; while the natural consequences have been, that the ryots have received a new incentive to industry, cultivation has been gradually extended, by which an augmentation of the public revenue has been yielded, without an increase of assessment.

Of the beneficial effects of a ryot-war settlement, in advancing the welfare and prosperity of a country, and in augmenting the revenues of the state when judiciously and ably conducted, the records of the Company furnish a very striking instance, which the Committee deem it proper to bring under the notice of the House. The Ceded districts were obtained by the Company in 1800, and were placed under Lieutenant-Colonel Thomas Munro. This very extensive tract of country, which including the tributary district of Kurnoul, is larger than Scotland, and which is considered to contain a population of about two millions, had been sunk to the lowest point of declension, by a weak and improvident government. The value at which it was ceded was 16,51,545 star pagodas, including all heads of revenue. The collector, in the first instance, fixed his rents at a rate, much below what had been the former demand, encouraging it only as the means of the ryot, and the improving state of the country, enabled him safely to do. He returned to England at the end of the year 1807, having been upwards of seven years in the charge of the districts. During this period, the land revenues had increased from 10,06,593 pagodas to 15,17,272; having in one year (1805-6), in which the season was extraordinarily favorable, exceeded that amount, in considerably more than a lac of S. pagodas. The whole amount realized within that period, and up to the conclusion of the revenue year 1807-8, including the other branches of revenue, was no less than 1,19,90,419 star pagodas, with a remission on the whole, of no more than 3,415 pagodas, or 1 fanam 22 cash per cent. It was recorded, by the acting governor, on the resignation of Lieutenant Colonel Munro, (and the good effects of his administration is represented, in equally strong terms by the board of revenue,) that "the inhabitants, from disunited hordes of lawless freebooters, had become as far advanced in civilization, submission to the laws, and obedience to the magistrates, as any of the subjects under the Madras government: that every one, seemed satisfied with his situation; and that the regret of the people was universal, on the departure of the principal collector." It was also stated by the principal collector himself, on that occasion, that "if no alteration was attempted, the Ceded districts would yield, one year with another, about 18 lacs of pagodas: and that it would never be necessary to call out a single sepoy to support the collections." In the following year, 1808-9, the total collections amounted to no less than S' pag' 18,02,570: of which sum S' pag' 16,60,908 consisted of land revenue only.

The province of Malabar, into which the same principle of revenue settlement has been of late years introduced, was, on its coming into the possession of the Company in 1792, annexed to the presidency of Bombay, as your Committee have already stated. It was found to labour under all the evils that could be inflicted on it, by the hand of oppression and injustice; and the administration of its affairs, while it continued under the Bombay government, was by no means calculated to improve its condition. Malabar, on its invasion and conquest by Hyder Ally, was governed by a race of rajahs exercising in their respective districts, an authority nearly independent. The land was mostly in the possession of the nairs, a description of Hindoos, were subjected, during the Mahomeddan rule of Hyder and Tippoo Saib, but more particularly during the reign of the latter, obliged them to seek refuge in other countries, from whence they waged war with their oppressors. The power and authority which they had possessed in the country, were conferred on the mopillas, a people who professed the Mahomeddan faith, and who appear to have come from Arabia, and had conducted the trade with the Red Sea from the most ancient times. On them, all the confidence of the prince was bestowed; and they became throughout Malabar, the officers and instruments of government. On the breaking out of the war between the Company and Tippoo Saib, in 1790; the rajahs, the nairs and other Hindoos, who were not included in the lower orders, were either leading a predatory predatory life in the Jungles, or were living in Travancore. They were then allowed to join the British army; as those who, in avenging their own injuries, might prove useful allies. It appears, however, that their services, had they been able to afford any, were not necessary, as the war was terminated without their assistance, by the battle of Travancore, where none of them were present. One of the first acts of the Bombay government was, to reinstate the rajahs and nairs on their former footing, and to divide the province into three districts, which were placed under the charge of three Company's servants, a supervisor and two superintendents; by whom an annual settlement of the revenues was formed with the rajahs and nairs. The next settlement, which was for the same term, was formed by commissioners, who had been appointed to superintend the affairs of the province. The settlement which followed, was for the period of five years; but the failure of the rajahs in their engagements, obliged the government at different times to assume the collection of the revenues, before the expiration of the leases in 1799. The three settlements thus successively made, were for a very inadequate revenue; and large balances had accrued. They were founded on no better data, than fabricated estimates, prepared by native interpreters, acting in conjunction with the servants of the rajahs and nairs.

In 1799, the offices of superintendent were abolished; and the province was formed into twelve circles or collectorates, to which Company's servants were appointed. The office of supervisor had been previously discontinued, on the appointment of joint commissioners from Bengal and Bombay, in lieu of the former commissioners appointed by the Bombay government. The duties of the commissioners extended to a general controul over every department connected with the civil administration of the province; in the exercise of which, they were guided by certain regulations, and by instructions subsequently furnished by the supreme government at Calcutta. The regulations here referred to, provided for the civil and criminal administration of justice, and were similar to those of the Bengal government, antecedent to the year 1793.

The rajahs who had been re-established by the Company's government, on the acquisition of the province, knew of no other system of managing its affairs, than that which they had themselves formerly exercised or witnessed, under the reigns of Hyder and Tippoo. Hence it was, that the unjust and oppressive principles of the former governments, were continued; while the feudal institutions of military service were revived; and an influence and power was thus brought again into action, that were independent, as it were, of the ruling authority; and which came to be employed, in resisting it. Nearly the whole of the rajahs and nairs who were leagued together, having forfeited their lands under the quinquennial settlements, afterwards hoisted the standard of rebellion, by which a great part of the country was thrown into a state of internal disturbance, which could be subdued only by a military force. There was also too much reason to apprehend, that the form of government, both revenue and judicial, which had been adopted, did not accord with the feelings and prejudices of the people, nor with the circumstances of the country.

In this state of things, the Bengal government issued instructions in the early part of 1800, to the Bombay government, to transfer the province to the charge of the Madras presidency; directions being at the same time given to that presidency, for the better establishment of order and good government therein. The transfer took place in June of the same year. The first measure adopted by Lord Clive, was to call upon the local authorities in the province, for information respecting its concerns, and the modes in which the revenues and the administration of justice were then carried on.

This information having been obtained from the commissioners and the collectors in the districts, Lord Clive in September 1801, recorded a separate minute; in which he considered, first, the extent of the authority of the Company, as established in Malabar; and secondly, the nature of the government, which had been introduced for the administration of its affairs.

He observed, "that the plan of civil government introduced into Malabar, at the time that province was transferred to the management of the Company, was founded upon the labours of the first commissioners appointed for the affairs of

"Malabar; that, debarred by their local residence, from the means of obtaining authentic information, they supplied the defect with elaborate descriptions of a speculative nature, and with hypothetical propositions of improvement, founded on the information of their native interpreters; and of the interested servants of the native rajahs; that the form of government founded on those arrangements, was administered under the authority of a supervisor, and of two superintendents; that the form thus established, resembled that of the provincial councils in Bengal, and in the Northern circars, with the addition of a system of judicature in some respects similar to that, which had been introduced into the territories of Bengal; that the prostitution of the public authority under that form of government, to purposes of fraud, peculation, and corruption, required a modification of it; and that an arrangement had been accordingly made for executing the office of supervisor by means of a commission; and that at a subsequent period, subordinate collectors were appointed, subject to the controul and authority of the commission for the administration of the revenues; that the means of appointing local collectors, if it had been established on proper principles, was calculated to have removed the errors of the system, under the administration of a commission; but that the collectors of Malabar appeared to have been precluded from the primary objects of their duty, and to have been limited to the execution of the orders of the commission; that independently of this fundamental objection, the appointment of those officers appeared to have been too recent, to admit of the acquisition of useful knowledge from authentic sources; and that it was accordingly observable in their reports, that the public revenue had been determined, and was then collected, on information derived from the reports of canongoes, confirmed by the commissioners; that it was not surprising that the annexation of Malabar to the government of Bombay should have produced erroneous opinions, with respect to the mode of governing that province; that the distance from the seat of government, the extent of territory compared with the former possessions subject to that presidency, and the general inexperience of the servants of that establishment, with regard to the administration of revenue, all conspired to augment the imaginary importance of Malabar; and that accordingly, that province, which under more auspicious circumstances, would have been subjected to the superintendence of one or two collectors at little expense to the state, had been erected into a distinct government, with the attendant train of financial, commercial, and even political considerations; that this plan of administration was accompanied with a proportional rate of expense, for that while the civil disbursements of the past year exceeded fifty-four per cent. of the revenue, the military establishments remained under the government of Bombay, rendered that province a burthensome incumbrance to the general finances of the Company."—He further observed, "That the fear of exercising, and the subsequent failure in the attempt to exercise the power of government, had reduced the local administration to the lowest degree of estimation in the minds of the native inhabitants; that the collection of the public revenue depended more on the sufferance, than the obedience of our subjects; that the administration of police was rendered abortive, by the fear entertained of a ferocious banditti; and the apprehension of provoking the resentment of the offenders, rendered it dangerous to enforce the sentence of our criminal courts."

Under these circumstances, Lord Clive considered, that the system of government which had existed in Malabar, had proved incapable of asserting and maintaining the supremacy of the British power; either as relating to the realization of the revenues, or to the enforcement of the sentences passed by the criminal courts; and he proposed, 1st, That the commission should be dissolved: 2d, That the functions of the criminal court should be suspended: 3d, That the powers entrusted already to the officer commanding the forces in Malabar, for the purpose of bringing the rebels to trial by summary process, be extended to all cases of a criminal nature: 4th, That for the civil government of the province, one principal collector, and subordinate collectors, be appointed: 5th, That the collector and subordinate collectors continue to administer justice in civil causes, according to the forms then established in Malabar.

These propositions were carried into effect, and the province was committed to the management of one of the military officers who had been engaged in revenue duties in the Barahmahl country; and three subordinate collectors.

Instructions to Major Mac Leod,
dated 14th Sept.

At

At the time this arrangement took place, it would appear from the reports furnished to Lord Clive, and by the former collectors of circles, that the settlement of a few districts or parts of the country, continued to be made with the rajahs and nairs, or nambars, or rather the collections were made by them; they receiving a commission on the revenues. They were, in some parts, required to grant the ryots, muchelkas, or written engagements; but this was little attended to. Several gradations of officers were also appointed to check the misappropriation of the revenues by the rajahs, but without avail. These officers were desired to produce a certain sum within a stipulated period, under pain of being removed from office. This led to the greatest oppressions being committed on the ryots and the rajahs, down to the common kolkars or peons, employed under the head native officers and assistants; all derived their unauthorized advantages, at the expense of both government and the ryots.

In the greater part of the country, owing to the general failure in their payments under the quinquennial lease, the rajahs, with whom nearly all the settlements were made on the principle above explained, were allowed their malikana or 20 per cent. on the net collections; and the settlements were made partly with the landholders or proprietors of the soil, (for most of the lands in Malabar, as will be hereafter explained, were the private property of individuals), and partly with the khudians or cultivators. In the latter case, that is, where the lands were in the occupation of tenants, generally as persons to whom they had been mortgaged, the tenants, before they settled with the government officers, paid to their landholders, who were either rajahs, nairs, nambouries, or potalies, or managers of temples, one fifth of the revenues, after deducting the interest on the mortgage of the lands, if they were mortgaged; for which payment, they produced the receipt of the landlord to the Company's collector.

The system of revenue management, which the collector was instructed to adopt, was that of ryot-war settlements, conducted in the mode in which they were then carrying into effect, by Lieutenant Colonel Munro, in the Ceded districts. It is still adhered to; and though rebellion and civil disturbances continued to prevail in the province, for several years after it was transferred to the presidency of Fort St. George, the revenues have nevertheless gone on increasing in their amount, and have been collected with extraordinary facility. The great improvement which has taken place in the affairs of this province, exhibiting, as it now does, a state of perfect tranquillity and growing opulence, would appear in a great degree, to be attributed to the judicious local arrangements of Mr. Warden, the collector, who was appointed to that important situation in the year 1803-4, and still continues to discharge the duties of it.

The only countries besides Malabar, of the revenue management, of which it is deemed necessary to make any separate mention under this head of the report, is that of Tanjore, and that part of the Tinnevely country, not in the hands of the Poligars.

In Tanjore, the revenues were realized under the former government, partly by a division of the crop, and partly by a grain rent or monied commutation of the produce, and partly by a fixed rent in specie; each rent settlement combined more than the interest of one village, and did not descend to an engagement with each individual. In later years, a new class of persons was introduced, between the government and the head ryots, called puttuckdars; under whose superintendence, the lands were gradually placed; but, at no period, were they employed over the whole province. The number of villages included in the rent of a puttuckhary, varied from 128 to 1. They appear to have acted in the character of zemindarry farmers. Where they had not been established, the modes of collection before described, continued in practice. On the province being transferred to the British government, the puttuckdars were removed, on account of their oppressions on the inhabitants, and of their standing in the way of a full investigation of the revenues of the country. It was not till 1804, that the principle of ryot-war rents was extended to this province; the rents being fixed with reference to the produce on an average number of years only, and not, as in other parts of the country, on a survey valuation of the land also.

Reports of Collectors of Board of Revenue, and Report of Mr. John Hodgson, on the Affairs of Tinnevelly.

In that portion of Tinnevelly, which has been specified, the settlements from local circumstances of a particular kind, arising out of the uncertainty of the seasons, proceeded on the same principles which had regulated the demand of the native government. It was a system, which partook very much of the nature of an amance management. The produce of the paddy lands was divided into fixed proportions, between the cultivator and the government; and of the two principal wet crops, the government share of the first, was sold by its own officers; and of the second, about one-third was also taken by the government, late in the harvest year, often not two months before its expiration. A kind of settlement was formed with the inhabitants; made up of an estimated value of the portion of the latter description of produce left with them, of the fixed rent on dry grain lands, and of the usual taxes on other lands and on professions. In 1805, the fixed money rent on the dry grain land, was regulated by a survey; and it was collected on the ryot-war principle. This measure, as being calculated to annihilate the improper influence and tyrannous exactions of the superior inhabitants, induced them to use every exertion to prevail on the inferior ryots to resist it; but as soon as a few villages were settled, and pottahs delivered, their interested persuasions were disregarded by the other cultivators.

Your Committee have thus brought down the history of the revenue management, in that large portion of the territories under the Madras presidency, to which this branch of their Report professes to relate, to the year 1807; when the whole of it was under ryot-war rents; excepting the part of the Tinnevelly province just noticed, and also the circar lands of Salem and Kistnagherry, or the Baramahl, and the province of Dindigul, which having been divided into separate allotments, were sold to individuals on the terms of a permanent zemindarry tenure, in the years 1803-4-5. The Salem and Kistnagherry districts were formed into 228 estates, and assessed with reference to the average of rents in preceding years, and to the expected additional resources of waste lands. In the ancient possessions of the Company, the calculations on which the permanent rents were founded, were the result of a system of zemindarry or village rents; but in Salem and Kistnagherry, they were formed on the information derived under ryot-war settlements, which had at an early period been introduced, and were continued until the lands were assessed in perpetuity. In some few instances the rents were fixed on the principle of adding 10 per cent. to the jumma of 1801-2. The circar lands of Dindigul, in which were included certain pollams, which had either been declared forfeit, or had reverted to the government on failure of heirs, consisted of 40 estates. The jumma on these estates was determined principally with reference to a ryot-war survey rent on each field, which had been progressively increasing for several years, but had not reached the standard at which it was fixed.

In the years 1807 and 8, the government of Fort St. George, came to the determination of giving up the principle, which had obtained in the lands in which zemindarry settlements in perpetuity had not been established, of collecting the public revenue from each individual cultivator, through the agency of its own servants; and of recurring to the system, which formerly obtained, of village rents.

Before the Committee proceed to describe the nature of this change, and the circumstances which led to it, they think it proper to furnish some information, on several measures of internal arrangement connected with the administration of the land revenues, which chiefly took place during the continuance of the ryot-war settlements; and also with such an account of the landed rights and tenures as they are enabled to afford from the official documents, which have been transmitted to England.

It has been shown, under a former head of this Report, that the officers and servants belonging to each village community, were, from the ancient times of the Hindoos, remunerated partly by a share of the crops of the other inhabitants, called russooms, and partly by grants of land, rent free, called mauniums; and that the pagoda establishments were supported on the same principle; the lands appropriated to them going by the name of eniums. With a view to the simplification of the demand on the ryot, (an object which it has been seen it was one great purpose of a money rent to accomplish) and with a view also to prevent the abuses incident to the mode of collecting the russooms, to which the village officers were entitled; the measure was adopted, adopted, by some of the collectors in the districts under ryot-war rents, of adding the amount of those perquisites to the rent of each cultivator, and to pay from the company's treasury that amount, in its customary proportions, to the respective parties. The eniums to the pagodas appear also, in some parts of the country, to have been incorporated with the other lands of the district; and the rents received by the Company's servants, and accounted for by them to the superintendents of those establishments; an arrangement which, in some instances, also appears to have been adopted with regard to the mauniums of village servants.

Though this arrangement seems calculated to secure the parties in the due receipts of the funds allotted for their support and maintainance, your Committee entertain considerable doubts of its policy, as far as regards the wishes and feelings of the persons whose interests are involved in the measure; who must naturally prefer of the persons whose interests are involved from the land itself, than to have them receiving the advantages they enjoyed from the land itself, than to have them commuted for a stipend in money, liable to be resumed or withheld on any change in the government. The government also, by taking on itself to make the fixed payments in question, was necessarily exposed to a loss on that account, when the lands were unproductive. With respect to the mauniums and russooms of the village officers, they appear to have been of late years restored, and the money payments discontinued; but the pagoda lands still remain, in a state of resumption. A proposition was made, by an intelligent member of the board of revenue, to restore them in like manner to the managers of those institutions. This step was considered an inadvisable one; and they continued to be supported by issues from the treasuries of the collectors. Your Committee have not been able to meet with any documents that explain the reasons for adhering to a practice, which deeply affects the interests, feelings, and the prejudices of the people, without bringing any advantage to the government. By the ancient Hindoo constitution of a village, the ministers of the pagodas, and the servants of the village, had an interest in adhering to, and extending the cultivation, under every change of authority, and in every vicissitude of season, and could bring no charge of neglect against the government, for a deficient culture of their eniums and mauniums. The substitution of a stipendiary payment, throws upon the public servants the whole weight and odium of any such deficiency; and the continually recurring necessity of regulating such stipendiary payments, in consequence of the fluctuating price of grain, cannot fail to add a vast detail of unprofitable labour to those extensive duties, which the collectors have independently to perform. Your Committee are not therefore aware of the expediency of departing from the ancient Hindoo system, of supporting the pagodas of the peninsula, more particularly as they believe, that the discreet regard shown by the Company's servants to the native religious establishments, in the early wars of the Carnatic, as contrasted with the levity of the French, and in later periods of our possession of the country, as compared with the rapacious assumptions of the Mussulman governments, has tended, in a great degree, to establish the name and authority of the British nation in the affections of the people.

It appears that much attention was paid by the collectors to the proper regulation of those taxes, personal and professional, coming under the description of notrerpha; which, under the Mahomeddan governors, by whom they were principally introduced, constituted a branch of the sayer revenue, but under the British administration, were separated from it. These taxes, which were levied on the implements of agriculture, on looms, artificers, casts, houses, cattle, &c. from their variety and undefined nature, were open to great abuse. Such of them as were considered oppressive and indefinite, were abolished by the Company's government; and those which were suffered to continue, were, wherever they could be, united with the land rent, as had been done with respect to the russooms to the pagodas, and village establishments. By the consolidation of this description of demand on the cultivator with their land revenue payments, they are represented to have been relieved from much vexation, by knowing the full extent of what they have to pay to the state, besides being exempted in common with the other classes of society, from those articles of taxation which were found to be oppressive.

Another description of ready money collection, which, in addition to one called saderward, for supplying the catcherry, or village office, with lamps, oil, and stationery, consisted in contributions or benevolences, passing under the name of grana khirch; which were levied to defray the expenses incurred by the potail and his servants in travelling to the district catcherry on the public affairs of the village, and in the execution of other services, as well as for providing for the charges attendant on public rejoicings and marriages. In these collections, which were made under the most fraudulent and frivolous pretences, the district servants generally participated; and they had become an extensive source of abuse and peculation. It was a primary object with the local authorities in the districts under their immediate management, to restrain and regulate this head of expenditure in such a manner, as to prevent its being perverted to improper uses, and being made an engine of clandestine emolument; and their efforts for so necessary a purpose, appear to have been attended with considerable success.

It also appears, that as the enquiries of the collectors became extended to particular objects, those various abuses were brought to light which were connected with irregular and fraudulent alienations of land. Those who held under valid grants, or whose titles were clear, were confirmed in their rights. Those whose possessions were of questionable origin, and had been of long continuance, were in general, allowed to remain in such possession, at a certain rent, more or less, as the land had been free from rent, or favourably assessed. Unauthorized alienations of a more recent date, were either resumed or brought under the regular assessment. From the time that the arrangements were in progress for the establishment of zillah courts, questions of this sort were left to be ultimately decided by those courts.

The scrutinies thus prosecuted, assisted as they were by surveys, and the other means afforded by a ryot-war settlement, tended to augment the public resources; and, though the government was the chief gainer, the increase of revenue which they thus derived, did not enhance the payments of the regular cultivator, nor interfere with the just rights of any party.

IN describing the tenures under which the land is held, and the rights of those connected with it, in that extensive description of the modern possessions, under the government of Fort St. George, which forms the subject of the present head of their Report, the Committee will first draw the attention of the House to those which are found to obtain in the provinces of Canara and Malabar.

The lands in general appear to have constituted a clear private property, more ancient, and probably more perfect, than that of England. The tenure, as well as the transfer, of this property, by descent, sale, gift, and mortgage, is fortified by a series of regular deeds, equally various and curious, and which bear a very strong resemblance, in both parts of the country.

The proprietary right, is either vested in individuals, or in copartnerships of persons, each of whom possesses an unalienable interest in the estate, proportioned to the share of the property of which he has become possessed.

In Canara, the landlords or proprietors are called Nair Mul Guenies; and their lands descend from father to son or from uncle to nephew, according to the law of the inhabitants. Even the non-payment of the dues of government, does not absolutely deprive the nair mul gurney of his proprietary right; for should he abscond to avoid such demand, and the land be transferred to another person; yet if he returns, though at ever so distant a period, he is entitled to be reinstated in his patrimony, on satisfying the claim of government against him, and such expenses as might have been incurred in improving the estate. The same rule is observed, when the property is transferred to a mortgagee, on failure of the proprietor to redeem it, and the former gets possession. The owner can always recover possession on repaying the mortgagee, and reimbursing him for improvements, and the latter is required to account for the proceeds of the estate; what the proceeds are, and what the outlay in improvements, are usually determined by arbitration. The right of the heir to the succession is unimpeached by any crimes or offences, committed by the owner. When property, held under the nair mul gueny tenure, reverted to government on the failure of heirs, it was generally granted to individuals, for the consideration of a few years rent. Many of the estates appear to have been held immediately of the government; but subject to no other condition than that of paying the stipulated fixed rent, the holders enjoying the full power of mortgaging, transferring, selling, and bequeathing them to others. The rents of estates held held under nair mul gueny tenure did not, under the Bijnugger government, on an average exceed 50 pagodas; some were, however, so large, as to amount to pagodas 5,000. The proprietor of the small as well as the large estates had under them, an infinite number of shud mul guenies, or tenants for ever, but who were in fact lesser proprietors, having the same rights, as the nair mul guenies themselves derived from government, being liable only to a fixed rent. These tenures are not the subject of purchase in all cases, though they can be transferred or disposed of by will. If a valuable consideration was paid for the land, that is, if the tenure was purchased, and the mul gurney or tenant at will, is desirous to give it up to the superior proprietor, he can do so, and the latter, is bound to reimburse him for every improvement, besides the amount of the original purchase; and if the mul gurney die without heirs, his lands revert to the superior landlord, on the same principle, that the lands of that superior landlord, become escheated to the government. The fields thus held of the original proprietor generally yielded to him sufficient to enable him to discharge the whole of his payment to the state; the rest, he retained in his own hands, or let out to chalie guenies or tenants at will, on longer or shorter leases; but who sometimes by courtesy, have become tenants in perpetuity. Where this happened, the lands had been in their possession, for several generations. In some cases, however, the right was extended to such, as having been in possession for 50 years, had, with the consent of the nair mul gueny, made extensive improvements, or had brought other lands into cultivation; but in such cases, the nair mul gueny raised the rent; and on the refusal of the tenant removed him from the lands; though such a proceeding, being considered a stretch of power, is said to have been rarely resorted to; and when it was, the occupant was entitled to be reimbursed in full for improvements; as were also mere tenants at will, in the like circumstances.

Chalie guenies or tenants at will, also hold lands under the lesser proprietors, and in every way possess the same right, as the same description of persons, holding under the original landlords.

The rents of the mul guenies and chaley guenies were paid, either in money or a certain quantity of grain; and never by a share of the crop; as in the other parts of the British possessions in the peninsula, where fixed rents existed.

The successor of an original proprietor, on coming into possession of his estate, is obliged, by usage, to keep all engagements made, either with the mul guenies or chalie guenies; nor is any failure on the part of a mul gueny, admitted as a plea for keeping the superior landlord out of his rent.

The province of Canara continued undisturbed, under a Hindoo government, until so late a period as 1763, when it was subdued by Hyder Ally.

An extraordinary attention appears to have been paid to the preservation of the accounts of the curnums; which is ascribed to the great value of land under their Hindoo rulers. These accounts, were not only a register of the public revenue; but of all transfers of land among individuals. They were written in black books, which lasted above a century; and it was the custom to distribute several copies of them, among the different branches of each family. Whenever a book was worn out, a fresh copy of it, was made; and a memorandum usually inserted in the title page, notifying the year in which it had been written, and the date of the original copy. The use of these registers, was interdicted by the Mahomeddan government of Mysore, and many of them were therefore, from negligence or other causes, lost or destroyed. Of these written evidences, sufficient remained, on the transfer of the province to the Company in 1799, to enable Lieutenant Colonel Munro, to whom the administration of the public revenues was entrusted, aided by information which he collected from other sources, in the course of his active and very judicious enquiries, to furnish the abstract of a series of records of the land assessment, commencing with the æra of one formed by Hurry Roy, a rajah of the Bijnugger dynasty, between the years 1334 and 1347, and terminating with the reign of Tippoo Saheb; thus tracing the several changes which it had undergone, for a period of 400 years.

It appears, from the intelligent and able report of that officer, that the public tax on the land, which was assessed at fixed money rates, with reference to the quantity of rice equal to the quantity supposed to be necessary to sow it, remained fixed for two centuries and a half, under the Bijnugger government, and amounted to less than a fourth of the gross produce; and that for more than a century afterwards, under the Bednore government, the augmentation made to it, hardly amounted to ten per cent. which still left to the inhabitants, a larger proportion of the produce, than was enjoyed, under any other native government in India: but that the increase which that assessment underwent at different times, during the Mahomedan government of Mysore, was so great, and the exactions of its officers so severe, as to have, in some degree, annihilated the old proprietors, and diminished the quality, though it did not alter the nature of the property. The landlords had so little rent left to them, after rendering their public dues, as to be mostly unable to subsist upon it; and were driven for a maintenance to the necessity of managing instead of diminishing, the attachment of the proprietor to what remained: he never quitted the estate of his ancestors, so long as he could live upon it, though even in the capacity of a labourer: and if, after paying the government tax, or after resuming what was due to himself for his labour, there was left the most trifling surplus, he would as soon have parted with his life as with his estate; nor failed to contest the title to it, as obstinately, as at any former period.

From the causes to which the Committee have adverted, and from the population of the country having been, within 40 years, reduced one-third in consequence of wars and internal feuds, the destruction of many principal towns by Tippoo Sahib, and to his sending upwards of 60,000 Christian inhabitants into captivity in Mysore, from whence, but a small part ever returned; it was found, on the Company's becoming possessed of the province, that large tracts consisted of unclaimed waste, particularly in the vicinity of the Ghauts, where they were overgrown with wood. In other parts of the country, the land sold from eight to sixteen years purchase of the tax paid to the government on account of it; but in general, those estates that were saleable, were reduced to a very small proportion, and were situated chiefly between the Cundepore and Chundegherry rivers, and within five or six miles of the sea.

The reduction which was made in the public assessment by the British collector, and the general confidence with which his measures inspired the inhabitants, appears to have led to the revival of an infinite variety of claims to the possession of land, by those, who had either abandoned the occupation of it, or were sunk to the condition of tenants or labourers. It is stated, by Lieutenant Colonel Munro, on this subject, that "the accumulated suits of half a century appeared to have broken loose at once; and that every moment which he could spare from his ordinary business, had been given up to the hearing of them, without having sensibly reduced their number." Such appears to have been the pressure of taxation on the land, and the insecurity of this kind of property under the former government, that there were but few landlords, who were disposed to avow the full extent of their estates. A part of their lands was therefore held in the name, either of some opulent and powerful relation, of a revenue servant, or of a pagoda.

At an early period of the British administration, it appears, that the share of the produce received by the landlords as rent, was about fifteen per cent. and that which belonged to the tenant, 57 or 58 per cent. leaving the remainder, about twenty-four per cent. as the land tax or public demand; but that in some places, the landlords enjoyed from 60 to 70 per cent. of their net rent, while the tenants also received a larger proportion of the gross produce. These inequalities were however done away in subsequent years, by a progressive scale of advance in the assessment on those estates which were underrated, and by lowering the demand on those on which it was too heavy; so as to fix and settle the land tax, as far as circumstances would admit of it, at an equitable standard. The rent at present received by proprietors from fixed tenants and tenants at will, is estimated to be between $\frac{1}{4}$ and $\frac{1}{2}$ of the produce in some cases, but to be generally about $\frac{1}{4}$; the government tax being, in the latter case, about $\frac{1}{4}$ or 60 per cent. of the landlords rent, and 30 per cent. of the gross produce. By the operation of this fixed and moderate tax, by discoveries of concealed cultivation, and other clandestine advantages which were enjoyed by individuals, to the injury of the public revenue, and which were brought to light under the Ryot war settlement, and by the extension of agricultural labours, it appears that, at the expiration of the year 1807-8, including a period of nine years since since the province was obtained, an aggregate increase had taken place in the collections, amounting to S. Pagodas 8,13,901. 21. 68. $\frac{1}{2}$; in which was included the receipts from other heads of revenue, independent of the land tax, and exhibiting an average increase of S. Pagodas 1,01,757. 50. 68 $\frac{1}{2}$.† Satisfaction prevailed throughout the country; a common improvement was exhibited among the people, in dress, living, and other personal comforts; and the revenues were realized with singular punctuality, notwithstanding the number of estates from which they were collected, which from the natural division and subdivision of property under the Hindoo laws, amounted in one division only of the province, soon after the acquisition of it, to upwards of 22,000, some of which yielded only one fanam rent.

In Malabar, where private property has also existed from the most ancient times, it is distinguished by the word Jumnum, signifying birthright. The forms of mortgage, of temporary transfer, and conditional possession, which are necessary to be gone through, before a deed of complete sale, and unlimited alienation of the land from its owner can be effected; are of a similar kind, to those described to prevail in Canara, and evince as strong an attachment to such property, and reluctance to part with it. The jumnum lands become forfeited by acts of treason to the sovereign; to whom it also becomes an escheat, in the event of the proprietor or Jelmkar, as he is called, dying intestate, and without heirs; but it is seldom that land falls into the government from the latter cause, as the jelmkar has the right of adoption, and of devising his property to whom he pleases.

The modes by which an estate is either temporarily or absolutely transferred from one person to another, have in most cases a reference to mortgage. By Kyoodooth, it is pledged and delivered over to the mortgagee; the jelmkar receiving from the former two thirds of the produce or rent of the estate; but retaining a certain interest in the land itself, which is said to be about one third of the whole value of it; and it is not until he alienates this remaining interest, that he loses the character of proprietor. Fixed rules are established for the adjustment of rent and interest between the parties, and for the redemption of the land, on the repayment of the sum received by the proprietor.

There are two other modes of transferring land, the one termed Otti, and the other Otty Koolly Kanum; which vary little from the former species of contract, except in name, and in some trifling respects as to the particular forms to be observed for the redemption of the land. In all cases, the mortgagee, or temporary tenant in possession, accounts to the proprietor for the surplus of rent above the interest which accrues, which he is intitled to, under his mortgage.

If the jelmkar is unable to pay off the original mortgage, or from misfortune, or from any other cause, desires to raise an additional loan on the security of his estate, he executes another form of deed, called Otti Kempoonum; on which the mortgagee advances the loan. The amount is regulated on a certain proportion of the whole value of the land; and the proprietor gives up to the mortgagee, a further proportionate interest in the estate. The second advance is generally supposed to be so great, that the whole rent is not much more than sufficient to discharge the interest on the sums for which the land is pledged.

If, however, the jelmkar should require a further advance of money, he executes the contracts, termed Ner Moodut and Jelmam Ponunjam; under which he receives a further per centage on the whole value of the estate, and alienates so much more of his interest in it. When he is driven to the necessity of this step, his remaining interest in the property has become so very faint, that he has nothing left him, but a handful of rice or a measure of ghee, as an acknowledgement of his title; and the prospect is nearly shut out, of his ever being able to redeem his property. In some parts of the Province, the option of redemption is, in the mortgagee: in others, it is in the jelmkar, who recovers possession on paying a fine, and on returning to the mortgagee the sums advanced to him on the security of the estate.

There is another contract termed Koodimaner; which is executed in cases where the mortgagee has been long in possession, and has the power of refusing to allow the the landlord to redeem his property. The effect of it, is to convert the tenure, by

The deed by which a jelmkar absolutely transfers his property to another, is termed Quiper; and before the instrument can be executed, it is in most places required that the preceding descriptions of engagement should be entered into between the parties; and they are frequently concluded at the same time, as the Quiper

There are several descriptions of tenure, by which the Jumum lands are conveyed by the proprietor in leasehold.

According to the tenure of Kanum patum, the proprietor receives from the tenant, in addition to his rent, an advance of money, which may be considered either as a loan, or as a security for the due payment of the rent; of which the tenant retains so much, as will discharge his claim of interest on the sum advanced, and delivers over what remains to the proprietor. It is under this kind of tenure, that a mortgagee gets possession of land. Under the Ponyam patum tenure, which is described as somewhat similar to the former one, the rent and interest of the sum advanced by the tenant, are rendered security for each other.

Lands are also leased out on the principle of calculating the rent for a certain number of years; and the sum to which it amounts, is advanced by the tenant, who has the land made over to him, for as many years as will enable him to repay himself.

By another mode of renting lands, termed Kay Kamum Patum, meaning tenure of labour or usufructuary tenure the jelmkar conveys a spot of land to a person, who undertakes to fence it with mud walls, and plant it with productive trees; and he is ensured in the possession of it for a specified period, generally 12 years, free from all charges. At the expiration of the lease, the jelmkar has the right of resuming the land, on paying the lessee for the buildings he may have erected, or the wells he may have dug, as well as for the plantations he may have formed, according to an appraisement; but the resumption of this tenure is rarely enforced by the jelmkar when the land has been properly cultivated; the tenant being commonly allowed to continue in possession, at any easy rate of rent. The buildings and plantations are in fact the property of the tenant; and he can mortgage or sell them, in the same manner, as the jelmkar mortgages and sells his own property in the land.

The land tax is, in some cases, paid by the jelmkar; and in others, by the tenant or the mortgagee in possession.

The last description of leasehold tenure, which it is deemed necessary to specify, is the Patum or Warrum Patum, or simple lease: the rent being annual, or for a definite term; the renter retaining to himself all the produce, after paying such

The deeds of mortgage, of transfer, and of lease, are drawn out in a peculiar character, which may be termed the black letter of Malabar.

This province continued, as did Canara, under the rule of its ancient rajahs until the middle of the last century, when it fell a conquest to the arms of Hyder Ally.

It was represented by the natives, that previously to that period, the lands were not subject to any assessment; and although no positive evidence has been adduced to disprove this fact, it seemed to be negatived by tradition and general belief. It is concluded, that the proprietors of them must, at all events, have been liable to occasional contributions in time of war and invasion, bound as they appear to have been, to military service; and if they paid a regular assessment, it must have been a very low one; for a militia was the only army which the rajahs maintained, and they do not appear to have kept up any other establishment of an expensive kind. They had lands of their own, which must have yielded them a considerable revenue, in addition to what they derived from fines, royalties, imposts, and personal taxes. From the time however that the province became subjected to the tyrannical and rapacious domination of the Mysorean sovereigns, it shared the same fate as the neighbouring country country of Canara. The military power of those sovereigns was exerted to extinguish the authority of its rajahs, and establish throughout Malabar the same system of revenue, which prevailed in the other parts of their territories. Assessment was superadded to assessment, which, with the private exactions of the officers of the government, had very considerably reduced the value of landed property, and in many places, had altogether destroyed it. In the northern districts, it appears to have suffered, in a much less degree, from the oppressions of that dynasty. This probably arose from the natural strength of the country along the Ghauts which, being less accessible, was never completely subdued, either by Hyder Ally or Tippoo Saheb; nor did the British government succeed in establishing its authority, until within a recent period, although the province came into its possession in the year 1792. In those districts which were situated to the southward, and where the more unlimited violence of conquest and despotism had in numerous instances left little more than the traces of private property in the soil, the country was open: an army could more easily act, in carrying into effect the orders of the governing power, and the inhabitants were less capable of making a resistance to the execution of its mandates.

On the transfer of the province to the government of Fort St. George, in 1800, the rates of assessment on the taxable products of the soil, underwent a revision; and it was then supposed that the land tax was less than 1-3d of the gross produce. Those rates were however soon afterwards superseded, as being disagreeable to the inhabitants, from their inequality, but particularly from the rates of exchange at which the produce was converted into money; and a recurrence was had to the principles of assessment, which were adopted by the Bombay commissioners in 1800-1, and which still continue in force.

In the southern districts, the land tax is stated to be in the aggregate about 80 per cent. of the landlord's rent; and in the northern districts, to be about 50 per cent.

But in this statement the accounts of seed and produce were considered to be false.

The price at which land is disposed of, necessarily varies according to its quality, and the amount at which it is taxed. The most valuable will sell for 20 years purchase.

It appears, that about the period that the existing assessment was adopted, the collector had proposed another scale of rates; which received the sanction of the Madras government: but the adoption of it was deferred, till the complete suppression of the rebellion, which then existed in the country, should prevent the measure from being ascribed to wrong motives. By this intended scale of land tax, the government were to receive 6-10ths of the patum or landlord's rent from paddy lands, 1-3d from beetle nut trees, one-half from jack trees, and 1-6th from pepper vines.

Though good order has been re-established in the province for several years, these rates have not been carried into effect.

The Committee have, in a foregoing part of this branch of their Report, had occasion to notice the rapid improvement which has taken place in Malabar, since its annexation to the presidency of Fort St. George; and the considerable increase of revenue which it has, within that short period, yielded under a low rate of taxation, collected and duly administered on the ryot-war system.

GEORGE. Your Committee have also endeavoured, from such means of information as the official records of the East India company afford, to ascertain the landed tenures and rights in the other parts of the modern possessions under the presidency of Fort St. George; and they find them to be of the same kind and description, as those which were described by Mr. Place, as obtaining in the Jaghire.

The ryots, who are immediately connected with the soil, if those be excepted who are employed as labourers, or attached to the land as slaves, may be reduced to two denominations, Meerassadars, and Pyacarrics or Paracoodies.

Though the Meerassadars appear for some years to have been regarded in the light of fixed cultivators only, with an hereditary right of occupancy, so long as they paid the dues of government; more particular enquiry seems to have established the fact, that they possess a real property in the land, having the right of mortgaging, selling, and otherwise disposing of it; and that this right they have always, and do still exercise. The lands held under this tenure, are of course of greater or less extent; sometimes, comprehending a whole village or more, but generally, part of a village only. A meerassadee portion of land would, under the operation of the Hindoo law, (by which property descends equally to all the male children of a family, and by which the adoption of children is admitted,) be reduced, by the divisions and sub-divisions of it, that would constantly take place, to estates or rather scraps of land, of so small and minute a kind, were each individual to assume the part of it, which under that law he succeeded to, as to be of little or no value to the owners of them, and quite insufficient to afford them a subsistence, were they to cultivate them on their own account, unless they happened to possess other land in the vicinity. For the purpose of avoiding this inconvenience, it is the general practice throughout the peninsula, to preserve the original property in its entirety as long as possible, by letting it stand in the names of those who have the principal shares, in it; to whom it is left to manage it, for the common benefit of all interested; each person receiving his proportion of whatever it yields of grain, and in like manner bearing his proportion of loss, according to the extent of his interest in the meerassadee; thus preserving a union and copartnership, which continues through several generations; a part of the proprietors attending to and cultivating their inheritance, and the rest of them, being at liberty to seek and follow other occupations. The principal sharers, who nominally appear in the village accounts as the owners, are answerable for the payment of the public demand on the whole land. When an entire village is held under the meerassadee tenure, it is common for a new distribution of the lands to take place at stated periods, by the drawing of lots; and this custom appears to obtain where the meerassadee constitutes but part of a village. In these cases, no part of the meerassadee is the permanent property of any particular individual; the land belonging to the whole body of meerassadars connected with it. Before therefore a meerassadar can mortgage, sell, or bequeath his interest, in this common property to another, the consent of the other meerassadars is necessary, to the validity of the transaction.

The term meerassadee, by which this species of property is distinguished, was introduced by the Mahomeddars; and since the establishment of their authority, the word has become familiar to all ranks. Among the Bramins, it generally goes by the Sanscrit term of swastram; and by that of canatchy among those shudras, or cultivating classes of inhabitants, who may not have adopted the general term meerassadee.

The value of this right of property necessarily depends on its kind; with reference to the sort of produce which it was calculated to yield, and with reference to its local situation, as distant or contiguous to a village or market; on the comparative quantity of arable land uncultivated in a district; and on the amount of the public demand upon the particular land.

In the poorest kind of soil producing dry grain culture, the ryots appear to have little more interest in it, than that of being hereditary cultivators. It is in the paddy or wet lands called munjah, that the right of meerassadee is found to obtain, in a more or less perfect form. Where the demand of government was so high as to have absorbed nearly the whole of the landlord's rent, that is, the whole produce, after deducting the expenses of cultivation, and what was necessary as subsistence to the owner; the land naturally ceased to be, either a mortgageable or saleable commodity; but even in this case, if the meerassadar did not cultivate the land himself, but permitted another to do so, he was entitled to receive from the cultivator a russoom or quit rent, in acknowledgement of his proprietary right, termed sawmy bogum.

The

II. FORT ST. GEORGE. LANDED TENURES. The provinces which form the northernmost of the East India company's modern possessions in the Peninsula, and which consist of the districts ceded by the Nizam, and the districts of Salem and Kistnagherry, were brought under the settled and tyrannic rule of the Mahomeddars, at a much earlier period, than the more southern parts, and had long been the seat of revolutions antecedent thereto. The produce of the soil also consisted principally in punjah, or dry grain culture; and the quantity of arable waste land exceeds the quantity of land in cultivation. Hence it appears, that in those districts, the existence of private property in the soil, had become nearly altogether destroyed, because not worth preserving; and even the remembrance of it, obliterated. The fields, which constitute a saleable and transferable property, are chiefly those in which wells have been dug by the owners, for the purposes of irrigation. The price for which this property will sell, depends, not on the extent of the field, but on the nature and productive powers of the well; for that part of the field which cannot be watered from the well, is comparatively of no more value than any other dry grain land.

It is in the southern provinces of the Peninsula, which are situated below the Ghauts, and which, from their local position with relation to that formidable barrier, and the greater heat of the climate, were last invaded by the northern conquerors, and in which therefore primitive institutions and rights have undergone less change, that the tenures which have been described, were found to exist, in a less impaired state.

In these regions, there was also a considerable quantity of dry grain land; the provinces of Coimbatore and Dindigul being principally composed of such: and although of the fields of that description, those only appear to be saleable that had the advantage of wells, or from particular circumstances of local situation, were rendered particularly desirable; yet, to deprive an individual of any field he had long cultivated, while he continued to pay the rent, had always been considered an act of injustice. The same inhabitants are represented to have peopled the same villages and ploughed the same fields, from time immemorial. The oppressions of Hyder Ally, of Tippoo Saheb, and of the Nabob of the Carnatic, may have produced a temporary emigration; but those who thus deserted their lands, returned to them, from time to time. It also appears, that neither the Hindoo nor Mussulman governments, supposing their rights in the soil as proprietors to be indisputable, ever exercised such a right; that what was fair assessment, and what was exaction, was known to the governing authority, and to those governed. In the province of Tinnevely, the meerassadar is represented to receive as swamy bogum or rent, about 13½ per cent. of the gross produce of his meerassadee, from the tenant or person whom he allows to cultivate it, and who pays out of the remaining produce the dues of government. In the province of Tanjore, which continued under a Hindoo government until it was annexed to the British possessions on the coast, and in which the land tax is less in amount than in any other part of those possessions, except Canara and Malabar, the swamy bogum of the meerassadars is consequently more than in the province of Tinnevely.

Though it does not appear that the right of meerassadee, as it has been here explained, has ever been distinctly and avowedly recognized by the government of Fort St. George, it has been left in the state, in which it was found; and since the establishment of courts of justice, has derived confirmation, from the decisions which have been pronounced, in various cases of disputed property, which have been brought before them by the contending parties; while the value of territorial property, held by the above-mentioned tenure, has increased under the assessments of the Company's government, which excludes all those extra collections from the land to which it was before constantly subject, and confines all demands to the established rent.

Of the pyacarrics or paracoodies, there are two descriptions: The Ool Paracoody is the fixed and permanent tenant of the meerassadar; who resides in the village in which the land is situated. The common Paracoody, is the temporary tenant who is invited by the meerassadar, from a distant or a neighbouring village, to cultivate his meerassadee, under an engagement, for a given period; at the expiration of which, his connection with the land determines, unless renewed by the formation of a new contract. It often happens, from various causes, that a meerassadar is unable, or unwilling unwilling to cultivate his fields. In this case, it has been the practice, for the government, or its managers, to assign the culture of such land to paracoodies of their own nomination: but the right of the meerassadar in the soil, is not impeached by this act arising from his inability; he is still considered as the proprietor, and entitled to his sawmy sagum or rent from the paracoodie in possession, and may return again to the cultivation of his nicerassee lands, whenever he may be able or willing to occupy it.

In those lands, where there are no meerassadars to claim, the ryots may be considered as col paracoodies, holding of the circar; enjoying, as they do, an hereditary right of occupancy, subject to the condition of paying the rents demanded of them.

This right, it has never been the practice either of the Hindoo, or of the Mussulman governments, to take from the poorest cultivator, so long as he remained in obedience to the general authority of the circar, and duly yielded the public share. Indeed it is not to be discovered, in the history of the Hindoos, from the reign of their first princes, until the final downfall of the Hindoo authority, that any of the landed rights, to which your Committee have thus briefly adverted, were ever impeached or destroyed: on the contrary, their uninterrupted existence is proved by numberless records, and by none more distinctly, than by the ordinary form of a deed of sale. The manner in which the ancient landed rights of the natives are affected by the permanent settlement of the British government, demands much more consideration, than it is possible for your Committee now to bestow upon it. The Committee have inserted in the Appendix, some extracts from the reports of the collector, calculated to throw light upon the subject of Ryotwarry Tenures; to which they have added some passages from the reports of Mr. Hodgson of the board of revenue, containing the result of his enquiries on different tours of inspection, on which he had been employed, and which afford much satisfactory and valuable information on the same subject.

Appendix, No 25.

The preceding head of this Report, relates to those possessions obtained since 1792, which are exempt from the control and jurisdiction of zemindars, or as they are termed in the Peninsula, Poligars; and in which the government were free to adopt any mode of revenue administration which appeared to them most expedient.

POLLAM LANDS.

THE Committee have next to bring under the view of the House, the information they have derived from the records of that government, in respect to the state of that portion of territory subject to its authority, which was found in the possession of Poligars; and to the system of policy which has been pursued by the government therein, since the period of its acquisition by the East India company.

The Poligars are military chieftains, of different degrees of power and consequence, who bear a strong affinity to the zemindars of the Northern circars. Their origin may also be traced, to similar events and causes. Those whose pollams are situated in jungly and frontier parts of the country, are represented to have been for the most part, leaders of banditti of free-booters; who, for the preservation of internal order in the country, had been either expressly entrusted with the charge of the police, or had been suffered to take upon themselves, that kind of service. Some of them, derived their descent from the antient rajahs, or from those who had held high offices of trust under the Hindoo governments; whose ancestors had received certain villages in enau, either as a personal allowance from the state, for the support of their rank, or the reward of their services; or partly for those objects, and partly on the feudal principle of supporting a body of horse and foot, which were to be at the call of the sovereign, whenever they might be required. Others, had been renters of districts, or revenue officers who had revolted in times of public disturbance, and had succeeded in usurping possession of lands; to which they were constantly adding by further encroachments on the territorial rights of government or of individuals, during those conjunctures of public affairs, which rendered the ruling authority weak and inefficient. Even potails of villages had by these means, attained the footing of poligar chieftains, though on a smaller scale. In some districts, which were favoured by the natural strength of the country, it appears that this description of people people had generally assumed the character and name of poligars; and though in some cases, their incomes did not exceed a few hundred pagodas, yet they kept up their military retainers, and their nominal officers of state, and were regularly installed with all the forms and ceremonies of a prince of an extensive territory; assuming and exercising, in this contracted sphere, many of the essential powers of sovereignty. It does not appear that any of the poligars, except those of the antient aboriginal stock, had ever been regarded by the different sovereigns, who had governed the country, as holding any independent authority; most of them, therefore, whose military services were not required by the kings of Bijapoor and Golcondah, and afterwards by those at Delhi, were assessed at the full value of their districts, instead of yielding only a small tribute. If they were police officers, and derived advantage from that employment, a proportional addition was made to their rent; and if the profits of it did not defray the charges, a suitable reduction of it was allowed.

In the Mysore country, the turbulent, ambitious, and aggrandizing spirit of these people, their internal feuds and struggles against the sovereign power, appear to have been the occasion of frequent civil wars, in the last century. Some progress indeed, is said to have been made, in the expulsion of them by the nabobs of Cudapah; but neither they, nor the Mahrattas, succeeded in reducing them to obedience, or in securing the regular payment of their tribute. Though the wars in which Hyder Ally, who succeeded the rajahs of Mysore, was engaged, prevented him from destroying their dangerous influence and power; yet he so far accomplished this design, as to drive many of them out of the country. Those also who remained in it, were disabled from disturbing his government, by the policy which he adopted of keeping them near his person. The civil government and police of their pollams were nominally left in their hands, on condition of paying a stipulated peshcush or tribute, and of providing a military force for the service of the state; regulated in both cases, with reference to the extent and value of their lands. The lineal successors of many of the most powerful of them, died in camp, during the last invasion of the Carnatic in 1780. In the early part of the reign of Tippoo Sahib, the poligars were generally expelled, and the revenues of their lands were either rented out to individuals by the officers of the government, or retained under their own immediate management. Some of them, however, contrived through the agency of emissaries, whom they employed for the purpose, to prevail on the aumildars of that prince, to permit them to re-assume the management of their villages, for a participation in the advantages to which they were thus secretly restored.

The foujdars and other military commanders, might have prevented these proceedings; but they were equally corrupt with the aumildars, and not having a sufficient force to protect the country from predatory incursions, were easily prevailed upon to lend themselves to their views.

Hence it was, that a proportion of the pollams, which were officially reported to the government, as under the direct administration of its own servants, were, in fact, in the actual possession of their former rulers; and that the degree of authority which should have been exercised by the aumildars, came at length to depend on the sufferance of those rulers, to whom was often wanting, even a presumptive title to the character which they assumed.

In that extensive part of the country which devolved to the Nizam or Soubah of the Deccan, by the treaties of Mysore and Seringapatam; and which, under the treaty made with that prince on the 12th October 1800, were ceded to the East India Company, the poligars, through the remarkable feebleness of his government and venality of his public servants, had not only got again into possession of their pollams; but were in some cases, allowed to manage the affairs of other villages. Their petty but destructive warfares, were renewed; and they went on, exacting in the most arbitrary manner, contributions from the people, in order to supply the resources necessary to recruit and augment their means of military defence. The expeditions which were sent against them, were not only disastrous in their effects on the country, by depopulating and laying waste large tracts, and exposing the inhabitants, in others, to all the horrors of famine and the ravages of a licentious soldiery; but were often rendered fruitless in their objects, by restoring the poligar to his villages or district, on discharging his arrears of peshcush, and paying a nuzzeranah on account of the expenses of the military operations which had been carried on against him. Though it appears, that their refractory and rebellious conduct towards the government was sometimes produced, by the urgent motive of self-preservation; yet it more frequently arose from a prevalent desire which has always, in a greater or less degree, influenced the poligars, of rendering themselves independent of control, of enlarging the bounds of their possessions, and from the vanity, so conspicuous among them, of maintaining a larger number of armed men than they had the regular means of supporting.

The military peons maintained in the poligar countries of Mysore, have been already stated to have been extremely numerous; and they appear to have been more particularly so, in the districts ceded by the Nizam. This circumstance is ascribed, to that territory having been formerly almost wholly in the hands of the petty poligars, who all maintained their small bands; to its recent conquest by Hyder Ally; and to the practice of that prince and of his son Tippoo Saheb, and more especially the Nizam, of employing large bodies of peons as militia, in addition to those who acted with their armies. These peons, were of a similar description with those maintained by the zemindars in the Northern circars. The first class, consisted of those paid entirely in money, and who had no other means of living, and they were the least numerous; the second class, consisted of those who enjoyed service lands, but who, being composed of farmers who rented other lands, regarded their enaums, as only a secondary object; the third class, were those who confined themselves to the cultivation of their enaums. Each description received batta or pay, when called out beyond the limits of their villages.

The usual allowance of land to a common peon, in the Ceded districts, appears to have been a field valued at six pagodas annual rent; and to the head man, who had parties of 10, 50 or 100, as it might happen, a piece of land of from 9 to 24 pagodas rent. It also appears, that antecedent to the conquest of Hyder Ally, the poligars in general, kept up about 6 kutpuddy peons, for every 100 S. pagodas of gross rent in their respective districts; but as every peon had relations able to bear arms, he was required to bring them into the field in cases of emergency; so that the poligars were enabled, when necessary, to assemble a much larger force than their fixed establishment amounted to.

The police duties exercised by the poligars, were not confined to their own villages; but extended to the protection of the property of the inhabitants and travellers, in the adjoining villages and roads. This extension of authority, had gradually risen in encroachment, and was converted into a pretext, for the most severe oppressions on the people, in the form of fees and ready money collections. Of these perquisites, there appear to have been two kinds, which passed under the general designation of Cavelly, viz; a certain allowance on the land revenues and customs, from villages not included within their own pollams, of from 5 to 10 per cent. and received chiefly by the greater poligars. The proportion which fell on the land, was generally collected, in one payment at the harvest season. If on sending peons to the villages to realize these dues, excuses were made by the inhabitants; some other of the poligar's followers were dispatched, to commit depredations on the village; and if this did not end in the acquittance of his demand, the practice was frequently resorted to, of carrying off the potail and curnum, beating them, and putting them into confinement, until they paid him from their own pocket, what he demanded, and such a fine, as he chose to impose. The other official perquisites which he drew from the customs, were either rented by him to those who leased the land of government, or by stationing his own people at the chokies or toll-houses to receive them. Though he did not regularly enjoy any enau, he had succeeded by violence and other methods, in obtaining a considerable portion of land, which was entered into the village accounts, as being held under this tenure, or as being waste or uncultivated. In the lands thus possessed by him, were often included gardens and other desirable spots belonging to individuals, which he had obliged them to make over to him. His power and influence enabled him to take the lead in the adjustment of differences and disputes, particularly in questions of property and boundaries of land, in which his decision was uncontrolled; for though it was the custom to appoint arbitrators to assist in the determination of the question, the dread of displeasing the poligar, deterred them from expressing an opinion contrary to his own.

Similar perquisites to those above mentioned, were also collected by the inferior or petty poligars, whose jurisdictions did not extend beyond the limits of their respective villages; villages; and in the same arbitrary and unjust manner. They were regularly possessed of enaums, in the circar villages; but to these, they had added by undue alienations.

The Poligars entrusted, as has been described, with the charge of police, were responsible for the loss of all property stolen within their jurisdictions. The allowances which they received, were, in part, intended to furnish them with the means of making good losses of that nature; but this was rarely done by them; while the contributions they levied, though much more than adequate to that purpose, were principally applied to the maintenance of a larger force than they could otherwise have kept up from the resources of their own lands. So imperfectly in fact, did they perform the duties of police, that in those districts, which were immediately under their authority, they and their peons were not only themselves, chiefly concerned; but the further a village was distant from the scene of their influence and operations, the more secure were the properties and persons of its inhabitants from plunder and violence; for there, the ancient institution of the potail, directing and enforcing the vigilance and local knowledge of the hereditary talliar, had its full effect.

But where the influence of the poliga predominated, the most skilful and experienced offenders were to be found; and though suspicion immediately fixed itself on them, whenever an act of robbery was committed, it was difficult to bring it home to the individual, from the dexterity employed by the gang to which he belonged, in eluding a discovery; and from the reluctance which the inhabitants felt in giving information against the party, on account of the severe retaliation to which it was sure to expose them. The numerous petty poligars exercising the duty of cavilgars, appear to have risen in comparatively modern times. They were in fact, for the most part, no other than potails or head men of villages; in which capacity it was left to them, under the ancient system of the Hindoos, to conduct the general affairs of the police within their local boundaries; but the fees and collections which they made in that capacity, were innovations; for the only contributions sanctioned by that system, were such as were applied to the support of the *talliar*s or watchmen, of which there were several in each village municipality; they, like all other public servants on the village establishment, were entitled to their customary rusooms and allotments of rent-free land. But whenever their means of subsistence were wholly or chiefly usurped from them by the poligars, or by any superior cavilgar, the ancient talliar became himself, from want, a plunderer, and a plunderer of the most formidable character, in consequence of the minuteness of his local knowledge, and the nature of his office which had made nocturnal hours and vigilance, the habit of his life.

The course which was pursued by the government of Fort St. George, and the local authorities under their controul, with respect to the poligars in the Ceded districts, and Mysore, appears to have been dictated by considerations of true policy, humanity, and justice. Of the superior poligars, there were some, who having been long deposed, were subsisting on allowances which they received from the former governments. These allowances were either continued to the respective individuals, or they were provided for by territorial grants on enau tenures. Those who were found in the actual possession of their polams, or who had been induced or obliged to retire from the country during the wars with Tippoo Sultaum, or who had joined the standard of that prince, and fought his battles, were, (with the exception of such as, by their contumacious spirit and determined resistance to the authority of the Company's government, had forfeited all claim to indulgence) on an examination of their pretensions, confirmed or reinstated in the possession of their lands, under such regulations as were calculated to render them peaceful and obedient subjects. They were freed from all obligation of military service to the state, and no longer permitted to maintain an armed force, or to exercise any independent authority; to conduct the police, or to levy the fees which they had been accustomed to receive for the exercise of that duty. The peons which they had hitherto kept up were also permitted to continue in the possession of their enaums; and such as could be usefully employed in carrying on the revenue affairs, were engaged in the service of the Collectors.

A similar arrangement was also made, with respect to the cavilgars or petty poligars, who were deprived of all official power, and of all personal emoluments or advantages, except those which accrued from the cultivation of their enau possessions.

- The

The peshcush or tribute, which the great poligars formerly rendered to the government, but which was too often withheld until the payment of it was compelled by the presence of a military force, was converted into a rent receivable by the Company's collectors, which in most instances, was regulated with reference to the resources of the lands, as ascertained by survey, as well as an estimate of the average produce which they yielded; but in some, this rent was adjusted without any survey, on an examination only of the village accounts, and on such other general data as were procurable. In other cases, it was settled at the amount of the peshcush which had been customarily received; but this was in a few pollams only of inferior extent, and under peculiar circumstances as to their local situation. Where a settlement was preceded by a survey (that is, where the survey had not been commenced or completed, for the lands have been mostly surveyed, and entirely so in the Ceded districts) and an investigation of the produce one year with another, the assessment on each ryot, or in other words, the demand to which the poligar was entitled, was adjusted and defined by the collector, as well as the jumma or rent which he was himself to pay to the government. In the Ceded districts, this principle appears to have been particularly adhered to. The rent of each cultivator in a pollam was arranged by the collector; the potails, curnums, and other parties concerned, attending at his cutcherry or office, in the same manner as was the practice in those districts where the ryot-war system was followed; and the poligar was prohibited from taking any part in the formation of the assessment, his authority being limited to the collection of it, of which he retained a per centage for his own use, and the remainder he accounted for to the government. He was also obliged to make ryot-war settlements and to give pottahs to every cultivator. In determining the quantum which was allowed for his support, no other general rule was attended to, but that of not fixing it at a greater amount than was adequate for the purpose; and permitting him to draw a commission upon all future increase of revenue, not exceeding a certain limit. In forming the assessment on the ryots of the extensive pollam of Punganoor, the collector did not at first, descend into greater detail, than to fix the aggregate demand upon each village: but even in this case, the poligar was invested with little more authority than an aumildar. His peons were mustered, and pottahs given to them for their lands in the name of the Company; in the same manner as to the potails for the rents of their respective villages, where they were farmed out to them. For a very valuable and interesting abstract account of the rise and progress of the poligar power in the Ceded districts, your Committee are referred to two documents prepared by Lieutenant Colonel Munro in the year 1802. From these documents it will be seen, when the poligars first arose, what was the condition of their original tenures; at what periods their possessions were extended or contracted, or totally resumed or again recovered.

The public demand on the poligars of Mysore has been, in some instances, fixed in perpetuity: and in those pollams to which this measure has not been extended, it has remained at the same amount, for a greater or less number of years.

The Mysore possessions to which the foregoing remark apply, were obtained by the Company in the years 1792, 1799 and 1800.

The CARNATIC Poligars, whose history, management, and present condition, your Committee now proceed to describe, were transferred to the Company in the year 1792, by a treaty concluded by Lord Cornwallis, with the Nabob of Arcot: but the conditions of that treaty were differently understood by the contracting parties, and therefore, ill calculated to accomplish that reform in the countries which was the object of the British government in the transfer, and which could only flow from an undivided authority.

It seems to have been the early policy of these poligars, to impress upon the servants of the Company, an idea of their importance, as independent chieftains, who had acquired that character, and had enjoyed the rights belonging to it, from the most remote antiquity; but these were fabulous representations, designed for the purpose of giving a form and body to that spirit of pride and ambition, by which they had always been distinguished; while it was established by the well authenticated facts of history, that, like the poligars of Mysore, they were originally no more than officers of police, to whom was committed the protection of a given portion of country: head men of villages or public servants of other descriptions, whose actual condition had become changed to that of military rulers, during those revolutions of power power in the Deccan, which had every where contributed to the usurpation of authority, and in no part more, than in the southern division of the Peninsula. Though their sunnuds, where sunnuds could be produced, did not particularly describe the terms on which they held their pollams, they all bore internal evidence of their dependance on the Emperor, and of their subjection to the soubahdars of the Carnatic, to whom they yielded tribute, and whose camp they were bound to attend, whenever summoned, with a military force proportioned to the extent of their local jurisdictions. The amount of their peshcush was wholly disproportioned to their revenues; but the lowness of its amount, in the struggle to obtain more, by the exaction of nuzzers and fines, was, whilst they continued under the Nabob's government, a perpetual source of violence and distraction. During periods of public calamity, they retaliated upon the Nabob's officers, and upon the peaceable inhabitants of the circar villages, those acts of indefinite and oppressive authority, which were committed on themselves; and hence the British government were repeatedly burdened with large armaments to subdue these feudatories, involving heavy disbursements from the public treasury, and severe loss of lives.

The great object of the treaty of 1792, was to obviate these effects; disgraceful to the character of the Company's government, and destructive of the peace and prosperity of the country.

The defective nature of that treaty, under which the British connection with the pollams in question, was first established, has, on a former occasion, been so fully explained by the papers then laid before the House, that the Committee will here only generally refer to that subject.

The nominal authority of the Nabob in these districts, as preserved to him by the treaty, left open a door for an interference on his part, in the management of affairs. This, he did not fail to exercise; and at an early period, the country became the scene of rival authorities, producing all the evils of a divided government; and precluding the Company from obtaining those advantages from them, which Lord Cornwallis believed had been constitutionally derived from the Nabob of Arcot. But the exact adherence to treaty, on the part of the British government, left to the poligars, the possession of their principalities, on the conditional payment of a tribute, utterly disproportionate to their revenues. The means of super-abundant wealth, which, under the government of the nabobs of Arcot, had enabled the poligars to appease the resentment of the nabobs of Arcot, and to expiate rebellion against the state, by satisfying the rapacity of local officers, became under the British administration, the source of personal aggrandizement and ambition to the poligars. These passions were exhibited in the extent of their military power; in their defiance of the Company's authority, whenever the portion of their army stationed to control them, was, from necessity, diminished; in the cruel warfare and hostilities, which were continually breaking out among them; in their irregularity of payment; and in the grievous oppressions which were inflicted on the inhabitants within the reach of their arbitrary rule. These excessive evils, as described by succeeding collectors, seem strongly to have impressed the court of directors, with the necessity of adopting some decisive steps for the better administration of the country. The measures essentially requisite to this end, were considered to be, the disarming, the poligars, and the placing the country under the controul of one authority.

As early as the year 1795, the court of directors, in a political dispatch to their government abroad, had entered into a very full discussion of the principles of the treaty of 1792, and of the rights acquired by that government, to reform the administration of the poligar possessions. These subjects form the matter of a very interesting report by the Board of Revenue, dated 14 March 1797; and of a minute recorded soon afterwards by Lord Hobart, pointing out to the court of directors the defects of the engagements contracted with the Nabob Mahomed Ally, with respect to the government of those possessions; and suggesting the means of rendering the poligars useful subjects, and obedient tributaries to the British Government.

The answer of the court was transmitted to India in a dispatch of the 5th June 1799; in which, assuming the treaty of 1792 to be the foundation of their interference in the poligar countries, they expressed their agreement with Lord Hobart, that the provisions of it must, in some degree, be the general rule of their conduct; and referring to their former instructions of the 10 June 1795, they insist on the absolute suppression sion of the military power of the poligars, and on the substitution of a pecuniary tribute, more proportionate than the ordinary peshcush to the revenues of their pollams, and more adequate to the public demands for defraying the expenses of general protection and government.

Instructions were, about this time, issued by the government of Fort St. George, to the collectors in the southern and western poligar countries, for obtaining the most accurate information respecting them; and the collectors in consequence reported fully on the military establishments of the poligars; the mode in which they were supported; upon the extent and nature of the revenues of each poligar; upon the various oppressions to which the inhabitants were subjected; and upon the means best adapted to rescue the pollams; and the contiguous provinces, from a state of rebellion and unprofitableness.

Their military dependants were of the same description as those of the poligars of Mysore; and were maintained in the same manner, either by grants of land, or by allowances in money and grain. These, constituted their ordinary means of subsistence; but when embodied, or called out on actual service, they were entitled to batta.

When the assignment was for grain and not for money, which happened in some districts, the peon received the particular quantity stipulated at the market price of the day; but if the poligar, instead of granting a grain assignment, paid the peon the money wages which were due to him in that commodity, it was always at an enormous advance above the market rates.

The power exercised by the poligars of the Carnatic, in regard to police, and the manner in which it was exercised, either to raise revenue or to augment their influence, are particularly explained in one of the reports of Mr. Lushington, collector of poligar peshcush in the southern districts. The information furnished by him on these points, though it relates to those districts only, may be considered in a great degree, as applicable to the western pollams; and will be found also to exhibit the same state of things in those particulars, which has been shown to have existed in the Mysore country, on the establishment of the British authority therein.

When the poligars of Tinnevely were transferred to the Company, they were in the habit of collecting two sorts of fees from the province; as district watchers, and village watchers. The village watching fees were termed tallum cavel: those for watching the districts, desha cavel; exactly corresponding to the munny cavelly, and nayel cavelly, in the Ceded districts and other parts of Mysore.

The former description of fees, as has been already stated, was of much older creation than the poligar influence and authority; being coeval with the establishment of villages, and constituting the fund for the support of the tallars or officers of police. The poligars however had encroached upon, or assumed the rights and privileges of these people, to so great an extent, that, of 2,000 villages in the province of Tinnevely, there were in the year 1799 only 477 with independent officers of that kind, the remainder being under the control of the different poligars, who had superseded the tallars in the discharge of their accustomed duties, by the appointment of their own peons to perform that service; or if they allowed them to retain their situations, it was upon the condition of receiving from them a share of the emoluments attached to the office.

The desha cavel or district watching fees, though not of ancient institution, appear to have had an existence for many years, but was quite unconnected with the aboriginal system of Indian police. When Mr. Lushington enquired into the history of those fees in 1799, they were considered to exceed the amount of peshcush paid by the poligars to government, and to have yielded to the poligars a receipt of nearly tenfold, as much as they did at one period. The desha cavel had been bestowed, sometimes by the prince, either through favour, or to conciliate an individual whose power and influence were formidable; but more frequently, by the liberality of the villagers, whose inability to protect themselves would also appear to have been one cause of their being rendered subject to such contributions; but in latter times, they were levied by the poligars from defenceless villagers, as the price of forbearing to plunder them.

These contributions consisted in payments in money, grain, ploughs, or cattle, and various other articles; and were made by armed peons, detached from the fort of the poligar for that purpose. They were not regulated by any fixed principle; but the amount dated 20 August 1799.

amount depended upon the conscience of the poligar; and when the payment of them was resisted or not quietly submitted to, it was enforced by torture and the whip; the whole village was put into confinement, every occupation interdicted, the cattle pounded, the inhabitants taken captive into the pollam lands, or murdered; in short, every species of outrage continued to be committed, until the object of the poligar was accomplished.

The fees and collections thus made on account of the police, were exclusive of other assessments to which the inhabitants of the neighbouring circar villages were equally subject with those in the pollams, under various pretences, such as hunting, batta, marriage expenses, and presents.

The poligars also managed to possess themselves of allotments of land in the circar country, which they held free of rent as enaums; but to which they had not even a colourable right. This unwarrantable extension of unauthorized territorial alienations, had in some places been carried to an excessive extent, more particularly in those parts of the country where the pollam lands were indiscriminately intermixed with the circar villages, and which was sometimes the case, where the poligars had been allowed, under the Nabob's government to farm the lands in those villages. Two other causes have been assigned for that connection which the poligars had with the circar country, and which in their effects, served in no small degree, to add to those grievances and acts of injustice, which the inhabitants experienced from the extension of poligar authority beyond its proper local limits. Suffering at one time under the extortions of the government, and making a pretence of it at another, to serve their particular views, the inhabitants would fly from the circar villages and betake themselves to the pollams, and as the condition of their return demanded of the government the madisum, as it was called, of the poligar, which meant his mediation to protect the village from any breach of faith on its part, or that of its officers. This practice was generally encouraged by the poligar and brought about by his own intrigues: and it was so managed, that the public servants of the Nabob had no alternative but to acknowledge the madestrum of the poligar, or put up with the loss of probably a whole year's revenue; his interest usually prompted him, to adopt the former. Thus, by possessing a right under his title of madestrum, to interfere in the internal concerns of the village, if the exercise of it did not end in annexing it to himself, it gave him such a control over its inhabitants, as could rarely afterwards be done away by the government.

The other cause of the connection of the poligars with the circar villages, and which very much contributed to undermine the authority of the Nabob in those villages, was the practice, which was common with them, to plough the cavel lands, that is the enaums, of which they had become possessed for performing the duties of district or village watchers. An enaum, as it would appear, did not entitle the person possessing it to cultivate the land, but to receive from the person who was in the occupation of it, that share of the produce, or that amount of rent, which would otherwise go to the government. By thus taking upon himself to manage the land, the ryots in the possession of it, were not only ejected and deprived of the advantages attending the cultivation; but the poligar's concern and interest in the village, became more close and permanent, by being numbered himself among its cultivators.

When the war with Tippoo Sultaun commenced in 1799, and the Madras army was actively employed in his dominions, a formidable insurrection broke out in the southern pollams of Tinnevely; for the quelling of which a body of troops was sent into the country. The service on which it was employed, was soon accomplished: and this occasion was taken, of issuing instructions to carry into effect the orders of the court of directors for disarming the poligars, demolishing their forts and strongholds, and reducing them to the immediate authority of the civil government of the Company. It was, at the same time, resolved that the poligars should be relieved from the military protection of the country, and from military service to the state, as well as from the administration of the police, as attached to the tenures under which they held their possessions; and that the internal defence and security of the country, and the regulation of the police, should be left to the care of government; that the poligars should be divested of all interference whatever in the circar lands; that the desha cavel fees of the poligars from the circar lands, and all other customary collections arising therefrom, should, for the present be collected by the immediate officers of government: that the principal poligars should no longer longer be allowed to hold the office of tallum-cavel-carrah; that the tallum cavel should be restored to the original purpose of its institution, by limiting the enjoyment of the fee to those who executed the duty. It had been thought proper, during the disturbances, to sequester six of the pollams, which belonged to the principal offenders. These, it was resolved to declare forfeited, and they were incorporated with the circar lands.

Upon the principles above explained, the collector concluded a settlement of the pollams of Tinnevely, for the years 1799-1800. The inconvenience both to the executive government and to the Nabob, which was found to attend the collection of the tallum cavel, and desha cavel fees, by the officers of the Company, under the arrangement which had been made, appears to have led, in the progress of this settlement, to an agreement with his highness the Nabob of Arcot, which was concluded in 1800; by which the collection of both descriptions of fees, and, with them, the right of interference on the part of the Company, was relinquished; and by which also the claim of the Nabob, to the performance of watching duties in the villages and roads within his territories, was relinquished; the Nabob engaging to reimburse the Company for the loss sustained, in consequence of their giving up the fees in question, and to afford a compensation to the individuals who had discharged the cavelly duties, but who had been deprived of their emoluments.

It having been long a principle, among the poligars, to conceal from others all knowledge of their antient privileges, as it had been, to add to them by every act of fraud and violence, the collector was not able to obtain any accurate accounts of the resources of their lands. The dusters or official registers of Tinnevely ryots in former years, and of the aggregate receipts which they yielded to the poligars, than what was to be found in the records of the loose and corrupt management which pervaded the province since the time of Isooph Cawn; and from which it was difficult to distinguish between the produce and collections, while the assessments were so entirely without consistency or regard to the comparative capacities of each pollam, as to bear a strong confirmation to the fact, that the private nuzzers or irregular collections, did alone very greatly exceed the peshcush. Those accounts were also consulted, which had been kept of the revenues derived from the pollams during the short intervals that this country had been assigned to the Company; but it was not from such documents, that much information was to be collected.

As therefore a settlement could not be concluded with the poligars, on a correct principle, with reference to the value of the lands, the arrangement made for 1799-1800, was considered as temporary. All lands in the possession of the poligars, or from which they collected the rents, which did not properly belong to their own villages, were resumed under this settlement; and an amount of revenue was stipulated for, on account of their respective pollams, which exceeded their payments, in all former years, no less than 117 per cent. The increase thus made to their tribute, was principally derived from the sum at which their military services were commuted.

The Committee have already stated, that six of the pollams had, on the re-establishment of tranquillity in the province, been incorporated with the circar lands. Several other pollams had been transferred to the management of the Company at an antecedent period: and on declaring the assessment which had been temporarily formed for the lands in the possession of the poligars, several of them preferred surrendering their villages to the collector, until the exact amount of their revenues should be ascertained, to paying the jummahs at which they were rated. In all these pollams, the collector appears to have directed his particular attention to the acquirement of every information in his power, with respect to their internal affairs, the rates of assessment which existed, and the abuses which were practised under the poligar system, that could be obtained by consulting such records and accounts as existed; by employing native agency; and by his own personal investigations.

The public dues from the dry grain lands were realized, by farming them to the head inhabitants of the villages. The tax on dry grain culture, which constituted the grand source of land revenue, was not regulated on any fixed or regular principle, but varied in every village. These inequalities having been ascertained, they were adjusted adjusted with reference to the rates existing in the neighbouring countries, assisted by a measurement of the fields, and a full communication and discussion with the people themselves; and the lands yielding such produce, were rented by villages to the head inhabitants for a specific sum. It appears, that a very small part of the little there was of paddy lands, was in the possession of the ryots, being kept by the poligars in their own hands, and cultivated by slaves, who received no share of the crop, but were allowed a certain quantity of grain, for their daily subsistence. The warum, or share which the inhabitants had formerly enjoyed, from the lands of this description, was, generally speaking, one half, as in other parts of the country. One of the measures adopted by the collector, was to restore this share to the cultivators, having in each particular case, been so defined and determined, as that upon occasions of complaint, it might be at once distinctly ascertained where justice ended and oppression began. As the produce from the paddy lands was, from local circumstances, extremely fluctuating in its amount, and as the inhabitants were averse to enter into village settlements for the government share, it was either collected in kind from the cultivator, or the value of it was received in cash.

The arrangements which he made, were attended by a still greater increase of revenue, than had resulted from the settlements he had formed for those lands, which continued in the possession of the poligars; and the punctuality and ease with which the collections were realized in both cases, evinced, that in the one, the jummahs or rents which had been agreed upon with the poligars, and in the other, the rates of assessment which had been established in the forfeited and assumed pollams, did not exceed the limits of a moderate and just demand.

Your Committee find, that in the year 1801, a second insurrection took place in the southern pollams; which was considered to have been connected with another, which at that period existed, in the Dindigul and Malabar countries.

This insurrection was effectually crushed by the proceedings of the military force, detached for that purpose.

The orders which had been issued in the former war with the poligars in 1799, to demolish their forts, and to abolish their military establishments; but which had been but partially executed, were, on this latter occasion, carried into effect; and measures were adopted for discovering such arms as might have been concealed, and for preventing the use and manufacture of weapons of offence by the inhabitants. Severe examples were also made of some of the poligars, who had been principal actors in the disturbances. They were deprived of their pollams, and some of them, capitally punished. Among these, were three Poligars, whose lands were conferred on other poligars, in suitable divisions, on the principles of a permanent zemindarry tenure; as a reward for the fidelity which they had displayed to the Company's government. The jummah was declared to be progressive for several years, and afterwards to remain unalterable, at an amount which was calculated to be equal to 2-3ds of the gross collections.

The strong measures adopted in consequence of the second rebellion, having produced the effect of general obedience to the authority of government, and being well calculated to secure the allegiance of the poligars for the future, were soon after followed up by the extension of the principles of a permanent zemindarry assessment throughout the pollams in Tinnevely; as well in those, that remained in the hands of the poligars, as those that had been assumed. A report was received from the special commission, on the arrangements which they proposed for this purpose, in the month of May 1803; and they were a few months afterwards carried into effect by the collector.

The report of the commissioners was founded on the communications and statements, which had been received from the collector during the latter period of his management of the country; and which, in their judgment, furnished ample materials for determining the amount of revenue, at which the poligars should be permanently assessed.

Of the pollams that remained in the hands of the poligars, which were fourteen in number, the permanent assessment was, with some few exceptions, less than the peshcush settled in the year 1799-1800. In the larger pollams, it varied in its proportion to the computed resources, from 54 to 57 per cent.; and in the smaller ones, from 41 to 49 per cent.; the expenses of management being relatively less in the former, former, than in the latter. Among these, were the three pollams which had been previously bestowed on certain poligars for their good conduct and assistance during the last rebellion, under the permanent zemindarry tenures. In order to render this reward the more substantial and distinguished, a reduction was made in the jummah, at which they had been fixed.

The pollams that had been voluntarily transferred to the collector, for the purpose of ascertaining their actual condition, which were likewise eleven in number, were restored to the parties, at the rates of jummah fixed upon them.

Of the two other pollams, one of which had been assumed, and the other sequestered for several years; the former, was restored to its original holder; the latter, to the surviving heir.

There remained three forfeited pollams; which were sold at public auction.

The southern poligar countries are principally situated in the province of Tinnevelly. The other lands which come under this description in that part of the peninsula, are situated contiguously to them; and consisted, on their acquisition by the Company, of the pollams of Shevagunga, of Ramnad, of Manapara Madura, and Nuttum.

The pollams of Shevagunga and Ramnad, were permanently assessed at the same time, as those of Tinnevelly; the former, at the rate of jummah which yielded an augmentation of Revenue to the extent of 50 per cent. on the peshcush before collected; and the latter, at 2-3ds of the average gross collections during the preceding 5 years, affording an increase of 55 per cent. of revenue. The poligar of Ramnad having been deposed in 1795, on account of his cruelties, tyranny, and other misconduct, an agreement was entered into with the Nabob of Arcot, for the better government of the country; by which it was made over to the sole and absolute charge of the Company for 3 years. It was however continued under the management of the British collector, until settled in perpetuity; on which occasion, it was granted to the sister of the expelled poligar.

Before your Committee close their observations upon the system adopted towards the southern poligars of the Carnatic, they will shortly advert to the condition of those feudatories, prior to their subjugation, and since its completion. From the detailed correspondence, which passed at Fort St. George, in the progress of this arduous reform, much useful information may be extracted; and your Committee believe, that many of the regulations then adopted, may be successfully applied in subduing that ferocious anarchy, noticed in a former part of their Report, as disgracing the name and authority of the Company in part of the Bengal possessions. Before this reform was accomplished in Tinnevelly, life and property were exposed to shocking outrages, similar to those which now distract the provinces of Bengal, where gang-robbery prevails; and the poligars of the south, like the decoits of Bengal, exhibited a practical example of the calamities brought upon a peaceful and industrious people, by the neglect or subversion of their antient institutions, and by the licentious rage of the most cruel passions of mankind, unchecked by any system of efficient police, or internal village government. The means by which these enormous evils were subdued, and their recurrence prevented in the Carnatic, your Committee have considered with particular gratification; for, after the happy experience of nearly ten years of internal peace and prosperity in the southern countries of the peninsula, there can be no doubt of the truth of the sentiments delivered by the special commission, and the government of Fort St. George, on the subject in the year 1803.

In addressing the government at that period, the special commission closed their able and interesting Report, with the following observations:

"Upon a review of the whole arrangement now submitted to your Lordship in council, we have the honour to observe, that the vigorous measures adopted for the subjugation of the poligars of Tinnevelly, Shevagunga, and Ramnad, appear to have been effectual; and that the firmness and perseverance with which those measures have been pursued, have actually produced that change in the state of the provinces which was indispensably requisite to convert the ferocious and turbulent character of the poligar tenure, into the peaceful and beneficial condition of the zemindar. Under the former description, these valuable lands contributed the sum of pagodas 1,68,304. to the purpose of general government; whilst the maintenance of their

"armed

"armed retainers, amounting to about 100,000; instead of contributing to the preservation of internal tranquillity, demanded a constant and vigilant attention to the means of augmenting the regular force stationed in the southern provinces. Under the proposed plan of settling the pollams, the permanent assessment of the lands which we have proposed, combined with the resumption of the cavelly, which has been already carried into effect, will be attended with an augmentation of the public revenue, to the extent of star pagodas 1,76,378. per annum; while the necessary operation of the change, by directing the attention of the zemindars to the improvement of agriculture, and the arts of peace, must daily tend to diminish the former jealousy of their military condition, and to discharge the government from the expense of those armaments, which have been repeatedly attended with heavy disbursements of the public treasury, and with severe loss of its soldiers and subjects. Impressed with these sentiments, it is with peculiar satisfaction that we direct the attention of your Lordship in council, to the concluding declaration which the superintendence of the southern provinces, during the eventful period of the last four years, has enabled the collector, Mr. Lushington, to pronounce with confidence, "That nothing appears to be wanting to consolidate the foundations of internal order and peace, but the establishment of the settlement recommended, the abolition of the customs, and the regulation of the police."

"By the energy and justice of government (the collector proceeds to observe) the rebellions have been subdued, the oppressed have been upheld and exalted, the obedient have been liberally rewarded, and the extinction of a divided authority, has restored the fairest province of the Carnatic, from an acknowledged state of anarchy and confusion, to a state of subordination and prosperity."—Mr. Lushington's general acquaintance with the state of the revenues under this presidency, and his successful experience in the practical administration of them, entitle his opinions to the greatest degree of respect; and we have had the most satisfactory proofs of the zeal with which he has devoted his labour and talents to the public service. We deem it to be our duty to inform your Lordship in council, that the information submitted to us by that gentleman has been satisfactorily digested; and that, in the opinions which he has suggested, for our consideration, he has manifested an intimate knowledge of the principles and operation of the system of permanent revenue."

From this period, the increased tribute of the poligars has been punctually paid, no blood has been shed, and no treasure expended in military operations against them; and the surrounding districts have enjoyed tranquillity under the revival of their antient system of village police.

The same course of measures with respect to village police, appear to have been pursued by other collectors, in the Mysore and Carnatic territories, and has been followed by the same happy effects; more especially in the Ceded districts, where they were made a primary and anxious object of care and attention on the part of Colonel Munro. Your Committee therefore look to the revival of the talliary office in every village, as the best security of internal police. The manner in which the institution was restored to its antient efficiency in Tinnevelly, and in the Ceded districts, after its resources had been so long usurped, and in many places, the remembrance of its benefits lost in the cruel outrages of the poligars, affords an example of successful exertion in the officers of the Madras government, worthy of imitation.

Your Committee do not find that any steps were taken, except those of a preparatory nature, for reforming the condition of the western poligars of the Carnatic, till 1802. The preparatory steps which they here allude to, consisted in the issuing a proclamation in the year 1800 to the poligars, declaring the determination of government to render them subject to its immediate authority, and in giving the instructions, which had been already noticed, to Mr. Stratton, the collector of the peshcush, to enquire into the actual state and resources of the pollams. Though the poligars who were four in number, had exercised an independent jurisdiction and power, wholly incompatible with their relative situations as dependants of a regular government; yet being more under its eye and control than those of the south, they were less disobedient to its authority. When the instructions were issued to Mr. Stratton, respecting the pollams, they appear to have been in full possession of them; nor did any circumstances occur, to render the removal of any of them necessary. His investigations, though not the result of a detailed management of any of the pollams, supplied him with a body of information on the respective points, to which his attention had been directed, highly honourable to his integrity, industry, and talents; and the government were enabled thereby to settle the pesheush of the poligars on permanent principles, and introduce the same internal arrangements which were adopted in the southern pollams.

It appears from the accounts of the assessment which was finally determined upon, consisting of the former pesheush and the equivalent for military service, that a pecuniary augmentation of resources was yielded to the Company under that assessment, to the extent of S. pagodas 1,72,296; while the poligars were left in the enjoyment of an income, which considerably exceeded what had been allowed to the zemindars in the other parts of the country, which had been settled in perpetuity.

Adjoining to the western poligar districts, are several others of inferior consideration, called the Chittoor pollams; which came into the possession of the Company under the treaty with the Nabob of Arcot of 1801. The poligars had long been refractory and turbulent subjects under his Highness's government, and very backward in the payment of their tributes. A determined adherence to the same line of conduct, occasioned the necessity of sending a military force against them, in the early part of 1804, to recal them to obedience. Their balances were considerable;—they not only refused to discharge them, but to acknowledge the authority of the British administration; and their example had begun to have an unfavourable influence on the poligars of the Ceded districts, who had also evinced a disposition to withhold their submission, were opposed by open force. Two of the most powerful of them, surrendered themselves, at the commencement of military operations. They were removed from the district, and granted an allowance equal to 1-10th of the estimated revenue received from their lands. The other poligars having been driven from their fastnesses, which were demolished, took refuge in the jungles. A commission was afterwards appointed, to arrange the affairs of the country; but they failed in bringing the poligars to terms of accommodation. They were required, to account to government for 2-5ths of their resources, which was much below the usual terms of a zemindary assessment in perpetuity; but this they refused to do; and a military force having been again dispatched against them, the district was restored to order and tranquillity in the beginning of 1805. Two of the poligars had capitulated; and they were granted an allowance equal to 18 per cent. of the value of their lands, which were declared forfeit. The five remaining pollams were assumed, until they should be surveyed and their value fully ascertained; pensions being, in the mean time, allowed to the poligars, on the same principles as to those whose lands had been forfeited.

The whole of the pollams of Chittoor having come under the charge of the Company's collector, the same system of fixed rents on the lands of each ryot, and the same mode of realizing them, was resorted to, which were then in practice in the circular lands in the peninsula, and has been attended with a considerable increase of revenue. It does not appear that the poligars have yet been restored to their possessions. They have, however, been allowed to participate in the augmentation of revenue received from the pollams; their per centage, which was in the first instance allowed to them on the former collections, having been, in the year 1805, regulated with reference to the receipts of the collector; during the two first years of his administration of the affairs of these pollams.

II.
POLLAM LANDS.

Your Committee will now explain to the House, the nature of that change of revenue management, which was introduced into the Havelly lands, to which they have before adverted, as having taken place in the year 1808. This change consisted in a recurrence, under modified rules, to the plan of village settlements; which had formerly been adopted in the different districts, but which had been progressively superseded by the more detailed system of collecting the rents from each individual cultivator, by the means of native servants employed under the immediate authority of the collectors.

It appears to have been first carried into effect in the province of Tanjore, in the year 1807, in consequence of the recommendation of a committee, which had been appointed to investigate the revenue affairs of that province, and the principles on which the land assessment had been formed. It further appears that in the same year, Mr. John Hodgson (a member of the board of revenue, who was also one of the Tanjore committee) having been deputed by the government to visit the province of Tinnevely, and the districts of Coimbatore, for a similar purpose, had proposed proposed that the system of village settlements, should also be introduced into those countries.

The reports received from Mr. Hodgson, afford a very perspicuous analysis of the history of the revenue affairs of the countries to which they relate. They were referred to the board of revenue, under instructions to state their sentiments in regard to the expediency of carrying into effect the arrangement therein suggested in all the territory then under ryot-war management, as being a plan of settlement more nearly approximating to that of estates permanently assessed. The board in their answer to this reference, detailed at length the grounds on which they deemed it to be desirable, that the measure in question should be adopted. The government concurred with them in opinion; and directed the necessary steps to be taken, for introducing the proposed system of village rents into all the circular lands under the presidency of Fort St. George; and circular instructions for that purpose were issued by the board to all the collectors (except those of Malabar and Canara) in whose districts a permanent settlement had not yet been established, nor village rents introduced: viz. the collectors of the Ceded districts, the northern and southern divisions of Arcot, and of Coimbatore, and the districts of Trichinopoly and Tinnevely.

According to the principles prescribed for the formation of the village settlements, the chief cultivators were to farm the revenues of their respective villages, for a period of three years, upon such terms as, with reference to the accounts of cultivation, and of the demand and actual collections of each village for a series of years, might be deemed adequate, moderate, and equitable; but in districts in which a survey rent had been completed, they were to be regulated with reference to the payments made by the ryots under such survey assessment. The rents determined upon, were to be payable, under all circumstances, extraordinary calamities excepted; in which case, an abatement of the rent was to be granted, at the discretion of government; and as, in some particular villages, the effects of adverse seasons, or other adventitious evils, might have been experienced in so great a degree, that the accounts of former years might not furnish a result sufficiently favourable to the state, to be taken as the basis of a triennial lease; and as the means also of the inhabitants, in such a state of things, might not prove such as to ensure the due discharge of a rent equal to what, under this mode of lease, in reference to the period of it, it would be proper to stipulate for, even should the renters be disposed to accede to it, the collectors were permitted, where it might be considered expedient, to make the rents progressive, to defer the adoption of a triennial lease, or to limit the engagements to the term of one year, and to conclude them, either with the ryots of the villages collectively or individually, as under the former system, and upon such conditions as might be best calculated to secure the company against any unnecessary loss of revenue. It was also directed, that where the right denominated meerassae existed, the rents were, in every practicable case, to be concluded with all the meerassads of each village, who were to be held jointly as well as severally responsible for the amount; the personal and real property of the actual defaulters being, however, in the first instance, liable for the balances; and the difference only (in the event of their property being insufficient to answer the demand) to be made good by the other meerassads of the same village, under their joint agreement with the officers of government. In cases in which any of the meerassads refused to accede to reasonable terms of rent, the collectors were authorized to enter into engagements with one or more meerassads; and should the whole of them refuse to do so, to come to terms with any other individuals, who might be willing to engage in such contracts, or to continue the ryot-war mode of collection. In those districts where the right of meerassae was not understood or defined, a preference was to be given to the potails or heads of villages, by whatever name they might be distinguished, and even to the common resident inhabitants, over strangers, who had no permanent connection with the villages. It was also enjoined, that in all cases the renters who might contract for the revenues of villages, should be required to grant pottahs to the cultivating ryots, for their mutual security against loss on the one hand, and oppression on the other; and that no obstacles might be opposed by the leaseholders, to the prosecution of the survey, or the equalization of the rates. In districts, where these necessary objects had not been accomplished, it was considered proper to provide for the prosecution thereof, by a separate clause in the engagements formed with the renters.

Report of Board to

ment; 25 May 1809.

The

The reasons which led to this alteration in the system of conducting the revenue concerns in the havelly lands, are stated by the revenue board and by the government, to be, its comparative economy; the trouble and inconvenience which attended the collection of the rents of each individual cultivator by the officers of government; a desire to prepare the way for a permanent assessment of the lands, as your Committee conclude, on those principles on which the measure had been adopted in other portions of the territories of Fort St. George; and lastly, considerations connected with the system of judicature which had recently been extended to all the districts, into which zemindarry assessments in perpetuity had not been introduced, under regulations passed for that purpose in the year 1806. The considerations here referred to, as constituting an incompatibility between ryot-war rents, and the judicial system, appear to have turned on the impediments to the ready realization of the public revenue from the ryots, in consequence of its being required by the prescriptions of the law, that in the settlement of disputes respecting land revenue payments, and in the amount. The inconvenience thus experienced, appears to have been represented by several of the collectors, and by Mr. Hodgson, in the report he made on the revenues of Coimbatore.

The method of conducting the affairs of the land revenue which was thus superseded, has been shown, by your Committee, to have been resorted to, at different periods, as the state of the provinces admitted of its application. In the province of Malabar, it took effect shortly before the expiration of the quinquennial leases formed with the rajahs and nairs, in the year 1795: in Canara, it was found to obtain pretty generally throughout the country, on the acquisition of it: in the districts ceded by the Nizam, it was at once resorted to, by the collector appointed to the charge of them; and in the Carnatic, it was adopted, in most of the districts, in the years 1803 and 4; though it could not be said to have been properly introduced in some of them, till several years afterwards.

The degree of advantage which has been derived from this system of revenue administration, must have depended upon the length of time, that it had an operation; on the talents, energy and other qualifications of the collectors; and on various adventitious circumstances, as connected with the local state of the district.

The board of revenue in their report, and the Madras government in their proceedings respecting the establishment of triennial village leases, admit, that the ryot-war annual settlements which they have supplanted, were attended with the beneficial effects, which your Committee have described to have resulted from them; in reference to the acquisition of revenue information, the just ascertaining of the dues of government, and the rights of the cultivators, the defeating of the interested considerations of the inhabitants, and the delivering of the inferior from the oppression of the superior ryots; and they expressed their hope, that these objects, had been in a great degree, attained. Your Committee are, however, inclined very much to doubt, whether, even in those parts of the Company's territory, where the system of collecting the revenues of government from each cultivator by its own officers, had been the longest in operation, it has not been discontinued; before all the advantages it was capable of yielding, had been duly realized; before it was possible to have investigated, defined, and adjusted all the rights of government, and those connected with the soil; before various other matters relating to the interests, both of the sovereign power and the people, had been accurately understood and arranged; and before the mass of the subject, had become so well acquainted with the genius and spirit of our government, and its just intentions and principles, as should confirm their confidence in it, into a settled and habitual feeling.

It is therefore matter of regret, that any circumstances should have existed, to render the abandonment of ryot-war settlements necessary, more especially in those collectorships in which they had been of more recent introduction.

The proceedings with relation to the change of system which your Committee have adverted to, are explained in a revenue dispatch of the 24th October 1808, and in the report of the board of revenue and proceedings thereon which accompanied it.

In another revenue dispatch since received, bearing date the 6th February 1810, and in the documents transmitted with that letter, your Committee are also supplied with a view of the result of the village settlements, during the first year, in the districts ceded by the Nizam, in the southern and northern divisions of Arcot, Nellore and Ongole, Tinnevely and Madura, comprising, with the exception of the pollams pollams of Tinnevely, and the Diodegul and Rannad country, six entire collectorships. These, are the latest accounts which have been received in England, in relation to those settlements. Of the measures adopted for applying the village system, in the two divisions of Coimbatore and the district of Palnau, no statement has yet reached the India house.

Your Committee find, from an examination of the documents above referred to, that in considerable tracts of country, the collectors had not been able to conclude triennial village leases, and were under the necessity of adhering to the ryot-war annual settlements; in consequence, as it appears of the potails and other inhabitants having declined to become renters, on the terms proposed to them, as not leaving a sufficient profit to enable them to undertake the risk of a lease settlement for three years, with reference to the possible contingencies of unfavourable seasons.

It further appears to your Committee, that in most of the collectorships, the renters were required to stipulate for an amount of rent, which not only exceeded what was realized from the districts in the preceding year, under the former mode of management; but generally for an augmentation of revenue during each year of the lease, or what is called riusud or progressive jummahs.

Your Committee have explained to the House, the manner in which the rents of the cultivators were fixed and settled, under the ryot-war system of collection; and how it accommodated itself, to their means: that there was a standard rent, to which they were liable; but that it was so high, as to render them, unable to pay it, in all seasons, without impoverishing the country, and thereby checking and discouraging agricultural industry: that therefore the actual demand on the cultivator, for the year, was not positively determined, until the seasons were so far advanced, that a tolerably correct judgment could be formed of his ability, to satisfy it: that, if the land in his possession was able to bear the standard rent, the standard rent constituted the payment for which he became answerable; but if the state of the produce, and the general circumstances of the ryot, disabled him from engaging on such terms, a proportionable reduction, was made in such rent. This principle of regulating and adjusting the demand on the cultivators, appears to your Committee to have produced the largest amount of revenue that could be collected with justice to the people, where the settlement was rightly formed; its steady and regular realization, of course, depended on the vigilance and talents of the collector; and your Committee have no doubt, that in the territories which were under the Ryot-war rents, and where the demand of the state bore so large a proportion to the means of the husbandman, as to leave him only a subsistence, in an ordinary year of cultivation no change of system which proceeds on the principle of obtaining an immediate increase of revenue from the land, can ever continue, without impairing the resources of the country. An increase of receipts may certainly be obtained, by waste lands brought into cultivation, and by the detection of concealed cultivation, or of lands found to be assessed on too low a scale, through the collusion of the cultivators, with the native revenue officers: and these, as appears to your Committee, were among the means by which an increase of the revenue was effected, in some of the territories to which they here allude; and by which, in others, the collectors were enabled to keep up the aggregate receipts from their districts, without augmenting the rates of assessment: for the mode of management which then existed in them, was calculated to bring to light every irregularity and clandestine proceeding, which went to deprive the government of its dues, or to violate the rights of the inhabitants. It is not therefore, in the opinion of your Committee, to be expected, that in such a country, where the practice has obtained of collecting the rents directly from each cultivating inhabitant, and where a regular survey has been made, any augmentation of land revenue can be realized, under the engagements entered into with the village renters, unless they make undue collections from the ryots in their villages; nor can they conceive, how any legitimate advantages can accrue to them, under their contracts, unless it be from the waste lands that may be brought into cultivation, during the term of their leases:—But as the renters are described by several of the collectors, to be as poor as the common ryots, the necessary capital will probably be wanting, to enable them to encourage that they would apply it, to such a purpose, with only a temporary and but short interest in the land. It would also, as appears to your Committee, be unreasonable to expect, that the other ryots of the villages, in such a state of things, paying, as they they necessarily must do, a higher average rent to the farmer than they formerly did to the Company's collector, should enlarge their undertaking with him.

The question also naturally forces itself on your Committee, what security, under the above circumstances, have the government, for the fulfilment of engagements, which provide for a specific annual amount of revenue, during a period of three years, and which admit of remissions, in no other case, but that of extraordinary calamity?—On this subject, the opinions of some of the collectors, are clear and explicit.

By the collector of the southern division of Arcot, it is stated, "if seasons are bad, they (the leaseholders) will not be able to pay the present rent, without numbers of them being ruined, and the prosperity of the country suffering of course, in proportion:"—and by the collector of the northern division, it is stated, that "if the data, upon which the rents were formed, were accurate, and not less favourable than there was reason to expect; then, the only probable advantage to the renters is, that they will be able to pay their rents to government, and have a surplus sufficient only, for the support of themselves and families."—As to the village renters undertaking any improvements, the collector did not expect it.

The assistant collector of the division, further states, that "he was convinced that many would not have agreed to such high rents, did they not expect the tanks to be repaired, by government;" and that they would not have taken the villages at all, without an express stipulation to that effect, "had they not been afraid he should give away the villages, to more needy and less conscientious bidders."

It is also declared, by the collectors of the Ceded districts, that one bad season would render the village renters, unable to keep to the terms of their leases; that a great part of them being, in point of circumstances, not more substantial than common cultivators, their property would hardly be sufficient to make good the balances against them; that the pottahs had entered into engagements, merely to prevent strangers from becoming the farmers of their villages.

The first year of the triennial farming contracts, it appears were generally favourable to cultivation; and the rents were realized, in most of the districts. But your Committee see much reason to believe, that the renters could not have fulfilled, even in that year, the terms to which they had agreed, had they not pressed severely on the ryots. It is stated by the collector of the northern division of Arcot, that frequent disputes had occurred, between the ryots and the renters; the one, complaining of unjust demand; the other, of unnecessary and evasive delay, in the payment of their rents; and it would further appear, from the report of the collector of the southern division, that evils had there resulted, which threatened a revival of those oppressions upon the inhabitants, which have been described, as formerly practised under the village farming system. On this subject, he thus expresses himself: "My apprehensions are very strong, that, even in good seasons, the prosperity of the country will suffer considerably, from the oppression of the farmers over the inferior ryots. This, indeed, is almost past apprehension. It already admits of some proof. I have not been able to learn, that a single pottah has been issued by them; yet they have made the ryots pay for all sharve and poolathy (damaged produce) which was remitted to them, under the former system. They have, in many cases, made them pay more, than the rent; and in most cases, the full rent, for all waste lands cultivated by them, for which, under the old system, they had a remission granted them for the first three years."

And in another part of his Report, he states it as his opinion, that "the resources of the country will be found at the end of the leases, far more deteriorated than they were."

Your Committee are the less surprised, at the very unfavourable statement thus made by the collector of the southern division of Arcot, in as much as they find, from an examination of the records respecting this division of country, that though the sanction of the Madras government had been given, to introduce the ryot-war system, as early as the year 1803-4; yet, owing to causes of accidental occurrence, which it is not requisite here to explain, little progress was made in that work; in the measures necessary for protecting the Ryots, or gaining a knowledge of the revenues, of the country, until the appointment of the present collector, Mr. Ravenshaw, to the charge of the division, in the latter end of the year 1804-5.

The HAVELLY LANDS.

*Report of the Board of Revenue, dated 11th September 1806; paras. 22 & 23.

The state of it, at the commencement of that gentleman's administration of its affairs, was thus described by the board of revenue: "The examples of the pernicious policy of the late sovereign of the Carnatic were, as it were embodied in the deplorable picture of the state of the province in question. The grammatan (or pottah) had thought himself warranted in his oppression, by following the footsteps of his prince. The poor peasant endeavoured to elude by fraud, what he could not resist by force; the public servants were allowed, by a participation in the spoil, to confederate against their employers: whilst the country, suffering under such a complication of evils, was accelerated in its process to decay."

The measures employed by the collector, in forming his settlements for the years 1805-6, in order to reduce the influence of the head inhabitants, and to excite the confidence of the great body of the cultivators, were, as it appears from his reports to the board of revenue, and from the recorded testimony of that board and of the government, attended with the most promising effects. An evil, however, which had been of such long continuance, and which had become so deeply rooted, was not to be easily or speedily subdued. It nevertheless appears, that the adoption of a reduced scale of rents, and the operation of the ryot-war principle of collection, duly conducted and superintended; having for its leading objects, the confining every man to the cultivation of his own land, and defining the specific amount to be paid by each; and thus, securing to him the meed of his own industry, had, in the following two years, during which the country continued under this system of management, effected an improvement in its internal condition; which was made evident, by a considerable increase of cultivation in each year;—and in this short period, the public revenue not only attained its former amount, but in the last of those years, it exceeded the jumma of any year, since the transfer of the province to the Company, with the single exception of one year. The grammatans were confined to their proper duty of village collectors; much was done to remove the inequalities of the assessment; pottahs signed by the collector and his assistants, were granted to each individual cultivator, specifying the rent he was to pay; the grammatans were prohibited from collecting any thing more from the ryots, than the pottah demand; while the latter, became encouraged to resist the exactions of the native servants, from a confidence in the protecting power of the government. The sentiments of the court of directors on this favourable state of things, in the southern division of Arcot, are thus expressed to the government abroad, in a revenue dispatch of the 24th April 1811: "This (referring to the augmentation of revenue) is a strong proof of the growing industry and exertion, which is represented in the letters of Mr. Ravenshaw the collector, to prevail among the ryots, in consequence of the improved administration of the revenue of those districts; and we trust that no encouragement will be wanting on your part, to foster and strengthen the sentiments of respect and confidence, which the inhabitants seem so willing to entertain towards our government. It is particularly gratifying to us, to learn that the collections are made with facility, that the process is conducted without fraud on the part of the cultivator, or force on ours; and that they are truly sensible of the value of the benefits, which it has been our invariable wish, and first endeavour to confer upon them."

Your Committee have deemed it proper to bring under the notice of the House, this gratifying instance of a province, which was, in so short a space of time, restored from a condition of the lowest depression, to one of comparative prosperity. In a former part of their Report, they had occasion to state another extraordinary instance of the same kind, in regard to the management of the Ceded districts, during the seven years they were under the enlightened superintendence of Lieutenant Colonel Thomas Munro. They both furnish undeniable proofs of the important good effects which have resulted from the establishment of moderate rents, and especially a system of adequate protection to individual rights and property. The amelioration which has taken place in the condition of the provinces, which the Committee have here particularly referred to, and which, in a greater or less degree, has been produced in the other parts of the modern territory under the Madras presidency, is undoubtedly in a great measure, to be ascribed to the talents, activity, zeal and experience of the collectors: but your Committee are thoroughly satisfied, that all these qualities combined, could not have enabled them, so generally to have improved the situation of the provinces under their charge, had they not paid particular regard to moderation of rent. The great practical principle enforced in all their reports; by Lieutenant Colonel Munro, and the other collectors, whose revenue administration has been the most prosperous; the principle ciple on which they acted themselves, when left to their own discretion, and which they never ceased to press on their assistants, was this, that to enable a country which had been long oppressed, to attain to a flourishing state, assessment must first be low, and can be increased only, with its encreasing improvement, and that one year of over assessment would throw it back, beyond the power of several years of favourable seasons, again to recover.

Your Committee cannot, therefore, advert to the late change of system, which has been introduced into most of the districts where ryot-war settlements prevailed, and which have proceeded on the principle of generally augmenting the rents, and on a scale of encrease in each year, during the short period of a triennial lease; without entertaining apprehensions of the unfavourable effects it may have, on the welfare of the country, more especially as the business of realizing the revenue from the ryots in the villages, may now be considered as being virtually left to the renters, who stand in the same situation with relation to the ryot, in which the European collectors before did; while the only remedy within the reach of the ryot, in case of oppression, must be sought, through a judicial proceeding. But it is of the policy of the principle of restoring the potails and other head inhabitants of villages, to the capacity in which they before stood, of farmers of their villages, and in which they practised injustice, in so many various ways upon the inferior ryots, that the Committee more particularly doubt; fearing, as they cannot but do, for the reasons they have stated, that a revival of that tyranny and those exactions, which once, and at no distant time, were so customary, will be the necessary consequence. It was a similar feeling which induced the court of directors, in a revenue dispatch of the 30th August 1809, when speaking of the ryot-war settlement in Nellore and Ongole for the year 1805-6, and alluding to the idea, then in contemplation abroad, of extending a permanent zemindary assessment to those districts, to express themselves to the Madras government, as follows: "Until the influence of the village chiefs over the cultivators be destroyed, and those prejudices which had contributed to the evils prevailing were removed, the people were not prepared to receive the benefits, which it was the object of the British government to confer upon them." That the potails have again returned to their oppressive practices, in several of the districts, has been shewn; and that the courts of justice can afford but very inadequate means of redress to the injured, would appear, from what is stated on that subject, by the collector of the southern division of Arcot, inhabitants, of acts of oppression: "I have no power (he says) to grant redress; I can only refer them, to the court; and the court, if it did nothing else, would not have time to redress all such grievances, even if they came before it; but the road to justice is so clogged with forms, &c. that nine out of ten of such grievances, never can come before it."

Your Committee have stated, that the government were principally influenced, in their determination to resort to triennial village leases, by the unsuitableness of the new code for the administration of justice, which had recently extended to the districts under ryot-war settlements, to that mode of management. It has also been explained, in what this unsuitableness consisted. Entertaining the sentiments which they have expressed, respecting the effects of ryot-war settlements, they must lament that any circumstances should have occurred, to which they should be made to yield.

It is stated by the board of revenue, that it would have been "inconsistent, unsafe, and impossible then to have deviated" from the system of jurisprudence which had been established. It is not to the present purpose of the Committee, to enter on the general merits, of that system, as applied to the Madras possessions; but they must observe, that if the ryotwar mode of administering the revenues of an Indian country, be, as they conceive, and as the board of revenue seem to admit it to have been, the best calculated "to retrieve the energies of the country," "to reform the manners of the people," "to emancipate the interior from the thralldom of superior ryots," "to develop the capacities of the country," and, "to remedy the inveterate abuses of the mahomeddan government;" if, from such a mode of revenue administration, has flowed encouragement to industry, protection from injustice, extension of agriculture, and augmentation of revenue, it is not in the minds of your Committee to be doubted, that the accomplishment of objects of such paramount importance to the permanent welfare and improvement of the country, ought ought not to be sacrificed, even for a time, to forms of process and modes of judicial proceeding.

Report on Settlement for 1808-9.

App. No. 30.

Nor does it appear to your Committee, that the inconvenience which was felt from the process of the courts of justice, in recovering arrears of revenue, and in the settlement of disputed cases of demand, has been, in any material degree remedied, by a recurrence to village leases. The collectors and their servants are relieved from this inconvenience; but it still exists, transferred as it is to the village farmers; who, as it has been before observed, stand in the same situation in which the collector before did, in relation to the cultivators. The village farmers will experience the same kind of obstacles in collecting the rents of their villages, and will be subject to the same kind of vexatious impediments from litigious and designing ryots, unless they substitute the hand of power for the rule of law. As the engagements of the potails are for three years, instead of for one year, which was the case under the ryotwar assessments, the frequency of applications to the Courts, have been probably lessened; but the evil must, in the nature of things, exist to a great extent, under any other than a less dilatory and troublesome form of process.

It is represented by the board of revenue, in their report, in favour of the village system of rent, which has been described, that "it was, at least, as old as the age of Menu;" but if by this, it be meant that such a mode of settlement was, in conformity to the general and settled practice of the Hindoo governments, the fact appears to be at variance with such information as the Committee have been able to collect, in their enquiries upon that subject. The usual course pursued by them, for the realization of their territorial revenue, appears to have been, to collect it from those having an interest in the cultivation of the soil, either in proprietary right, or as tenants, through the medium of their own officers. They may have farmed out the revenues of a whole village or more, to the head inhabitants, on terms of a specific contract; but where this occurred, the Committee believe it to have been a deviation from the general rule. In the latter periods of the Mahomeddan domination, the system of farming the revenues, by degrees, came into very general use; and to this, it is believed may be traced, the origin of most of the zemindars in the Bengal provinces, and in the Northern circars. They were, as it is now pretty clearly ascertained, in general, no other than the revenue servants of districts or subdivisions of a province, who, as the Committee have formerly explained, were obliged, by the conditions on which they held their office, to account for the collections they made, or the share of the crop they received from the ryots, to the governing power in whose service, they were employed; and for which service, they were in the enjoyment of certain remuneratory advantages, regulated on the principle of a per centage or commission on the revenues, within the limits of their local charge; but having in the process of time, and during periods of revolution, or of weakness in the sovereign authority, acquired an influence, and ascendancy, which it was difficult to keep within the confines of official duty, it was found convenient to treat with them, as contractors for the revenues of their respective districts; that is, they were allowed, on stipulating to pay the state, a certain sum for such advantage for a given period, to appropriate the revenues to their own use and profit: the amount of the sum for which they engaged, depended on the relative strength or weakness of the parties; the ability of the government to enforce, or of the zemindar to resist. In this situation of things, the practice of sub-renting naturally ensued: and the detail of the farming system would extend itself, to single villages. In the Carnatic territory, where large tracts were leased by the Nabob Mahomed Ally, to individuals, for a greater or less number of years, under engagements entered into, at the seat of his residence; it was found, on that territory being annexed to the British possessions, that the revenues of each village were generally sub-rented to the potails. But in the districts ceded by the Nizam, and in the Mysore country, which also passed from the rule of Mahomeddan princes, to that of the East India Company, sub-renting by villages, was by no means universal; though it existed to a considerable extent. Whole districts were still under ryot-war rents: rents, not farmed to the potails of villages, but which were collected by the potails, in the name and for the use of government, in their natural and constitutional character, as the agents or superintendents of the villages to which they belonged, agreeably to the antient practice of the Hindoos; and, as your Committee may add, according to the institutions of their native rulers; for according to those institutions, as they have been explained in a foregoing part of this Report, the potail, in the character racter above-mentioned, and also the curmum, or village accountant, has from the earliest times, been in the possession of a rent-free portion of land, and in the enjoyment of regular and established perquisites attached to their offices.

Your Committee have stated, that in considerable tracts of country, the collectors were under the necessity of adhering to the existing system of individual collection, on account of the repugnance of the head inhabitants to agree to the terms on which they were required to rent their villages, under the triennial leases. This was more particularly experienced, in the collectorship of Bellary, constituting a division of the Ceded districts, in Nellore and Ongole, and in Tanjore: indeed, in the former of these collectorships, an immediate change of system was altogether abandoned; and in other collectorships, the new system, in many instances, could only be introduced under an annual engagement. The Committee are here induced to notice the refusal of the potails, and other chief inhabitants, to consent to the terms of the village leases; because they deem this circumstance in itself, to afford a strong presumptive ground for concluding that the terms of rent demanded, must have been excessive, under such a mode of settlement: for if but a reasonable prospect of any profit had been held out to them, under those terms, or if a compliance with them, would not have exposed them, to the probable chance of considerable loss, they would naturally be desirous of entering into engagements, which would have once more restored them to the management of their villages, and have thus increased their power and influence.

Your Committee have also further to observe, that they do not find, from any of the documents which have come under their notice, explanatory of the proceedings of the board of revenue and of government, in regard to the establishment of triennial village leases, that any steps were taken for ascertaining the opinions of the collectors in the districts, as to the expediency and fitness of the measure, before it was resolved to carry it into effect. The language of the collectors of the two divisions of Arcot, clearly shews, that the adoption of the system did not accord with their ideas. The collector of the northern division speaks of his wish "to afford a fair trial to a system established by superior authority;" while the collector of the southern division, alluding to a communication, he had made to the board of revenue, against the new plan of settlement, states, that his opinion on that subject, "he saw little reason to alter; but that, on the contrary, every thing he had seen since the introduction of the system, confirmed its justness; but that he had obeyed the board's orders, and as he trusted, not less zealously than of the advocates for it:" and, when speaking of the increase of revenue under the first year of his village settlements, he observes, that it was all, with the exception of 6,000 star pagodas that was to be expected during the lease, even with the most favourable seasons for the two succeeding years, and that under the ryot-war settlements, with such seasons there would have been an increasing revenue, every year. "The difference (he adds) is what we shall lose by the present system; and I do not yet see the probability of any advantage, at all adequate thereto; on the contrary, as I have said, on more than one occasion, that we shall find the resources of the country, at the end of the lease, far more deteriorated than they are at present." "There are (says he, in another part of his report) few arguments that have been urged in favour of it, (the village system) that might not, to my mind, be satisfactorily refuted by facts and past experience; but as it has been determined upon, I deem it unnecessary to enter upon such refutation."

Though the adoption of triennial village leases, in the extensive portion of the Madras territories, which has been described, is intended by the government of Fort St. George to be followed by a permanent settlement of the land revenue; the sentiments and instructions conveyed by the court of directors, in a dispatch to Fort St. George, of so recent a date as the 11th December 1811, shew, that they are by no means eager for the early establishment of any system of measures, that are not only fixed and permanent, but irrevocable also in their principle; and that they are strongly impressed with the necessity of proceeding in such a work, with slow and cautious steps. Referring to the adoption of the plan of village rents, in answer to the para. 58 to 70, of the letter of the Madras government, dated the 24th October 1808, signifying their intention to carry that arrangement into effect, they thus express themselves:

"In communicating to us in these paragraphs, the measures you have adopted for introducing, at the commencement of Fasly 1218, triennial village leases into the "unsettled

"unsettled districts under your presidency, as a plan of settlement more nearly approximating to that of estates permanently assessed, you have, as being necessarily connected with this general change of system in those districts, brought under our view, the merits of the different modes of revenue administration, of which experiment has been made, and which you deem more or less applicable to the situation and circumstances of our territories in the peninsula.

"We are thoroughly sensible that there are questions connected with a decision on this subject, which are of essential moment to the prosperity and happiness of the people, as well as to the interests of the state; and we entertain a confident hope, that the numerous local enquiries which you have of late years instituted, and the valuable information which has been furnished by some of your ablest servants, will ultimately lead to the establishment of a system, liberal in its principles, equitable and beneficial in its operation, and durable, from the soundness of its constitution."

"It was our intention to have communicated to you our sentiments on the general subject to which these paragraphs relate, by the present dispatch; but the conviction which we entertain of its great importance, in all the practical bearings and relations which belong to it, has induced us for the present, to postpone the execution of this intention, in order that we may bestow upon it, that full and deliberate consideration to which it is undoubtedly entitled, and which we propose to give to it, at no distant period."

"We shall, therefore at this time, content ourselves with stating, that as far as we have yet been able to form a judgment on the subject, we are disposed generally to approve of the village leases which you have granted, and of your having limited them to three years, as admitting of an earlier correction of errors."

"We observe that these leases are intended as preparatory to the conclusion of permanent settlements. We desire it, however, to be distinctly understood by you, that we are by no means anxious for the early adoption of that system, in any part of our territories, to which it has not been hitherto extended. We have always entertained a full persuasion, and have uniformly pressed it upon your minds, that before any settlements be formed, that are intended for permanency, it is highly necessary, that the most correct knowledge, which it is practicable to obtain, should be acquired, respecting the actual state and resources of the lands, their capacities of improvement, and the tenures and rights of individuals. Strong and decisive as our opinion has invariably been on this point, it has received no small confirmation from the experience which, we are sorry to say, has been recently afforded us, of the frequent failure of assessments formed on the principle to which we allude, in our possessions subject to your immediate authority: and we hereby think it proper to restrict you, from concluding any settlement of a district in perpetuity, without having previously received our specific sanction for that purpose; nor shall we grant that sanction, unless we are put in possession of every information necessary to direct our judgment, in a matter of such essential concern."

Your Committee think it proper to state, as connected with the proceedings of the board of revenue and of government, respecting the late change of system in the Madras territories, to which they have thus particularly adverted, that they involve a decision on a very important question, therein discussed, viz. how far the mode of ryot-war settlements was calculated for permanency?—Opinions had been conveyed to the board of revenue, at different times, by some of the collectors, who were for rendering that mode of settlement permanent, in preference to the zemindarry principle; but no specific and detailed plan appears to have been submitted, for carrying it into practice, until one was proposed by Lieutenant Colonel Munro, in a report, dated the 15th of August 1807. This report was taken into consideration by the board of revenue, when they recommended the adoption of village rents; and the plan it recommended was negatived, both by that board and the government, as well as the principle on which it was founded.

It is not the intention of your Committee, to enter upon the practical merits of this question; but, as they cannot but consider it to be one of great moment, and as they find that a very different view of it, has been taken by a late Governor of Madras; and by persons serving under that government, in the revenue department, whose local knowledge and experience entitle their opinions to much attention; they consider, that the House would desire to be made acquainted with what has passed on this subject.

App. No 31.

Your Committee find, that the zemindarry assessments in perpetuity, which have been introduced into part of the Madras possessions, were principally concluded during the administration of Lord Clive, under the orders of the governor general in council; and that Lord Clive resigned the government in the year 1803, and was succeeded by Lord William Bentinck; who appears early to have entertained an opinion, that permanent zemindarry tenures, was not the system most applicable to a large part of the territories on the coast; that the creation of zemindars, where they did not exist, was neither suited to improve the condition of the lower orders of the people, nor politically wise, with reference to the future security of government; and that the principle, of the ryot-war annual settlements, as then obtaining, in the larger portion of the possessions of Fort St. George, not permanently assessed, should form the basis of any arrangements for settling them in perpetuity. These sentiments were recorded by his Lordship, in a minute, dated the 22d January 1806; from which it will appear, that he had entered upon a correspondence with the collectors of districts on this subject; and that he intended to have himself visited the country, in order the better to satisfy his own mind, as to the justness of the opinions he had formed.—The Committee have called for the above-mentioned correspondence; but they find that it has not been received in England. It further appears, that sentiments to the same effect, as those conveyed by Lord William Bentinck, in his minute, had been expressed by the collectors of Dindigul, Salem, Canara, and Tinnevely †, in their reports to government, at the period of issuing the circular instructions of the 15th October 1799 formerly alluded to, on the arrangements to be made preparatory to the introduction of the zemindarry permanent settlement, and since that period.

Lord William Bentinck appears to have been prevented from proceeding on the tour of investigation, which he intended to have undertaken, by the state of public business; and, in the latter end of 1806, Mr. William Thackeray, whom his Lordship meant should have accompanied him, was, under a resolution of government, appointed to make the proposed circuit. In the interval between Lord William Bentinck's forming his intention of visiting the districts himself, and his relinquishment of it, he called on Mr. Thackeray, to state his sentiments on the subject of ryot-war and permanent zemindarry settlements. In the paper, which he accordingly produced, he separately examines, in detail, the arguments which might be adduced, against making the former system permanent; states the advantages which he considered it to possess; and his objections to zemindarry assessments in perpetuity. This document was submitted to council, by Lord William Bentinck, in a minute, dated the 29th of April 1806; in which he observes, in reference to the question therein discussed,—"The more I consider this important question, the stronger my conviction is, that the present system is not the best, which might be adopted. I am satisfied, that the creation of zemindars, is a measure incompatible with the true interest of the government, and of the community at large. I am not (he adds) at all at variance with the principle of the permanent settlement; which I admire, and which I believe applicable to this, and to every part of the world. The principle of that settlement was, a limitation of the demands of the circar. I venture to differ only, as to the detailed operations of the system, which has been founded on these principles. So little do I differ with the original founders of it, that I fully concur, in the application of the system to the existing circumstances of Bengal. I regret, that such circumstances, did require such an arrangement; but I feel, that they could not have been set aside, without a great violation of justice. Here the same circumstances, do not exist; and therefore the same objections do not occur, to a departure from the same rules."—On these grounds, his Lordship proposed, that the communication of Mr. Thackeray should be referred to the board of revenue, with a request, that each member should record his individual sentiments on the subject matter of it; and instructions were issued for that purpose. It does not appear to your Committee, that the individual opinions of the revenue board were, in consequence, communicated to the government; or that any notice of the paper in question was taken by the board, until they made their report, in the early part of the year 1808; in which they proposed a transition from ryot-war annual engagements, to triennial village leases: and with regard to that paper of Mr. Thackeray's, they stated, that they considered the sentiments and reasonings in their report, as applicable to the reference made to them, respecting it. The minute of Lord William Bentinck, and the remarks of Mr. Thackeray, are noticed by the court of directors, in a revenue dispatch, of the 30th of August 1809; in which they described described them, as "truly of a most important nature;" and state, that "they were glad that it was likely to be brought into discussion; for that they were very desirous of receiving the sentiments of the individual members of the board of revenue, to whom Mr. Thackeray's memoir had been referred; that they might be in possession of all the objections that could possibly be offered against an universal application of the principles of a permanent zemindarry settlement, to all the lands under the Madras government, as well as of every argument which might be advanced in favour of it."

Your Committee have further found, that a memoir had also been prepared, at Lord William Bentinck's desire, by Mr. Hodgson, on the same general subject as Mr. Thackeray's; containing opposite views and sentiments. This paper consists of three parts, the first, is an examination of the relative rights of zemindars and ryots, and of the regulations of government, as they relate to those rights; the second is, on the advantages of the zemindarry agency, with reference to government and the ryots; and the third is, on the disadvantages which must result to government from a ryot-war settlement, as a measure of permanency; and particularly on the disadvantages of it, as affecting the ryots. This production may be considered as a reply to the remarks of Mr. Thackeray.

The Committee have adverted to the mission on which Mr. Thackeray was sent in the latter end of 1806; and shortly after he had written the above-mentioned remarks, Lord William Bentinck in his minute entered upon that occasion, dated the 25th Nov. 1806, prescribed to Mr. Thackeray, the tour of Canara, Malabar, and the districts ceded by the Nizam; which was the same as he himself had purposed to make.

With respect to Canara, he observed, that the ease and regularity with which the revenue was realized, and the general prosperity of the province was, in his opinion, to be traced to the tenure of landed property therein, and to the moderation with which the rights of government had been exercised: That these principles appeared to him to contain, the certain sources of prosperity, wherever they were introduced: That he had been early impressed with the great advantages of the ryot-war settlement, as an annual settlement: That those advantages consisted, in the equal distribution, and the defined amount of the land tax, and upon the security afforded to the poor, against extra assessments from head inhabitants: That every man knew his exact obligations to the circar (or state) and was assured of the quiet enjoyment of the surplus produce of his labour: That hence, arose the true encouragement to industry; and from this principle, had followed increased cultivation; and, contrasted with the revenue of former times, the easy realization of the public revenue: That, from an attentive consideration of these effects, it appeared to him, that, if an annual settlement with the ryots, founded upon fixed principles, the essential part of which was to secure to the ryot for a year the fruits of his industry, had actually been productive of such decided advantages, a permanent settlement founded on the same principles, but carried to a greater extent, in regard to the benefit of the ryot, would produce the same effects, in an increased ratio: That it was not his intention to argue these positions, but to present to the board, the progress of his own ideas upon this particular question: That he had been struck with this opinion, before he became acquainted with the exact nature of the tenures of land in Canara, with the average extent of separate estates, and with the rate of the circar assessment; that when these circumstances were made known to him, he was astonished at the close resemblance between the actual state of property in Canara, and the proposed permanency of the ryot-war settlement: That, among other peculiarities, the greater part of the estates, though fully assessed, paid less than 10 pagodas per annum to the circar: That he felt satisfaction in finding theory reduced to practice, and speculation proved by the test of most successful experiment; that Canara thus became the great land mark, by which he hoped to trace out those principles and regulations, which might be applicable to the unsettled districts where permanent tenures were to be introduced: That he had reason to believe, though he could not speak with positive certainty, that the same tenures, as in Canara, existed originally throughout every part of the peninsula: That, in other parts, the boundaries of individual rights had been trodden down by the oppression and avarice of despotic authority; but that there still existed in almost every village the distinction of meerassee inhabitant, or hereditary cultivator: That the hereditary right to cultivate certain lands, and to reap the benefit of that cultivation, seemed to be nearly the same thing with the right in the land, called property: That between man and man, these rights, had an equal value and security; but but that before the sovereign, who assessed and taxed at will, neither one nor the other right, was good for much: That, to what circumstances Canara might owe the preservation of its original tenures, handed down through so many ages, he could not then say; but, that they still existed, was certain; and that, therefore, it naturally became a primary object of enquiry, how far these permanent tenures in Canara had been conducive to the prosperity of the country; how far the existing conditions of property might afford the means of ascertaining and restoring elsewhere, the original constitutions of landed property; and, how far the same constitutions, if not originally belonging to other parts of India, might be suitable to the unsettled provinces?

The object of his visiting Malabar, was to acquire information respecting the land tenures in that province, for which it was remarkable; and the peculiar customs of the inhabitants; and such other knowledge, as could enable the Madras government to decide between the various and contradictory opinions, that had contributed to the changes, which had occurred in the affairs of that country. His intended visit to the Ceded districts, was with a view of consulting with Lieutenant Colonel Munro, which his Lordship deemed essential, previous to the trial and ultimate adoption of any opinions, which the result of all his enquiries had led him to form.

The points to which Mr. Thackeray's attention was directed, in the instructions furnished him on setting out on the tour of these provinces, were, to ascertain the present state of the country, the sources of revenue, especially of the land revenue; the principle on which the assessment on the land was formed, the quantum of produce payable by the land holders; the security taken for the due collection, and the mode of collecting the land revenue; the nature of the land tenures; the rights of the landholders; the state of agriculture; the state of the police; and the administration of justice, as far as it affected the revenues; the defects of the present revenue management; the condition, opinions, and wants of the ryot; the present state of the country in respect to the comfort of the people, authority of government, and amount and security of the revenue, compared with other times and governments. From the information which he might acquire relative to these very important matters of enquiry, he was directed to draw his inferences, as to the best mode of administering the revenues in future, especially in introducing the permanent settlement, giving at the same time, every opinion for and objection to, particular systems. He was further desired to discuss fully every part of the subject of his investigations with the collectors and revenue servants, to have free communication with the people; and where it might appear expedient, to enter into an examination of village accounts. Mr. Thackeray was placed under the immediate orders of government, with whom he was to correspond, through the governor; but to communicate to the board of revenue, of which he was a member, such information as might appear to him important for them to be furnished with, and to attend to such suggestions as he might receive from them. The nature and purposes of his deputation were made known to the several magistrates and collectors in the provinces, within the range of his tour, who were instructed to assist him by every means in their power, in the execution of the duties confided to him. The result of his researches were communicated to the government of Fort St. George, in a report, dated the 4th August 1807, the receipt of which was intimated to the court of directors, in a revenue dispatch of the 21st Oct. 1807; but which did not arrive in England, until the middle of the year 1810, having been transmitted with a revenue dispatch of that year. The facts advanced by Mr. Thackeray, and the tenor and effect of his observations and arguments, are in confirmation of the reasoning and conclusions in the memoir, which he had before delivered to Lord William Bentinck.

The documents, here specified by the Committee; the report of Lieutenant Colonel Munro, dated the 15th of August 1807, already alluded to; the report of the Tanjore committee; and the reports of Mr. Hodgson, on the districts of Coimbatore, Tinnevely, and Dindigul, appear to them to afford a body of very useful and important information, for enabling the House to judge of the relative advantages, inconveniences and defects, of the different modes in which the administration of the Company's possessions in the peninsula have been hitherto conducted. The Committee have therefore given such parts of these documents in the Appendix, as immediately relate to that subject.

Your Committee have furnished the House with a full account of the administration of the land revenues, within the possessions of the East India Company, both ancient and modern, under the presidency of Fort. St. George, from the periods when those possessions (comprehending an extent of territory, which, according to the best computation they can form, contains a population, of not less than between eleven and twelve millions of souls,) were respectively acquired, up to the most recent intelligence received from India. It remains for them, in conformity to the plan which they have prescribed to themselves in respect to this branch of their report, to state what appears to them to have been the operation and effect of that system of permanent land assessment, which has been established in several of the provinces and districts within the limits of that presidency.

The following Statement, which has been prepared from the official records, will show in what parts of the country the permanent settlement has been carried into effect, and at what periods in each, as well as to what districts, it has not yet been extended.

It thus appears, that zemindarry settlements in perpetuity, have hitherto been established in but a small proportion of the company's territories on the coast, compared with the whole extent of them; and that the provinces of Salem, Kistnagherry, and Dingidigul, acquired in the year 1792, and the Southern and Western Pollams furnish the only instances of that arrangement having been hitherto resorted to, in the modern possessions. This, as your Committee find, is to be ascribed to the cautionary and restrictive orders which were sent out to Fort St. George in the year 1804, and since, against the adoption of any measure, which proceeded on the principle of irreversibly fixing the public assessments on the land, before every practicable information should have been acquired of its real resources.

With respect to the effects of the permanent settlement in those parts of the country where it has been introduced, the few years which have since elapsed, have not furnished sufficient experience to enable your Committee to form an opinion, which might not appear premature. As far as relates to the realization of the public revenue, those effects have been favourably manifested, inasmuch as it has been collected with much greater steadiness and regularity than was before experienced since the first connexion of the company with those districts. The Committee here particularly refer to that large tract of territory, called the Northern Circars. In the province of Ganjam, in Vizagapatam, and in Rajahmundry, comprising three collectorships, a deficiency in the collections have occurred, to a greater or less extent. In the Ganjam country, indeed, it was found necessary, in the year 1806-7, to grant temporary remissions, to a great number of the zemindars, against whom arrears were were outstanding, in consequence of the adverse seasons in that year; and in the following one, measures were taken for attaching a large portion of the estates, preparatory to the sale of them: And it further appears, that the principles of the permanent settlement, which had been introduced into that country, in the latter end of 1804, had been erroneously applied, and that it was the intention of the board of Southern Pollams of the Carnatic, it does not appear that any difficulty has attended the realization of the public demand, since the permanent assessment on the poligars was first established; and in but one instance only, in the Western Pollams.

Your Committee find, that in the

Your Committee find, that in the modern territories, as well as in the ancient possession of the company formerly denominated the Jaghire, but now forming the collectorship of Chingleput, the permanent settlement has by no means, had a satisfactory operation. In Dindigul it, to a considerable extent, has failed three years successively; and in two of those years, the estates of many zemindars were sold, to make good the balances against them. Extensive sales of land have also taken place, in Salem: but more especially in Chingleput; in which latter collectorship, as well as in that of Dindigul, a considerable portion of the lands are in a state of assumption, having been rented out by villages for three years.

This very untoward state of things, in so large an extent of country, may be, in some measure, imputed to the extraordinary calamitous season in the year 1806-7, the effects of which were generally felt, throughout the Madras possessions; but the great efficient cause of it, appears to have been, errors in the assessment of the estates, by which a sufficient profit was not left to the zemindars, to whom the lands had been conveyed, to enable them to fulfil the engagements into which they had entered; and to the rents or payments of the ryots having been left at too high a scale; particularly in the province of Dindigul. In Chingleput, and in Salem, the revenues of which, had been realized, under the system of village farming; and in the latter, under the ryotwar mode, the permanent assessment was fixed with reference to an average of actual collections for a series of years; but in Dindigul, where the ryotwar principle of management had also obtained, the amount of the permanent settlement was regulated, with reference to an ultimate survey rent from the ryots, which had been progressively increasing for the three years antecedent, but which had not, when the zemindarry settlement in perpetuity was introduced, been collected. The ignorance of speculators, without stock and capital, who had, in many instances, become the purchasers of the estates, appears also to have contributed to the failure of the settlements in question.

The remarks of the

The remarks of the court of directors, in their revenue letter to Fort St. George of the 18th December 1811, when speaking of the unfavourable turn of the permanent assessment in Dindigul, are well deserving of the attention of the House.

“ It may indeed be observed, that the disappointment of an unreasonable expectation, ought not to be considered as a loss; and, strictly speaking, this may be true, though to the case before us, the remark is applicable only to a certain extent. The effect of immoderate exaction, is not merely to disable the contributor from paying the amount of the surcharge; but by discouraging his industry, and impairing his productive capital, it incapacitates him from discharging, what might have been, at first a moderate demand. A landholder, who could without much difficulty pay 1,000 pagodas rent, if assessed at 1,200, may pay that the first year; but the second year, he may not be able to pay 600.

“ But the most serious injury likely to result from errors of the description to which we are now alluding, comes from their tendency to render our government unpopular, by loading the subject with exorbitant imposts; to alienate the landholders from a system dictated by the most beneficent intentions; and which, when wisely introduced, experience has shewn to be, in many respects, well adapted for the purposes, for which it was framed: it tends also, to shake the confidence of the inhabitants in the prudence of our councils, the stability of our measures, and the consistency of our administration.”

On concluding the

On concluding the Review, which the Committee have thus taken, of the Land Revenue administration under the Madras government, it remains for them briefly to state, the other sources from whence the public receipts of that government are derived. These consist of the government customs, both sea and land, the latter being levied on the articles of inland trade on their transit through the country, and on their entrance into particular towns; of a monopoly of the sale and manufacture of salt:

of the licensed manufacture and sale of arrack and toddy; and, in some parts of the country, of the licensed sale of beetle and tobacco; and of stamp duties and fees on judicial proceedings.

The mode and principles, according to which these branches of the public resources are conducted, are similar to those obtaining under the Bengal government. For information respecting the amount of revenue which they have yielded, and for some general particulars relating to them, the House are referred to the Second Report of this Committee. The heads of fiscal receipt, which have been specified, and what is derived from renting the pearl and chank fisheries, on the coasts of Tinnevely and Rannad constitute all the sources of public supply under the presidency of Fort St. George, immediately connected with the subject of this Report, which it is thought requisite to notice.

The collectors to whom is confided, under the superintendence of the board at the presidency, the local management of the revenues within the Madras possessions, are twenty-one in number, exclusive of assistant collectors: And the names of the districts or portions of country forming each collectorship, are as follows:

The limits of the collectorships are, in almost every instance, co-extensive with the local jurisdictions of the zillah courts of justice.

IT was the intention and hope of your Committee, to have been able to have concluded their Report, with an account of the system of Jurisprudence, and Police, established within the territories subject to the government of Fort St. George, similar to that which is contained in the branch of their Report, applying to Bengal; but the range of enquiry and detail they have felt it necessary to pursue, in respect to the management of the land revenues, has extended so much beyond their expectation, as to render it impossible to carry that purpose into effect, in a way that would either satisfy their own sense of duty, or correspond with the intentions of the House. If therefore this part of their investigation is for the present omitted, it is not because it has escaped their attention; but from a strong impression of the importance that belongs to it, and a conviction that no slight view of it, would be useful or desirable.

THE course which your Committee has pursued, in the account they have thus given of the measures, whether of a temporary or permanent kind, which have been adopted by the Madras government, for conducting the revenues under their charge, supersedes the necessity of here entering into any detailed observation, on the effect which they have have produced on the welfare of the country. With regard to the permanent settlements, which have recently been formed in the Northern circars, the Committee consider the sentiments expressed by them, as to the arrangements of the same nature, which were antecedently established in the Bengal territories, as equally applicable to those under the authority of the government of Madras. Your Committee are disposed to believe, that they have tended to introduce a more settled and better order of things into the Northern circars; but it nevertheless appears to them, that the experience, which has been obtained, of permanent settlements, in some parts of those provinces, as well as in some of the districts more recently acquired, in which they have, as already observed, in numerous instances entirely failed, suggests the expediency and wisdom of proceeding, with great circumspection, in the extension of them, on the principles on which they have hitherto been introduced. The important lights which have been thrown on the subject of revenue management, by the active and intelligent investigations of the Company's servants, in the modern possessions of the Peninsula, has in so great a degree added to the stock of information before possessed, respecting local institutions, and the Hindoo system of financial economy, as contra-distinguished from the altered and perverted form, which it assumed under the Mahomeddan governments; while the good effects which have resulted from a recurrence to the former system, by the means which it has afforded, of reforming abuses, removing oppressions, ascertaining individual rights, and obtaining a real knowledge of the people, and of the internal affairs of the country, renders it, in the opinion of your Committee, highly expedient, that the mode which has hitherto been resorted to, for permanently settling the land revenues, should be reconsidered in its principles, before it be applied to provinces into which it has not yet been introduced, with a view to such modifications and improvements of it, as the more intimate practical knowledge we now possess of the local concerns of the country, may render desirable to be adopted. This opinion has derived material strength, from an attentive consideration of the Documents, which are inserted in the last article * of the Appendix to this Report.

One circumstance appears to have peculiarly contributed to make the situation of the great body of the natives, under the government of Fort St. George, infinitely superior to what it was under their Mahomeddan rulers, and by which all the other advantages extended to them, are, as it were, confirmed and secured; that is, the vigour, the efficiency, and, if the expression may be allowed, the unity of its authority, which neither acknowledges nor permits divided sovereignty, but which keeps every other power, in subordination to its own. The beneficial operation of this state of things, has been greatly felt in Bengal; but, it is believed, much more on the Coast, arising from the greater degree in which a turbulent and warlike spirit pervaded the zemindars, the poligars, and other chiefs. As long as they were allowed to maintain their military retainers and establishments, they not only bad defiance to the government, but were constantly carrying on petty wars, one against the other; by which, the fields of the ryot were overrun and laid waste, his crops destroyed, and whatever other property he possessed, became a sacrifice to the predatory bands of contending parties. Even the potail of a village, in many parts of the country, had his small military retinue; and among this description of persons, the same scenes of intestine disturbance were exhibited, though on an inferior scale. At present, there exists not, unless it be in the hills of the Northern circars, and in some few other places, any military force kept up by individuals. The unruly and restless spirit of the poligar, is gradually giving way to the peaceable habits of the landholder; and the ryot is enabled to pursue the cultivation of his fields, without danger or apprehension. It is not meant by your Committee to assert, that the evils which are here alluded to, are not occasionally still experienced, but they are now only occasional, where they were continual, and when they have unhappily occurred, they have been vigorously and promptly suppressed, and have led to those further measures of effectual precaution, which a powerful government has alone the means of employing, and which it is its duty to employ, when necessary, for the protection of those committed to its care.

Appendix, No. 1.

MINUTE of Mr. SHORE, dated 18 June 1789; respecting the Permanent Settlement of the Lands in the Bengal Provinces.

- No. 1. Mr. Shore's Minute of June 1789, respecting Permanent Settlement of Lands in Bengal.
1. A PERIOD of twenty-eight years has now elapsed since the Company first acquired a right to the revenues of any considerable part of these provinces, and of twenty-four years only since the transfer of the whole in perpetuity was regularly made by the grant of the Dewanny.
 2. When we consider the nature and magnitude of this acquisition, the characters of the people placed under our dominion, their difference of language and dissimilarity of manners; that we entered upon the administration of the government, ignorant of its former constitution, and with little practical experience in Asiatic Finance; it will not be deemed surprising that we should have fallen into errors, or if any should at this time require correction.
 3. The Mogul dominion, in the best times and under the wisest princes, was a government of discretion. The safety of the people, the security of their property, and the prosperity of the country, depended upon the personal character of the monarch. By this standard, his delegates regulated their own demeanor; in proportion as he was wise, just, vigilant and humane, the provincial viceroys discharged their respective trusts with zeal and fidelity; and as they possessed or wanted the recited qualifications, the inferior agents conducted themselves, with more or less diligence and honesty; a weak monarch and corrupt minister encouraged and produced every species of disorder, for there was no law paramount to the sovereign's will; few of the officers of government were liberally paid, and property was left to accumulate from breach of trust, abused patronage, perverted justice, or unrestrained oppression. This description, I conceive to be applicable to all Mahomedan governments, where practice is for ever in opposition to the theory of morals, and a few remarkable instances of distinguished virtue or forbearance, are exceptions which deduct little from the universality of the remark.
 4. Long before our acquisition of the Dewanny, the vigour of the empire had been irrecoverably weakened, and its constitutions, as far as they can be traced in the ordinances and practice of its best princes, had been violated. The agents of the Company, when they obtained the grant, had no other guide for their instructions than the measures of a provincial administration which had assumed an independency of the empire, and had long ceased to act according to its laws.
 5. If we further consider the form of the British government in India, we shall find it ill calculated for the speedy introduction of improvement. The members composing it are in a constant state of fluctuation, and the period of their residence often expires before experience can be acquired, or reduced to practice; official forms necessarily occupy a large portion of time, and the constant pressure of business leaves little leisure for study and reflection, without which no knowledge of the principles and detail of the revenues of this country can be obtained; true information is also procured with difficulty, because it is too often derived from mere practice, instead of being deduced from fixed principles. Every man who has long been employed in the management of the revenues of Bengal, will, if candid, allow that his opinion on many important points has been often varied, and that the information of one year, has been rendered dubious by the experience of another; still in all cases decision is necessary, and hence precedents formed on partial circumstances, and perhaps on erroneous premises, become established rules of conduct; for a prudent man, when doubtful, will be happy to avail himself of the authority of example. The multiplication of records, which ought to be a great advantage, is in fact an inconvenience of extensive magnitude; for in them only the experience of others, can be traced; and reference, requires much time and labour.
 6. It is however the duty of every one who is entrusted with a share in the administration in Bengal, to contribute that portion of experience and ability which he possesses towards the improvement of the whole system, which, without such attempts, must decline; and I now mean, agreeably to the promise which I made to the Board, to give my sentiments upon the revenues of this country, with a view to practical conclusions. The preceding reflections reflections offer an apology for others which I cannot but claim for myself. Let us not take advantage of our own experience, to condemn the measures of those who wanted that experience to guide them.

7. I enter upon the task with diffidence; for although from the nature of my public employment in the service of the company, I may be supposed qualified for the performance of what I have undertaken, I am myself but too sensible that much still remains to be learnt by me, and I can only regret that frequent returns of indisposition and occupation without intermission, should render any apology for defects necessary, and requires this acknowledgment, lest my supposed experience, derived from a long residence in India, should give sanction to opinions which I wish to see discussed as freely as I avow them. My remarks may frequently be desultory; I hope they will not often be found inconclusive; I mean them as preparatory to the formation of a Settlement for a term of years, which is now under contemplation, in conformity to the orders received from Europe.

8. If the arguments and observations contained in my minute upon the rights and privileges of zemindars and talookdars, should tend to confirm the opinions already adopted and avowed by the court of directors, that these descriptions of people are the proprietors of the soil, one material point is gained. It is however but one step towards the establishment of order; and what remains to be done relating to practice and detail, requires a greater degree of minute knowledge and local information.

9. With respect to the general assessment of Bengal, there are two opinions directly opposed to each other, and of the greatest importance to the prosperity of the country and interest of the company: one, that the assessment upon the whole is enormous and greater than the country ought to pay; and another, that it is prodigiously under-rated, and may be very largely increased. The first is maintained with great ability and financial knowledge by Mr. Francis, and the latter supported by Mr. James Grant with much ingenuity, and reasons derived from an attentive investigation of the records.

10. With a view to assist the independent judgment of the Board, I shall

10. With a view to assist the judgment of others, and to show the grounds of my own, I shall trace the revenues of Bengal from the first recorded settlement of Turvumull during the reign of Akbar in 1582, to the assessment of Cassim Ally in 1763. Assuming the statements exhibited in Mr. Grant's Analysis as the ground of my observations, an abstract of the whole is annexed, (Appendix No. 4.)—In examining this abstract, and my observations upon it, the following informations, which have often been repeated, must be attended to.

11. Tury Mull is supposed to have formed his settlement of Bengal called the Tumar Jumma, by collecting through the medium of the canongoes and other inferior officers, the accounts of the rents paid by the Ryots, which served as the basis of it. The constituent parts of the assessment were called Takseem, and comprehended not only the quota of the greater territorial divisions, but of the villages, and as it is generally believed, of the individual Ryots; to avoid ambiguity, I shall invariably use the term of Standard assessment whenever I speak of the Tumar Jumma as established originally by Tury Mull, and subsequently augmented by the nazims.

12. With respect to the land and land revenue, there are two material distinctions First. The lands of the country were anciently distinguished by the denominations of Khalsa and Jaghire; the former may be translated, Exchequer lands; the latter, which are appropriated for the maintenance of Munsuddars, or the officers of government, may be denoted Assigned lands. The aggregate of the two, constitutes the whole of the lands paying revenue to the state. Secondly. The distinction with respect to the land revenue is that of asal, or original, understood to be the standard assessment in contradiction to Abwab or taxes subsequently imposed upon it. I suppose the article of sayer, meaning duties and variable collections, to be included, in one or both of these heads.

13. From the era of Tury Mulla in 1582 to that of Jaffier Khan, an interval of 140 years, the increase added to the assessment of Bengal, amounted to R' 24,18,298 only. This sum includes a tax imposed by Jaffier Khan, stated at R' 2,58,857. The remainder was the result of investigations into the resources of the lands. I speak here of the increase effected by these means only; the additional territory from which the increase is of a distinct nature.

14. If we suppose the assessment of Tury Mull to have been moderate in the first instance, the stated increase will not be deemed exorbitant. Between the two periods of Tury Mull and Jaffer Khan, the country had considerably improved in opulence, as new sources of trade had been opened, and commerce in general had become more diffused and specie, comparatively scarce in Akbar's reign, was afterwards poured into the country through new channels. On the contrary, we invest, acknowledge and applaud, that political wisdom which prescribed limits to exaction, and allowed the subjects of the state to enjoy the profit of their own industry and good management. The observation is important, and the more so as being founded upon an admitted fact.

15. Yet, moderate as this addition and amounting

15. Yet, moderate as this addition may appear, that part of it imposed by Jaffier Khan and amounting to R' 14,31,136, was obtained by measures of the greatest severity; the zemindars, with few if any exceptions, were dispossessed of all management in the collections, and his own officers were employed to scrutinize the lands and their produce. The severities inflicted upon renters in arrears, and upon the zemindars to compel them to a discovery of their resources, were disgraceful to humanity; and, as if personal indignities and torture tortures were not sufficient, the grossest insults were offered to the religion of the people. Pits, filled with ordure and all impurities, were used as prisons for the zemindars, and these were dignified with the appellation of Bykout, the Hindoo paradise. Jaffier Khan is recorded to have employed none but Bengally Hindoos in the collection of the revenues; for this special reason, that they were most easily compelled by punishment, to discover their malpractices, and nothing was to be apprehended from their pusillanimity; and he is said to have compelled defaulting zemindars, with their wives and children, to turn Mahomedans: Such was the man whom Mahomedan annalists have praised for justice and wisdom! Such were the acts of an administration, which, in the language of Mr. Grant, opened a new and illustrious era of finance.

No. 1.] The Affairs of The EAST INDIA CO. 179

16. From the tenor of the measures pursued by Jaffier Khan, it would appear, either that the country was then assessed to the utmost amount it would bear, or that he and his agent were incapable of discovering latent resources; or, finally, that he himself concealed what he had ascertained, for his own private emolument.

17. The two last suppositions I reject for the following reasons: The proved abilities of Jaffier Khan in finance procured him the appointment of dewan; and he knew that his reputation and continuance in office, depended upon the success of his exertions, which were directed with uncommon skill, energy and perseverance, to a discovery of the resources of the country.

18. The tendency of his measures was calculated to excite numerous enemies; his administration began with an opposition to the son of the Emperor, and was prosecuted to a reformation in every department of the state. He retrenched the emoluments of the most powerful officers, and diminished the influence by which they were procured; in his zeal and honesty, he relied for support against the insinuations of the disappointed; the intrigues of the envious, and the accusations of all. Fraud and dishonesty, in any considerable degree, would have furnished charges against him, which his enemies would have availed themselves of, with irresistible success.

19. A supposition has been assumed, that Jaffier Khair collected for himself, during the long period of his management, as deewan and viceroy, the sum of 2,40,00,000 rupees, with a view to prove an excess in the revenues of Bengal beyond the amount of his assessment. The premises are conjectural, and I am not bound to admit the conclusion. The value of his property at his decease (Mr. Grant's Analysis) as publicly stated, amounted to Rs 60,93,227.: and although we should, without authority, estimate this sum as a moiety only of his estate, a large portion of the amount might have been acquired from his own jaghire: nor will I deny, that something may have been extorted from unauthorised sources. His parsimony and frugality give countenance to the first part of the conjecture. His parsimony and frugality give countenance to the first part of the conjecture. His parsimony and frugality give countenance to the first part of the conjecture.

20. Neither do I admit the first supposition without restriction; but am rather inclined to adopt a conclusion, that Jaffier Khan, amidst the rigour of his proceedings, had a regard to the future welfare and prosperity of the country; and that in appropriating a large proportion of the produce, as far as he could discover it, he did not endeavour to undermine the sources of reproduction. My opinion of his proceedings (the cruelty of which humanity must reprobate) is, that when he succeeded to the management of the country as dewan, was to introduce reformation and regularity, by a system of unremitting severity; and by the same means, to preclude the return of future disorder and relaxation.

21. Sujah Khan, the successor to Jaffier, appears to have entertained an opinion, that the demands of his predecessor were not burthensome to the country, or that great improvements had resulted from his management; since, in a very few years afterwards, he imposed a further considerable increase upon it of R^y 19,14,095. His administration is not, however, recorded with that detestation which is indelibly affixed to the name of Jaffier Khan. He employed the zemindars, many of whom he restored to the management of their lands.

22. The impositions of Aliverdi Khan were ill calculated to relieve the country from the effects of the Mahratta invasion. They amounted to Rs 22,25,554. The contributions of the zemindars, to defray the expenses of the wars in which he was involved for ten successive years, seem to have suggested to him an idea of their ability to pay the increase which his necessities required.

23. The augmentation of revenue, demanded by Cossim Ali, during the short period of his administration, commencing properly in November 1760, and terminating formally in July 1763, was dictated by an apprehension of the precariousness of his situation. I shall hereafter enlarge more particularly upon his proceedings; and observe only in this place that by new impositions, and resumptions of the supposed profits of the zemindars, fouzedars, and jaghiredars, he attempted at once to collect an accumulated increase of

24. The Abstract of these impositions, as follows:					19,14,095
By Sujah Khan, - - - - - from 1722 to 1728	-	-	-	-	22,25,554
By Aliverdi Khan, - - - - - to 1755	-	-	-	-	41,39,649
Total in thirty-three years	-	-	-	-	74,81,340
By Cossim Ali, - - - - - 1763	-	-	-	-	1,16,20,089
Total in forty-one years	-	-	-	-

25. It is necessary to remark, that these imposts were founded upon principles unknown to the Mogul constitution; and that the Tumar Jumma, or standard assessment, to which this increase was superadded in 1728, was rated at 1,42,45,561 R^s. To this amount it had arisen, in a period of 146 years, from the sum of 1,06,93,152, the settlement of Tury Mull. We are not to forget that 14,35,593 R^s, the revenues of new territories, constitute part of the difference.

26. The sum of 1,16,20,089, with an addition of 2,58,857, the amount of a tax levied by Jaffier Khan, in 1722, forms the total of the increase, effected by the subahdarry abwal, or viceroial imposts, consisting of twelve principal articles, according to the specification in the Abstract. (Appendix, N^o 1.)

27. In accounting for so large an augmentation in the public demands for revenue, from the year 1722, it will scarce be deemed sufficient to say, that Bengal, in Jaffier Khan's time, was much under rated, and the assertion requires to be authoritatively supported. The cold unrelenting character of that nazim, the strictness of his inquiries, the severity with which they were prosecuted, and his acknowledged abilities, justify an opposite presumption. If, however, the contrary be maintained, his political moderation must at the same time be admitted.

28. But it may be contended, that the improvement of the country in opulence, agriculture, and population, created new resources during the forty-one years in which the subsequent augmentation took place. Admitting the premises, the extent of which should however be determined, the conclusion is fair; but the imbecility of Seifraz Khan who succeeded Sujah, the wars of Aliverdi, the tyranny and inexperience of Suraje ud Dowlah, the weakness, ignorance, and dissipation of Meer Jaffier, and the violence and extortions of Cossim Ali, tend rather to overturn than to support the premises, and at all events are entitled to weight, in opposition to arguments stated on other grounds. The administration of Sujah was moderate, firm and vigilant, and seems the only part of the whole period, with an exception perhaps of the last years of Aliverdi Khan, in which the conduct of the government was in any respect, calculated for the improvement of the country.

29. It is not only necessary to examine the amount of the increase; but we must attentively consider the principle upon which it was demanded, and the mode in which it was imposed. This enquiry will exhibit a deviation from established practice, sufficient to account for many evils now prevailing in the collection of the revenues.

30. The principles of Mogul taxation, as far as we can collect from the institutes of Timur and Akbar, from the ordinations of the emperors, and the conduct of their delegates, however limited in practice, were calculated to give the sovereign a proportion of the advantages arising from extended cultivation and increased population. As these were discovered, the Tumar or standard assessment was augmented; and whatever the justice or policy of the principle might be, the practice in detail has this merit, that it was founded upon a knowledge of real and existing resources.

31. In conformity to these principles, inferior officers were stationed throughout the country, to note and register all transactions relating to the soil, its rents and its produce, every augmentation of cultivation was required to be recorded, as well as every diminution in its quantity.

32. An increase of revenue exacted from a zemindar under these circumstances, affected his profits, but made no alteration in the rates upon the ryots; he paid a portion of the rents arising from discovered improvements in his lands; but the cultivators of the soil were not by this demand, exposed to an enhancement of their rates. The excess claimed augmented the Tumar or standard assessment, which by the investigations of Jaffier Khan was raised in the sum of R^s 11,72,279.

33. But the abwal subahdary or viceroial imposts, which constitute the increase since 1728 had a contrary tendency; for they enhanced the rates. They were in general levied upon the standard assessment in certain proportions to its amount, and the zemindars who paid them were authorized to collect them from their ryots, in the same proportions to their respective quotas of rent. Thus the tax known by the denomination of serf sicca, raised the rates of taxation and rent, nine rupees six annas per cent. Where the proportions were not ascertained, the demand was in fact discretionary, and though meant in some cases to have a partial operation, was often extended by the inferior officers to situations where it was unclaimed by government.

34. Jaffier Khan was the author of this innovation; the consequences of which he probably did not foresee. The tax imposed by him which established the precedent was trifling in its amount, and apparently intended as a fee to the Khalsa officers. I have already shown the degree to which these impositions were afterwards carried.

35. An enhancement in the rates of taxation may be defended on the grounds of the extension of commerce and increase of specie between the time of Tury Mull and the administration of Jaffier Khan, although his conduct does not authorize the first conclusion which is supported by that of his successor Sujah. But the mode of effecting it was unconstitutional and liable to the greatest abuses, as the event has proved.

36. I shall now endeavour to explain the circumstances which probably suggested to the nazims the idea and practicability of this operation, which might otherwise appear less irregular than it really was.

37. Long before the time of Jaffier Khan, impositions under various denominations, and to a very considerable amount, had been levied from the ryots beyond the Tumar or standard standard assessment. In many places, they had been consolidated into the assul, and a new standard had been assumed, as the basis of succeeding imposition. The zemindars and officers who levied these imposts gave, in their own practice, an example to the government which knew and probably connived at them; and hence an idea was naturally entertained, that the actual receipts from the country exceeded, in a very great degree, the demands of the state: since the latter had not been augmented in any proportion to the successive impositions of interior management.

38. This I conceive to have been the presumption upon which the nazims of the country acted when they increased the number and amount of their taxes; they considered the impositions levied upon the ryots as a fund of emolument enjoyed by the zemindars and inferior agents, and determined that they were entitled to exact a proportion for themselves.

39. Admitting their reasoning as to the fact, to have been well founded, it ought to have suggested a different practice; they should, in the first place, have ascertained whether the ryots were capable of paying without distress, the impositions of the zemindars, and have abolished such as were oppressive and exorbitant; and when they determined to appropriate the produce of these, they ought either to have confirmed by their authority, such as they meant to continue, and to have demanded the amount required of them under the same denomination, or where they adopted others, to have proclaimed them, as the only legal imposts. By these means, the exactions on the ryots would have been restrained within due bounds; but these considerations, either did not occur or had no weight. The nazims imposed new taxes upon the zemindars, who levied them in whole or in part from the ryots, in addition to the excess which they had previously collected; thus, in attempting to gain by this mode an advance of 25 per cent. upon the Tumar, upon a presumption that this or a larger amount was already received by the zemindars, the nazims, in fact, left it to their discretion to make new demands upon the ryots in the same degree, in addition to the excess already imposed. The detailed accounts of interior management established the truth of this explanation, and show that the operation in practice went beyond the real or supposed collections of the zemindars.

40. Let us now attend to the object of the practice, which was to deprive the zemindars of their profits, and acquire them for the state. It could only be to a certain degree, productive; the zemindars would consent to part with a portion of their emoluments, but seldom without attempting to gain what they had lost, by new impositions upon the ryots. Experience shows this to be the case; and from this source we are enabled to trace the multiplication of the articles of demand at the present time, which baffle the ability of almost any man to understand or simplify.

41. The impositions of Jaffier Khan, Sujah and Aliverdi, amount to about 33 per cent. upon the Tumar or standard assessment in 1658; and those of the zemindars, upon the ryots, probably at the same period, could not be less than 50 per cent.; for, exclusive of what they were obliged to pay to the nazims, a fund was required for their subsistence and emoluments, which they of course exacted.

42. The circumstances, which I suppose to have influenced the determination of the nazims in these impositions, place their conduct in the most favourable point of view which it admits; but I am far from allowing that they observed any due proportion between the amount of their demands, and that of the sums levied by the zemindars. General information, or merely the supposition of existing profits, were, I believe, much oftener adopted, as the grounds of their impositions, than any accurate enquiry into them: a presumption derived from the payment of one tax, was sufficient with them to authorize the demand for another. The separate amount of each, was not very considerable; and an addition of five or ten lacks to the general assessment of Bengal, would not appear burthensome. It was reserved for Meer Cossim to demand, in one or two years, an increase exceeding the augmentation of nearly the two preceding centuries.

43. The cultivators of the soil, whose labours constitute the real wealth of the state, do not appear to have been considered in these arrangements; it was sufficient that they had paid the exactions of the zemindars to render them perpetual; no calculation was made of the proportion which the ryots, bore to the produce of the lands; nor any rule prescribed for limiting that amount, and for securing a certain portion of the produce of them.

44. I am not possessed of sufficient information to enable me to determine, whether the impositions upon the zemindars by the nazims, and their increased exactions from the ryots, to the close of Aliverdi Khan's administration in 1755, were oppressive, or not. If a conjecture be formed from the collections since that period, I must suppose them not to have been very burthensome, and that the resources of the country were, at that period, adequate to the measure of exaction. But nothing can be more evident, than that the mode of imposition was fundamentally ruinous, both to the ryots and zemindars; and that the direct tendency of it was, to force the latter into extortions, and all into fraud, concealment, and distress.

45. Cossim Ali extended the principle; and attempted to realize for the state, nearly all that the ryots paid. In the early part of his administration, he deputed his own agents to ascertain every source of emolument enjoyed, or exaction practised, by the zemindars and officers employed in the collections; and at once demanded from the country in addition to the impositions of his predecessors, 74,81,340 R^s. He even endeavoured in some instances, to deprive the ryots of what was allotted for their subsistence and emolument.

46. During

sic in orig.

46. During all the financial operations from 1722 to 1753, the tumar or standard assessment remained nearly the same. If the increase had risen from actual discoveries of extended cultivation, it ought to have been proportionably augmented. The settlement of Bengal at the close of Cossim's administration is thus stated by Mr. Grant:

Tumar or standard assessment	R ^r 1,41,16,116
Abwab in eight articles to the death of Aliverdy in 1756, with the serf sicea of Cossim Ali	42,23,467
Keffayet of Cossim in three articles, with abwab soubadarry of Jaffier Khan in part	45,23,563
Towfeer of Meer Cossim, including increase in the Jagheer Nowarah of Dacca	31,62,358
Total Imports	1,19,09,388
Deduct established allowances and charges	4,01,276
Net assessment of Bengal in 1763	2,56,24,223

47. That this amount was ever realized by Cossim Ali, or by any nazim, no proof has yet been exhibited; nor would the collection of it for one or two years establish the practicability of fixing this sum, as a permanent realizable revenue. A precedent derived from tyranny and extortion, can have no weight with those who do not wish to imitate it; nor can such means be productive for a continuance. The rapid increase of the assessment in forty-one years from 1722 to 1763, and the mode in which this was effected, furnish a priori, the strongest arguments against the propriety of it; and no other refutation of them ought to be admitted, than proof, that the circumstances of the country justified these impositions by the exhibition of actual, realizable and just funds, adequate to the amount of them, or by authentic records, evincing that the amount of the settlement thus enhanced was actually collected for a consecutive series of years. A fact of this nature might gain assent, where arguments failed to convince. The balance of unpaid revenue at the end of the Bengal year 1168, answering to the period between April 1761 and 1762, is stated in the public accounts at R^r 79,74,065.

48. It may be proper in this place, to furnish a more detailed explanation of Cossim Ali's proceedings; and for this purpose, I shall select the instance of Dinagepoor, because it has lately been appealed to, in proof of the capacity of that zemindary to yield a much larger revenue, than its present assessment.

49. There are two accounts in the Appendix of the settlement, collections and balances of Dinagepoor for the Bengal year 1169, commencing in April 1762. The first contains the stipulations of the farmer with government; the second, the settlement which he made in the district, for the performance of these stipulations.

50. The tukuddar or farmer was Ramnaut Baddie; he had been employed the preceding year, in examining the hustabood or assets of Dinagepoor; Cossim Ali took advantage of the estimate of the resources which he had exhibited, to urge him to enter into engagements for the revenues of that district; and he accepted the test. His refusal would have been an acknowledgment that his estimate was fallacious.

51. The basis of this settlement is composed of a consolidated and exaggerated amount of original revenue and imposts, to which the following additional taxes and demands were that year, superadded:—First, nuzzeranahal, in contradiction to the former imposts of nuzzerana mokurrery. If this had a reference to any real supposed resources, it may mean the presents received from the under-tenants on concluding their engagements.—Second, Serf, or discount on Rupees, calculated at 9 rupees 6 annas per cent. Third, Cutch or quire bekenny, meaning the resumption of an allowance of land given up to the ryots, being a tenth of a begah; and in addition to the above, the estimated receipts from casual sources of revenue are stated at R^r 21,337; and the sale of the zemindars effects is inserted, as an available fund for producing R^r 48,450 more.

52. The recapitulation of these demands is as follows:

Nuzzeranahal	R ^r
Serf, or discount	2,97,859
Kutch balauny	2,53,680
Estimated receipts	1,00,000
Sale of zemindars effects	6,51,539
Total Rupees of sorts	R ^r 21,337 } 69,877
	48,540 } 7,21,416

53. On the other hand, the charges of collection were reduced from the former rate of 4,87,241 to the sum of 2,93,684. Without following the account through its various additions and subtractions, I shall state the net sum which the former engaged to pay as the revenue of the current year, clear of all deductions, at S^r R^r 26,44,733; to this again, a part of the balance of the former year, deemed recoverable, was added, as well as the arrears of an article for the provision of lime, making the total of his engagements S^r R^r 27,06,019.

54. The next account, No. 3, exhibited the settlement which he actually made in the district, and which of course differs in the amount of almost every article from the preceding statement. It is, however, proper to observe, that it neither includes the sale of the zemindars zemindars effects, nor the resumption of the land assigned to the ryots for their emolument, which form part of the assets in the former engagements; still however, he discovered apparent funds, to the amount of S^r R^r 27,42,552.

55. After all his skill and exertions, the collections in S^r R^r amounted only to 20,10,338, leaving a balance, according to the account No. 3, of 7,32,216; from this sum of 20,10,338, we are again to deduct the charges of collections, stated at R^r 1,87,809, which reduces the net amount realized for government to 18,22,526 R^r only; the difference between that and the sum which he engaged to pay is R^r 8,83,493. In part of this balance, R^r 1,09,948 were discharged by money stated to have been borrowed for that purpose.

56. The farmer was called upon to make this balance good, or to explain the causes of it; and he delivered in detailed accounts of his settlement, receipts and balances; which were examined with all the rigour suggested by the suspicions arising from his failure.

57. His explanations are curious and important. He stated, that the ryots actually refused to admit the intended resumption of the land assigned for their emolument and subsistence; and although they consented in the beginning of the year to pay the new impositions of Nuzzeranahal, he found the collection of it, wholly impracticable. He exhibited also a list of ryots who had been forced into desertions, with an account of their rent, amounting to the sum of R^r 2,23,746. 14. 15.

58. If, in reply to the conclusions suggested by this statement of facts, it should be agreed that the accounts of the farmer were false and fabricated, and that he realized more than he paid; I can only answer, that whatever weight may be due to arguments of this nature, upon general principles, the detail of the settlement is a sufficient refutation of them, until some positive proof is produced to invalidate it.

59. By the general accounts of the whole soubah, it appears, that the balance of the district, at the time when this settlement was formed, amounted to R^r 46,395. The consideration which naturally suggested caution in the imposition of new and enormous taxes, was unattended to: it is not therefore surprising that the amount of the settlement was not realized. The farmer exerted himself to the utmost; every source of revenue was explored; and nothing discovered remained unappropriated. I have examined the particulars of his collections; and exhibited a list of petty articles, exceeding two hundred, in their very nature extortionate and oppressive, and such as neither could nor ought to become sources of revenue.

60. If an estimate were to be formed of the gross capacity of the district from the accounts here discussed, I should adopt the collections of Ramnaut Baddie, stated at R^r 20,10,338; after making some allowance for the severity of his proceedings. If this demand had been limited to something less than this sum, it might have been realized without distress to the ryots, or undermining the sources of future revenue; both which consequences I attribute to his conduct. This supposition however provides nothing for the charges of collection nor for the zemindar, which by some mode or other, must have been allowed him; and the estimated amount of the resources is liable to a proportionate diminution, unless a sufficient maintenance had been assigned to him in lands; which does not appear.

61. It is further material to remark, that in the list of soubadarry imposts detailed by Mr. Grant, the nuzzeranahal is not mentioned. The account, No. 3, proves, that it was distinct from the nuzzerana mokurrery, which, in the year but one preceding this settlement, had been augmented in the sum of 1,54,208 rupees.

62. The above description of the settlement of Dinagepoor for the Bengal year 1169, commencing in April 1762, may be deemed a specimen of Cossim Ali's general proceedings. In Rungpoor the assessment was fixed by Abdul Ali Khan, the amil employed by him, at 11,29,324 R^r, in the face of an existing balance of R^r 3,57,986. The severities employed in making the collections of that district, forced the ryots of Carjeehaul, which is a principal part of it, into rebellion; and the amount realized that year, was only 6,68,692 R^r.

63. In this review of the settlement of Bengal, I have not thought it necessary to notice particularly the assessment of Sultan Sujah in 1658. From the era of Turynnull in 1582, until Jaffier Khan in 1728, the increase was moderate; from that period, to the close of Aliverdy's administration in 1755 it was rapid, but not perhaps excessive; in 1763 it was violent and exorbitant.

64. My objections to the principal of the Soubadarry imposts, have a reference to the circumstances under which they were established. If the rates in the tukseem of Turynnull with respect to the ryots, had not been previously augmented by impositions separate and distinct from those of the Soubahs, perhaps the best possible mode of obtaining an increase, would have been by demanding it in certain proportions to that standard, with a due regard to the degree of improvement in the country. But the fact was otherwise; and these demands upon the zemindars confirmed and perpetuated their impositions upon the ryots, antecedently levied for their own subsistence and emolument, whilst it opened a door for future unbounded exactions.

65. There is no proof in Mr. Grant's Analysis, as far as I can discover, that a fixed proportion of the produce was ever formally or virtually assigned to the zemindars of Bengal for their subsistence. The allowed deductions under the general term of muzoonet,

muzoonet, were applied to a variety of disbursements; and that portion of it which the zemindars received under the denomination of nankar or ruasoom zemindarry, was seldom sufficient for their maintenance, with the strictest attention to economy. But a variety of information tends to prove that at the period of Aliverdi Khan's administration, the circumstances of the zemindars were in general affluent. This affluence could only have arisen under a moderate assessment, in which the interests of the zemindars were consulted, and by an economical management on their parts. The principle that proposed to reduce them to poverty was certainly unwise; but as we know not what was meant to be left to the zemindars, we cannot judge with certainty of its effect; in practice, we may in general conclude, that it had a tendency to depress zeal and annihilate industry, and with moral certainty affirm that a system, which professes to destroy all the rewards of intermediate agency, is not only unjust in itself, but impracticable in the execution. How far the soubadarry imposts, including all that were imposed to the year 1756, operated to accomplish this object, cannot be now precisely ascertained. I am willing to suppose that the zemindars had still something left to themselves; if they had not, it is clear that they would exact it.

66. Cossim Ali's proceedings are not liable to the same uncertainty. After ascertaining what the ryots paid, his next object was to collect as much as possible of that amount for himself; he reduced the stipends of intermediate agency, and attempted to abolish every gradation of subjects between the government and cultivator, as far as he could; and if the plan and measures adopted by him had been long pursued, the subjects of the state would have been reduced to three classes only, an oppressed peasantry, rapacious tax-gatherers, and an over-awing military. So far from admitting his assessment as any evidence of the capacity of the country, I consider it as a proof of violence and extortion, which rendered the subsequent decay inevitable. In this opinion, I am supported not only by the detail of the settlement of Dinagepoor and Rungpoor, and by the arbitrary and immoderate increase of the general assessment of Bengal, but by the concurrent testimony of the natives and our own experience, since that period.

67. As the accounts which have been delivered to me of Cossim Ali's settlement, for the Bengal year 1169, differ both in the component articles, and in the total amount from statement exhibited by Mr. Grant in his Analysis, which I have hitherto adopted as grounds of my remarks, I shall insert two abstracts of them in the Appendix, and give one instance only of their disagreement in this place. The net settlement of Dinagepoor, in the first part of his Analysis, is 18,02,946; whilst the accounts which I have obtained from the public records, both general and particular, and upon which I rely as authentic, state it, clear of all charges and exclusive of former balances, at rupees 26,44,733.

68. This summary account of the assessment of Bengal, has now been brought down to the year 1763, for the sake of comparison; and, in order to connect the period with the commencement of our management, I shall exhibit an Abstract of the settlement collections and balances of the Dewanny lands of Bengal for four successive years, comprizing the period between April 1762 and April 1766, drawn from the records of the khalsa and canongoes: The first year of this period belong to Cossim Ali; the second and third to Nundcomar under the authority of Meer Jaffer; and the fourth to Mahomed Reza Khan, being the first year of the Dewanny. 69. Cossim Ali's estate

69. Cossim Ali's settlement was formed in the year of an existing balance of former years, amounting to rupees 79,74,065; in part of which the sum of rupees 1,04,793 only was afterwards recovered, making the total of his receipts, 65,60,991.

70. The statement however exhibits the collection for the first nine and a half months only of the year 1169. Detached records of particular districts are preserved, containing an account of the collections, for the whole year; but I do not believe that they exist any where entire for all Dewanny lands. If the receipts of Dinagepoor, which are complete, be assumed as a ground of comparative calculation for the possible receipts of Cossim Ali's settlement in 1169, the amount will be nearly double the sum stated in the abstract, or rupees 1,31,21,903 for the whole year. The conjecture is unimportant.

71. The settlement of the next year 1170, B. S. by Nundcomar, is formed upon an usual or original standard, with an addition of the subahdarry abwab, or taxes. The total of this sum being R^r 1,28,91,500, is denominated in the original account jumma istinraee, or permanent assessment, apparently in contradistinction to the kefayet or profit resulting from the investigations of Meer Cossim; the article of serf sicca, stated in an account particulars of Cossim Ali's settlement, at R^r 12,30,561; together with the increase obtained by his his investigations relinquished by Nundcomar. It may be proper to remark in this place, that Mr. Grant allows only R^r 4,53,438 for the serf sicca, being the amount included in the assessment of Mahomed Reza Khan.

72. By the public accounts of that year, I find that several articles included in Cossim's settlement were separately collected by the nizamat officers; probably for their own private emolument, and formed no part of the assessment of the dewanny lands. The amount of the whole is 5,64,575, which, being added to the assessment of Nundcomar, makes a total of 1,82,69,341 Rupees.

73. The settlement of 1171 proceeds upon the same principle; and, being nearly the same in amount, requires no remark. The addition to be made to it on the grounds of the preceding explanations, raises its amount to R^r 1,82,62,254.

74. When Mahomed Reza Khan was invested with the charge of the revenues on the part of the Company, he re-annexed the several articles which had been separately collected by the nizamat officers during Nundcomar's administration, as well as a proportion of the serf sicca. These additions were, however, more than counterbalanced by abatements.

75. Mr. Grant states the difference between the settlement of Mahomed Reza Khan and that of Nundcomar at 78 lacks. I rely upon my authorities, the authenticity of which I have no reason to doubt. A Statement of the progressive decrease from Cossim Ali's settlement to that of Mahomed Reza Khan is given in the Appendix, (N^o 8,) and the abstract of it is as follows:

Net Decrease in the settlement made by Nundcomar, on a comparison with that of Cossim Ali Khan.
In 1170,	Rupees	5,64,05,891. 17. 1
In 1171,	Rupees	70,87,151. 0. 0
Total Rupees -		58,56,65,710. 18. 1
Net decrease allowed by Mh ^d R. K ^a in 1172		2,23,32,421. 16. 2
Total difference between the settlement of 1169 & 1172		8,08,99,006. 4. 3

76. The only just criterion for ascertaining the propriety of this decrease, is a knowledge of the state of the district in which it took place; on any other principle, the conclusion must be vague and indefinite.

77. I have no hesitation in acknowledging my opinion of the propriety of a remission generally, since I entertain the strongest conviction, that Cossim Ali's demand was a mere pilage and rack-rent; no satisfactory proofs have yet been produced to refute this assertion, which is established on strong presumptive evidence. We might at this time, by means similar to those practised by Cossim Ali, increase the receipts of revenue to a fourth or third perhaps beyond their stated amount; but the public interests would afterwards suffer in a greater proportion, and no prudent man would advise, nor any one possessed of humanity make the attempt.

78. If the labour attending the research would produce any practicable advantage at this period, the decrease for the four years might be traced, through all its detail. In the four principal zemindars of Rajeshaye, Dinagepoor, Nuddea, and Beerbhoom, it amounts to 34,70,562 in part of the whole sum of 80,09,900; this remission in the succeeding years was again partly re-annexed to the assessment of these zemindars. I shall only observe in this place, in opposition to Mr. Grant, that the decrease in the settlement of Cossim Ali did not, according to my information, take place at the moment of the transfer of the dewanny; that the sum of rupees 58,405 was admitted in 1763 by Nundcomar, and that the reasons with which he attempts to support this assertion are ingenious, but not solid. Admitting the documents upon which I rely to be authentic, his premises are done away, and the conclusions altogether vanish.

79. That Nundcomar and the nabob Mahomed Reza Khan derived advantages from their administrations, and that these advantages were independent of the public settlement, I shall not dispute. The profits of agency have always been taxed in Bengal; nuzzahs and nuzzaranahs are as ancient as the government; some allowance through him to estimate it, I know not, may therefore be made on this account, as a deduction from the revenue of the state; but whatever may be assumed on this ground, the actual distress which Mahomed Reza Khan suffered, as long ago as the year 1775, and the repetition of them since that period, are such as he would not have submitted to, if he had possessed the means of stopping the clamours and importunities of his creditors. I know, that at this moment, his most valuable effects are mortgaged for debts which he cannot discharge, notwithstanding the liberal inter-commission which he derives from his public allowances and jaghire; and I have myself interposed, on more occasions than one, with his other friends, to avert the operation of the jurisdiction of the supreme court upon him, to which he had made himself amenable by express bonds extorted from his necessities. This observation is suggested by a remark of Mr. Grant.

80. I shall now state a comparative account of the settlement of the Dewanny Lands in 1172 Bengal style, with that for the year 1193, ending in April 1787. I make choice of this period in preference to a later date, because the accounts of it are complete, and the variation which

Mr. Shore's Minute of June 1789, respecting Permanent Settlement of Lands in Bengal.

DEWANNY LAND:
	Gross Settlement.	Deduct Charges and Allowance.	Net Settlement.
B. Y. 1172 or 1765/6 A. D. - - - -	1,60,78,264	10,29,931	1,50,48,333
B. Y. 1193 or 1786/7 A. D. - - - -	1,49,54,808	4,18,469	1,45,36,338
Difference - - - -	11,23,456	6,11,462	5,11,995

81. The first line of the statement is extracted from Mr. Grant's Analysis, and the second from the records of the Revenue Accountant General. The following remarks may be necessary to elucidate the comparison:

82. The gross sum stated as the assessment of 1172, comprehended all that, publicly demanded from the dewanny lands under every denomination. It includes the rents of the salt lands, and duties of all kinds; the charges deducted are those entitled Muzroorat and Sebundy, or fixed allowances, and charges of establishments; and the third column contains the sum realizable for the Company.

(Appendix, Nos. 11 & 12.—These Accounts are prepared from the Records of the Custom-house by the Secretary of the Board of Revenue.)

83. The gross sum of assessment for 1193 is independent of the two following articles, viz

Amount customs actually realized, exclusive of charges -	R ^s 6,23,16,801
Salt duties transferred from the salt department -	6,67,36,152
Sicca Rupees -	12,90,52,953
Deduct difference between the Gross Jumma of 1172 and 1193, as above -	11,23,456
Remain excess in the Revenues of 1193, Sicca Rupees -	1,67,07,353
If the comparison be made between the next assessment of the two periods, the excess will be greater.—Amount Customs and Salt duties as above -	12,90,529 5 3
Deduct difference stated -	5,11,995
Excess Sicca Rupees -	7,78,534 5 3

84. As the customs collected at Calcutta and Chittagong belong properly to the ceded lands, and those collected at Chawwa and Patna to Behar, I have not inserted their amount; but that of the collections of Dacca, Houghly, and Moorshedabad only, as forming part of the revenue of the dewanny lands.

85. In like manner, the salt produced in the 24 Pergunnahs, and Chittagong, belonging properly to the ceded lands, I have stated only the Rowanna duties on the quantity produced in the dewanny lands of Hidjellee, Tumlook, Roymongul, and Baluah, including that part of the Hidjellee salt made in Midnapoor.

86. It is to be observed, that the charges stated in the abstract of 1193 are those only, which might be considered as transfers, such as allowances to the zemindars, canongoes, charitable donations, pensions, catechery charges, &c. for which the zemindars receive credit in their accounts with government; and I have, to avoid all objections, admitted some which are clearly disputable and might be rejected. My object is to compare what we demanded from the dewanny lands in 1786/7 with the sum assessed upon the same lands in 1765, and I have therefore admitted as a deduction from the gross demand, that part of the charges for 1193, or 1786/7, which is or may be paid by receipt, lest it should be objected to as a nominal jumma, because part of it might even be discharged in account, without being collected. The remainder to be paid, must be actually levied from the country.

87. The other expenses incidental to the revenue department, consisting of allowances to collectors and their assistants, charges of their establishments, dewanny and foudlarry adawlut, &c. have no connection with the object of the present comparison. The appropriation of the amount received, with the propriety of that appropriation, forms a distinct consideration.

88. Thus it indisputably appears, by any mode of comparison, that in 1786/7, the revenues of the dewanny lands of Bengal, forthcoming to the state, were actually more than in 1765/6; and if the collections of the two years be compared, we shall find the result equally favourable.

89. But, exclusive of the above excess, we are also to take into consideration the profits of the salt, which I cannot at present determine, and which are to be added to the excess above stated.

90. The

90. The net assessment of Bengal and Orissa, observing the prescribed rules in the deduction of charges, stand thus for 1193:

Dewanny lands - - - -	R ^s 1,45,36,338 13 12
Ceded lands; viz. Burdwan, 24 pergunnahs, town of Calcutta, Pauchwungong, Chittagong, Midnapore, Jelasore -	61,49,991 12 8
Tabqa Behar, acquired since the dewanny - - - -	73,07,111 1 1
Total - - - -	20,75,94,027 9 1
Customs and Duties - - - -	2,51,14,005 0 1
Resumption of alienated Lands in Midnapore - - - -	82,579 12 2
Sicca R^s - - - -	2,33,53,382 5 13

91. The net settlement in 1763, for the dewanny and ceded lands, exclusive of the sayer and customs of the town of Calcutta, according to Mr. Grant, is - 2,56,24,223
Add Midnapore, not included in this account, and rated by him at - 11,00,000
Total - - - Sicca R^s - 2,67,24,223

92. The difference between the two totals is, without fractions, 33,70,840; but if we are to take in the profits of the salt, not included in the total net assessment of 1193, the amount of which having been variously stated by Mr. Grant, and the comptroller of the manufacture, has not yet been determined: the difference will be less.

93. Against this conclusion it may be urged, that the profits of the salt, arising from an alteration in the mode of managing that branch of the revenue, ought not to be brought into the calculation. Without considering the validity of this observation, I shall content myself with stating the fact, leaving to the reader to form his own judgment upon it; remarking only, that as salt in Bengal is universally an essential to the existence of the inhabitants, the effect of the enhanced price of this article, upon the rents levied from the ryots, exceeding a hundred per cent. what it was in 1765, is to be considered, in forming a determination.

94. In tracing the progress of the assessment since the acquisition of the Dewanny, we find that its amount has generally been fixed, by conjectural estimates only; and hence it has happened, that the impositions at one time have been too heavy to be discharged, and remissions have been granted with almost the same facility with which the increase was demanded. A knowledge of the emoluments enjoyed by the zemindars and farmers, on a suspicion that they existed, has occasioned an augmentation of the assessment. Representations of real or pretended losses have procured, an abatement in it.

95. The professed object of the committee of circuit in 1772, was to ascertain the real value of the country, by letting it in farm for a term of years to the highest bidder. It was conceived that the natives were better informed of the value of the lands than their rulers, and that few would engage to pay what they could not find means to discharge. The event, however disappointed expectation, and this settlement before the expiration of the leases, existed, I believe, in no place, upon its original terms.

96. The farmers acting upon the principles of government found their estimate of the profits fallacious; they did not exist, or what was to them, the same, could not be realized. Complaints of inability to discharge the settlement were preferred from all parts of the country, and the government in my opinion adopted the wisest alternative, that of lowering it. To have compelled the persons who had made themselves responsible for the revenues under such circumstances, to stand to the terms of their engagements, would have established the universal oppression; for ignorant as most of them were, of the actual resources of the country, and incapable of ascertaining them, extortion could alone have supplied the funds, for acquitting themselves of their obligations, supposing those funds to have really existed.

97. The settlement of the committee of revenue in 1781 was made upon similar principles. It is true that the lands were not let out to the highest bidders, and in general, the zemindars had a preference; but the increase levied from the country was not regulated, by an accurate knowledge of its resources. The khalsa accounts compared with such other information as could be obtained of the state of the districts, furnished the materials for fixing the amount of the assessment.

98. It has been the object of this government to raise as large a revenue as it could, without distress to its subjects. They on the contrary, equally attentive to their own interests, exert their ingenuity to procure a diminution in the amount of their contributions. Upon these terms, an officer of government, and a zemindar or farmer, when a settlement is to be concluded, meet. The former, looks to the highest amount of the settlement and collections for former years, and attempts to gain for his constituents what he deems them entitled to; the latter, pleads inability, and suggests a variety of reasons to show the necessity for lowering the amount. It may so happen, that both the demand may be right, and the facts stated in objection be just; that is, that resources may exist, which sufficiently counterbalance the affirmed losses, and which the zemindars or farmers will not discover, or the reverse may be true. In the former case, government, by insisting upon its own terms, gains gains only, what it ought; but wanting accurate information of the real state of the district, and of the sources from which its demands are to be made good, is exposed to future deficiency, from claims which cannot be refuted. In the latter, the zemindar must either be dispossessed or become subject to distress, from which he is to recover by future exaction.

99. This summary explanation of our proceedings in fixing the assessment of the country, shows one difficulty under which I labour, in estimating what the amount of it should be. Let an application be made to any district in proof of what I assert. Take for instance Rungpoor, the revenues of which, with various intervening augmentations and diminutions, most of them conjecturally made, stand for the years stated as follows:

Collector's letter, dated 16 January 1787.	Bengal year.	A. D.	R.
	1109	1762/3	11,29,324
	71	64/5	5,09,182
	75	68/9	9,11,789
	78	71/2	11,01,743
	81	74/5	7,95,298
	88	81/2	9,47,188
	93	86/7	7,39,244

100. The settlement of Rungpoor for 1178 was declaredly formed upon a hustabood or examination of the assets of the district; yet it was not realized within 1,87,128 rupees; for many of the component articles of the assessment, were merely conjectural; and one in particular, to the amount of 81,960 rupees, is called by the very term of conjectural increase.

101. If a question were asked, which of the above years we should adopt as a standard for estimating the revenue of Rungpoor, one person would take the highest, and another the lowest amount, and both would probably be wrong. Perhaps by tracing the various reasons assigned for the progressive increase and decrease, and by comparing the receipts with the demands; by ascertaining the circumstances of the season on which the eventual ability of any district to make good its assessment greatly depends, and contrasting them with those of other years; and, finally, by knowing in what manner the collections were made during that year; an answer approaching to the truth might be given.

102. The assessment of Rungpoor for 1193, is nearly a thirty-eight part of the total assessment for all Bengal; and although variations in the same degree, may not prevail in every district, they will still be sufficient to point out the fallacy of reasoning from general statements, and justify an indulgence to conjecture upon this subject.

103. The settlement of Cossim Ali seems to me to have furnished the principal foundations of Mr. Grant's opinion, that the country is prodigiously under rated; but he also appeals to many other arguments, some of which I shall now consider, without any particular attention to the order in which he introduces them.

104. First, the numerous taxes imposed upon the assul or original rent paid by the ryots since the Company's acquisition of the dewanny, from which it is contended that the rents levied by the zemindars greatly exceed the demands of government, which have not since been proportionably augmented.

105. The statements exhibited of these taxes are much too partial to warrant a general conclusion of this nature, which I do not think would follow from an unrestricted admission of the fact. This may be accounted for, upon other principles. A calculation, founded upon the observation, and applied to the zemindary of Rajeshahy, gives the produce of that district at sixty-three lacks of rupees per annum. The manifest disproportion of this amount to the highest revenue ever imposed upon that district, and exceeding in a twofold proportion the sum ever known to have been realized from it, is a strong presumptive proof of the fallacy of the calculation; which with me is decisive.

106. The truth is, that the most fassil or anterior records and accounts have undergone such variations in form and principles, as scarcely to admit of any conclusion, from a comparative statement of them at this period, with the same accounts twenty-five years ago. In proportion as imposts have been multiplied, the assul or original rent has fallen in its rates; and in some places, the revenues are principally made good from the superadded cesses. An accurate knowledge of the population and cultivation of the country, at the two periods of comparison; of the relative value of money; of the taxes formerly imposed; and of extra demands annually levied; is the test by which any just conclusion could be obtained from a comparison of this nature. Including the duties on salt, the general amount of the revenue has not decreased since we acquired the dewanny. The premises therefore admit another conclusion, which I do not however contend for, that the burthen of the impositions was so heavy as to force the subjects of the state into exaction.

107. Mr. Grant, in one part of his Analysis, seems to consider the entire original gross produce of the lands of Bengal to be twenty crores of rupees. I dissent from his supposition. It would be difficult to establish an unobjectionable standard by which the gross produce could be deemed unreasonable.

109. For this purpose, I assume as a fact, the Ryots pay in a proportion of one-half of the gross produce of their lands, and I suppose the revenue collected by government to be for Bengal two crores of rupees. I am willing further to allow, that the charges of collection, by which I mean those only paid by the zemindars, farmers, and other gradations of land-holders holders and renters, to be 15 per cent. upon this amount, and the intermediate profits between the government and the ryots to be 35 per cent. more. This allowance upon the whole is very ample, and gives altogether three crores, which considered as one half of the gross produce only, the total would be then six crores. If to this again we are to add, the rents of the alienated lands upon the most exaggerated estimate, and considering that estimate as one half of the gross produce only, the entire gross produce would not exceed rupees 8,51,27,826, which is less by nearly one and a half, than what Mr. Holwell rates it; and which in Mr. Grant's opinion, is as much below the true amount, as it exceeds the revenue actually forthcoming to the state. I do not pretend to have studied accuracy in this calculation, which is merely speculative; but it will not be deemed unfair by those who have had experience in the collections. It is sufficiently correct, to limit their demands for rent to one-fourth of the gross produce, deemed by Mr. Grant the sovereign's proprietary share; the actual collections upon the supposition of a resumption of all the alienated lands (which I deem impossible) would be equal only to their present amount.

110. Secondly, The existence of alienated lands which Mr. Grant supposed would yield one crore and twenty-five lacks of rupees. This estimate is formed upon a rule of proportion, drawn from the ascertained accounts of the ceded lands, and applied to the dewanny lands.

111. From the records of the investigation set on foot in 1777, it appears that the alienated lands under the two distinctions specified, were as follows:

	Begas.
Chackeran or land allotted for the maintenance of public servants	12,04,847 5
Bazee Jumma or land held by Brahmins and others	43,96,095
Total Begas	55,00,942 5

And admitting Mr. Grant's calculation of alienated land in districts which were not exposed to the investigation, we must add begas 27,75,000 to the above, making a total of begas 8,375; adopting his rate of one rupee and a half per bega, the quantity would yield 1,25,63,013 rupees per annum.

112. The alienated lands have already employed much of my attention, and the subject has been frequently discussed on the public proceedings; I shall not repeat what is there recorded, but confine myself to general observations only, principally relating to the preceding calculations, and some remarks made by Mr. Grant.

113. I do not consider the bankar or chackeran to be a fund of which government can with propriety avail itself for increasing the revenues; as I believe the actual charges of collections to be fully equal to the produce of the lands applicable to defray them, as far as those are ascertained.

114. The only part of the alienated lands, from the annexation of which any increase of revenue appears to me practicable, is that under the head of bazee zemin; the total of which, including for the sake of argument Mr. Grant's estimate for the districts not investigated, such a will be 71,71,095 begas. But according to the rules adopted by this government, such a portion only of the quantity is liable to resumption, as may have been alienated since the company's acquisition of the dewanny. We must exclude alienations, either originally admitted or subsequently confirmed by authority.

115. What this quantity may be, I do not pretend to ascertain with any degree of precision. By the principles upon which the investigation was conducted in Midnapore, and which have been since confirmed with no material variation, supposing the circumstances to be throughout similar, the resumption would yield 35 lacs of rupees. In Midnapore, the alienated lands amounted to begas 2,00,863, and the produce reannexed to the public assessment is 1,00,474 rupees.

116. I by no means allow, that the profits of the alienated lands are wholly enjoyed by the zemindars; on the contrary, I am of opinion, that they have been as grossly defrauded by these alienations, as the government itself: admitting the fact to be otherwise, and the zemindars to participate in the advantages of these secreted resources, I have every reason to conclude, that their profits are as little, generally speaking, as the government ought to leave them.

117. The rates of assessment are so heavy upon the ryots in many districts, that I believe their capacity to discharge them, arises from their secretly holding lands which pay no rent. How far this may extend, I know not.

118. Lastly; the detection and resumption of alienated lands, particularly such as are possessed by bramins and others, who have obtained them in charity, are operations attended with great difficulty and peculiar embarrassment to the government and its officers; and such, as are not easily surmounted. Popular prejudices and humanity must be resisted, to accomplish it.

119. These considerations, must be opposed to all estimates of the alienated lands, considered as an available fund for increasing the revenue of government; however indisputable the right of the sovereign may be to the revenue of lands separated, without his sanction and authority. The Mahomedan government certainly tolerated these alienations, though not perhaps in the extent to which they have now arisen. This appears from Mr. Grant's Analysis.

120. That some advantages may be gained from this source, I have little doubt; what it may prove, I cannot ascertain, and I shall not conjecture.

121. Thirdly, The augmentation in the revenue of the ceded lands, beyond the amount at which they were assigned to the Company; whence it is concluded that the dewanny lands are equally capable of an increase on their assessment.

The following statement of the ceded lands is contained in Mr. Grant's Analysis:—

Assul Jumna of 1722;
Khalsa and Jagheer	27,05,826
Abwab in eight articles to the death of Aliverdy in 1756; with the serf sicea of Cossim Ali	10,26,896
Kefayet of Cossim, in three articles, with Abwab Foujdarry of Subah Khan in part	2,07,204
Towfeer of Meer Cossim	87,179
	14,11,279
	41,17,105
Muzcoorat Sebundy, &c.	65,454
	40,51,651

122. His argument is founded upon a comparison of the above sum of 40,51,651, including a very moderate increase established by Meer Cossim, and the assessment of the ceded lands, since levied by the Company. The exorbitant increase upon the dewanny lands, took place in 1761 and 1762; and they were delivered over to us with a great part of it still remaining. The deduction therefore is not just, because the premises are not similar; on the contrary, as the revenues of the dewanny lands in 1765, were much higher than they were in 1760, when we obtained possession of the ceded lands, the latter might admit of an enhancement, when the former required abatements.

123. This reasoning will, I believe, be deemed fair, and a sufficient answer to the assertion to which it applies. I might farther, in opposition to it, contend, that if the dewanny lands, since they came under our administration, had been as capable of increase as the ceded lands, the revenues would have been proportionably enhanced. They have now been for eighteen years under European management, and various methods have been tried to augment the revenues of them. It can never follow, because one district yields a larger revenue than it formerly did, that another must; local circumstances may produce this effect, in one instance, which do not apply, in others. Exaction diminishes the resources of one district; whilst equity, moderation, and good management, raise those of another. And I might with equal reason argue, that because the valuation of some districts have diminished, remissions ought to be granted in all.

124. In opposition to the idea of enhancing the assessment, the following facts and observations appear worthy of attention:

First. The diminution in the population from the famine of 1770, by which a fifth of the inhabitants, on the most moderate computation, is supposed to have perished. In 1784 the same calamity prevailed, though in a much less degree; and in 1787 many lives were lost in the Eastern provinces by inundations, as well as in the last year, from partial scarcity.

125. It has been contended, that the amount of the revenues realized in 1770 proves, the effect of the calamity to have been less fatal than is generally supposed. The consequences resulted from the additional burthens imposed upon those who escaped, and which the enhanced price of grain and other necessaries of life enabled them to discharge.

126. That the increase of population in Bengal is rapid, seems obvious to common observation; but whatever estimate we may form upon this subject, it may be reasonably concluded, that the productive labour of the country is less at this period, than it was before the calamity of 1770.

127. Mr. Grant maintains the reverse of this assertion, and contends for an increased population, with reasons derived from the augmented consumption of salt.

128. This argument rests upon so many hypothetical circumstances, that I think it can never warrant a satisfactory conclusion. I deem it impossible to ascertain with accuracy the exact quantum of the manufacture and consumption in the year 1765. From the calculations regarding population, a period of eighteen years for the recovery of a fifth of the inhabitants, considering at the same time the deductions to be made for subsequent calamities, I believe insufficient: I do not profess myself well informed upon the subject.

129. Secondly, It is a certain fact, that the zemindars are almost universally poor. This assertion, if doubted or disputed, may be enquired into with respect to the zemindars of Rajeshahy, Beerbhoom, Jessore, Nuddea, Dinagepoor, and Salsyka; to whom I do not mean to restrict it. Justice and humanity call for this declaration, in opposition to insinuations of the zemindars are wallowing in wealth and luxury.

130. I do not, however, attribute this fact to the extortions of our government, but to other causes, which I shall hereafter point out, and which will be found sufficient to account for the effect. I am by no means convinced that the reverse would have taken place, if the measure of our exactions had been more moderate.

131. Thirdly,

131. Thirdly, The Company are merchants as well as sovereigns of the country. In the former capacity, they engross its trade; whilst in the latter, they appropriate the revenues. The remittances to Europe of revenues, are made in the commodities of the country, which are purchased by them.

132. Whatever allowance we may make for the increased industry of the subjects of the state, owing to the enhanced demand for the produce of it (supposing the demand to be enhanced) there is reason to conclude, that the benefits are more than counterbalanced, by evils inseparable from the system of a remote foreign dominion.

133. From Mr. Grant's Analysis it appears, that, exclusive of remittances by bills, of which a considerable proportion was probably sent in specie by the drawers to answer them, the sum of eight crores twelve lacs of rupees was actually sent in specie to Delhi, during Sujah Khan's viceroyalty, in a period of ten years and a half. I may perhaps be warranted in assuming, the sum of one crore of rupees as the amount of the annual remittance from Bengal and Behar to Delhi in specie, for the period stated; and the total in British money may be rated at ten millions and a half.

135. Whatever superabundance of wealth we may suppose then to have existed in the country, it is evident that, as the circulation does not appear to have been affected, these enormous drains must have been replenished by very large returns; and the fact itself proves an extensive commerce as the means of providing these returns.

135. Every information, from the time of Bernier to the acquisition of the Dewanny, shows the internal trade of the country, as carried on between Bengal and the upper parts of Hindostan, the gulf of Moro, the Persian gulf, and the Malabar coast, to have been very considerable. Returns of specie and goods were made through these channels, by that of the Foreign European companies, and in gold dust for opium, from the eastward.

136. But from the year 1765, the reverse has taken place. The Company's trade produces no equivalent returns. Specie is rarely imported by the foreign companies; nor brought into Bengal from other parts of Hindostan, in any considerable quantities.

137. The exports of specie from the country for the last twenty-five years have been great; and particularly, during the last ten of that period. It is well understood, although the remittances to China are, by the government, provided by bills, that specie to a large amount, has been exported to answer them; in the same manner, great part of the sums sent by bills of the shroffs to Bombay and Madras, travel over the peninsula in bags. Silver bullion is also remitted by individuals to Europe; the amount cannot be calculated, but must, since the Company's accession to the dewanny, have been very considerable.

138. During the last two years, a considerable discount has been taken by the shroffs upon the exchange of gold mohurs. Every mode of enquiry, both public and private, has been adopted, for ascertaining the cause of it, but without success. The fact is chiefly confined to Calcutta, where the gold mohurs almost exclusively obtain a general circulation; but the effect is felt in all commercial dealings throughout the country.

139. We have no authority to conclude, that any sudden cause had taken place to produce this consequence; and we have reason to presume, that it has been greatly enhanced by the artifices of the shroffs and money changers. The occasional effect of the remedies applied to stop these evils, proves the supposition; but my opinion, confirmed by the sentiments of many others, is, that the foundation of this discount existed in the quantity of silver, without which it could never have been practised or enhanced, in the enormous degree to which it arose. The depreciated state of the silver currency throughout Bengal, is with me also a confirmation, though not a necessary consequence of a diminution in the quantity of silver.

140. Upon the whole I have no hesitation in concluding, that, since the Company's acquisition of the dewanny, the current specie of the country has been greatly diminished in quantity; that the old channels of importation, by which the drains were formerly replenished, are now in a great measure closed; and that the necessity of supplying China, Madras and Bombay, with money, as well as the exportation of it by Europeans to England, will contribute still further to exhaust the country of its silver.

141. If we were to suppose the internal trade of Hindostan again revived, the export of the productions of the country by the Company must still prevent those returns which trade formerly poured in. This is an evil inseparable from an European government.

142. It is obvious to any observation, that the specie of the country is much diminished; and I consider this as a radical evil, which, without some unforeseen changes, will progressively operate to affect the British interests in Bengal. The real quantity required for the circulation of the country, considering the expedition with which returns are made, may be comparatively moderate; but an annual diminution of that amount, whatever it may be, must by degrees affect the circulation. I do not imagine that large sums are now, as formerly, hoarded. The advantages derived from the purchase of paper afford a temptation to the natives in Calcutta, with whom the riches of the country almost exclusively center, to bring their stock to market; and if this observation be deemed well founded, the circulation may in future be still further affected, in proportion as the Company discharge their paper debt.

143. To form a correct judgment of the weight of the assessment upon the country generally, we ought to possess the following data:

First.—A knowledge of the rents actually paid by the ryots, compared with the produce of their labour.

Secondly.

Secondly.—Accurate accounts of what the zemindars and farmers collect, and of their payments to government.

Thirdly.—Detailed accounts of the alienated lands, showing the quantity of them, the person by whom they were granted, the dates of the grants, and those by whom they are now held; in order to determine how far a resumption should take place.

144. All the material part of this information is wanting; and to procure it, would require much time and indefatigable research. But there are certain points connected with it, which are ascertained; and these may enable us to adopt some probable conclusion, though less certain than what the premised information would afford.

145. I believe that the ryots in Bengal are generally taxed in a proportion of one half of the produce of their labour, and we must therefore admit that the assessment with respect to them is, full as much as it ought to be, supposing it even to be one-third; that it is so, seems the general opinion, whether the stated proportion be just or not; we also know from observation and experience, that the mode of living amongst the zemindars is neither ostentatious nor expensive; and that the proportion of the collections left to them, does not exceed one tenth of their amount; and as we have the clearest evidence that they are in general needy and embarrassed with debt, we may without hesitation pronounce, that their profits are not immoderate.

146. Amongst these conclusions, it may be stated, that much collusion exists in the collection of the rents and revenues; and that it is practised both by the ryots and zemindars, as well as by the intermediate classes, and more particularly by the head ryots or munduls. But from what I can collect upon this subject, by my own enquiries and from the reports of the collectors, I should rather suppose that the detection of these abuses would prove of advantage towards the equalization of the demands for rent, than productive of any considerable increase, the practicability or amount of which, is not within the bounds of conjecture.

147. The resumption of alienated lands is a separate resource, which may add to the revenues without imposing new burthens upon the ryots or zemindars, provided that in the execution of it, an allowance be made for those situations where the produce of these secreted treasures, is at present applied to the discharge of the public rents of other lands.

148. Any decision with regard to the assessment upon the country which may be formed from general statements of the demands only, is liable to be fallacious, and at the best can only be probable. Authentic accounts of the revenues actually levied from the country for a continued series of years, where the circumstances of it with respect to cultivation, population, specie, and commerce, can be proved to be similar, or where the difference can be ascertained, may furnish a standard for comparison at a future period. Adopting, however, the accounts referred to in this discussion as a test, the actual revenues of the Bengal year 1193, terminating in April 1787, will, upon the whole, be found to exceed the receipts of any year before Cossim Ali, whose settlement I reject as any fair standard of comparison. The difference between the amount of the settlement of the first year of the dewanny and that of 1193 or 1786/7, is upon the whole, in favour of the latter, without including the profits on salt; for the decrease in the land revenues is more than made up by the customs and duties; and when we reflect upon the annual diminution of the specie from that period until the present time; when we consider the effects of the famine and subsequent partial scarcity and calamities, with other arguments which have been stated, we may perhaps pronounce the present assessment, nearly equal to what it ought to be. I state this conclusion, with an exception of any increase which may arise from a resumption of alienated lands made with a due consideration of the circumstances attending them.

149. This conclusion is deduced from comparison of abstract accounts, and from arguments of a general nature; and upon these grounds, it may be just. When the information which has been furnished by the collectors upon their respective districts is taken into consideration, we may perhaps be enabled, by a more particular examination and comparison of the revenues and circumstances of each, to adopt a more accurate result regarding the total assessment; for I am willing to admit, that the revenues of some districts appear to be decreased with sufficient reasons assigned, others on the contrary may be rated too high. I shall not hesitate to renounce my present opinion, if in this examination I should see cause to warrant it, but I rather believe that it will confirm the sentiments which I have expressed.

150. Mr. Grant computes the gross revenue of Bengal, expedient and proper to be drawn into the royal exchequer, at 5 crores three lacks of rupees, and estimating the charges incidental to the collections at fifty-six lacks, leaves for the company a clear revenue from the subah of four crores forty-seven lacks, including a positive resumable yearly defalcation of at least two crores of sicca rupees.

151. I neither admit his estimate nor his conclusion; both which I deem wholly unsupported by established facts or solid arguments. No man of experience, I believe, will assert that the country exhibits any external signs of this prodigious wealth; it is not to be discovered, in the accumulation of the ryots or zemindars, nor to be accounted for, in the extravagance of the latter. In tracing the revenues of the country for a period of more than two hundred years, we find no statements to justify Mr. Grant's calculations; neither the abilities of Jaffer Khan, nor the attempted extortions of Cossim Ali afford any support to them. The discovery was reserved to the present period; but until better proofs be produced in support of it, I trust to the wisdom of all periods to decline adopting his estimate as any principle of action.

152. In recording my opinion in opposition to the arguments and sentiments expressed by Mr. Grant, I disavow every idea of speaking lightly of his Analysis. The labour and ingenuity of his researches are highly meritorious; they display a superior degree of knowledge and abilities, which I most readily admit and applaud, and am happy to avail myself of them whenever I can, with practical experience, in the collections and management of the revenues, which Mr. Grant does not profess to have acquired. He might have found many reasons to distrust the reality of his speculations; and still more, the possibility of reducing them to practice. On this point, indeed my sentiments are absolutely irreconcilable with those which he has adopted. I am well aware of the embarrassment under which the company labour, from the enormity of their present debts; and if the resources of the country afforded in my opinion available means for diminishing the burthens equal to what Mr. Grant supposes, I should not hesitate to recommend an attempt for securing them; but convinced as I am, that the attempt would be unsuccessful and distressing, the obligations of my duty impose upon me the avowal of this conviction.

153. I shall now proceed to consider a question of the first importance;—by what mode of agency the collection of the revenues of this country can be made, with the greatest advantage to the Company. The court of directors have in fact decided it, and I might content myself with recommending measures in conformity to their decisions, without discussing the propriety of them; but I deem it my duty to record the observations suggested by my own experience, which will either afford new reasons in support of the resolutions adopted in Europe, or furnish matter for future consideration and decision.

154. There are three modes by which the revenues of the country may be realized for the state. First, by employing officers for this purpose on the part of government, to collect them immediately from the ryots or lower denomination of tenants, without the agency of the zemindars or farmers. This mode of management is usually termed khas; the inferior agents and receivers under the collector are chosen by him, and have fixed salaries allotted to them.

155. The due and successful administration of this plan, supposes sufficient knowledge and experience in the collector employed, with respect to the rent and land, to regulate all the detail of the settlement and collections, as well as time and application to go through with it, the Mofussil account should be examined; the charge of the inferior agents, whether employed to collect the rents of a village or pergunnah, should be inspected; and curtailed where exorbitant; the number must be regulated; and the rent of each village and indeed of every ryot ought to be adjusted.

156. The advantages attending this mode of settlement, in speculation are these: The collector has it in his power to reduce the cesses where they are burthensome, and to equalize the assessment paid by the lower classes of ryots; it affords him an opportunity of ascertaining the resources of the district, to acquire a knowledge of any improper reductions which have been made in the rental, to afford relief where wanted, to encourage improvement, and to establish such regulations as he may deem best calculated for the security of the cultivators of the soil, against present exaction and future oppression.

157. It ought also to be the most productive, by bringing to the account of government the profits of intermediate farmers and contractors, as well as the produce of their frauds and embezzlements.

158. The objections to the plan and its disadvantages are these:—That it presumes a degree of knowledge, experience and application in the collectors, which is rarely to be found or attained: It may exist in those of the present day, without any assurance that it will be found, in their successors. The selection of proper inferior agents depends upon them; and their fidelity and exertions, from the dewan and vigilance of the superintending lowest deputy, will be in proportion to the ability and vigilance of the superintending officer. If incapable of examining the accounts of his agents, and of detecting the fallacies of them, he will be exposed to constant imposition, and the public loss will be proportionably great. The same effects would follow from indolence.

159. The government is not secured, with respect to its revenues, by any specific engagements; it must stand to all losses and accident of seasons; where the ryots fail or are unable to pay, there is no remedy, and the annual amount of the revenues must be subject to considerable variation. The native officers employed in the detail of the business, are only bound to a responsibility generally for the faithful discharge of the trust reposed in them, and to account for what they collect.

160. The board of revenue can exercise little control over this mode of management, but must rely upon the conducting officer; the detail is too minute for their inspection.

161. Where the operation is applied to counteract the success of the collector, and a sub-in worse, employs himself secretly to counteract the success of the collector, and a subsistence must be allowed him by the government.

162. In general it will be found, that the settlements attempted upon this plan, have proved unsuccessful under our administration. It was however often executed by the Mahomedan government, who entered into all the details of the business, and examined the accounts of the amil or collector with rigour and minuteness. Whether, for this reason, it ought to be attempted by us, or not, remains to be decided.

of Lands in Bengal.

163. In the execution of a khas settlement, as usually performed, the details which I have described are seldom entered into; and it means little more than delegating authority to the collector of a district, to conclude specific engagements with farmers or with petty landholders for the rents of the several pergunnahs and divisions, instead of entering into an agreement for the revenues of the whole zemindary, with the proprietor of it. These engagements are more or less detailed, at the discretion of the collector. The principal advantage attending this mode of management, is the probability of larger receipts. That, rests upon the supposition, that the zemindar declines engaging for the revenue of his lands, and that the resources of them, are equal to the assessment on them; as well as to furnish a provision to the zemindar upon the collector's knowledge of these emoluments, and upon his ability to collect them. With regard to the persons with whom he may enter into engagements, a comparative advantage may arise to them; that of a better security from contracting with government, than with the zemindar; but this ought not to be the case, where the collector knows and discharges his duty. In other respects, the plan combines many of the evils attending the farming system; which is now to be considered.

164. The conveniences of collecting the revenues by farmers are, few and small; whilst the disadvantages are, many and great. It is certainly easy and simple to contract with a farmer for the revenues of a district; and this is all that can be said for it. Experience proves that it is fallacious in point of security, for the farmers and securities both fail; and that it is oppressive in its execution. The engagements with a farmer, from a deficiency of local knowledge in the officers of government, can seldom be made with sufficient precision to prevent impositions on his part; and the subsequent attempt to redress them, generally affords him grounds for claiming remissions. A temporary farmer never looks to future improvement of the collections, who ought ever to be excluded; those who are in the service of Europeans, and participate their influence: But as it stands universally condemned, there is no occasion to detail inconveniences, which are acknowledged. The partial admission of farmers may perhaps take place on the grounds of necessity, as a remedy against greater evils.

165. The Third mode is to make a settlement with the zemindars; and upon this subject I must apologise for being diffuse.

166. The situation of a zemindar combines two relations; one, which originates in the property of the land, a portion of the rents of which he pays to the state; and the other, in his capacity of an officer of government, for protecting the peace of the country, and for securing the subjects of the state from oppression. An extent of country yielding a proportion of one crore of rupees, equivalent to a million sterling, is the property of the zemindars of Burdwan, Rajshahy, Dinagore, Nuddea, Beerbhoom, Bishenpore, and Jessore.

167. If we consider their relative situations; the importance of the character will be apparent. Justice, integrity, moderation, humanity, a knowledge of their own rights and those of their tenants, an attention to business, and an acquaintance with the detail of it, ought to be their characteristics. Setting aside the moral part of their characters, I shall more particularly consider how far they possess the two last qualities mentioned, without which the former must be in a great measure, silent unproductive virtues.

168. With respect to the zemindars generally, opposite opinions, as is the case upon most subjects in this country, have prevailed. By some the zemindars have been considered as the natural guardians and beneficent protectors of the ryots, and as the objects of their esteem and veneration. By others, they have been decried as an useless, idle, oppressive race, practising every species of extortion, or countenancing it by their inactivity and ignorance.

169. If a review of the zemindars in Bengal were made, it would be found that very few are duly qualified for the management of their hereditary lands; and that, in general, they are ill-educated for this task; ignorant of the common forms of business, and of the modes of transacting it; inattentive of the conduct of it, even where their own interests are immediately at stake, and indisposed to undertake it. Women of this denomination are, by their own laws and customs, secluded from all immediate interference. Minors, from their natural incapacity, are in the same predicament.

170. Let a zemindar be asked, what are the rents, and rules for demanding and fixing them, in his district, or in any part of it; what is the assessment of any pergunnah; what is the particular produce of any part of it; whether that produce has increased or declined; what manufactures are established in it; in short, let the questions have any reference to the internal detail of the business and state of the country, his replies would probably be the same, as if he had never entered it, or he would refer to his dewan or some officer for information. On one point, he is always clear and explicit, the inability of his lands to pay the assessment; nor will he hesitate to state the decline of cultivation, as the cause of it, although, if true, it must have been chiefly owing to his own bad management.

171. The business in general, is exclusively transacted by the zemindary servants; and all that the principal looks to, is a release from the trouble of attending it, an exemption from the importunities of government, and a sufficiency to gratify his wants, present or anticipated. In their houses the zemindars are treated with respect and attention by their domestics; and are flattered, soothed and served, in proportion to the hopes, fears and interests, of the parties concerned. But although the power of dismissal and appointment of their servants rests with them; and although this power is employed as a source of traffic and

Mr. Shore's Minute of
June 1789, respecting the Management

and management, the zemindars are as much dependent upon their servants, as the latter are upon them.

172. Their ryots have seldom access to them; and when they are permitted to approach them, or force an intrusion with complaints and petitions, they are dismissed with a reference to the dewan, or perhaps sent back to their houses, with an order, in the name of the zemindar, which the former has dictated; nor is the sale of justice uncommon with them.

173. The avowal of their hereditary rights, and the great regard paid to them by the British government, has inspired the zemindars with an idea that these rights are indefeasible: very few instances have indeed occurred to contradict it. This opinion is propagated, with the same conviction, through all the classes of talookdars and ryots within their jurisdiction, and hence they have acquired a permanent influence over all their tenants. Its operation of late years has seldom, I believe, proved beneficial to the country. In one respect, it has been sometimes attended with great evils, that of preventing the ryots complaining against exactions; for the latter reason this way, "although we should now obtain redress, we shall in future be exposed to resentment."

174. The ignorance of the zemindars, and their great inattention to the management of the concerns for which they are responsible, is as deplorable as it is universal. I shall detail some of the consequences attending it.

175. They seldom know the principles upon which government acts with regard to them. Every transaction is misrepresented; and those which proceed from a sense of justice or moderation in the ruling power, are explained to have been effected by intrigues, or the successful applications of influence.

176. All the principal zemindars have vakeels or agents in Calcutta, whose business is to inform them of what passes, or is supposed to pass, regarding them. The habit of intrigue, and of attempting to obtain, by indirect means, that which, if proper, would be accorded as a matter of course; and, if improper, by none, is of such long standing, and so inveterate as only to be eradicated by time. Hence it happens that when a zemindar fails in obtaining his object, he imputes it to a want of interest in his solicitors, or perhaps to other motives more injurious to the reputation of the government and its officers; and when he succeeds, the credit of administration is not raised with him.

177. But the effects of misrepresentations upon ignorance, are far more extensive. The zemindars are encouraged in disobedience and evasions; they are taught to ascribe to the favour and indulgence, or to the resentment of individuals, the censure or compliance of the supreme power, and they are made to believe that every thing depends upon intrigue, without any relation to system or to principles. The common variations in the practice of a government, where uniformity is not invariably observed, will add strength to these sentiments; and the zemindars of course adopt them, as rules of conduct.

178. But the most serious consequences of the ignorance and incapacity of the zemindars, are those which affect their ryots. Let the situation of a man, in this predicament, at the head of a large zemindary, the management of which is intricate to a degree, be considered. Nothing can be more evident, than that he must be exposed to endless frauds and impositions. His head farmers obtain leases, at an under value, for private considerations paid to the managing officer; or, by the same means, remissions at the close of them. Impositions prevail through all the gradations of renters to the ryots: hence proceed alienations of land, unknown to the zemindar or his officers; deductions in the rents of some tenants, made up by augmentations, on those of others; fabrications and mutilations of accounts, at the end of a lease; fraudulent concealments, for temporary stipulations; the perpetual introduction of new taxes; conciliatory remissions, at the commencement of a lease; and arbitrary impositions at the expiration of it, with the endless catalogue of abuses, which perplex mofussil accounts, and render a remedy difficult.

179. I wish to make these remarks intelligible to those, who have had little experience of the facts on which they are founded. Perhaps the following detail may, for this purpose, be of use.

180. A zemindar, possessing an extensive district, having made a settlement with government, relets, in portions, to several farmers; they again, make over their leases, in whole or in part, to others; and these again, to renters of inferior denominations. To reverse this operation, the ryots, who cultivate the soil, pay to a head ryot, mundul or gomastah, of which each village, according to its extent, has one or more; these to a renter of two or three villages; he, to a farmer of a terf or division, comprehending several; and so on, through the farmers of a pergunnah to the zemindar; and ultimately, to the officer of government.

181. This is the description of the detail of business, in most of the principal zemindaries. If, in some, the zemindars should employ their own officers, it diminishes the gradations but little. It is only in the smaller zemindaries and talookdaries, and that not invariably, that the proprietors collect the rents from their ryots: in general, they are far removed from them.

182. Where the fundamental principle of the collections is not fixed, it will not be surprising, that in every district, there should be a constant struggle between fraud, exaction and concealment. Where a zemindar knows nothing beyond his engagements with his own immediate farmers, and those imperfectly, the operation must be extensive. The zemindary officers, exclusive of the * bids, derived from a regard to their own interests, are seldom sufficiently informed of what passes in the numerous stages of the business.

183. The following quotation from an address of the collector of Rajeshahy, is in point : speaking of that extensive zemindarry, he says,

184. The people in this country have eternally in their mouths, "the necessity of distinguishing between sudder and mofussil; by which they mean, in this instance, the difference between the general knowledge that can reach the governing power, compared to the real state of things in the detail." The deputy, in his pergunnah court, if he never leaves it, will form a very defective judgment of the state of his village; the zemindar, if he relies upon his deputy or dewan, will know as little of his pergunnahs."

185. He adds a reflection, which, though not strictly applicable in this place, is too important to pass unnoticed: "What comparative knowledge a temporary superintendent of collections can obtain, with whatever labour, need not be told; he may often be working, both day and night, upon the most mistaken principles, and acquiring, not knowledge, but confirming error."

186. I have assigned to incapacity and want of application in the zemindars, what has been attributed to worse motives; but this, I believe, is certain, that whatever their follies or vices may be, they are themselves the principal sufferers. It is not from profusion or from the exorbitancy of the demands of government, that they are generally, at this time poor and in debt. Ignorance and inactivity have loaded them with the responsibility of discharging obligations which they might, perhaps with moderate abilities and attention, have avoided.

187. The preceding description will explain an observation which has formerly been made, that the apparent justice of restoring a zemindar to the management of his lands, has not always proved conformable to humanity. The ruin of the zemindar of Baldacaul, who was neither a minor nor female, is a direct proof of it; many instances of real distress, the consequence of this measure, might be exhibited. Nothing perhaps has more embarrassed the officers of government, than to unite the justice of the measure, with the protection of the zemindars property. The attempt has often been defeated, when the utmost consideration and labour have been bestowed upon its accomplishment; and it has been sometimes found, that the only method for insuring this object, was to let the lands in farm, and provide a separate maintenance for the zemindar. Even there, the very means have been employed to defeat the end proposed, and the sums which were destined to the subsistence of the zemindar, have been dissipated by his servants in unavailing intrigues for his restoration to a nominal trust; and their access to real power, or the pretext, has been used to cover their own frauds.

188. The opposition which often subsists between a collector of government and a zemindar, has been held forth to public observation, in innumerable instances; the object of both ought to be the same, but they seldom agree. This also may be attributed to the ignorance of the zemindar, and the intrigues of the zemindarry servants, contending for influence, which are equally directed to the subversion of the collector's authority, and of the power of each other.

189. When a collector attempts to check abuses, the zemindar is made to believe that his authority is annihilated; if he restrains exactions, that the sources of the revenue are narrowed; if he controls the conduct of the zemindarry officers, that he acts from a wish to take the management into his own hands. Hence representations on one side, intrigues on the other, the ryots are ushered in as complainants, and every mode exerted to infuse suspicions of the integrity and conduct of the collector. In the district, an underhand influence is employed to counteract legal authority, and universal confusion prevails. The collector complains that his power is subverted; and the zemindar that he is oppressed. The impartiality of government exhibited in patient investigation, has been imputed by each party, to a design to favour the other.

190. In zemindaries, at the head of which minors or females are placed, the mutual contentions of the zemindarry servants, for the direction of the management, scarcely ever subside. In Burdwan, the opposition of the zemindar and his mother; in Dinagepoor the representations of the family servants, on behalf of the dowager Ranny and the minor zemindar respectively; in Bishenpore the complaints of the widow of the deceased zemindar against her old servants at one period, and against those nominated on her own representations at another, are a few amongst many instances on record which might be produced. An uninformed or indolent zemindar, stands nearly in the same predicament. If the difficulty be dissolved by a public act appointing a manager, he is too apt to rely upon the influence which has raised him, without regard to the zemindar, whose interests he is nominated to superintend. In this situation, he generally becomes the object of jealousy, which he must soothe; and of complaint, which he must suppress; the point is gained by apparent concessions on his part, but really at the expense of the principal. To decide upon his conduct and upon the propriety of supporting or dismissing him, is by no means easy; for this requires a minute examination of the business in detail, transacted at a distance, beyond the reach of inspection.

191. One half of the complaints and representations preferred to the government in the name of zemindars, are either suggested by the means which I have detailed, or fabricated by their servants without their knowledge. These complaints, to persons unacquainted with the customs of Bengal, suggest an idea of the prevalence of universal oppression; by others with some experience, they are referred to intrigues. To discover the truth, ought in every instance to be the object of government; but it always proves a task of great difficulty and embarrassment.

192. To those who have been used to consider the zemindars as versed in all the functions of their situation and trusts, as possessing an intimate knowledge of their tenants, and an immediate connection with them, as animated with a regard for the prosperity of their estates, and as faithful executors of the public duties; these remarks will appear extraordinary. They are the result of my own experience, combined with that of others; and I fear no refutation of them, where they are examined with candour, and can be ascertained by local reference and information.

193. It is of the last importance, if possible, to distinguish between those imperfections which are natural to the zemindars, and others, which the practice of their rulers has given rise to, in order to discover the principles of future regulation. Neither an arbitrary, nor a variable system of government, is calculated to inspire its subjects with confidence. If exposed to increasing or fluctuating demands, they will give little attention to make improvements; or if they should attempt them, they will be equally careful to conceal them. If liable to be dispossessed of the management of their estates, they will have no anxiety to acquire the habits of superintending them, and will look to present advantages, unconcerned at future consequences. In such a state of things, they are compelled to resort to intrigues; and their primary object is to secure a real patron or ostensible protector. What has once been accomplished by intrigue, they conclude may be successfully practised again; and, relying upon a principle so habitual to them, they re-assume the management of their lands after dispossession, without profiting by past experience, with the same indifference and disregard to their essential interests.

194. I by no means attribute the habits or situation of the zemindars to our administration; the evil had long before taken root. The universal dispossession of the zemindars by Jaffier Khan, the impositions upon them by his successors, and the notorious corruption of the native government, existing, I believe, wherever Mahomedan despotism prevails, are causes sufficient to account for the consequences.

195. The frequent variations in our political rules and principles, were certainly ill calculated to remedy these defects. The means adopted for this purpose, were oftener applied to correct the symptoms, than to eradicate the evil itself; nor was it to be supposed that we could at once, assume principles of action, which could arise only from knowledge founded on experience. The habits of the people, formed by despotism, and exhibiting a mixture of simplicity, fraud, servility and tyranny, seemed too inveterate to be corrected by another set of rules. Forbearance would be construed into ignorance by some, and fear in others would dictate a suspicion that it was only temporary; in such a situation, the government and its subjects, would misunderstand each other; and whilst the former hesitated at conforming to those principles, which humanity and justice led it to adopt from observing abuses in the application of them, the latter, would continue to act upon their old habits and principles.

196. The preceding observations, if well considered, will point out the objections to a settlement with the zemindars, the disadvantages to which it is exposed, and the evils which we must attempt to surmount, if upon the whole, this measure should be determined on. The following arguments occur in opposition to these objections, and in support of a zemindarry settlement.

197. That in making a settlement for a term of years with the zemindars, we rely upon the strongest of all principles, by uniting the interests of our subjects with that of government; that although this principle has been checked by fluctuating measures, there is no reason to suppose it will not gradually operate under another system, where it is allowed scope, and particularly if regulations are adopted to strengthen it; that this mode affords the government the only substantial security for the revenues, by making the property of the lands responsible for it; that to permit the zemindars to retain this property, without allowing them to exercise the functions annexed to their denominations, seems absurd and impolitic, since nothing but an absolute exclusion of them, and a declared annihilation of their rights, can destroy their influence; that if this could be effected with justice, and if they were excluded from the management of their estates, an allowance must be granted to them, and the amount would be a heavy expense to government, unless it were made up by the superior management of their substitutes, which there is little reason to expect: partially it might be the case, but universally, never. That this system has the simplicity derived from the employment of farmers, with a security which every other plan, wants, and, finally, that it is the only plan which can be adopted, without some degree of injustice to the acknowledged rights of the zemindars.

198. Before we determine upon either of the modes pointed out, there are other considerations connected with them, which I shall now enter into.

First, The form of our government in Bengal. It is material to observe, that the entire system of Eastern finance had a reference to a form of administration, distinct from ours; and it cannot be deemed unimportant to trace the distinguishing points of variation, between them.

200. Summary investigation, and arbitrary punishments, were the natural consequences of a despotic government. When a ryot complained against a superior officer, or a zemindar or talookdar against an amil, the inquiry seldom went beyond presumption, which was deemed sufficient to justify the infliction of punishments. The natives, acquainted with the habits, misrepresentations and practices of each other, as often, probably, judged right

Permanent Settlement
of Lands in Bengal.

as wrong; and the promptitude of decision, in some degree, corrected the licence of oppression, where no regular system existed to restrain it.

201. Under our government, the case is widely different. Rules have been established for the hearing and trial of complaints; and the process is conducted by forms, imposing delays which usage alone can reconcile to those who, from injuries sustained, have a title to complain, and a right, in their own opinion, to immediate redress.

202. The delay inevitable to this regularity of system, is in itself, a grievance often mentioned, particularly by the lower orders, who by it, are exposed to real injury. In a country where "short injustice" is proverbially said to be preferable to "protracted justice," the remark requires little proof. It is also worthy of observance, that the same cause gives rise to innumerable false complaints, for the sole purpose of defeating and interrupting the measures of government. When the end to be obtained by preferring them, is answered, the complainants disappear.

203. Under the Mahomedan government, the power of every department centered in one person. The dewan in the khalsa, assisted by the information of the public officers, examined the accounts of the revenues, with an expedition impossible to be attained by us. The officers employed in this department, were not only subject to dismissal, which as often preceded inquiry, upon the least suspicion, as followed it; but to the confiscation of their property and personal punishment for offences proved, and sometimes surmised only. The collections were also made, with a rigour which has never been imitated, by any European.

204. An officer employed in the Mahomedan administration to collect the revenues, and the zemindar or farmer who contracted to pay them, hesitated at no means, to fulfil the obligations of their trusts or engagements. Any disobedience to orders, evasion of them, the concealment or fabrication of accounts, were considered as crimes against the state; but a private pecuniary commutation was often accepted, as a sufficient discharge for established or imputed criminality. No power, however exercised, could effect impossibilities; but the terrors and punishments of such a form as I have described, possessed a coercion which ours, wants. If, with the advantages of information attainable in the country, a doubt can arise upon the truth of these remarks, they may be easily verified by contrasting the faults committed and punishments inflicted under the authority of these nazims, with the various acts of disobedience, evasion, fraud, concealment and extortion, practised with impunity under our authority, by the zemindars, ryots, and subjects of our government. It may not be too much to assert that the zemindars and natives employed in the revenues, avail themselves of its lenity to infringe its laws, and oppose its orders. They know that punishment is neither arbitrary nor immediately inflicted: they are aware of the difficulties which impede detection, and of the forms to be observed in investigating complaints: they confide in their own abilities to misrepresent and perplex; and trust, after all, that our laws and humanity, aided by a consideration of their habits and customs, will afford an indulgence to their transgressions. With us, they argue upon our principles: in their conduct, they assume their own; for although the coercions of despotism have been removed, the habits implanted by it, still remain.

205. It will easily be conceived that a form of government, where one man despotically presided, and he, too, conversant in the languages and manners of his officers and subjects, was capable of an attention to the detail of business, which ours is not. The coercion and activity of such a government gave a vigour to its acts, which we must enforce, by more regular methods: our proceedings are formally held, and methodically arranged; all papers and letters received are read at public boards, deliberated upon, and, with the resolutions upon them and replies to them, are regularly recorded: papers and accounts relating to the revenues must go, through the preparatory operation of a translation. It is not merely sufficient to act right; we must also show the grounds and reasons of our resolutions. The time occupied in an attention to these forms would be sufficient for a dewan, in his mode of transacting business, to decide ten times as much. The collectors of revenue are equally obliged to adhere to prescribed order, and to communicate to the Board of Revenue in English, information and accounts, the grounds of proceedings, which did not employ half the time required for the translation of them. An amil had nothing more to do than to direct copies to be made, and send them with a short address, the work of his moonshee, to his principal.

206. There is no country in the world, I believe, where the officers of government devote more time and attention to the discharge of public business, than in Bengal. The official duties are inconceivably laborious to those who perform them, with zeal and assiduity—an assertion which the public Records will prove. But there are limits to industry, and bounds to exertion. If too much be attempted, matters of great importance must be neglected. The control of the board of revenue over the collectors, and that of the supreme power over them and all other departments, will alike prove ineffective, if their attention is dissipated in the minutiae of detail.

207. These reflections, too obvious to escape any observation, must be examined, and the weight due to them, be estimated in establishing any system for the conduct of public business generally, and particularly with respect to the revenues. What a former government could effect by arbitrary power, summary decision and dispatch, without formality, cannot be done in the same time, or by the same means, by a tempered limited authority, acting by settled rules and forms. What, therefore, could be executed only by the former administration, administration, should not be attempted, by ours: practice must be modified to principle, and uniformity be established throughout. The multiplication of business must be guarded against; for if it should exceed its proper bounds, the possibility of control would be defeated, and nothing can be more evident, than that no system can generally succeed, where the controlling power is unequal to the task of watching its progress. If, upon every occasion where artifice is employed, or evasions practised, to defeat the prescribed measures, government itself must interpose new orders, or its supreme authority; or if the progress of them, must be delayed whilst an inquiry is carrying on into complaints against the minister, (for this must ever be the case where complaints are preferred) the system which they are meant to support must vanish into air, or the whole be left, to the discretion of the conducting agent. I hold it far wiser to adopt a system upon other principles, which will not require such extraordinary exertions; and which moderate talents and industry may progressively carry into full accomplishment.

208. The system at present established for the management of the revenues, renders the government dependent upon the communications of the collectors for information, and upon their skill and attention, for the realization of its revenues.

209. The power of a collector is well known to be great and extensive, in proportion to the trust delegated to him. The situation requires considerable ability, a knowledge of the language, unwearied zeal, incorruptible integrity, and great humanity. Any government would, no doubt, wish to make choice of those persons only for this trust, in whom the qualities recited are to be found. But this is not always possible, and every deviation from the rules which ought to dictate the appointment of a collector, has a bad effect upon the success of the business belonging to that charge.

210. It is well known that a collector may adhere to the letter of the rules prescribed for his conduct, with little improvement in the business entrusted to him. That activity which gives energy to regulations, and the zeal and ability which suggested them, may all be wanting, without any imputation of criminal conduct. The board of revenue, with competent experience and laudable exertions, cannot penetrate into the detail of occurrences, at a great distance; and incapacity in a collector, may lead to a diminution of the assessment, even against their own conviction of the necessity for it. Without any intention to deceive, the Reports of native officers are quoted to support assertions, which knowledge in the executive officer, would have mistrusted, and ability refuted.

211. Whether we refer to the persons now in employments or to those of any other period, it is perfectly evident that knowledge, abilities, and application, are distributed amongst the collectors, in various and unequal proportions. One man may be competent, not only to the discharge of his current duty, but to regulate the assessment in all its detail, to the lowest divisions; he may be equal to the task of unravelling the complex accounts of the ryots, and to distinguish between false and true representations, and know where to interpose and where to withhold, the exercise of his authority. Another perhaps, with equal honesty, has talents sufficient only to discharge the business, according to prescribed forms.

212. One, if left to himself, would improve the revenue, and render the people under him happy. Another, with the same discretion, would let all the business run into confusion. With one set of men, their officers have all the power; and their master the appearance and responsibility of it. With others, the official servants are restricted to the exercise of ministerial functions; and the collector, with his responsibility, preserves the control in his own hands. But even the ablest and best informed will acknowledge, that the perplexed details of the accounts of the ryots in Bengal, cannot be understood, without the assistance of the natives versed in them.

213. These considerations, are, in my opinion, very important. We are not to indulge a vain expectation, that the collectors will always be men of the first talents and knowledge. In judging, what they will be in future; we must look to, what they have been. The same persons do not always continue; and experience and qualification are not transmitted with offices. In discussing a system of management, the situation and qualification of the collectors by whom it is to be executed, must be adverted to. If the system proposed should require those talents and that knowledge, which belong to few only, it must either be confined to those few, or the others must be removed for able substitutes; or, if the latter be deemed invidious and impracticable, the measures, if general, must be adapted to the standard of all capacities.

214. It is not my intention to assert, that all the defects which I have stated exist at this moment, in every part of the country; by the vigilance and zeal of the officers of government, by their integrity, and that of their superiors, much has been done to reform them. I relate only what I have seen in the course of progressive experience; and the review is of consequence, without the necessity of a minute distinction between evils which exist, and those which have been corrected. If under any circumstances they are liable to return, we should as far as possible, guard against them; and for this purpose they must be known, without an invidious discrimination of the places, where they are found in a greater or less degree. I could with pleasure quote instances where the humanity of a collector, assisted by knowledge and prudence, has prevented the impositions of the zemindary servants, and saved the proprietor from ruin.

215. Each subject of consideration, as it occurs, seems to point to a different system of regulation; but it is not from a partial view of the revenues that we can deduce the true principles of arrangement. They must result from a connected consideration, of the whole; and

and I shall therefore postpone the conclusions which the preceding reflections suggest, and proceed to other circumstances which merit attention. In the details which follow, I shall avail myself of the information afforded by the gentlemen appointed to superintend the aumany investigation in 1777, as well as that supplied by the present collectors.

216. The rent of the land, through whatever channels it passes into the public treasury, is paid originally by the ryots, or the immediate cultivators of the soil. Their situation, not only on this account, but as being the most helpless and exposed to oppressions, ought naturally to attract the attention and engage the interest of the ruling power.

217. By the institutes of Akbar, we are informed, that when from motives of justice and humanity, the emperor ordered a settlement of the country to be made for ten years, he began by directing a measurement of the lands, and by fixing the rates of them, according to their qualities and produce. The proportion which he claimed for the state, was one-third of the medium produce.

218. Whether this operation extended to Bengal, I know not; Tarymull is supposed to have fixed the rent payable by the ryots, but by what rules he settled it, we are not certainly informed. The assul jumma established by him, does not now any where exist.

219. At present, no uniformity whatever is observed, in the demands upon the ryots. The rates not only vary in the different collectorships, but in the pergunnahs composing them, in the villages and in the lands of the same village, and the total exacted, far exceeds the rates of Tarymull.

220. Where these variations take place, by any established rules founded on the quality of the soil, its produce, and the uses to which the land is applied; however perplexing they may be to the collector, or other officers of government, I do not deem them of material inconvenience to the ryots, who from usage understand them, and can tell when they are exposed to exactions. But the standard is often so indeterminate, that the ryots neither know what they have to pay, nor can the officers of government, without the most difficult investigation, ascertain whether they have been imposed upon or not.

221. Of all subjects relating to the revenues, this, though the most important, is at the same time, the most difficult to explain. I distrust my own knowledge upon it, and still more my ability to render it intelligible. I shall not, therefore, in this place, enter into all the detail that it admits, but confine myself to a few general principles of practice only.

222. There are two fundamental distinctions in the tenures of the ryots, into which almost all the variations might be resolved; the first, when the rents are calculated upon an assul, or original rate, with an addition of the cesses subsequently imposed.

223. The imposition of these cesses is generally discretionary; they differ in names, number and amount, throughout the country; their rates are variously regulated, at so much per rupee, or according to the number of months, and by other distinctions. The proportion of each, is not calculated upon the assul only; but generally, upon the aggregate of that and the preceding cesses, and so on progressively.

224. The second is, where a fixed sum is paid for a specific quantity of land, at so much per bega, without any other distinction. The rate, in the first instance, may be settled with a due regard to the quantity of the land and its produce. The ryots, holding under this form, are compelled to stand to all losses; to pay for the land, whether cultivated or not; and no security against demand but desertion.

225. There are two other distinctions of importance also, with respect to the right of the ryots. Those who cultivate the lands of the village to which they belong, either from length of occupancy or other cause, have a stronger right than others, and may, in some measure, be considered as hereditary tenants, and they generally pay the highest rents. The other class, cultivate lands belonging to a village where they do not reside; they are considered as tenants at will; and having only a temporary accidental interest in the soil which they cultivate, will not submit to the payment of so large a rent as the preceding class, and when oppressed, easily abandon the land to which they have no attachment.

226. In general, throughout Bengal, the rents are paid by the ryots in money; but in some places, the produce is divided in different proportions, between the cultivator and zemindar. This custom chiefly respects lands under the denomination of Khamar.

227. A ryot pays his rent either by a formal or implied agreement.

228. The first is a deed, called a pottah, which ought to express the nature and terms of his tenure, and the amount of his rent; it often however refers some of the conditions to indefinite rules, such as the custom of the village, or the pergunnah, the rates of an elapsed year, or the rent of his predecessor.

229. The terms of an implied agreement are sometimes specific, as in Chittagong, where the rents are paid from year to year, according to rates established upon a measurement of the lands in the year 1767; or indefinite, as having a reference to the rates of the last and preceding year, as in Nudda.

230. In some places, as in the northern parts of the Dacca district, the collections are made by a hustabood, or measurement of the land held by each renter, immediately previous to the harvest, agreeable to which the lands are valued, and rents received.

231. It would be endless to attempt the subordinate variations in the tenures or conditions of the ryots. It is evident, that in a country where discretion has so long been the measure of exaction, where the qualities of the soil and the nature of the produce suggest the rates of the rents, where the standard of measuring the land varies, and where endless and often contradictory contradictory customs, subsist in the same district and village; the task must be nearly impossible. The collector of Rajeshahy observes upon this subject, "that the infinite varieties of soil, and the further variations of value, from local circumstances, are absolutely beyond the investigation or almost comprehension, not merely of a collector, but of any man who has not made it, the business of his life."

232. The distinctions above pointed out, have a reference to some rule; but the abuses that subsist are great, and more important to be known: amongst these the following may be enumerated.

233. First.—The arbitrary impositions of the zemindars, farmers and others, to which the ryots are subject, which are generally measured by their supposed ability to pay them. The pretences for these impositions, are various; the death of a zemindar, the birth of a son, any increase by government upon the zemindar, are some amongst the number. A stipulation is sometimes exacted, and without ceremony given, that these taxes shall terminate with the year; but they are seldom relinquished, without the substitution of others to an equivalent amount.

234. Second.—The want of formal engagements between the renters and the ryots. This is a very general complaint, as it renders it almost impossible to detect exactions.

235. Third.—The inequality of the assessment, to the advantage of the superior, and to the great injury of the inferior ryots, established by the influence or impositions of the former.

236. Fourth.—The indefinite terms of the pottahs in some places, which neither specify the quantity nor the quality of the land, or rate of payment.

237. Fifth.—The arbitrary custom of levying the deficiency, occasioned by failures in some parts of a district, upon the other ryots.

238. Sixth.—The continual breach of engagements with the ryots, on the part of the zemindars or landlords and renters.

239. Seventh.—The want of regular discharges to the ryots, for the rents which they pay.

240. On the other hand, the ryots derive advantages, even from abuses. The want of engagements, or of precision in the terms of them, affords them opportunities of imposing upon the landlords; artifice is opposed to exaction, and often with success. They cultivate lands, of which there is no account, and hold them in greater quantities than they engage for; hence they are enabled to pay rents and cesses which appear extortionate; they hold lands at reduced rates by collusion; obtain grants of land fit for immediate cultivation, on the reduced terms of waste land; and by management with a renter at the close of a lease, procure fictitious pottahs, and accounts to be made out, with a view to defraud his successor.

241. It has been found that the ryots of a district have shown an aversion to receive pottahs, which ought to secure them against exaction, and this disinclination has been accounted for in their apprehensions, that the rates of their payments being reduced to a fixed amount, this would become a basis of future imposition: but admitting this to have its weight, the objection may be also traced to other sources, in the preceding explanations. The collector of Rajeshahy informs us, "that he fears the ryots would hear of the introduction of new pottahs, with an apprehension that no explanation could remove."

242. In almost every village, according to its extent, there is one or more head ryot, known by a variety of names in different parts of the country, who has in some measure, the direction and superintendence of the rest. For distinction, I shall confine myself to the term Mundul; he assists in fixing the rent, in directing the cultivation, and in making the collections.

243. This class of men, so apparently useful, seem greatly to have contributed to the growth of the various abuses now existing, and to have secured their own advantages, both at the expense of the zemindar, landlord, renter, and inferior ryots.

244. Their power and influence over the inferior ryots is great and extensive; they compromise with the farmer at their expense, and procure their own rents to be lowered, without any diminution in what he is to receive, by throwing the difference upon the lower ryots, from whom it is exacted by taxes of various denominations. They make a traffic in pottahs, lowering the rates of them for private stipulations, and connive at the separation and secreting of lands. If any attempt is made to check the abuses, they urge the ryots to complain and sometimes to resist. In Beerbhoom a striking instance of this, has been exhibited; when an attempt was made to equalize the assessment of the ryots, by removing the burthen from the lower class, and resuming the illegal profits of the munduls, an immediate opposition was made, and the complainants came to Calcutta. The government was obliged to interfere with a military force to anticipate disturbances; and at present the ryots are apparently averse to an arrangement proposed for their benefit, and upon principles calculated to ensure it. On a former occasion, when a general measurement was attempted by the zemindar of the same district, as a basis of a general and equal assessment, the munduls, by a contribution, prevailed upon him, to forego it. In Purneah, we are informed by the collector, that the head munduls are become the real masters of the land, and the first object of a zemindar should be to effect a gradual reduction of their power.

245. The committee appointed to conduct the investigation in 1777, in their address of the 25th March 1778, after describing more in detail than I have done, the functions of a Mundul or Mokuddim, make an observation upon this officer, which I think it material to particularize: "The Mundul is therefore chosen from amongst the eldest and most intelligent inhabitants

Mr. Shore's Minute of June 1789, respecting Permanent Settlement of Lands in Bengal.

"inhabitants, and his influence and services depend solely on the good opinion of the ryots: it is not the interest of the zemindar to change him, as long as he preserves their confidence."

246. I admit the justice of this principle, and in considering this subject it merits attention. The point then to be ascertained is, from what cause an institution of so much apparent utility has fallen into abuse? The reply is obvious: the ignorance and incapacity of the zemindars and farmers on one side, and the inattention of government on the other, to the preservation of the antient forms of restraint. It would be too much to expect that any set of men should forego the advantages held out to them by an abuse of their trusts, when all restraints and coercion are, from ignorance and inattention removed.

247. I shall here insert a remark of the committee before mentioned, which is agreeable to my own information and belief.

248. "It appears to have been an established measure in this country, that the accounts of the rents of every portion of land, and other sources of revenue, should be open to the inspection of the officers of government; it was chiefly by the intimate knowledge, and the summary means of information which the government thereby possessed, that the revenue was collected, and the zemindars were restrained from oppression and exactions. To the neglect of these antient institutions, to the want of information in the government of the state and resources of the country, may perhaps be justly ascribed most of the evils and abuses which have crept into the revenue."

249. In order to preserve the valuation and register of Turynull, the office of canongoe was appointed, and in this office, all the records of public accounts were kept; naibs, or deputies, were stationed in different parts of the country to mark the establishment of new villages, transfers of land and other circumstances, which occasioned a change in the state of the country; and every sale or deed of transfer, the measurement, the boundaries and divisions of land, were registered by them with a minute exactness. These records were referred to in every point, that respected the finances or civil government; and in all disputes concerning lands, they contained an account of all customs and variations in them; and served frequently, as a guide in imposing or collecting the revenue, and as a check on the embezzlements and exactions of the zemindars and public officers.

250. In the villages there were also officers for keeping the accounts of them, properly known by the name of Putwarries, who were generally considered as hereditary; their accounts formed the basis of the canongoe's records, and in some places, they are said to have been appointed by the canongoes. At all events, whether they received their nominations from them or from the zemindars, or from any public officer, I conceive them to be servants of the state, and responsible to it, for their trusts.

251. In the institutes of Akbar, the several inferior officers for registering the accounts of the land and rents, are recited under various denominations, some of which are no longer preserved; but the principle is there clearly established, and the correspondence of terms is immaterial. Of late years, and more particularly since the establishment of the English authority, the names and functions of the inferior officers have been confounded, and the whole system has fallen into insignificance or abuse. The canongoes have been as ready to take advantage of this as others; and hence the office has been by some condemned as of no use, because little was derived from it. The conclusion is not warranted by the laws of reasoning.

252. The apparent necessity for the revival of these institutions, and an observation of the abuses which have crept into them, seem to have suggested to some of the collectors the idea of their abolition, and the substitution of other officers in their stead.

253. Thus the collector of Beerbhoom proposed the appointment of a sheristadar to execute, with his assistants, the functions of the inferior canongoes; the collector of Farnes, with a view to preserve regularity in the mofussul accounts, recommends the nomination of mohurs and museddies; the collector of Sylhet, on the contrary, proposes that the office of putwary should be new modelled by the canongoes.

254. In concluding this part of my minute, it may not be improper to hint at an evil, which more or less affects all orders of men, but falls particularly upon the ryots: I mean the great variety in the species of silver in currency, and the depreciated state of it. The discount levied upon the ryots, is as arbitrary and discretionary, as any other species of taxation. One obvious remedy for this, evil suggests, itself; I mean a new coinage. But I shall not here anticipate a subject which has separately long attracted the attention of the members of government, and which they mean to take into their serious and collected consideration.

255. To the preceding reflections, upon particular subjects relating to the revenues, I shall still add some further observations, as introductory to the conclusions to be deduced from the whole.

256. The dominion over a populous and extensive country is vested in a few strangers, differing in language, religion, habits and laws, from those whom they govern. The power of the sword is exercised over the rest, through the natives themselves, trained by discipline into superiority. A large proportion of the rents of the country are paid into the Company's treasury; and the manufactures are applied to remit to England the surplus which remains, after discharging the claims on this government, and to augment the commerce and revenue of Great Britain.

257. In

Mr. Shore's Minute of June 1789, respecting Permanent Settlement of Lands in Bengal.

257. In the pacific disposition and habitual subjection of the natives, we enjoy a security without example in the records of history. At this moment, no government can have a stronger appearance of permanency than our dominion in Bengal; and without attempting to show how it might be convulsed or subverted, it will be sufficient to observe, that the surest way to retain it, is by establishing a system of government calculated to promote the happiness of our subjects, by affording them security in their property, relief from oppression, and a reasonable indulgence to their prejudices.

258. Our administration has heretofore been fluctuating and uncertain; an idea of improvement has been hastily adopted, unsteadily pursued, and afterwards abandoned from a supposed defect in principle; new measures have been substituted, followed and relinquished, with the same facility; and the natives, from these variations, with every succession of men, expect a change of system.

259. Measures in the detail must always be subject to variation from local circumstances and contingencies, which no foresight can provide against; but principles should be fixed, if possible.

260. The fluctuation in the members of government, as well as in the officers employed in the subordinate departments, renders the establishment of principles indispensably necessary; for as experience cannot be transmitted with offices, the discretion of the agents will never cease to operate in the expectation of real or fancied improvement, unless it be restrained by rule. The characters of individuals, even where the same system is pursued, must have a considerable influence upon the success of it; but where no system is established, the evils will far exceed the partial benefits resulting from the talents, knowledge and zeal, of a few.

261. The skill and success which the natives display in applying to the defects of our personal characters, and in rendering them subservient to their own views and interests, are well known; what one man refuses, another is disposed to grant; the system rejected to-day, is again brought forward with new arguments in support of it, at another period; what has been once tried, and found to fail, is again revived under plausible reasons assigned for its failure. They study our dispositions, inclinations, aversions, enmities and friendships; and, with the cool caution so familiar to them, seize the favourable opportunity to introduce propositions for new systems and measures, or for reviving those which have been exploded. With the most upright intentions, our caution and experience are liable to be misled: but experience is not the lot of all; and the judgment will often yield to the suggestion or adviser, where it ought to be guided only by the propriety of the measure suggested or proposed. In the stability of system alone, we must look for a remedy against evils which can never be thoroughly eradicated or corrected; and this consideration is, with me, of the greatest importance.

262. We are not however to expect that our subjects will at once give us credit for this principle. Time will be required for imprinting it solidly upon their minds, and to eradicate the habits acquired under a despotic government, and strengthened by the fluctuating measures of our administration. But the evident advantage which they will derive from it, will, by degrees, force conviction upon them, and stimulate them to exertions, which they never could be expected to make, when the benefits of them were rendered precarious, by the frequency of alteration.

263. Despotism is as inconsistent with our constitution, as it is subversive of every idea of improvement. If we wished to adopt the principles of it, we must alter the system of our administration in India, and new-model the established regulations; but we must also reflect, that we are governing a people whose habits are implanted by despotism, who in their practice adopt the licentiousness of it, and the evasions and subterfuges which it gives rise to, and that they are more ready to take advantage of the moderation of our principles, than to adopt or acknowledge them. This reflection once suggested to me the idea of making our administration despotic in form, though not in principle; and at all events evinces the propriety of enforcing the orders and rules established, with a vigour and perseverance proportioned to their tenacity.

264. We have admitted the property in the soil to be vested in the zemindars; and although it should be proved, under the Mogul system, to have belonged to the sovereign, which I deem impossible, the Company ought in my opinion to relinquish it. The more admission of the right, unless followed by the measures that will give value to it, will operate but little towards the improvement of the country. The demands of a foreign dominion like ours, ought certainly to be more moderate than the impositions of the native rulers, and to render the value of what we possess permanent, our demands ought to be fixed. Removed from the controul of our own government the distance of half the globe, every practicable restriction should be imposed upon the administration in India, without circumscribing its necessary power; and the property of the inhabitants be secured against the fluctuations of caprice, or the licence of unrestrained controul.

265. Those who have perused the preceding observations with attention, will not be surprized when I express a regret at finding so many objections occur against any devisable mode for managing and collecting the revenues of the country. The plainest, most natural, and wisest method is certainly to levy them, from the proprietors of the soil. The objections arising from their incapacity, whether the effect of bad education, indolence, or natural infirmity, on the other hand, must be guarded against.

266. Taking

266. Taking the whole of what has been said on this subject, relating to our government in India, its form, the qualifications of the collectors, the necessity of establishing a permanent plan, and of convincing our subjects that in future our measures will be directed by system, into our collective consideration; after comparing the advantages and disadvantages of the several modes of agency which have been discussed, and after reflecting upon the evils resulting from fluctuating measures, I am of opinion, that the settlement should be made, with the zemindars upon a fixed and permanent plan. This opinion is not only conformable to the sentiments of others, whose authority I am happy to avail myself of; but also to the orders of the court of directors, and intentions of the legislature.

267. If my object in this discussion had been merely to propose this measure, I might have relied upon the authorities referred to, for recommending it; but in stating the objections to which it is liable, I have yielded to the dictates of candour. I am farther willing to admit that the evils now existing are so various, that it may be impossible to correct them at once, by any measures: in restoring and confirming the confidence of our subjects, we assume one solid principle of reform; a principle without which no system can ever be successful.

268. It now remains to trace the several considerations connected with the principle, to form the best possible regulations consistent with it, for guarding against the evils arising from the incapacity of the zemindars, and for the security of the ryots; and to establish, as far as can be done, a plan of progressive improvement, which future care may carry into full accomplishment.

269. With a view to these objects of consideration, as early as February 1787, the collectors were respectively called upon for information upon the following points:— Whether any new cases had been imposed by the zemindars or farmers under their authority during the last three years; if they exercised any oppression which required the interposition of government to correct and prevent; and generally, to communicate such observations as might have occurred to them from experience, of any imperfections in the system of collections, together with regulations adapted to the correction of existing abuses, and for the prevention of them in future.

270. And upon the 10th of August 1787, more particular instructions were sent to them, requiring specific information, and propositions upon the following heads:—

- 1st. The amount of the jumma.
- 2dly. The person with whom the settlement was to be made.
- 3d. The rules for preventing oppressions on the ryots by the zemindars and farmers, as well as collusions amongst the latter, tending to defraud the zemindars and farmers of their just dues.

271. These instructions, were communicated in detail, under a declared intention of applying the information received, to the formation of a settlement for a term of years which, when completed, was, by the orders of the directors, to be sent home with every necessary document and illustration. The answers to the requisitions, with the opinions of the board of revenue, were received on the 20th November 1788.

272. Of the information thus applied, I have already occasionally availed myself, in the preceding detail; and in what follows I shall more particularly advert to it, taking each of the three subjects of enquiry, in the order in which they stand.

273. First. The amount of the jumma. To ascertain this, the collectors were directed to revert, as far as the accounts and materials in their possession admitted, to the settlements and collections of former years, tracing the diminution which had taken place from the highest rate of taxation, and the causes thereof; and to ascertain whether the latter were of a temporary or permanent operation. Minute, local scrutinies were objected to, as contrary to the orders of the court of directors. The collectors were required in every instance, to name a specific sum, with their reasons for fixing it; and they were at the same time informed, that it was not the intention of government to levy a heavy increase upon the jumma which could not be collected, but that the amount of the settlement should be such, as the government might fairly exact. The instructions comprehended other subsidiary circumstances.

274. I was not unapprized of the difficulty of determining, with a precision that precluded objection, the amount of the assessment of each zemindary or pergunnah by the mode pointed out; but whilst it was conformable to the tenor of public orders, it appeared to me, that if duly pursued, and assisted by local information and experience as to the present state of cultivation in the districts, compared with former periods, the collectors might be able to form an opinion with sufficient accuracy, as to the amount which the government should levy from the districts under their charge.

275. These are the materials which we must now employ for regulating the assessment upon the country, if the proposition which led to the requisition of them should be confirmed; and allowing them even to be imperfect, I am by no means convinced that the inequality is such, under all the circumstances detailed, as to justify the application of a hasty and unprincipled investigation for the sole purpose of correcting it. The length of time required for the execution of this measure; the various difficulties attending it; and the necessity of postponing the establishment of a general system until its completion, comprise the principal, and in my opinion, unanswerable objections to it, considered as a preliminary to the settlement, independent of other arguments.

276. In assuming these data, we avail ourselves of the experience, both of the present collectors of the board of revenue, as well as that of their predecessors.

277. The

277. The Court of Directors have declared in favour of a revenue, not subject to the defalcations which have taken place heretofore; and that the augmentation of the land revenues beyond any just reasonable bounds, would be bad policy. They have disapproved the conduct of the committee who made the settlement in 1781, in assuming the highest actual collections from 1178 to 1187, as the ground-work of their first settlement, and have expressed their opinion that an average of the annual collections within that period, would have furnished a prospect of a realizable revenue. They further observe, that a moderate jumma, regularly collected, unites the Company's interest with the happiness of the natives more effectually, than any forced imperfect system of an exaggerated jumma.

278. They object also to a rissud, or progressive increase. No man can entertain a more thorough conviction than myself of the propriety of establishing, in every instance, a fixed jumma, which shall be unalterable in its amount, during the period of the engagements of the zemindars, for whatever term they may be settled. But there are circumstances which induce me to recommend to the consideration of the board, the question, whether the settlement shall in any instance, be liable to a rissud.

279. The policy of the Mogul administration assumed the right of taxing improvement in proportion to its advance; but it is, I conceive, proved, that from that of Akbar to that of Farockseer, they exercised it with moderation; and that since they departed from that rule, the confusion and uncertainty in the revenue accounts and demands, have been proportionably great. I admit the same right to have devolved upon us; but I by no means recommend the adoption of it, as a principle of assessment, since it would overturn the foundation of that prosperity which we now mean, if possible, to establish. In proposing the question for consideration, I have no view to an increase of revenue in proportion to the progressive ability of the country or zemindars to yield it; but other motives.

280. It is possible that there are situations in which the revenues have fallen much below their average standard, either from accidental losses of the season, or from a series of unsuccessful management, which the present arrangements may in their progress correct, without imposition of new burthens upon the country.

281. In the former case, the loss not extending beyond one or two seasons, ought not to be considered as a permanent diminution of revenue; all that justice or equity requires, is to make a reasonable allowance for it, in the first instance, where this is necessary; and to extend that allowance during a sufficient period, for the recovery of it. The latter supposition, involves a great difficulty. If all that may be presumed to have been lost by bad management is at once to be reclaimed, an obstacle is opposed to exertion; whilst, on the other hand, it may be contended that the government ought not to suffer, from the undue administration of its subjects.

282. We are however to remember, that we mean now to establish a principle of giving confidence to our subjects, and of correcting the evils resulting from fluctuating measures; to convince them of our moderation, and by that, and firmness, to show them that whilst we exact what we deem ourselves fairly entitled to demand, we are equally disposed not to enhance those demands, beyond their ability to discharge them; and that the object of this system is to put an end to those intrigues which they have sometimes been forced into, although they have oftener adopted them from habit. We must therefore take care not to clog the principle with difficulties and embarrassment that shall suppress its operation, and more particularly in the article of the amount of the assessment; since I fear, that in other instances, we shall be under the necessity of adopting measures, which, however intended for the public good, may wear a different complexion.

283. If the object of our present deliberations were only to obtain the highest possible jumma, without regard to the permanency of our arrangements, we should then relinquish the principle of concluding engagements with the zemindars altogether, and attempt to secure it by other modes. That the success would be answerable to the attempt I am far from admitting; but having determined that a settlement shall, in all practicable instances, be made with the zemindars, the detail must correspond with the principle.

284. From these considerations, if they be allowed to have weight, it will follow, that we should relinquish the design of imposing upon those with whom we make the settlement in future, the whole responsibility of losses arising from former mismanagement; or in other words, to require from them, the difference between the highest rate of assessment at any former period, and the present reduced amount. The attempt would in fact be absurd, unless it were founded upon an accurate knowledge of the assets, and upon proof that they were equal to the demand; yet where the defalcations appear excessive, where assets may be proved, or on reasonable ground be presumed to exist, and to be recoverable by a moderate application of zeal and industry, without too much discouraging or annihilating their efforts, or in other words, where the sources of revenue are not actually undermined, but only concealed or misapplied, something may be trusted to the success of future management, and a proportion of what has been lost, in future be demanded from the zemindars. Too much lenity towards them, will be equally fatal to the success of the system, as too great rigour; exaction must be limited, and the proprietors of the soil must be encouraged to exertion by the prospect of enjoying the produce of their labours; but neither justice nor policy demand that the government should submit to a permanent loss, where it may be recovered, or that the zemindars should derive great advantages from their own mismanagement. The application of this reasoning in practice, may be attended with some difficulty; but it ought to be attempted.

See

285. The settlement formed by the committee of circuit would have operated as a progressive tax upon industry, during its whole period, by requiring an annual increase in proportion to its advance, or at most, have left the profits of a single year only to the renters. The orders of the Court of Directors may have been suggested perhaps by this consideration, and by observing, that the actual decrease was universally proportioned to the augmentation of demand; the fact may be established in many instances; this, must be guarded against; and I would therefore, upon the supposition that the settlement is to take place for the term of ten years, limit the rissud or progressive increase, in all cases where it may be thought proper to impose it, to the termination of the third or fourth year at farthest; the remainder of the term should be left to the zemindars.

286. I would wish, if possible, to propose in every instance, the amount of the settlement to be made with the zemindars for the consideration and determination of the governor general in council; but as I have little reliance upon my health to go through this detail, it may not perhaps be in our power to carry it into execution beyond the principal zemindaries, in one year.

287. We have now before us the reports of the collectors, upon the amount of the jumma, and the opinions of the board of revenue upon them. The decision upon the whole, in propriety, should be made by us; and if time should be wanting for this purpose, it may become a question, whether the settlement shall take place for the presumed period, in those districts to which we may not be able to extend our determinations, upon its amount.

288. To establish general principles as a rule of practice, is the most important; but it will still be more satisfactory to point out and superintend the application of them.

289. In determining the jumma to be assessed upon any zemindar, we must attend to the following circumstances.

290. The gross jumma of any district, is properly the amount paid by the ryots, which is liable to various deductions, on account of the charges incidental to the collector of the revenues in its different stages.

291. First.—Mofussil charges, or the expenses of the petty officers employed in collecting from the ryots, and in settling with them, such as putwarries, peons, pykes, &c.

292. The allowances for these servants, are in some places, made by an appropriation of land, but they are generally provided for in the payments of these ryots. The regulation of them, depends upon the zemindar or farmer who has charge of the district; and they are seldom detailed in the accounts brought before the inspection of officers of government. In speaking of the gross jumma of any district, we should distinguish whether it is independent of those charges, or not.

293. The charges attending the petty officers employed in the police of a district are generally provided for in the same manner, and included in the mofussil charges. In some places however, there is a separate tax levied from the ryots upon this account, as for instance, in Nuddea.

294. Secondly.—The pergunnah charges or expenses attending the officers employed in collecting and superintending the business of the pergunnahs. The accounts showing the revenues of a pergunnah exhibit the aggregate of the rents of the villages, after deducting the mofussil charges above described. This, for distinction, may be called the pergunnah jumma.

295. Thirdly.—The sudder cutcherry charges, or other expenses of the officers employed in the head cutcherry of the zemindary.

296. Fourthly.—Poolbundy, or the repairs of the embankments. Where this duty is entrusted to a zemindar, the charge must be considered, in fixing the amount of his contribution.

297. All these charges are indispensable, and in whatever manner the settlement is made, must be defrayed from the gross collections, that is, from the amount paid by the ryots.

298. The accounts of the jumma, furnished by the collectors, exhibit in general only the amount of the stipulations of the zemindars and farmers with government; subject, in some instances, to a deduction on account; the sudder cutcherry charges and poolbundy, which are included in the establishments, and in others omitted. The moshaira, or personal allowances to the zemindars, are now granted only to those out of possession, and no longer form a part of the jumma, where a settlement is made with a zemindar, having been considered at the time of making it.

299. The sudder jumma, according to the present mode of drawing out the accounts, may be distinguished into gross or net.

300. The gross sudder jumma, stated in the official Abstracts of the Revenues, means the revenue engaged for by the zemindars or farmers; but it includes the allowances for moshaira, sudder cutcherry, poolbundy where allowed, and the two former come under the general term of zemindary charges. The net jumma is the sum remaining, after those deductions.

301. The salary of the collectors, their commission, the allowances to the assistants, the rized pensions, are also charges upon the revenues; but are of a distinct nature from the disbursements which I have mentioned.

302. The distinctions here pointed out may be thus enumerated; first, the gross jumma of the country; secondly, the gross sudder jumma demanded by the Company; thirdly, the net jumma. The two last, are what remains of the first, after deducting the charges incidental to the collections.

303. In concluding a settlement with the zemindars, we must, therefore, determine what charges shall be paid by them; and the amount of their jumma; must be regulated by this consideration.

304. If we adopt the abstracts of the sudder jumma, the two first articles, viz. mofussil and pergunnah expenses, are understood to be already provided for, and are not to be considered; if on the contrary, we adopt the gross jumma, they must be allowed for, unless it should appear that they have been already deducted from the amount; or that a separate provision is made for them in land or other assets, not inserted in the public accounts.

305. In the former case, we are to consider, whether the sudder cutcherry and poolbundy charges have been heretofore defrayed by the zemindar or farmer, exclusive of his agreement with government; whether any separate allowance was made to him, on this account; or, whether the expense was separately paid by the government. On the first supposition, he will still be liable to defray these expenses, without any additional consideration; in the two latter, a provision must either be made for them by a proportionate diminution of the jumma, or by the continuation of them as articles of disbursement; unless it can be proved that he possesses resources equivalent to the amount.

306. In the same manner, a determination must be made regarding the moshaira. Where this article is at present paid from the sudder jumma, and the zemindar has no provision in land, nor other fund distinct from the revenues included in that amount, some allowance must either be continued, or a provision be made by an abatement in his assessment. This consideration, will apply to a few instances, and only, I believe, where the lands of a zemindar are at present let to farm; and it will cause an apparent diminution in the jumma, by transferring to that article, what now stands in the account of disbursements.

307. There is another point to be considered. The district of Nuddea was let to farm for a period of five years; and the government having appropriated the whole produce, as far as they could discover it, was obliged to grant allowances, as a provision both for the zemindar and his family. The same circumstances may have taken place, in other instances.

308. Separate provisions to the families of the zemindars by the government, are liable to great objections. The necessity which originally dictated the allowance never ceases, and the expense becomes thus perpetuated.

309. The government, therefore, should avoid as much as possible entailing upon itself these charges; and leave every zemindar to take care of his own family. If the precedent should be continued and extended, in the course of time, the amount of these pensions will become enormous. Our humanity, in this respect, has gone beyond policy and prudence; and the variations in our system, have given scope to it. If a zemindar fails to take care of his family, redress may, I conceive, be obtained by application to the courts of dewanny adawlut; and a provision for this purpose, if it does not exist, may be added to the present regulations.

310. But we are now to determine, whether the zemindars, to whom the case applies, should be entitled to a consideration on this account, in making the settlement with them; and the decision must depend upon a due consideration of the circumstances above stated; that is, where the revenue forthcoming to the zemindar is assumed as the basis of the settlement engaged for by him, we must consider this article amongst other expenses to which he is liable, and for which a provision must be made; but in future, all applications from any part of the family of a zemindar, for distinct allowances, should not be complied with, further than to use our influence over the zemindar to take proper care of his family.

311. In the list of zemindary charges there will be found charitable donations, which ought properly to be paid by the officers of government. Convenience may sometimes admit of a disbursement of them, through the zemindar. There are other articles also, of a trifling nature; and it must be decided by whom they are to be paid, as the amount of the jumma will depend upon this decision.

312. In all these instances, whether the settlement be made upon the gross jumma of the district, or upon the abstracts of the sudder jumma, we must be careful to record the particulars of it, lest hereafter we should be unable to trace them. The greatest inconvenience has already resulted, from the want of accuracy in this respect. The substitution of it, will lead to a clearer knowledge of the capacity of the country, and will preclude the necessity of those frequent references which we are now obliged to make, as well as future uncertainty regarding the terms of the settlement; and point out to the court of directors, the grounds and reasons of our proceedings in fixing the jumma.

313. No proposition has yet been made, with respect to the Alienated Lands. Whatever annexations of revenue may take place in consequence of an investigation into them, will, in whole or in part, as may be hereafter determined, become an addition to the revenues of government. We certainly have a right to the whole; and if in the view of engaging the zemindars to assist in the discovery of them, or to prevent opposition or concealment on their part, which superstition or self-interest will dictate, any part should be left to the zemindars, it must be considered in the light of indulgence. This resumption must however be provided for, by a clause in the engagements.

314. The next point referred for enquiry, was the person with whom the settlement is to be made.

315. It was observed at the time of this reference, that the orders of the Court of Directors prescribed that the settlement should, in all practicable instances, be made with the zemindars; but that as many of them, are disqualified from any real interference in the management management of the collections, from incapacity on account of sex, minority, or otherwise; the interposition of government was necessary, both for the security of the revenues, the protection of the ryots, and even that of the zemindars themselves, who from incapacity fall a prey to the artifices and frauds of their own officers and servants.

316. To obviate this inconvenience, it was proposed as a general rule, that the principal officer of a zemindar whose incapacity disqualified him from the management of his own business, should become a party in his engagements with government; and that he should be bound to a faithful discharge of his duty, by restrictions imposing a responsibility equally affecting his person and property.

317. The collectors were accordingly directed to ascertain amongst the zemindary servants, the persons most capable for this trust. Those who had been employed, and who had faithfully and ably discharged their assigned duties, naturally stood forth as the properest persons for future responsibility. Where the zemindar himself was capable of making a choice, weight was to be allowed to this consideration.

318. When Mr. Francis proposed a permanent settlement with the zemindars, he was not inattentive to the difficulties attending the execution of the plan, which may now be presumed to have increased. His propositions for correcting the evils, resulting from the incapacity of the zemindars, were founded upon the same observations which dictated the instructions above substantially recapitulated.

319. The Court of Directors in prescribing a settlement to be made with the zemindars in all practicable instances, limit the exceptions to this rule; to incapacity from age, sex, lunacy, contumacy, or notorious profligacy of character; and they recommend the appointment of a near and reputable relation, by way of guardian or dewan, before any temporary farmer or servant of government.

320. If the real capacity of the zemindars were taken, as the rule for determining the selection of them for employment; it is evident that they must be in general, excluded. This however is not the question at present; and having decided it, upon a comparative and attentive consideration of the various plans for managing the collections in favour of the zemindars, we must face the difficulties of the system, and endeavour to overcome them.

321. To the limitations pointed out by the Court of Directors, I can see no objection. I shall state some remarks regarding female zemindars, which will strengthen the objections to their acting, and perhaps suggest the expediency of a rule, that they be declared incapable of holding any management of the collections.

322. It is well known that women in Bengal are, by the laws of their religion and customs, secluded from public society; and that they receive no education to qualify them, for the transaction of public business. In all suits and causes where they are concerned, it is almost impossible to ascertain whether they are parties to the representations which bear their names, or not; they cannot be produced in the public courts, nor are they accessible to the officers of justice. It is not possible, in the nature of things, that they can be judges of their own interests, or competent to form opinions on the intricate detail attending the management of the revenues. They are mere passive instruments in the hands of their servants; and often perhaps ignorant of the transactions in which they are made to appear as principals. They must be liable to every species of misrepresentation and imposition, since they have not the means of detection: the characters, abilities and conduct of their agents, can never be known to them; for they want all opportunity of forming a judgment upon them. The government can seldom determine, whether its orders reach them; and hence they incur penalties for disobedience, where submission perhaps was never refused; and their officers avail themselves of the sanction of their names, to shelter their own misconduct.

323. In general, it will be found that the female zemindars are under the government of the family brahmin, who controuls their consciences; he has his own private interests to attend to, and without appearing, exerts an influence over the conduct of the public business. The managing agent submits to the controul of a concealed authority which he must conciliate; and the interests of the state and zemindar, equally bend to it.

324. To enlarge upon this subject is unnecessary. Nothing can be more absurd, than to assign a trust of the utmost importance to government and its subjects, whose property and security depend upon the faithful discharge of it, to an agent precluded from all knowledge of its obligations, as well as from all interference in the execution of them; in short, to require the performance of acts of the first consequence to the state and its subjects, from a person incapable of any exertions.

325. The detail of the management in Rajeshahye, under the nominal authority of the Ranny; the decline of the revenues in that zemindary, and the confusion in which the whole of it, has been involved for years; would exemplify and prove the inconveniencies which I have stated; of which many other instances, might be quoted.

326. By the Hindoo laws, as explained in the 20th chapter of the code translated by Mr. Halhed, it evidently appears that women are deemed unfit for so important a trust, since they are not considered as capable of self-management. In every state, whether married, unmarried, or widows, whether young or old, they are consigned to the care of a father, husband, or some relation; and where there are no relations, the charge devolves upon the magistrate. These regulations, are founded on the peculiar customs of the people; and common sense warrants the application of them, to a situation of so much importance and responsibility, as the management of the settlement and collections.

327. Assuming

327. Assuming then, as a fixed principle, that female zemindars are disqualified from all management and interference in the collections, and are not to be allowed to exercise any; it follows, that they ought not to be charged with any responsibility; and that the settlement for the revenues ought not, even in point of form, to be made with them.

328. I am aware that by this resolution, the fundamental security, that of the land, is given up; but I do not see with what justice it can be retained, after a declaration that the proprietors are incapable of any management.

329. Whether the lands be made over to a farmer, or given in charge to the servants of the zemindar, the conduct of either, under such a declaration, should not affect her property; for though every possible restraint be imposed upon the manager, and although the selection of him by the government may be made with more judgment than by the zemindar, still it is unreasonable to make her property responsible for his failure.

330. A deficiency in the revenues can only arise from two causes; misconduct in the agent employed to collect them, or calamities which he could not prevent. In both cases, the objection is strong, supposing the latter to be of such magnitude, as to claim a remission.

331. Precedents, in opposition to this reasoning, may be found in the records of the Mahomedan government, and perhaps in those of our administration; but when they are contrary to reason and justice, whatever inconvenience may attend the renunciation of them, they ought not to be adopted, in a system that professes to act upon these principles. By employing the heir in succession wherever capable, the objection loses part of its force; but this may be often impracticable, for the successor may not be competent, from sex or minority, to undertake the management.

332. The zemindar being excluded from all real and ostensible interference, government must either take the charge of the lands upon itself, or let them to farm; in either case, a provision must be allotted to the zemindar.

333. By farming the zemindary, the property is secured to the zemindar; since, whether the revenues are paid, or not, it cannot be affected; and nothing further can be urged, in favour of the plan. The Objections to it, exclusive of those which are acknowledged to exist in the farming plan in general, are these:—

334. That the zemindary officers not being employed, will be less capable of the management, when it reverts to the zemindar: That the heir in succession has no opportunity of acquiring any knowledge of the business, and will succeed to the administration of it, entirely ignorant of the duties annexed to his situation:—

335. That as the farmer must have his profits, as well as the zemindar a subsistence, the double provision is an additional tax upon the government:—

336. That the security to government, for the revenues, is merely personal, and not recoverable from the land.

337. The Fifth and Seventh paragraphs of Mr. Francis's minute on the revenues, proposes the establishment of a Court of Wards, for the care of estates, of which the incumbents are the minors, idiots or females; and to have the care of the education of minors, now usually committed to servants or relations, who have an obvious interest in bringing up the children in ignorance and stupidity. The importance of the subjects points out the suggestion to attentive consideration.

338. To a separate establishment of this kind, there are two objections; first, the expense of it, which the government could ill afford; and secondly, the interference of its operations with those of the board of revenue. I do not see how they are to be obviated.

339. The purposes however of such an institution, may be answered by the following propositions:—

340. That the zemindars declared incapable, shall be released from all responsibility; and that their lands shall remain under the charge of a manager appointed by government.

341. The Board of Revenue will stand in some degree, in the place of a court of wards; the manager or trustee will, in the first instance, be recommended by the collector, and be amenable to him; and both will be responsible to the board of revenue.

342. There are two objections to this plan; one which arises from the detail attending the inspection and controul of the trustees conduct, the second, that the security of government, is transferred from the land to the skill of an agent; but I do not think them of sufficient weight to supersede the arguments in support of it. A provision must be made for the zemindar, either by fixing the jumma of the district, and by declaring the profits beyond that amount to belong to the proprietor, or by allowing a fixed sum as moshaira.

343. In fixing the jumma, the fundamental principle of the revenue plan is adhered to; and supposing the profits to exceed the usual allowance to zemindars, or what is necessary for her subsistence, the surplus may be appropriated to the improvement of the zemindary, for the discharge of the debts, if any have been contracted, and for the accumulation of a fund for contingencies.

344. The second mode has this convenience, that it avoids some intricacy, which would attend the adjustment of accounts upon the former plan; that it renders the payments to the zemindars certain, and relieves the government from embarrassing applications from them, or from discussions respecting the amount of the profits. It is probable also, that the zemindars upon the whole, will be gainers; by fixing the jumma, and allowing them the profits beyond this amount, they might, from an unfavourable season, or from the negligence or dishonesty of the managing officer, be deprived of a subsistence, and the government ment would find itself under a necessity of granting it, to remove their distress; but by allowing them in the first instance moshaira, they are secured from distress, and solicitation is anticipated. I presume that the zemindars would rarely, on the former plan, receive more than they will do, by the latter. If the profits of a year exceeded the usual amount of the moshaira, the government, whilst the management was under its officers, might be tempted to appropriate the surplus, or by enhancing the demand for revenue, so as to absorb it. The females, as the jumma fixed upon others should remain, and the first proposition be adopted.

345. The arguments in favour of each proposition are strong, and I submit them to the determination of the board.

346. We ought, however, to determine the age at which minority should cease. The Hindoo laws admit some latitude in this respect, but generally limit the period of maturity to the sixteenth or seventeenth year; a reference to the pundits and moolvies may determine this point. The latter, may possibly be thought too early an age to intrust with it the concerns of a zemindary; some zemindars may be capable of executing their proprietary functions, at that early period; others, and the generality, will not. It is a question worthy consideration, whether the limitation shall be extended to the expiration of minority, or be settled at the age pointed out. In the former case, we adopt the principles of reason by consulting the interests of the state, and the real benefits of the zemindar; but at the same time, we go beyond the rules of the Hindoo laws, and declare incapacity in concerns of a public nature, whilst the zemindar is personally responsible to individuals, and is liable to be sued for their demands upon him.

347. The second part of Mr. Francis's proposition, relating to the education of the zemindar, is too material to pass unnoticed; and I fear that the government must, to accomplish this object, exert an authority liable to objection.

348. In the year 1781 the committee of revenue adopted a plan for the education of the minor zemindar of Dinagepoor, but the obstinacy of the mother defeated it; she would not give up her son to the tuition of his appointed instructors, and resisted all orders and applications for his attendance. He was detained in her private apartments, where instruction was impracticable.

349. I have no doubt, that the same difficulties will attend the execution of the present plan, and government must interpose to over-rule them, or it will be defeated. Where the object of a measure is reasonable, and can be defended upon its avowed principles, I should not hesitate to adopt such means for its accomplishment, as I would not otherwise recommend. Where a zemindar is so inattentive to the real interest of her son or heir, as not to listen to the persuasions of reason, I would propose the separation of the mother and son, for some time at least, and to compel her to give him up, either by withholding her subsistence until she complied, or by employing women of her own cast to enter her apartments and withdrawing him from them; but the opposition would rarely, I conceive, last, when the determination of government was found to be fixed. The separation should never take place until the zemindar was arrived at a proper age for instruction, nor in any case whilst the mother consented to admit of his attendance on those nominated to instruct him, or appointed proper persons herself.

350. The tutors must be distinct from the trustee appointed to manage the estate; with respect to the latter, the directors recommend a discreet and reputable relation. I believe the proposed plan, upon the whole, will be found to be most agreeable to their instructions, although it appears rather to go beyond them; it differs also in some respect, from the orders communicated by the board of revenue to the collectors, which proposed to continue responsibility nominally to the zemindar.

351. In making the settlement with the zemindars, the allowance of moshaira will of course cease; yet as this must be actually or virtually provided for in some cases, I shall point them out, and offer some propositions for determining the rates of these allowances.

352. I have already observed, that the proportion of the revenues to be left to the zemindars was never, as far as I know, fixed by any established rule, when they held the management of their own lands. I should however conceive, that during the regulated periods of Mogul administration, it must in general have exceeded the amount of the moshaira fixed by us for their subsistence, when out of possession. This conclusion I draw from two considerations; the opulence of the country, and the manner in which the zemindars lived a few years before we obtained the Dewanny. Admitting these facts, which are established by the best information I can obtain, and by none, as far as I know, contradicted, the conclusion is probable.

353. When the lands were let in farm by us, the moshaira was fixed at ten per cent. upon the gross sudder jumma, that is, the amount of the engagements contracted by the farmers with the government; such at least was meant to be the general allotment, although this proportion was not regularly adhered to; for when the zemindars were restored to the management of their lands at a reduced jumma, the original allowances were continued, and additions were even made for charges of poolbundy servants and others.

354. No authoritative precedents were, I believe, quoted in fixing this amount, although it seems to have been understood as prescriptive. The circumstance of the malikana in Behar may have suggested it.

355. A proportion of nine-tenths of the zemindary receipts is surely as much as our government ought to demand, if it means to regard the welfare of their subjects by zemindary receipts; I mean that proportion of the gross produce which comes to the zemindar, after after deducting intermediate profits and charges. I should hope that the profits of the zemindars would in time exceed this proportion, by a due attention to the improvement of their lands, and the encouragement of their ryots; and I should be happy if, without lowering the amount of the revenues, their profits could be at this time, increased: but we are not authorized on this account, to relinquish any part of what has hitherto been paid.

Mr. Shore's Minute of June 1789, respecting Permanent Settlement of Lands in Bengal.

The situations to which the present considerations apply, are these:

356. The situations to which the present considerations apply, are these:
357. First. To zemindars who decline to take the management of their lands upon the prescribed terms.

358. Secondly. To minors, females, and others, excluded by the determined limitations.

359. Thirdly. To zemindars entering into engagements with government, for the purpose only of regulating the amount of their engagements.

360. With respect to the first, premising what I have already said, that the terms offered are equitable and moderate, the allowance should be small. It may be contended, that the refusal of the zemindars ought to preclude them from all allowance; but whilst we are liable to error in our estimates of the produce of their lands, such a decision might be deemed severe and unjust. Notwithstanding the reluctance with which the zemindars relinquish the management of their lands, I think it possible that some, from indolence or other causes, might be tempted to give it up, and remain satisfied with the moshaira, if this were always fixed at ten per cent. In this case, the government would have a class of proprietors to pay, without deriving any benefit from their services. The zemindars of Burd-prietois, upon this supposition, with an exemption from all trust and responsibility, whilst at the same time, his influence might be directed to counteract the persons employed, who, if farmers, must receive some profits. The temptation should be stronger, upon the other side; that is, the terms of the settlement with the zemindars should be such, as to encourage them to undertake the administration of their own estates: nor indeed ought they to be permitted to decline it, without assigning satisfactory reasons for such refusal.

361. To zemindars under this description, who refuse to undertake the management of their lands, I would, for the reasons stated, assign five per cent. only.

362. To minors and females I think ten per cent. should be allowed; part of it to be assigned to the payment of their debts, if any have been contracted, or to the improvement of their zemindary, unless the whole should be required for their subsistence. This proposition is founded upon that contained in paragraph 344. If the jumma of the zemindary be paid, no moshaira will then be necessary; the surplus beyond the assessment, will provide a subsistence for them.

363. In both cases, if there are any lands appropriated for their subsistence, the amount of the produce is to be deducted from the percentage allowed to the zemindars.

364. The considerations which apply to the regulation of the third proposition, I have already detailed. They are founded upon a principle that the zemindars are entitled to a subsistence, and to a reasonable profit, beyond the amount of their contributions to government.

365. I doubt if any precise rules of limitation can be fixed for determining the quantum of the profits to be left to the zemindars; the question applies to the present period only, and the general principles for the regulation of it, are these:—that the settlement should be so estimated as to allow them, in common seasons, a profit of ten per cent. over and above the expenses of collection. In estates, the rents of which are greatly reduced, or capable of increase, either by improving the lands or by economical management, this sum, upon the principle of a fixed jumma, may be deemed too large at first. The circumstances of the district must be therefore attended to.

366. If the present jumma assessed upon the country were confirmed, although there would be inequalities in it, I have no doubt that, upon the whole, the profits of the zemindars, with due economy and attention, might be nearer fifteen than ten per cent. upon its amount. That this is actually the case, I doubt.

367. The difference of expense to the proprietors of large estates is not, in proportion to the difference of jumma. A zemindar, whose lands yield to government five lacs per annum, would subsist with more ease and convenience on ten per cent. than another, would on twelve, where the annual rated jumma is one lac of rupees. This consideration offers an objection against a fixed rate for the emoluments or allowances to the zemindars generally; where particular instances occur for the application of it, a determination may be made upon them. There are other circumstances of a local nature, which may influence the determination of the board.

368. I now advert to the third subject of enquiry, the rules for preventing oppressions upon the ryots, by the zemindars and farmers, as well as collusions amongst the latter, tending to defraud the zemindars and farmers of their just dues.

369. In determining this question, the rights of the zemindars, talookdars and ryots, ought to be first ascertained; and I shall here insert a summary of what I deem myself authorized to maintain upon these points; premising that I pretend only to state facts, and draw such conclusions from them as they fairly admit, without reconciling every apparent inconsistency, either in facts or forms.

370. I consider the zemindars as the proprietors of the soil, to the property of which they succeed by right of inheritance, according to the laws of their own religion; and that the sovereign authority cannot justly exercise the power of depriving them of the succession, nor of altering it, when there are any legal heirs. The privilege of disposing of the land, by sale or mortgage, is derived from this fundamental right, and was exercised by the zemindars before we acquired the Dewanny.

371. The origin of the proprietary and hereditary rights of the zemindars is uncertain; conjecture must supply what history does not mention; they probably existed before the Mahomedan conquests, and, without any formal acknowledgment, have acquired stability by prescription. I do not admit the sunnud, which the zemindars sometimes receive, to be the foundation of their tenure; which, though it may acquire confirmation from it, exists independent of this deed. The origin of the possession of some zemindaries may be traced to a grant, but the inheritance goes on, without it.

372. The revenues of the land belong to the ruling power; which, being absolute, claimed and exercised the right of determining the proportion to be taken for the state.

373. The rights of the zemindars are limited and conditional. They cannot alienate lands from the public assessment, without the permission of the supreme authority; they are bound to make good their stipulated payments of revenue, under the penalty of suffering an equivalent loss of property, or of being deprived of the whole; and it is also their duty to preserve the peace of the country from infringement, and to secure their lands from inundation, by repairing the embankments of the rivers. The performance of these functions, supposes the means of discharging them to be left with the zemindars.

374. Formerly, their services were required for the defence of the state, against rebellion or invasion, when they possessed the means of furnishing this assistance. This obligation was chiefly exacted from the principal zemindars; but was binding upon all.

375. The government, in virtue of its claim to a portion of the rents, considered itself entitled to the minutest information regarding the land, its produce, the rents paid by the ryots, and all transfers in their possession. The duty of the mofussil canongoes was to record and furnish this information, and the accounts formerly kept by them were calculated to afford it.

376. The sanction of government was often given to sales, mortgages and successions; but the want of it did not, as far as I know, render them invalid.

377. No alienation of land by the proprietor, or diminution of the rental, could deprive the supreme authority of its title to the revenues of the land; it of course exercised the right of resuming such alienations, and of re-annexing them to the public assessment, as well as of enquiring into fraudulent diminutions of the jumma.

378. The government sometimes interfered in regulating the rents paid by the ryots, and in some cases, employed its own officers to collect them. Jaffier Khan's conduct offers a precedent of an interference to the exclusion of their zemindars; and the Institutes of Akbar show, that the relative proportions of the produce were settled between the cultivator and the government; yet in Bengal, I can find no instances of government regulating those proportions. Although the nazims have attempted to collect the rents from the ryots, those attempts have been partial only, and do not warrant an inference that they were systematically pursued, which I do not believe was the case. The practice of appointing an officer to superintend and control the conduct of the zemindars was a more limited exercise of this authority, and was more general. This is established by a variety of instances. The officers thus employed, were denominated amils and sezawuls.

379. Admitting the proprietary rights of the zemindars, wherever government supersedes the rights properly connected with them by collecting the rents from the ryots through its own officers, it follows that some provision should be made for the subsistence of the zemindars. I cannot find that this was ever formerly done in Bengal; nor can I learn that the Mogul government in this subah, ever established the proportion of the rents to be paid by the zemindar, the profits which he was to receive, or the allowance to be made to him, in case of his temporary dispossession. I conclude that the rules of limitation in these instances, were never fixed. The settlement of Turymull appears to me to have furnished the standard for the demands of the state upon the zemindars, from the period of its establishment to the administration of Jaffier Khan, unless the measures of Sultan Sujah, of which I have no accurate information, should be deemed an exception. The augmentation of the general assessment by him, was moderate.

380. Zemindars, during this interval, enjoyed the profits which they received, over and above the stipulated standard; and when they were temporarily dispossessed of the management, retained their nankar lands only, without receiving any additional allowances; when a zemindar was deprived of his property, his right to the nankar ceased, and was transferred to his successor.

381. The variation in the public demands from the standard of Turymull, for a period of one hundred and twenty years, was so small, that the profits of a continued management would furnish a subsistence, during a temporary dispossession; that the zemindars were often taxed by the nazims, or their officers for their private emolument, beyond the established demands, must be deemed probable, and during the period in question, they could afford it.

382. Rights depending upon the discretion of the ruling power, must be deemed precarious; despotism could extend its claims to the subversion of the rights of the zemindars, without an avowed and direct infringement of them, but its practice, generally speaking, has been in favour of them. The zemindars of Bengal were potent and numerous in the reign of Akbar, and they existed when Jaffier Khan was appointed to the administration, under under him and his successors, their respective territorial jurisdictions appear to have been greatly augmented; and when the English acquired the Dewanny, the principal zemindars exhibited the appearance of opulence and dignity.

383. A property in the soil, must not be understood to convey the same rights in India, as in England; the difference is as great as between a free constitution and arbitrary power. Nor are we to expect under a despotic government fixed principles, or clear definitions of the rights of the subject; but the general practice of such a government, when in favour of its subjects, should be admitted as an acknowledgment of their rights.

384. From these data, others may be enabled to place the subject in a clearer light; and to reconcile the principles of right, with the practice of an arbitrary government. I have endeavoured to point out what it actually left to its subjects, under the assertion of claims apparently calculated to leave them nothing: this part of the precedent is most worthy our imitation.

385. In India, the land has always furnished the chief revenues of the state, and the taxes are immediately imposed upon it; commerce has rarely been considered of importance.

386. Talookdars who pay their rents to the officers of government, are in all material respects, on the footing of zemindars; but they enjoyed a privilege which has of late years been invaded, that of an exemption from an augmentation of their rents; and on the other hand, they have obtained remissions.

387. Those who pay to the zemindars are more dependant; but it is a general rule I believe, that their rents shall not be liable to augmentation at the will of the zemindar. That they were subject to a proportion of the increase demanded from him, must be understood; but since the increase and deductions have been imposed and granted upon an estimate only, without reference to any fixed rule or rate, the variations of practice with respect to talookdars will be found to supersede all rule. A talookdar of either description, who has once been allowed a remission, is subject by prescription to a future increase; where he has paid the same rents invariably, from the establishment of his tenure, he is not liable to it; the terms of the conditions by which he holds his talook, are sometimes special, and furnish the particular rules to be observed between him and the zemindars.

388. With respect to the ryots, their rights appear very uncertain and indefinite. Whilst the demands of government upon the zemindars were regulated by some standard, as I conclude it was from the time of Turymull to that of Jaffier Khan, they had little temptation or necessity to oppress their ryots; but the same variable discretion which has affected the payments required from them, has extended in the same manner to the ryots. The rates of the lands were probably fixed formerly, according to the nature of the soil and its produce; the cesses imposed by the zemindars were an enhancement of these rates, and arbitrary without being at first oppressive.

389. It is, however, generally understood, that the ryots by long occupancy acquire a right of possession in the soil, and are not subject to be removed; but this right does not authorize them to sell or mortgage it, and it is so far distinct from a right of property. The zemindars, other rights, under a despotic or varying form of government, is precarious. The zemindars, when an increase has been forced upon them, have exercised the right of demanding it from their ryots: If we admit the property of the soil to be solely vested in the zemindars, we must exclude any acknowledgment of such rights in favour of the ryots, except where they may acquire it, from the proprietor.

390. Although much has been said with respect to the ryots, I shall nevertheless enter into a more particular detail of what regards them.

391. In every district throughout Bengal, where the licence of exaction has not superseded all rule, the rents of the land are regulated by known rates called Nirk, and in some districts, each village has its own; these rates are formed, with respect to the produce of the land, at the rate of one rupee per bega; some soil produces two crops in a year of different species, some three; the more profitable articles, such as the mulberry plant, beetle leaf, tobacco, sugar cane and others, render the value of the land proportionably great.

392. These rates must have been fixed upon a measurement of the land, and the settlement of Turymull may have furnished the basis of them. In the course of time, cesses were superadded to that standard, and became included on a subsequent valuation, the rates varying with every succeeding measurement. At present, there are many abwabs or cesses collected distinct from the nirk, and not included in it, although they are levied in certain proportions to it.

393. The following Abstract of a Ryot's account, taken near eight years before this time, will show the mode in which this is done:

394. The first sum of R⁴ 14. 0. 8 is called the original rate of the land, but even this may include cesses consolidated into it; some of the abwab, or cesses, since added, are subsequent to the period of the Dewanny.

395. If the accounts of the same land were now examined, some additional impositions might appear. The zemindars introduce them by degrees, at intervals of two, three, four, or five years, and rarely attempt them for two or three years successively. Solicitation and influence are equally employed to effect the establishment of them; and a ryot, where the burthen is not too heavy, will rather submit than resist or complain. Temporary extortion may be practised at any time; but a permanent exaction of this nature can rarely be established by force alone upon the ryots.

396. Tucka puttahs generally express a fixed rate for the land at so much per bega, without any other article; but the sum total includes the several existing cesses at the period of adjustment, and others are sometimes again added and consolidated.

397. When the rents by successive impositions become too heavy, the ryots either abscond, or the zemindar allows them a compensation by giving them other land at a favourable rate; but seldom by remitting either the imposts or diminishing the rates of the other lands. In some places, however, the accumulation of abwab has caused a proportionate diminution in the assul; this is particularly the case in Dinagepoor.

398. When a measurement of the lands takes place, the existing rates are confirmed, and generally with some additions. Where none can be found, a reference is made to the rates of other lands of the same quality, in the vicinity of the spot measured; but the adjustment of them in that case, is a business of considerable difficulty. Every part of the transaction is a subject of contention; the demands on both sides are unreasonable, and are finally terminated by a compromise.

399. It is the business of the putwarce to register these rates, which were also formerly recorded by the Mofussil canongoes; and these, when wanted, became open to the inspection of the government.

400. It would be impossible, I conceive, to fix specific rates for any one species of produce, in any district generally; the quality of the soil and the situation of the land, as enjoying the advantages of markets and water-carriage, must determine it. The remark applies to every species of produce.

401. Where the rates of land are specific and known, a ryot has a considerable security against exaction, provided the officer of government attends to his complaints, and affords him redress; and without this he can have none. The additional sanction which he derives from a puttah, supposing it to be properly drawn out, is this; that it specifies, without reference to any other account, the terms upon which he holds the land, and the amount of the abwab or cesses, which are not mentioned in the nerkbundy, nor always in the jumabundy.

402. In those places where the accounts are kept with the most regularity, and the established rates adhered to, the annual adjustment of the rent to be paid by each ryot, is not made without difficulty. The usual mode is to form a survey of the ground, and compare it with the accounts of the former year, in which every species of cultivation is specified, together with the relative situation of the land. Where the general appearance of the land corresponds with the detail of it in the accounts, the rent is adjusted without much difficulty; but where it differs, either by exhibiting a greater quantity of land in cultivation, or any article of a superior quality on the same land, the rents of such land are demanded, and a measurement is often adopted to determine them. The nature of the business shows that it can only be effected, by a person well versed in it.

403. In the ordinations of the emperors, the officers employed in the collections are constantly encouraged and required to preserve the more valuable species of produce.

404. I suppose that the rents in Bengal may be collected according to ascertained rates throughout two-thirds of the country; and, notwithstanding the various abuses which I have detailed, it is evident that some standard must exist; for, without it, the revenues could never be collected from year to year as they have been. Exactions on one side, are opposed by collusions, on the other; but we may with certainty conclude, that the ryots are as heavily assessed as ever they were.

405. The land is divided into ryotty and khemar; the rents of the former, are paid in money, and of the latter, in kind. The usual division is half to the zemindar, and half to the cultivator; but some part of the expenses generally fall upon the latter, in addition to the stipulated proportion.

406. Puttats to the khode khosht ryots, or those who cultivate the land of the village where they reside, are generally given, without any limitation of period; and express that they are to hold the lands, paying the rents from year to year. Hence the right of occupancy originates; and it is equally understood as a prescriptive law, that the ryots who hold by this tenure, cannot relinquish any part of the lands in their possession, or change the species species of cultivation, without a forfeiture of the right of occupancy, which is rarely insisted upon; and the zemindars demand and exact the difference. I understand also, that this right of occupancy is admitted to extend, even to the heirs of those who enjoy it.

407. Pykaust ryots, or those who cultivate the land of villages where they do not reside, hold their lands upon a more indefinite tenure. The puttats to them, are generally granted with a limitation in point of time: where they deem the terms unfavourable, they repair to some other spot.

408. Such are the general usages and practice, as far as I have been able to ascertain; but there are local customs which can only be known by an examination on the spot. In some parts of the country, I understand that the zemindar is, by prescription, precluded from measuring the lands of the ryots, whilst they pay the rents according to the puttah and jumabundy. Amongst the inconveniences and abuses which may be inferred from this detail, the principal appear to be these:

The gradual introduction of new impositions.
The number of them, and intricacy attending the adjustment of the ryots' accounts.

409. I shall now proceed to state and consider the several propositions which have been made at various times, for the introduction of regularity, and the correction of the existing abuses.

410. Mr. Francis proposed, that it should be made an indispensable "condition with the zemindar, that, in the course of a stated time, he shall grant new puttats to his tenants, either on the same footing with his own quit rents; that is, as long as the zemindar's quit rent remains the same, or for a term of years, as they may agree." The former is the custom of the country. This will become a new assil jumma for each ryot, and ought to be as sacred as the zemindar's quit rent. The puttah should be expressed in the simplest terms possible, without a single abwab or muthote; so much p' bega of land which he cultivates, varying only according to the articles of produce, or quality of the soil.

411. By some, it has been proposed, that the collectors should grant puttats to the ryots; and we have, I believe, on some occasions, authorised this measure; but of late the applications on this subject, have been postponed for general consideration.

412. It may be here proper, in addition to the observations which I have already recorded, to collect into one view, the suggestions of the collectors upon this subject.

BEERBHOOM AND BISHENPORE.

413. The collector, after enumerating the various frauds and impositions which exist, and which seem principally practised by the head ryots or munduls, recommends the general distribution of puttats throughout Beerbhoom, as necessary to guard against them; and proposes a form for this purpose.

414. In additional security to the grand objects aimed at by the distribution of puttats, he suggests the appointment of a sheristadar for each pergunnah. The description of the functions to be executed by this officer, shows them to be of the nature of those formerly performed by the naib canongoes, with some extension of authority. He communicates the regulations adopted by himself, for deciding upon the claims and disputes of the ryots.

415. But in Bishenpore he does not recommend puttats, for this reason; that it would preclude government from the benefit of discovering frauds and collusions.

BURDWAN.

416. In this zemindary, the collector informs us that not more than a fourth of the ryots are in possession of puttats, and that those are granted by the farmers, or their gomastahs, and not by the zemindar; that the rent paid by the ryots is regulated by custom and usage, and that the puttats are not permanent; for where a more profitable species of cultivation is produced than before, the profit is accounted for by the ryots. Some of the puttats which I have seen, contain a condition to this effect. He further adds, that the distinctions in the tenures of the ryots, render any general form of puttah impracticable, nor a fixed quit rent possible, either upon the quantity of the land, or the quality of the produce; that the latter varies from accidental causes.

417. In obedience to orders, he has nevertheless, with the assistance of one of the ablest zemindary officers, drawn out the form of a puttah, observing at the same time, that the constant opposition to all innovations in mofussil management, renders its process doubtful. In addition to this detail, I must further add, what I believe to be a fact, that the zemindary of Burdwan is at present in the highest state of cultivation throughout, although the ryots there, are taxed heavier than in any district in Bengal.

DACCA.

418. The remarks apply to one division of the province only. The collector, Mr. Day, informs us, that the mode of collecting in the northern parts of the Dacca district, is by making a hustabod or measurement of the lands held by each renter, immediately previous to the harvest, agreeably to which the lands are valued and rents received. He apprehends the same mode prevails elsewhere, and that nothing can be more discouraging to the renters.

419. The zemindars in general, enter into no engagements with the ryots, but collect what they can. Allowed remissions never extend to ryots; they feel no increases.* The impositions are said to be numerous and unascertainable, and the want of engagements renders it impossible to detect abuses: this will require immediate remedy; and he proposes that the zemindars shall be compelled to enter into engagements with the ryots, for the periods of their own leases. He sends the form of a puttah.

MOORSHEDABAD

* sic. in orig.

MOORSHEDABAD.

420. The collector proposes various forms of pottahs, according to the rates of the lands, and the fixed or occasional residence of the ryots; he observes that these rates have been formed from a minute inspection of the Mofussil accounts, the ryots, puttahs, and a measurement of at least one village in each pergunnah; that the ryots from all parts came and examined the accounts and approved the form; a time was allowed for objections, but none were made.

CHITTAGONG.

421. The rents of this district are collected by rates established by a measurement and jumabundy formed in the Bengal year 1174. It has never been the custom to grant puttahs to the fixed jumabundy ryots, who would refuse them, on an idea that the zemindars might then grant puttahs to whom they pleased; the rates and rules of assessment do not vary, and the jumabundy being established, impositions on the ryots are easily ascertained and redressed.

NUDDEA.

422. The collections from the ryots in this district, are regulated by the amount paid in the last and preceding year; that without a measurement and jumabundy, the custom of granting puttahs and collecting by them, could not be introduced, as the quantity and quality of the land must form the basis of an equal assessment, and both, with the rates, ought to be specified in the puttah. In Mahomed Amynpore, which forms a part of the Nuddea collectorship, the same rule of collection prevails; but a hustabood was formed from the mofussil papers in 1178 Bengal style, by Mr. Lushington. No oppressive impositions have since been made, the ryots do not desert; and their situation appears tolerably satisfactory. In Satsyka, and other places under the same authority, the usage is similar.

JESSORE.

423. The various inequalities in the rates of assessment, and the abuses prevailing, are related by the collector, and suggested to him the recommendation of abolishing the present puttahs and granting others. He proposes the form of a puttah, which has been drawn out with the concurrence of the canongoes; the object of this, is to fix specific rates, at which each article of assessment upon the assul jumma is to be collected, and not a specific sum for a given quantity of land, which would be impossible, unless a general measurement and new valuation of the lands were authorized. I am not sure that I understand the proposition.

424. The collector discusses at large the subject of granting puttahs, and the mode in which it should be done, and his arguments merit attention; but I have extracted in this place, whatever appears material to the question, in one point of view only. It may, however, be proper to advert to a custom subsisting in Jessore, viz. That the nominal rate of begas, where their puttahs state five only; and upon this last quantity, the assessment of three rupees for each, is made.

RAJSHAHY.

425. I could wish that the information on this extensive district, had been more particular; the material part of it relating to the present question, is as follows:
That there is no difficulty for a capable mohurr to detect oppression on a ryot, as far as the enquiry depends upon his puttah, except where the batta is adjusted. That the ryots would hear of the introduction of new puttahs with an apprehension that no explanation could remove, and that he cannot transmit forms of puttahs to be executed by the zemindars and farmers to the ryots. That the rates of land may be procured, but that the great difficulty still remains unconquerable to any body but a zemindar, of ascertaining the quantity.

DINAGEPORE.

426. The abuses detailed, sufficiently pointed out the necessity of regulating the demands upon the ryots by some rule. The collector accordingly proposes the introduction of puttahs, but in a mode different from all others. He assumes the demand of government upon the zemindar, as the foundation that is to be apportioned out through the pergunnahs and villages, and thence to graduate to the ryot by certain rules. The settlement, when it arrives at this gradation, is to be assessed upon the land, at a fixed rate per bega. He states the difficulties attending the execution of this plan, and the means of counteracting them, and observes upon it, that in the opinion of intelligent people, no other mode for the introduction of puttahs can take place. He proposes, that no puttahs should be valid, without the collectors signature.

SYLHET.

427. Of this district little need be said, as the very peculiar circumstances of it, have induced the board to order a measurement of it, which is now under execution.

RANGPUR.

428. The varying customs of the different districts classed under this collectorship, render it difficult to lay down any rules for preventing abuses, which the collector only can prevent; it is usual for the zemindars to give ticka puttahs at the beginning of the year, but if the grain is dear, they insist upon being paid in kind. The remedy for this oppression, is to punish exemplarily all abuses of this nature.—No measurement has ever been made of Jeldia. A form of a puttah is proposed, which he thinks will operate particularly well in Jacheat.

RUNGPORE.

429. The collector as long ago as March 1787, proposed the form of a puttah in Carjeehaut, which is not yet effectually carried into execution. He now recommends a general form for the districts under his charge, upon similar principles.

PURNAH.

430. The detail of the situation of this collectorship is very minute. It is proposed by the collector, that he should be allowed to grant puttahs under the seal of the cutcherry, at a certain sum, including rents and taxes; that by this mode the annual traffic carried on by the munduls and putwarries in puttahs will be prevented; the demands of the zemindars will be limited; nor can the ryots lower the dues of government.

24 PERGUNNAHS.

431. A form of puttah has already been adopted for the lands under this division, and the collector informs us, that puttahs are granted according to that form, and a general register kept of them.

432. This detail, without extending it unnecessarily, points out the objections to the immediate establishment of general rules, and the necessity of adopting them to the local circumstances of each district. In deviating from established usages, we run a risque of substituting others of more detriment, in their room. No order of government should ever be issued, unless it can be enforced; to compel the ryots to take out puttahs where they are already satisfied with the forms of their tenure, and the usages by which rents are received, would occasion useless confusion; and to compel the zemindars to grant them under such circumstances, or where the rules of assessment are not previously ascertained, would, in my opinion, be nugatory. When Mr. Francis proposed that the zemindars should be compelled to grant puttahs to the ryots within a limited time, he was not aware perhaps of the little intercourse subsisting between the more considerable zemindars and the ryots, nor that puttahs are generally granted by the farmers, gomastahs, and munduls of the villages. To require that the puttahs should be given for a definite time, as proposed by some of the collectors, would diminish the force of that prescription which established a right of occupancy in favour of the ryots. In some places, as for instance in Jessore, the issuing of puttahs at present, would tend to the confirmation of the existing abuses, by which it appears, that the zemindar is more defrauded than the ryots oppressed, notwithstanding the numerous taxes imposed upon them.

433. In authorizing the collectors to grant puttahs to the ryots, we certainly deviate in some degree, from an established principle, which I always assume, that the zemindars are the proprietors of the soil. I have admitted, it is true, on the grounds of precedent, the right of the government to interfere in regulating the assessment upon the ryots; but I object to the policy and propriety of this interference, without evident necessity: where a zemindar has refused or evaded the execution of the orders prescribed to him for the security of his tenants, or is unable to execute them, the interference of the collector may be expedient. The regulation of the rents of the ryots is properly a transaction between the zemindar or landlord and his tenants, and not of the government; and the detail attending it, is so minute as to baffle the skill of any man, not well versed in it. Where rates exist, or where the collections are made by any permanent rules, the interference of the collector would be unnecessary; where the reverse is the case, he would find it difficult to adjust them. Errors committed by a collector, should not be left to the subsequent correction of a zemindar; but it is the duty of an officer of government to correct those of the zemindars. Nothing but necessity should ever induce us to authorize the collector to fix the rates of assessment on the land. In trusting to established custom, and to the Mofussil officers under the inspection of a collector, who has mindarray servants, we have a more safe reliance than the interposition of a collector, who has already sufficient employment to occupy his whole time. I do not see the same objection in authorizing him to affix his signature to the puttah or jumabundy of a ryot, after it has been settled by the zemindary officers. I proceed to other propositions.

434. Mr. Hastings and Mr. Barwell, in their minute for the future settlement of the revenues, recorded on the 22d of April 1775, propose that all new taxes which have been imposed upon the ryots in any part of the country, since the commencement of the Bengal year 1172, being the year in which the Company obtained the dewanny, be entirely abolished. Mr. Grant, in his address of the 28th of February 1788, makes the same proposition with respect to the dewanny lands, but with a qualification which apparently removes part of the difficulties attending the proposition; adding, that the Company do restrict their annual demands upon those lands to the assul, abwab, kefayet and tawfur of the dewanny, to be levied in the form of a simple assessment, and to be subject only to a deduction of the established amount of all the Mofussil charges and native management suggested with regard to those and the dewanny lands. The consideration of Mr. Grant's proposition will apply to those and the dewanny lands. It does not follow that a measure, proper and practicable in the year 1775, is equally so, at this period; and although it ought not to be now attempted, in execution, I shall state my reasons why I think it ought not to be first, as furnishing the standard for the demands of government upon the country; and secondly, as establishing the rules for collecting the rents from the ryots.

436. With respect to the first, I think we have in the accounts supplied by the collectors, and their experience, a better standard for regulating the demands of government.

437. With regard to the second, it has been already observed, that the mode by which the demand of government upon the zemindar was regulated, and that by which the rents of the ryots were collected, are different. Admitting that in some instances, the ryots paid the taxes imposed by the nazims upon the zemindars, in the same proportions to the assul, and under the same denominations as the zemindars, this was by no means invariably the case; on the contrary, I hold the reverse generally to be true.

438. In Nuddea, for instance, seven articles of abwab out of the twelve specified by Mr. Grant, were imposed upon the zemindars, viz. khusnoreesec, nuzzarana, mokurrery, zer mathote ahub serf sicca 1 $\frac{1}{2}$ anna, abwab Fonzdarry, and chout marhatta; and of these only the two last, were levied from the ryots. In Mahomed Amynpore, five were imposed upon the zemindars, and three of the five mathoot fulkarrak chout mahratla, and serf sicca 1 $\frac{1}{2}$ anna in the rupee upon the ryots. In Satsyka six were levied from the zemindars, and one only of the six, the chout Mahratta, from the ryots. This last is doubtful; but the ryots of Nuddea had, as long ago as the year 1724, been taxed with two articles named beekee and haldaree, amounting to one anna six gunds in the rupee; and in 1751, another was added under the denomination of subdharree being about two annas in the rupee. If, therefore, we were to adopt Mr. Grant's proposition for restricting the demands to the twelve ascertained legal articles of exaction at the time of the dewanny, by which I understand those enumerated in his Analysis, we should exclude the three which had been previously established, and which to this day subsist, amounting to three annas 16 gundas: to avoid the loss occasioned by such a defalcation, we must add the three to his list, in which they do not appear. This might be done where they are known, but should not take place at random.

439. In Jessore, exclusive of fourteen articles imposed upon the zemindars by the nazims, twelve of which descended to the ryots, there were nineteen distinct articles collected from the latter. The nuzzeranah mokurrery, mentioned in Mr. Grant's list, was not paid by them.

440. In other districts, similar variations occur. What has been stated is sufficient to show the danger of complying with his proposition without an accurate knowledge of the state of taxation, both at the sudder and in the mofussil, at the period of the dewanny. Without this, we should not know what we confirmed, nor what we rejected of the mofussil taxes. I find no detail in Mr. Grant's Analysis.

441. The collector of Nuddea, in an address to the board of revenue dated the 6th March 1787, proposed the abolition of sundry taxes established in 1190 and 1191. Upon further inquiry and subsequent experience, he found that deductions had been granted in lieu of them, and that they were not so oppressive, as he first supposed. He accordingly recommended that the revenues should be collected agreeable to the rates of 1191. Thus, practical experience corrects the errors of theory. The collector also of Jessore informs the board of revenue in an address dated June 25th 1788, that the old assul jumma is in many places extended or else lost, in the accumulating taxes that have been subsequently added, and constitute the present jumma. The information of the collector of Dinagpore to the same point, has been already quoted.

442. In the Houghly district, a jummahundy was formed by Mr. Lushington in 1778, which has since furnished the rules by which the ryots payments have been made.

443. Now let us suppose that an order were issued for abolishing all taxes imposed since the dewanny, and trace the consequences.

444. The zemindars and farmers, in the first instance, must revert to the accounts of that year, to know what taxes were collected from the ryots. It is probable, and I may venture to say certain, that the accounts in many places would be lost, or so confused, as not to be traced; and in this case the measure would be impracticable. Let us suppose, however, that the accounts are forthcoming: the trouble of tracing, examining, and applying them would be endless; and after all, it may be doubted whether the ryots would agree to the substitution of the rates of the period referred to, for those now paid by them, and whether they would benefit by the alteration. Considering the variations in the state of the mofussil since 1765, the application of the documents and records of that period, would be difficult.

445. The promulgation of such an order, as Mr. Grant observes, is very easy; but the immediate consequence would be a diminution of the public revenue. This necessarily diately revived and established, the loss would be certain during the first year, probably to the amount of one-fourth of the public revenue.

446. After all I see no advantage that would be gained by it. If the assul jumma, with the twelve subahdarry abwab formed the measure of the ryots payments, then indeed it might be considered as a standard for the public revenue, and for limiting and ascertaining the rents paid by the ryots. But we have direct proofs to the contrary; and this, in my opinion, furnishes an incontrovertible objection to the adoption of Mr. Grant's suggestion. The nuzzeranah, which existed to so large an amount in Dinagpore, is not mentioned in his Analysis.

447. If there appeared to me any valid reasons for assuming the collections of 1765, as a standard for the rents from the ryots at this period I should propose, in the first instance, that the collectors should be required to furnish an account of the rates of taxation at the former former period, and to give their opinions whether the adoption of them would be practicable; and if it would be attended, with any beneficial effects to the ryots, or with advantage to government. Without this information, the promulgation of the order proposed by Mr. Grant, would infallibly produce, in my opinion, the greatest confusion throughout the districts, and a certain diminution of the present assessment; it would also load us with a detail, which we should find it difficult to get through. The necessity of the measure ought to be established beyond all doubt, to induce us to adopt it, with such probable consequences.

448. These are the arguments which occur against the measure, as a general proposition: I will not assert that it may not be partially practicable, in particular instances; and if from the reports of the collectors, which will be distinctly examined, this should appear to be the case, we may then adopt it, when it cannot be attended with the apprehended inconveniences.

449. I shall now state the measures which have heretofore been adopted for the purpose of limiting the exactions of the zemindars and farmers, and the collusions of the ryots, as well as the reasons which have prevented their operation.

450. When the five years settlement was concluded by the committee of circuit, several conditions were inserted in the agreements of the farmers and zemindars, calculated for the security of the government and benefit of their tenants. Thus, they were prohibited resuming lands applied to religious or charitable uses, exclusive of the original revenue land, and collecting the various impositions known by the name of bazee jumma, haldarry, moracha and salamy. They were precluded making any new grant of bromutter, &c. they were directed to collect from the cultivated lands of the ryots in the Mofussil, the original jumma of the last and foregoing year, and abwab established in the present, and on no account, to demand more; where the lands were cultivated without puttahs by the ryots, they were to collect, according to the rates of the pergunnah. By another clause of the rates of the former mulguzarry, the puttah for the present year's cultivation was to become the standard of the collections from the ryots, and penalties were enacted for a breach of this. The receipt of any nuzzer salamy parbunny was prohibited.

451. A mohrer was also appointed on behalf of government to take comparative account of the sherista; and secret and clandestine collusions were expressly prohibited.

452. In explanation of a former article, it was ultimately fixed; that the assul and abwab of 1172, together with the abwab accumulated thereon by the records of the sudder since the year 1173, were to be consolidated, and to form the standard of the collections.

453. The regulations, though less accurate in terms than they might have been, had a reference to an established principle of collecting, and it is very apparent, that if they had been enforced, the present difficulties would not have existed; but the truth is, that they were not; and at the expiration of the five years, the state of the Mofussil was less known, than when the settlement took place.

454. The farmers collected, what they could; they measured their demands, by the abilities of their tenants. Ignorance of the actual state of the Mofussil, was a bar to the detection and prevention of abuses. The government, embarrassed by two opposite motives, the necessity of realizing the settlement which they had made, and a desire to restrain them. The were sometimes obliged to support the farmers, and at other times to restrain them. The recal of the effect, however, in both cases, was a deficiency in the public payments. The recal of the collectors in 1781, contributed still further to involve all past experience in obscurity, and to multiply the confusion which prevailed.

455. The caboolat then established, has been since continued; and every succeeding farmer, by the terms of it, has deemed himself authorized to collect what his predecessor demands. Hence every new cess has in fact, become confirmed.

456. The only observation which I shall here add to this detail is, that we are not to infer the inutility of the restrictions imposed, because they were not enforced; a distinction which may with great justice be applied to the measures of this government.

457. The leading principles upon which I shall ground my propositions for the ensuing settlement, are two.

458. The security of government with respect to its revenues; and the security and protection of its subjects.

459. The former, will be best established by concluding a permanent settlement with the zemindars or proprietors of the soil; the land, their property, is the security to government.

460. The second, must be ensured by carrying into practice, as far as possible, an acknowledged maxim of taxation. That the tax which each individual is bound to pay, ought to be certain, and not arbitrary. The time of payment, the manner of payment, the quantity to be paid, ought all to be clear and plain to the contributor and every other person.

461. It is essential to the success of these principles, that the settlement be made upon such fair and moderate terms, that the zemindars may derive advantage from their engagements, after a due performance of the stipulations contained in them. The period of the settlement is prescribed in the 56th paragraph of the letter from the Court of Directors by the Swallow, in the following words: "We therefore direct that you form the assessment for a period of ten years certain." But it is also necessary to advert to the directions, in the 52d paragraph of the same letter.

Mr. Shore's Minute of June 1789, respecting Permanent Settlement of Lands in Bengal.

"It is therefore our intention that the jumma now to be formed, shall, as soon as it can have received our approval and ratification, be considered as the permanent and unalterable revenue of our territorial possessions in Bengal, so that no discretion may be exercised by our servants abroad in any case, and even by us, unless some urgent and peculiar case, of introducing any alteration whatever."

462. The settlement is then to be made for a period of ten years certain; but with a view to permanency.

463. To accomplish these measures, we must pay due attention to the existing circumstances of the country, adverting at the same time, to the most approved practices of Mogul finance, which may be adopted as far as they are compatible with the principles and form of our government. To establish at once a perfect arrangement, would be impossible; but our regulations, should have a view to it. In combining temporary expedients with permanent arrangements, the former must be so modified as not to impede the operation of the latter, but to lead to them, and promote them.

464. The tukseem of Turymull, which was adhered to for a long period, was well adapted to the circumstances of the government and the country. The name is still kept up, although there is reason to suppose that long before our accession to the dewanny, a new tukseem had in fact taken place.

465. Bengal was formerly portioned into a certain number of sircars, and each sircar into a number of pergunnahs, and these again into terfs kismuts and villages, and the revenue of each subdivision was recorded in the tukseem.

466. It should be our object to obtain a similar account, not I think by reverting to the antient account, and after comparing the differences which have taken place, to re-establish the division of it, which would be little applicable to the existing state of things; but by assuming as a ground-work the present distribution of the country into collectorships, after such correction as it may admit, and by obtaining through the different collectors, an account of the distribution of the revenue upon pergunnahs and villages throughout their respective jurisdictions.

467. To perform this, we must first determine the number of pergunnahs in each zemindarry, and prescribe a form of arrangement for them, which shall be established by law, imposing penalties for every unauthorized alteration. I do not by this mean to prevent a zemindar changing the subdivisions of a pergunnah, but to require only that the constituent subdivisions shall always stand under the same pergunnah, where they are originally placed, and that they shall not be transferred to any other. Thus, supposing a pergunnah to be portioned out into five or more terfs or kismuts, comprehending the whole, it shall stand in the accounts as one article only, comprizing so many divisions. This will not interrupt the operations of the zemindars in making a settlement, which must be accommodated to the prescribed distribution of the lands.

468. Secondly. When this account is completed, another must be formed, showing the component parts of the pergunnahs; the divisions of the pergunnahs into kismuts and terfs is arbitrary, and liable to frequent variation, but the villages are more permanent. These must therefore form the particulars of the second account, and the names of them should be fixed, not liable to any alteration.

469. To these propositions I see no material objections; but they suggest a very important question, whether the tukseem account shall contain the actual assessment upon the subdivision of the zemindarry, or only the proportions of each to the revenue assessed upon the whole, by government.

470. As preparatory to a decision upon this question, it may be proper to enumerate the advantages which would ensue from obtaining accounts of the assessment, upon every portion of land, and the objections to the measure; to consider whether the same advantages may be procured by other means, what inconvenience would result from neglecting them, and whether, upon the whole, they are sufficient to overbalance the objections against it.

471. The advantages resulting from it, will be these:

First. The government will obtain, in the course of time, a more accurate account of the resources, and progressive information of the improvement or decline of the country.

Secondly. They will possess the knowledge requisite to manage the collections through their own officers, in case the adoption of this measure should be eventually expedient, and of employing, when wanted, their interference to correct the irregularity or inequality of the assessment.

Thirdly. In the event of balances, they will be furnished with a standard for fixing the value of land in case of sale.

Fourthly. They will possess the means of ascertaining the truth of any representations of the zemindars on losses sustained by calamities, and a rule for determining the necessity of relief, and the quantum of it.

Fifthly. Whenever it may be necessary in any disputes regarding the boundaries, proposed account will furnish the basis of comparison, and in time become a new tukseem for the country.

Sixthly. The accounts required will afford information respecting all persons employed in the collection of the revenues, both as to their conduct and capacity, as well as the means for preventing breach of engagement and extortion.

472. I shall now state the objections to each of these arguments, in the same order in which they occur.

473. First.

Mr. Shore's Minute of June 1789, respecting Permanent Settlement of Lands in Bengal.

473. First. It may be urged that unless government intend to raise the revenues of the lands in future, any further knowledge of the value of them beyond what we at present possess is unnecessary; and to demand the accounts of it, would only tend to excite suspicions in the zemindars, that the present assessment would not be permanent. The Court of Directors are themselves satisfied upon this point, and discourage the idea of local investigations into the value of the lands; directing, that when the tribute of each zemindar is fixed, he shall remain undisturbed in the administration and enjoyment of his estate, and be assured that as long as he pays his stipulated revenue, he shall be subject to no scrutinies or interposition of the officers of government, unless where a judicial process may become necessary, to adjust claims between him and tenants, or talookdars, or co-partners of the same zemindarry.

474. If the amount of the settlement is to be re-adjusted at the expiration of the ten years, these accounts will be necessary; but if it is to be confirmed in perpetuity, they may be dispensed with.

475. The board have lately had before them very positive assertions, that the country is capable of yielding an increase of revenue exceeding a crore of rupees. I have already given my opinion in opposition to them, and have stated the arguments by which it is supported. With me, therefore, these assertions have little weight; and as they have long been before the Court of Directors, without producing any orders in consequence, it is to be presumed that they adhere to their more moderate opinions, so amply and decisively expressed in their letter by the Swallow. I see no reason, therefore, for adopting any measures contrary to the spirit of the orders by that conveyance, on the grounds of Mr. Grant's arguments or assertions, or those of others.

476. Admitting this reason, we may fairly disclaim the idea of pursuing measures calculated to afford us a more accurate valuation of the lands, when attended with risque to the principle we assume, and the argument which rests upon the advantages to be derived from the investigation loses much of its force. Whatever has a tendency to inculcate in our subjects a reliance upon the permanency of the measures of government, by removing or abating their suspicions, is, on the other hand, an important consideration; yet I must acknowledge an opinion that our assurances will not abolish suspicion, which will never be eradicated, but by a steady adherence to system.

477. It may be further observed, that neither the zemindars nor their under tenants will voluntarily discover their advantages; and that to procure true accounts of the amount of their several engagements, penalties must be established for the suppression of them, or for the delivery of false.

478. On the other hand, it is also certain that the Mogul government required and recorded the jumma of the lands in all its subdivisions, together with the fluctuations of it, through their own officers; and that the proposition is conformable to antient practice.

479. The progressive decline or improvement of the country is another consideration; and although we may form a general idea of it, without requiring the accounts in the manner proposed, the information on these points, will be less accurate. The question then is, whether the general information of the collectors will be a sufficient guide for the government, in this respect. With due care and attention, I think it may.

480. I might have contented myself with resting this argument upon the orders of the Court of Directors, which it is our duty to obey, unless solid reasons for a deviation can be shown; but they will, I presume, be better satisfied with a discussion of the question, than a tacit obedience.

481. Secondly. Upon a supposition that the settlement is to be permanent, and deficiency in the payments of the zemindars must be made good by selling a portion of their estates, equal to the liquidation of it; and hence it may be inferred, that no occasion will ever occur in which it will be necessary for the government to undertake the management of the collections through their own officers. That when the jumma of a zemindarry is once fixed, the proprietor will find it so much his interest to improve his estate, that he will be led by this principle to correct the subsisting irregularities and inequalities in the assessments, without any interference on the part of government.

482. This argument is so immediately connected with the fundamental principles of the present propositions for a permanent zemindarry settlement, that they must both be admitted, or rejected. I am far from supposing, however, that the principle will operate immediately, considering the ignorance of the zemindars, their inattention to business, the great extent of the principal zemindaries, and the abilities required for a due administration of the rents. In the course of time, it ought to be effective.

483. That several of the zemindars will incur penalties for the non-performance of their engagements is at first to be expected; and it may be said that they will be the sufferers, and not the government, who will have a security in the land. It is certainly also for the interest of government, and good of the country, that the great zemindaries should be dismembered; and the number of petty proprietors be increased. The ryots, or inferior reuters, who suffer from the irregularity or inequality of the assessment, will obtain relief from being transferred to a more prudent, economical, or equitable management; and partial inequality may be corrected by partial interference.

484. The only instances in which it occurs to me that government ought to take the management of the revenues into its own hands, is that of minors and females, and other excluded proprietors; and in this case, the true accounts of the assessment would be useful.

485. For it is not to be presumed that the appropriation of the mofussil settlement to the amount engaged for by the zemindar, in the terms of the question, will be truly stated, or that it will serve as a rule for levying that amount from the same divisions of the country. The inequalities of the allotment, it is true, are of little comparative moment, whilst the zemindars manage their own estates; but when a minor succeeds they will be material, and without a knowledge of them, the government may be subject to loss; many of the pergunnahs will appear under-rated with a view to guard against a discovery of the emoluments of them, whilst others will be over-assessed, and perhaps be found unequal to the rated portion of the jumma, and the officers employed by the collectors, will take an advantage of it.

486. I acknowledge at the same time, that a collector with tolerable abilities, and an assiduous exertion of them, may soon surmount the difficulties attending the situation, and his residence upon the spot ought to give him sufficient experience to enable him to superintend the business successfully, whenever the management falls to his lot. It has been effected under greater disadvantages. The reverse however may happen, and the weight due to this consideration be allowed.

487. Thirdly.—In answer to the remarks stated under this article, it may be observed, that if the rent of the constituent parts of the zemindary be apportioned to the government's demand upon the proprietor, that will furnish a sufficient standard for determining the assessment of the land when sold; that it will remain with the officers of the government to select such parts of the zemindary in case of sale, as they may think proper, and it is their duty to choose portions equal to the payment of the stipulated revenue; that hence, the designed or accidental inequality in the settlement of the parts to the whole, will not be prejudicial to the revenues of government.

488. But it is not impossible to foresee cases in which loss may be actually sustained; suppose for instance, a zemindary divided into fifty pergunnahs, of which twenty, yield a considerable profit; that fifteen of them, are barely equal to the allotment of the jumma put upon them; and that the remainder are over-assessed. That this will be the general case at first, and is so at present, can hardly be doubted.

489. Let us suppose further, that a zemindar is deficient in his stipulated payments to the amount of fifty thousand rupees, and that two pergunnahs are sold to make good this amount.

490. If they be selected from the class of profitable pergunnahs, the zemindar will be a loser, and the loss will render him so far incapable of paying the revenues of the remainder, upon which he will probably attempt to levy the deficiency, even at the certainty of future loss. If the selection be made from the losing pergunnahs, the lands must again be dismembered, and the government must ultimately lower the assessment, which becomes a permanent loss without any equivalent.

491. Admitting these suppositions, the consequence is evident, for if the sale were carried on until the whole zemindary be disposed of, the revenues must be lowered, and this consequence will follow in whatever manner it is begun and continued, under the circumstances by reflecting, that if the pergunnahs of a zemindary paying ten lacks of rupees, were separately sold, subject to the payment of a fixed quit rent proportioned to the whole assessment, admitting the premised inequality, there would be a deficiency in the revenue, not perhaps immediately at the first sale, but this would bring on a second, and ultimately, the necessity of lowering the jumma of the different pergunnahs; for no man would hold land at a certain annual loss, nor purchasers be found at a second sale, for land subject to such terms. It is a known and undisputed fact, that a zemindar, when called upon for an account of the rents of his zemindary, will furnish them in detail, so calculated as to show an account, less than what he is called upon to pay. Profits are secreted and not brought into the account. I can produce the accounts of Burdwan as delivered to me, in different years, by the zemindar, in proof of the assertion. The assessment of the villages will be no remedy against the stated inconvenience, for a zemindar will find no more difficulty in adopting their rental to that of the pergunnahs, than the rental of the latter, to the total jumma of the zemindary. It is probable that some will be at first omitted.

492. I know but one answer to this supposition; that it is scarcely probable the zemindars, when their property is secured by a limitation of the demands for land tax, will ever prove defaulters in a degree, to affect the public revenue. Thus far probability opposes presumption, but it does not answer the objection completely or satisfactorily; for a zemindar may be ruined through his own ignorance and the knavery of his servants, not to mention that their general conduct is against the probability.

493. It may, however, be contended, that under the circumstance of a fixed jumma, the same consequence will follow, supposing it to be founded, in the first instance, on the account of the actual assessment, as delivered by the zemindars.

494. To this it may be replied, that with the knowledge presumed, the consequence may be prevented; that the profits of part shall be equal to the deficiency upon the remainder; or in case of sale, one part may be augmented and another lowered, with a due regard to the produce.

495. In any case, the limits of the land sold must be previously defined, to prevent the subsequent disputes between the former and new proprietor.

496. Mr. Francis proposed that a new tukseem of the country should be made, for the mere purpose of regulating the quit rent of the lands upon sales or transfers, by adopting the the jumma of the pergunnahs to that of the whole zemindary, which was to be permanent and unalterable. This, in fact, is the proposition which I have been considering, although expressed in different terms; but it may be proper to enter into a more particular discussion of it, by itself, with a view to professed objects, without any comparison of it, with the other mode suggested.

497. It is admitted that our knowledge of the constituent portions of the large zemindaries is at present, very imperfect; we have some ground for determining the quantum of revenue which the whole is capable of yielding, yet we should probably find much difficulty in realizing that amount, if the officers of government were to collect it, from the several pergunnahs. The reason is obvious; because they know not the real capacity of them.

498. The zemindar and his officers, ignorant as one or both may be, are in this respect, better informed than we are; and hence they are enabled to collect the assessment which we suppose.

499. The relative value of the pergunnahs is continually varying, from accidental calamities, good or bad management of them, or from the superior skill of the different farmers. Many instances may be produced in which the value of the pergunnahs is now diminished or increased one-half in a period of fifteen years. As inundation sometimes leaves a pergunnah desolate, and incapable of cultivation for a term of years, the ryots remove to another, and augment the value of it.

500. A knowledge of these variations is not so material in fixing the jumma, upon the whole, as the loss in one place, may be balanced by the gain, of another; nor will our ignorance of constituent portions of the assessment upon a zemindary be productive of any material inconvenience, whilst the zemindar makes good the revenue.

501. But the proposition applies to the opposite consideration, the fixing the value of the lands in case of sale, and this is to be done at present, to determine the revenue of lands sold at any future period. Notwithstanding the very respectable authority in matters of Asiatic finance, which has been adduced in support of it, I see very considerable difficulties in the execution of it.

502. The following statement of Rent assessed upon several of the pergunnahs in the Nuddea collectorship, at the period nearly when Mr. Francis's proposition was made, compared with the jumma of the same pergunnahs in 1195, will elucidate those remarks.

PERGUNNAHS	Jumma of 1183.		Jumma of 1195.
Balguah - - - - -	22,681.		13,302.
Bogwan - - - - -	95,541.		69,001.
Cobagepore - - - - -	19,765.		11,621.
Kishenagur - - - - -	90,814.		76,237.
Mutteary - - - - -	73,572.		52,001.
Boonun - - - - -	91,211.		55,061.
Pajenore - - - - -	68,054.		49,189.
Plassey - - - - -	81,098.		49,774.

503. Boonun, in the above extract, is rented at 55,001 R^s; but the calamities of the season reduced the receipts of it in 1195, to about 28,000 R^s only. The collector's opinion with regard to this pergunnah is, that it would require a period of ten or twelve years to restore it to the jumma of 1183, and an annual advance for assisting the cultivation, equal to half the present jumma.

504. Let us suppose that the jumma of 1183 had been declared permanent, and that for the liquidation of the balances since incurred by the zemindar, any of the above pergunnahs, or in lieu of them, some others, with increased profits, had been sold. In either case the sale in the first or second instance, would be attended with loss to the government.

505. These considerations apply to Bengal; half the revenues of which are supplied from six large zemindaries: and if the fact be true, that the pergunnahs are liable to constant in their respective from whatever cause this may arise, the inconveniences attending the sale of them, subject to a fixed jumma settled at this time, will be obvious.

506. If the pergunnah sold should yield much beyond the stated jumma, the zemindar will have a reasonable ground of complaint.

507. If much less, unless the land should be capable of easy and speedy improvement, the purchaser will lose; and the land must be again sold, and the jumma be reduced. These consequences may ensue without any fault of the zemindar, who will then be punished, where he does not deserve it.

508. After all, it may be asked, where is the necessity of fixing the revenue of the pergunnahs at this time, for the purpose of future sale? That the jumma of a pergunnah should be determined previous to its actual sale, is all that is required for the security of a purchaser: and since there are inconveniences attending the mode pointed out, we ought to consider if some other may not be adapted, not subject to them.

Mr. Shore's Minute of June 1789, respecting Permanent Settlement of Lands in Bengal.

509. This may be done two ways; by requiring the zemindars to deliver in annually an account of the jumma of the pergunnahs, as assessed upon the villages apportioned out to the sudder jumma. I conclude, that it will be inaccurate both from design and ignorance, the zemindar, having suffered by it, will be more attentive to proportion the value to the whole, to avoid another loss. Or, secondly, by ascertaining the value of the land previous to a sale, and regulating the revenue to which it shall be liable, by that value, at the end of the year. The collector, if necessary, may be directed to attach certain pergunnahs, sufficient on a sale to produce the amount of the deficiency, and retain the management of them in his own hands, until the value is sufficiently ascertained, for regulating the land tax previous to a sale.

510. This mode will be the most satisfactory and equitable for all parties, for the zemindar, the purchaser, and the government; but it will be attended with delay, intricacy, and trouble. The plan of an annual valuation may, however, be sufficient for determining the revenue of lands previous to a sale; and though not free from objections, is attended with one important advantage—an expeditious realization of the revenue in arrear. Upon the whole, I am inclined to recommend it; but either of these suggestions will serve as a reply to the arguments under the third head, in support of the necessity of requiring the real valuation of the lands, as the means of regulating the rents of them at a sale.

511. Fourthly.—It may be contended, in answer to the advantages stated under this head, that when the jumma is fixed, the zemindars ought never to be allowed any deductions of revenue on account of calamity, particularly as we mean to settle the revenues which they are to pay, by a fair estimate of what has been actually paid.

512. But it is upon the other hand to be remarked, that with the utmost care and attention in the execution of this proposition, we are still liable to error; and that unless the jumma should be so regulated as to afford the zemindar considerable profits, a calamity of extensive operation, to which no country is more subject than Bengal, from drought and inundation, both of which may even operate in the same year, will, unless some relief be granted him, reduce him to ruin. This consequence may not immediately follow, but result from distresses which he cannot overcome.

513. Let us suppose, that upon lands yielding a jumma of five lacks, a loss of ten per cent. only is occasioned by inundation; that it has been sometimes greater the pergunnah of Boonun proves; and that the zemindar also fails in his payments to an equal amount; whence is the deficient 50,000 rupees to be made good? If by a sale of any of the pergunnahs, the zemindar may be ruined. It is not a sufficient answer that the zemindar may enjoy advantages from others, equal to this loss; and the annual subsequent deficiency for a period, although the proof of such a fact would be. But without the knowledge requisite to determine this point, the decision against a zemindar may be such as the equity of government would hesitate to confirm.

514. The accounts proposed to be required, will not, alone, determine whether the zemindar is entitled to relief. The loss must be ascertained, first, by comparing the actual rent of the desolated pergunnahs for two or three successive years, with the amount of the loss; and taking into consideration the profits and losses upon the whole zemindary, the point may then be ascertained. Without these accounts, fictitious assets will be produced, in order to enhance the effects of the calamity. There are other modes by which a general estimate may be formed of the loss, with a view to decide upon the claims for relief (which ought never to be admitted but where the effects of the calamity are obvious, extensive, and exceed the profits of common years), less accurate indeed than that which I have proposed, but at the same time, unattended with some inconvenience to which it is exposed. Thus, when a plea of loss by inundation is urged, the zemindar may be required to prove his title to relief, by an immediate exhibition of the actual accounts of his collections for the two preceding years; from which it may be known, whether the assessment is, upon the whole, moderate or excessive, and whether he can bear the loss, or not; the local deficiency may be computed, if these accounts are actually delivered.

515. Fifth.—The arguments in support of the proposition, are founded upon the following data.

That there exists an account in this country, known by the name of tukseem, which is frequently resorted to for determining the limits of land, the property of it, the right of erecting markets and gunges, and other points relating to the revenues. It is at the same time, acknowledged to be partial, incorrect, and often inapplicable to the present state of things; at present, however, its use cannot be superseded, although in time it may be a mere account. Gunges and markets are not to be established at the discretion of zemindars and farmers; there are certain rules regarding the establishment of them, with respect to their distance from old erected gunges, and the days on which the markets are to be held. I understand also a rule prevails, that a gunge or market recorded in the tukseem, may be again established, after an abolition of several years, without any regard to the rules of vicinity, in other cases.

516. The proposed tukseem is meant to serve the purposes of the former, and as that is now in use, so the new one in the course of time, will be substituted for it.

517. A tukseem formed upon an allotment of the general jumma of the zemindaries, to serve as a basis of future assessment for the parts of it, will, if progressive, sufficiently answer all the purposes of a tukseem, containing the actual jumma.

518. For

Mr. Shore's Minute of June 1789, respecting Permanent Settlement of Lands in Bengal.

518. For the purpose of granting sunnuds of investiture for lands, such an account will be necessary. The particulars of the present tukseem are inapplicable to the state of the country.

519. Sixthly.—To insure the stated advantages, it will not only be necessary that the engagements of the zemindar with his under-renters be known, but that every engagement between the different renters in all the gradations between the zemindar and ryot, or copies of them, be deposited in the public cutcherry of the zemindary, the pergunnah, talook, or village, to which they appertain, that in case of complaints a ready reference may be made to them.

520. The objections to this, are stated under the first head. The zemindar will be suspicious that the object of the regulation is to procure a knowledge of his profits; and the under-renter will be equally suspicious of the zemindar, who would not fail to take advantage of the knowledge gained, in opposition to the principle established by the government in his favour. To carry it into execution, penalties must be enacted for the delivery of false or the suppression of true accounts.

521. In further opposition to these arguments by which the proposition is supported, it may be replied, that as every renter is furnished with an engagement, every purpose may be answered by the production of it, when complaints are preferred, and that the names of the persons to whom the management of the land is assigned may be known and recorded, without requiring the production of all the actual engagements contracted by them. That this will answer in some degree, I admit; but a record of the jumma, and of all the transactions relating to it, will afford an ampler and greater security to all parties concerned: the publicity of such transactions will deter oppression, or attempts to break any existing contract and engagements. The caboleats entered into by the farmers, when the five years settlement was concluded, has a clause, the direct tendency of which was to procure the record now suggested; but it was evaded, opposed, and never enforced.

522. In favour of the proposition, another argument also occurs; that unless the records of the settlement of the pergunnah be deposited in the cutcherries of them, a new farmer will want the necessary accounts to assist him in forming his own settlement of the lands which he has rented.

523. The choice of a farmer resting with a zemindar, it is his duty to see that he has the means of fulfilling his engagements; the Mofussil farmers also with whom the zemindars engage, are generally inhabitants of the zemindary, and have the means of knowledge; these arguments are suggested by preceding remarks.

524. It is certain, that by procuring a detailed assessment adapted to the sudder jumma, we shall possess more accurate information than what we now have; and if this be annually procured, the comparative accounts of several years will check and correct erroneous statements, without calling for those which may affect the fundamental principle of the settlement. If upon experience, they be found indispensable, they may be demanded.

525. With respect to ryots, however, their security requires that the settlement made with them, should become matter of record. In every zemindary, where the established laws of collections have not been infringed, this is the case at present.

526. I shall now consider the supposition, that nothing more is required from the zemindars, than an allotment of the jumma imposed upon their lands through the pergunnahs and villages; and that they are left undisturbed in the possession of them, without any further attempts on the part of government, to ascertain their value, or interference in the detail.

527. My own experience, as well that of the committee of investigation, whose report I have quoted, has shown that many inconveniences have resulted from an inattention to the ancient institutions, particularly in suffering the office of the canongoes to fall into disuse, which was essential to the prevailing system of an annual variable jumma. For five successive years after our acquisition of the dewanny, the zemindary of Rajshahy paid a jumma of near 28 lacks to government; for the last fifteen years the average does not exceed 21 lacks. It has at different periods, been placed under the management of the officers of government, but without success; what is the cause of this defalcation? It may be in part owing to the depopulated state of the zemindary, the consequence of successive bad management; but it must at the same time, be confessed, that our ignorance of the internal state of the district, has deprived us both of the means of ascertaining the cause, and of correcting it by our own interference. We can only conjecture, at present, the amount of the revenue to be demanded from the zemindar; the records of the canongoes, if duly preserved, would have supplied what we want, by exhibiting what has actually been collected.

528. We know also, that the zemindars continually impose new cesses upon their ryots, and having subverted the fundamental rules of collection, measure their exactions by the abilities of the ryots. This is a very serious evil; for exclusive of the injury which the unprotected subjects of government sustain from it, a necessity follows of our interference to regulate the assessment upon them; a task to which we are rarely equal. That it has been accomplished is admitted, but generally I believe, either at the expense of government or its subjects; that is, the jumma is lowered, beyond what it ought to be, or kept up, at too high a rate. The former is most often the case.

529. I shall not urge these arguments beyond what is fair. In opposition to them, it has already been observed, that the demands of government have been fluctuating; that the zemindars have had no certain security of enjoying the advantages arising from a due administration of their estates, and hence have wanted the encouragement which the present system system is meant to give, and have perhaps been forced into practices which, under a permanent system, would have been forborne.

K k k

Mr. Shore's Minute of June 1789, respecting Permanent Settlement of Lands in Bengal.

530. But the ignorance and incapacity of the zemindars are not to be forgotten. The consequences are equally prejudicial to government and its subjects, whether derived from this source or any other.

531. The security now to be given to the zemindars is more substantial than ever it was; and if the system proposed had been adopted when we acquired the dewanny, and successively adhered to, both the government and its subjects would have experienced the benefit of it; some time will now be required to convince the zemindars that we are serious, and a longer period elapse, before they can or will obtain a knowledge of their interests, and of the mode of conducting them. To eradicate those habits and impressions which have been continued through life, is scarcely to be expected during the present generation. Sufferance will at first teach them; and the stability of our measures must promote self-interest. Government begins, by giving them an example of good faith. In relying therefore upon the operation of the principle which we assume, we ought not during the process of it, to abandon the ryots to caprice or injustice, the result of ignorance and inability. With knowledge, or the means of obtaining it, we may correct the consequences of both; and at present, we must give every possible security to the ryots, as well as to the zemindars. This is so essential a point, that it ought not to be conceded to any plan.

532. Secondly.—Supposing this plan continued for a period of twenty years, we may at the end of it, be without any real account of the state of the country. The present villages may be removed or abandoned; new ones may be erected; and the loss of land by inundation, or accession of it by cultivation, may alter the state or value of the several pergunnahs in a zemindary. In Burdwan, where the proportion of uncultivated land is small, and in other places in the same predicament, the alterations, may be comparatively little; but in Nuddea or Dinagepoor, and Rajshahy, the appearance of the lands, may be totally altered. Under a foreign government, circumstances may be easily foreseen to diminish or increase the value of the whole. It is only upon the diminution of the value, that I lay any stress; for I renounce all idea of taxing our subjects, in proportion to the successful exertions of their industry. The ancient administration of the country acted differently; but if we discard the principle of their conduct, it ought not on this account, to form a precedent for imitation. As long as the revenues are duly paid, an inquisition into the actual produce may destroy confidence, without producing any equivalent advantage.

533. Thirdly.—If all enquiry into the rents of the lands is to be absolutely renounced, it may be difficult to obtain a knowledge of the alienated lands. The Court of Directors, in their revenue general letter of August 20th 1788, by the Swallow, observe that the general and permanent settlement with the zemindars is wholly independent of the revenue which may accrue to the Company from the recovery or reservation of any lands now in alienation; but an investigation of them cannot, I fear, be completely made, without local enquiry. I would wish, if possible, to avoid it; and the determination may be suspended until the effect of the measures now in execution can be known.

534. At all events, upon the principle of the settlement now laid down, laws must be enacted against alienations. To say that the self-interest of zemindars will prevent it, is to argue against proved experience; ignorance and superstition are ill calculated to resist the claims of braminical imposition.

535. Fourthly.—In making a permanent settlement with the zemindars upon the terms of a simple assessment, without requiring the accounts of it in detail, we deviate from ancient established practice.

536. To innovations made upon clear and just principles, and where the extent of them can be known, I have no objection; but we should be cautious in departing suddenly from rules established by our predecessors, even where the possible ill consequences are not obvious.

537. The natives who are versed in the official management of the revenues, will all concur in the necessity of obtaining those accounts which the Mahomedan government formerly required, though as zemindars and talookdars, they would not hesitate to give an opposite opinion. They reason from the practice which they have been taught.

538. The principle upon which such accounts were required, appears to be the right of the sovereign to a proportion of the rents of the land, and his claim to augment them; but the character of the people may have also suggested the necessity of continuing the establishments for recording the Mofussil accounts, in order to guard against a diminution of the jumma. The terrors of despotism were not always sufficient to enforce the payment of the revenues. Since the arrival of Jaffier Khan in Bengal, one-half the property of the zemindaries of Burdwan, Rajshahy, Nuddea, and others, will prove this.

539. We on the contrary, maintain the principle, without meaning to follow up the consequences of it; and under this modification it may be asserted, without imitating the practice of our predecessors.

540. But to secure the revenues from diminution, we propose the adoption of a rule which must be maintained without relaxation, except under the stated circumstances of great calamity; that the lands of defaulters shall invariably be sold to make good the deficiency; and if we can always adhere to it, by a due care in selling the lands, little diminution of the revenue is to be expected.

541. Upon

541. Upon this ground, the deviation from ancient practice seems admissible; at the same time, there may be consequences resulting from it, independent of those which I have stated, and which may not be foreseen.

542. At this period, the government is not possessed of any records that can afford them a knowledge of the consisting parts of the principal zemindaries. From a Report of the Royroyan in 1786, it appeared that there are some villages which paid no revenue to government, and were annexed to no zemindaries. The quantity and state of the alienated land is little known to us. Our ignorance upon these points, will hereafter be greater, unless the information to correct it, be annually called for; at the same time, if the want of it, be compensated by the improvement of the country, and the regularity of the collections under a permanent system, it will not be regretted.

543. In stating these arguments, my object is to relieve the subject on the outset from those embarrassments, which may impede the success of the plan which we mean to pursue; the conclusion which may be drawn from them, whatever that may be, will not, I fear, be exempt from objections.

544. The fundamental and solid objection to requiring the accounts of the actual settlement through all its detail, is founded, in the apprehensions of the zemindars, that we shall avail ourselves of it, to augment the revenues demanded from them; and if it should prove the capacity of the country to be greater than what we now suppose, although the consequence of the exertions of industry, I will not affirm that the cupidity of government when possessed of the knowledge, will not be tempted to demand an additional proportion of the excess; such a suspicion might, I will not say it would, shake the foundation of the proposed plan, and no other can be substituted, in my opinion, for the prosperity of the country, and advantage of the state.

545. Yet if this argument were urged to its utmost extent, the zemindars ought not to be called upon for any accounts, for to demand those of the revenue of the pergunnahs, apportioned to the demands of government only, will excite their suspicions; but after the reasons above detailed, I can never allow that government should concede this point to them.

546. Neither do I think we ought so far to vary from established practice as not to require an account of new villages; by such neglect, in the course of time, a number might be established equal to a fourth of the revenues of a zemindary, paying no revenue to government; and if they were sold to independent proprietors, the value of those remaining, might diminish in proportion.

547. That the government of this country should be restricted, by every possible rule, from exercising a discretion in varying the amount of the settlement when once made, I think absolutely necessary: but whether the government in England should subject themselves to the same restrictions, is a point upon which I am not free from doubt. With the arguments here stated, and the advantage of future discussion, they can seldom be at a loss to determine upon propositions to this effect, submitted to their judgment. We must however, be cautious in committing the national faith, by the measures which we pursue in this country.

548. In order to bring these arguments to a conclusion, I shall now state the propositions which result from a due consideration of the whole, as a ground for discussion and determination, in such a form as I think calculated to remedy the objections which have been urged, and to combine the principle of giving confidence to our subjects, with the proper restraints for preventing an abuse of it.

549. That the zemindars shall be required to distribute the amount of the settlement made with them, upon the several pergunnahs within their jurisdiction, and the amount of the assessment of each pergunnah, upon the villages contained in it.

550. That this account be accompanied with another, describing the boundaries of the villages accurately, and the estimated quantity of land in each.

551. That they further be required to deliver in an account of all villages paying no revenue to government, and that these accounts be annually delivered.

552. That if any new villages be established, and the zemindars should fail to give in an account of them, they shall become forfeited to government.

553. The accounts will certainly afford the officers of government more information than they at present possess, and whatever suspicions the demand of them may excite, they can not be considered as inquisitions into the profits of the zemindars, which they may conceal.

554. With respect to the sales of land it is to be considered in two lights:—First, a public sale, by order of government, in discharge of balances. Secondly, as a private transfer of property.

555. With respect to the first, it remains to be determined, which of the two modes proposed shall be adopted.

556. As to the second, it should be made with the knowledge and sanction of government; and all sales made, without its knowledge and sanction, should be declared invalid. If this be deemed too rigorous, a limitation, as to a quantity of the land sold, may be fixed.

557. Some provisions must be made against collusive sales, that a zemindar, in order to get rid of a ruined pergunnah, may not substitute a fictitious purchaser. Thus, supposing a pergunnah to be rated at 50,000 rupees, and to produce half that sum only, the zemindar, to be released from the stated jumma, may procure a nominal purchaser, who, after the transfer of the revenue in his own name, may decamp. To know the zemindars, is to suppose this possible; and the jumma may be rated, with a view to this object.

558. The

Mr. Shore's Minute of June, 1789, respecting Permanent Settlement of Lands in Bengal.

558. The zemindars, being secured in the enjoyment of their rights, we are next to provide for the security of their tenants;—the farmers and under-farmers, the talookdars, situated within the jurisdiction of the zemindarry, and the ryots. I shall enumerate the rules which occur to me, in distinct propositions, founded on the arguments and information in the preceding sheets. By collecting the whole into one view, the board will be better enabled to consider them, and form a judgment upon them.

559. I lament, with sincere regret, the impossibility arising from my want of health of preparing these materials, at an earlier period; but although it has been determined that a settlement should only take place for one year, to expire in April 1790, I see no reason why the ten years settlement should not be made in the course of it, instead of protracting its formation to the close of the year. Many of the observations recorded, refer to a supposition that the settlement for the ten years was to begin with the present Bengal year in April last.

It is my wish that all my reasoning and propositions may be fully discussed, and that the governor general and Mr. Stuart will not only assist me with their observations, but take the opinions of those in whose judgment they place any reliance, on any points which appear dubious to them, and where my arguments are unsatisfactory.

In this respect, it will be for the advantage of the plan, that the execution of it has been delayed. I have no attachment to any opinion beyond what may be warranted by fair reasoning; and I shall be happy to see my propositions corrected and improved, or to relinquish them for others more advantageous.

560. I shall go on as far as my health and other avocations admit, to the detail of the settlement under each collector, and submit it, as prepared, for the consideration of the governor general in council; at all events, I would wish to lay before the board a draft of instructions for two or more of the principal zemindaries, that the application of the rules suggested by myself in the first instance, as far as they should be confirmed, may become a precedent for others. Some additional regulations will be required for the collectors, and some alteration must be made, in those which exist. It will also be necessary to notify to the principal zemindars, the intention and determination of government by a special perwannah.

561. Something might be still added to this minute; but as I wish it to be submitted to the consideration of the board without delay, I shall from time to time, suggest such further observations as occur to me.

562. The great importance of trust delegated to us by the orders of the Court of Directors, has induced me to consider the execution of it, with the utmost attention. I have, on every point, detailed all the arguments which my information and experience suggested, as well for as against the propositions which I have ultimately adopted; nor have I neglected the suggestions of others. A discussion of this nature, can scarcely be too minute, when the former fluctuation of our measures is considered. Mr. Grant's Analysis has led me into disquisitions which, to some, may appear superfluous; but my duty more particularly imposed upon me the examination of his positions. Much has been repeated by me, that has been said before; and although the conclusions deduced from the whole, may not be new, it is certainly of importance to free them from the objections which have been made to them. The detail will, I hope, establish what I profess, the sincerest inclination to fulfil the orders of the Court of Directors, and to promote the true interests of the British nation in India, by establishing a system of administration for the revenues of this country, on declared, permanent and moderate principles. Many mistakes will probably occur in this Minute; but as it comprehends the arguments for, and against, any material proposition, they can be the more easily detected and corrected; and I shall, without hesitation, renounce them when pointed out.

June the 18th 1789.

PROPOSITIONS deduced from the Arguments in the preceding MINUTE.

1st.—THAT a new settlement of the revenues, to commence from the first of Bysack of the Bengal year 1197, be concluded for a period of ten years certain, under the denomination of Karar jumma deh sala.

2d.—That the settlement, under certain specified exceptions, be made with the zemindars and independent talookdars, agreeably to the rules now prescribed. The term "independent" is applied to those talookdars who are usually denominated huzzoory, as paying their revenues immediately to government and not to the zemindars, within whose lands their talooks may be situated.

3d.—That every zemindar or talookdar who is a minor, or female, be declared incapable of having any concern whatever in the management of lands paying revenues immediately to government, and that no engagements for the payment thereof be contracted with any zemindars and talookdars under this description.—Minority, with respect to Hindus, is limited to the expiration of the year, and for Mahomedans to year.

4th.—The management of the lands of zemindars and independent talookdars, who are minors or females, shall be assigned to a person specially appointed by the government for this trust, to be denominated Serberakar or manager, who previous to the receipts of his commission, is to execute an obligation, binding himself to a faithful discharge of the duties assigned to him, and no further.

5th.—The manager is to be chosen by the collector, subject to the approbation of the board of revenue, and his commission is to be signed by the collector, and to be authenticated by his official seal. In recommending the persons for this trust, the following considerations are to be observed.—In the first instance, a near relation of the zemindars or talookdars is to be preferred, to all others; in the second, a creditable servant of the family; and in the last resort, in case of necessity, a person unconnected with it: capacity for the business is to be understood as a necessary qualification, and to be particularly attended to, in determining the preference.

6th.—Lunacy, contumacy, or notorious profligacy of character, are to be deemed disqualifications; and the settlement, in such cases, is to be regulated by the provisions above laid down with regard to the lands of minors and females; but no zemindar or talookdar is to

to be excluded for any of the disqualifications mentioned in the article, without the previous approbation of the Governor General in council.

7th.—In fixing the amount of the settlement, the jumma of the present year, compared with the accounts and information supplied by the collectors, and the recommendation of the board of revenue founded thereon, is to furnish the standard under the following considerations:

That no remission upon the jumma of the present year be allowed, without the special sanction of the governor general in council.

That no russud, or progressive increase, shall be established, to extend beyond the third year of the lease.

That the settlement be made, as far as possible, in one net sum, free from any charges of moshaira, zemindary, amla, poolbundy, catecherry charges, or others of a similar nature, it being intended that all the charges incidental to the collections of the revenues (the expenses of the officers of government excepted) be defrayed by the zemindars from the produce of their lands.

That with respect to any of the articles in the book of revenue establishments, under the head of zemindary charges, such as pensions, charitable allowances, or others, which it may be thought proper to continue, they shall be paid by the collector, and the zemindar have no concern in them, unless for special reasons of convenience, it should be deemed more expedient in any instance, to entrust the zemindar with the disbursement thereof.

That in every possible case, all separate allowances to the families and connections of the zemindars be abolished, and the provision for the maintenance devolve upon the zemindars.

8th.—Any occasional diminution of the jumma, on account the casualties of the season, is to be provided by a russud.

9th.—The amount jumma, payable by the zemindars and talookdars, is to be assessed with a view to permanency, and to be so calculated as to afford a provision for themselves and families, over and above their contribution to government, equal to about 10 per cent. on that amount, including nankar, or other free lands. In future it is expected, that by due care and economy, their income will increase. The information and accounts which are to supply the basis of this calculation, are pointed out in the seventh article; and the following circumstances are further to be attended to.

The charges to which the zemindars or talookdars are subject on account poolbundy and amla, whether any separate provision has been made for these articles, or whether they have been defrayed from resources exclusive of the revenue of government, with a view to determine if they are to be admitted or rejected in the calculation of the jumma payable by the zemindars or talookdars. Where these charges have been hitherto defrayed by them, exclusive of their contributions to government, and where the jumma has been assessed, without any stipulation for moshaira, no provision on this account, is to be made to them. When, on the contrary, a separate allowance has been made by government for these charges, the calculation of the jumma is to be regulated by this consideration; that is, the jumma is to suffer a proportionate diminution, unless there be separate and distinct funds for the discharge of them. With respect however to the moshaira, it is necessary to remark, that some part of the emoluments enjoyed by the farmers, in those instances where the zemindary has been let to farm, either in whole or in detached pergunnahs, may be presumed to revert to the zemindars.

10. The estimated provision for the zemindars and talookdars is stated generally at 10 per cent.; but if owing to any peculiar circumstances a larger provision should be deemed necessary, particularly in zemindaries or talookdarries yielding a small annual jumma, the governor general in council will take it into consideration.

11. Where the jumma of the zemindars and talookdars is fixed upon an ascertainment of the gross assets, in addition to the articles above specified, the actual mofussil charges of every denomination, whether debatee pergunnattee or others, are further to be considered in the calculation for determining its amount.

12. Every circumstance influencing the regulation of the jumma must be minutely recorded, to prevent any claims hereafter on the part of the zemindars, for altering or lowering the amount.

13. The amount of the jumma in every instance, as far as may be practicable, is to be determined by the governor general in council, and after determination to be notified to the zemindars and talookdars through the medium of the board of revenue, by the collector, who shall call upon them to sign an agreement for the payment of it. A zemindar or talookdar is to be allowed a period of fifteen days from the date of the notification, to express his acquiescence or objections. Where objections are made they are to be laid before the board of revenue by the collector, with his opinion upon them; and by the board of revenue, with their opinion upon the whole, before the governor general in council, who will then pass a final decision.

After such decision, the zemindars and talookdars shall be peremptorily required to sign an agreement for the amount, and three days be allowed them for this purpose; when, if they should decline to comply with the requisition, an avowal of which the zemindars and talookdars must give under their own signature, they shall be dispossessed of the management of their lands, and a provision of 5 per cent. upon the sudder jumma, including any nankar

14. The collector, upon the declared refusal of any zemindars or talookdars, is to take charge of the district, and to hold it ~~for~~ during the year, and the lands are not again to be restored to the talookdars or zemindars without the special sanction of the governor general in council.

15. The settlement having been concluded with the zemindar, he shall be required to enter into engagements with the talookdars situated within his zemindary, and paying their rents to him for the same period as his own lease, not liable to any increase or decrease during the term of it; and that within three months after the conclusion of the settlement with the collector, the zemindars be required to deliver to him a record of the settlement entered into between him and the talookdars, specifying their names, the talooks, and the jumma payable by each.

16. In order to prevent undue exactions, the following rules are to be attended to: That no zemindar be authorized to demand any increase from the talookdars under his jurisdiction, although he should himself be subject to the payment of an increase upon the jumma of the present year, except upon proof to the collector, that he is entitled to do so either by the special custom of his district, or by the conditions under which the talookdar, by receiving abatements from his jumma, has subjected himself to a demand for the increase, and that the lands are capable of affording it.

If in any instance it be proved that a zemindar exacts more from a talookdar than he has a right to do, or should be guilty of oppression towards him, the talookdar shall be separated from his jurisdiction, and the rents thereof, in future be paid to the officers of government.

17. The zemindar is to let the remaining lands of his zemindary, under the prescribed restrictions, in what manner he may think proper; but every engagement contracted by him with under-renters shall be specific as to the amount and conditions of it, and all sums received by any zemindar or renter, over and above what is specified in the engagements of the persons paying the same, shall be considered as extorted, and be repaid with a penalty double the amount.

18. That no person contracting with the zemindar or talookdar, or employed by him in the management of the collections, shall be authorized to take charge thereof without an amulnama, or written commission, signed by the zemindar or talookdar; copies of all such commissions are to be deposited in the sudder catecherry of the collectorship.

19. That the zemindars and talookdars, previous to the signature of their cabooleats, shall deliver to the collectors an account of the pergunnahs now composing the zemindary or talookdary, as well as of any terfs, talooks, kismuts, villages, or other divisions of land not included in the detail of the pergunnahs, but standing separate, with a proposed arrangement of them; and the collector is to consider the arrangement, and establish it with such corrections as he may deem proper, in order to render it as compact as possible. The account, so arranged, is to be delivered to the zemindar as a fixed form not to be departed from.

20. That the zemindars and talookdars be not afterwards permitted to change the designation of any of the divisions, or to vary the dispositions of the pergunnahs, terfs, talooks, and kismuts, comprizing the zemindary or talookdary, as stated in the required record, or to make any alteration in the extent of them by any subsequent annexations or separations. This order is not to prevent the zemindars and talookdars subdividing the several pergunnahs in such manner as they may think proper, in forming the settlement; but every subdivision shall invariably stand under the pergunnah to which it originally belongs, in the general abstract. Thus, supposing any pergunnah rented in five subdivisions, the account of the whole shall be inserted in the abstract, under the name of that pergunnah, with a memorandum of the number of the subdivisions.

21. All zemindars, talookdars, or others, assessed by government in the course of the first year, are to distribute the total assessment of their zemindaries, talookdarries, or other lands, on the several villages contained therein, equally and impartially, according to the rents derived therefrom respectively, and to deliver a record of such distribution in the course of the three first months of the ensuing year, and successively for each year, specifying the name of each village, the boundaries thereof, the estimated quantity of land in each, distinguished as malguzary and lakkeraje, together with an abstract thereof, containing the distribution of the sudder jumma upon each pergunnah, terf, tuppah, kismut, or other division, as recorded in the prescribed arrangement of the pergunnahs. This record is also to specify under a separate head, the number, names, and boundaries of all detached lakkeraje villages.

22. In order to correct inequalities in the distribution of the sudder assessment, from the improvement of some villages and decline of others, or from the cultivation of new villages, a village record and abstract, as above described, are to be delivered in annually in the course of the three first months of each year.

23. Should it appear that any land-holder shall have omitted inserting any village in such record, the same to be declared forfeited to government; and should any considerable wilful partiality in the distribution of the assessment be proved, the landholders guilty of such offence to be liable to a fine, determinable by the governor general in council.

24. It is not meant by this distribution to prevent the landholders from acquiring a larger rent from the pergunnahs or villages than the sum apportionate, or to demand from the accounts accounts of the actual assessment. It is intended only to be a standard for fixing the revenue of government on lands transferred by sale or otherwise, without which neither the actual proprietor, nor the purchaser, can form a determinate judgment of its value.

25. To accomplish this object, the following rules are laid down with regard to future transfers.

In case of public sales of land for the liquidation of arrears, the land sold to be declared wholly independent of the zemindarry or talookdarry to which it before appertained; and the future assessment thereof to be paid by the purchaser, and the zemindar shall be obliged, upon forfeiture of the land, to deliver up all the accounts thereof.

In such sales, if an entire division of land, before separately assessed, be disposed of, the assessment to remain the same to the end of the current settlement. If a portion of such division only be sold, the assessment allotted thereto by the latest village records delivered in, to remain as the fixed revenue thereof to the end of the current settlement.

Any person purchasing land sold by order of government, shall be obliged to pay the revenue thereof as fixed at the time of sale, for one year certain.

That the zemindars and talookdars be permitted to dispose of their lands by sale; but that no private transfers of the property of land, exceeding begas, to be valid unless registered in the office of the collector.

The parties at the time of transfers to settle by whom the revenue of government shall be paid in future, and, in the event of its being agreed that the purchaser shall pay it, the same rule shall be observed as laid down above with respect to public sales. If the land sold still remains dependent on the zemindarry or talook in which it was previously included, and the purchaser stipulate to pay a rent for the same to the former zemindar or talookdar, the amount of such rent to be adjusted as the parties may agree. Government still holding the land so transferred, in common with the remaining parts of the zemindarry or talookdarry, responsible for its due proportion of the general assessment.

Zemindaries, the property of minors, females, or others, excluded by the 3d or 6th regulations, are to be considered Khas; but the Jumma of such lands shall be fixed in the same manner as for other lands, and the profits beyond that amount, after discharging all charges, shall belong to the proprietor.

26th.—Zemindaries, the property of minors, females, or others excluded by the 3d and 6th regulations, are to be considered as khas, and the actual amount of the engagement contracted by the manager with the under-renters, after deducting the mofussil and pergunnah charges, is to be inserted as the assessment of government. The expenses of the manager, and of his establishment, are to be paid by the collector, and to be included in his establishment, and the several regulations prescribed for the zemindars, are to be executed by the managers.

Provisional rules for the security of the ryots.

27. That whereas from the ignorance, inattention, and oppressions of the zemindars, the greatest abuses have been practised in the collections, and the ryots have been exposed to exactions, the following rules are now prescribed to all zemindars, talookdars, and persons entrusted with the revenues, for their immediate direction and guidance.

That the rents to be paid by the ryots, by whatever rule or custom they may be demanded, shall be specific as to their amount. If by a pottah, containing the assul and abwab, the amount of both shall be inserted in it; and the ryot shall not be bound to pay any thing beyond the amount specified, on account of kircha, salany, or any other article.

If by a ticka pottah, the whole amount payable by the ryots is to be inserted in it; if by any rule or custom, such as the payment of the last and preceding year, the rate of the village pergunnah, or any other place, an account is to be drawn out in the beginning of the year, showing what the ryots are to pay by such rule or rate, and a copy of it be given to them; where the rents are adjusted upon a measurement of the lands after cultivation, the rate and terms of payment shall be expressed in the pottah.

If by any established and recorded jummabundy, that is to be the rule for demanding the rents.

If the rents are paid in kind, the proportion which the ryot is to pay shall be specified either in account or written agreement.

In every Mofussil cutcherry, the nerkbundy, or rates of land, shall be publicly recorded; and the zemindar is answerable for enforcing this regulation under a penalty or fine for neglect, at the discretion of government.

That for every village a putwarree shall be established by the zemindar, for the purpose of recording the accounts of the ryots in that village; and a list of such putwarrees be deposited in the sudder cutcherry of the collectorship, and in the cutcherry of the pergunnah where the village is situated. No farmer shall be allowed to remove a putwarree without the permission of the zemindar. If after the expiration of six months from the commencement of the year, upon a reference to the accounts of any village for the purpose of deciding complaints, it should be found that no putwarree has been established, the zemindar shall be fined by the collector for such neglect; that where no nerkbundy of the land exists, the zemindar shall be bound to form the same, either for his whole zemindarry, or such parts thereof where it may be wanted, within a prescribed period to be determined by the collector.

That no zemindar, farmer, or person acting under their authority, shall be allowed to cancel the puttahs of the khode khoost ryots, except upon proof that they have been obtained by collusion, or that the rents paid by them within the last three years, have been reduced below the rates of the nerkbundy of the pergunnah, or that they have been collusive deductions, or upon a general measurement of the pergunnah for the purpose of equalizing and correcting the assessment.

That

That when the jumma of a ryot has been ascertained and settled, he shall be authorized to demand a puttah from the zemindar, or person acting under his authority, whether farmer, gomastah or other; and any refusal to deliver the puttah shall be punished by fine proportioned to the expense and trouble of the ryot, in obtaining it. The zemindar is also required to cause a puttah for the rent so adjusted, to be prepared, and tendered to the ryot. It remains with the zemindar to determine by whom the puttah shall be granted, whether by himself, farmer, gomastah, or whom. No under-renter, without special permission from the zemindar, shall be empowered to grant a puttah beyond the period of his lease; and no agent to grant them, without authority from the zemindar or talookdar when in possession of the lands; or of the manager, when the zemindar and talookdar are excluded.

All existing leases to under-renters and ryots to remain in force to the period of their expiration, unless proved to have been obtained by collusion, or from persons not authorized to grant the same.

Every collector, renter, or receiver of the rents, throughout every gradation, from the zemindar to the ryot, shall be compelled to give receipts for all sums received by them, and a receipt in full, on the complete discharge of every obligation; and any person complaining that a receipt has been refused him, upon establishing the charge, shall be entitled to double the amount paid by him, as damages from the person who received it. The receipts to the ryots are to specify the quantity of ground for which he pays rent, and the denomination of it, as being khoo khaust, pykaust, or comar, with the rent received on account of each sort of land severally.

That in case any village or district should be affected by inundation or other calamity, causing the ryots to desert, it shall not be lawful for any zemindar or renter, or collector of the rents, to demand the rents of the ryots who are fled, from those which remain.

That the zemindar be not authorized to impose any new abwab or muthote, on any pre-tence whatever, upon the ryots; and every exaction of this nature, to be punished by a penalty, equal to three times the amount imposed. If at any future period, it be discovered that new abwab or muthote have been imposed, the zemindars shall be made responsible for the penalty, during the whole period of such impositions.

Permanent plan for the ease and security of the ryots.

28. That as the impositions upon the ryots, from their number, and uncertainty, have become intricate to adjust, and a source of oppression to the ryots, the zemindars shall be compelled to make a revision of the same, and to simplify them, by a gradual and progressive operation, as follows:

They shall begin with those pergunnahs where the impositions are most numerous, and having obtained an account of them, shall, in concert with the ryots, consolidate the whole, as far as possible, into one specific sum; but so, that in no case the sums demanded from the ryots, shall exceed three articles, viz. Assul abwab and kurcha. Having prepared this account, they shall submit it to the collector for his inspection, after which it is to be enforced by the authority of government; and any enhancement of the abwab or kurcha, to be punished as an extortion.

That where, by mutual consent of the ryots and the zemindars, the abwab can be wholly reduced and constituted, it be done accordingly; and the rates of the land, according to the nature of the soil and the produce, to be the rule for fixing the rent.

That the rents of each pergunnah in the zemindarry be annually adjusted in the same manner, until the whole be completed; and that the exact proportion which the abwab and kurcha bears to the assul jumma be precisely determined. The zemindar is to be positively enjoined to regulate a certain proportion of his zemindarry annually, so that the whole be completely performed within * years from the date of his agreement.

29. That every zemindar and talookdar be also compelled to prepare the form of a puttah or puttahs adapted to the circumstances of his zemindarry and talookdarry, and to lay the same before the collector, who having approved the form, shall publish it, with a notification to the ryots, that upon application such puttahs will be given to them; and no puttahs under any other form, shall be permitted.

30. That no zemindar be allowed to contract any engagements with any farmer, or authorize any act contrary to the letter and meaning of these regulations.

31. The moshaira to excluded zemindars is to be settled at 10 per cent. upon the amount of the sudder jumma; and out of this, a provision is to be made for such of the zemindar's family, as may be entitled to receive it.

32. That it be notified to the zemindars, and become an express condition of their engagement, that all resumption of rent-free lands, not at present constituting any part of the jumma of their zemindaries, shall be made for the benefit of government, and the amount thereof, or such proportion thereof, as the government may determine, shall become an addition to their jumma. The government will determine the mode by which an investigation of the rent-free lands shall take place.

33. That no grants of bazee zemin, under any denomination whatever, be made by any zemindar or talookdar, under a penalty that the lands so given, be confiscated to government, and that the grantee possessing the same, be compelled to pay as a fine the rents thereof, during the period of their alienation.

34. The zemindars are declared responsible for the preservation of the peace of their districts; and the regulations established for the Burdwan district are to be applied to all other zemindaries where practicable, or to be modified to the circumstances of them.

34. The regulations of the gunge bazar and haut duties, being of importance to the welfare of the community, the following rules are established regarding them:

That it be notified to the zemindars, that an officer will be appointed by government to revise and correct them; and to establish such tolls and duties, as it may be lawful for the zemindars to collect, as well as to prescribe the mode of collecting them.

That when these tolls have been established, the zemindars shall not be at liberty to vary the denominations of them, or to demand more than the prescribed rates.

That if at any period, a scarcity of grain or other articles of subsistence should, under any abatement of the tolls and duties, be necessary, government will hereafter order it, and the zemindars shall not be entitled to any remission on this account.

That if the zemindars have reason to apprehend that these regulations will affect the receipts of the sayer, they be required to deliver in an account of the gunge and hauts, and of the duties collected at them within their zemindaries respectively, previous to their entering into engagements for the revenue of their zemindaries; and that the settlement be thereupon made exclusive of the revenue arising from duties at hauts, and gunges until a determination thereupon can be made.

That no zemindar be allowed to establish any new haut or gunge, without previous application to the collector, and a perwannah under his seal and signature.

Appendix, No. 2.

LETTER from the Assistant on Deputation, to the Collector of Bhaugleporé; dated 11th August 1790.

Sir,
I WAS yesterday favoured with your letter, under date the 9th instant.

As introductory to the Report, which I have now to submit, of my proceedings on deputation in Pergunnah Monghyr, I beg leave to insert here, a general historical account of the zemindars and zemindaries therein contained, extracted from a report made to the board of revenue by your predecessor Mr. Adair.

"The traditional amount of this purgunnah (Monghyr) is, that it was formerly inhabited only by Thudhars of the class denominated rich; also resided chiefly in the woods, at the foot of the hills. One of those whose habitation was upon a rock in the river Ganges, is said, with the assistance of Vishkarna, the god and patron of artists, to have built a fort, and to have named it, Monghyr. Also, that although the adjacent country was at that time, a wild jungle, without the smallest vestige of cultivation; yet it was much frequented, owing to the distribution of large sums of money made by the Rajah Curhun, (a descendant of Raama) among the bramins, who frequented a temple of the goddess Chundy, and to his residing on Currin Chowrt, a spot still recognized by that name.

"That in process of time, when the country was fallen under the dominion of the Moguls, an army of the emperor Heirnaion being at Monghyr, Heerorama Rajaput, and Raam Roy, of the cast (or rather profession) named Baud Corath, attendants in the camp Scubathen, and afterwards, through the means of the emperors mutesdies, became chowdries, and obtained sunnuds for the tract of land which, many years later, when the Subah Sujah Sdah repaired the fort, and built a palace in it, first acquired the name Havilly Monghyr.

"This account (fanciful as it appears, and wholly traditional) is collected from the oldest of the persons, inhabitants; the canongoes registers extending only twenty-four years back, as to the time of Cossim Ally, in whose war their papers, it is said, were either plundered or lost; and the following genealogical Tables of the present zemindars, who all deduce their descent from one or other of the two above-mentioned chowdries, are formed on the credit of their own declarations respectively.

"Havilly Monghyr is divided into eleven turfs, or small zemindaries, of which the first five, are in the possession of the posterity of Heeroram; as follows:

- | | | |
|------------------------|-----------|-------------|
| 1st. Turf Mohedydepore | Maha Sing | Nirby Sing. |
| 2d. Turf Mohegdepore | Bheekum | Assaram. |
| 3d. Turf Bunwara | | Bundoo. |
| 4th. Turf Tajepore | | Jourawon. |
| 5th. Turf Jamaelpote | | Mungeram. |

Each turf is subdivided into talook, among the relations of the zemindars, and whose names are inserted in the list lately transmitted to the board of revenue.

"The 4 turfs appertaining to the posterity of Raam Roy are as follows:

- | | |
|---------------------------------|---|
| 1st. Turf Moholey, &c. | Dallel Sing. |
| 2d. Turf Suttanpore Coltoo, &c. | has not been claimed |
| 3d. Turf Bausdespore, &c. | since the death of Gunshaum without issue in 1120 Fusuly, but has remained in charge of |
| 4th. Turf Bahaderpore Guncis | Surajemun. |
| | Holaus. |

1st TABLE.

2nd TABLE.

Letter from Assistant on Deputation, to Collector of Bhanglepore;
Aug. 1790.

"The two remaining Turfs of Havilly Monghyr yet undescribed, are, 1st. Turf Indiruk. 2d. Turf Ibrahimpore.

The first may be considered as a defalcation from the original zemindarry, left by Raam Roy to his posterity. It is said to have been abandoned by Bheek Roy (vide his name in the foregoing table) by reason of his being unable to defend it against the savages of the Cunnikpore people; whereupon Lechmun a bramin, in 1061, applied for and obtained a sunnud for it from the emperor Alumgyre; and Munkower Sing, the fourth heir in descent from Lichmun, is now in possession.

"Turf Ibrahimpore was when waste land, granted, with the consent of the chowdries of Monghyr, to Benode chowdry, whose grandson Harry Kishen, is now in possession of it; but the sunnud is said to have been lost or destroyed, in the troubles occasioned by Mustafa Cawn in 1152.

"Besides these divisions of Purgunnah Havilly Monghyr, there are comprehended in it, certain small talooksana, magas, denominated muskoory and hush-ul-nossoly, which pay their rents immediately to government. These, may possibly be defalcations from the foregoing zemindarries, although the separation cannot now be ascertained; neither do the present incumbents hold them, by any other title than that of long possession. These having been particularized in the list of zemindarries, &c. already transmitted to the board, it seems unnecessary to recapitulate them here. The history of Bazar of Monghyr, held independent of the zemindars, has also been furnished to the board under date."

With respect to the subdivisions of the zemindarries of this pergunnah, mentioned in the foregoing extract, into small talooks among the collateral descendants of the original zemindars, and the discrimination of the right of property thereon depending, by the rules established by government;—as the discussion of those points, make no part of my instructions, but appear to appertain rather to the business of the approaching settlement, I shall only mention here, that, in order to prevent the ryot suffering inconvenience from the new pottahs being signed by the zemindars for land, whereof the malik or talook due might hereafter be found with the proprietor, or vice versa, I proposed that the signatures of both parties should be affixed, which being readily agreed to, the measure was accordingly adopted.

I proceed now to explain the rules of assessment, and the mode of collecting the rent, by an investigation of turf Dallel Sing, including the mozas moholey, &c. For information of these particulars, I had recourse to the putwarry accounts, (there being few or no powhnahs extant) and to the canongoes registers, which agree in stating the rules of assessment to be as follows:

The division of the assessment into assul, abwab, and neakdarry, is a mode which has prevailed from time immemorial in this pergunnah, as in other parts of Behar, whereby the rent or produce of the land became appropriated in distinct shares, to government, to its officers, and to the cultivator; the two first, being considered as the right of government; and the last, or neakdarry, of the several persons particularized, whose contingent expenses of collection, together with some further charges, which will be mentioned, were defrayed by the deh curcha. It may be necessary further to explain the several articles of taxation contained in each division, or separate head.

Assul—Is the general rate per bega on land, the rent of which is paid in coin; and which varies according to the quality of the soil, and the facility of procuring an artificial supply of water from tanks or wells, in the dry season. These rates, have existed beyond the date of any public record; and were certainly fixed, long before the Company acquired the dewanny.

Abwabs.—1st. Kussoor. The term means batta; it was formerly levied as a part of the deh curcha (explained further on) to make up for any deficiency in the rupees collected in the Mofussil, which, under the Mogul government, were required to be paid into the treasury, at an equal standard. Cossim Ally converted this contingent tax, into an uniform and permanent assessment throughout the pergunnah, as it has continued ever since. There is no objection now made to it by the ryots, whose advantages, in the increased price of grain and other articles, since its first imposition, may be supposed to have kept pace with the tax.

2d. Dehdarry.—This was originally the appropriated share of the dehdar, an inferior officer of the police, whose office about 16 years ago being found unsupplied, and his service unnecessary, the assessment was, under the same name, shifted from the neakdarry to the abwab, where it now constitutes a part of the revenue.

Letter from Assistant on Deputation, to Collector of Bhaugleporc; Aug. 1790.

3d. Mehemany. This is a partial exaction, which, during the residence of Cossim Ally at Monghyr, was first laid upon Mohoby and its dependent villages Sackerpore and Jummulketa, at the gross amount of 42 rupees on the first, 20 rupees on the second, and 12 R. 12 A. on the last. The assessment of it, was apportioned on such land only as was capable of being watered in the dry season; by which mode, its operation became partial even among the ryots of the same village, whose assul rates of land became thereby increased 7 annas in the rupee. On the earnest entreaty of the ryots, and on their ready consent to my proposal of their taking waste land on an adjacent island (there being none on the continent) to such an amount as, in its rent, might be equivalent to the obnoxious exaction, I recommended the abolition of it to the zemindar, who readily acquiesced; and it is abolished accordingly. The quantity of land engaged for as an equivalent, with its rates and other particulars, are specified in the Persian register of abeyabs, herewith to be transmitted.

Neekdary.—1st Mockudmy, or as it is also termed, Malikannah, is the proportion of the gross rent from time immemorial allotted, to the proprietor or officer of that name, whose relative situation, or particular duty, I conceive it unnecessary to explain.

2d. Rusoom Chowderahy—is an allotment to the chowdery or zemindar, similar in its nature to the foregoing.

3d. Putwarry.—An allotment to the putwarry or village register.

4th. Gorayt.—An allotment to an inferior village officer acting under the zemindar or tassaldar; his office is somewhat similar to that of a peon.

5th. Deh Curcha.—This was formerly here, as it is still in other parts of the district, an assessment variable in its rate, which could be determined only at the end of the year, agreeably to the amount of certain contingent expenses which were supposed to be incurred for the purposes implied in the literal meaning of the term, in the course of it, joined to the tussulana of the zemindars, of the canongoes, and other established allowances, the particulars of which, in the instance of Mohoby, accompany this; and the particulars of which, in the other parts of the pergunnah, will hereafter be furnished. The unfair mode however, of computing this assessment, being complained of about 16 years ago, an enquiry was then made into its actual amount in each village; and, in lieu of this variable assessment, a proportional rate was established, as a permanent tax, which has duly been collected ever since. By the operation of this measure, which seems to have given general satisfaction, I found one principal object of my deputation anticipated in this pergunnah; the only indefinite assessment being thereby reduced to a fixed rate, and the oppressive exaction of peons in particular, precluded: and I must do the zemindars the justice to observe, that on the most minute enquiry, I do not find them to have deviated from the rule in question. I have not therefore, as far as I have yet proceeded, found it necessary to alter either the amount or the mode of this assessment in any instance, excepting that of Selimpre dumduma, an equivalent for the remission on which village, you will observe by the accompanying Persian papers, is obtained by the cultivation of waste land on an adjacent island.

The above explanations apply equally to the bhowley and the nuckdy rates of taxation; but in the former, there is an additional article to be noticed, namely,

Kyally.—This was formerly, it may be presumed, an allowance made to the kyall, who actually weighed out the respective shares of the crop; but as in process of time, instead of the produce in kind, the value of that produce at a certain rate in money, was paid by the ryot, the kyall became unnecessary, although the assessment was still continued under the same name, as a part of the revenue.

On computation made by the zemindars, the canongoes and myself, in the results of which we all agreed, it appeared that the net share to the ryot on the bhowley land in this turf, was on the whereas in several other turfs, it appeared to be about

	-	-	-	17	4
	-	-	-	13	8

This great disproportion in the pah land between Mohoby and the adjacent zemindaries, the ryots of the former with reason complained of; and after some argument on the subject, the zemindars acquiesced in the propriety of its being reduced more nearly to an equality. The rates were accordingly paid on the

These rates, will still on comparison, be found heavier on the ryots of Monghyr, than those which prevail, in most other parts of the district; but I am inclined to believe, that the difference is amply compensated by the superior quality of the land in this pergunnah, and the vicinity of a ready market for its produce.

On the grounds of the above investigation of the rates of taxation in Turp Mohoby, and of a similar investigation in every other instance, as far as I have yet proceeded, the issue of Janapaut pottahs, both nuckdy and bhowley, has been obtained, excepting only for land cultivated on some islands situated in the Ganges westward of Monghyr, which will be mentioned mentioned hereafter. Those pottahs, you will please to observe, from the copy of one annexed, express the quantity of land, the several articles and rates of taxation, and also on nuckdy land, the same total or jumma.

The same particulars being stated in the register which will accompany my final report on this pergunnah, the plan of which register is herewith submitted for your consideration, you will thereby be furnished with the information you require, viz. "the most accurate and minute value of the lands cultivated by nuckdy pottahs, as well as the exact amount of "bhowly kissa lands in cultivation," except in such instances as above mentioned of the islands west of Monghyr, where the obstacles to the accomplishment of this measure, stated by the canongoe in his answer to my query which is annexed, seem to me at present to be insurmountable, and concerning which I request to be favoured with your instructions. In the mean time, permit me to observe, that the species of pottahs granted in similar cases in Furkeya appearing to me well adapted to the particular local circumstances of those islands, in which is included the whole tuppah Dewra, I did not hesitate to adopt it, under the authority of the 4th article of the proclamations I am furnished with; and should it meet with your approbation, an adequate knowledge of the quantity and value of the lands in question, as the ground of a permanent settlement, may be obtained by other means, namely, an inspection of the village records; unless objection to this mode should arise, from the idea of its being a minute local scrutiny. If, on the contrary being the case, you will be pleased to point out in what manner the difficulties stated by the canongoe may be removed, and janapaut pottahs devised, including the particulars you desire to have inserted, those already granted in this tuppah may be easily recalled, and others substituted, conformable to your instructions.

I request also to be informed, whether it is your pleasure that the issue of pottahs be extended to the Mockurrey mahals in this and the other pergunnahs included in my deputation registers, which are, I believe, deposited in your cutcherry.

I trust you will think the accompanying Abstract of pottahs issued, sufficient for your present purpose, or until the register shall be complete for each village (which I expect to accomplish in the course of a few days); the transmission of the original, would at this time, greatly retard my progress; and a copy of a paper of such a magnitude, it would not be possible, with the assistance of the mohurrer I am furnished with, to prepare in time for this dispatch.

Not having with me the Orders alluded to in your letter from the board of revenue, dated the 4th December 1787, I shall be much obliged to you for a copy of them.

I am, Sir,
Your most obedient humble servant,
S. Davis,

LETTER from Collector of Bhaugleporc, dated 6th December 1787; on the constitution and duties of the office of Canongoe.

To John Shore, Esquire, President, &c. Members of the Board of Revenue, Fort William.

Gentlemen,

I HAVE the honour to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 23d October, in which you direct that I should propose specific rules for the establishment of the canongoes; in detailing which, I am to compare the present situation of the office with its former state, when the institution was in due order.

The object of the Mogul government in instituting the office of canongoe, and the nature of the charge entrusted to those officers; may be understood, by considering the list of papers which composed their records.—These were:

- 1st. Dustoor ul umul.
- 2d. Umul dustoor.
- 3d. Ferisht debaut.
- 4th. Sahaby andarry.
- 5th. Awargy.
- 6th. Dowl tuckshees bundoobust.
- 7th. Jumma bundy khass.
- 8th. Jumma sayre chobootra cutwally my chowkeyaut wa Guzooeghaut.
- 9th. Jumma mahal Meer Bahry.
- 10th. Jumma Pachowtra.
- 11th. Jumma mahal Budderky.
- 12th. Ism nevisly Zemindaraun.
- 13th. Huckikaut Bazy Zemin.
- 14th. Jumma mockurrery wa istummary.
- 15th. Wassool-buky.
- 16th. Hucklekut Rozendaraun.

These accounts when faithfully taken, gave the complete annual history of a zemindary, comprehending the ground in cultivation, particularizing the portion of it which paid rent to government.

Letter from Collector of Bhaurpore, on the constitution and duties of the office of Canongoe; 6th Dec. 1787.

To render the several functions of this office, however intricate in appearance, not only practicable but easy in execution, the privileges and duties of the parties anywise concerned in the revenue department, were defined and recorded, and the produce of the land as it might turn out in the course of the year, allotted to the zemindar, the ryot, or cultivator, to the government and its officers, in distinct proportions, which in Behar continued still to furnish the rule of collecting the rents. These shares, it may be presumed, were formerly daily apportioned in every pergunnah where the lands were held khas, or retained in the hands of the government. In zemindarry settlements, where the bundoobust, or amount of revenue, was fixed upon the information supplied by the canongoes office, the zemindar, after paying the amount of his jumma or revenue, and the salaries or the fixed allotments of the produce of the land due to the putwarries (village registers) and other inferior officers who acted under him, had a right to all the surplus of his collection. But this surplus could be derived only from the improvement of the country, during the term of his settlement or temporary engagement with the government; or from the nature of the blowley part of his collection, which admitted of advantage, under a rise in the price of grain. His loss, on the other hand, depended on his management, which might discourage the cultivators from maintaining the same standard of tillage; or induce some of them, to desert to other mahals. His collection also on the blowley harvests, instead of proving advantageous, might fall off from the cheapness of grain; or, he might lose, from an unfavourable season.

Of all these circumstances, the canongoes registers furnished a minute account, which at the expiration of the year, or term of the zemindars engagement with the government, enabled the aumal to judge of the remission proper to be allowed for unavoidable loss, as well as of the mode in which the zemindarry might be settled for the ensuing year, either as a khod bundoobust (with the zemindar) or farmed, or kept khas (in the hands of government.) Under the latter mode, the zemindar was not considered to be aggrieved, or as having any cause of complaint, while he received his russoom zemindarry, or allotment of the produce, which even then, was due to him only conditionally, for services which he was at all times bound to render for the advancement of the cultivation, and the promotion generally of the interests of the government.

At what period the canongoes office was instituted, or how long the regulations above specified, were strictly observed, it may not now be easy to determine. It is probable that under a government subject to convulsions, they were occasionally violated for the advantage of the annals, the zemindars, and the canongoes themselves; and that the office from neglect has fallen gradually to decay. In Bengal, I believe, little of it remains, besides the name and the salaries annexed. In Behar, where the ancient usages of the provinces have undergone fewer alterations, the canongoes have retained more of the exercise of their functions, although, as might be expected, these have often been made subservient to the purposes of the zemindars. The canongoes of Behar are, however, well informed of those functions, agree in their definition, and are ready to resume the strict exercise of them, to any extent, that it may be the pleasure of the government, to require: but before any proposal be made for the regulation, or perhaps the re-establishment of an office so immediately connected with the detail of the provincial collections, it may be necessary to learn on what footing the zemindars are to be considered, as holding their zemindarries, lest any encroachment should be made on those rights, which it may be in the intention of government for them to possess. If a "minute local scrutiny" into the circumstances of a zemindarry be (as you were pleased to inform me in your letter of the 10th of August) repugnant to the orders of the Court of Directors, I should be cautious of recommending for the canongoes the resumption of their former functions, since a more full disclosure of a considerably management and profits can scarcely be afforded.

I trust therefore, gentlemen, that as the first step towards a preparation of the plan you require of me, you will be pleased to assign the terms on which it is to be traced; lest by choosing of myself those whereon the zemindars are considered merely as servants of the government, having no further tenure in the land than they derive from an office which, although hereditary, has been liable to much local scrutiny and restraint, I might trespass on your time by presenting you with such a plan for the canongoe's office, as could not, consistently with the orders of the Court of Directors, and with the rights they may have conferred on the zemindars, be carried into effect.

An Historical and Comparative ANALYSIS of the FINANCES of BENGAL; Chronologically arranged in different periods from the Mogul Conquest to the present time:—Extracted from a Political Survey of the British Dominions and Tributary Dependencies in India. By Mr. JAMES GRANT.

To the Honourable JOHN MACPHERSON, Esq.

Governor General, &c. Council, in their Secret Political Department of Inspection, Fort William.

Honourable Sir, and Sirs,

I HAVE now the honour to lay before you, An Historical and Comparative ANALYSIS of the FINANCES of the Soubah of Bengal, from the æra of the Mogul conquest, under the emperor Akbar, till the present time, chronologically arranged in three periods, of which the two first are comprised in the accompanying volume; and will exhibit a summary view of the rise, progress and extent of all the existing sources of public income, belonging of right, or virtually transferred to the East India Company, in form of the dewanny grant in 1765; and still undoubtedly recoverable in their fullest extent, though perhaps not with the same rapid facility, they were in that moment unfortunately lost to the state.

The general principles touching the nature, right, and management of the revenue system of Hindostan universally, I have endeavoured to define, in a former work, entitled, " A Political Survey of the Northern Circars," submitted to the honourable board's consideration in 1784; and applying these principles then more especially to the actual collections made on account of those valuable possessions, showed that a defalcation, which may be called, as it was chiefly, a zemindarry one, of about half a crore of rupees yearly, had been sustained by the Company as sovereign proprietor of the soil, through the collusive chicanery of native agents, in withholding official intelligence from their new masters, and fraudulently converting the use of such knowledge, to their own private emolument at the public expence.

In like manner, applying the same general principles, on the present occasion, to the territorial rental of the Soubah of Bengal, it will appear that, from a similar combination of native agents, employed in the department of finance, there hath been here a defalcation of at least two krore of rupees annually; of which, one krore twenty-nine lacks may be denominated as arising from the usurpations, clandestine alienation, or embezzlement of the zemindarry, as officiating farming landholders of the country; but the remaining seventy-one lacks must be considered, as incurred originally, and since continued, through a direct, criminal, inexcusable breach of trust in the ministry first appointed, or other natives subsequently vested, really with equal powers, though formally of humbler designation, to settle and conduct the affairs of revenue in behalf of the Company, down to the close of the present treatise; either by fraudulent, unwarrantable, unaccountable reduction, generally in the best established, most productive funds, forming the basis of the constitutional moderate rent roll of the demowanny lands, as then indisputably ascertained and fully realized; or, by wilful corrupt negligence, in withholding from their immediate superiors all such forms, documents, accounts, with other sources of local experimental knowledge, as were sufficient and indispensably necessary to check, controul, or superintend with effective intelligence every subordinate agency in finance, and which having acquired officially under the preceding government, it became immediately their first essential duty to communicate, to succeeding rulers.

The depravity, ignorance, and misconduct of native Hindostanny agents, in every branch of government, have often been the theme of general declamation, as notorious, lamentable, irremediable. But I hope the accompanying detail will be thought sufficient to justify the severity of my own particular censures; as I am willing to flatter myself, after combining the substance of this performance, however imperfect, with what hath been in like manner, set forth in the Political Survey of the Circars, that I shall not fall under the imputation of describing and deploring an evil, which I have not been able to trace to its primitive source, where alone a radical cure can be effected, or of pointing out imaginary benefits equally unsubstantial and impossible to be realized. In a humble private capacity, it would be presumption to prescribe the fittest means to accomplish the end proposed; that, will be the more arduous task of administration: my inferior labours have been confined simply to clear the way, and lay open a rich, long hidden, therefore neglected field for the exercise of superior official talents; and if the public can be in any shape relieved by every united endeavour, in circumstances of present or subsequent exigency, I may not have reason to be very anxious about the reward of that little share of merit which I might claim to myself, in having thus performed a voluntary duty, stimulated as I have been, by the highest private encouragement.

Accordingly, it was my intention, at the beginning of the season, to have finished the period of my slender services in this country, on delivering in the tract which I have now now presented, and meant to leave, as a humble testimony of unfeigned gratitude, and of that best will I shall always bear for the enlarged growing prosperity of the interests of my honourable employers, as far as they may be consistent with the true national welfare. But, considering the great imperfection of the work in question, joined to the impossibility, perhaps, without better talents or further materials, of rendering it more comprehensively clear, in the same manuscript compass of an abstract; and being earnestly desirous to afford every possible elucidation of the subject brought forward, either through any incidental personal knowledge or a full communication of such papers as I may be possessed of, for the purpose of ascertaining sufficient grounds to resolve on, and carry into effect suitable measures for restoring, as well any constitutional rights and privileges of the East India Company, that they may have been unjustly deprived of in the capacity of real or representative sovereign, as those supposed to have been wrongfully taken from zemindarry members of the state, and thus to fulfil the spirit equally with the literal injunctions, of the last regulating act of parliament;—so I have, of my own free accord, thought proper to remain another season in the country, more especially during the usual period of concluding the annual settlement of the revenues of Bengal, that I might have it in my power to answer personally before the honourable board such questions, if any were necessary, as they should be pleased to propose, or in written explanation reply to the possible inquiries of any subordinate officers, instructed to revise, report on, or correct the substance of what I am extremely sensible is a loose performance both in style and matter, but which nevertheless I willingly submit to criticism; professing myself perfectly indifferent, how justly severe it may be, if the result should prove in the least favourable to the national cause by discussion, whether in confirming or refusing, in whole or in part, what I have ventured thus to obtrude on public notice, without any other admissible plea or excuse perhaps besides what I have indicated to have been the dictates of my own mind in acting up to its proper sentiment of rectitude, under the most flattering encouragement indeed I could desire from the honourable the governor general, short of an official command.

Mr. J. Grant's
Introductory Letter.

It is also to answer fully the purpose now expressed that I have thought it requisite, without further delay, to give in the present work, in anticipation of a reply to some queries, which wishing previously to have solved, I begged for permission to propose through the honourable the governor general's indulgence on the 3d instant. Whatever the solution may be, it cannot alter materially the substance of what I have written. I shall be glad that the accounts I have named and wished to refer to, may be forthcoming, as they will be found no less important in themselves, than they may be essential, in the verification of some of the principal facts which I have stated; but that they were not officially rendered, or their practical uses explicitly or fully communicated to any British subject in the civil service of the Company, any time before the 12th April 1784, I must beg leave implicitly to believe, with the most entire certain conviction of concluding right; being firmly of opinion, if otherwise, that the importance and utility of such papers would have been suggested, made manifest, and brought into general current use, long ere now. That the native officers were always in possession of these and every other account necessary to ascertain or realize to the public exchequer, all the established rightful dues of the sovereign, I cannot entertain the least doubt of. That they have carefully suppressed the most consequential imperfection, of equally convinced of; first, from positive direct evidence, in the scantiness, imperfection, of confused order of such as have been brought forth, and which have been for the most part published; secondly, the constant uniform affirmation, (in opposition to every inquiry set on foot to obtain full authentic vouchers for ascertaining the preceding mussulman system of finances, exhibiting an accurate detail of the amount collected), that they were all or in great part, carried off or lost in the troubles of Cossim Aly; and lastly, the intricacy or difficulty which a system of revenue, perhaps the easiest and the simplest in the world, hath ever appeared to ourselves to have been involved in, and often so represented, through the insufficiency of native information, or a still more criminal conduct in wilful misrepresentations to mislead, embarrass, and prevent by obscure complex accounts, the effectual endeavours of an upright British agency; threatening at once, detection of the deceit at first imposed, with future discontinuance of every intermediate fraudulent emolument.

Nevertheless it is possible now, if an idea were entertained of the existence of the papers in question, or of copies being forthcoming through any foreign channel, that the persons officially entrusted under the preceding government with, and still in possession of, the originals, might attempt by anticipation, to shift the charge of neglect of duty from themselves to others, in not mentioning or delivering them before; urging perhaps in their own defence, that they had never been called upon to do so; as if it were possible for strangers necessarily to the mysterious, technical, multifarious description of all the component parts of an account of Indian territorial revenue, though really simplified under such subdivided form, not complex in the construction, to name any of them intuitively. But the honourable board will readily see through the insidious artifice, if attempted to be practised, and I hope be pleased to hear what I may have further to say on the subject in my own behalf, as one of the body of the Company's covenanted servants generally implicated, though without any dread, if I stood by myself foremost in the recriminated charge.

I have the honour to be, with the greatest respect,
Honourable Sir, and Sirs,

Your faithful and most obedient humble servant,
J. G.

HISTORICAL AND COMPARATIVE ANALYSIS.

INTRODUCTION.

THE promulgation of the late Act of Parliament, for the better regulation and management of the Affairs of the East India Company, from the 1st of January 1785, hath at length relieved the representatives of government in this country, from that painful embarrassing state of suspense, which might hitherto have frustrated the best designs of reformation, as it may have prevented an earlier adoption of, or return to that system of order and political economy now authoritatively enjoined, and so long established in form, throughout that portion of the Mogul dominions under present consideration, until the very instant of the revolution in 1765, introductive of the sway of the actual sovereign. The ultimate views of the Legislature are now become as manifest, as they must in general be considered well directed towards their apparent object, of ensuring great lasting territorial advantages to Britain, on the only solid foundations of a rightful permanent empire; in leaving the free entire enjoyment of ancient customary rights, privileges, civil or religious law, to the great body of native inhabitants, under a stable local administration, framed on principles of reasonable constitutional policy; perhaps the best possible to be devised, for the government of distant possessions subjected necessarily to an oligarchy of foreign rulers, under relative circumstances, singularly delicate in themselves, as well as perfectly new in the political history of the world. And however unmerited in respect to a great majority of the Company's servants are those stern provisions of the new parliamentary code, which may be construed into an indiscriminate imputation, or rather presumption of guilt, in all, for the real or supposed transgression or misconduct, of a few; provisions perhaps the more readily adopted on a review of the detached interests, inconsiderable numbers and covenanted or previously abridged liberties of such of his Majesty's British subjects as may continue to hold executive offices in this country; yet regarding the act as it stands at present, generally with all its salutary and obnoxious clauses, it may truly be considered as the great charter of rights, if not to the whole body of national representatives in Asia, at least to all East India subjects of Great Britain, who enjoy the inestimable advantage of living under a delegated sway, thus tempered for the first time in Hindostan, with the mildest influence of practical enlarged distributive justice.

It is true indeed, with respect to a very small but important class of the native inhabitants of this country, forming the necessary responsible agents between the prince and peasantry, for managing the zemindarry or landed interest of the state, that the law as yet seems only declaratory of the humane and generous intention of the legislature to restore, and henceforth firmly to establish in all the plenitude of territorial jurisdiction, or ancient ascertained immunities, on principles of equity according to the constitution of India, such, or any other descriptions of persons who may have been illegally deprived of their official or possessory rights within the period of British administration. But as the injunction to the Company on this head, is unequivocally positive, to investigate and forthwith redress, if founded in truth, the injuries supposed or complained of; so the eventual benevolent purposes of the act, may reasonably and fully be anticipated, from the moment it begins to have effect in the proposed sphere of its operation.

To assist therefore in an inquiry, not less extensive and difficult in itself as a task to be accomplished, than humanely laudable in its object, becomes not only a duty on all those who may be entrusted with ministerial executive authority, but on every individual member of the same community, whether in a private or public station; who, from his own experience, or that of others, can throw the smallest possible light on a subject touching so nearly the interest, the dignity, and honour of the British nation. Animated with these sentiments, as well as encouraged by the indulgence and attention shown to a disquisition recently exhibited on the topic of Indian finance in general, applied on that occasion, particularly to the northern circars, I now again venture to obtrude the result of my observations on the same interesting subject at large, applied here more especially with fuller intelligence, in ascertaining the nature, mode of management, former and actual amount of the established revenue of the Soubah of Bengal, collected in behalf and with the positive sanction of government.

But the most powerful motives were necessary, as a counterpoise to the slender hope, or satisfaction of impressing conviction of the truth of my own opinions, on the minds of others, however material, justly stated, or ascertainable might be the facts on which such opinions were founded; and the dread of incurring the imputation of ignorant misrepresentation, would otherwise, though encouraged with all the presumption of conscious rectitude of design, shrink at the task of opposing the present popular belief, which hath, through the charms of eloquence, in displaying a familiar theory, partially just, though locally misapplied, gained gradual ascendancy in the course of the last ten years, over the authoritative informations of the secret committee of parliament in 1773, founded on the oral or written testimony of some of the ablest, most upright and experienced individuals employed in the highest offices of the financial department in this country; and who deriving their speculative knowledge of the constitutional constitutional forms of local administration from a view of the real practice of the preceding Mussulman government, from which they immediately obtained a transfer of dominion, may reasonably be supposed to have been the best instructed on that important subject of inquiry. Under such circumstances therefore, if the presumed experience of the whole twenty years now elapsed since the acquisition of the dewanny, the voluminous records of the Company, together with the deliberate evidence of many respectable persons, delivered as matter of simple opinion, unsupported by established facts, were universally against me; yet I should aver confidently, as I will maintain, that the actual system of revenue in Bengal was from the beginning taken up on mistaken grounds, fundamentally wrong in itself, and highly dangerous to be continued; yet still as easily to be corrected, as its principle may be proved to be false, with common intelligence joined to an inclination of investigating dispassionately the truth. It is a baseless fabric reared in the ignorance, corruption and chicanery of the natives, intended to conceal from superficial popular view, or perhaps ultimately to destroy, the symmetry, convenience and simplicity of the original structure, which it has been made artlessly to cover from outward sight, and through delusive information of the first sole keepers of the golden key of interior admission, imposed on the unsuspecting honesty of foreign rulers, as the solid genuine edifice of Indian finance. Such as represented, it was presumed in every respect to be, and being deemed too stupendous or expensive an undertaking to be wholly pulled down and reconstructed, was thought only proper to be repaired and adjusted to modern European ideas of perfection. Invention was racked to hide or correct apparent deformity; and under such skilful hands, no wonder if the motley, shapeless mass should now be considered, as a work highly finished. It is only to be lamented, that those who have thus shown themselves actuated by the best inclinations, or capable of the greatest execution, were necessarily precluded from taking an interior view, and making the discovery that the immediate object of their labours was merely an outwork, a heap of rubbish rudely formed, with design to screen the true substantial work within, from simple passengers, or embarrass and prevent the approach, of more curious observers.

To drop the style of comparison, though sanctioned by the title of our performance, it is impossible but the fallacy of the system, and accounts of revenue which were obtruded by the designing natives on the Company's administration in Bengal at the acquisition of the dewanny, and since, almost universally acquiesced in, or adopted, must sooner or later be manifested and generally acknowledged; because it is the nature of truth ultimately to force itself on the minds of all who are interested in the discovery. Such however is the stubbornness of long established belief, that the progress to conviction of error, may be so slow as to render entirely vain the hope of any individual's effecting the change; but what cannot be completed by one person, should not therefore be wholly laid aside when the design is laudable and the execution thought necessary. A rude or imperfect essay received favourably, may simulate others better qualified, to take up and prosecute the task until its final accomplishment; and the merit of the undertaking, thankless privately, though perhaps not the less useful to the public, will be in proportion to the number and difficulty of the obstacles to be surmounted.

Among the most powerful of these, are to be reckoned the original forms pretended to be deduced from ancient practice, and as such imposed upon the inexperienced sovereign agency, by some of the best established characters for ability and integrity of the native inhabitants of this country, who for seven successive years were vested in the sole virtually uncontrouled administration of the dewanny rents, from the time they were first acquired by the Company. It would be a task, if not difficult, at least invidious, to prove designed deception on the part of the superior Hindostanny officers thus employed by delegation, in the early management of the revenues: not so much from the dread of wounding the sensibility of a Mussulman or Hindoo, really, by such a charge, but the supposed injury it would be in the estimation of others of a sympathetic feeling, or unacquainted with national character, to bring an accusation against them of delinquency, as understood in Europe, unsupported, perhaps, by the formalities required there of legal evidence; as well as the consequences to be apprehended by themselves, when thus stigmatized in the eyes of their rulers, the dispensers of favour, or, in being obliged to refund former unrightful acquisitions, sacrifice those of present enjoyment, and forego the expectancy of future additional defalcations. It may be sufficient for all the useful public purposes simply to prove, that through the medium of natives, hitherto almost exclusively employed in real effective operations of finance, we have been, by some means or other, unintentionally or with design, grossly deceived in respect to the nature, form and extent of the annual assessment of Bengal; that such intermediate agents themselves, have always been fully, or more perfectly informed on these important subjects, though they withheld their knowledge from European superintendents; and that when they have been regarded, or officially consulted as oracles to determine the most efficient rights of government, they have in most cases, stood in the predicament of judge and party against the sovereign ruler; deeply interested perhaps in the event of their own decision; yet placed in every instance beyond the reach of detection, as holding in the same hands, though incompatibly, all the great offices of state, instituted as mutual checks on each other, together with the entire volume of authentic documents, accounts or official forms, so indispensably necessary to controul their conduct with intelligence, while the ruling administration were still unaided by the lights of free extensive self experience.

The more general conclusion of deception, will only be acquiesced in by liberal unbiassed minds, on a review and nice examination of all the facts and circumstances relative to the management of the finances of the country, before and since the acquisition of the dewanny, and and intended to be here set forth by comparison, as grounds are wanting to pursue the mode of more positive independent reasoning. But the less important collateral deductions in regard to the possibility, joined to the apparent private interest there might be of practising such delusion, must occur at once to the minds of those who recollect, or have been sufficiently informed of the character, situation, power, or necessary influence of the first appointed native ministry in behalf of the Company. A Mussulman presided; and if there be a scruple of difference in point of what we understand by moral principle among the numerous followers of Mahomed, without any knowledge of the man but from report, I am inclined to throw it, into the scale of his virtues. An outward deference and practical observance of religious forms may be admitted, as a proof at least of his understanding; if not of his piety; though perhaps his abilities will appear most conspicuous, in considering a rapid progress in the career of ambition, which with all genuine Asiatics, must 99 times in a 100 be by the basest degrees of servility, venality, dishonesty, corruption; or, if once against such odds through military talents, is ever necessarily attended with assassination, perfidy, cruelty and oppression. During the two years subahdarry of Jaffier Ali Khan after the expulsion of Colim, this man acted as naib of Jehangeernagur, then undoubtedly the first and most lucrative post under the nizamut; because the jurisdiction was the largest, the province the richest, and the rents, though valued low on the royal registers, were always rated the highest in the secret separate rent-roll of the provincial delegate. In this short period of financial anarchy, a balance was stated to have been incurred, as he himself will be forward to acknowledge, throughout the whole of Bengal, of more than two krore of rupees; but it would be unreasonable to expect to be informed from the same quarter, how much of this was to be placed to the account of Dacca, notwithstanding the calamities of the civil war, supposed to have occasioned the general deficiency elsewhere, were certainly little felt in this remote district, and could not decently be pleaded to authorize continued arrears, after the restoration of peace; neither would it be altogether fair to require an exact account of the four months anticipated collections of the first year of the dewanny from May to September 1765, stated at about one-third of the annual hundobust, though during these months, the receipts of revenue all over Hindostan are ever comparatively small in proportion to the interval of time, and never could be authorized before the settlement of the jummabundy, which did not take place till long after the arrival of our first resident at the Moorthedabad durbar, in July of the same year;—nevertheless the expenditure of part, to answer the private demands, as pretended, of British subjects then high in office, hath been minutely set forth, and now stands on the Journals of the House of Commons in 1772, to screen the great defaulter, by anticipated insidious recrimination against those who were probably ensnared into a participation of the illgotten wealth of an hour, to realize to himself the enormous fraudulent acquirements of years. Still however, the selfish view, with the means of concealing such defalcations, were only adequate to the inferior station of provincial deputy; when acting afterwards as naib subah and dewan, holding virtually the whole united powers of executive government under the self same authority, and exclusive of official knowledge, it is equally impossible to measure the predominancy of private interest, as to define the irresistible influence of an Eastern despot, to ensure the gratification of his will. Some nominal coadjutors, it is true, were intended to controul the inordinate power of the minister, but the feeble restraint of the Royan, his Hindoo colleague, served only to quicken and confirm his arbitrary movements; while the councils of a banker associate, sole interested or experienced in the benefits of money dealings, which were great in proportion to the gross receipts of cash from the country to be afterwards misapplied, naturally urged the progress of the same unrightful devious course.

On the other hand, it must be remembered, that the hereditary and consequential post of chief canongoe, the only true effective constitutional check known in the whole system of Mogul government on every temporary delegated trust, has been unequally divided from the commencement of the present century, between two Indian families of the tribe of Koyt; and as the interested execution of this important office indispensable (however managed under an indolent ignorant Mussulman administration, with the continued inheritance of it,) depended more on personal ability and anticipated succession, than doubtful hereditary pretensions; so it has happened generally, agreeable to common Hindoo policy in this and zemindary employments, that the heir of adoption, whether of line, consanguinity or cast, hath been a minor-grandson, nephew or foundling, acting under the experienced tutelage of the father, mother or household bramin, and represented in the sovereign presence by a servile dependant, properly instructed, with the designation of naib or vakeel, to this infant chancellor, register and keeper of the imperial archives of the subah. At the period now in question, a very intelligent mutfeddy, whose name deserves to be rescued from oblivion, held this inferior delegated trust in behalf of the lesser canongoe. The lowliness of his degree rendered him the fitter instrument for the minister's purpose; and he was accordingly appointed peishcar to the Khalssa duster, having obtained the nomination of his former charge for his minor nephew and adopted son, after passing by the experienced father, who in his turn even then, undoubtedly looked forward to the high post of virtual dewan, which he at present occupies in the financial department of the company, in the like manner as he seems now to expect the transmission of it, to his immediate posterity, by the same mode of re-transfer, and convenient filiation in favour of an infant grandson.

To controul so formidable a combination of intriguing natives, or penetrate into the mysteries of their financial conduct, against their will and private interests, through a mass of such obscure materials as were designedly thrown in the way of European investigation to perplex perplex and mislead, required what was impossible,—immediate intuitive knowledge of affairs, only to be learnt by long practical experience: even the genius, ability, disinterestedness or Clive himself, aided by all the vigour, address, and awe of his military character, might have been long baffled in the attempt, in those early days of imperial acquisition of territory. Nor yet could the propriety of his choice of ministerial agents, be called in question; for, perhaps, in Hindostan, a Mussulman could not be found characterized by the greater reputed virtues of honour, sagacity, moderation, and equity, locally understood, than Mahomed Reza Khan; a Hindoo more pliable, experienced in the collections, or highly respected by his countrymen, than Rajah Doolubram; nor of the latter nation, a mulleddy endowed with greater cunning or secrecy in his profession; more skilled in the detail of the exchequer dues; the fraudulent emolument of the zemindars and other officers of government; practical arts in composing or decyphering revenue accounts; dividing, subdividing, intermixing, annexing, reducing, or entirely concealing portions of rent and territory (thus to enhance the merit with the difficulty of execution in rendering various, complex, and intricate, the simple operations of Indian finance) than Rada Kuntlingh, the elder brother of Gangagovind, the father of Praan Kishen.

Nevertheless, it is a melancholy, as I hope it will become a notorious truth, that, from the routine of business, official forms, notions of right or former practice, at first introduced under this original triumvirate, is to be deduced a positive inexcusable defalcation from the unalienable established moderate rental of the country, in the moment of transfer to the company, of at least 10 lakhs of rupees, during the twenty years of administration which has now elapsed since that memorable era of the acquisition of the dewanny, as in the same manner we have shown a loss, not much less, to have arisen in rather a shorter period in the northern circars; through the like fatal necessity of trusting implicitly a janto of native agents, deeply interested in concealing the amount of the actual collections, or in misrepresenting the just undeniable rights of sovereignty, with the true nature of zemindary tenures. To trace all the wily mazes through which so enormous a sum has been dissipated in Bengal by large deductions, smaller additions, and unaccountable remissions of rent, together with the designed confusion in the prescribed order, extent, and denomination of the several districts to be assessed, agreeable to the ancient records of the superior khalsa duffer, would be, if possible, yet a very irksome unnecessary labour; considering that the same detail hath been more recently introduced in the formation of the sudder abitracts of revenue, in specifying the annual settlement of an inconsiderable talook, or obscure village, as in stating that of a zemindary jurisdiction equal to twice the kingdom of Sardinia in Europe; and that nine-tenths of the huge volume of modern bundobusts will not be found to contain the hundredth part of the rental of the country: such minutiae, though perfectly adapted to the broken diminutive scale, by which a slow, patient, indefatigable Hindoo calculates the most extensive as well as the smallest pecuniary transactions, ill suits the magnitude of our present subject of inquiry; and it might be thought equally absurd to exhibit for annual current use, the vast financial operations of a mighty empire thus partially by undefined unwieldy provinces, and partly by the frittered divisions of an insignificant haint, as to attempt giving at one glance, a general comprehensive view of a boundless object through the focus of a microscope. Besides, it may be very reasonably supposed, that the plausible story of Colsim Ali's having destroyed or carried away with him, on his expulsion, all the material archives of the exchequer, may yet have some slight foundation in truth, though for the most part invented to be constantly urged by the native officers of the revenue, to prevent retrospection, or the possibility of tracing their own embezzlement progressively to the original source of the evil, where every true practical reform must also take its rise; and that really a few consequential papers, perhaps, relative to the history of his own administration, general principles of taxation, or the tuckseem hupabond accounts of those provinces, where so expediently he brought into the public treasury the keyyet, or private benefits of amildars, may be wanting; in which case, a narrow scope is left to caviil, though none to vindicate, the prodigious defalcation of succeeding agency.

As to the obstacles which occur in overturning a fallacious system that has been so long adopted and powerfully promulgated by very able and respectable individuals of our own nation, who have held the highest executive offices in this country, I shall in this place only observe, that these difficulties will be in great part removed, if the imposition can be proved to have originated with the first native administration appointed on behalf of the company, and that the grand errors in the principles of their theory, could only be detected after many years of practical experience; yet still an arduous task will remain, perhaps surpassing our slender unaided ability, though necessary to be attempted to turn the bias, which must have been given to the prejudices of the public by a recent literary performance, entitled, "Original Minutes of the Governor General and Council 1776, with a plan for the settlement of the revenues of Bengal," &c.; a work replete with local information, and the soundest political doctrines, when applied to the finances or the state of civil society in Europe; though entirely foreign to the circumstances of this country, in many fundamental points. The consideration of some of these, will naturally arise in the prosecution of our present subject; but it may not be improper here to premise a few of the most essential, and in which we are sorry to differ so widely from the author of the tract in question, respecting the application of adduced facts and opinions, to the actual situation of persons and things in India. First, the grand material difference between us, is on the nature of landed property. It is positively affirmed on the one side, pages 163, 4, "that the lands of these provinces are not the property

"property of the East India Company as sovereign representative, but of the zemindars and other classes of the natives, who owe nothing to government but a fixed portion of the net produce," indifferently described in other parts of the work under the denomination of a quit rent, tribute, or land tax. This is declared to be "the main hinge on which the whole argument for the proposed settlement turns;" and the author's deductions will be found to flow regularly from that position. But it must at the same time, in justice be observed, that it is the principle of this doctrine, as thought essential to the public interests, that seems to influence the ready belief of its constant admission into the system of Mogul legislation, rather than any solid proofs of the fact, from what can be deemed incontrovertible evidence, either official, written, or circumstantial; for, agreeable to an established European maxim, involving however a distinct secondary question, it is inferred, that the proprietary uses of the soil, would be incompatible with the actual sovereignty; and that a mind impressed with such a notion might not be open to conviction, though the point of right were otherwise determined by authority. On the other hand, in the political disquisition delivered in the board in December 1784, relative to the northern circars, and to which I must beg to leave frequently to refer, when treating of the subject of Indian finance in general, the very reverse of the foregoing proposition, in its more important as well as its subsidiary affirmations, is set forth as incontestible, on substantial specific grounds, admitting of an immediate, final, or determinate issue. The sovereign ruler in all parts of Hindostan, if not through the whole of Asia, unless it be in the Russian dominions, is declared to be the sole virtual proprietor of the soil; not in the European feudal acceptance of the term, agreeable to which it hath lately been attempted to be qualified, implying a fictitious tenure as lord paramount, from whom all lesser holdings are supposed to be derived by every class of subjects, but in right and fact, the real acting landlord entitled to, and receiving from the ryots or husbandmen, a certain portion of the gross yearly returns of the country in money or kind, fixed on a medium in Bengal, at one-fourth of the whole produce, according to a pecuniary estimation made about the year 1582, soon after the establishment of the Mogul government under Akbar, and continued thence, without any deviation in the principle, down to the present time, though it is much to be feared the iniquitous practices of Indian landholders may have clandestinely exceeded that original equitable standard. It is further advanced as incontrovertible, that the zemindars or other classes of natives, hitherto considered the rightful proprietors of the lands, are actually no more than annual contracting farmers or receivers of the public rents, with stated allowances in the nature of a commission on the receipts, and a small estate or portion of their territorial jurisdictions set apart for constant family subsistence, whether in or out of office, but never exceeding in the whole, by an universal prescriptive law of the empire, 10 per cent. on the Mofussil collections; and that to alter or otherwise define these fundamental, implicitly acquiesced-in, rules of financial jurisprudence in India, ascertaining the nature of civil tenures, the established mode of levying, and actual amount of the rental or yearly assessment of the land, would be no less impolitic, useless, and dangerous, in respect to probable future consequences, than unconstitutional, unnecessary, and a wanton sacrifice of the dearest, most essential interests of government, in the present moment.

The speculative opinion involved in this proposition, will be subject to caviil, and can only be determined by reference to past experience, still to be unfolded to the world, and perhaps, after all, inapplicable partly to actual circumstances; but as to the mere matter of fact, here we must join issue. A question of the highest rights of sovereignty, of subjects, or in property is depending; and though we do not take our departure from the same point, it is but fair that we should start as nearly as possible on equal terms in the same instant, or in plainer words, that the burthen of proof should not rest entirely on one side, while bare assertions may have been admitted, on the other, without previous investigation. Our different principles being then explicitly laid down or avowed, and the arguments in support of both, with respective proofs or illustrations, being free for public examination and discussion, while the important object is one and the same, a candid ultimate decision may be the immediate result of an authoritative enquiry on the spot; to which I can anticipate the ready acquiescence of the author of the plan, even with the more assurance, that he seems to refuse in advance his assent to the practical inferences of secondary determination, on the simpler points what, in his own understanding, would be an unfavourable decision, on the simpler points of fact. The parties eventually and most interested on this occasion, compose the three principal orders of men in every subordinate state; the representative ruler, the landholders technically or locally understood, and the whole body of husbandmen. To define the rights and privileges of the zemindars, &c. of India, forming the only intermediate class of territorial subjects existing between the prince and peasantry, would be in truth, to distinguish also those of the two latter descriptions of persons, by marking the common boundaries of all, in the chain of mutual dependence, and where alone they are capable of limitation; the higher extremes of despotism and the lowest of slavery, being ever alike indefinite. Something like this, however, has been attempted in the Political Survey of the Circars before referred to, and may again be loosely taken up in the present disquisition; but as we are persuaded, that so great and powerful a body of people, such as the more eminent landholders of Bengal, particularly those styled rajahs, who have been compared in dignity to the feudatory princes of the German empire in Europe, can never want special, able, and more agreeable advocates to plead their cause, particularly while they are suffered to administer, with unconstrained authority, the unascertained revenues of their ample jurisdictions; so in this essay, we mean rather to apply our reasoning to explain the immunities and relative situation of both the other corporate members of the community.

A second difference of opinion arises on consideration of the burthen of the actual territorial assessment, on a comparison of the original toomur jumma of Toory Mull, with the more modern bundobust of the present century. In support of the positions laid down in "the plan of settlement, &c. p. 167," a rent-roll of the provinces, fixed in the reign of Akbar, and that of the year 1728, have been exhibited. The latter, is affirmed to be 7 lacks lower than the former; and it is added "if there be any proofs to invalidate the evidence of these documents, it ought to be produced." On this point, admitting the authenticity of the two accounts separately, we must deny the conclusion drawn from them comparatively, as seems to be authorized by the first glance of their contents; for the particulars of the first rental, extend to all the lands of Orissa, which were then annexed to Bengal; whereas the tack-feem of the second, include only a small portion of the lesser foubah, forming the chucklahs of Hejellee and Balasore; determining thereby the settlement of Sujah Khan, in 1728, to be 31 lacks more, instead of 7 less, than that of the Mogul emperor, concluded nearly 150 years earlier. Another important inference, respecting the relative worth of money at the same or later periods, intimately connected with the question of comparative assessments, is in like manner, to be controverted on principles of reasoning apparently the most solid, but which depending on a variety of combined facts and speculative deductions, too complex perhaps to be brought forward in one view with mathematical precision, will not preclude the possibility of cavilling.

With great ingenuity it is stated, p. 197, that a settled increase in the price of the necessities of life, and proportional decrease in the value of specie, may in like manner be occasioned by a rack rental, which forces the husbandman to enhance his demand for the produce of the land, as well as by any extraordinary influx of gold and silver. Hence it is strongly implied, or rather the conclusion is inevitable, that these effects, as then applicable to Bengal, must be attributed to the former cause, and that accordingly the rental of the period in question, about the year 1776, might be considered as overrated, and should be reduced. To refute this opinion, will be more especially the object of the present disquisition; but it may not be improper in this place to remark, that the subject hath already been in great part anticipated, in our political survey of the northern circars, and that here it only seems necessary to bring to remembrance the principal facts or observations which constituted the groundwork of our former general reasoning on the same topic. 1st. We insisted, and do still maintain, that by the discovery of the mines of America, and a passage round the Cape of Good Hope, the relative value of the precious metals has diminished at least one-half, all over the commercial world, in consequence of the quantity of coin in circulation having surely doubled, in the course of the two last centuries. 2dly. That from the rise of the Marhattah state on the Malabar coast, the signs of wealth, particularly in Bengal, must have greatly increased, through the decline of trade and manufactures in the former country, and their transposition with new vigour to the latter, at the era of the same important revolution; and 3dly. That as the rights of sovereignty were originally established at one-fourth of the gross produce of the land shared with the ryots; did from the beginning; do actually; and must ever, from necessity or policy, continue to be rated formally at the same equitable standard, it appears highly expedient for government to realize its pretensions virtually to such proportion; that nevertheless the actual public receipts fall greatly short of it, supposing only a twofold increase in the quantum of money, and allowing for the farther extension of territory under the same general description of country, since the first assessment of Akbar; but in those districts where the deficiency is the most glaring, the burthen on the peasantry is usually the heaviest, and perhaps surpassing the prescribed rule, though by the collusive practices of zemindars with other native officers of the revenue, the surplus of collected rents is commuted for private douceurs, or otherwise under the heads of remissions, serinjamy, or feebund expenses fraudulently withheld from the public treasury.

In respect to the materials from which I have been enabled to complete the present work, I have only to observe, that they have been wholly collected since my last return to the presidency from Hyderabad, during a longer interval of freedom from any permanent public avocations, however necessary, to succeed in the objects of my pursuit, than either suited inclination or private interest; but at an expense so trifling, and with such little trouble, comparatively with the large sums or tedious multiplied labours hitherto ineffectually employed for the same ends, that if I were to make an extraordinary charge for the whole, in addition to my ordinary personal disbursements, I should beg leave to decline it, in the apprehension of lessening in the public estimation the importance of the knowledge intended to be communicated by means, which may now appear at once so simple in themselves, easy and practicable to be used. Nevertheless, the papers referred to, chiefly contained in about 20 volumes of Persian ferds, or account of revenue, prior to the era of the dewanny, though entirely procured, through the influence of a light and private purse, will assuredly stand the test of inquiry, as copies of originals still existing privately in the hands of former or actual officers of government; and which, though perhaps they may not be found among the public archives of the Khalsa, should certainly have been deposited there, as they ought now to be considered the most, perhaps the only, essential documents for current use, and worthy of being preserved in the superior duster. At the same time, the portion of individual merit that can be annexed to the discovery of such papers, in any situation, would be extremely small in mine, otherwise unemployed, while yet covenanted in the service of the company; relaxation in the search of them, or future suppression when obtained, must have been thought reprehensible. In this country, every branch of professional knowledge to be acquired from the natives, is wrapt up in mysterious process, or a technical jargon of obscure, but not always always of unmeaning words, and only to be learned through the influence of cast, of public station, or of money. Wanting the two former requisites, I of course availed myself of the latter, having previously, by ordinary diligence and some fortuitous circumstances, procured the first necessary key to information, enabling me to call for what was wanted, and without which, one might long seek in vain, through the passive indifference of a Hindoo. Furnished with such means, and supported by a decent character for understanding and moderation, just sufficient to inspire a confidence, that no personal bad design stimulates enquiry; the success of any individual must ever be more certain than the effect of torture and imprisonment, to attain the same object under the obdurate secrecy that would be opposed to apparent or presumed ignorance.

To proceed with the greatest perspicuity in our present undertaking, it might be proper to begin with a general geographical description of the country now under consideration, and ascertain or define its various divisions of territory, whether natural, civil, or political, as far as these are necessarily connected with a correct and perfect knowledge of the revenues; but as these are necessarily connected with the whole and in its parts, as liable to the Mogul system the superficial contents of Bengal in the whole and in its parts, as liable to the Mogul system of finance, have undergone to many changes at different periods, or may be arranged by subdivisions under such a variety of denominations, useful to be explained and kept in remembrance, that we must here beg leave to refer to Major Rennell's atlas for a view of the foubah at large, in its actual and greatest extent, being 91,142 square British miles, exclusive of Midnapore in Orissa, and comprising all the more contracted dimensions of this portion of the empire of Hindostan under the same name, in former times; as unlike manner, we wish to avail ourselves of the aid of that valuable work, to calculate the importance of a great natural territorial division into two parts, nearly equal, on either side of the narrow boundary of included provinces; which, though not altogether all the necessary purposes of political arithmetic, and precision in the execution, as to answer all the necessary purposes of political arithmetic, will nevertheless be extremely useful to the order and amount of the old-established or recent proportional assessments, or collected by the immediate officers of the Khalsa, can only be fully comprehended through the detailed accounts of all the financial departments taken together, and are so various in their designation or uses, and have been subject to so many periodical reforms, that the utmost we can resolve to exhibit within the compass of the present work, will be merely an abstract sketch, of which we shall here content ourselves with indicating simply the general heads.

1st. The permanent imperial divisions into circars, with the subdivisions into pergunnahs, are indispensably necessary at all times to be accurately known, as being the basis of every other distribution of land or annexed rent, and the only true effectual boundary checks on every description of local agency. The numerary of these originally fixed by Toorel Mull, in the reign of Akbar, about the year 1582, particularly specified in the Ayeen Akberry, was nineteen of the larger portions of country, corresponding to our idea of counties, and 682 of the lesser included mahals, or districts, rated nearly for one crore and 7 lacks of rupees. At the close of Shah Jehan's reign in 1658, as appears from a variety of concurring testimonies, the number of the former had been increased, though not with proportioned dimensions, to 34, by annexations of the maritime border of Orissa from Hejelee to Balasore, and new conquests on the side of Agham, &c. and the latter by these additions, or 19 subdivisions of the ancient pergunnahs, were stated at 1,350, yielding then about one crore and thirty-one lacks. During the administration of Jaffier Khan and reign of Mahomed Shah in 1722, although the same circar divisions were necessarily kept in the khalsa records to adjust the annual accounts transmitted to Delhi; yet being thought at this time, too small or expensive, as forming the separate jurisdictions of so many amildars of mussulman soubdarry governments, while thenceforth compounded into 13 chucklahs or more extensive foubahs, with an established rental in future, of the numerary of lesser districts, was increased to 1,660, with an established rental in future, of one crore and nearly forty-three lacks of rupees. This was the ultimate and most important reform, in the royal financial distribution of territory in Bengal. It is the very ground-work and substance of what is now termed the Aulil Toomur Jumma of the whole country, hitherto so universally and egregiously mistaken for the famous original rent-roll, exhibited in the Plan of settlement, &c. before referred to, though it is greatly to be regretted that the particulars were not at the same time, communicated to the writer, as they would in all probability, have prevented the mistake already noticed in that publication, with some others of no less importance when functioned under the same respectable authority.

The two-fold distribution of lands in jagheer and khalsa, was subordinate to, or entirely regulated by, the foregoing divisions. Under the first denomination, near two-fifths of the anciently assessed territory by Akbar, had been assigned on temporary tenures for the support of the provincial civil and military establishments. In the reign of Shah Jehan the amount of revenue thus alienated continued the same, while the proportion to the improved total rental of the country then, was only about one-third. But in the government of Jaffier Khan, these jagheer appropriations were reduced in extent and value, to a fourth of the reformed toomur jumma of this period. On the other hand, the remaining or khalsa portion of the foubah, which was all that ever entered into the annual bundobusts, was divided into an indefinite number of eahlimams, or zemindarry jurisdictions, greater or less in proportion to the influence or ability of the landholders; among which those of Rajelhy, Burdwau, Dina-gipour, Nuddeah, Beerbhoom, and Calcutta, are the most considerable, as possessing together, about one half of this division of the lands, when rated by the ultimate established rent-roll.

2d.—A very important distribution of the large and smaller districts of Bengal, either into chucklals, circars, or pergunnahs, jagheer, khalsa, or zemindary territory, can only be distinguished by the abwabs or proportional assessments of rent begun to be levied by the provincial delegates from the commencement of the present century, in addition to the allotment of the Mogul emperors. These new imposts, were in fact only a moderate computation for ancient military services, or a necessary increase to answer the greater expenses of government, in consequence of the diminution in the value of specie, from its recent extraordinary influx; and by such means to keep up, with all expedient exactness, to the standard of the original estimate, the allotments to the sovereigns, or tenantry respectively, of the yearly produce of the soil. But their denominations, application and uses, were various; some, being general throughout the provinces, others, confined to particular districts; and all appropriated indiscriminately to defray the public exigencies of the state, or the private disbursements of individuals vested with authority.

They were always raised, however, without the imperial sanction, formally; and the accounts continued to be kept separately in behalf of the nazim, even after all dependance of the crown of Delhi had been thrown off by Aliverdi Khan, until the period of the last revolutionary decline of the empire, or its inability to compel the foubahdar to pay into the royal treasury, the full provincial receipts. It is further to be remarked, that under the description of abwabs is comprized the article of keshiyet profit, or returned defalcations in some of the frontier and hitherto imperfectly rated districts, entirely subjected to the military government of foudjedars, who in their several jurisdictions had followed the example of their immediate superior, in levying proportional or arbitrary assessments from the landholders; and in like manner as the nabob withheld from the Mogul the sum of his additional collections, so these inferior delegates kept to themselves, by connivance or force, the amount of their own particular exactions. Under the same general head also, must be classed the towfeer, or increase in the nazim's and some lesser jagheers, which had not been liable to any other ascertained extraordinary imposts, from the earliest period of appropriation, to the time of Cossim Ali.

3d.—The division of Bengal into ceded and dewanny lands, nearly in the proportion of one to nine, from the year 1765, is highly important to be distinguished; as serving to evince the effect of different modes of interior administration on the country, more especially the superiority of the Company's, when immediate and locally conducted under the supervision of their proper covenanted servants. It was at this era, to answer the fraudulent selfish purposes of the native ministry then appointed, that the ancient forms of keeping the revenue accounts regularly in separate dusters, with a certain precise knowledge of the value of the lands or capacity of the farmers, were first laid aside; that the prescriptive rule of raising the public supplies by proportional assessments, in addition to the long-established rental, was at once overturned; that a fallacious system of finance, in regard to the nature and legal sources, mode of management, and actual amount of the collections, was fabricated, and imposed on the inexperienced sovereign agency, as conformable to the genuine institutions of the preceding government, from which the transfer of territorial right had been obtained; and that under the delusive idea of simplification, by consolidating the ancient toommar jumma with the various permanent abwabs, in yearly zemindary settlements, founded on no standard of fixed exaction as formerly, so much designed confusion, intricate defalcation of near 60 lacks of rupees per annum, from authorized, necessary, and equitable dues of the public exchequer; exclusive of the improvements of rent, which might have been since expected, if the truth had been earlier known.

These three heads of local divisions, have also a reference to so many distinct periods of time, according to which we mean to arrange chronologically the following work. The first period, commencing A. D. 1582, in the reign of Akbar, and brought down to the year 1722, during that of Mahomed Shah, including an interval of 140 years, will comprehend a short historical and comparative Analysis of the assit Toommar jumma, or original rent-roll of the lands of Bengal, from its first establishment by Toorai Mull, to its ultimate reform and improvement under the foubahdarry of Jaffier Khan. The second period will comprize, in like manner, a concise account of the origin, progress, and annual produce of the several abwabs or proportional assessments on the first established ground-rent, continued to be levied by the sole authority of the provincial delegates in their own behalf, though virtually for the public service, from the commencement of Jaffier Khan's government, and the reign of Farrookseer in 1713, to the expulsion of Cossim Ali Khan in 1763. The third and last period will contain a similar detail of the territorial revenues of the same country entire, under the Company's administration, from the cession of the Dewanny in 1765, when the assit Toommar jumma was consolidated, but fraudulently diminished to the years 1781-4, when the last reform took place in the mode of interior management, under the superintendence of one subordinate Committee, stationed at the presidency.

FIRST PERIOD

Of the ASSIT TOOMMAR JUMMA PADSHAHY.

PRACTICAL FINANCE, considered in its greatest scope, seems regularly distributed under three distinct heads, viz. Nature and sources of revenue;—mode of management;—and actual amount of yearly collections. The two former, in Hindostan, apply generally to the whole country; and we have already discussed the subject of these at large, in our Political Survey of the Northern Circars; the latter alone is variable, and requires a separate treatise for the different foubahs or larger governments of the Mogul empire; accordingly in respect to the first, it hath been set forth in that work, by a short analysis of the original settlement, to the first, it hath been set forth in that work, by a short analysis of the original settlement, concluded through the agency of Toorai Mull, A. D. 1582, in the reign of Akbar; an historical detail, brought forward or in reference, to prove the adoption of the like rule universally since that period, and the uniform practice actually, of all the modern states of India, in raising the public supplies on the same permanent principles of sovereign authority, that every species of assessment levied on the inhabitants of this part of Asia, is usually classed under the technical terms of mhal or territorial rent, and fayer or variable imposts; the latter distinctive appellation, though comprehending almost the whole system of taxation in Europe, and extending to a great number of articles unknown there, yet in no one local division of the empire ever did, or at this day, doth amount to one-tenth of the whole rated annual revenue of the same districts; that therefore, it is the former or landed income, that constitutes the grand effective financial resource of Asiatic government, as established on political institutions, peculiar perhaps to this quarter of the world, but according to which, all intermediate proprietary interests, as elsewhere understood, were absolutely excluded, and the sovereign vested, through despotic law or usage, in the unalienable, indefensible, necessary right of sharing with the peasantry the gross produce of the soil, in certain determinate proportions, fixed in Hindostan at one-fourth for the prince, by pecuniary estimation, to be collected through the native Hindoo agency of zemindars, or farming landholders, at an expense never exceeding 10 per cent. in nancar (or their official landed estate) and rissloom, or pecuniary commission to be deducted from this portion of the entire yearly territorial rental; that, nevertheless, both these revolving funds of the public wealth derived from the mhal and fair united, even in all their hitherto unascertained magnitude, fall infinitely short of the state exactions in other countries for the same political purposes, by reason of the local circumstances of a luxurious soil, torrid climate, few wants of the native Hindoos, with their indolence or factitious simplicity from habits of life, influenced by the most powerful physical and moral causes.

But in Bengal, it will be proper, after the year 1780, to distinguish from the head of variable imposts, under which it was before comprized, a large improved branch of the revenue accruing from the sale of salt manufactured in the country, hitherto of little consideration to the state, through the ignorance, impolicy, or depravity of the native government, though now become of the utmost financial importance to the actual sovereign, as forming an object of near half a million sterling yearly profit, capable on any extraordinary emergency, of being doubled with the greatest facility, yet certainly of being realized even when other resources might fail; and at the same time, of imposing a burthen the lightest or most equal on the people, that perhaps ingenuity could devise, with the same desirable expedient effect. This useful necessary mean of public supply hath however, of late years, though doubtless on mistaken ground, fallen under the common appellation and usual opprobrium annexed to the idea of monopoly; and a celebrated orator of our own nation has condemned it, in the most unqualified terms, as administered by the servants of the company in India, while he bestows by implication, the highest eulogium on a similar impost under the denomination of gabelle, infinitely more oppressive to a rival kingdom in Europe, in a strain of general panegyric on one of its best and ablest financiers, on occasion of the famous literary performance, entitled, "Compte rendu au Roi:" in which perhaps the facts, political maxims and reasoning on this very article of the revenue, may be considered most worthy the notice or adoption of other states similarly circumstanced. In truth then, the difference in principle between the Bengal and French systems is merely nominal, or rather the prejudice raised against the former, should be attributed to the odious meaning of the word made use of to express it, and not to any comparative defect in the institution itself. We shall therefore beg leave, when this subject comes to be discussed in the due process of our work, to consider it under the more ancient vernacular terms of feroolla nemuch, which though of more simple signification, and less liquid in pronunciation than the technical one of gabelle, could not fail, through the same gilding powers of eloquence, if they were at command, become equally palatable, at least to popular sense.

In like manner, what hath already been said in our Political Survey of the Northern Circars, on the second general head of finance, describing the mode of management, is equally applicable to the country under present consideration. The same writs, forms and process, are practically observed or enforced through similar agents, with very little variation in language, but scarcely any, in the purpose of the terms used; and the routine by annual settlements is also here, the essential distinguishing feature of the method pursued in levying the public rents; there is, however, a material difference both in the period of renewing these agreements, as well as in the numerary of the local revenue year. For in Bengal, where the harvest is rice, being the natural produce of low lands abundantly watered by by tropical rains in the summer solstice, the full computation of time hath been made to commence with this season, adjusted to the beginning of the civil year of the Hindoos, on the 1st of Bylack, answering to the 11th day of our April; and two months afterwards are allowed to elapse for the convenience of the zemindars and other officers of government to close their accounts, to liquidate any outstanding balances, and be prepared to conclude new engagements with the sovereign dewanny representative at the well known customary meeting then held, called Poonnah; whereas, in the neighbouring soubahs of Orissa and Behar, where the soil is high and the climate less moist, therefore productive of the drier grains, with exception of a few adjacent districts of the former province, now annexed to Bengal, the Velaity or Aumily (being other names for the financial year) commeth at the autumnal equinox, with the seed time of the rubbi or spring harvest, which in Arabia, from whence these words expressive of the seasons are derived, forms an equal division of an annual revolution. On the other hand, with respect to the accumulated number of years, as it has been remarked that the Fullilee is only a continuation, by solar calculation of the Hejirah or lunar epoch, from the beginning of Akbar's reign in Hindostan, or succeeding Mogul conquests in the Decan, so we shall find this revenue computation of time reckoned from the first-mentioned period, (being the 962 of the Mahomedan era) to correspond with any subsequent year of Bengal, or (by the addition of an unit) with that introduced in the adjoining soubahs, on account of the later commencement of the rubbi season, and, at the same time, of its near approach to the beginning of the year 963 of the Hejira, from which the aumily year in these provinces, is to be deduced. In exception to this general rule, it is to be observed, that in the districts of Chittagong, anciently dependent on the state of Arakan, though the construction and monthly terms of the year used there, answer in every respect to the formation of the Bengalah, yet the numerary of the former, is 45 less, and therefore, if it be not an anachronism in the calculation, must be founded not on any period of the Mahomedan, but on some other religious or civil epoch peculiar to the country.

It is therefore only the third general head of revenue, or annual amount of local collections, that is henceforth chiefly and more properly to furnish, the subject of our Historical Comparative Analysis:—conformably to which arrangement, we shall now exhibit, as the ground-work of the actual financial system of India, as also of every well directed inquiry into its original principles, and various progressive reformations to the present time,

An Abstract of the AUSIL TOOMAR JUMMA of BENGAL, as settled in behalf of the Mogul Emperor Akbar, about the year 1582, by Rajah Toorel Mull, exclusive of the five circars of Orissa, which were for a short time afterwards annexed, but finally dismembered and formed into a separate soubah, before the close of the same reign, or at the commencement of the succeeding one.

KHALSA LANDS, divided into 19 Circars, composed of 682 pergunnahs, assessed in daums, or in rupees, each of 40 of the former currency, as follows; viz.

11th.—CHITTAGONG, since called Islamabad, separated by the river Fenny, from the south-east angle of Futtehabad, and stretching south of Tipperah, along the eastern coast of the Bay of Bengal, was but very imperfectly conquered under Akbar, from the state of Arakan or Mogg, to which it was adjoining and tributary, therefore probably rated only by estimation, not from any certain knowledge of the country - perg^{na} 7 - - - 2,85,607

15th.—MADARUN, forming a broken frontier on the west of the two last-mentioned circars, and inclosing them in a semicircle from Beerbhoom to Mundelgaut, near the confluence of the Damoodah and Roopnarrain, with the river Hooghly serving them as a barrier against the incursions of the neighbouring unsubdued rajahs sheltered in the jungles of Pachet and Bishenpoor, or the low marshy lands of Hejellec, anciently called Batty, as being in a great part subject to the overflowing of the tide - - - perg^{na} 16 - - - 2,35,085

16th.—SATGONG, the great ancient emporium of Bengal for foreign commerce, on a dried-up channel of the lesser Ganges, 4 miles N.W. of the succeeding principal mart of Houghly, extending its districts along both banks of that river, but chiefly on the eastern side from Plassey, in the island of Cossimbuzar, southward to Mundelghaut - - - perg^{na} 53 - - - R^s 4,18,118

19th.—BOKLAH, or ISMAELPOOR, laterally eastward to the foregoing circar, chiefly on the western bank of the Pudda, or great Ganges, and extending to its mouth near the island of Rabnabad, which forms the S.E. angle of the Bengal Delta, as also the further extremity of the lowlands of Bhatta, commencing on the west from Hejellec. Two years subsequent to the date of this account, fixed for convenience at the beginning of Toorel Mull's financial operations, though not completed before his death in 1589, the whole circar now described was overwhelmed and laid waste by an inundation, and from the succeeding ravages of the Moggs continues to this day in great part depopulated, though undoubtedly the lands are very capable of cultivation, notwithstanding their proximity to the sea, being annually overflowed by the fresh waters of, and fertilized by the slimy mould carried down by the river Ganges - - - perg^{na} 4 - - - 1,78,266

AKTA, or JAGEER LANDS, dispersed throughout the several districts before-mentioned, in small dismembered allotments, of which the accounts were always to be kept separate; for, though valued in the sum total of the general rent-roll of the country, never were entered into the bundobust, or annual settlement; the whole being assigned over from the least known frontier or improveable districts, for the personal maintenance, support of the dignity, or to defray the official and haviilee or household expenses of the nazim; with the similar establishments of all the other great officers of state, subordinate muskulan, foudjehs, mansubdars, enaumdars, &c. &c. including generally the whole civil and military disbursements of the foudjehdarry in ordinary, as then fixed - - - - - 43,48,802
Khalfa lands, as above stated - - - - - 63,44,200

TOTAL of the Jageer and Khalfa lands of Bengal, which, added to the rental of the five circars of Orissa, Jellalore, Budernuch, Cuttac, Kulling, and Rajemundry, then annexed to, but afterwards dismembered from Bengal, will make up the total of the assessment put down in the Ayeen akberry, being dawms 59,84,59,319, or rupces 1,49,61,482; but separated as they should be, will stand dawms 42,77,26,082, or at the exchange of 40. - - - S^r R^e 1,06,93,152

This last sum then, being in round numbers, nearly one crore and seven lacks of rupces, it must be kept in remembrance, constituted in full the Awal Toomar Jumma, or original established revenue of Toomel Mull for the whole foubah, in its then circumscribed state, and agreeable to the universal, invariable, equitable, necessary principle of custom finance, was levied from the ryots, as an equivalent in specie for the rubba, or fourth share of the entire yearly produce of the lands claimed in behalf of the sovereign, by ancient conquered right, as sole despotic proprietary lord of the soil; after deducting the kharije jumma, or real estates, appropriated under the name of Nancar, for the family subsistence of the krorics, zemindars, or collectors of the public rents, and which appears to have been originally settled for the entire list of such officers, throughout Bengal, at 3,26,250 rupces. But it was to serve in detail, as a fixed proportional standard for rating the several subdivisions of the country, classed under the head of khalsa and jageer, circars, pergunnahs or zemindaries, thus to make all the parts correspond with the ascertained whole; yet it was by no means to preclude the liberality of government, to make up the unavoidable losses of the peasantry, no more than to limit in perpetuity the just demands of the state, in lieu of further improvements over the same extent of ground; or a more perfect knowledge of frontier districts, hitherto only partially explored, or new annexations of neighbouring territory, in addition to the old. On the contrary, there were small sufficient diminutions allowed constantly to be made from the gross rental, as set forth in the tulkhees jumabundy, or net settlement, concluded annually with the farming landholders, on account of the damages sustained by extraordinary drought, inundation, war, pestilence or famine, calamities always to be reckoned on, in the more intemperate regions of Asia; as in like manner, there were increased exactions for the favourable contingencies before-mentioned, though these became only of public notoriety, or were realized to the royal treasury at distant periods, in proportion to the virtue of the local administration, being for the most part, intermediately appropriated by the ruling delegates from Delhi, as a special private perquisite of office.

Accordingly, when Rajah Man Singh, on being appointed the emperor Akbar's lieutenant in Bengal, and director to the young prince Khukero, vested in the government of the newly conquered province of Orissa, towards the close of his grandfather's reign, had considerably increased the revenue of the former foubah, by the conquest of the maritime country of Bhatti, near the mouth of the Ganges, and by levying a tribute from Luchinawarin, then sovereign of Cooch Behar, it does not appear that the advantages gained, were even formally accounted for to the state. For that they did not really enhance the public income, in those early days of the Mogul dominion is not to be wondered at, when it is considered, that the ordinary established rental of the whole country was then almost entirely absorbed, actually or fraudulently, in jageers, and protecting the sea-coasts from the ravages of the Moggs or Arakaners, aided by the Portuguese, who inhabited the port of Chatgong, and settlement at Houghly. Such was the reduced state of the revenue in Jehangeer's time, that an agreement to pay into the exchequer 10 lacks of rupces per annum, in full of the man whole administration proved him to be, in every other respect, destitute of the requisite qualifications for the office; and in 1638, in the reign of the emperor Shah Jehan, when the take advantage of the internally distracted powerless state of the neighbouring territory of Bengal, and increase the measure of its misfortunes by a hostile descent from their boats, which sailed down the river Burrampooter, there is reason to believe, that not a rupee was paid into the royal treasury at Delhi; though doubtless, notwithstanding the distresses and comparative poverty of the country at that period, the delegates themselves, reaped an ample harvest from the yearly produce of the lands, or in the general dissipation of the public wealth. It was at this crisis therefore, to restore the rights with the expiring authority of government, that Sultan Sujah was appointed viceroy of the foubah; which he held during the remainder of his father's reign, for twenty succeeding years, except an interruption of two, when jealousy occasioned his recall to court, though effectively only to evince the importance of his services, by soon rendering his reinstatement in office highly necessary. In the long period of this prince's administration, he introduced a very essential reform in all the

the departments of state, but more especially the financial; of which, proof is to be found in the records of history, as well as in the figured accounts of that time, shewing an enlargement of the king's receipts, far beyond the recovery of former defalcations. It does not appear, however, that there was any deviation from the original principle, in rating the lands, as established by Toomel Mull; yet the number, extent and valuation of the several territorial divisions underwent so great a change, that though the ancient denomination of Toomar Jumma was still retained to express the amount of the new rent-roll, the gross and fractional sums of the latter were largely increased, and in fact exhibited an entirely different statement of the annual revenue. All the particulars of this second more regular assessment, are now perhaps irrecoverably lost; but the total rental of the country, in its then distribution into circars and pergunnahs, we shall here state under the title of

IMPROVED JUMMA TOOMARY of Sultan Sujah, as settled in the year 1658, on the deposition of his father Shah Jehan, and the accession of his brother Alemgeer to the throne of Hindostan;—34 circars subdivided into pergunnahs, 1350 rated for S^r R^e 1,31,15,907.

Khalfa, annexation of new territory, in 15 circars additional to the 19 already enumerated, dismembered from the foubah of Orissa, then divided into 13 circars, of which six were included in the ancient one of Jellahir, under the following heads, to be here considered only as so many portions of each division respectively, taken chiefly from the maritime border of this province, in a curve from Mundelgaut to the Bunder of Balasore, apparently for the purpose of subjecting the whole coast, liable to the invasion of the Moggs, to the same royal jurisdiction of the Nowarah, or admiralty of boats stationed always at Dacca.

33rd.—PESHCUSII, or fixed tribute levied from the districts of Bishenpore, Pachet, Chunderconah, &c. on the western frontiers of Circar Madarun, being part of the jungly country of Jeharcund, subject to petty zemindars of the Rajepoot tribe, who were probably vassals of the great rajahs of Bahar until the extinction of the latter race in the person of Chentamun, towards the middle of the 16th century, when Shere Khan made himself master of the principal fortress of Rhotas.

The petty chiefs of Bishenpore pretend to have conquered this district near 1100 years since, and show a genealogical table minutely exact in names and time, tracing their descent, in regular uninterrupted succession, down to the actual representative of the family; in like manner, as the Hindoo sovereigns of Hindostan were wont to do, from the commencement of the Kally Jogue, or the Mahomedan princes, from the æra of the universal deluge. The claim to antiquity, however, set up by these zemindars, may be very well founded; for about the period referred to, there is some reason to believe, that a revolution introductory of the Bramin religion, and the sway of new rulers happened, at least, in that part of Bengal where the native inhabitants were budofites, or wholly uncivilized, as indeed may be still said of them, being chiefly of the tribe of chuars or robbers, of a swarthy black, like the neighbouring mountaineers on the N. and W. supposed to be the aborigines of the country; and though now for the most part received as converts to the blood-aborring established system of Hindoo faith, are classed among those who continue to follow the savage custom of offering human sacrifices to their Bowanny, or female deity named Kally. Mr. Holwell, and after him, the Abbé Reynal, drew so flattering a picture of the simplicity, pure manners, regular and equitable government which prevailed among the inhabitants of this little canton, until within these few years past, that the latter writer could not but entertain doubts himself, of the existence of a state which seemed to realize the fable of the golden age; as it was a contrast to the situation, and a living political satire on the pretended refinement, of all modern societies. But we presume to say, after a more intimate local knowledge since acquired of the country, that these characteristical traits, applied to Hindostan in general, were by no means the unauthorized sketches of a poetical fancy, no more than of a mind wholly deluded by ideal schemes of human felicity. The natives of India universally, with the fewest possible animal wants, bloodless in their disposition, patient probationary sufferers under the severest despotism, founded with them apparently in nature, or rendered supportive by the religious doctrine of transmigration, are at once the most passively happy, submissive, timid, inoffensive, orderly, and easiest to be controuled, perhaps, of any race of people in the world. If any exceptions to the contrary now occur, they will be found in the small compass of time and place of European administration, through the necessary diffusion and weakness of a divided government, which may have unhinged the ruling system of ages, by the tyranny of forcing men in habits of slavery to receive the partial blessings of freedom, though to them the greatest curse, as necessarily degenerating in an ungrateful soil, to the wildest licentiousness and anarchy, or which may have annihilated the very existence of sovereignty with the idea of its unity, in placing the sword in the hands of one, the sinews of war in those of a second, the balance of justice with a third, all claiming for separate, independent powers of each other; while the true, effective, absolute sway over the persons and property of the people at large, is committed, against all the principles of humanity, reason, law, policy and justice, to the charge of a small junto of native collectors, mistaken for princes and hereditary proprietors of lands, the most barbarously ignorant and depraved of their species, being as tyrannically oppressive to their inferiors, forming the great mass of useful subjects to the state, as they are themselves abject slaves to superior

* The name of Sunderbund, hath also been derived from that of Soondery, with which the territory abounds; and with more learned ingenuity, from two Sanscrit words, Soonder beautiful, and Bund woods or jungle. But we adhere to our own etymology rather, because the place was probably known and named before its growth of wood; and when in its primitive state, the effect of the tides in forming sand banks at the several mouths of the Ganges might have been observed, as is reasonable to suppose, from its being always included under the local description of Bhatti, with all the neighbouring low lands overflowed by the tides; also, because however beautiful these woods might now appear to an ingenious poetical fancy, as they were rarely traversed, being for the most part an impenetrable thicket, or if sometimes partially explored in the pilgrimages of cold and timid Bramins, it must be under a sentiment of terror in meeting beasts of prey, which would suggest a different epithet to beautiful; but above all, because the richest and greatest parts of the Sunderbunds, is still comprized in the ancient zemindary pergunnah of Chunder deep, or lunar territory.

superior authority, especially when employed in the basest schemes of corruption, or mercilefs depredation on the private property of individuals, unprotected and incapable of making any hostile resistance. Nor are we to be surprized that the chuars of Bishenpore, under the influence of so mild a religion as the Bramin, more than the Marhattah plunderers of the Decan, the least zealous of its sectaries; or the Bedouins of Arabia, who scarcely feel the restraints of any form of divine law, should respect the rules of hospitality among themselves, observe good faith with strangers, who solicit and pay for personal protection in passing through their country, or show the most profound veneration for the despotic chief, by yielding implicit obedience to his civil ordinances: for it is only in respect to the inhabitants of neighbouring states enemies, or as acting from a principle of necessity, to gratify natural wants, always so slender in Hindostan, that such people can truly merit the epithets of savage, or robber, with which they have been, and are still usually distinguished.

At the same time that Bengal was thus assessed for one crore and thirty-one lacks of rupees, including an increase of 24 lacks on the aulil jumma of Toorel Mull, the neighbouring soubah of Orissa, after the dismemberment of the districts of Hejellee, &c. as before stated, on the north, of Kulling or Cicacole and Rajamundry on the south, as belonging to the great Decanny province of Hyderabad, was yet rated in the king's books 13 circars of 224 pergunnahs, yielding an established rental of 35,71,025; of which, after deducting jagheers, about one half, or, to be more exact, 16,58,816 rupees, entered annually into the account of receipts of the royal exchequer at Delhi. The net income or crown revenue of Bengal, therefore, appears to have been considerably more than such proportion of the gross produce of the lands there; for, of the general assessment of this soubah, near two-thirds, or, as ascertained more precisely after deduction of the usual allowance of muscoorat, or petty Mofussil disbursements, sicca rupees 86,19,247 were yearly realized to the state, clear of all charges of provincial government, whether civil, military, or naval. But, besides the stated sovereign dues, it may be supposed, that, even at this early period, very considerable collections were levied throughout the interior districts, under the authority or in behalf of the nazim and his inferior officers; for, at this time, the extraordinary spring; and extended its influence to agriculture and manufactures. Commerce felt its invigorating spring; and the arts of necessity and luxury. A country therefore, dreaded for its noxious climate, or considered as a place of of banishment, was now resorted to from the allurements of wealth and ease; even the predatory warfare of the Portuguese, accelerated its growing prosperity: for as the mutual sources of supply; so, when peace was restored, trade flourished with fresh vigour, from the united effect of enlarged internal circulation, and the quickened emulation of many additional rival competitors, from the same objects of private gain. It would be impossible, however, as it would be useless at this distance of time, to ascertain, with tolerable accuracy, the most constant and best authorized sources of the secret emoluments of the provincial delegates, such as the profits on jagheers bestowed with territorial jurisdictions; fines and confiscations of property by judicial sentence; nuzzeranah, or presents on the greater yearly festivals; investiture of honorary or efficient employments; and, above all, on the renewal of zemindarry fannuds, which became necessary as often as the demise, misconduct, or supposed riches of Indian landholders, alarming the jealous policy, and tempting the cupidity of their Mussulman despots, brought about a vacancy in the superior financial offices filled by Hindoos. But it is important here to observe, that whatever the private advantages of a nabob soubah-darry, or dewanny deputy, may have been, they reverted directly to the state, at the period of the natural or civil death of the immediate occupant; and that, as government thus ultimately participated in such individual acquirements of fortune, if not originally an accessory secretly or avowedly under the sanction of supreme authority, exercised in most cases necessarily by delegation.

However this may be, during the long and vigorous reign of Alemgeer, after the overthrow of his brother Sujah, there was no formal acknowledged improvement made in the revenues of Bengal, except what may be reckoned from the more punctual payment of rent into the royal treasury, by the general subjection of the whole country with awe of the reigning monarch, or complete reduction of Cooch Beyhar in 1660, and of Chaugong five years after, when it received the name of Islamabad. The emperor himself, for the last 25 years of his life, was personally engaged in the wars or conquest of the Decan; and having ultimately committed the management of the distant eastern provinces to his grandson Azeem ul Shan, rather as an appendage of royalty, than in the design of increasing the finances, so he never demanded more than the established rental; but, as the exigencies of the state required an exact payment of that amount, he bestowed the dewanny on a man who had recommended himself by his ability in the inferior offices, and gave an early proof of his integrity or laudable ambition in resisting, with firmness, such measures of the prince Soubahdar as seemed derogatory to the honour and interests of a sovereign, known to be equally ready to reward, as quick to discern the merit of such conduct. The person thus distinguished, was the famous Jaffier Khan, whose future administration makes the most brilliant period of the financial history of Bengal, as being the epoch of the last more useful reform in the tuckseem jumma, or distributed assessment, proportioned to the capacity of each territorial division, and serving to this day, though a circumstance unknown to the best informed natives, as the established practical rule of rating the lands in zemindarry grants, or yearly assignments of rent in tenancy; when these are given away with any degree of intelligence, or certain knowledge of what are the proper sources of revenue; what their true measured extent; what the unalienable rights of a despotic sovereignty, or the equitable political privileges flowing from thence, to the great body of industrious subjects employed in agriculture, by regular gradation, from the superior farming landholder, to the poorest ryot in the laborious occupancy of the soil.

This delegated, legislative financier, who may be said to have perfected the original standard of Toorell Mull, for ascertaining the most important desiderata of Indian government, was born of Bramin parents; and if the constitutional bias or national character of that class of Hindoos, were admitted as a proof of legitimacy, there could be no mistake in the designation of his ancestors. He possessed all their distinguishing qualities of apathy, parsimony, minuteness, cruelty short of blood or death, with the most servile submission to superiors, and on similar principles, unrelenting tyranny to dependants, incurring arbitrary displeasure. A Mussulman education served to give energy and refinement to the hereditary gifts of nature. Bought, while an infant, by Hajee Shefia, of Isfahan, he was carried to Persia, and there brought up in the Mahomedan faith, under the name of Mahomed Hadee. When death deprived him of his patron, he returned to the Decan, and was soon received into the service of Alumgeer, who honoured him first by the title of Kar Tullub Khan, with the dewanny of Hyderabad, then removed him to the same post in the soubah of Bengal, under the title of Moorshed Kooli Khan, in which he was confirmed at Ahmednagar, notwithstanding complaints of his administration preferred at the instigation of the prince Azeem ul Shan, just before the emperor's decease in the year 1707; and had throughout the whole of the succeeding reign of Bahadur Shah. On the accession of Feroz Shah to the throne of Hindostan in 1713, and consequent vacancy in the nizamat of Bengal, Jaffier Khan was enabled, by the assistance of Jaggut Seat the banker, to purchase it on very easy terms for himself, with the higher titles of Motemmu ul Moolk, Alaoudow-lah, Atid Jung; though perhaps his good fortune on this occasion, was chiefly to be attributed to the daring vigorous spirit he discovered in resisting the appointments of, and defeating the civil war of the same year, in which Jehauder Shah was deprived of empire and life by the prince, his nephew. From this period is to be dated, the entire uncontrollable administration of the finances, when united virtually in the same person, with that of the superior office office of nazim. The first effect of the change, was the removal of the seat of government in 1717, from Jehangur-nagur or Dacca, to Moorshedabad, as being more central to all the districts in general, and the former titular place of Jaffier's residence, when acting solely in the capacity of dewan; then, was completed a reform that had been some time before begun, in the improvement and expenditure of the public revenue. The royal household troops of 3,000 cavalry, being the only regular forces kept in constant pay within the province, were represented as an useless establishment, either for the purposes of defence against foreign invasion, or maintaining internal tranquillity of a country where horse could not be brought to act, by reason of the lowness of the soil or interfection of many rivers, excepting a few places to the west of the Ganges. By the reduction of this corps, which was in fact annihilating one of the great imperial checks in curbing the ambition of the delegate, together with a transfer of some Bengal jagheers to the neighbouring soubah of Orissa, a saving of 10 lacks of rupees was brought to the credit of the khalsa portion of yearly rent; and, in addition to the profits thus economically acquired, a clear positive gain of 11½ lacks more was realized to the royal exchequer, or annexed as a perpetual increase to the former rent-roll, in consequence of a hustabood investigation set on foot solely throughout the inter-rent-districts, and chiefly in that of Satgong, for the purpose of ascertaining or equalizing the established proportional assessment. These various reforms were accordingly included in the JUMMA KAUMIL TOOMARY, or more perfect standard account of the imperial revenues of Bengal, as ultimately settled by the Nabob Jaffier Khan, in the fourth year of the reign of Mahomed Shah, corresponding with 1135 of the Hegirah, 1128 Fustillee Bengaleh, and 1722 of the Christian era, (being only 35 years prior to the real British conquest of the country, or 44 preceding its complete formal acquisition, under the titles of Ceded and Dewanny Lands) the whole newly arranged in 13 chucklehs, or large divisions of territory, constituting an equal number of separate soubahdarry and aumildarry zelahs, or civil and military jurisdictions compounded of the 34 ancient districts of circars, which nevertheless were still to be distinguished, and comprizing thenceforth, by minuter subdivisions of old pergunnahs, the increased number of 1660 of that denomination, serving as so many necessary ascertained portions of the soubah in rental and extent, to rate the whole, as well as the indefinite variable distributions of included land in jagheer and zemindarry holdings; viz.

1st.—BUNDER BALASORE, including the port and adjacent lands in the Kismut or divided Circars of Rumneh, Butteh and Muscoory, dismembered from the soubah of Orissa, and annexed to Bengal in the reign of Shah Jehan as before set forth, since again, about the year 1750, for the most part restored to the former province, but originally comprized in Jaffier Khan's Jumma Toomary account of the latter, and rated - - - - - Mhals 17 - - - - - Rs. 1,08,876

3^d.—MOORSHEDABAD, consisting of a large portion of the circars of Oudember, Jennetabad, Barbeckabad, Shereefabad and Mehmoodabad; few pergunnahs of Satgong; almost the whole of darul zerb or mint duties, together with the fair of Chunacolly, &c. In all, forming that part of the Ranny Bowanny's zemindarry, properly called Rajeshahy, and extending over most of the fertile islands of Cossimbuzar, two-thirds of Beerbhoom, two fifths of Oukerah; the whole of Tuttehing, Assidnagar, Satfykeh, &c. on the west of the Ganges, with Bokunpoor, Lushkerpoor and Chundlai, &c. east of that river - - - - - pergh^{ts} 118 - - - 29,99,126

Hence also we discover, that the famous established rent-roll, technically understood by the Persian terms jumma toomary, now in current use, or indispensibly necessary throughout Bengal, in granting zemindary fannuds, ascertaining all fiscal divisions of lands, and, above all, in equalizing on the several districts any new demands of revenue, as well as judging of the equity of the old, is not that original amount framed by Toorel Mull, and specified in the aryaen akberry, as ignorantly believed to this moment by the native officers of government, or designedly imposed by them on the credulity of others; but a repeatedly enlarged, corrected, practical scheme of the finances, improved at different periods by actual surveys, hustabood accounts, or particular local investigations in course of near a century and a half, down to the expiration of almost a third of the present; and exhibiting perhaps one of the most recent, accurately minute, regular, authoritative, proportional standard assessments of territory, that hath been formed and still existing in any part of the world. From this description of the rent-roll in question, our wonder will cease that so much pains should be taken to impress an idea of its being lost, to depreciate its worth, or embarrass and mislead every enquiry instituted for its discovery, by alien persons, who might heretofore alone have possessed the most authentic official copies, with the technical knowledge necessary to comprehend all the included particulars; and who, from the confusion of a change in government, or the inexperience of new rulers, could, without dread of detection, indulge a natural propensity to speculation, by converting to their own private use the princely advantages resulting from a deposit of such importance, while the secret of its value could be confined to a narrow circle of interested individuals. It is with singular satisfaction then, that here we announce its existence entire, or in detail, at least as far as seems necessary for general purposes of finance, and can give sufficient assurances of its being forthcoming, through many private or public channels, in case it should not be found among the records of the khalsa, which there may be some reason to doubt, as it hath never been recognized, used, or taken notice of under any husbandry, conducted with intelligence, industry or good fortune. But however this may have been, by personal address, and anticipating the wants or desire of the sovereign representative, in paying large douceurs over and above his current revenue, he enjoyed the annual special privilege of administering internally his own district, without being subject like the other zemindars, to either bustabood investigations, or the immediate controul of a Mussulman amildar. Nor did these extraordinary exemptions cease entirely before the year 1757, when a new revolution having strengthened the efficient powers of government, and politically increased the public expenses, through the necessity of maintaining a regular standing military establishment, it was found expedient to resume the equitable, indispensable rights of royalty, by bringing into the exchequer the ascertained surplus exactions levied from the country by the farming collector, and hitherto fraudulently kept for his proper use. Originally this zemindary, exclusive of jageers, consisted of pergunnahs 89, yielding 4,62,964.

4.—NUDDAH, properly OUKERAN, and more recently called Kishenagar, from the propensity of Indian landholders to derange the ancient established system of government, ascertaining their own relative situation, and hence attribute princely consequence to themselves, by deriving local designations from their proper names, was originally bestowed, in the beginning of this century, on Ragooram, a Bramin, descended from Bobanund, the first conspicuous man of the family, distinguished by the title of Mujumdar, as holding the office of temporary substitute, recorder of the jumma, or rental of the circar of Satgong. The district, though large and wonderfully fertile in all the dearer productions of Indian soil, capable of an easy, quick transportation, by the river Houghly, to all the great foreign settlements in Bengal, hath yet, from the tolerated corrupt practice of zemindary defalcations, heightened, in the present instance, by fraudulent alienations of lands, or exemption in the payment of the established dues of government in favour of inferior brother members of the same religious cast, ever remained prodigiously under-rated in the general assessment of the province, and in the proportional one of the Ausil Toomary, only set down - - - - -

5.—BEERBHOOM, the largest Mussulman zemindary in Bengal, was originally conferred by Jaffier Khan, on Affid Ullah, father of Beddi ul Zeman, of the Afghan or Patan tribe, allowed to settle here after the expulsion of Shere Shah and his descendants, for the political purpose of guarding the frontiers on the west, against the incursions of the barbarous Hindoos of Jharoond, by means of a warlike Mahomedan peasantry, entertained as a standing militia, with suitable territorial allotments under a principal landholder, not less attached to the interests of the state from motives of religion, than inimical to all unbelievers of the same superstitious faith. This district, therefore, though granted under the same written forms generally; was yet held by a tenure different to any other known in the country. In some respects, it corresponded with the ancient military fiefs of Europe, in as much as certain lands were held lakheraje, or exempted from the payment of rent, and to be solely appropriated for the maintenance of troops. This privilege, in its nature temporary, being afterwards resumed in the time of Cosim Ali, as having been found entirely subversive of the sovereign authority under preceding mussulman administrations, and inconsistent with present exigencies, or a more vigorous, intelligent system of government, requiring the sword to be kept unparticipated in the hands of the ruling power, brought a considerable accession of territorial income, under the denomination of Kesfyet, into the soubahdary treasury, erroneously supposed to have arisen entirely from an increased rental on a hustabood of lands, already sufficiently assessed, throughout the country at large. Accordingly the zemindary, in its original extent of rated ground, did not exceed one-third of its present estimated jurisdiction; though the included divisions of pergunnahs, are still nominally the same, being only 22, and yielding - - - - -

6.—CALCUTTA, lands formerly held by many petty talookdars under the jurisdiction of Mahomed Shereef, and since constituting the zemindary of the East India Company, conferred in jageer on Lord Clive, at the original valuation of pergunnahs 27 - 2,22,958.

7.—BISHENPOOR, comprized in the chuckleh of Burdwan, and surrounded by the districts of the great zemindary of this name, of Midnapoor in Orissa and Pacheat, is affirmed to have been the inheritance of a Rajepoot family for 1,021 years, under a regular succession of 55 rajahs, and only subject to a small peheush or tribute to the sovereign of Bengal, until the year 1715, soon after the commencement of Jaffier Khan's administration, when the country was more completely reduced, though yet imperfectly explored, and conferred again in zemindary tenure on Gopaul Sing, the heir of line, assessed under the head of - - - - -

8.—YUSEFPOOR, comprehending almost the whole of the modern province of Jessore, as described by Rennell, when originally conferred, at the beginning of this century, on Kishenram, of the koyt cast, having then included within its jurisdiction, the recently dismembered pergunnahs zemindary of Saidpour, rated separately at 45,805, but together reckoned - - - - -

9.—LUSHKERPPOOR, the small fertile zemindary, rich in the production of raw silk, &c. opposite to the island of Cossimbazar, on the eastern bank of the Ganges, and altogether enclosed in the zemindary jurisdiction of Rajeshahy, granted in the first instance to Anoopnarrain, a Bramin, though since unequally divided into two portions of 10½ and 5½ annas or sixteenths, after deducting the pergunnah of Tahrpoor, originally included, but long since dismembered from this district, was composed of pergunnahs 15, - rated - 1,25,516.

10.—ROKINPOOR, formed the large, of unknown extent, though doubtlessly the richest zemindary of equal dimensions, throughout Bengal; being the jurisdiction originally, but very improperly and unconstitutionally assigned to Shaw Narrain, canongoe or register of all the lands of the soubah, either as matter of special favour, or more probably as a favour all the lands of the soubah, either as matter of special favour, or more probably as a favour for the lesser portion assigned to him of the rusloom, or usual commission of 2½ per cent. on the revenue, when this emolument of office came to be divided unequally between the two branches of the same family, for the political purpose of creating rivalry, and by that means, the lessening the power of either to abuse the highest confidential trust under government. The nature and acquisition of this district, afford a remarkable instance of the propensity of man-kind, to act alike under similar circumstances; it is dispersed over the greatest part of Bengal, in the minutest divisions of lands, taken from different zemindaries. These scarcely sensible dismemberments, could not be regularly assessed, as their proportioned dimensions were never ascertained; at the same time, they might be secretly enlarged by collusion, through the official influence of public registers, appointed solely and expressly to controul the conduct of landholders; while they were sure of being exempted, unless very partially, from any bustabood investigations, which were always difficult, seldom occurring in the same period of time beyond the limits of a single chuckleh, and perhaps not there repeated twice, in half a century. Acting under such temptations, and with equal unchecked authority, we have seen in the case of the chief ferishtedar, interpreter or dewan of the Mafulipatam division of the N. Circars in 1767, from pieces of ground too insignificant to be worthy mention, discovered here and there, from every landed jurisdiction in the province of Rajemundry, that a princely estate of near £. 20,000. a year was, in a manner imperceptibly, acquired for a quit rent of about one-eighth of that income, liquidated under the head of a monthly salary, supposed to be equivalent to the actual receipts from this extensive domain, which being artfully denominated a merassy, or inheritance passed as such, until recent re-annexation gratuitously to the many districts mutilated, to give this one substantial form. Hence also the scattered talookdary of Rajenagar, in the chuckleh of Dacca, was constituted by raja Rajeboolab, (of a different family from the present Rai Raian, of the same name) when at the head of the finances of Bengal, in the administration of Aliverdi Khan; and from a like combination of circumstances, might be deduced, the origin of many other existing zemindaries, though perhaps of less note than Rokinpoor, which from the beginning constituted of in whole or subdivided pergunnahs 62, - - - - - assessed for - 2,42,943.

11.—MAHMOOD SHAHY, in the chuckleh of Boosnah, indifferently situated, and poor in production, comparatively with the adjacent but threefold larger territory of Neldy, dependent on Rajeshahy, was conferred subsequently to the year 1722, on Ramdeo, a Bramin, comprehending, besides jageers, pergunnahs 29 - - - - - 1,10,633.

12.—FUTTENSING, originally a single compact jurisdiction, advantageously situated on the Bagrutty or Cossimbazar river, a little to the southward of Moorshedabad, was conferred on Herry Persaud, a Bramin, for which reason, and on account of a number of small unsurveyed talooks carved out of it; lands since perhaps prodigiously improved in fact, may be deemed formally on the decline, by gradual diminution of the yearly rental. The first funuds were for pergunnahs 11 - - - - - rated - 1,86,421.

13.—EDRACKPOOR, composed of what is described, in Rennell's Atlas, as the province of Ghorahgaut, has sometimes been annexed in the annual settlements with Dinagepoor, and more recently Rungpoor, but held always as a separate zemindary, by the family of Bilhenahit, a koyt, the original grantee - - - - - pergunnahs 60 - - - - - 81,975.

14.—TIPPERAH, the extensive most eastern zemindary of Bengal, south of Sylhet, for the most part barbarous, poor and uncultivated, abounding in wild elephants, and constituting the reign of Shah Jehan, from the heritable possessors of the family of Manick, and constituted the circar of Odeypoor, the then capital of the district, about 25 miles east from Comilah. In 1135 A.B. this jurisdiction, composed of pergunnahs 4, afterwards subdivided into 24 when reconquered under the head of Roshenabad, was rated originally altogether, for rupees 92,993, exclusive of Daodpoor, which continued to be annexed to the chuckleh of Jehangeernagar. But from this sum is to be deducted the amount of jageers for 45,000 rupees to be separately stated, and then allowed to the son of Ram Manick for himself, or to defray the expense of catching elephants; leaving for the khalsa portion of rent only - - - - - 47,993.

15.—PACHEET, the large and most westerly zemindary of Bengal, on the same parallel with the foregoing, but rather more productive in all the necessities of life; bounded by Chutea, Nagpoor and Ramgur, the southern districts dependent on the soubah of Bahar: being imperfectly reduced, like the adjoining territory of Bishenpoor, from another Rajepoot family, of the name of Goorp-Narrain, was at first in great part only subject to a fixed peheush on account of - - - - - pergunnahs 1 - - - - - rated at 18,203.

TOTAL Jumma Bundobust Toomary, or standard yearly assessment of Khalsa lands, included in the fifteen larger zemindaries, or territorial jurisdictions of Bengal—still continued to be arranged, under so many undivided heads of districts, in the annual settlement, concluded with the like number of single landholders, either personally or by their representatives, and composed, as by the foregoing particulars of perg^{na}s 615 - - - - - yielding 65,22,111

JUMMA

JUMMA TOOMARY TESHKHEES of 1135 A. B. carried forward.

JAGEER. Assignments of Territory for the support of the civil and military establishment of the whole Soubah, exclusive of the foregoing Khalfa appropriation, from which was derived only the net effective revenue annually paid into the royal exchequer.

1st. CIRCAR ALL, the viceregal establishment of the nazim or foubahdar of the three imperial provinces of Bengal, Bahar and Orissa, to defray a large portion of the military expenses of government, the whole of the nabob's household in his public and private capacity, together with the greater part of the civil list charges, inclusive of those usually incurred in the foudjardary or high court of criminal judicature. The lands originally thus appropriated, extended in 296 entire or broken pergunnahs, over 21 of the 34 circars, into which the whole country was divided. They were certainly the richest and most productive of the foubah, one-half being situated in the province of Dacca or Hejelleh, and the remainder distributed in Jessore, Rajshahy, Kishenagur, or Dinagepour, and continued altogether invariably under the separate independent management of the nazim formally, without having been subjected to any additional dewanny assessment for the full space of a century, after the revolution in the value of specie, from the discoveries of America, &c. until the important era of British sovereignty in 1765. At this time, the auzil jumma toomary of the whole jageer, and a large towfeer, or jageerdary proportional increase on the former established rental, were incorporated with the khalfa revenue, under the same zemindary jurisdictions; though the amount entire, was unaccountably sunk, embezzled, or collusively withheld from the state. All the scattered valuable territories producing this princely income, to support the amaret, command and dignity of 7,000 horse, constituting the highest establishment allowed to any subject of the empire, were estimated in the king's books at the jumma reckmy, or written account, rupees 16,05,693, being the supposed actual receipts of the jageer at that time, but rated like all other lands at the standard assessment or toomary, for several perfected divisions, which if united might form - - - pergunnahs 60 - - - R^s 10,70,465.

2.—BUNDEH WALLAH BARGAH, designation of the dewanny delegate of the crown; under which, was enjoyed for personal or official charges, including a munsub of 4,000, with the command of 2,500 horse, the extensive fertile districts of Baherbund and Bhitrbund, with almost an equal portion of the modern province of Rungpoor since, with natural Hindoo conformity to the ancient usage, acquired by an English dewan in zemindary tenure, and then held billa sherret or mulhroot, in 97 broken pergunnahs, estimated according to the reckmy account at rupees 2,92,500; but assigned at the established rental of - - - - - pergunnahs 20 - - - R^s 1,46,250.

3. AMEER UL OMRAH, bukhshi, or commander in chief of the empire, then in the person of Sumiam ul Dowlah Khan Dowrah, acting by his delegates Moshuffier and Aihref Khan, in Bengal; to whom was assigned, for private maintenance in a munsub of 6,500, denominated zatee or personal, and to support a command of 2,650 horse, a large extent of territory, calculated at the jumma reckmy of 3,37,500 rupees, supposed to proceed from its 63 component parts, situated chiefly in the Delta of Bengal, and with more policy, throughout the frontier provinces of Dacca, Sylhet, or Curry-Barry, &c. to give a special interest to the military commandant in the safety of the districts most exposed to depredation. The kishmuts, or territorial divisions included in this jageer, may be reduced in number, as they were in rental, to the standard assessment of - - - - - pergunnahs 18 - - - R^s 2,25,000.

4. FOUJEDARAN, the territorial assignments for the civil and military expenses of inferior nabobs, or deputies in the government, of the five great frontier provinces of Bengal; viz.

(1) MOORSHED KOOLI KHAN, Naib of Dacca, chiefly conditional jageers, for the establishment of the Nabut foubahdary of Jehangeer-nagur, the provincial garrisons, under the denomination of Tannahjat, with the daroghagee or superintendency of the topekhaneh or artillery; and nowarras or fleet of boats. The lands appropriated for these different services, all lying with great impolicy in the special jurisdiction of the foudjedar, were scattered in 60 pergunnah fragments, valued at the reckmy amount of 2,40,750, but reduced to the proportional standard of pergunnahs 11 - 1,00,145.

(2) SHUMSHERE KHAN, and four other subordinate officers in the foudjardary of Sylhet, holding, almost in two equal divisions, billa sherret and mulhroot jageers, for the defence of that province, within its proper jurisdiction, excepting about a seventh part held in Rajemhal; reckmy 4,30,000 rupees, rated at the established rent of - - - small pergunnahs 48 - - - Rup^s 1,79,166.

(3) SAYF KHAN, governor and jageerdar unconditionally, for the greater part of the rich province of Poorneah, at the reckmy jumma 2,70,280, reduced to standard assessment of pergunnahs 9, 1,80,166.

(4) MUNOOCHER KHAN, a conditional jagheer for the foudjardary of Ghora-Ghaut, assigned from the lands of Rungpoor - - - - - pergunnahs 3 - - - 16,666.

(5) ALIVERDI KHAN, afterwards foubahdar of Bengal, &c. but then only foudjedar, and jageerdar of Rajemhal and Telliagurry - - - - - pergunnahs 4 - - - 16,666

TOTAL Jageers of the greater Foudjedars - - - - - pergunnahs 75 - - - 4,92,800

5.—MUNSUBDARAM, petty territorial assignments to twenty-one individuals, severally holding inferior rank or offices of trust, throughout the foubah, the generality of them, under the degree of five hundred zatee, and obliged to perform military services personally, when required to do so, by the nazim, with each a small established number of followers. The lands thus appropriated, were chiefly in the provinces of Sylhet, Dacca, Hejelleh and Rajemhal, estimated at - - - - - pergunnahs 20 - - - 1,10,852.

6. - ZEMINDARAN, Fiefs in the nature of conditional jageers, conferred on the four frontier landholders of Tipperah, Muchwah, Soofing and Telliagurry pafs, within their respective jurisdictions - - - - - pergunnahs 2 - - - 49,750.

7. MEDDED-MASH, subsistence to religious and learned men, throughout Bengal, in small allotments of land, chiefly in Burdwan or Rajemhal, near the seminaries of Pandua or Pirruah - - - - - pergunnahs 7 - - - 25,665.

8. SALIANADARAM, annual allowances to zemindars and others, chiefly in the province of Sylhet - - - - - pergunnahs 9 - - - 25,927

9. ENAM AL TUMGHA, the only heritable grant of lands known in Bengal, conferred on two moolvies, or doctors, learned in the Mussulman law - - - - - pergunnahs 1 - - - 2,127

10. ROOZINADARAN, for a small talook in Lushkerpoor, in lieu of the pecuniary allowance of a mulla - - - - - - - - - 337.

TOTAL of lesser grants of territory to Munsubdars, &c. on different tenures, as specified - - - - - pergunnahs 39 - - - R^s 2,14,718.

11. OMLEH NOWAREH,—Naval establishment of 768 armed cruizers and boats principally stationed at Dacca, to guard the coasts of Bengal against the incursions of the Moggs and other foreign pirates or invaders. The whole expense of manning the fleet, including the wages of 923 Fringuan or Portuguese sailors, was estimated monthly at rupees 29,282, which, with constructing new vessels and repairing the old, amounted annually to rupees 8,43,452, levied altogether from 112 entire or broken pergunnahs, appropriated for this special purpose, chiefly in the chuckleh of Jehangeernagur, and composing a great part of the richest, most productive lands of that great province, in 99 of the forementioned territorial divisions, yielding at least four-fifths of the whole assigned rental; while the inconsiderable remaining portion was mostly drawn from the district of Sylhet. But from the sum total here specified, is to be deducted a peshcush of 50,433 rupees, paid by some of the neighbouring frontier zemindars, for lands not rated in the king's books as the property of the crown, with 14,065 more for loss of exchange, &c. and then the net standard assessment will stand - - - - - Pergunnahs 55 - - - Rup^s 7,78,954

12. OMLEH AHSHAM—Establishment of 8,112 troops, with artillery for guards and garrisons of the eastern frontier provinces, maintained from the territorial income of lands thus appropriated in jageer, within each respective jurisdiction; viz.

SECOND PERIOD.

ABWAB SOUBAHDARRY.

THE Circumstances which gave rise to the viceregal territorial assessments, now to be stated in addition to the original crown rent of Bengal, and set forth in the preceding section, have been occasionally touched on, both in this and our former treatise on Indian finance, introduced in the Political Survey of the Northern Circars. To enter into a minuter detail of the subject, or to exhibit all the proofs and illustrations which might be required to demonstrate facts, or vindicate opinions so contrary to prevalent ill-founded belief, is by no means our present intention. The task would be laborious and infinite, while the true history and actual state of men and things in this country, continue involved in such obscurity, or while the Persian MSS. authorities proper to be referred to on these interesting topics, besides being enveloped in the difficulties of a foreign language, only exist in the hands of a few individuals, with whom great part may otherwise be rendered useless, from want of a technical knowledge of Eastern finance; and while the more enlightened statesmen of our own nation who have been in India, could overlook the effects of a political event of the greatest notoriety, in adopting sentiments so contradictory to universal experience in all other parts of the world, as to suppose for a moment, that during a period of two centuries elapsed from the institution of the original toomary jumma of Akber in 1582, in course of which the newly discovered treasures of America were poured so abundantly into Hindostan through the multiplied channels of European traffick round the Cape, there hath not been, particularly in the great commercial province of Bengal, a prodigious influx of specie, which occasioning a diminution in the original standard value of this universal medium of exchange, produced inevitably by the same operation, a nominal increase in the price of manufactures, of the necessities of life and of labour, requiring ultimately a further proportional demand of territorial revenue to answer the factitiously enlarged exigencies of government. We shall therefore here content ourselves simply with observing, that the necessity of accumulated assessments on the lands of this country, constituting generally the only source of public income, appears as evident, as the extraordinary cause which gave it birth, must be deemed in every respect sufficient to authorize such additional pecuniary levies from the people, as far as they have been at any former time, are or may be still realized, to the state; though without doubt the mode of exaction by zemindarry jurisdictions, introduced by Jaffier Khan, but only properly established in the government of his successor Sujah, towards the 30th year of the present century, was in its principle irregular, unconstitutional, and in its operation productive of the worst effects, being no less injurious to the sovereign rights than highly oppressive to the whole body of peasantry, as well as destructive to general population, the arrangement, good government, or peaceful prosperity of the community at large; yet perhaps greatly short, in the amount of the rightful, original stipulated dues of the exchequer, when stated as they ought, at one-fourth of the gross produce of the soil.

To those who are only acquainted with the rudiments of political knowledge, the want of some ascertained fixed standard to limit the annual public supplies, to the true occasional exigencies of the state, as well as to proportion such demand equitably, on the whole country and its subdivisions, according to the extent, capacity, circumstances of the land, or agreeable to the local state of commerce and manufactures, yielding further internal sources of revenue; must appear at once embarrassing and alarming. But to such as are most skilled in the science of Eastern finance, and whose attention alone we are ambitious now to engage, if they could at any time have admitted the fact, either of such a deficiency originally, or subsequently through the confusion and loss arising on Cossim Ali's expulsion from Bengal; it would have been considered a misfortune of the most deplorable nature, attended with increasing inward disorders leading to inevitable ruin, unless timely checked by some powerful expedients. Accordingly, it is to a sense of this want, we are to ascribe the measures pursued or proposed, under the most enlightened administrations of our own days and nation in India, to investigate, ascertain or establish, the first grand principles of every well-regulated system of finance definable, permanent agency with settled forms of management, and a fixed proportional standard assessment, acquired from a positive valued gross rental of the country on a medium of many years, or to be formed by comparative views of past collections, progressively from the earliest records extant, as long as the influence of unforeseen extraordinary events continued to produce great successive alterations nominally in the bulk of revenue, though perhaps with a really diminished weight of burthen on the people. Such were the circumstances that gave birth to the intelligent well-directed plan of supervision in 1769, which if perseveringly executed as ably and vigorously commenced, would at least, have exhibited the chicanery and corruption of interested natives, or afforded sure indications of the fallacy of the financial system imposed on us, at the era of the dewanny, leading eventually practical reform; such also, were the grounds of procedure or proposed objects of the committee of circuit in 1773, by the well-intentioned, though ineffectual, destructive measure of letting the lands by public sale to the highest bidders, in violation of the constitutional forms of zemindarry agency; in consequence of which which, a number of needy temporary farmers let loose on the country, and no less ignorant of the value of their territorial trusts than the sovereign landholders themselves, were compelled to compromise expected benefits for a small douceur, in the nature of a private fine, for reinstatement levied from the ejected official tenants, who of course were to be indemnified by new encroachments on the rights of government; and to such, doubtless, must be attributed the native amany scheme of 1776, on one side of the question then agitated, as well as in opposition to the memorable plan of settlement already so often mentioned, of which the leading feature, on the truest principles of European policy, was a permanent moderate quit rent. Yet even the feeble lights now held out, if they could have been easily enough exposed to view, might in a great measure have saved the sad perplexity, and loss of time and expensive labour incident to so many eventually fruitless deviations from the direct simple path to all the important desiderata of financial knowledge.

At least such must be our determined belief, after having presumed in the present or a former political Treatise, submitted in like manner to ministerial consideration, to decide authoritatively on the highest possessive right of territorial property, controvert received opinions, and assign to the sovereign power in Asia that which, in Europe universally, by fiction of law or virtually, is vested in the subject. After pretending to have ascertained the fixed quota of the gross produce of the land due to the circar or prince as landlord, and shared with the ryots or labouring inferior tenants, to be the rebba chout or one-fourth, liable only to a diminution of about a tenth part of the amount of this proportion, to defray the charge of intermediate agency of the whole body of zemindars, acting permanently in one or all of the following official capacities by virtue of sunnuds or letters patent from the high dewanny delegate of government, viz. either as annual contracting farmers-general of the public rents; formal representatives of the peasantry; collectors of the royal proprietary revenue, entitled to a russoom or commission of five per cent. on the net receipts of the mofussil or subordinate treasuries; or as financial superintendants of a described local jurisdiction, periodically variable in extent, and denominated cahtiman, trust or tenure of zemindary, talookdary, or territorial servile holding in tenancy; within which however is appropriated, a certain small portion of land called nancar, partaking of the nature of a freehold, serving as a family subsistence to the superior landholder, to give him an attachment for the soil, and make up the remainder of his yearly stated tythe, for personal management in behalf of the state. But more especially such must be our firm political creed, after having indicated or brought forward a formally fixed proportional assessment of the whole country, applied practically for the first time within British knowledge, to its several financial subdivisions of territory, and traced through various progressive changes or improvement, of this famous rent roll, known by the technical persian terms of Ansil Jumma Toomary of Bengal; necessarily and constantly used in forming the annual settlements, as well as in regulating jageer or zemindary grants, from the 22d year of this century, to the very moment of the company's acquisition of the dewanny; and exhibiting, as hath already been observed, a more recent, particular, accurate, comparatively just, well proportioned standard rental, the whole to its parts, and these, to each other periodically, than perhaps at this day is to be found among the records of any existing nation, with a dominion of equal extent, in either quarter of the world. Nor are we altogether destitute of hope in being able to impress our own conviction on the minds of others, when to the display of these fundamental principles of the actual system of Mogul finance, be added a view of the temporal influence of enlarged commerce, with an extraordinary influx of specie from the American mines, authorizing an accumulated demand of annual revenue, now to be set forth under the head of Abwab Soubahdary or new perpetual imposts, levied in addition to the old established royal rental by the authority of the provincial governors, in their advancement to independence from the beginning of the present century. And when it shall be shown that it is not the extent or irregularity of these assessments, considered either in their primary magnitude or inequality, and supposed enormity of exaction in behalf of the public, at the close of Cossim Ali's administration in 1763, that are causes of complaint and real grievance to the people at large; but the subordinate, extremely disproportionate distribution of the increased amount, over unascertained territorial subdivisions, according to the arbitrary will of tyrannic zemindars, freed from every constitutional controul, through the ignorance, wilful negligence, or depravity of native superintendants, who have lost in part, could dispense with the more general use, or suppress the knowledge from their superiors of a fixed valuation of the lands so practically serviceable in every important operation of finance, as well as to check the most corrupt, inefficient personal agency.

In such hope, we proceed to remark that the extraordinary levies thus imposed on the several districts of the soubah, under the technical descriptive terms, distinguishing this Second Period of our Comparative Analysis, might be divided in respect to local extent, into general, partial, and special assessments. The first class extending universally to all the zemindary jurisdictions of Bengal, would appear to be only least oppressive, because less considerable in amount, to the dimensions and valued rental of the whole country; the second, confined to the khalsa lands of the interior chucklahs entire or broken, though of small importance comparatively to the jumma toomary of the same territory, would seem infinitely more grievous to the peasantry; and the third, applicable to jageers and such provinces as were then and may be still in part denominated frontier, however great in proportion to the standard rent roll of these districts, or the sum of each of the two other classes.

of Abwab, would be found incontrovertibly the easiest and most equitable with respect to the bulk of inhabitants, while the aggregate of the whole could be considered, if at all the burthensome, not from the weight of the original demand of government, so much as the increased unequal exactions of the zemindars, under the sanction of such authoritative imposts, of which the proportional shares were not ascertainable, in the detail of variable indefinite subdivisions of territory. But, in conformity to our general plan, we shall arrange this branch of our subject chronologically, and assign to the several soubahdars the various perpetual imposts levied on the lands or ryots, through the agency of the superior landholders, within the period of each successive administration, beginning with Jaffier Khan, as the earliest on record, in which the practice thus of assessing the country in gross, by zemindary jurisdictions, was first introduced in Bengal.

ABWAB JAFFIER KHAN.

The Nabob Motumen ul Moolk Allaou Dowlah, Jaffier Khan Bahadur, Assid Jung, may be said to have commenced his soubahdary with the antedated reign of Furrokhseer, in A. D. 1711, though he was not formally established in his government until some time after that monarch's actual accession to the throne of Delhi, two years later; and having retained possession till his death in the 9th year of Mahomed Shah, towards the end of 1158 Hegira, 1133 Bengaleh, and 1726 of the Christian era, accounted with the royal treasury, as we shall hereafter show, for the receipts of Bengal, forming the best portion of his vice-royalty, during the exact lunar period of 15 years 9 months and 3 days; in course of which, the only perpetual additional impost levied on the country and carried to public account, was that known under the head of Abwab.

1st. KHASNOVEESSY.—The origin of this most ancient soubahdary assessment was a russoom or fee, exacted from the zemindars at the renewal of their annual leases by the khalsa mutseddies, from whence the technical denomination khassnoveessy, special writers or accountants of the exchequer. The amount ascertained to have been so raised over the whole country, did not exceed rupees 1,91,095. To this, however, was added under the same head, rupees 65,511 more, being the price of gold mohers 4,679 $\frac{1}{2}$, rated at 14 rupees each, sent yearly by the nazim to the court of Delhi, as a token of homage at the usual recoinage on the anniversary of the king's accession, or nuzzeranah on occasion of other public festivals. Generally all these extra collections, it must be remembered, extended only to the khalsa portion of the lands of Bengal, which may in round numbers be stated at the ansil jumma of a crore of rupees, after deducting the amount of variable revenue; but in the present instance, besides the increase of russoom ghettery, or duty on bale goods small addition on the sayer in the article of Chunacally, in the city of Moorshedabad, exported from the panchoutra or custom-house, of Chunacally, in the city of Moorshedabad, calculated on a medium of years at rupees 2,252. Nevertheless, the aggregate of the whole, consolidated into a fixed perpetual impost from the very commencement of the present century, and continued to be levied henceforward without intermission, throughout all provinces, until the period of the company's acquisition of the dewanny, is little more than 2 $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. on the original rent roll, or precisely rupees 2,58,857, and being assessed on all zemindary jurisdictions, though with little regard to the proportion of each to the inhalgoozary of the whole soubah, and still less in respect to the subdivisions of those larger districts, among themselves; the burthen could scarcely have been felt by the peasantry, even supposing their landholders to have clandestinely tripled the amount thus authorized to be levied from them, by the order of the nazim.

But besides the fixed avowed assessment of khassnoveessy, there is undoubted proof of Jaffier Khan's having exacted temporary aids from the zemindars, under the heads of finer nuzzeranah or mahtoot; for in fact we find, as shall be shown at the conclusion of the succeeding administration, which may be said to have also terminated the Mogul sovereignty in Bengal, a much larger sum carried to credit of the imperial treasury than was collected on account of the new abwab, unless an "et cetera" annexed to this head in the statement of receipts now referred to, implies the certainty of additional unspecified imposts of a similar description. In the mean time, we venture by anticipation to assign to the soubahdary of this renowned financier as the produce of such arbitrary levies, with the larger contingent legal income arising from occasional renewals of zemindary sunnuds, an annual surplus revenue of fifteen lacs, which added to the stipulated dues of the exchequer as then established and already set forth in the jumma toomary, or its recent increase of khassnoveessy, make the net public income of that long period of famous representative government now closed, amount at least to one crore and sixty lacs of sicca rupees.

ABWAB SUJAH KHAN.

Sujah ul dien ou ul Dowlah Mahomed Khan, better known in Hindostan by the name of Mirza Daccary of Boorhanpoor, appointed successor from Delhi, in titles, honours and delegated trust of the triple vicereignty, become vacant by the demise of his father-in-law Jaffier Khan, ruled virtually from the moment when, hearing of this event, he left his nobleship of Orissa, and took charge of that of Bengal, until his death in the 20th year of Mahomed Sha's reign, 1152 Hegira, 1145 Bengaleh or A. D. 1739, including a period of 13 lunar years, of which however he only accounted with his sovereign, whose authority had latterly been annihilated in consequence of the invasion of Nader Shah, for the imperial collections of ten years 6 months and 22 days, withholding almost wholly the amount of the additional fixed assessments, levied officially in the country during his own administration, under the following heads of account, kept henceforth separately, with others others of a similar nature and more recent date in different departments of the khalsa, termed the Nizamut, in contradistinction to the royal dewanny dufter, as considered to appertain exclusively to the soubahdar or nazim; viz

2d. NUZZERANAH MOCCURRY.—fixed pecuniary acknowledgments paid by the zemindars as farmers-general of the king's revenue virtually, for improper remissions, indulgences, favour and protection; forbearance of hustabod investigations or privilege of being freed from the immediate superintendence of aumils; but ostensibly and formally, to defray the charge of nuzzers sent to court at the eyecedein or two principal yearly Mussulman festivals, and other great ceremonial days, in like manner as the jagheerdars or holders of assigned territory were, as Mahomedans, with more propriety obliged to contribute their share of the whole demand. This impost, agreeable to the universal custom of Hindostan from the remotest period of financial history in detail, must necessarily have been included in the temporary operations of Jaffier Khan; but it only became moccurrey or permanently fixed in Bengal at the beginning of Sujah's government, and being then considered a very moderate, as it was a pretty general assessment, extending to all except some of the frontier districts of the country, if it were not for the fraudulent increased exactions of the landholders, under the same administration, would now be scarcely felt by the peasantry, in its authorized original magnitude of about six and a half per cent. on the khalsa land rents, or more exactly - - - Rupees 6,48,040.

3d. ZER MAT-HOOT.—one of the most ancient locally universal imposts of this soubahdarry period, in being somewhat variable in amount, depending on the charges to be defrayed by it, and therefore wrong in principle, as liable in the first instance to abuse, may possibly have suggested to people in Europe some affinity between it, and the arbitrary taxes of maltote in France, Spain and Portugal. When the Indian assessment became a subject of British parliamentary enquiry in 1772, on the clandestine revival of it, with accumulated burthen under Mussulman management, after the acquisition of the dewanny; and indeed from some resemblance in the pronunciation of either term, as well as in the nature of the thing to be expressed, we might be led to imagine it was borrowed from the Portuguese, in their early intercourse with Bengal; though that nation originally may have derived it from the Moors or Saracens, by compounding the Arabic terms mhal to het, very significant of an oppressive exaction, levied in the East by nations, whose troops chiefly consist of cavalry, as the price of forbearance in not trampling the cultivated fields of the ryots in passing over their ground; and known more generally in Hindostan, under the denominations nuzzer sewarry, gift to riders or lalbundy, expense of shoeing their horses. But the zer, or money contribution, called mat-hoot, now in question, appears undoubtedly of Hindoo etymology, signifying literally a certain proportionable increase of a capital sum, applied technically in the present instance, to a per centage of about one and a half rupee on each hundred of the ausil jumma of the khalsa mhal, and made up of the four following component aboabs; viz.—(1st.) Nuzzer pooneah; presents exacted from the zemindars by the officers of the exchequer at the annual settlement, a second time resumed by government.—(2d.) Bhay-khelat, price of the robes bestowed at the same time, on the most considerable landholders, as tokens of yearly investiture in their offices of farmers-general of the king's rents.—(3d.) Pooshu-bundy, upholding the river banks in the vicinity of Lal-Baug and the Kellah of Moorshedabad.—(4th.) Kus-soom-peon, commission of ten annas per mil. enacted by the nazim jummadur, or head nezarut, on the treasure brought from the Mofussil. All of which thenceforward carried to the public credit, constituted a permanent additional revenue extending over the whole country, of - - - Rupees 1,52,786. 6.

4th. MAT-HOOT FEEL KHANEH, a partial contribution, in other respects similar to the last-mentioned, to defray the expense of feeding the elephants of both the nazim and dewan, kept at Moorshedabad, levied for the most part on the interior districts, in exclusion of Rokimpoor and those to the frontiers on the east and west, viz. Jellalpoor, Tiprah, Sylhet, in the former quarter, and Poorneah, Rajemhal, Beerbhoom, Bishenpoor, Pachet, in the latter; which yielding together about one fifth of the ausil jumma of the khalsa lands of the whole country, left only a fund of eighty lacks of that original rental, for the operation of the new assessment, in the proportion of nearly four per cent. amounting exactly to - - - 3,22,631.

5th. FOIJEDARRY ABWAB.—It is a mistaken notion that such imposts were in the nature of confiscations or temporary fines on personal property, and exacted by the foujedars in their judicial capacities. On the contrary, as hath already been observed, they were limited permanent assessments on the land, levied by these subordinate provincial rulers within their respective jurisdictions, on the like principle, and agreeable to the same propositional standard of the toomary, as influenced the conduct of their superiors in the Soubahdarry. Accordingly, the burthen of them, fell almost entirely on the distant frontier districts, which originally were imperfectly conquered or explored, and therefore left politically to the sway of arbitrary delegates, for the unequivocal purpose of ascertaining more accurately, or expeditiously to increase the territorial rental of the ryots, considered always as appertaining of right to the actual sovereign. These additions then of improved revenue, may be termed special, less properly in regard to local extent, comparatively with the four preceding articles described, than on account of the few heads, under which they were comprised, and in the first instance settled by chucklahs, or foujedarry and tamadarry jurisdictions, instead of, as

(1st) ATWAB, FOIJEDARRY, SYLHET, &c. included

First: A general impost on that province, which will appear great in proportion even to the whole of its original jumma, jagher and khalsa, being 5,31,455; and in truth may still exceed the actual circumstances of a distant frontier country, poor in culture, and so little benefited by commerce, that to this day revenue and merchandize are paid in cowries, as the substitute for a common medium of exchange in money; nevertheless the established increase here, brought to the credit of government in the time of Sujah Khan, and before levied by the foujedars, amounted to - - - R^s 1,59,535

Second: A very easy moderate assessment on the extended khalsa portion of the rich, large, unascertained province of Poorneah, so much improved in sovereign estimation under the vigorous administration of Seyf Khan and Aliverdi Khan, then acting under the soubahdar of Bengal - - - R^s 2,83,027

Third: A similar impost on Tiprah Roshenabad; from which however ultimately is to be deducted, R^s 87,993 (being the excess of our valuation of the district taken from Jaffier Khan's toomary settlement and that of Sujah's) when the zemindar had recovered for the most part his country and independence; for the present we state the whole foujedarry increase at - - - R^s 1,84,751

Fourth: Nikhas, a duty on horses and other cattle, brought for sale to the city of Moorshedabad - - - R^s 11,679

Fifth: Tannahjat, small garrisons or stations for subundies or other military corps in different parts of the country. Universally, wherever troops were assembled, there was a bazar or market, subject, for the sake of a regular police, to a cutwal, who held his appointment from the commandant. Retailers were licensed to vend liquors for a fee, and on account of such other articles as were to be exposed to sale, paid a certain duty. These profits, considered at first a private emolument of office, were in process of time seized by government. Such was the foundation of the tannahdarry revenue of Cutwah, amounting to - - - R^s 48,000

Rangamatty, including the kehda expense of catching elephants - - - R^s 24,000
Neldy, in Boosnah - - - R^s 24,025
Mahomed Shahy - - - R^s 10,860
And of 19 other small tannahs - - - R^s 8,848

TOTAL Abwab Foujedarry Sylhet, &c. - - - R^s 7,54,750

These extended to all the principal zemindaries or pergunnahs of the whole chuchlah, in a very minute participation of the sum total - - - R^s 19,279

(3^d) ABWAB FOIJEDARRY MOORSHEDABAD,

In like manner prevailed throughout the chucklah, and may probably, as well as the preceding article, have been levied as fines or small arbitrary taxes, if not of the nature of Tannahdarry Aboab - - - R^s 16,639

TOTAL of the Foujedarry Aboab - - - R^s 7,90,638

Under the four preceding more general heads, were comprised the whole of Sujah Khan's established territorial assessments, forming an increase of something less than one-fifth of the ausil jumma, of all the khalsa lands of the Soubah, or more precisely - R^s 19,14,095
To which, if we add the amount of the prior article of khasnoveassy - R^s 2,58,857

The TOTAL of Soubahdarry Abwabs will be - - - R^s 21,72,952
or near 22 per cent. when proportioned to the original crown rent; from the first introduction of these exactions, under Jaffier Khan, to this remarkable era in the history of the decline of the Mogul empire in Bengal, as well as over the rest of Hindostan, including a period of near 26 years, closed in 1739 with the last popular delegated government appointed from Delhi. But it hath been observed, that exclusive of the imperial toomary and additional avowed imposts, levied by the former viceroys, there were, probably, contingent temporary receipts from the country, to the amount of 15 lacks more, which made up the sum total of the public revenue then, one crore and sixty lacks. In like manner, under the administration now in question, though a formally acknowledged increase of the old valued rental had taken place, greatly exceeding the presumed extra contributions raised by Jaffier; so we must assign to his successor, a further yearly income, proceeding from the same casual sources of secret benefit. The estimate, however, should not be made by an equal proportional standard; for of the funds which constituted the former's private advantages, the nuzzeranah, with lesser customary receipts of the nizamat in the latter's government, were henceforth permanently consolidated with the other stipulated dues of the exchequer, so that, perhaps, no more than the authorized established peshcush for the renewal of the zemindary sunnuds, sunnuds, can with propriety be brought into the account, and which, though periodically variable, yielded a large constant supply to be calculated, on a medium, at least five and a half lacks; reckoning in a revolution of 19 years, a renovation of all the grants of the lands of Bengal to produce in that time the ordinary fine of one year's original jumma, and limiting thereby the whole of Sujah Khan's income, to about a crore and seventy lacks, or only ten lacks more than hath been assigned to his predecessor.

The known universal practice of representative Mogul government in all parts of Hindostan, from the commencement of this century down to the present moment, in levying such extra-contributions as have been now stated, would render it unnecessary to exhibit proofs merely in confirmation of the fact, otherwise an ancient statement in our possession, of the estimated collections of the country twelve years subsequent to the period in question, might be considered the most conclusive evidence. It is therefore rather to establish collaterally another point, of great importance in political speculation, that we in this place interrupt the progressive order of our subject, to introduce some particulars of an account before alluded to, serving also at the same time, to evince the truth of what we have here ventured to advance. The Persian papers, constituting the authorities on which we proceed with full assurance of their sufficiency, state at the beginning, that a copy was given to an English gentleman high in office on the 6th of Aug 1182, Bengaleh, or about the middle of January 1776, by Siry Narrain, gomastah of Luckinenarrain canongoe, jointly with Narsing, serishtadar of Mehendernarrain, the other canongoe. Then follows, an abstract of the eahitman bundy (being the teshkhees jumma toomary) of the khalsa mhal of Bengal in 1135, in the time of Sujah Khan; the jageer appropriations of the same period, with accompanying remarks; and the general heads of the jumma of the dewanny lands on which our first bundobust was made in 1765; the whole corresponding precisely with the similar translated accounts lately published, and annexed to Mr. Francis's plan of settlement of the revenues, &c. It is from a supplemental part of this original performance, which may not in like manner, have been communicated, that we derive the particulars now to be set forth summarily, and entitled,

The most material article of the preceding accounts, and from which we mean to draw an immediate conclusion, applicable to the subject of enquiry, is that where credit is given to the royal treasury, for the effects of Jaffier Khan, agreeable to the universal maxim of Eastern policy, establishing in the crown a reversionary right to the property of individuals employed and dying in the service of the state. We might here dwell on the principles of a despotic legislation, which seems, in a great measure effectual, as it might originally have been intended to remedy the deficiency of corrupt agency, perhaps inseparable from every system of government, not founded on a national sense of public virtue: but it is sufficient for our purpose to remark the implied authority given to the delegate for all financial actions, of which the prince eventually participates; and that, in the instance before us, the viceroy had amassed a considerable private fortune, even partly, in the inferior gradations of This wealth could not have been accumulated, even partly, in the inferior gradations of office. Bribery is the ordinary road to preferment in Asia, and is expensive in its first stages, however ample may be the reimbursement in the last. Neither could it have been acquired partially by collateral aids, from the revenues of Orissa or Bahar; for both these provinces considered as frontiers to Bengal, when in the distracted state of the empire, the nabob or deputy looked forward to sovereign independence, were bestowed almost wholly the nature of military fiefs, on near relations, or trusty adherents, as the anticipated rewards of personal attachment to the inclined rebellious chief. Much less could any considerable portion of it, have been made, by savings from the income of the jageer establishment of the large, was only sufficient to bear the burthen of the civil and military establishment of the nazim, and if apparently an increasing fund, was only nominally so, in proportion to the influx of specie, like the factitious rental of the country. In short, as something more than the ordinary established revenue of Bengal was faithfully and regularly accounted for, the private riches of the officer, thus in the highest public trust, could only have arisen from such extraordinary and more secret levies, as we have suggested. The amount of these, we have ventured to fix in round numbers at 15 lacks, which in a period of 15 years, should have formed the aggregate of one crore ninety-five lacks, after deducting the annual sum of two lacks, for the surplus collections, under the head of khasnoveessy, &c. exceeding the ascertained produce of that impost singly; whereas the whole of Jaffier Khan's effects, brought by his successor to the emperor's credit, fell rather short of sixty-one lacks, more from this, is to be subtracted, supposing it the full amount of the defunct's property, though than fourteen and a half for repayment of money borrowed. But in Hindostan, though the whole personal or real, if there be any such, estate of subjects in office, devolves to the right to the prince; yet political clemency usually gives up, as a matter of indulgence, to the natural heirs, the greater share of what cannot be touched, without a violation of the more sacred rights of the haram, within the walls of which, and perhaps only in the knowledge of a favourite begum or her eunuch, the provident board hath probably been deposited, to favour ambition in its wanton career to the pinnacle of greatness, or meet a reverse of fortune, more generally to be expected, through the vicissitudes of every individual's life in the Eastern world. A moiety of the whole, therefore, may always moderately be reckoned on, as eluding the grasp of despotism, to fall into the hands of private inheritors, according to the civil institutions of free societies; and as there must in all cases, to realize the sovereign's portion, be one or a greater number of public virtue, in proportion as the system of government deviates from republicanism, so we think ourselves fully justified, agreeable to an almost universal rule throughout the dominions which once composed the Mogul empire, in reducing the regal share in every kind of property, ascertained by pecuniary estimation, to one-fourth of the total assets originally forthcoming, and which, calculated on the datum of credit in Sujah Khan's account, with the khalsa shereefa, for the effects

CHOUT MARHATTAH;—The well-known tribute exacted by the Marhattahs from the Moguls, and which at this time afforded a pretext to Aliverdi Khan, in common with other soubahdars, to levy an additional assessment on the khalsa lands, wast first formally acceded to A. D. 1717, by the Nizam or viceroy of the six soubahs of the Decan, in the reign of Furrokhseer. It originated about ten years before, through the wantonness of anticipated prosperity, in rebellious warfare with the falling Mussulman sovereignty, by the demand of a sirdesmooky of ten per cent. on the gross collections of the royal exchequer throughout the Peninsula, to be levied immediately from the desmooks or chiefs of districts, being the zemindars of those southern provinces of Hindostan. The great Alemgeer, however, did not admit even of this small encroachment on the imperial rights; though in his last illness, he certainly foresaw the approaching weakness of the state, by the distractions of a disputed succession to the throne, which might make a still greater sacrifice necessary. Accordingly, when the event of his own death, with the other operating mischiefs apprehended, gave freedom to the captive Sahojee Bhoosla, lineally descended from the famous Sewajee, originally acknowledged chief of all the Marhattah tribes, Daoud Khan, then acting as naib to Zulfezar Khan, the first appointed soubahdar of the whole Decan, agreed to the payment of the sirdesmooky, and appears traitorously to have purchased, for private ends, the friendship of the young enfranchised Hindoo leader, by tacit acquiescence in the new additional exaction of chout or fourth, then begun to be levied from all the jagher lands, south of the Nerbudda. But it was not till the period before-mentioned, or in the Hejrah year 1120, that the latter claim was formally recognized by Syed Hussein Khan, Ameer ul Omrah, bukhsli or commander in chief of the imperial forces, and then viceroy of the Decan, in behalf of the emperor Purrokhseer, as the price of present forbearance or treasonable future support from a formidable banditti, who had been, on this occasion, instigated to disturb his government, through the weak and jealous machinations of an enslaved monarch struggling to be free, while otherwise too impotent to controul his own nominal refractory delegate. In the progressive decline of the empire, the same dangerous instrument was alike unsuccessfully used by the sovereign to reduce to obedience his proper usurping deputies; and from such repeated proofs of imbecility, the power of the crown of Delhi was sunk below contempt in the estimation of a barbarous race, now swelled with pride in having shaken off the yoke of their imperious Mahomedan rulers. The demand of tribute was hence extended to the khalsa or royal portion of revenue; and, as if by way of retaliation, but more certainly from mistaken imitation of the Mogul policy, in asserting the sovereign right to the rebba or fourth of the territorial rental of the conquered country, so the Marhattahs, a tribe of native inhabitants, affected to exact from the proprietary lords of Hindostan an equal proportion, under the denomination of chout, of their yearly landed income.

It was in satisfaction of this spurious claim, little attended to or compromised on easy terms, under the vigorous administration of the famous Nizam ul Moolk, and in conformity to the necessitous fatal system of government lately adopted by the emperor of Delhi, that Mahomed Shah, when hearing of the death of Sujah Khan, with the usurped accession of Aliverdi to the soubahdary of Bengal, feeling sensibly the consequent deficiency of yearly remittances of rent from thence, though at the same time incapable of recovering the rights of the empire with its proper force, then in a manner annihilated by the recent invasion of Nader Shah, had recourse to the worst, most fatal engine of state in employing the Marhattahs, by granting them formal permission, for what they might otherwise have in contemplation without such authority, to levy their exaction of chout on the newly dismembered provinces. Nevertheless, the self-created soubahdar still carried on the farce of apparent allegiance to the emperor. He expended the revenue of the country ostensibly in opposition to the majesty of his sovereign; but virtually and in effect, to establish for himself a dominion independent of that superior, whose interests he affected to maintain. The issue of this contest hath already been mentioned. The greater part of Orissa was relinquished to the foe, publicly, as a compensation for their too powerfully supported, though unjust demand, or in acquittance of the royal acknowledged debt; though truly and more properly, a necessary sacrifice for the attainment of peace, and to secure the larger remaining portion of usurped possessions, from the future attacks of the only formidable enemy then to be apprehended throughout the dismembered members of the Mogul empire. But in the spirit of modern Hindostany half efficient soubahdary policy, Aliverdi did not neglect that opportunity of indemnifying himself for an unavoidable loss of territory, by levying an equivalent assessment on the other provinces subjected to his government, on a pretence so specious as the sacred mandate of imperial authority, and on grounds so popular as the ease and tranquillity of the great mass of a naturally timid people, who were filled with the utmost dread and horror of the continuance of the savage Marhattah war. At the same time, the confound investigation, to ascertain the proper regal dues, proportioned to an extraordinary influx of factitious wealth, always an expensive, oftentimes an oppressive operation; and, however comparatively prompt in execution might be the decrees of arbitrary sway in or account of the forms or numberless checks requisite to restrain the utmost moral depravity, and therefore ill suited or seldom adopted under the temporary views with the usually precarious personal tenure in eastern sovereignty.

We should, however, be careful here, not to confound the real tributary exaction of chout demanded by the Marhattahs, but never paid nor intended to be paid, by Aliverdi, from the nature of the impost now in question, actually levied by that usurper, under such denomination and pretence, in addition to the preceding rental of Bengal. The former, if complied with, would in fact, as it was really in form or in amount, have been a tax of four annas in the rupee, five shillings in the pound, or one-fourth, as the technical Hindoo term implies, on on the royal proprietary territorial income of Hindostan, according to the old and only universal known valuation of the 12 soubahs north of the Nerbudda, ascertained under the administration of Toorel Mull, in the reign of Akbar. Whereas the latter, was merely an internal operation of finance, or proportional assessment on the lands, corresponding virtually in every respect with those already established by former viceroys, and being only about one-seventh of the aasil jumma of the khalsa portion of territory, while extending universally to all the districts of the soubah, may be regarded, though by far the most considerable of all the Abwabs, as the best authorized formally under legal sanction of an acknowledged sovereign, or actually in the expedient policy of the ruling administration; the least oppressive to the people in general, as founded in apparent necessity, notoriously ascertained in the amount, or capable of being apportioned by every indefinite zemindary jurisdictions, instead of measured districts, which alone could be effectual, and were instituted for the express purpose of equalizing throughout the smallest territorial subdivisions, in the utmost practicable detail, the royal revenue, as well as restraining, as much as possible, the incorrigible propensity of the superior official landholders to oppress the subordinate peasantry, whenever vested with the least discretionary power to distribute internally their respective portions of the whole yearly demand on the country. The net annual bundobust of this assessment, henceforth invariably fixed in proportion to the jumma toomary, was - Rupees 15,31,817.

On the same principles virtually with all the other soubahdary assessments, this small additional one, was partially levied on the interior districts; but ostensibly, in order to conceal from the court and people such usurpation of the great royal prerogative, it was originally established under pretence of a real public service, to defray the expense of purchasing or transporting chunam or lime from Silhet, for the purpose of repairing the kallah of Moorshedabad. We have included under this head, another trifling impost of the same nature, distinguished separately in the nizamat dofter by the title Kimut Kheshtgour; being a mean exaction to answer the charge incurred in barbarously dismantling the venerable remains of the ancient city of Gour or Lucknowty, undoubtedly the Palybothra of the Greeks, and once the capital of the better part of Hindostan, as well as of Bengal; and conveying from thence, a particular species of enamelled bricks, surpassing in composition the imitative skill of the present race of native inhabitants.

8th. NUZZERANAH MUNSOORGUNGE was, in like manner, an arbitrary imposition, vicious in mode or principle, yet extremely moderate in amount; considered as an assessment proportioned to the aasil jumma and subsequent increase in the pecuniary value of the same rated lands, being confined in the present instance, to the larger interior zemindaries, particularly that of Rajeshahy, which was charged with at least one-fifth of the whole burthen. It originated in the dotage of Aliverdi, through a weak concession to the extravagant folly of his favourite adopted successor and grandson Suraja ul dowlah, of infamous tyrannic memory. This designing profligate youth, in the view of securing indulgence in the most vicious pleasures beyond the sight of controul, an expensive mansion nearly finished, at a convenient distance from family observation, an expensive mansion envired by an artificial canal, denominated Heirajul or the Lake of Diamonds. When the building was nearly completed, the old Nabob was invited to survey the structure, and whether by a concerted scheme of both parties, or alone, the wanton audacity of the young man, suffered himself to be locked up in one of the apartments, most exposed from without to the views of his officers and attendants, among whom were the vakeels of some of the principal zemindars; and as it was pretended, could only be released on the express stipulation of granting a pecuniary aid to be levied on the districts of such zemindars present as should be most willing to contribute towards ransoming a despotic ruler from mock imprisonment, or purchase the future favour of an heir apparent by slavish gratification of his passion. In truth, at all times the landholders of India seldom wanted any other stimuli than natural depravity, propensity to oppress, or their selfish interests, when a favourable opportunity offered of increasing clandestinely the burthen imposed on the inferior peasantry, beyond the proportion formally authorized under the sanction of government. This perhaps, of all such occasions, was the most suitable to their views and wishes; therefore, most cordially embraced with promptitude. The Soubadar was released, and in addition to the extorted favour, voluntarily conferred on his grandson the privilege of establishing a gunge granary or market, productive of a considerable sair revenue in the neighbourhood of his new dwelling dwelling place, henceforth denominated munsoorgunge, or the storehouse of the victorious, in allusion to one of the titles of Suraje ul dowlah, as well as of this artful trick of pleasantry, in which he is supposed to have outwitted the craft of more experienced age. The average amount of this further increase of the land rent of particular zemindaries, permanently established and consolidated with other assessments, was - R' - 5,01,597.

This being the last financial operation of Aliverdi, made up the total of Abwabs levied in the period of his administration, terminated with his life in 1756, 22,25,554 R^s. which, with all the former soubahdary exactions, being nearly as much more in addition to the usual toomary padshahy, inclusive of jageers, should have constituted a yearly revenue of R^s. 1,86,44,067. But it hath been observed in the government of Sujah Khan, a dangerous innovation had been made, expressed by the terms teshkhees-jummabundy, admitting, contrary to the ancient rules of the empire, a reduction to be made in the amount of the original standard valuation of the lands. Though this, in the beginning, was too inconsiderable to merit attention, in process of time, it involved a prodigious defalcation of the royal income; partly on the justifiable grounds of dismembered territory, such as the circar of Odeypoor or Tipperah, and the chuckmah of Bunder Balasore, recently ceded to the Marhattahs, with some other districts in possession, of former estimated worth, since become really waste or unproductive. The deficiency was chiefly however on fallacious pretences, through the chicanery of intermediate and inferior agents, who are ever prone in this country, to avail themselves of the least discretionary latitude to abuse their trust at the expense of the sovereign, and more especially to break through all fixed standing rules of policy or form, which are the only difficult thorny fences capable of restraining a natural propensity, to speculation. In less than 30 years from the first introduction of this pretended necessary correction of the toomiar jumma, a reduction of about ten lacks of rupees was made in the annual settlement from the khalsa portion of rent when established formally at a krore and nine lacks of rupees, besides the usual mofussil expense of muscōorat, fixed at a lack and seventy-six thousand, allowed to the zemindars, with other officers of government, at the close of their yearly accounts. So that, to estimate accurately the soubahdary revenue of the period now under consideration, so much should be deducted from the aggregate of what hath been assigned to Aliverdi, if we had not reason to suppose from the particulars of one year's collections, and the known contingent nuzzeranah ever forthcoming on grants of zemindary sunnuds, that his actual receipts for the last five years, fell little or nothing short of the sum stated; to which were we to add, the ascertained keffyet of profits of shahamat and soulet jung, his nephews and sons-in-law, arising from the improved rental of the rich foudjedarries of Dacca and Purneah, bestowed rather in the view of affording a personal maintenance to themselves, than supplying the public exigencies beyond the antiquated stipulated dues of the exchequer, we might then fairly and moderately calculate the net territorial income of the whole soubah of Bengal at two krore fifteen-lacks of rupees. Finally, in respect to the probable treasure accumulated at the close of the same usurped administration, considering the extraordinary expense of almost ten years warfare with the Marhattas, and the consequent diminution in that time, of the realized rental of some of the districts west of the Ganges, that although the remittances to Delhi had been wholly suspended, even for the last five years of peace, yet as a largely increased military establishment had nearly absorbed a sum equal to the customary tribute before sent thither, and serving henceforth only to increase the fund of provincial currency or quicken interior circulation; it may be conjectured with all the political certainty which perhaps the occasion now admits of or requires, that the total of effective wealth left by the usurper to his immediate successor, did not exceed two krore and a half of sicca rupees.

ABWAB COSSIM KHANY.

ABWAB COSSIM KHANY.

The long years of Suraje ul dowlah's tyranny, after the death of Aliverdi, as well as the feeble substitute administration for the three immediately following of Meer Jaffier, raised formally to the Musnud by the power of the English, were alike unproductive of any increase or improvement of the public revenue. Nor yet are we to ascribe either to the financial abilities or disinterestedness of Meer Mahomed Cossim Ali Khan, the large additional impost, keffiyet or profits now to be introduced under his name, as having been first publicly asserted, and carried to the credit of the khalsa shereefa, in the short period of his powerfully supported, though wholly dependent, soughbaldarry rule of three years, commencing in 1760. The foundation of these territorial advantages, accruing to the state, was laid in the famous institutions of Akbar, by fixing permanently the proportion of yearly produce to be forthcoming from the tennantry to the imperial sovereign, as sole proprietor of the soil, according to a regular hustabood, or valuation by measurement of land, with a comparative view of former and actual sources of the annual income, which repeatedly corrected by the standard of political perfection, in ascertaining the equitable medium assessment, suited to the capacity of the country and people, at the same time, reasonably sufficient for all the legitimate purposes of the established government; and thereby leaving to all subsequent administrations, barely the merit of common intelligence, the simplest honesty, or interested fidelity in a delegated trust, when, after having brought into the treasury the last daum of rent legally collected from the ryots, with the authority or under the implied original sanction of the state, the regal dues of revenue were increased to the utmost amount, proper or expedient to be realized.

No. 4.] The Affairs of The EAST INDIA COMPANY.

In truth, Meer Cossim, as well as most of his Mussulman predecessors in office, seem to be alike ignorant of the first elements of financial knowledge; and were not even pretenders to the equivocal probity of intendants, as sometimes occurring under despotism. It is not however to be inferred from hence, that they were destitute of the very moderate share of natural talents requisite to qualify themselves for this most simple, easy, important department of Indian administration; and with less justice, are they to be specially accused by any individual, possessing better opportunities of instruction in an age of philosophic reasoning, confined to a more enlightened quarter of the world, if wanting political discernment or sagacity to distinguish the excellence, and adhere to the spirit of the original equitable institutions of the Mogul empire, they have suffered these, in great part to fall into disuse; or if availing themselves with less effect, more oppressively than might otherwise properly have been done, with a fuller understanding of established civil rights and the nature of a fortuitous influx of specie, when claiming by no fixed measured rule, but arbitrary indefinite expediency, the sovereign's share of such factitious wealth, they appear to have been altogether unacquainted with or indifferent to, the causes productive of the change perceived, and of which the influence unforeseen by the ingenious framer of the actual revenue system of Hindostan, could not have been admitted in the estimated amount of immediate or future sources of the public supplies, however applicable to all times and every possible contingency, are the leading principles of his theory, as well as practically simplified, in proportion as they are grand or universal to the meanest popular capacity.

principles of his theory, as well as practically universal to the meanest popular capacity.

It is rather then to a vicious education, the sloth, natural depravity, and prevalent ignorance of the Mahomedans in the East, that we are to attribute generally any deficiencies which may occur during Cossim Ali's administration, in levying the established rents of government by any other rule than the wise, equitable standard fixed by Toorel Mull, making due allowance for the extraordinary intervening accidental change in the nominal decreasing value of money, which, without such correction, as well in Bengal as all other parts of the commercial world, must prove an extremely erroneous medium of financial calculation for the two last centuries entire. At the same time, the few instances of Mogul policy in assessing he seems to have acted in conformity to the original system of Mogul policy in assessing the country, or may be said to have discharged faithfully the ordinary duties of a delegate, in bringing to light and public account, the clandestine receipts with private defalcations of subordinate agents employed in the collections, must be ascribed not to a single virtue in his moral or political character, but wholly to the circumstances of his situation, rendered factitiously necessitous, through the wanton ungrateful ambition of shaking off the easy legitimate yoke of that power, which alone raised and supported him in his elevation, to the virtuous soubahdarry, joined to the very inadequate formal sacrifice of territory to his benefactors, the real conquerors of the whole country in that small portion of it, hence denominated ceded lands, with perhaps the little pecuniary gratification, stated at about 25 lacks, in the 3d committee report to the British parliament in 1773, bestowed on individuals of the then effective representative administration; while the summary violent means, terminating usually in the bloody execution of such native officers as had been concerned, sometimes only on suspicion, as principals or accessaries in the high misdemeanors of fraud, breach of trust, or embezzlement of the public money, punished always as the worst of crimes in despotic states, must be ever regarded with horror in christian brethren under the strongest prejudices of character, however considered by his own partial brethren under the strongest prejudices of Mussulman education, as only the ordinary measures of all oriental arbitrary rules, when distinguished for tolerably vigorous policy, impelled by real or ideal necessity.

But to estimate the merits of the Government in question, as far as connected with our present subject, by facts and relative circumstances independent of vague controvertible opinion, it seems requisite to enter into some detail, discriminating the origin, nature or scope of the several territorial abwabs, at this time brought to public account, under the head of keffyet or profits; and hence, perhaps, as erroneously believed to have been in the first instance wholly imposed by Cossim Ali, as their influence is supposed generally to have been extended over all the dewanny lands of the soubah, in exclusion of the portion ceded. These imposts were, with one inconsiderable exception, limited in local extent to the frontier provinces, originally till then imperfectly, conquered, explored or assessed; and may altogether be classed under four distinct general heads, in continuation of the eight already assigned to former soubahdars, beginning with such as belong properly or solely to the period under consideration, being two in number, and comprizing about one-fourth of the total amount of assessments now to be stated; viz.

9th. KEFTYET HUSTABOOD:—These denominated profits, or increased collections, on regular legal investigation and accurate ascertainment of ancient with actual productive sources of revenue, as implied by the compounded Persian word hust-o-bood, positively were confined to the two great zemindarry jurisdictions of Beerbhoom and Dinagepour, under the following particular circumstances, necessary to be stated, in order to evince the propriety or the reverse of the formal additional burthen then authoritatively imposed.

Beerbhoom, already generally described, with all its ascertained dimensions from the year 1760, contains, according to Rennell, 3,858 British square miles, and is the fourth in magnitude, of all the single zemindarries of Bengal, being next to Burdwan, in superficial measure, measure, the most extensive. Of this area, near two-thirds (comprising all the lands among the hills west of Nagore, the capital, and still in great part jungly, uncultivated, or little known under the topographical subdivision name of sarhant, which is probably a corruption of the Persian word sarhad, boundary or marches, as applicable to the local situation of the district) were, (from the first financial arrangements of Toorel Mull, and subsequent improvement of Jaffier Khan) assigned over for the maintenance of some thousands of bakendauzes, matchlock men, or native Hindostany militia, appointed to guard the frontiers towards the barbarous unsubdued rajahship of South Behar, then confined to the wilds of Palamow, Rangur and Currickden; while the remaining portion of territory was alone productive to the state of yearly revenue, rated in the ausil jumma toomary, khalsa and jageer, Rupees 3,77,645; exclusive of all mofussil expenses, with the ordinary establishment of chakeran, servants, or village peons; every where necessarily kept up by government, for the business of the collections. But the zemindar, a Mussulman of the warlike and proverbially treacherous Patan race, soon found out the importance of the station in which he was placed, to favour princely independence, when the distractions of the Mogul empire, or feeble divided administration of usurping soubahdars, awakened the dormant passion of unlawful ambition. The militia corps were gradually formed of soldiers of his own tribe, seldom wanting in fidelity to their proper chieftains, however much the reverse, under alien leaders; and thus perceiving himself at the head of what, comparatively with the whole military strength of the soubah, might be deemed rather a formidable force, when considered as a body of feudatories, acting on a principle of personal attachment, as well as on the more common interested one, of mercenary troops, in a frontier province of great extent, unexplored and difficult of access, with considerable internal resources in men and money, subject only to the weak controul of a delegate, who had, in some instances of his own conduct, set an example of disrespect for constitutional authority; so, it was as natural for even the farming landholder of Beerbhoom under such circumstances, to endeavour to withdraw all allegiance from the legal sovereign, as the task proved easy after the death of Jaffier Khan. The consequent loss of revenue, however, was less felt, than the political disadvantage of dismemberment of a territory which commanded all the leading passes direct from bordering foreign independent countries, when in the government of Aliverdi, the Merhattahs found their way into Bengal through this district, by the treacherous connivance of the refractory zemindar. Its reannexation became, therefore, an object of the first importance immediately after the conclusion of the war; and under so vigorous an administration, was soon partially accomplished, with an increase of rupees 68,223 on account of the abwabs khasnoveessy and chout, in addition to the ancient established jumma. But the complete reduction of the rebellious superintending farmer, who in the period of his independence had grievously oppressed, by means of his foreign Mussulman soldiers, the native inoffensive Hindoos, composing the body of peasantry and manufacturers, was reserved for the soubahdarry of Cossim Ali, when pressed by his proper exigencies, and supported by the power of the English, there could be no cause besides imbecility or the basest corruption, in not vindicating a fundamental indispensable law, by wresting the sovereign rights from the hands of a petty tyrannical usurper, and restoring provincial subordination with interior financial order, agreeably to the old standing moderate rules of the Mogul empire. Accordingly, the militia establishment was in great part reduced, and the assigned lands resumed by government; which, together with the result of a local scrutiny into the yearly receipts of rent from the ryots throughout the rest of the district, enabled the soubahdar to form an equitable standard for the future assessment of the whole territory, on the prescribed and only solid foundations of a proper settlement, technically understood by the word hustabood, indicating a comparative view of former and actual sources of gross revenue. If there should appear a deficiency in the reform of the first most essential object of Eastern policy, unparticipated military power on this occasion, it ought to be remembered that the relative position of Beerbhoom, from being a frontier zemindary of the same dominion, was not wholly changed, until the more recent conquest of the British arms, of the bordering dependencies of the soubah of Behar, on the west; and if a larger increase of annual income might have been expected from the old rated lands chiefly in consideration of their ascertained superior worth, or perhaps in small degree, on account of the valuable commodities of iron, coal, and tesser silk, in a manner peculiar to this province, besides the other more ordinary productions of Bengal, we are to recollect that the two former articles found chiefly on the surface of the ground, and the latter formed abundantly in the woods by a caterpillar feeding on the bere and saul tree, instead of the mulberry, afford more than a presumptive proof of general poverty of soil, or at least the imperfect state of cultivation. However this may be, the net additional revenue accruing to the exchequer from the whole of Cossim Ali's financial operations in the district now in question, and brought to public credit under the head of keffiyet hustabood, did not exceed - - - - - Rupees 8,96,275

DINAGEPOOR, another of the greater single zemindaries, being 3,519 square miles in extent, and the next in inferior size to the preceding one, was, under circumstances somewhat dissimilar, rated exactly on the same principles of assessment from a hustabood valuation of the yearly collections, made by the landholder in the name and behalf of government, but for the most part fraudulently kept by himself. The address and corrupting arts of Rannahit in preventing a strict local enquiry into his actual receipts of revenue, by anticipating the public demands with what might have have the appearance of a voluntary pecuniary aid, if still practised, had now lost their effect. The district being originally a frontier towards that part of the then unconquered Raje of Cooch Beyhar, since called Rungpoor, was little known and lightly assessed; for even after the accession of the rich pergunnah of Santose, with other lesser portions of adjacent country, the ausil toomary of all the jageer and khalsa lands, included in the whole jurisdiction, amounted only to rupees 7,54,215, while the total of abwabs levied on that jumma, and carried to public account, until the period now under consideration, did not exceed 3,31,823. Considering, therefore, the vast enlargement imperceptibly or better ascertained of territory towards a foreign frontier to be reckoned, exclusive of the more recent better known acquisitions, at least one-third of the present area of the zemindary entire; the effect of interior visible improvements, either real, through increased cultivation, or fictitious, by a reduction in the value of specie, but all in consequence of resuming the towfeer or profits arising on a part of the jageer lands; so the additional keffiyet, at this time, brought to the credit of the soubah, and before, clandestinely withheld by the farming landholder, may appear very moderately rated in the sum of - - - - - R^s

With such as have formed erroneous conjectures of the relative civil rights of the sovereign proprietor and intermediate zemindar or tenant of the soil in India, and should be inclined to draw general conclusions of past or present impoverishment of the country, rather from an actual derangement in its finances, than any circumstantial adduced proofs of the existence of the more material fact; it may be difficult to establish a belief of the moderation of the two preceding articles of assessment. Yet, perhaps, an apt comparison of sufficient notoriety occurring in the state and periodical improvements of the zemindary of the pergunnahs about Calcutta, may have some influence. These lands, extending over, for the most part, a salt marshy surface of only 882 square miles, alone capable of producing rice, the meanest, unprofitable, however essential, article of Indian culture, were rated on the partial, more recent hustabood of Jaffier Khan in 1722, to complete his famous original rent-roll of Bengal, at the toomary jumma of R^s 2,22,958, as hath been already stated, or may be proved by reference to the Company's sunnuds, as formal official landholders for that portion of territory, considered by some to have been really acquired in sovereignty in 1757, but of which the crown rents specifically were assigned by Shah Alem, in sycurghal jageer to Lord Clive. In the very moment of acquisition, the proportion of all the soubahdarry assessments afore-mentioned, and till then regularly levied throughout the several subdivisions of this henceforth united district, in addition to the old standard revenue, amounted to Rupees 3,32,078. Eighteen months afterwards, the aggregate of rents actually collected, being better ascertained, were farmed, by public sale, to the highest bidders, for rupees 7,65,000; and yet, only three years subsequent to the period of Meer Cossim's administration, were calculated as being found in great moderation, really to exceed 14 lacks of rupees, per annum, on the minute authoritative enquiry of one of the best and ablest of our English governors in Bengal; a gentleman, who, with great experience, possessed peculiar talents in finance, and having the most favourable, with the earliest, opportunity of acquiring genuine information, touching the nature of the ordinary sources of Indian revenue under the Mahomedans, the principles on which it was annually collected, forming part of the laws and usages of the country; joined to a perfect understanding of the character of the natives; had not only the ability and inclination thus to improve the fund of his proper knowledge, but also the virtue of making it practically beneficial to his immediate employers, while in office, or afterwards in speculation render it useful to the nation at large, if there had been a suitable disposition to receive and profit by his published instruction or formal declarations before a Committee of the House of Commons in 1772.

Nevertheless, by some it will be said, that the population of his territory has greatly increased under the more immediate lenient free administration of the English; and in respect to the town of Calcutta, the observation must be allowed to be well-founded, particularly during the arbitrary government of dependent Mussulman soubahdars. But it by no means follows, nor does it appear in fact, that such fortuitous accession of inhabitants were either of the industrious, more useful, classes of people; or as ordinary subjects, contributed in any degree, to the improvement of the neighbouring lands. They were for the most part, rich individuals, with their trains of idle, hireling dependants, who fled from the terrors or necessary severity of their proper laws, to find a secure asylum for their persons and fortunes, under the universal indiscriminating protection of the British flag; without even conferring the equivocal benefits of luxury on the sheltering power, or perhaps having added a single plough to the culture of any of the 24 pergunnahs; besides the garden ground of the pital, the amount of which we have therefore deducted from the two last periodical rentals specified; though it may be proper on our part to assign the probable cause, that they could with greater convenience and economy be supplied in all the scanty wants from the opposite shore of the river Hooghly, or through the same commodious channel, on equal terms, from almost any more distant part of Bengal.

On the other hand, such as have adopted the erroneous opinion of the existence of great territorial proprietary interests in India, separate or independent of those of the sovereign, might attribute the extraordinary increase of the company's denominated proper rents, to the union of the rights of both prince and landholder in the same body; if Burdwan and the lesser distinct zemindaries of the ceded lands, did not exhibit instances of improvement, under the same form of superintending administration. Moreover, we apprehend it might not be very difficult to prove, that on the acquisition of the Calcutta pergunnahs, the many higher occupants of the soil, distinguished as choudries or talookdars, and thenceforward united under one superior jurisdiction; instead of losing any of their former legal advantages, gained considerably by the change in the clandestine appropriation to their own uses under the heads of Buzee Zemeen, Bermooter or bramin charity lands, not only a compensation for their russom of five per cent. and other lesser official privileges annexed to the royal collections, of which they were exonerated formally, by the same power that bestowed them conditionally, but also tripled the former specified extent of their namcar on real family estates, set apart by the indulgent sovereign for their proper maintenance, when at any time, they should be so deprived of their commission as receivers general. For it is notorious, that even to this day, there is a greater portion of ground within the district now in question, held under such fraudulent, unauthorized, and perfectly novel title of charitable donation, than ever was conferred throughout the whole of Bengal in all the usual known forms of granting similar endowments, agreeable to the laws and constitutions of India, as established by the Moguls; and perpetuated under every other succeeding regular government still existing in their dismembered empire, either from necessary adherence to the implied terms of a formal transfer of dominion, or voluntary adoption of the only system of jurisprudence universally acknowledged and revered, by the great mass of the people ruled. Though at the same time, it is perfectly consistent with our belief, that there may be upwards of forty lacks of begahs, each to be valued on a medium at a rent of two rupees per annum, standing at this moment and ever since the cession of the dewanny, but certainly not before, on the accounts of alienated lands from the soubah, by zemindars and others, thus treasonably assuming the highest regal prerogative, in issuing unlicensed sunnuhs, denominated Bermooter, as well as those in great part called Deowulter, Beshnoutter, Peerooter, with a variety of such other like fraudulent Hindoo forms of grant, entirely foreign and new to the actual legislative code of the country. But however this may be, to resume our subject and finish the view of territorial assessments in Beerbhoom and Dinagepoor, after the financial operations of Cossim Ali in 1763, compared with those of the Company in their proper district of Calcutta, only three years later, we have only to observe further, that the lands of the latter, have since in great part been restored, with all the old annexed privileges, to their former zemindarry possessors, or as many of them as could be found. Yet such is the difference between true practical well-founded local knowledge, and the doctrines recently promulgated in Europe respecting the proprietary rights and uses of the soil in India, that if a demand had been made, by those reinstated landholders, of the whole or a participation in the increased rental of the pergunnahs, during the period of their suspension, there probably is not a man in Hindostan, or any that hath been there long enough to observe the most remarkable customs and common usages of the country, who would not have considered it, rather as a sure indication of premeditated rebellion, than either the effect of ignorance, presumptuous folly, or a mistaken notion of rights so notoriously vested in the sovereign. At the same time, in respect to the inferior tenants, or real occupant cultivators of the land, paying the yearly rents of government (notwithstanding the Company's zemindarry was assessed proportionably to the rest of the soubah, even before 1763, as well as in the ausil jumma, as amount of subsequent four years afterwards, nearly tripled by the hustabood investigations, and consequent settlements made by British collectors) we dare aver, that there is not in Europe a body of peasantry happier, more lightly taxed, comparatively to their proper natural wants, or the actual capacity and income of their farms; (continuing still to think themselves so, though within the verge of an English supreme court, instigated by all the barpies of the law to complain) while the demands of the circar or state exceed not its legal established due (of one-fourth of gross territorial produce) than the ryots of the 24 pergunnahs of Calcutta, however thinly peopled, poor in culture, confined in extent, yet largely assessed, the whole district may appear, in comparison with Beerbhoom, Dinagepoor, and almost all the other zemindaries of Bengal.

ABWAB.

10th. SERF SICCA $\frac{1}{2}$ Anna.—This perhaps, of all the proportional abwabs of the soubah might be deemed comparatively the most reasonable in principle, and moderate in effective operation, if the nature and extent of the original assessment had been properly made known to the people at large, and strictly adhered to, by the officers of government; but under different circumstances, hath become an intolerable grievance to the country, as it is, under similar mismanagement, one of the most fertile sources of the peculation and fraud of intermediate pecuniary agency throughout the whole of Hindostan. Such was the extraordinary influx of silver into the commercial parts of the empire, from the reign of Jehangeer, that the Mogul coin of rupees newly struck, each varying in the established standard of fineness fineness in different periods from 11 $\frac{1}{2}$ to 10* masheh weight, began immediately to lose something of their legal value, when thrown into circulation, (whether for the purchase of the necessaries and luxuries of life, or the higher prized or baser metals serving as concurrent mediums of exchange) which with the associated irremediable chicanery of shroffs, soucars, or Hindoo bankers, in counterfeiting, clipping, debasing money, enhancing or depreciating its relative worth in the markets, as it suited their particular purposes, made it at length an object of government, to find some remedy to a disorder of such magnitude. Accordingly, since the time of Alemgeer (after its continuation in a long series of years had been sufficiently observed, to calculate and prevent its probable further progress, however ignorant the ministry of that monarch may have been of its origin and temporary duration, in the discovery of the exhaustible mines of American treasures, to devise a more radical cure) it must be allowed that at least the only effectual palliative was applied in ordaining an annual recoinage, and lowering arbitrarily the value of the money before in circulation, so opportunely, and at such a rate of batta or exchange, as should not only be an indemnification for all the charges of the mint, but be productive of a considerable income, under the head of duties to the exchequer, which was ultimately to receive into its coffers, most of the cash in currency, after having been subjected to the touch, and deducted profits of intervening shroffs, who, being perhaps the original projectors of the scheme, have ever since been, the necessary agent copartners of the state, in realizing its territorial revenue. Accordingly, in Bengal, soon after Jaffier Khan had removed the seat of administration from Dacca to Moorshedabad, he appointed the house of Jaggut-Set, sole managers, in the first instance, for the receipt or transfer of the kists, or monthly instalments of rent coming from the country, in the different species of circulating money; and the system of a yearly recoinage having been adopted, it was further instituted, that the sicca rupee of nearly the present standard of about 7 $\frac{1}{2}$ D. W^{ts}, should be reduced gradually in value, from the proportion of 116 to 111, in the course of three years, after one of undiminished legal worth, which the greater portion of the silver coin in use, it was calculated would be brought again into the mint to be restruck, and thereby yield a stated advantage to government, exclusive of charges of about 2 per cent. estimated to produce in the total annually, rather more than three lacks, after having been subjected to the operations of shroffage, which were to absorb all the rest of the stipulated profitable reduction of near five per cent. except what was necessary to make up any real deficiency in the weight of the coin, in the short interval of its circulation, or defray the unavoidable expense of recoinage. On pretence of the loss sustained, in consequence of the arrangement by the zemindars, and other revenue officers, through whom, of course, the mofussil collections were paid into the bank, and usually a larger intermediate agents, exacted secretly for the benefit or convenience of the representative sovereign; discount than was established for the benefit or convenience of the representative sovereign; but on a plea of indemnification, entirely groundless, (for if they only performed to do their own proper engagements in the capacity of farmers-general, for payment of the dewanny rents within the year, in sicca rupees so denominated, being only considered as of standard value, when struck and issued in the same revolving period of the king's reign) no serf, batta, or disadvantage of exchange was to be incurred. Cossim Ali detected the fraud of his proper officers; and probably establishing it as a proof against them, of their knowledge of the real capacity of their territorial jurisdictions, to bear a larger assessment within the corbba, or stated dues of the exchequer, than they admitted in the annual settlement of the bundobust, endeavoured to correct the abuse, by realizing the amount of such extra collections in future to the state, and fixing invariably at a moderate rate, like the other soubahdarry imposts, a demand which was before entirely arbitrary, at the discretion of zemindars; therefore certainly grievous to the peasantry. Such appear to have been the original nature and principles of the abwab, one and a half anna under the denomination of serf on each rupee, of what, by mutseddy craft, might have been termed the khalsa jumma, which varying unfortunately in amount, in consequence of successive financial reformations, from about 48 lacks, to the proportion of the ausil toomary of Toorel Mull for the division of dewanny lands, still upwards of two crore of rupees, forming the increased assessment of the present day; still left a latitude to collectors, under the negligence of any ruling administration, to exact a per-centage on the one or the other sum, of more than nine rupees in the hundred, though the former capital was evidently that in contemplation, as may be denominated arithmetically, by proportioning the total authorized medium produce of the assessment at its fixed specified rate of 1 $\frac{1}{2}$ annas; or when applying it by calculation, as with more propriety, ought to have been at first done, to the then khalsa dewanny portion, being about 90 lacks of the true effective ausil jumma of the soubah, corrected by Jaffier Khan in 1722, and alone in common use, we find the ascertained defalcation of five per cent., before clandestinely levied on the standing rental of the country, on pretence of an equal loss of batta, by the annual recoinage, pretty nearly balanced, and henceforth brought to public credit, under the head of the present assessment, always limited by legal estimation, in the medium amount of

Rupees	4,53,448

Thus making the TOTAL of Meer Cossim's proper imposts only

* These variations in the standard weight of fine silver in the sicca rupee, were probably another state operation, carried to the greatest length, in the reign of Alemgeer, to remedy the inconvenience of serfage and the decreasing worth of the coin in actual currency, by ordaining the payment of wages to all the civil and military servants in the sicca, henceforth usually struck throughout the empire under the denomination of ellahee, from 10 to 10 $\frac{1}{2}$ masheh weight, including about 103 parts of 116, into which the Bengal rupee is divided.

It may further be observed, while treating on the subject of coinage, (one of the highest prerogatives of royalty, and perhaps the most delicate branch of regal administration, to be managed or even touched practically, in commercial states) that as the officers dependants, tradesmen, and servants, forming the civil and military establishments of government, were to receive their salaries, gratuities, or disbursements, calculated generally to absorb the whole revenue of the soubah, in an inferior species of rupees called ellahee siccas, (varying from 16 to 16½ masha weight in pure silver, and forming still the legal current money, struck throughout the rest of Hindostan, except Bengal, in the proportion of 108 to 116; as in the siccas were alone coined and made to pass current, without any periodical diminution, until a real perceptible deficiency of weight occurred from usage, it might be easily foreseen and calculated, that a loss of at least fifteen lacks would have been incurred by the state annually, by such a regulation, which could only be justified by a continuation of the cause that probably influenced the establishment of the ellahee standard, being an extraordinary influx of specie tending to decrease the value of the stock in circulation.

ABWAB.

11th.—KEFFYET FOUEJEDARAN:—These profits, like the former, denominated hustabood, might also have been raised on similar principles, as they were in nature and effect exactly the same, being for the most part partial assessments on the other frontier provinces delegated to the arbitrary military government of foujedars, who following precisely the example of their immediate superiors in the soubahdarry, in levying an increase of rent, unauthorized formally on the original jumma of the lands within their particular jurisdiction, could equally well justify their conduct on the plea of necessity in every respect, but infidelity to their trusts, by concealing the amount so exacted: for however equivocal or unsubstantial, the viceroy's actual dependence on the crown of Delhi might have been, and as such considered to absolve him from the performance of duties, which were alike nominal; their civil and moral obligations to the former, from whom they derived virtually their appointments, and by whose continued favour alone they could hope to keep them, were real, indispensable, and binding, in every sense of fealty; sociable convention; or more private engagements of servants to their employers. But neither was the virtue of the one great enough, to bring to light and the credit of the state, nor the vigour or policy of the other sufficient, to enforce the resumption of the large defalcations of revenue here to be set forth, as notoriously known for near a third of a century before, to have been collected from the zemindars or ryots officially, in the name and ostensibly to supply the exigencies of government, by its proper Mussulman delegates in the frontier foujedarry districts, while imperfectly explored; though the amount was fraudulently withheld from the public, until ascertained and carried finally to account under the general head of keffyet or profits, during the needy and powerfully supported administration of Meer Cossim.

To correct, however, more fully a prevalent error, respecting the nature and local extent of the financial advantages, thus succinctly stated; it seems necessary to distinguish and describe more particularly, the relative situation of the districts within which they were realized, in the manner of the other increased assessments throughout the soubah; in order to estimate their comparative burthen on the country and people at large. The province of

(1st.) POORNEAH, or Seerpoor-Dulmaipoor, as denominated on the khalsa records, is the first that occurs, in sharing the larger portion of improved rental. It forms beyond the Ganges, the north-west boundary of Bengal, towards the soubah of Bahar on the one side, and the independent Raje of Morung, forming a narrow slip of unhealthy woody territory at the foot of the great northern Thibetian hills, on the other; comprising, in its greatest modern dimensions, 5,119 square miles of a fertile, compact, well-watered cultivated flat; rich in the produce of rice, oil, pulse, wheat, with almost all the other ordinary grains for home consumption, in the valuable articles of opium and saltpetre for foreign commerce, to which might be added, fir masts and other useful timber from the neighbouring woods of Morung; but chiefly abounding in draught and carriage bullocks, together with the most necessary article of ghee for exportation, derived from the best pasture lands, in great part exempted from taxation. Of this area, however, no more than one-third originally was contained and assigned over under the same provincial denomination in 1722 to the management of Seyf Khan, rated at the ausil jumma, khalsa and jageer, of rupees 2,78,830. In 1732 a district of nearly the same extent, called Derhempoor or Bernagur, dismembered from the circar of Mongheer in Bahar, and including all the lands lying to the west of the river Cossah in its ancient channel, was annexed, at the standing valued rent of 3,55,773, proceeding from the four pergunnahs subdivisions of Gundewarrah Bowanypoor, Bernagur and Nahpoor; and in 1752 on the death of Seyf Khan, when the province was conferred in government, or rather appanage on Soulet Jung, the nephew and son-in-law of Aliverdi Khan, it was found that, in course of an able administration of thirty years under the late foujedar, it had received a further accession of productive territory, by conquest or improvement on the side of Morung, equal in extent or value to either of the afore-mentioned portions of country, as stretching from Jelalgur the ancient boundary, near the capital town of Poorneah, to the present frontier, removed at least thirty miles more to the north, on a line of fifty in length; that the amount actually collected from these three territorial divisions in behalf of the state, rather exceeded 18 lacks of rupees; while the effective public revenue realized from thence, according to the treasury accounts, had only been increased, ausil and abwab abwab by the very inadequate assessment of Sujah Khan, to rupees 5,61,857. In this state however, and so lightly burthened, Soulet Jung succeeded by soubahdarry appointment, to the vacant government; and through the enlargement of power with his proper finances, thought himself in a condition, on the accession of Suraje ul dowlah to the usurped dominion of Bengal in 1756, to assert his own independence of all superior authority; as in like manner, did his son under the following administration of Meer Jaffier, on the first appearance of foreign disturbance, until finally reduced with his coadjutor the refractory zemindar of Beerbhoom, to proper obedience by the terror of the English arms. It was then, that Cossim Ali, pressed by the exigencies of the state, of which effectively he could be appointed subordinate ruler in despotic form, only to stimulate the ambition of grasping at the real sovereignty, assumed the virtue, perhaps because acting as he believed in his proper behalf, of doing what right and policy always required; investigating and carrying to public credit the defalcations of inferior agency, from the ascertained long established dues of rent, collected from the ryots through zemindars and other lesser intermediate officers of the revenue, under the head of keffyet or emoluments of Soulet Jung, and other foujedars in the province of Poorneah, estimated moderately on a hustabood of their clandestine receipts, Rupees 15,23,725.

(2d.) DACCA, or Jelalpoor: This continues to be, as it was in 1760, by far the largest, most valuable province of the country, subdivided into a number of small zemindaries, comprising altogether 15,397 B. square miles, and reckoned the granary of Bengal in rice, in like manner as the whole soubah is considered to be, of the rest of Hindostan. Its other more peculiar productions, being almost exclusively confined to this little portion of the Mogul empire, are, beetle nut, and a species of cotton called banga, indispensably necessary, though not otherwise of superior quality, to form the stripes of some of the finest muslin manufactures in the world; for every kind of which, the city of Jehangernagar, formerly the capital of the viceroyalty, may be accounted the grand emporium. Though stretching some of its districts southerly to the sea, at the mouths of the two great fertilizing rivers, the Ganges and Birbampooter; or northerly to the impassable Garro mountains on the confines of Asham, yet, in most interior circumstances, it differed from the other frontiers, with the exception of being ruled alike independently by a Mussulman foujedar. The last in office, and till our own days, the greatest in power, was Shahanut Jung Nowazish Mahomed Khan, a third nephew and son in law of Aliverdi; at once dewan of the whole soubah, and nawab nazim of Dacca, with all the provinces to the eastward. It was, in search of the treasures amassed by him, in his own or constituents right by Raje Bullub, (the naib or deputy of this high officer of state) and supposed to have been concealed by his son Kissen Dass, when he took refuge in Calcutta, that Suraje ul dowlah deluged the land with blood, until he met his fate, in the merited punishment of tyranny; as it was, the obstinate secrecy of the same inferior agent who held within his late master's jurisdiction the rich unascertained zemindarry of Rajenagur, in refusing to surrender the mofussil accounts or disclose a true state of the gross collections of rent made throughout the province, solely appropriated to private benefit, that afterwards drew on him the resentment of Cossim Ali, when employed in the prosecution of his plan, to draw forth and realize to the exchequer, all the financial resources of the country. Nevertheless, as cruelty generally defeats its own purpose, so it may be presumed, the nawab soubahdar was on this occasion, disappointed; for notwithstanding the enhanced value of all the original lands of Dacca since the toomary bundobust of Jaffier Khan in 1722, when rated at 19,28,294 rupees, the standard rent roll has been since increased by annexations of improved territory dismembered from the neighbouring chucklahs of Sylhet, Currybarry and Gorahgaut, in the sum of rupees 2,55,696 more; that on the khalsa share of this accumulated jumma, and before set forth, did not exceed proportional aboabs levied by all former soubahdars in office, and more especially that, of the larger and richer portion of territory held from the days of Akber in jageer, almost the whole assigned to defray the annual expense of the royal marine garrisons and artillery, being little short of the ausil amount of 6,93,937, had been absolutely resumed, together with an immense towfeer or profit arising gradually in the course of near two centuries, in consequence of an extraordinary influx of specie, from the improved rental of the lands; yet we repeat, notwithstanding how favourable all these circumstances, the utmost keffyet that Meer Cossim appears then to have added to the yearly effective revenue of the whole province, was no more than - - - - - R^s

(3d.) RUNGPOOR, or Fetchercoondy; in the still frontier circar of Cooch Beyhar, and therefore always under a distinct foujedarry government, which was secretly increasing the financial income of a fertile territory of 2,679 square miles, famous for its staple produce of tobacco (long undoubtedly before the introduction

introduction of different species of that plant from the western hemisphere, after the discovery of America; but more substantially valuable to the sovereign proprietor, for its great improvable growth and manufacture of opium, with a superabundance of the more essential article of rice; yielded on this occasion (under the denomination of profitable receipts of rent, hitherto fraudulently withheld from the public, by subordinate Mussulman delegates on the khalsa toomary jumma of 2,86,485, after the accession of the pergunnah of Koondy, with a subsequent soubahdary assessment of only 6,23,233 rupees) a new surplus revenue to the exchequer, of - - - - - Rupees - - - - - 1,51,498

(4th.) RAJEMHAL or Cankjole, in like manner, a frontier to the soubah of Bengal, when held separate from that of Bahar; commanding the formerly important passes of Sielagorry and Teileagorry between the western hills and the Ganges, and having been improved by powerful rulers, by civilization of its more savage Hindoo inhabitants, or cultivation of the woody mountains and valleys, comprising near one half of the whole area of the province; calculated in all to contain only 2,217 square miles; but above all, being increased to this its present important magnitude, by the annexation of several neighbouring more productive zemindaries in the plains, on the eastern borders of the Ganges; from an extent of territory yielding only 74,317 of aasil toomary in 1722, to what would then by equal enlargement, and doth now produce on the same royal standard, khalsa and jagher 2,66,826; with only a jumma of additional soubahdary assessments since established, of 31,625 rupees, so a keffiyet was of course discovered, and moderately estimated at - - - - - Rupees - - - - - 42,757

IT is a mistaken opinion, that the portion of ceded territory, in contradistinction to the dewanny of Bengal, was not included under this head of Cossim Ali's profitable increase of revenue, because the cession took place at the commencement of his administration. Rights of sovereignty and possession of land in Hindostan, are held as dear as in any part of the world, and could never be transferred by a Mussulman, bonâ fide, without mental reservation of resumption, whenever power or accident presented a favourable occasion, for so doing. When therefore, force or expedient policy prevails in compelling a sacrifice of the reality, still the nominal superiority, is seldom or ever relinquished,—and in like manner, as the representatives of the illustrious house of Timoor keep on the records of their duffer all the revenue accounts of a great dismembered dominion; so it was perfectly natural, however presumptuous, that a naib soubahdar, appointed by the English, under the forms of the Mogul government, should follow an example of such high authority. Besides, though all legal sunuds or formal grants of country, must constantly be drawn out, conformably to the royal standard valuation of the jumma toomary, as now variously established in the several soubahs of the empire; yet it is not to be imagined that such concessions are ever made, without a perfect mutual understanding of the true, actual, specific, and relative worth of the territorial property thus alienated. Accordingly, when Meer Cossim in 1760, conferred on the East India Company what hath been since termed “Ceded land,” though undoubtedly, the Zymn inventory or described particulars, were rated at the fixed original rental of Jaffier Khan, we are not to suppose that these districts had till then, been exempted from all additional burthens of viceregal or foujedarry assessments, more than the rest of Bengal; nor that the donor neglected to set forth at the time, or the dewan and canongoes of the soubah subsequently, to continue on their registers, the then ascertained hustabood or intrinsic value of the gift bestowed, always to be understood as acquiesced in, more or less reluctantly, without some apparent substantial equivalence, in proportion to the antecedent acknowledged right of possession. Such appears to have been the case, in the instance of the two following ceded provinces, rated for a share of the keffiyet.

(5th.) CHITTAGONG or Islamabad, containing 2,987 square miles, of a hilly, jungly country; of which, scarcely a third is, at all capable of cultivation. Though this small portion seems better adapted for the production of coffee, pepper, and the more valuable spices of the East, than perhaps any other spot on the continent of India; forming the south-east extremity of Bengal on the borders of Aracan or Mogg and the sea; while favoured at the same time, with a very convenient port, in either season of the year for coasting traders in the Bay, it became of course one of the most important frontier stations for both the marine and standing military forces of the Soubah. Accordingly, from the earliest days of Mogul government until the revolution of 1757, the lands of this province had been appropriated in jagher abshani, or assignments for the support of troops in garrison; and being also subject to independent foujedarry administration, underwent the universal change of an improved rental, under the denomination of towfeer, to distinguish such profits from the keffiyet arising on the khalsa portion, though on occasion of the dismemberment in 1760, the former proper appellation, appears to have been confounded, in the latter. The amount of the pecuniary increase was however less than might have been expected, considering the vast intervening alteration effected during the two last centuries, in the relative value of money; for, on the aasil jumma of rupees 1,76,795, established by Jaffier Khan, all the additional imposts afterwards levied, were only - - - - - Rupees - - - - - 1,56,340

(6th.) BURDWAN zemindary; comprising 5,174 B. square miles, being half environed by the jungles of Midnapore in Orissa, of Pachete and Beerbhoom, was, like a garden in a desert, deemed wonderfully productive in the beginning of the present century, and estimated accordingly on the standard rent roll, comparatively high, at rupees 23,26,444, including some recent acquisitions of valued adjacent territory of the pergunnahs of Aruh Mundelgaut, &c. though it hath been since brought more to a level, in proportioning all the subsequent soubahdary assessments, rather conformably to the greater progress of improvements around, by fixing only a slender increase of 7,62,831 rupees. But as there were besides, domestic annexations, considerable foreign unrated districts, added to the zemindary, such as Ehaminbhoom, dismembered from the neighbouring circar of Gualpatah in Orissa, with the lands of Chunderconah, Berdah, Bhurset, formerly only subject to a peshcush or tribute and since completely reduced; so it was found in the moment of transfer to the Company in 1760, that a keffiyet had been levied, and therefore proper to be resumed, on account of the latter acquisitions, amounting in the aasil and ezafa to - - - - - Rupees - - - - - 1,37,660

12th.—TOWFEER JAGEERDARAN. If Cossim Ali can be said to have possessed any distinguished merit as a financier, it must be allowed on occasion, first, of the resumption of the extraordinary accumulated assessments which had taken place on the principal jageers, since the period of their being originally alienated in the reign of Akbar, and annexed in the nature of temporary help to the offices of the great provincial delegates or ministers of state, in in lieu of personal services, and to defray the ordinary public expenses of government, including all those of the more effective military force of the whole Soubah; secondly, more especially, by incorporating the amount so resumed, with the ausil toomary of Jaffier Khan, and instituting the aggregate of both, thenceforward as the most recently established standard rent-roll of the country, according to which all future grants of assigned territory whether in jageer or otherwise, were to be drawn out and valued;—the whole, being in the true spirit of the actual constitution of India, and perfectly conformable to the practice of three of the ablest, best authorized, and most experienced, famous approved of soubahdarry administrations ever appointed to rule Bengal, under the Mogul government. Nor are we to be surprised, such being the case, and so fully warrantable, the moderate increase of the old Crown rent, which from this time had arisen from the profits of the jageers, admitting at the same time the notorious characteristic chicanery of native agents, that not only the pecuniary substance of the thing should be altogether suppressed, but the technical word itself, expressive of the improvement in question, and perhaps leading to a discovery, be most carefully omitted in all the voluminous complex accounts of the revenue, figured or in writing, fabricated by the Hindoo or Mussulman officers, employed in the department of the finances, since the acquisition of the dewanny, and obtruded on their rulers, as conveying the fullest state and information of the former or actual sources of the legal public income due to the exchequer; at least, of the amount realized in the yearly period of the collections.

(1st.) JAGEER CIRCAR ALI. The scattered lands composing this extensive princely domain, which, if united, might be computed to contain about 5,500 square miles, had been assigned, since the reign of Akbar, as hath already been observed, with the most ample jurisdiction in matters civil, military, and fiscal, to the nazim soubahdar for the time being, to defray his personal and household expenses; all those of the foujedary or high court of criminal judicature, as well as a large portion of such as were allowed to be incurred, in support of the standing forces of the country. The whole territory being formed of fragments, dismembered from the richest districts of Bengal, though thus disadvantageously dispersed, yet of course largely participated in the extraordinary influx of specie occurring within the two last centuries, and was long known to yield a proportional increase on its original rental, of which the account collections, however distinguished, as appertaining to the department of the Nizamut, had always been under the superintendence of the officers of the dewanny duffar, from the time of Sujah Khan. Accordingly, when Cossim Ali succeeded to the administration of affairs, as naib (on the suspension of the virtual authority of his father in law Meer Jaffier, still to be considered, formally, as high representative of the real or nominal government then instituted, but entirely exonerated henceforth, from contributing any share of his official income, to make good the quota of heavy military disbursements, hitherto forming the great ostensible purpose of an appropriation of such magnitude, held by a species of feudal tenure;) so the substitute soubadar, with great policy, resumed the ancient assigned grants of territory, so much improved, ascertainably under the influence, with the separate management of many successive viceroys, and issued new sumuds, with the imperial sanction, for other lands, rather of larger extent and rental, when calculated on the ausil jumma of 1722, while no less capable of yielding an equal revenue; being chiefly comprised in the zemindaries of Rajeshahy and Nuddeah, which were notoriously under-rated, in every article of additional assessments subsequently levied; and having annexed at the same time to the khalsa, the toomary of the former jageer, together with the handsome towfeer, or profitable increase ascertained to have accumulated on that antiquated rent roll, and now brought to account in the very moderate sum of - - - Rupees 15,31,235.

(2d.) BUNDEH WALLA BARGAH. The important jageer held under this title, constitutionally and formally, as well as really, appertaining to the dewanny representative of government; more compactly situated, but of less value and extent than the preceding one, as being certainly limited to an area not exceeding 2,000 square miles in all its dimensions;—yielded exactly on the same financial principles, and after a similar operation of resumption of the former, on the new assignment of other lands, with rather an addition of old valued rental, a towfeer or profitable increase of - - - Rupees 2,18,674.

(3d.) AMEER UL OMRAH. The jageer assigned, under this designation, to the bukhshi or commander in chief, though probably in all, containing at least 800 square miles, yet being situated in the less productive frontier provinces; produced only an addition to the ancient jumma toomary, of - - - Rupees 15,381.

(4th.) OMLEH ANSHAM, being the military jageer, and after the cession of Chittagong to the Company in 1760, chiefly confined to perhaps 700 square miles in Dacca province, as well as thenceforward distinguished more properly by the terms "mushroot tannahat" or conditional assignments of territory for the maintenance of the still existing garrisons of the soubah, in like manner, afforded on this occasion, a towfeer of - - - Rupees 1,15,724.

JAGEER Appropriations of Territory, as arranged under the administration of Meer Cossim in 1170, rated according to the original Rent-roll of Jaffier Khan in 1128.

(1st.) CIRCAR ALI, or Jageer, allotted to Jaffier Ali Khan, as nazim or soubahdar of Bengal, of which more than one-half was very politically assigned on such of the undervalued zemindary lands of Rajeshahy, at the ausil jumma, as constituted formerly the akta of Meer Jumla, including the large pergunnah of Bhetooreah for 78,990, forming at least one-fifteenth share of the district, improperly so called; and until this time, entirely annexed to the khalsa portion, from the reign of Shah Jehan, excepting R* 4,810, set apart as the dustoor or nancar of the zemindar, now Ranny Bowanny. The whole territory thus appropriated to make up a princely establishment, perhaps the largest ever admitted of under the Mogul empire to any viceroy not of the blood royal, it must be remembered, was to support a great part of the military for the internal defence of the country; to defray the expense of embassies or negotiations abroad; besides the ordinary charges entire of the remainder of the civil list, composed of the household and high courts of foujedarry or criminal judicature. But by the political arrangement of 1760, and adopted thenceforward to the present day, the formal soubahdar was virtually exonerated from the expensive incumbency of the two former articles, together with the exercise of the higher concomitant duties of representative sovereignty, and burthened solely with the latter; yet to soften the pain of dismissal from the lucrative consequential post of principal nawab or delegate, as well as to palliate the family offence of a son, in effecting self-substitution in the room of a father-in-law; so Meer Cossim, on this occasion, procured the imperial sanction for a jageer, rather of superior magnitude, in behalf of his kinsman, than ever was enjoyed by any preceding nazim, without being liable for more than a third of the disbursements usually chargeable on that great official territorial fund. henceforth increased to -

(2d.) Governor Lord CLIVE. A species of tenure, with all the circumstances of its application, equally unprecedented in the official records of Hindostan, as it formed a new and separate article in the appropriation of the royal revenue of Bengal. By the constitution of India, or the Mogul empire, if the grant specified in the zymn or contents, all the particulars of the pergunnahs or districts assigned at the ausil jumma, his lordship, in fact, should have enjoyed in life-rent, or during the pleasure of the emperor all the financial regalities of the fief, and might have claimed from the Company as official landholders, not only, the original crown rent, but likewise all the soubahdarry assessments afterwards established, or additional receipts of annual rental, though constituting the sole advantage to be derived from the territorial gift to themselves, besides the inferior local jurisdiction, with ordinary zemindary perquisites; and his em-ployers formerly held their claim of surplus income, either in virtue of the jageer assignment thus drawn out, or if only, expressing generally so much to be paid out of the lands in question, depended on the forbearance of the king's dewan in demanding the further dues of the exchequer, until the necessary union of substance and form to the conquered right of dominion, long since acquired by the English. On the other hand, according to the constitution of Great Britain, in defining the legal obligations of servants to masters, his lordship might have been altogether deprived of a trifling gratification unequal to the least of the national advantages to be derived, perhaps exclusively, from the exercise of his personal abilities. By the more commanding influence of genius, the sin-imposed upon the world, by the more commanding power and pretensions to regal talents and merit of the individual having produced an equitable compromise indefinitely his own particular services, produced an equitable compromise which extended the benefit of the jageer even beyond the constitutional period of such grants usually terminated with the life of the possessor, when construed into its more limited signification of a fixed pecuniary annuity of -

CEDED LANDS.

(1st) BURDWAN, according to the tenor of the imperial Mogul Firman, in confirmation of the Soubahdarry Sunnuds for this district. The Company's rights to free perpetual tenure, expressed by the terms Taam or Altunglia, extend to the whole Chuckleh so denominated; which includes the zemindary of the same name, in its more ancient limits fixed by Jaffier Khan, the whole of Bishenpoor and Pachete, with nearly $\frac{1}{2}$ of Beerbhoom. But in this, as in many other instances, advantage seems to have been taken, through native craft, of the local ignorance of foreign rulers; for effectively the Territory surrendered in conformity to the grant, comprehended simply the jurisdiction of the titular Raja Tillakchund, second in descent from Keerutchund, the first acknowledged legal occupant of Burdwan; and whose official possessions, though recently enlarged by the fee large perannals of Bundelgaut, &c. and eleven lesser ones of Arsch, &c. in the chuckleh addition to the interior dependencies of Chunderconah, &c. formerly only tributary, then completely reduced; did not in all, by any means, constitute an adequate compensation for the proper ceded territorial rights, when defined, inclusive of the three aforementioned neighbouring entire or participated zemindaries. Such as they were however, in extent or value at the moment of transfer in 1760, corresponding with the Bengalee year 1168, they stood rated on the original vent roll -

(2nd) CALCUTTA, or twenty-four Pergunnah Territory, originally granted in 1757-8 by soubahdarry perwannah or dewanny Sunnuds, in the form of a zemindary, with rather an equivocal obligation for payment of the ancient crown revenue, was confirmed by the Mogul in 1765 wholly and for ever free in reversion to the Company, as an altunglia unconditional jageer, after nine years of further assigned occupancy to Lord Clive; having been in all, at the former period, exclusively of land rent and customs of the town of Calcutta -

(3rd) CHITTAGONG Tannah and Province (forming about half the garrison jageers, termed Onleh Aisham) when ceded to the Company in 1760 by Cossim Ali, to be afterwards confirmed by the King, in terms of the other free perpetual grants of territory, was rated, altogether, waste and productive Lands -

THE preceding Amount of Revenue then, stating it in round numbers at two crore fifty-six lacks of sicca rupees, it must be observed, constituted only the malgoozary, or net effective yearly income of the soubah, immediately received into the khalsa shereela, or realised in transfer by established jageer appropriations, after having allowed an estimated deduction (besides the modern additional articles of muscoorat of about 25 per-cent. or 35 lacks of rupees on a medium) from the actual gross receipts of the public exchequer on the ausil of jumma of the whole country, to defray all the various charges of collection in the mofussil, excepting the Sebundy militia establishments; and which, corresponding with the similar de-general head of finance, comprehending the actual unavoidable expense of interior management, was undoubtedly amply provided for, in the general assessment of Jaffier Khan, ex-erent-roll, and ever since carefully endeavoured to be concealed, as well as secretly enlarged by the encroachment of zemindars and other permanent officiating landholders, through the ignorance, corruption or negligence of the higher more immediate Mussulman officers of vinces of Bengal, under the denomination of kharijee jumma, nancar, bazee zeemen, or chakeran; while it affords at this moment, as we hope in due time will be experimentally proved, one of the fairest, most expedient, important objects of reform and economical saving, occurring in the whole scope of financial arrangement.

As to the ordinary deductions, on account of remissions or balances proper to be allowed in stating the actual receipts of revenue on the foundation of a revolving annual settlement; it will be invariably found, in times of internal tranquillity, free from any great public calamity, that the aggregate of both, on a medium of years, never exceeded 12 lacks of rupees; of which, one-third being the usual amount of the former article, (and granted with so much difficulty under the tedious Mogul forms of obtaining the imperial assent, in consequence of the legal incompetency of the viceroy dewan or other representative delegate, to pass an act of such high authority exclusively, as the special prerogative of the sovereign) was more than amply compensated for, by the nuzzeranah, or contingent income arising on the renewal or grant of zemindarry sunnuds, forming a constant source of supply, though making no part of the annual bundobust, while the remaining proportion of two-thirds, or 8 lacks of rupees generally uncollected, was brought forward from year to year, in addition to the gross of the current settlement, virtually to counterbalance a nominal remission of rent, first admitted in the government of Sujah Khan, on the formation of the teshkhees jumma toomary, and continued thenceforward on an increasing scale, eventually of real defalcation to the present time.

We must therefore assign very properly to the period of Cossim Ali's administration, the entire net amount of rent thus realized, clear of all charges from the lands in question; to which, if there be added 65 lacks proceeding from the soubah of Behar, together with 11 lacks more as the annual malgoozary of Midnapore, (being the only portion of Orissa annexed to the great vicerealty of Bengal) we shall find the total effective income of all the dependencies

Revenue in 1763/5, of - - - - -				Sicca Rupees dependencies of that triple soubahdarry in 1763, to be little or nothing short, of three crore 32 lacks of sicca rupees. But to estimate the nawab deputy's share of this imperial revenue, it should be remembered, that he had ceded in free gift to his constituents, a territorial fund of 51 lacks annually, and to his formally superior Meer Jaffier, 23 lacks additional in jaguer, to support the establishment of the ruling family; which united sum, being de-state, enjoyed by the younger branches of the three soubahs, leaves only two crore 58 lacks for the actual receipts of Meer Cossim; and of this amount, the surplus 58 lacks, may very reasonably be allowed for all the yearly military and civil expenses incident to his own proper government: thus estimating six crore, of which one and a half proceeding from Behar to have been the possible accumulated sum of three years collection; to support ungrateful meditated rebellion against the real sovereign authority, until his final expulsion from Bengal in August 1763; for as to the probable treasure amassed by his predecessors from Suraje ul Dowlah and Jaffier Ali, the whole was undoubtedly embezzled and squandered in the corrupt extravagance of, or in the confusions attending, the revolutions, which put a period to their respective administrations.

To form, however, a complete estimate of the revenues of Bengal, at the very moment of the acquisition of the dewanny, to serve as a just standard of comparison, in ascertaining the rise or fall in the sum collected and carried to public account, subsequently to that important period; it is not only necessary to state the improved net rental of the soubah as received by government, including that of the ceded lands, from the year 1760 to the 12th April 1765, (being the commencement of the Fussillee 1172,) but indispensably requisite to ascertain with all possible accuracy the gross amount then actually levied from the whole country in the name or behalf of the state, either avowedly by its proper officers, or secretly, through the channels of corrupt agency and personal favouritism, as far as the same hath been at any time virtually realized to the exchequer. For as the regal proprietary portion of the entire annual produce of the soil, constitutionally fixed at one-fourth, inclusive of zemindarry, with all other charges of collection, is now become the perpetual free unalienable right of the Company, whether considered formally as dewanny representative of the Mogul emperors, or really trustee for the British conquests in India; so it is highly expedient to know, with some precision, the total burthen of assessment on the ryots, rather if possible to afford them relief from vexatious zemindarry exactions, than increase, or even approximate the equitable standard of the sovereign landlords dues; as well as to regulate with the utmost economy the current expenses of the financial department, and thus check, by the only practicable means, the profuse extravagance, wilful negligence or incorrigible propensity of native Hindoo or Mussulman agents, who must ever unfortunately be employed in lessening the established nagement of the collections, to abuse their trust by corruption, in lessening the established revenue, or by fraud, in swelling fictitiously the yearly disbursements, thereby diminishing the proper income of the state under the plausibly humane, though legally inadmissible pretence, of granting remissions of rent to the peasantry, without the express intelligent concurrence of the superior ruler.

The expediency of thus ascertaining the utmost gross rental of the country is more especially in latter times the greater, that no fixed universal rule in stating the annual bundobust hath been observed agreeable to ancient institution; but in some instances, the net jumma, and in many, the whole demand, inclusive of variable proportions of incurred charges, have been exhibited in the yearly statements, to the no small confusion and intricacy of public accounts; rendering comparative views impossible, from the abstract and always difficult, under fluctuating forms of dry voluminous detail, though such mode of comparison be the only one hitherto of practical use to the sovereign, for the discovery of possible defalcations, through the lamentable ruinous want of a true constitutional standard, as well for raising the public supplies, as limiting the necessary expense of collection. In the summary anticipated discussion now intended of this topic, which more properly belongs to the ultimate division of finance under the head of Expenditure, we must claim every allowable indulgence.

Perhaps minute accuracy in objects of such vast magnitude would be impossible, and may not be expected from one wholly uninstructed, by official practice, in the revenue department, while unaided totally by any authentic manuscript records of the Company; except through the few imperfect documents which have been of late years published, more frequently to gratify personal resentments, or support the contestation of private pecuniary ambition, than to answer the laudable patriotic purpose of communicating useful genuine intelligence to the proprietary and nation at large, deeply interested with exclusive right in the ascertainment of the whole undisguised truth, touching the management of their proper territorial possessions in this country, though precluded by remote situation and other circumstances, from learning, through ordinary numerous channels of more general knowledge, such particular local information. After all, the novelty of the attempt, and the importance of the subject, may afford the best founded hope of meeting with all the indulgence required; not from any satisfaction herein given, but the probability, that the inaccurate result or partial analogical calculations, may some time or other, lead to more correct information derived from greater experience, in a course of authoritative investigation.

First, we proceed to state the Malgoozary or net revenue, clear of charges, actually received by government, or then levied, and clandestinely withheld by its native Hindoo or Mussulman officers, but soon afterwards realized to the public treasury, on account of the following districts of Bengal, which were imperfectly rated in the preceding bundobust teshkhees kool of Meer Cossim, and in part continued so, until the acquisition of the dewanny.

CEDED LANDS:

1st. BURDWAN zemindarry, when acquired by treaty confirmed by sunnuds, dated 4th Rabbul ul owal, 1174 Hejrah, being the first year of the King's reign, answering to the 1st of the month Katick 1167, Bengaleh, or 11th October, A.D. 1760; was estimated to yield, as hath been stated, a clear revenue of Sicca R^s 31,75,391, in the following Fussillee year 1168, A.D. 1761-2, when assessed for a gross jumma bundy of S^a Rupees 37,24,474, including only a certain portion of the mofussil charges produced net to the Company's Exchequer a malgoozary of

At the expiration of 3 years lease; viz.—to the end of 1171, or 11th April 1765, settled by public auction, a KEFFYET, or profit on the same territory, exclusive of 1,03,825 rupees for resumed chakeran or servants lands, comprising a portion of the zemindars nancary was stipulated as the annual increase on the former malgoozary, which the country was then thought capable of bearing

TOTAL Jumma bundy of 1171 S^a Rupees 44,84,049, leaving, after deduction of every mofussil charge carried to public account, and stated S^a R^s 6,23,620, a clear revenue of

It is however to be observed, that from the errors of the system at that time pursued in the administration of the finances, large balances were incurred, or incidental expenses accumulated; and it was not until the year 1177 or A.D. 1770/1, that this malgoozary was completely realised, clear of all charges, by a different, and nearly the old constitutional mode of management.

(2d.) CALCUTTA, 24 pergunnahs semindarry when formally granted in 1757-8, was computed to yield Ausil and Abwab, Malgoozary of sicca rupees 5,53,125 as stated in Cossim Ali's Teshkhees Bundobust of 1763. Though a large increase had in the mean time, been made on that assessment, under the Company's administration; still it was understood before the acquisition of the dewanny, that frauds were committed by the native collectors. A scrutiny, which bears testimony to the ability and integrity of Governor Verelst, was therefore set on foot, and finished in 1173; when it appears, inclusive of the salt khafary rents, &c. after allowing a deduction of £. 14. per cent. mofussil charges on the whole collections, that a keffyet of sicca rupees 6,78,533, reckoning the amount of Lord Clive's jageer, resumed A.D. 1784, might have been, and was actually realised to the exchequer 1174 Bengaleh, in a net malgoozary,

Besides which, the ground-rent, customs, and all the variable duties of the city of Calcutta, not included in Meer Cossim's bundobust, and forming the whole ancient revenue of the Company in Bengal, before the revolution of 1757, without comprising the recent chowkydarry, or police taxes, appropriated to defray particular charges, might have been always moderately estimated, on a medium of years - at 3,00,000

3d. CHITTAGONG, when ceded in 1760, was assessed for a malgozar of S^a R^s 3,23,155, but undoubtedly yielded then, and was soon afterwards found to do so, by gradual improvement or ascertainment of the revenue, after a deduction of about 12 per cent. for Mofussil charges, according to the actual receipts of the exchequer in 1178 - 4,66,428

SALT LANDS, Ceded, and Dewanny.

That woody inhospitable tract of country, which, for the sake of distinction, may be henceforth termed Noondeep, bordering the sea coast in a curve, stretching across the mouths of the Ganges, about 330 British miles from Jellalore West, on the frontiers of the Chukleh of Midnapore in Orissa, to Islamabad, the port and capital of Chittagong, near the S. E. extremity of Bengal, and comprehending (inclusive of the Sunderbunds) an area at least of 7,000 square miles in isles or continent, already comprised in the general dinner-sions of the soubah, hath always been of considerable importance, as a strong natural barrier against foreign invasion, or as yielding the necessary article of salt for internal consumption. But it is only within the period of British administration, that its soil and growth of wood, both essential to the production of this valuable manufacture, have been turned to the proper financial account of the state, instead of enriching, with greater burthen on the people, two or three corrupt foujedars with a few favourite Mogul or other foreign merchants; who always, exclusively, under Mussulman government, possessed the entire trade of the country; while the larger body of Hindoo natives, employed in this and every other branch of commerce, were, as they still for the most part continue to be, mere carriers, brokers, shroffs or agent banians, receiving indefinite commission, settled at discretion by themselves.

To acquiesce however entire in the political rectitude of the principle, on which a former source of partial individual benefit hath thus been converted to public utility, or rather restored to the requisite funds of national supply; it is to be remarked, that the sovereign is not only absolute proprietary lord of the earth and water from which the salt is extracted, as well as of all the fuel required in the operation; but, by mode of agency, is the sole im-pay, receiving or entitled (besides an allowance of at least one rupee per month each, while so employed as usual in the six dry months occupation) to a further constant annual full kharije jumma of the chakergan or servants, to be cultivated by themselves in the proper season of the year;—and that the manufactured produce of a soil thus possessed, assisted by labour so purchased, is as much the civil right and saleable property of the despotic master, as the natural yearly growth of those lands termed Khas and Comar, occurring every where daily throughout the country; which, becoming for a time untenanted, are cultivated by hire or contract, on the special account of the state. Nevertheless, a species of monopoly it must be called, where all territory, with its rude or cultivated production, ap-pertains pertains exclusively to the prince. Yet, as in its actual form, it leaves the most perfect freedom of interior traffic to all European and native inhabitants, excepting only British subjects, after the first immediate sale on the spot where produced; it differs widely from those pernicious institutions, under the same denomination, in other parts of the world, fraught with complete disadvantages to trade. At the same time, the policy of converting it into a source of revenue, seems not only warranted by the present insufficiency of public income, the extreme moderation of all other territorial burthens on the people, being greatly short of the sovereign's constitutional claim, with the expediency of thus levying the annual supplies in part from the intermediate agents of production, and partly from those employed on behalf of consumers; but is more than justified in the opinion of perhaps the ablest, most liberal, financier of the present age, and by the example of the greatest civilized existing nations. When in France (a dominion not more than double the extent and population of Bengal) the gabelle, which is an impost, or rather the exclusive right of selling salt throughout the kingdom, produces an annual revenue to the crown of 54 millions of livres, equivalent to two crore of rupees; and yet the king is neither territorial or saline proprietor of the rude materials required in the manufacture, more than rightful arbitrary employer of the workmen, advancing with risk the original cost of labour, involving a certain maintenance for a number of industrious, though thus virtually the sole privileged merchant for vending in the retail of general farms throughout all the interior provinces,—the great necessities of life prepared at the hazardous expense of others for the market;—the virtue and political economy then of British administration in India, must at least be acknowledged in one instance, by resumption, with improvement, of a dormant or hitherto misapplied source of public supply, under the head of Peroosh Nemuck, or sales of native manufactured salt, involving at all times an impost of equal weight on the country, but only fully and properly realized to the exchequer since the year 1780. Anciently, and still in common, the quantity of this article made for, and consumed annually in Bengal, may be estimated on an average, at twenty lacks of maunds each of 80 lbs. weight, produced by the labour of 45,000 Molungees; who with superior agents, including all expenses paid in money, were entitled to an allowance of about 20 rupees, usually advanced by contracting merchants, besides what was deemed equivalent to 40 rupees more, furnished constantly in land, and returned to the state from the original standard price of delivery at Hooghly, fixed latterly at 60 rupees per M^d, though afterwards for the benefit of a few Mogul monopolists, of which the principal had generally the title of Fakher-ul-Tejar, most exalted of polists, enhanced throughout the different markets of the soubah at various rates, reducible on a medium to at least 2 rupees per M^d. But since the annexation under the same vicereignty, of the province of Behar (formerly supplied with salt, as the greater part of Upper Hindostan still continues to be, from the lake Sambkur in Ajimere) the total required for home consumption or foreign exports to Asham, Napaul, with other neighbouring inland states, hath increased 8 lacks of maunds. That surplus was at first imported from the Coromandel coast, in what is called Madras or bay salt, of baser quality and value, as produced by the simple operation of the sun on sea water, introduced into shallow pits prepared for the purpose near the shore. But on the establishment of the private society in 1765, and since again, on the institution of the present public plan, it was found expedient to prohibit this branch of Indian coasting trade, affecting alone the native inhabitants of the country. And now the whole quantity in yearly demand (being on a medium 28 lacks of maunds) is manufactured in the proportion of 1/3^d in the ceded and 2/3^d in the dewanny lands of Bengal, for the use probably of 10 millions of souls there, and one fourth of that number in Behar; imposing only a moderate charge for one of the comforts of life, at the utmost calculation of all expenses, to be - - - - - Sicca Rupees 54,50,000.

- (2^d) AKHERAJAT ARUNG, expense of transportation to the place of sale; weighmen, erection of storehouses, purchase of utensils requisite for the carrying on of the works, &c. with all contingent charges, on an average - 4,50,000

TOTAL net annual sales of Salt, requiring always an advance for 18 months of 15 lacks of rupees capital to answer charges, before complete returns can be made to government; which, since the year 1781, hath resumed its right to the entire original profits accruing from the manufacture, and previously in part brought to public credit under the three following heads, proper to be continued in the same forms of account, and distinct agency, to serve as mutual checks, though now to be deducted in a lesser proportion from the whole clear produce, amounting to - - - - -

of the Ceded and Dewanny lands. In 1184, the amount thus appropriated and assessed on the same territory, in addition to the net rental, appeared to be 47 lacks; which served to defray the newly stated charges of poolbundy and foujedarry adawluts, with some more recent articles of the moshairch; and in 1190, or A. D. 1783-4, after the expiration of a complete cycle of 10 years, the clear malgoozary jumabundy (settled in behalf of government, continuing still almost precisely at the same reduced original standard of one crore, 92 lacks) left for the teshil serinjamy, thus exclusively levied after accumulation of the expense of the dewanny courts, security, &c. 74 lacks of rupees; remembering, however, that in this calculation, the charges of manufacturing salt, and collection of the customs, forming together an object of 2½ lacks, and always deducted from the gross receipts of both, in the abstract annual rent-rolls, is to be set against the salary and allowances of about 140 gentlemen, servants of the company, employed in all branches of the revenue department, and whose establishments, being extraneous or foreign to the system of Mogul administration, should have no admission, into a fair comparative view of the finances of Bengal, prior to the era of the Dewanny, unless perhaps for the very inadequate proportion of one-seventh of the amount, or 3½ lacks allowed to about 44 of those gentlemen, having 15 collectorships, which is far from being attended with the necessary authority, have not the shadow of that power, heretofore annexed to rather a greater number of foujedarry and zelahdarry Mussulman residences, distributed in like manner formerly throughout the country, but with fuller effect, in executing the duties of such high important stations.

This sum of 64 lacks then, supposed here to be the aggregate of yearly supplies appropriated to pay the first interior expense of the collections while under the management of native agents, if really ascertained to be as stated, an excess of the proper income of the state proceeding from territorial funds described within the khalsa portion, but altogether new, or recently discovered, exclusive of the net malgoozary resources; so it must be considered to have existed, as well in surplus of the bundobust teshkhces of Cossim Ali, or the greater estimated revenue of 1171, as of the unaccountably diminished jumabundy of the following year, under the auspices of Mahomed Reza Khan. For we must contend there is not a single individual Mussulman or Hindoo, necessarily or actually employed in the finances, or an article of unavoidable necessary expense, now incurred by administration, (excepting the moderate salaries to indispensable British agents), that was not before equally chargeable to government, in the most economical periods of Mogul sovereignty; and therefore, though the united, free, and appropriated public supplies of the present time, fall infinitely short of their more ancient standard, the defalcation is to be placed entirely to account of the former, or unappropriated resources, involved in the first grand simple operation of reduced settlement, at the acquisition of the Dewanny. In confirmation of this position, the two following instances of assessed lands within the soubah are adduced;—and though in local dimensions, these may be thought too small or undefined, to serve as a basis for exact calculation; yet as they ought in other circumstances to be perfectly analogous, they may be here safely admitted in support of what will appear rather an unimportant conclusion, until the more full positive statement of the principal fact, now only glanced at in the comparison.

The first is, in the zemindarry of Rajeshahy, and stands sufficiently authenticated among the documents referred to in the "Plan of settlements, &c. p. 90." under the title of, a Ryot's account of rent in the village of Deknypahr, dependent on the pergunnah of Gowas, in the Bengal year 1182, A. D. 1775-6. This account, if before received in proof of the great accumulated burthen on the country, might here be exhibited to show, as well the vexatious unauthorised exactions of the zemindar from the peasantry, as injustice to his sovereign, in withholding the amount of actual collections; for it is more than problematical, whether any British administration, so far from entering into such minute detail of the revenues, as to proportion the gross assessments of a whole district to the subdivided farms of a village, have ever been able to ascertain the proper names of all the greater included pergunnah divisions, each comprehending a multitude of these smaller territorial portions. But the purpose now of bringing it forward, is still of more extensive scope; being to estimate, from the data it affords, the similar defalcation of all the landholders of Bengal, on pretence of charges or increasing demands of the state.

To proceed accordingly. The ryoty jumma of 63 begas, 6 cotta of different sorts of ground, as stated in the ausil, which certainly means a proportion of the original toomary rent-roll, equal to ABWABS on that capital, being the soubahdarry proportionable assessments, already described, levied to 1144 A. B. A. D. 1737 towards the end of Sujah Khan's government at 5 A. 7 C. per rupee, is	24	0	0
To 1167 or 1760, on Meer Cossim's accession 11 an. per rupee	7	10	5
To 1172 or 1765, on the Dewanny acquisition, and yearly following on various pretences, and at different rates	16	8	0
To 1181, or 1774, altogether unauthorised, rateably	14	0	17
	9	2	6
Total Ausil and Abwab	23	3	3
	71	5	8

In like manner, a portion of fussillee or harvest grounds of 79 begas 6 cotta rated according to the yearly produce of crops at ausil jumma of rupees 18. 7. 17. with abwabs similar to the foregoing of 30. 11. 4. yielded in all - 49 3 2

Making together, a revenue little short of the original, increased three-fold, amounting to - - - - - Sicca Rupees 120 8 10

Now conformably to this exaction, calculating on the same proportionable scale, the assessment of the whole soubahdarry, should pay annually to government in gross about 63 lacks; whereas its then rental little more than exceeded a third of that amount, being barely equal to the ausil jumma; and the kooll bundobust of the soubah entire, should have been rateably in like manner, near four crore of rupees, including at least one-fourth to answer supposed mofussil charges.

The second instance, comprehends the ceded districts of Burdwan, Calcutta, and Chittagong; and, as these lands offer a much more extensive field for observation, so, in being longer known, or more perfectly investigated, and including in a certain proportion, all the variations of soil, climate, or other circumstances influencing the state, with the yearly value of rude and manufactured produce, to be found in every other province of Bengal, they also must afford a juster, more accurate scale of comparison, to determine the measure of the whole by a part, than the former or any other standard which occurs within the very narrow limits of actual knowledge. The data presented to us are; a widely dispersed various territory, part advantageously and part unfavourably situated, including in all its dimensions 9,043 British square miles, of which 8,000 may be reckoned productive, forming about one-ninth of the superficial contents of the whole soubah, coming under the like class of profitable sources of revenue. The ausil toomary jumma of the same portion of land, being the fixed proportionated medium result of its value, ascertained in 1722 after the minute authoritative enquiries of many able successive administrations, in course of a century and half of practical despotic rule, was, as hath been already stated, 27 lacks of rupees, which became increased by abwabs or improvements about the era of the Dewanny in 1765, to a net malgoozary of 58½ lacks; being, either in the case of the original or accumulated rental, nearly one-fifth share of the similar periodical assessments levied throughout the whole country, exclusive of the sayer duties and more recent profits set forth under the head of Feroosh nemuck. At the same time, the separate extra collection made from the same territorial funds on account of zemindarry or mofussil charges, amounted in all the districts, on a yearly medium taken at the commencement and conclusion of the cycle of 19 years, ending in 1783-4, to Sicca R. 8,33,673. Admitting, then, this last article denominated teshil serinjamy to bear the like proportion of one-fifth, that the clear khalsa revenue of its estimated universal to the total of the soubah; it will yield altogether, within 5 lacks of its estimated universal produce at first calculated, on foundation of the actual charges, including 17 lacks for the expense of native agency in the customs and manufacture of salt. But if the mean proportion of rent and extent of territory compounded, being a seventh part, were made the ratio of wojooahat collections throughout the whole of Bengal, the amount would exceed 75 lacks.

2. KHARIE JUMMA, or rental of lands, alienated prior to the last corrected formation of the ausil toomary of Jaffier Khan, as a constant ample maintenance for all the inferior native officers employed in the collections or otherwise, and for the charitable support of the Bramins, with the whole religious establishment of the Hindoos. This, at present forms the grand source of emolument to the zemindars and canongoes, as well as to all the classes of public servants, subordinate to both these official heads respectively;—and by the fraudulent extension of it through their collusion, under the ignorance, corruption, or negligence of government, since the last regular authoritative appropriation of such land, which might have taken place at the permanent original settlement of the revenues in latter times; and if not the year 1722, hath become enormously great, more especially in the nature of resumptions and absolute limitation, must in the end, inevitably absorb all the most productive, still existing territorial funds of the state. The lands thus alienated, were from the beginning distinguished under the two general descriptions Chakeran or Bazee zemeen, of which the chakeran, as the word implies, comprehended the territorial assignments made for the subsistence of servants of all denominations and ranks, throughout the soubah, viz. Nancar or Khanahbarry; so, the whole or the greater part of the zemindaran, canonguan, mokuddintan, putwarrian, paikan, molungian, and rahberan, forming together a body of at least 150,000 individuals, Mussulmen or Hindoos, necessarily employed in the department of finance. Generally in the other provinces of the Mogul empire, all these classes of natives, (excepting the zemindar and molungees, the latter of which are peculiar to Bengal and Orissa), were paid by a rissoom, commission or per-centage on the amount of their collections, either in money or in kind, or they received a moshairch or monthly allowance, in the nature of wages for services performed. But in Bengal, it appears that an ample provision has been made for the whole corps officially, in free land, entirely separated from and struck out of the original rent-roll; probably from the period of the Afghan kings of the country, hence the institutions, in this particular, were perhaps adopted, by their successors the Moguls, occasioning a particular local deviation from the established regulations of the latter.

Accordingly, it was found from the researches of the Auneens, throughout those districts, to which alone they had been deputed in the year 1777, (and scarcely forming two-thirds of the area of the whole soubah, inclusive of Burdwan, previously investigated) that no less than 10½ 10½ lacks of begahs were thus entirely appropriated lakheraje, or rent free, under the head of Chakeran, besides the nanear, zemindarian, and putwarrian, of which it doth not appear that any account, unless in a few instances, hath ever been obtained; and that valuing merely the ascertained territory so disposed of to servants, at the moderate yearly assessments of 1½ rupee p' bega, the amount would turn out 15½ lacks of rupees.

But the 2d division of the kharije jumma, being the bazee zemeen, or certain lands set apart for various uses, comprehends by far the greater portion of all the fraudulent alienations now in question. The true undoubted cause of this, will naturally occur to such as are acquainted with the bigotry and superstition of the Hindoos, the influence of their priests, and irresistible propensity to encroachment with chicanery, under presumed ignorance or negligence of rulers; when it is discovered that charitable donations to Brahmins, and endowments, for the maintenance of their various religious establishments, make up the greater part of this head of territorial funds, at present in a manner wholly dormant. It will seem nevertheless at first sight extraordinary, that either of two successive dynasties of Mussulman princes, both of the Sunnite most rigid sect of Mahomedanism, who, so far from tolerating the Hindoo worship, more frequently destroyed their temples, and imposed the lizea as a fine for idolatry; should yet, in the particular instance of Bengal, appear to make any provision, for the support of the local system of religion. In truth, they did not, and could not, avowedly do it, whatever might have been the lenity or policy of Akbar, in whose reign were framed the original institutions now universally received, in allowing a secret indulgence. Virtually, however, the effect was the same, whether the rajah's toorel mull and mausing, the emperor's first delegates for the settlement of the finances of the soubah, were authorized or not, to show any consideration for the ministry of their proper faith. But to what amount may have been thus clandestinely sacrificed, or by wilful negligence lost to the state, no records could then, or now, be produced to evince; and indeed, it is only of late that this portion of the Mogul empire had arisen into some estimation by its increasing riches and prosperity, that the enquiry or establishment of the fact, could be deemed of any great importance to preceding rulers. To the present, it may be sufficient to know, that all such alienations legally, and according to the constitution of India, as derived from the highest sovereign authority still formally existing, are absolutely null and void in themselves, ab origine; and only to be tacitly acquiesced in, on principles of policy or equity, inasmuch as they are to be restrained within bounds of moderation and universal national justice. The greater part therefore, of these spurious fraudulent donations denominated dewutter, birmooter, bishnowutter, perooter, mahooteran, &c. which for some years past, have been daringly made, if not even openly avowed, (from the experienced lenity of British administration) to have been conferred under a certain form of sunnud or grant, as the sole act and deed of zemindars, the mere acknowledged officers of government, in violation, or rather by treasonable assumption of the first exclusive royal prerogative, in so traiterously transferring any portion of their cahtimam or territorial trusts, to the prejudice of the perpetual proprietary right of dominion, besides a present enormous defalcation of the public revenue; we repeat, the greater part of these must necessarily, but with full intelligence, joined to the most cautious vigorous perseverance, be resumed; though constituting, inclusive of all other appropriations under this head, as appeared even from the partial enquiries of the native aumecas employed throughout the same districts, and with the like limitations as have been mentioned in stating the chakeran, a territory rather exceeding 45½ lacks of begas, estimated at least at 67½ lacks of rupees.

The aggregate amount then of both these branches, chakeran and bazee zemeen of the kharijee jumma, appears to be 55½ lacks of begas, which valued at a rupee and half each on a medium, should yield a net rental of rupees 83½ lacks -

But in this calculation, the following districts, comprehending altogether square miles 30,148, are totally excluded, as not having been subjected to the aumecny investigation, viz. Dinagepoor, Edrackpoor, Sylhet, Ateah, &c. Silberis and Tomooluck, Tipperah, Pachete, Rangamatty, Cooch Behar, with the muscory zemindaries entirely, and which being collectively equal to one-third of the whole area of the soubah, or at least one-fourth share of all the productive lands, should yield in proportion of the total of the foregoing 3-4ths 18½ lacks of begas, equivalent to - Rupees

Further, it may be admitted as certain, that little or no part of the nanear to the zemindars, or what may have been taken by the canongors themselves in land, as an equivalent for their russoom, hath been reckoned in this account, and which making together, when restricted to legal bounds, 7½ per cent. on the ausil jumma toomary, may moderately be estimated 7 lacks of begas - Rupees

Thus supposing the total of the kharijee jumma to be 81½ lacks of begas, yielding -

Again; this statement of appropriated lands, will be more largely verified, by proportioning the better known alienations of the Ceded territory to those of the whole soubah (thus supposed imperfectly ascertained through aumecny) than hath been already done, in respect to the revenue article of tehsil serinjamy. Accordingly, the districts of Burdwan, Calcutta, and Chittagong, forming a ninth of all Bengal, after various scrutinies, being found to contain in chakeran or bazee zemeen, begas 11,76,808; the proportionate result for the country entire, would be at least one crore of begas, producing a yearly rental of one crore and a half of sicca-rupees.

In like manner, the amount of the two more general heads of tehsil serinjamy, and the kharije jumma (being the rents or lands in part either legally bestowed by government, fraudulently alienated by its proper officers, or unconstitutionally seized by the actual possessors, taken together) shows the whole of appropriated resources to defray the real, supposed and fictitious zemindary, mofussil charges for interior management of the collections, or support of the honour and dignity of a munificent sovereign, to be one crore eighty-five lacks of rupees, which sum added to the net malgoozary revenue of the crown, as before stated, on the acquisition of the Dewanny, makes the total of the kham wosool, or gross receipt of the revenue, annually raised from the country and its inhabitants at large (on the proper account, in the name or with the assumed authority of the ruling administrative territorial lord proprietor of the soil, as the sole exclusive unquestionable high representative territorial lord proprietor of the soil, according to real assessments, inclusive only of a few estimated resources, which have been actually realized or ascertained, under different administrations at various periods, from all the severally specified defined districts of the soubah of Bengal) to be in round numbers, five crore and three lacks of sicca rupees; while it may be further advanced, in anticipation of what will furnish the similar details for a separate essay, that when the gross rental of Behar with the Chuckleh of Midnapore in Orissa are taken into the account, the sum of the whole, cannot fall much short of six crore and thirty lacks of sicca rupees.

Here we must bring immediately to our recollection what Mr. Holwell, generally the most enlightened political writer of his time, on the affairs of Hindostan, and who then possessed, in a manner exclusively, all the local financial knowledge of his countrymen, published about 20 years ago on the subject of the territorial funds now in question. If it should be admitted, as it appears, that his calculation of eleven crore, goes as much beyond the reality of rents or revenue actually forthcoming (as the amount proportionably will be found to fall short of the entire original gross produce of the same lands, which ought legally to be in quadruple ratio to the sovereign proprietary dues) it is to be remembered in justice to this gentleman's authority, for which we entertain the highest respect, that he could not have been furnished with any accurate details under the distraction and jealousies of the then ruling Mussulman government, as is apparent from the allowance of two crore of the then ruling Mussulman government, for the city of Dacca; and that the 24 pergunnahs of Calcutta (the for the sayer duties alone, of the city of Dacca; and that the 24 pergunnahs of Calcutta (the circumstances of which are made the basis of his analogical computation for the rest of the country) were the only portion of territory at that time tolerably explored, or perhaps in the least known to the other agents of the Company for some time, after the revolution of 1757.

To distinguish however the net malgoozary revenue, expedient and proper to be drawn into the exchequer, from the total of the gross rental of Bengal, which may for the utmost safety be thus computed five crore three lacks of rupees, it will be necessary here to exhibit for deduction, an anticipated sketch of what might have been constitutionally, and in justice, deemed a sufficiently great munificent allowance, or what can in probability be actually incurred on account of mofussil zemindary charges of society at large, by an adequate militia, as well as to secure the interior tranquil order in particular of the great mass of the people, called Hindoos, in affording support, secretly or avowedly, for the whole soubah, braminical establishment of any possible utility. Accordingly, supposing the whole soubah to be composed of 400 cahtimam or zemindary jurisdictions, inclusive of 1,600 pergunnahs, having each a canongoe; and with an equal number of putwarries, 25,000 villages, every one of which reckoned to contain on an average 60 houses for as many families of rather less than 7 persons, to make the entire assumed population of 91,000 square British miles, affording throughout a territory in all its dimensions of 91,000 square British miles, being entitled to about 72,000 in some measure productive, then the three orders of superior native officers here indicated as requisite for the internal management of the finances, being entitled to about 14½ per cent. on the gross receipts; 28,000 berkendazes and schundy troops, assigned over, at a moderate valuation of one rupee per bega; 50,000 pikes forming a relief of stationary frontier districts, with a subsistence to each of 12 begas in free land, assigned over, at a moderate valuation of one rupee per bega; 45,000 mofungees, being the presumed original number of salt manufacturers, possessing for their permanent support, perhaps only 4 begas individually, besides a rupee per month in rice or money, for their half year's labour; together with a surplus of 2½ lacks of rupees, for pool and bhery bundy, bazee khurch, &c.;—will make the total of mofussil zemindary expenses, as probably settled to the year 1722, rather more than 25 per cent. or 36 lacks on the rent-roll of that period, being the ausil jumma toomary of Jaffier Khan; and if at the same time we allow, under the head of Bazee zemeen 20 begas of the richest productive land to have been set apart for the charitable religious maintenance of a brahmin, admitting of two to every village; consequently a legion of 50,000 for the whole country; we shall find the amount of all the appropriated funds, for the authorised necessary disbursements of the state, during the vigour of the Mogul empire, to have been 46 lacks of sicca rupees. But though the collection of the soubahdary abwabs, since established proportionably on the original assessment, cannot really be attended with any great extraordinary charge, while thus levied rateably by zemindary jurisdictions, already universally subjected to similar observations of finance; nearly 3½ per cent. additional hath been incurred under the head of Maseoorat, on account of these newly accumulated imposts, or in consequence of a more extensive agency; to which being added one third of expenditure for a like increase in the quantity of salt manufactured and annually consumed, together with 4½ lacs more, to answer all further contingencies;—the total of all charges will be 56 lacs, leaving a clear revenue to the sovereign from the soubah entire, of four crore forty-seven lacs; thus, supposing a zemindarry deficiency of one crore twenty-nine lacs less than the net malgoolary of 1171, besides a reduction of one crore twenty-six lacs more on that settlement in 1172, including together a positive unaccountable resurable yearly defalcation of at least 2 crore of sicca rupees.

If however, it were allowed in a case of such importance to offer the result of a calculation, founded rather on analogous hypothetical reasoning, than on any detail of facts more or less correct in the exposition, I should be inclined to go beyond the bounds of the preceding settlement, and assign to Bengal, in all its dimensions, an area of 90,000 square British miles; of which one-fifth hilly, jungly, barren and useless; one-fifth mostly unproductive, as lying under water, towns, highways, woods, or pleasurable wastes; two-fifths a rich common pasturage with beneficial plantations, altogether exempted from taxation; and the remaining one-fifth proportion, alone in cultivation, liable to the rents of the territorial proprietary government at the established rate of the rebba, or one fourth of the yearly gross produce of 18,000 square miles each of 1,036 begas, which at the medium value of the lands of the 24 pergunnahs, being 1½ rupee per bega should yield (exclusive of salt profits, but including the foregoing collection for charges) a revenue of five crore twenty-two lacs seventy-two thousand sicca rupees.

To those who have heard of the vast riches of Bengal, and unfurnished with any local standard of appreciation to estimate them intrinsically, are forced to draw their comparative ideas solely from the fictitious more opulent circumstances of European dominion, still in a progressive state of improvement; while Asia, for ages past, hath been on the decline or stationary;—it may seem rather wonderful, that the proprietary share of a territory so advantageously situated in the temperate zone (known to be the most fertile of Hindostan, which is the acknowledged garden of the East, and productive at least of a double yearly harvest) should be even so inconsiderable as it appears to be, from the largest of our calculations. For, it will naturally occur that the lands of Great Britain, of the same dimensions almost precisely, with perhaps a more scanty population; yield a rental to the proprietors, inclusive of their present rated tax of four shillings in the pound, of twenty millions sterling, or crores of rupees, supposed to be only one-fourth of the gross produce realized by the tenantry, and which is nearly four times the valued landlord's revenue as stated for Bengal, bearing the like proportion of a quarter to the total returns of agriculture forthcoming to the Hindoo peasantry. But the relative wealth of nations, depends on the wants of the people, and the surplus product of their labour, beyond internal consumption carried abroad for sale. A seer of rice with a little seasoning, a rag, a hut, or the canopy of heaven (the whole brought within the daily expenditure of an anna or two-pence for each individual) satisfy all the natural wants of an Hindostanny husbandman or manufacturer; and if he can save at the end of the year, a couple of rupees from the produce of his industry, rated at 100 in the market, he is infinitely richer, more contented, and easy in his circumstances, than the individual following either of these occupations in England, who, after incurring a personal expense of two shillings a day, should yet be able to lay by an annual profit of two guineas from his whole estimated work of 100. At the same time, with respect to the natural intrinsic riches of country, it is to be observed, that in proportion as the soil generally is in itself fertile, so it will be found poorly cultivated from prevailing habits of national indolence; and that in Bengal the ordinary effect of relaxed industry is prodigiously heightened by the influence of climate or religion; while 2-5ths of the whole territory being exempted from rent, as appropriated for pasture, become of no account to the state, though supplying the greater share of the animal exigencies of the people. On the other hand, besides the operation of all these circumstances, in limiting the quantity or value of manufactured produce, the workmen being confined to particular casts or tribes from one generation to another (being universally mere journeymen without capitals, and depending annually on foreign merchants for advances, which must be in proportion to the extra demand) so this fund of acquired opulence is also comparatively small, to the similar resources of the western hemisphere.

To others again (who possess an imperfect local knowledge, have been misled by misrepresentation, and draw general conclusions of impoverishment, from an apparent irremediable derangement in finance, which could not be traced with experienced certainty, to its proper original abuse) the fact of moderation in our statement, may appear problematical. A superficial view of things, partial or interested information, may appear obtruded on us through the chicanery of the natives, and afterwards from common adoption, admitted as just without further investigation; a few circumscribed instances of decline in population, agriculture, manufactures, or trade; occurring to what is called general observation, expressed in terms equally indefinite, but which in truth, can only be depended on, when circumstantially stated and confined to special personal surveys of the small number of Europeans dispersed throughout Bengal, rarely a theatre of pleasurable excursion, together with the pretended grievances of farming landholders, who, presuming on the ignorance or lenity of their foreign proprietary rulers, grow insolent with the riches of accumulated defalcation, and become clamorous for remissions in the professional cant of being overrated in the yearly assessments of territorial rent: all these, have been anticipated, or might be adduced, as proofs of exaggeration in the revenue estimate in question. But the most conclusive, supposed posed unanswerable argument, is likely to be drawn from the presumed great drain of specie, and consequently ruin to the country; first by the oppression, then the rebellious flight of Cossim Ali, with all the hoarded extorted treasure of three years tyranny. Let us however enter into detail, and we shall probably find the reasoning built on this last event, alike baseless with every other hypothesis maintained to depreciate the actual resources of the country. The usual tribute of a crore, chiefly in money, sent to Delhi for 25 years successively, ending with the soubahdarry of Sujah Khan as already stated, at least prove by induction an annual influx to the same amount through the channels of trade, as it is allowed that local prosperity was constantly increased to the close of the same period. An equal space of time thenceforward elapsed to the acquisition of the dewanny, in 1765, in which it does not appear that any remittances of revenue in cash or otherwise were made to the emperor, though it be incontestible from the rise of panchoutra customs of Moorshedabad on manufactures, that the value of exports from thence must have nearly doubled; and allowing even gratuitously that Meer Cossim might have carried off the whole of his probable treasure collected from Bengal, which before hath been stated at 4½ crores of rupees; also, that the amount of presents, &c. chiefly to British individuals, with the restitution to the company from the revolution of 1757 to 1766 together, stated in the Third Report of 1773, at rather more than 5 crores, might in like manner have been withdrawn from the currency in circulation; still it will follow, that 15 crore in specie remained in the country in accumulation of the former stock of provincial wealth, and which must have prodigiously extended all the resources of government in the latter period beyond the utmost scope to be allowed to the preceding one, so celebrated for order, opulence, and general prosperity.

If in aid of our calculation an accurate view of the commerce of Bengal, which ultimately fixeth the valued stock of labour, of rude and manufactured produce, as well as of money, could be brought into comparison with the general rental of the country, we are persuaded the result would be a collateral support of what we deduce from a combination of such independent facts, reasoning, and opinions, as have been already stated. Moreover, the subject itself, besides affording the pleasure of novelty, would, we presume, be highly interesting to the public, as forming the only beneficial justifiable grounds of the continued dominion of Great Britain over the richest of all her Asiatic possessions, and opening a field for useful speculation in experimental politics; hitherto imperfectly explored, or wholly neglected by European philosophers. The most enlightened of these however admit, that the population, industry, and universal state of things in Hindostan, have been long, in a manner stationary, or liable to little intrinsic alteration under despotism; thence concluding generally, that all the sources of national wealth alone made productive with greater extension, through free operations of commerce, must be there, rather slender, and confined to exact limits. But they are so far from saying any thing specific and certain, from which practical inferences might be with safety drawn, to guide the conduct of public measures, that on the contrary, their doctrines imperfectly explained or misunderstood, added to wrong intelligence touching the policy, civil rights, or technical language of the East, together with the necessary confusion of ideas in using the relative term rich, without a just local standard of comparison, have led some of our statesmen into many very important errors, by the adoption and application of maxims, alone suited to the circumstances of society in a progressive state of refined improvement, and therefore extremely different from the one now in question. Amongst the most serious of these mistakes, may be reckoned;—1st. Such as occur in considering the nature, extent, and influence of the trade of Bengal respectively to the internal prosperity of the country, or of its foreign interests, subservient to the views of the protecting power of Britain.—2dly. Supposition of a great comparative stock of labour in agriculture or manufactures, requiring a proportionate quantity of circulating specie, with a large capital necessary for annual reproduction, and capable of considerable increase by accumulation of the profits.—3dly. Condemnation of the Company's present mercantile system, as ruinous in drawing any, or so large a portion of surplus manufactured produce, instead of the ancient greater pecuniary tribute paid to the Mogul, from conquered dependencies, now destined eventually to enrich the ruling dominion of a more distant sovereign, without indeed any adequate returns on the part of the latter, except the rarest blessings of peace, personal liberty, security of property, with the most powerful national protection hitherto ever enjoyed by Indian subjects.

The discussion of these various topics at length, would require as many volumes as there are heads of discourse; and we are so far from thinking ourselves equal to the task, even if our inclination led to it, or the performance were more intimately connected with the proper subject of the present treatise, that we are rather disposed to believe that no one individual of our countrymen, however considerable his abilities and local enquiries, hath been yet able to collect a sufficient fund of experimental knowledge to accomplish such an undertaking, with any thing like a complete intelligence, or tolerable accuracy. The following summary Analysis is therefore, rather in the view of propounding so many questions to be resolved for verification or to correct assumed data of facts chiefly, than to offer any certain or satisfactory information on the disquisition.

First. On the nature, extent and influence generally of the commerce of Bengal, it is to be observed; that in itself, it is of the simplest kind, entirely confined to the rude and manufactured produce of the country, exceeding the few natural wants of a poor people almost wholly agricoli, mere labouring farmers, under a single sovereign proprietor of the soil, in whose behalf, to make good a moderate demand of rent for the small share of lands in in cultivation, they are forced to carry the surplus of their industry beyond a homely consumption, to interior markets, where it is then properly distributed into two branches of inland trade; the one, furnishing the necessities of life to the rich, or class of idlers, soldiers, artificers, mendicant priests, the civil list of the government, with all such as are maintained for public service, or in the employment of wealthy private dealers of every denomination: the other, affording raw materials in silk, cotton, or such animal and vegetable productions for the use of that portion of peasantry who are journeymen manufacturers, as well as labouring husbandmen, and work up those rare inimitable fabrics, or valuable commodities serving as the basis of foreign commerce, hitherto in a manner exclusively supported and carried on by stranger-merchants, either in the hope of gain to settle as factors for their respective nations, in a country requiring nothing from abroad, yet possessing many desirable luxuries to spare, which, though the contented inhabitants wanted activity or mercantile enterprise of themselves to export, was to be done through the medium of other agents necessarily, from the greater better regulated money rental established on the Mogul conquest, or in Bengal more recently, from the constant demand of the same manufacturers on the part of former dealers, now acting both as sovereign and merchant; but who, if finding it unnecessary to bring little or no specie into the country, in the latter capacity, have also in the former, discontinued the practice of drawing the usual or any proportionate quantity out, under the denomination of a tribute.

The extent or total pecuniary valuation of this commerce, however limited in substance to the ancient standard with respect to the whole of Hindostan, hath certainly undergone a great change (as well by fictitious enhancement of price, as almost entire compression, within a single province) of all the foreign manufactures of the empire, in consequence of the three great events we have often called to remembrance; the discovery of the American mines; of the passage round the Cape of Good Hope; and dissolution of the Mussulman empire of Bejapoor. Yet after all, the utmost we can allow in 1765, with a possibility of verification from a five years medium, ending in 1785, of the custom-house rated collections for the gross trade of the soubah in question, doth not exceed in amount $6\frac{1}{2}$ crore of sicca rupees; which might be further subdivided, after its prior twofold distribution internally, into the following branches:

1 st . Articles of prime necessity; such as rice, vetches, wheat, and all other sorts of grain and pulse; fruit, roots and greens; oil, ghee, with every kind of laitage, carried to inland markets, and solely for home consumption, excepting about a twentieth part for victualling ships, for occasional supplies to the Coast of Coromandel; altogether computed at - - - Rupees	Two crore.
2 ^d . Articles of second necessity; such as salt, betel leaf and nut, tobacco, opium and saltpetre of Poonmah, &c.; sugar, spirits and bang, of universal growth and use; iron wood, chunam, earthenware, hemp, leather, wax, lack, indigo, pepper, woollen blankets or comlies; all, likewise for interior consumption, except to the value of a fifth exported in salt, opium, indigo and saltpetre - - - - - Total	{ One crore and 20 lacks. }
3 ^d . Articles of luxury; being all the raw silk, cotton and silk manufactures of the country, including the price of rude materials, with the labour, and of which two-thirds may be reckoned for foreign exportation, allowing to Europe a crore and sixty lacks, and sixty lacks more for the gulphs, coasts and islands of the Indian seas, with all the surrounding Continent of the rest of Hindostan, leaving only for home consumption about one crore and ten lacks; being in all - - - - -	{ Three crore and 30 lacks. }
To make up the Total of our calculation, as stated - - - - - Rupees	$6\frac{1}{2}$ krores.

As to the influence of such a commerce in securing with political certainty, internal prosperity, as well as the most liberal, mutually beneficial, and necessary foreign protection of Britain, it will best be shown in discussing the two succeeding heads.

Secondly. On the mistaken supposition of the existence of a great comparative stock of labour in agriculture or manufactures, requiring either a proportionate quantity of circulating specie, or a large capital, necessary for annual reproduction, and capable of considerable increase by accumulation of the profits. Taking all the ground in tillage, in the course of the year, to be 35 million of the small ryotty begas, of which perhaps, from the constitutional indolence of the inhabitants, only one third is in actual cultivation during either of the three seasons, khereef, rubbi, and bhadoovy; we may reckon for every 25 begas of the whole, one labouring farmer or ploughman, who with a family of five persons, male and female of all ages, will make the aggregate of peasantry, including manufacturers to be eight million four hundred thousand, in a total population of 10 million of souls allowed to the soubah entire. The gross product of the land, with the labour performed in different degrees by such a body of people employed in husbandry throughout Bengal, cannot reasonably be estimated on an average, at a greater rate than 6 rupees per bega, amounting in all to 21 crore of rupees, being rather beyond the quadruple of our largest assigned rental to government; and if to this be added, three crore more for the work of manufacturers and artificers, with rearers of the silk worm, we shall find the total value of the annual industry of the country, to be no more than 24 crore of rupees, to furnish an ample subsistence for the great mass in or out of productive occupation, besides a small proportion for cattle; cattle; to provide a stock of raw materials with machinery for workmanship, or renew the seed and implements in husbandry; and lastly, to pay to the sovereign territorial proprietor the moderate fixed demand for rent, forming properly the whole revenue of the common-wealth for the support of the necessary civil and military establishments of government; valued generally since the days of Akbar in money, which then began to flow in from abroad more abundantly, in consequence of the discovery of the American mines, and facilitated commerce with Europe through multiplied channels round the Cape; or which, being re-found at home, in the buried treasure of the superstitious Hindoos, was soon again thrown into the general circulation, from extravagance, with the increased measure of internal luxury, supported exclusively by their Mussulman conquerors.

The quantity of specie thus required in current use, to regulate the money price of all things, though undoubtedly much increased in the course of the two last centuries by an extraordinary influx of fictitious wealth; hath yet at all times, been extremely small, comparatively to what might be necessary for any European state, resembling most in circumstances the situation of Bengal; and can bear no proportion to the whole annual produce of the country. For in the first place, it is observable that the bulk of the people here, being husbandmen and manufacturers, provide, independently of each other, perhaps fully for their family maintenance or wants; and as there is no occasion for interchanging the product of the respective industry of these two great orders of men, among themselves; to neither, can they have any need for the ordinary pecuniary medium of circulation. It is therefore, solely to carry on the operations of commerce, that money is ever wanted. But the value of this commerce (consisting of the surplus of the land and the manufacturers the labour, carried annually for interior sale, to answer the homely consumption of all the other inhabitants, or less important demand of luxurious foreigners) hath been stated in its greatest extent, at $6\frac{1}{2}$ crore of rupees; and of this, near $5\frac{1}{2}$ crore, exclusive of the amount of the sayer and salt revenue, should be received yearly into the public exchequer. The payment, however, of such income is not, as in other countries, prolonged to so distant a term; neither, does it depend wholly, as might reasonably be expected, on the three local subdivisions of the fusillee or harvest season; nor is it even allowed to be made quarterly; on the contrary, it must be forthcoming by kistbundy, or monthly instalments; and as the like rule is universally established for all the disbursements of government, which thus absorbs 5-6ths of the surplus product of the soil and labour, as well as for the sole expenditure of individuals, whether in servants wages, detailed advances on account of provisions, materials of manufacture, or finished work;—so we may fairly and with great safety, conclude that the circulating capital in specie, at the period now in question, was made, at least, to perform three revolutions annually; and that the sum actually required for current use, probably never did exceed two crore and 20 lacks of rupees, or about one-third of the whole value of exchangeable commodities sold in course of the year.

Accordingly, when the effective revenue of the soubah was nearly at its greatest height, under the administration of Meer Cossim, and all productive regulations of finance most rigidly executed, the average amount of rupees brought into the mint for annual recoinage, ascertained by a duty of 2 per cent. to the state, doth not appear to have exceeded the old standard of $1\frac{1}{2}$ crore, forthcoming even in the soubahdarry of Jaffier Khan; and 70 lacks more must be thought no inconsiderable allowance, for the more minute languid circulation of interior mofussil-traffic. At the same time, it is perfectly consistent with our belief, as capable of being brought to political demonstration, that an equal quantity of specie what is appropriated for current use may be employed as a dormant capital liable to occasional drains, and of more or less public utility, in proportion as it is distributed among the five several monied members of Indian society: viz. the sovereign, merchant, banker, zemindar, and manufacturing dealer. In the hands of the two first, with whom, five parts in six, will be found indispensably requisite, and make no more than what in policy or legal right is the former's due, such a proportion of the quiescent signs of wealth, being the constitutional overflowings of a superabundant commerce, may indeed be called a sinking fund;—but it is a provident one, and ultimately beneficial, because in the course of national events, it must again be frequently thrown into the general mass of currency. If the share of this dead stock, falling to, and locked up in the coffers of the third, should prove excessive, a great and universal inconvenience arises from it, in giving the command of the market to a set of men who will not fail to distress the state and individuals with most exorbitant exactions of interest, batta, discount, or exchange, in every operation of loan, credit, or disbursement. On the other hand, if a large disproportionate part of this surplus fund of cash, be acquired or left with the fourth, it becomes extremely detrimental to the public interests, and if not tending to the immediate dissolution of society by rebellion, corruption, or profligacy, is, only as the lesser evil, perhaps entirely withdrawn from circulation, literally dead and buried, never again to be brought forward, unless through chance or violence, as hath been sufficiently experienced during the whole course of lenient British administration. But with the fifth, or manufacturing dealer, who always largely supplies the deficiencies of his own active and dormant capital, by encroachment on the merchants stock (perfectly understood in the operation of incurring outstanding balances should any useless money remain beyond the requisite advances for home or foreign demand) after satisfying selfish niggardly wants, it can only serve to encourage idleness and extravagance, and enhance the price of his proper labour, without the smallest benefit to the industrious poor.

Yet if the quantity of circulating, idle or useless wealth, be thus limited; how much more so on comparison, will be found the profitable capital required for annual reproduction. This

This is a subject that affords the largest scope for speculation; but least for controversy, as being most familiar to European experience, and therefore best suited to the present abstract. In agriculture, instruments of husbandry, the seed, and wages of labour, absorb the whole requisite productive capital. Under the first head, Cattle, forming in other countries the grand article of expense, are scarcely of any consideration, in Bengal; or if otherwise, alone to the prince, through whose bounty a much larger never failing stock than is necessary for cultivation, hath been, from time immemorial, reared and fed gratuitously by a superabundant pasture; but even if this were not the case, and that any casual accession to the number of peasantry could be looked for, among a people of stationary industry, and religiously confined in the occupations of different castes; ten yoke of oxen, sufficient for the ordinary yearly three-fold cultivation of 100 begas of ground, may be purchased generally throughout the country, for 30 rupees, while less than a fifth more of the same amount, will furnish ploughs with all the other implements required, even if the rude materials for building office houses were thrown into the account. In like manner, the seed is supplied by a very inconsiderable portion saved from the annual produce, and probably for all the lands of the soubah, doth not exceed in value 20 lacks. Then supposing 14 crore to be the aggregate wages of labour for the whole year, at the rate perhaps from 17 to 18 rupees to each individual of all ages, male or female, furnished by 350,000 mokuddeman ryots, or chiefs of inferior farmers; yet as this sum, is chiefly paid in provisions daily or proportionate to the returns of the triple annual harvest by monthly instalments, so the amount required in advance, never can exceed a twelfth of the total in money and kind. In a word, we are sure of being within bounds, in estimating the whole productive stock employed or necessary in agriculture, at less than a crore and a half; in the outlay of which, the farmers are more than amply compensated by the proprietary sovereign of the land entitled to rent, through the extraordinary profits accruing from a free unbounded pasturage.

In manufactures, the capital necessary and usually employing the whole industry spared from husbandry of at least a million and a half of people, will be found still less in proportion, than what hath been assigned to the greater division of agricultural labour. All the raw silk produced in the country, and chiefly for foreign exportation, may be valued prime cost at 50 lacks; but of this sum scarcely a thirtieth part, can be laid out in the purchase of cocoons, or rude materials in their original merchantable state; and being advanced at different times of the year, according to the successive bums or crops, varying in number from three to six. Of the mulberry and product of the worm, the amount required in any given period, be- comes extremely small; and will probably be returned in sale to the first dealer, before his stock can be employed, in a second operation. Again; the labour of winders, constituting the remainder of the interval, while all the officers and implements of work required throughout Bengal for this particular occupation (in exclusion of the Company's factories, with the more recent filature buildings) cannot exceed a lack. So that, perhaps the trading stock constantly employed in the whole of this species of manufactures, until it falls into the hands of the great foreign exporter, who is often in advance for the entire yearly produce, may reasonably be estimated under 10 lacks of rupees.

In like manner, all the copas, kerp, or kerpas, being the Hindoory, Bengalee, Shanscrit, and Arabic terms, used indiscriminately for cotton, in its rudest state with seed of native growth, in two unequal yearly harvests may be four lacks of maunds; which when cleansed and dressed for sale, after losing 3-4ths of its original gross weight, will still fetch at the first market, under the changed denominations of Ray, Pomba, and the Arabic Keten, about 12 lacks of rupees; and to this may be added 6 or a third more, for the value of what is annually imported from Surat, but chiefly from Mirzapore, in the zemindary of Benares, requiring together a capital of 18 lacks for the full purchase of rude materials used in all the valuable cloth manufactures of Bengal, whether for home consumption or foreign exportation. The quantity of cotton thus employed, is however always bought by, or delivered out, in infinite detail to the ketences or spinners, and generally in pro- portion to their monthly work, which is at once so laborious and cheap (under circum- stances of the most perfect freedom from all restraints in the power of the sovereign, the merchants, or any of their proper agents, to impose) that though the price of fine thread spun, after losing a third more of its weight in further refinement, be enhanced to 16 times the value of the raw material, yet it is a very remarkable fact, founded on the most expe- rienced credible information, this labour scarcely yields a subsistence of 9 annas, or about 18 pence per month, being no more than three farthings a day, to each individual of a corps of industrious poor, perhaps 18,000 in all, whose work the world besides, could not supply. A fact indeed, which might appear altogether wonderful, if it were not at the same time observed, that the greater part of this body of people is composed of women belong- ing to the families of the husbandmen or manufacturers, and who could not otherwise be more usefully employed, at least during the hot and rainy seasons of the year. How- ever this may be, supposing the number of weavers, whether masters or journeymen, throughout the country, to be 300,000 employed in working annually three millions of pieces of cloth, worth at prime cost two crore and 80 lacks of rupees, including about 15 lacks for the value of silk piece goods; yet, as the amount of thread, is not above half the price of the finished manufacture, and as the capital laid out in the purchase of such materials, seldom or ever, can equal the consumption of two months labour; so the whole productive stock at any time required or actually in use, for completing all those beautiful fabricks, so much the object of our admiration, after allowing a loom of 6 rupees to be re- newed once in 20 years for every workman, will not exceed 25 lacks of rupees, being rather less than the eleventh part of the full advances, made by the great interior or foreign merchant.

On the whole, we may venture to state as incontestible, that the utmost gross capital of every kind employed, or possible to be so, under present local circumstances, with the li- mited demand from abroad, in a yearly reproduction valued at 24 crore of rupees to answer the rent, profits on stock and wages of labour in all the various branches of agriculture, manufactures and internal commerce; falls rather short of one-sixth of the amount produced on 4 crore of rupees, of which two-thirds, may and should constantly be in some shape or other, at the sole outlay or risk of the East India Company as sovereign or merchant, to set in motion a proportionate share of all the industry of the country thus destined to feed so many millions, perhaps of the poorest, relatively, though independently, the richest, civi- lized, most useful, inoffensive, peaceable body of subjects, now existing on the face of the earth.

Thirdly, and lastly: The most dangerous prevalent error is that, which represents the com- pany's mercantile system, as ruinous in exporting any, or so large a portion of the surplus produce of their territorial acquisitions in India, without receiving the usual or adequate returns in specie, or other exchangeable merchandize. But surely those who have adopted this mistake, were uninformed of, or did not advert to, three principal local or experienced analogons facts, which seem irresistibly and decisively, to determine all the merits of the question: viz. 1st. That the Mogul emperors, formerly possessors of Hindostan, drew an annual revenue from Bengal, when its prosperity was supposed to be greatest, of at least one crore of sicca rupees in money, which never again returned into the circulation of the country, unless through the operations of commerce; still conducted probably on a larger improved scale, or at the worst, only varying in channel; and that the succeeding repre- sentative sovereigns, now entitled at least to the same net landed income, give up the claim of pecuniary tribute, because the importation of specie had ceased, inasmuch as they were themselves before instrumental to its influx, and are henceforth contented to receive their regal dues, in revolving manufactured production of the peoples labour; in support of which, they are become highly interested, as well locally in behalf of the poor native inhabitants, as nationally on account of the great important advantages derived from this chief provin- cial domain of the British empire in India.—2dly. That the people of this country generally never had, or can have, the smallest occasion for any foreign importations of goods, the necessities or superfluities of life, raw or wrought up, excepting perhaps one-third of the cotton used in home manufactures, and which, of late years, hath been necessarily furnished from abroad, on account of the increased demand from Europe, together with Hindostanny indiennes, requiring the spur of rigid, perhaps heavier exactions, to turn the attention of the peasantry from the exclusive enlarged private gain of graziers, to the narrowed more public benefits of agriculture; and that the woollens, lead, copper, warlike stores, articles of provi- sion, &c. annually brought from other parts of the world, are solely to supply the consumption of foreigners, luxurious Mussalman natives, or ambitious neighbouring rulers, desirous of introducing among their soldiery the clothing, arms and accoutrements, with such like out- ward appendages of that military discipline, which in latter times hath so powerfully sus- tained the shock of unrestrained tyrannic despotism, in its wild ungovernable career, return- ing to first principles of barbarous anarchy: and, 3dly. That the united proprietary repre- sentative sovereignty of the lands of Bengal, is virtually in right, possession, fact and rela- tive circumstances, but on a large imperial scale, almost precisely what private individual territorial property was, in some provinces of North America, and still continues to be universally, throughout the West-India Islands, with respect to local or more extensive national interests of the high, ruling, protecting state of Great Britain, and differing only in the descriptive terms of conquered and colonized dependencies, the one laboured by free- men, the other by slaves; that, nevertheless, though it be notoriously known, the yearly produce, rude and manufactured, of the latter, has been exported for a century past to the mother country, and there consumed for the most part, without any adequate returns having been made, either in specie or exchangeable merchandize; yet it never entered into the mind of man to say or suppose, that this commerce was ruinous to our insular possessions, but rather, on the contrary, beneficial in proportion to its extent; and that if France or Spain hath preserved more entire, or turned to better account territorial acquisitions in the same quarter of the world, it is chiefly to be ascribed to the genius of a government which unites every idea of right, dominion and national wealth, under the simple power of despo- tism, which is ever found most efficient in maintaining with prompt energy a distant con- trol, and drawing forth the industry of foreign enervated subjects, necessarily ruled by viceregal or other delegated administration.

It would be unfair then to fix on others, a conclusion which we must deem grossly erro- neous, without knowing whether they do or can proceed on the same grounds of facts, as influence our opinions; and, therefore, without further anticipation of what might be said on the subject, we shall content ourselves for the present, in stating simply what the amount is, or should be, of the exports in question made from Bengal in lieu of tribute, without any proportionate importation in return; and how far it becomes beneficial to the English, exclusive of all concomitant political advantages from the possession of such an extensive empire, in the midst of the establishments of other rival European states; considering the exports merely as a branch of the public revenue of the ruling dominion involved, necessarily in two operations of commerce; the one, direct from India; the other, indirect by the way of China.

326 Appendix to Vth REPORT from The Select Committee on [No. 4.]Mr. J. Grant's Analysis of the Finances of Bengal.

In respect to the former, it appears that (Appendix N^o 24, Ninth Report, Select Committee of the Commons 1783) on a medium of 4 years ending in 1779, that the prime cost of piece goods from Bengal, amounted annually to current rupees 49,32,382, which, estimated at the Company's then rate of exchange, being two shillings per current rupee, make,

National income on that capital under the heads of	£. Sterling	493,238
CHARGES: Customs paid to government annually	- - - - -	301,091
Freight, demorage, and 5 per cent. warehouse, &c.	- - - - -	96,774
PROFITS accruing to the East India Company	- - - - -	104,520
		502,385
TOTAL gross average of Sales of Piece Goods in England after deducting 6½ per cent. discount, is	£.	995,623

Now, supposing the Investment increased this year, as desired, to one kroro of sicca rupees, giving up the privilege of exporting raw silk to individuals; then the national gains, nearly in the same proportion of once and a third more, may be estimated at £. 1,172,231. of which £. 700,000. for customs to government.

On the same authority, and from a like yearly medium calculation of the trade of China, it appears,

That the prime cost of Tea imported in England was	£.	244,413
The national income on that capital, under the heads of
CHARGES, customs paid to government annually	£. sterling	218,862
Freight, demorage, and 5 per cent. warehouse	- - - - -	193,927

To which we apprehend may be further added the REVENUE of Excise on this amount annually, on a moderate estimate	-	400,000

Then it is to be observed, that of the capital required in so beneficial a commerce, the sum of £. 200,000. has been, or ought yearly to be supplied from the Presidency of Fort William, as it may be done with the greatest facility, convenience and advantage, without any exportation of specie, by remittances made to China for sales of opium, through an exclusive company of private merchants trading on their own accounts to the Eastern coasts and islands from Calcutta; and that all the British income forthcoming from this reduced capital, calculated on the foregoing scale of national profits, will not exceed £. 804,679. yearly, of which only a third or £. 268,226. properly belongs to the soubah of Bengal, the rest being furnished from Behar. Yet even this amount being, with the clear produce of piece goods, a total annual public gain of more than £. 1,400,000. sterling, of which £. 900,000. in Customs or Excise, being the interest at £. 4. per cent. of £. 22,500,000. of the national debt, make the commerce of Bengal, as derived from the territorial revenues of our possessions there, an object of the first national importance; and we insist, and will maintain, that such or even a more extensive trade than is now carried on by the East India Company in exports from thence, without returns of exchangeable merchandize, is so far from being destructive to the country, that the necessary standard of finance, the ease, welfare and prosperity, of the society at large, particularly the class of manufacturers absolutely and almost entirely depend, on its continuance; while sixty lacks of foreign remaining goods for exportation, must be deemed a most liberal equitable allowance for all the other European companies or mercantile adventurers; especially to those, after perpetrating a most atrocious murderous deed of rivalry, to be forgiven, not to be forgotten, by Britons, are still so jealous of securing exclusively, the trade of their own Eastern possessions.

II.

HISTORICAL and COMPARATIVE VIEW of the REVENUES of BENGAL, under established practical forms of rating and levying the public Assessments annually, in the detail of provincial and actual Zemindarry Divisions of the SOUBAH.

To the Right honourable CHARLES Earl CORNWALLIS, K. G. &c. &c. Governor General in Council, Revenue Department, Fort William.

My Lord,

I HAVE now the honour to lay before your Lordship in Council, an Historical and Comparative View of the Revenues of Bengal, under established practical forms of rating and levying the public Assessment annually, in all the detail of provincial and actual zemindarry divisions of the Soubah. In this is comprehended,

1st. The Tuckseem-pergunnah distribution throughout such portions of territory (ascertained generally, by recent geographical measurement, and described more minutely for financial purposes, by a permanent pergunnah valuation, completed long since under the vigour and highest delegated authority inherent in the Moghul empire) of the present ausil jumma tooimary or original rent-roll, instituted in the soubahdarry of Jaffier Khan, about the year 1127 of the Bengal era; finally corrected in 1135, towards the commencement of Suja Khan's administration; and set forth in a record stated by a late member of this government (Mr. Francis, in his Plan of settlement of the Revenues, A.D. 1776) as still existing amongst the archives of the khalsa, or exchequer, at least in the abstract of the thirteen greater divisions of the country, named chucklahs.

2d. The proportion of Abwabs assignable, and in the total exclusively incident, to entire zemindarry jurisdictions, being in the nature of further additional land-rent levied rateably on, and since establishment of the ausil jumma; at first through soubahdarry authority, afterwards confirmed virtually or in form, by the acknowledged sovereign power of the empire; until ultimately consolidated with the original rental in 1169, or rather, as ought to have been done two years later, on the Company's acquisition of the Dewanny, in nine different articles of new assessment, under so many various denominations of technical significance, extending universally to all the districts of the soubah; but with partial distribution in an aggregate portion of the whole amount of increased exaction, among the several zemindars, or official landholders, according to the supposed capacity of their respective eahitimams, or territorial trusts, which, though always of indefinite or fluctuating extent, were to be thus additionally assessed, in behalf of the state; generally, by entire zemindaries, without entering into the usual detail of the tuckseem-pergunnah war, left as an important operation on this occasion, solely to the landholders themselves, and thereby productive almost of all the abuses or derangement now complained of, in the actually established system of Bengal finance.

3d. The Keffyet, or profitable encrease, alone applicable to khalsa territory, and to be discovered by hustabood investigations into ancient and actual sources of the public revenue; in the Dewanny portion of Bengal, almost exclusively restricted to the foujcdarry districts of Purneah, Rungpoor and Dacca, with the zemindaries of Beerbhoom and Dinagepoor; where being found by Cossim Aly to have long existed in addition to the ausil and abwabs legally established by government; appropriated as the private perquisite of aumildarry financial management, by the officers entrusted with the interior superintendence of these five provincial jurisdictions, the amount of course became resumable on account of the state, and was accordingly in 1169, regularly incorporated with the other funds of the exchequer, by the constitutional form of pergunnah divisions, and a simple assessment, like the original, for each; absorbing the whole of the actual collections, after deducting a reasonable customary allowance for defraying the necessary expense of serinjammy-mofussil, including all charges of zemindarry agency. It may be proper here to observe that this, and the preceding head of the present work, appear also, and generally stand confirmed, in Mr. Francis's treatise before referred to, in the essential though only abstracted form of an account, ascertaining barely the amount of new assessments in addition to the ausil, but without any local distribution to fix the demand practically, on divisions of the country, the landholders or other revenue superintendents.

4th. The Towfeer, or improved rental of Jageer territory, beyond the original standard of assigned valuation, and always proper to be resumed by government on extinction of the feudal grant, in Bengal ascertained, and entered in 1165 on the public records, kept in a separate duffier or department different from that of the khalsa, distinguishing such appropriations of land to the nazim, the dewan, and in support of the marine or garrison establishments of the soubah; but then only partially brought to the credit of the exchequer in the two last-mentioned instances of assignment, while both the former jageers, together with with that of the bukshi, or commander of the troops, were rated asil and towfee to the respective officers in trust, until the gift of the dewanny to the Company in 1172, and treaty with the actual subahdar, surrendering at the same time conditionally his proper official income; when the improved as well as original rental constituting the latter acquisition, should have been passed to account, yet appears then to have been fraudulently concealed or embezzled, and the very term by which it was to be technically understood carefully suppressed; and now only accidentally brought to light, with indication of the specific funds of territory to which made applicable, or from whence still forthcoming substantially, after a lapse of nineteen years of financial British administration.

5th. A statement of the aggregate of all the preceding sources of revenue, in the same familiar detail of existing local divisions, constituting the highest neat bundobust, or yearly settlement of the maal and sayer, including the entire land-rent, customs and duties, legally established in behalf of government throughout the country, in this case considered to extend to Behar and Midnapoor in Orissa, after deducting certain allowable charges of zemindarry management (in Bengal classed under the head of Serinjammy, when supposed more fully liquidated on ascertainment of the hustabood, or that of muscoorat, when compromised with the landholder for a small specific sum, in consequence of the prevalent system there, of levying proportional abwabs, admitting of no increased expense beyond the appropriation for the asil) until the very moment of the Company's acquisition of the dewanny, or the end of 1171, and somewhat later in their proper ceded territory, in order to exhibit the ultimate standard of its improvement: hence continued in stating remarkable periodical settlements in a circle of nineteen years of English management, and finally brought into comparison with the last jumabundy concluded in 1190, terminating on the 11th of April 1784; when, after deducting from the amount herein set forth, alone the like articles of mofussil expenditure, or such charges of native interior agency on account of the collections as were allowed in the beginning to show the neat public income of the exchequer; a defalcation or diminution of about one crore and twenty-eight lacks of rupees, annual rent, appears in that time, to have arisen on the whole clear revenue of the British dominions in the soubahs of Bengal, Bahar, and Orissa; and which diminution, having for the most part taken place at the original settlement of the dewanny revenue in the nabut administration of M. R. Khan, suddenly, unaccountably, and as it appears, fraudulently, the same not being duly notified, nor since in any shape regularly made known or justified to the representatives of the constituent authority of the Company; or in a lesser proportion occurring subsequently, through progressive yearly decline of effective income, more than accumulation of any incurred unnecessary charges of internal management (both however in like manner unexplained, at least in the usual minute detail of time, place, occasion, and other local circumstances, so essentially requisite to check the conduct of provincial agents, or establish a valid plea for the smallest remission of the former highest constitutional demand of the aggregate jumma. Admitting the generally acknowledged improved condition of the country, under the lenity of the British government; also considering the moderation of that greater ancient assessment, comparatively made manifest in the increasing produce of the ceded lands, which were equally rated at the period of acquisition with the larger portion of dewanny territory; so I have thought myself sufficiently well founded in stating the whole as a recoverable defalcation, proper and easy henceforth to be brought back into the public exchequer annually, without any additional import, but rather with the effect of a considerable decrease of the burden of present exaction on the peasantry, and country in general.

A work already delivered in, more particularly entitled, Analysis of the Revenues of Bengal, with reference to a still anterior treatise on the "Political state of the Northern circars," involving the general principles of Indian finance; may be considered together, as comprehending the theory of the present performance, distributed under the same heads, and by a similar arrangement of the subject discussed. But the former was merely an abstract, which, however necessary as a key to understand the technical terms, and constitutional forms of the Moghul empire, in establishing its proper system of assessing the country; could not be applied to actual practice, according to the current modes and known territorial divisions of Bengal. Its greater volume, surpassing even considerably that found necessary in exhibiting the detail, was only the inconvenient circumstance attending a production, brought forward by a simple individual, as yet standing alone and uncountenanced, in opposition to recent prevalent opinions, the interests, the prejudices, or passions of thousands: an individual, conceiving himself called upon by public duty, to expose great and dangerous errors of state importance, adopted originally from ignorance of local institutions; growing into habitual existence through negligence, and supported by the whole corps of natives employed in the executive management of financial trusts, some of which, with circumstances of suspicion little short of positive evidence, were to be made once more appear under an imputation of wilful fraud, in the concealment or embezzlement of the proper resources of government on the company's acquisition of the dewanny, and henceforth, instrumental in the effect of perpetuating the evil. Repetitions to enforce a point of seeming consequence, explanations to elucidate, various epithets to convey precisely the sense intended by expressions, otherwise of indefinite meaning; and in many instances, those who might think themselves implicated, and were the most likely to be consulted for information; yet perhaps only to be thus answered in advance, by long winded periods, often requiring more than a single circumflex. These, with many acknowledged imperfections of style and manner, swelled the bulk of an intended epitome, no doubt, beyond its proper size.

size. Even the present work, notwithstanding its greater minuteness in a narrower compass, might possibly still farther be compressed with more perspicuity, under abler hands; but however this may be, the substance of it, will appear so wholly new, and may be deemed of such importance, either in particulars, method or application, when serving as the basis of an official proposition which I shall humbly crave your lordship's permission to offer for consideration, in virtue of my appointment as chief serrishtedar; that I hope here to be previously indulged in endeavouring to explain still farther the nature of its component parts, as before more generally described; attempt to evince the utility, and establish the authenticity of the whole.

First, with respect to the Tuckseem pergunnah-war of the Asil Toomary Jumma. This original assessment resembles the Domesday valuation of England; but it is infinitely more perfect, regular, and minute, as being the operation of many succeeding administrations in a century and a half, of the most powerful despotic rule over a dominion gradually improving in its territorial sources of national wealth, and as extending to the whole actual revenue of the country, parcelled out in the smallest measured divisions of land by the sovereign, as the sole virtual proprietor, therefore entitled to, and receiving a reasonable proportional share of the gross annual produce of the soil, settled ultimately at one-fourth by pecuniary estimation; exacted from the ryots or peasantry in the manner of rent, though forming the entire income of the state, to be collected through general official farmers, called zemindars or landholders, acting by special writ, termed sunnud, of indefinite duration, and revokable at pleasure, conferring certain jurisdiction, rights and privileges, understood always to include nancar or subsistence, in a real estate, calculated to yield five per cent. on the royal collections, as a reward for the more universal permanent trust reposed in them, with a russoom or commission in money to the like amount, when making themselves answerable by bundobust, or agreement for regular payment of all the dues of the exchequer, according to the ascertained fixed demand on the country, after deduction of every other necessary incidental charge of interior management, under the head of serinjammy. From this description of the tuckseem toomary jumma, it will appear to be not only the ground-work of finance, the only constitutional source of public revenue; but it is the grand important instrument, and intended result of the power, the institutions, and imperial establishment of the Moghuls, in all the conquered provinces of Hindostan; proportioning and ascertaining the measure of military strength, by an invariable standard of civil income; absorbing the entire rental of the subdued territory, exclusively claimed by the prince, excepting throughout those temporary benefices bestowed by himself in jageer; and thus, uniting every idea of real landed property in the crown, instead of being parcelled out, as is generally the case in Europe, among individual subject proprietors, usually taxed only for a small share of their land rent exacted from the peasantry, proportionably to the gross yearly produce, perhaps at the same rate that limits the sovereign's similar claim in India. Independent of the many apparently irrefragable direct proofs from history, civil institutes, and financial records, that might be adduced in support of the theory here advanced, descriptive of the nature of the toomary jumma, it may be considered an irresistible argument in its favour, that it is the only one, by which the established practice in levying the assessments in fact, form, and right, emulating empire, can be at all justified; seeming inconsistencies in fact, form, and right, entirely reconciled; and the whole system of Hindostanny finance, clearly and simply accounted for, on the single principle which assigns exclusive proprietary dominion to the emperor over his conquered estates, and converts the ordinary fixed rental of these, into what is called or virtually meant, by the entire existing public revenue.

On the subject of the utility of the original rent-roll in question; it would be ignorance or presumption to say much under your lordship's administration. We see daily instances of that spirit of simplification, order, economy, and systematic arrangement, before in a manner unknown to the British establishments in India, now operating a reform in every department of government, and unfolding itself as rapidly, as length of time, local experience, and sure intelligence (conveying a sufficient knowledge of probable moral consequences) can authorize the execution of important measures. Accordingly, in the commercial line, to acquire a just universal standard of comparison, so indispensably necessary in the vast transactions of the Company, to regulate the disbursements, and check the conduct of agents in the annual provision of instruments; it was judged requisite, to learn the price of original purchases, and from thence trace the gradual enhancement of their value in the accumulation of successive charges, allowing reasonable profit on stock, with wages of manufacturers labour. To limit and controul the expense of civil or military architecture; it was found expedient to ascertain a true medium estimate by measurement, of the works performed. Thus, in all operations of political economy, it is alone by the square and rule, a knowledge of elements, or going back to the origin of things which are progressive in their nature, that we can arrive at any truth or certainty: without such instruments and method to aid the soundest reasoning, the science of administration must ever be fluctuating, vague, and prove a source of perpetual error in all our determinations. It is not, therefore to be supposed, that the revenue department involving the most important concerns of government, should be alone neglected; or that the advantage be denied and application rejected, of a record of the highest authority recently brought to public light; being the known foundation and true practical measure, to form an idea of the dimensions of the vast existing substantial structure of our finances in this country; and indeed, in itself, the very body, most substantial part of the whole edifice.

Secondly, the nature and utility, substance and arrangement, of the three succeeding divisions of ahwab, kelliyet, and towfee, in the present work, seem equally important and obvious obvious. They arise naturally in taking into consideration, and are essentially necessary to comprehend, the system of the collections in Bengal: they form all the legal established additions to the original assessment of the soubah, until the period of the company's acquisition of the Dewanny. The capacity of the country to bear them to that era, was experimentally proved in a gradual accumulation of the burden of imposts to which the zemindars voluntarily submitted, rather than lose the larger indefinite advantages of their official trusts by regular hustabood investigations, which were to restrict their own profits to the constitutional allowance of one-tenth; and the greater ability of the people since, of sustaining a still heavier load of taxation, is sufficiently evinced in the notorious usage and daily discoveries made of new unauthorized exactions, over and above the old regal dues. These further improper demands, can neither be discriminated or repressed, until those of prior institution, sanctioned under the authority of the state, are clearly ascertained, distinguished, and apporportioned with practical exactness to known or measured portions of territory, to which they were originally made applicable. Accordingly, while by a fallacious representation of the method pursued in concluding the first bundobust under British administration, it was erroneously believed and negligently admitted, that the utmost requisitions of the Mogul exchequer were therein comprehended, and consolidated in the form of a simple assessment, it appears that at least one-third of the amount was suddenly, fraudulently, and unaccountably sunk; and while government, under an idea of relief to the country, was thus simplifying its operations with a few landholders, these, were increasing the complication of their demands on the peasantry, by novel, unwarrantable levies, grievous to the subject, or injurious to the prerogative of sovereignty. In short, it is alone by going to the fountain head of public revenue; tracing the progress in the various channels, through which it has been ordained legally to flow into the general treasury, that we can learn the true aggregate of the whole, and fix a genuine permanent standard of future exaction, founded in truth, and proportioned in moderation with all moral certainty, to the actual existing sources of national income. To consider such objects in their more advanced complex stage, unite them, and be sure of embracing the whole, is impossible, without retrospective enquiry and following each in its course, from the place of original outset; and therefore, nothing can be more futile, vague, and uncertain, than the result of investigations, alone applicable to present situation, thus instituted to acquire a knowledge of the real collections. Instead of coming to a right conclusion, and forming a just comparative standard for future settlements, opinions, and operative measures subsequently adopted, have been more fluctuating than ever; the effective ordinary supplies of the state from land have been continually on the decline; and to remedy the evil or make it stationary in its actual circumstances, a misinformed distinct legislature, could only devise expedients suggested from hence, or those occurring from views familiar to itself, totally dissimilar to the local state of things in this country. Hence, the idea of a bundobust for a term of years, where the sovereign's proportion of rent is already permanently established, and the amount to be exacted might now be fixed for ages, at least, during the unvaried standard of current money, being the necessary medium of revenue estimation, and subject only, as usual, to annual adjustments with the zemindars, depending no doubt, on various incidents affecting here, as well as every where else, necessarily and exclusively, a proprietary income, but under proper restrictive regulations, long since reduced to a system, attended perhaps with fewer inconveniences to the landlord of a province in Hindostan, than to the individual possessor of a small private estate in Europe: and hence too, the erroneous notions of a quit rent; the supposed hereditary nature of an office like that of the Company's vesting them by sunnud with a certain territorial jurisdiction, termed zemindarry, over the twenty-four pergunnahs of Calcutta; with various other such like opinions founded on no authenticated facts, but in violent opposition to the laws and constitution of India, referred to by a late act of parliament as the future code for the dispensation of justice throughout all the British dependencies there.

As to the authenticity of the papers composing the materials of the treatise now in question, were I disposed to avail myself of fortuitous circumstances to stamp their credit, I might observe, that almost two years have elapsed since first I presented the theory and abstract of the particulars set forth; that I avowedly staid in the country a twelvemonth, to afford an opportunity of bringing into discussion, to explain and elucidate such principles, facts and opinions, as might be liable to doubt or controversy; that I have nearly doubled the period of my proposed residence here, in consequence of an appointment, which however flattering to my ambition, as an honourable distinction, could never be courted by me for its pecuniary emoluments, and was rather contrary to my private views, or the inclination I then cherished of returning to Europe; that nevertheless, I have never as yet been called upon specifically to justify the whole or any part, of what I presumed to state to my honourable employers;—from all which, I might reasonably draw an inference of acquiescence, if I could pride myself with the idea of not having deserved or suffered rather a silent neglect. I could further shield such documents as I may be possessed of; and have to bring forward in support of what I have ventured to advance one of the most powerful weapons hitherto used to screen native delinquency, and which otherwise might, on the present occasion, be turned against myself. To manifest this, it is to be recollected, that the mutseddies of the khalsa, in the period of the Company's Dewanny administration, have invariably represented, when questioned on the subject of anterior accounts, that all these were lost or carried away, in the troubles of Cassim Aly. Now as all my papers of apparent official origin have reference to this supposed era of destruction, or even to times much more remote to it, it would follow, that they must stand singly and not fairly to be controverted, much less invalidated by any authorities of pretended equal weight produced, through the disqualified personal channels of regular gular intelligence. But as I am not afraid to express, that my object is simply the discovery of important truths; neither shall I be ashamed to be detected, in errors admitting of uncertain construction as to will, if they should in any manner prove, the means of attaining the desirable purpose suggested. I therefore waive all claim to give such equivocal pretensions of authenticity to the written sources of my own particular information, if called in question, on grounds of candid scepticism. They must rest on the merit of their proper intrinsic worth; however much or little valuable matter, may be contained in them. All the indulgence I shall have to bespeak in their favour is, that when they only stand in opposition to opinions recently promulgated and adopted; (these, as yet unsupported by any proofs of fact, or clear deductions in reasoning from analogy, comparative views, or experimental knowledge of true local application, and still only floating in popular imagination, bewildered by the fused contradictory reports, chiefly of uninformed or superficial observers) the advocates for such opinions, who may also come forward officially as opponents to the system which I have endeavoured to prove to be the true existing one of our Indian revenue, and with the design of invalidating the authorities on which I have proceeded, be required in the first instance, to discuss or state the grounds forming the basis of their own particular theory, repugnant to facts of long established practice, and the oral or written testimony of the best informed individuals of our countrymen in this country, of anterior and longer experience in financial administration. This seems a prudential or necessary preliminary, to remove ill-founded prejudices and censure an unbiassed determination; for I do not pretend in all cases to be able to bring demonstrative undeniable proofs of what I may have asserted, perhaps often depending on internal, or at best presumptive, evidence. But with respect to the comparative statement forming the ultimate division of the present work, as far as my informations may be supposed to have been drawn from the public records of the Company, I hope I may be permitted to claim still greater indulgence for probable inaccuracies or wrong intelligence; having given no trouble of official searches here, and having confined myself entirely to the materials found in published reports, extremely imperfect and irregular in their nature; frequently delusive or contradictory in representation.

Having thus finished, my Lord, the proposed description by analysis, of the contents of the accompanying manuscript volume, I now beg leave to offer for consideration, in terms and circumstances of situation already mentioned, and in as concise and simple a form as my understanding can suggest, the official proposition announced as founded on the substance of this and a former treatise, including with particular accounts of the revenues of Bengal; similar details of those of Behar, and the Chucklah of Midsapore in the Soubah of Orissa. Dividing it into two parts, it may stand as follows; viz.

PART 1st. That all abwabs or taxes of every denomination, imposed and originating since the period of the Company's accession to the Dewanny of Bengal, Behar and Orissa, applicable alone to the territory so usually described, in exclusion of the ceded lands, be henceforth discontinued, totally and finally abrogated, as altogether unnecessary in their effect, unauthorized by the sovereign authority, a violent usurpation of its rights, and probably productive of great oppression to the lower orders of the people, comprehending the whole body of ryots, husbandmen or manufacturers.

PART 2^d.—That the British government within the same districts from this time forward, and for ever (at least until a more easy constitutional suitable mode of rating the lands can be adopted) do restrict their full annual demand of revenue or rent from zemindars, farmers, and subjects at large, to the ascertained legal standard of exaction in the moment of acquisition, and subjects at large, to the technical descriptions of Ausil, Abwab, quiring the Dewanny grant, extending to, and comprising the whole original and increased rental, then authoritatively established under the technical descriptions of Ausil, Abwab, Keffyet, and Towfeer, on the Jageer and Khalsa, Maal and Sayer funds of the Dewanny; to be in future, levied in the form of a simple assessment, proportioned in the aggregate, as heretofore in detail, throughout the same divisions of the country, and alone subject to a deduction of the like amount, for all mofussil charges and native management of the collections. But, that in the ceded portion of territory, the demand be made according to the greatest improved jumma, founded on hustabood investigations, within the period of the Company's administration; with a diminution however, always to be allowed here, and every where else, for real, irrecoverable, inevitable losses, or abstractions from the actual sources of revenue then forthcoming, and occasioned by any calamitous circumstances, decrease of population, or decline of yearly agricultural or manufactured produce, to be calculated for whole zemindarry districts, on a view of their respective gross funds, generally, not partially considered, to be set forth and proved by the officers of government or zemindarry occupants, with circumstances of time, place, occasion, and peculiar local incidents, in all requisite detail of villages, broken and entire pergunnahs, to evince the temporary or continued necessity of a remission in all, equal to the difference between the highest settlement of former times, and diminished bundobust of the present computing charges of serinjammy and native agency in both instances, on the same scale of the allowed total, or compromised expenditure of muscovoat.

The principles of this proposition, are drawn from two political axioms, applicable to either of its parts in their conclusions, as commonly admitted in every civilized society, but essential to the financial policy of Hindostan; one, that the sovereign alone hath the power of assessing the people or country, whether done under the form of a rental or ordinary taxation as understood in Europe, and that therefore all such burthens imposed by official or private authority of subject zemindars and farmers, though on pretence perhaps of the increased demands of the state, in its annual bundobust agreements, when no augmentation in fact took place beyond established forthcoming sources of income, are in their nature fraudulent, grievous, or unconstitutional, and ought always to be totally remitted, and finally annulled as soon as discovered: the other, that government hath a right to, and should receive the full amount of revenue levied under its proper authority, and generally where no tyranny exists, proportioned to its exigencies, or otherwise be circumstantially informed of the cause, with sufficient proofs of the fact of eventual inevitable deficiencies; that therefore, it is just and reasonable, in determining the measure of present supply throughout the British provinces, to recur to the highest standard ascertainable of past legal exactions, of which the necessity of continuation with a possibility of being still realized to their fullest extent is strongly evinced by further new impositions, in addition to the old, though without any public sanction, and that the defalcation occurring on a comparative view of statements showing the greater, with diminished income, be always deemed wholly recoverable, until the contrary be proved demonstratively.

As leading, however, to a great practical measure (supposing no innovation in the actual system, or any essential immediate dependence on the grand original principle of Indian finance decisive of the question of territorial property) yet the instantaneous adoption of such a proposition, may require the further support of propriety, equity, or political expediency, in popular acceptance of the terms. The former, it is hoped will be found, if not entirely on an abstracted view of the fitness of the thing proposed, at least in its conformity to what seems to be the true spirit of the late regulating act of the British Parliament, referring to the laws and constitution of India, in determining the mode and rate of future zemindary assessments. The second, may then be presumed to rest on grounds of equally acknowledged validity, particularly when the true professed object in contemplation goes only to a complete legal re-adjustment, on the most perfect principles of justice, of real or original civil rights appertaining to the sovereign, the Indian landholder, and ryot respectively. But the third term, suggests a more complex idea, and may alone be admitted in common apprehension, to support the proposition offered, after many distinct considerations of the subject in reference.

Political expediency, accordingly, in one point of view, is to determine whether the constitutional claim of income acquired from our predecessors in dominion, ought not to be enforced, under supposed most affluent circumstances of situation, as being proportioned apparently only, to the experienced exigency of a government much more powerful in numbers, and more economical in all its operations; in a country; where revenue is rent, and cannot properly be augmented or diminished, but with variations in the state of industry, or a change in the relative value of money; where therefore, the hoarding of a treasure for contingencies of war, is policy; where the great mass of the people have always been, and must ever remain, dependent slaves on the despotic authority of their superiors, being timid, superstitious, knavish, without landed property beyond their farms of pottah, leasehold; rich individually, in the fewness of their natural wants; comparatively poor in society, from numberless moral and physical causes; doomed to the perpetual oppression of their zemindars, when these have the power of acting without controul, and who on their parts, on the other hand, are either servile or headstrong, in proportion as they feel the strait or slackened reins of higher despotism, but who in all cases, from a spirit of bigotry or natural propensity to the fraudulent acquirement of riches, for the purpose in effect of miserly future concealment, would suffer torture rather than part with a rupee of such ill gotten wealth, and perish in rebellion sooner than surrender the plunder of a district which they have been appointed to manage by bribery, and permitted to oppress through the corruption and neglect of their constituents; in short, a country where a warm climate, fruitful soil, and the stubbornest religious precepts, influence unconquerable habits of indolence; lead to a pastoral life; and make the natives in general, so averse from agricultural labour, that the spur of taxation is ever necessary to quicken improvement, so far as to insure a produce in the least beyond the scanty subsistence required by the cultivators themselves; yet a country nevertheless (with reference to the Soubah of Bengal alone) from which the Mogul emperors, by moderate, wise, and effectual regulations of finance, drew a neat revenue in specie annually, clear of every soubahdary or provincial charge civil and military, of upwards of one crore of rupees, or a million sterling, from the beginning of the present century until the period of Aliverdy's usurpation, and universal disorder throughout the empire in consequence of Nadir Shah's invasion; a sum at least three times as much, as ever the Company derived in like manner, on an average of years from the same territory.

In another point of view, perhaps more just, as supposing the opposite circumstances of a distressed situation, the expediency of extending our resources, at least to the utmost practicable bounds of right, will universally be acknowledged. It is ever difficult to ascertain a true economical standard of public exigency, to answer the design of proportioning exactly the necessary demands of the state. In India where revenue is rent, and industry generally long since stationary, the scale is also limited; and extraordinary wants must be provided for in advance, from the ordinary means of supply, considered always as stretched to the greatest length of a proprietary income, or invariably fixt at the entire original receipts from the country. It is on this principle, and this alone, that we have seen Bengal almost overwhelmed with debt, but no idea ever entertained of the possibility of farther or proportionate taxation; that year after year, remissions have been granted for the intended relief of the ryots, on vague representations of calamitous losses disabling them from the payment of their stipulated rents to government, though without any precise or adequate knowledge of the gross rental to ascertain the reality of such pretended losses; that the Mogul has entered into the minutest detail of landlord, in the measurement and valuation of his imperial domain, as appears by the Ruckbah accounts of whose soubahs still preserved amongst the archives of Delhi, and that the Company's representatives themselves have more more than once in every year of their administration, exercised the zemindary functions in what is called a khas, or special collection, receiving immediately into the public treasury from the lower farmers and husbandmen, their full rental, allowing indeed impropriety, when supposed to extend to the entire sources of a distinct one tenth, instead of properly, a twentieth part, as the landholders full appointed salary of agency, besides an equal portion for defraying all other expenses of the mofussil, and together chargeable on the sovereign's rebba, or fourth of the whole annual produce of the soil shared with the peasantry. In all these instances, the principles of a proprietary income are glaringly manifest, and though of late unaccountably overlooked in speculation, have, in fact, had constant operation in practice. It is alone in assuming the false medium of actual collections, as the true ultimate standard of right or genuine receipts, that distant rulers may mistake their object. But the error is imputable to local misinformation; and can only be corrected at the source of the evil. I do not however pretend to be sufficiently acquainted with the ways and means of, or services to be provided for, under this government, so as to be able to state with accuracy the amount of present exigency, and prove it to require the whole aid of expected resources on adoption of the proposition now offered, for the sake of satisfying the opinions of those who may still think, that here, as in Europe, the public demands should be scrupulously made according to the variable calls of immediate state necessity. I shall therefore confine myself to a few general remarks in the way of comparison, between an estimate apparently correct, to be found in Mr. Francis's Minutes, exhibiting a view of the income with the expenditure of Bengal in 1776, and such a one, as might at this time be drawn out from commonly reported or published facts, having regard to all material intervening changes of circumstances. To begin with the former:

1st. The territorial revenues of Bengal, Behar and Orissa, inclusive of government and Calcutta customs, salt and mint duties, with a remission of ten per cent. are stated on a three years average receipts ending in April 1775, after deducting all charges of this department, at current rupees 2,21,61,814; which added to the Benares tribute, reckoned then 25,76,193. and the subsidy of Oude at 35,83,222. more, made the neat total funds of the presidency 2,83,21,229 current rupees.

The disbursements were at the same time, as follows; viz. The Army, contingencies, stores, fortifications, &c. CR^s 1,05,22,915; the investment with commercial establishments 92,80,000; remittances to the other presidencies 20 lacks; general civil department, marine, and court of judicature, 19,53,713;—in all forming an aggregate of 2,37,56,628; and this being deducted from the amount of resources, leaves a balance of 45,64,601 current rupees, to answer all unforeseen emergencies. The unappropriated surplus however, which Mr. Francis seems to allow as necessary to be reserved for such extraordinary occasions, is only 37,11,547, with an expectancy of 5,37,319 further, the whole arising chiefly from bills on England and sale of Europe cargoes, in exclusion of the Oude subsidy; for which indeed, as remarked, credit might well have been taken, as the medium of actual receipts since, under this head, will be found perhaps to have exceeded fifty lacks.

2d. The same Bengal, &c. funds of territorial revenue in 1787, exclusive of salt duties, after deducting all expenses of collection, with every possible retrenchment in the amount of charges, involving the resumption of a large portion of the moshairah or zemindary allowance, and subtracting only an outstanding balance of about ten lacks at the end of the year; may fairly be computed at CR^s 2,45,24,989 neat; Benares forty lacks; Oude fifty and the profits on salt and opium fifty-five lacks more;—in all, an income of 3,90,24,989 current rupees, being at the exchange of two shillings, nearly the sum of four millions sterling.

On the other hand, the services to be provided for may stand; viz. the Army, &c. one crore and a half; King's troops on the Coromandel coast, seventeen lacks; deficiency to be made up in the necessary annual expenditure of Bombay, exclusive of the interest of its debt, eighteen lacks; the investment alone, ninety lacks; remittances to China, twenty lacks; general civil department commercial establishments, marine, and court of judicature, fifty lacks;—making altogether, an expenditure of three crore and forty-five lacks of current rupees, and leaving only a surplus of 45,24,989 unappropriated revenue, nearly equal to the sum before judged necessary to answer unforeseen emergencies.

Now at the period of Mr. Francis's estimate, the debts of the Company in Europe were small; in India, little or nothing. But since that time, they have increased to an enormous amount, requiring a vast additional income to pay alone the yearly interest accruing on the principal, which the minister of India in a recent account, laid before Parliament, states, if I am not mistaken, at seventeen millions. Of this total, perhaps no more than thirteen millions, have been incurred in the interval now in question; yet it appears almost certain, that the burthen of the whole must ultimately fall on Bengal, though at present only pledged for about a third part, either in the way of direct local payments, or by the medium of investments to be sent from hence to England; as every other fund of productive wealth hath never for the past, and cannot be expected in future, to yield more than ordinary profits on the original capital of India, proprietary stock. According to this calculation, eight and a half millions payable in this country, at 8 per cent. per annum, will require a supply of £.680,000. or sixty-eight lacks of rupees, to liquidate the annual demand for interest; and the like sum owing in Europe, at five per cent. raises the whole to a crore and ten lacks fifty thousand rupees beyond the exigencies stated, or ways and means set against them, in either of the preceding estimates, taking the former as a standard for what was actually necessary in 1776. To provide then immediately, constitutionally, and fairly, for such an excess in current disbursements comparatively to our present resources, without incurring new debts by loan, falling in arrears, or accumulation of interest, as at Bombay, seems impossible possible through any other practical mode, than that involved in the proposition now suggested. The scheme indeed of opening a channel of remittance for, or finding in England the amount due here, at present chiefly to natives, must be considered highly important and wise, as affording a sure though distant prospect of relief; but its operation, if adopted on the most liberal terms, will be extremely slow, and alone in proportion as property to be sent home can be acquired by British subjects; and fifteen years seem only a reasonable period, to accomplish such an acquisition of private fortune. After all, liquidation of any part of the principal, seems entirely out of the question, and the great advantage that can properly be supposed to result from the measure, in a national view, must depend on the extension of the Bengal investments, or yearly commercial returns from thence; while to the Company, it promises merely a reduction of three per cent. interest, or about 25 lacks on the whole, in shifting the place of payment; but without freeing this their chief territorial establishment, from the ultimate responsibility of the total original debt, together with the actual discharge of its load of annual interest periodically.

To remove, however, the objections of some who might be inclined to admit the expediency, as well as equity and propriety of recurring to the highest ascertained standard of legal exaction of Bengal revenue, still thought possible to be realized; but there, stop short, as the utmost boundary of right;—it may be necessary to explain the nature of the salt and opium profits of fifty-five lacks, stated in the latter estimate, and which, at first sight, will appear to be equivalent to, or so much of the ancient greater income thus already restored in effect, through a different channel to the exchequer. If, on this subject, the informations suggested in my former and present work should be found defective, or inconclusive, in establishing the contrary fact; I hope I may be further permitted to refer to the completer authoritative testimonies, entered on the Company's records in 1765, to show, at least, with respect to the produce of salt, that in whatever manner or proportion the profitable amount of the sales might have been received and distributed before then, between the public, the Nazim, or private favoured individuals, yet the total burden on the people, as involved in the selling price of this article of consumption, was fully equal to what it is at present, when estimated at the average rate of two rupees the maund (being the proper standard, if the quantity made be sufficient to answer the ordinary demand) and always to be considered exclusive of the larger revenue stated, excepting in so much as may be therein actually brought to credit.

But admitting in every point of view, a political expediency tantamount to pressing necessity, thus to bring forward all the lawful existing sources of former income; still it can be urged, that this may be more effectually accomplished in manner, and with greater advantage in amount, on principles of the most perfect equity, if not indeed on constitutional principles requiring always to be enforced to maintain the rights, the authority and energy of government, by resumption of all those fraudulent alienations of land made by the zemindars under the general description of Bazee Zemeen. I do not by any means, deny the entire propriety of such resumptions; and if made to extend to the whole territory, so clandestinely bestowed, or at this moment collusively held; perhaps the amount might surpass that now pointed out as recoverable defalcation, on comparison of the particulars of the two regular assessments of 1171 and 1190. I am inclined, at the same time, to believe, that the restoration of the former funds, might involve a considerable share of the latter; though I am persuaded, as I think on very substantial grounds, that it would not include the whole. The great unconquerable objection, however, to this mode will be the impossibility, through the tenderness and restrictions of an English administration, to learn fully the value of such illegal donations. The aumeeny and prior investigations leading to the discovery, have not as yet actually brought forward sixty lacks of beghas; and it is only by analogy extended to the districts still to be explored, that more is to be calculated upon. But in this mass of fraudulent mortmain alienation, who can pretend to discriminate the share so given away, since the Company's acquisition of the dewanny, in opposition to the interests of a people under the blindest influence of bigotry, and a crafty priesthood, practised in all the villanies of deceit, forgery, prevarication, and perjury? And no one has yet ever thought of resuming the portion bestowed, before that period; though both indeed may be deemed alike justifiable, on grounds of general civil policy and the existing laws of the country, or equally practicable with ease, and the most perfect assurance of internal tranquillity. It is, besides, always a most invidious and ungracious measure, even under the most warrantable expediency, to touch any appropriations set apart for supposed religious or charitable purposes, however different the real intention of such benefices may be, from apparent designation, and however collusively or unrightfully acquired by actual occupants. In the present case, it would seem altogether unnecessary and impolitic. The zemindars by such unconstitutional alienations and consequent abstraction from the territorial financial funds of the state, having been, whether wilfully or blindly, the instruments of their own, and sovereign's wrong, should in like manner, be made the instruments of re-establishing both, in their respective rights; and as they may be presumed to have had the full benefit of their former iniquitous acts, they ought to bear all the odium of the latter, proposed as an act of simple justice. A revenue which they before made good, without any reasonable cause for murmuring, as being optional with themselves to acquiesce in the payment of it, or submit to the legal equitable operations of a husbandry investigation, to ascertain the actual sources of public income, is now deince improved, though partly lost to the exchequer by presumed frauds, embezzlement and corruption: the particulars of their former and greater rental, applicable to their several territorial jurisdictions, are set forth in all the formality of apparent truth, and stated to be founded founded on official or documental testimonies, incontrovertible. If these can be invalidated, and that the same or a lesser defalcation resulting on comparison of the highest part assessment with the present diminished one, can be clearly, fully, and honestly accounted for, with circumstances of time, place, and occasion; in the same detail of the jumma and divisions of land, as exhibited in the work forming the basis of the proposition here offered; the landholders will stand completely exonerated from all further exactions; an essential service will be performed to the public, in discovering the ultimate standard of its resources; and the individual, covered with shame and confusion that hath dared thus, to obtrude his vain speculations on the attention of your Lordship, if he be not sufficiently shielded by the integrity of his motives, in the laudable pursuit of important truths.

Although however, under the wisdom, candour, and cautious intelligent procedure of administration, I have no reason to apprehend a result in any respect disreputable to myself, either in my official or private capacity; yet, still I think it necessary to add something by way of vindication of my own conduct, as well in the instance, as the manner, of thus pressing on public consideration, a subject which I have already treated so much at length in course of the three last years, under the discouraging circumstance of not having hitherto received the least intimation, how far my past labours may have proved acceptable, or a further prosecution of them be deemed meritorious. When the board of revenue, soon after your Lordship's departure from Calcutta, issued a Circular Letter, dated the 10th of August last, to the collectors, announcing it to be in contemplation to form a general settlement of the country for the ensuing Bengal year 1195, for a term of years, with directions to prepare themselves for carrying this measure into execution, and give notification of such their preparatory state, on the 26th January following, supposing in that interval, sufficient time to complete their enquiries, under prescribed rules, and specific heads of information; though I did not find myself then specially called on, yet in virtue of my office as chief serrishtedar, I thought it necessary to be in like manner prepared to exercise my functions of check and controul over the accounts of mutsedies, from whom all revenue intelligence must be originally derived, both at the sudder and in the mofussil; and the fairest way of communicating my remarks by anticipation, on the knowledge they are capable of affording, supposing it the most perfect, that the text and commentary might come at once under consideration. This I conceived on the present occasion, to be one of the most essential duties of my employment, and only secondary to the form of an official proposition with which I have accompanied my observations. The task imposed, of learning such a true past and present state of the resources of the country, as can authorize a permanent future settlement in limitation of the public income, yet liable to eventual diminution, will I doubt not be found rather difficult to be accomplished, even in its distributed portions, among four and twenty gentlemen of local authority and experience; attempted by one differently circumstanced, if aided here by all the strong executive powers of government, might prove extremely defective. Therefore, and as I by no means pretend to the infallibility of the materials from which I have drawn my information, much less to any superiority in the requisite talent of bringing them forward with the greatest advantage, by general or practical knowledge in finance; so I hope to stand excused in the act and form of delivering my sentiments; and that if I should in any respect have deviated from the precise line of my duty in either, it will be attributed rather to a zealous desire of serving the public, than any motives of ambition or private interest in assuming to myself an importance which may not properly be long to my station. Pretensions to patriotism, though allowed to exist by those who feel its influence (and on this ground I might venture to claim your Lordship's indulgence;) yet in general are always equivocal, and seldom admitted in modern popular belief. My sincerity will more universally be credited, when I assert, and can refer to public vouchers for proof, that constantly since I have been in the Company's service, I have connected or involved the advancement and security of my own private fortune, with the prosperity of the affairs of my honourable employers; and that at this moment the whole I am possessed of (small in itself, but every thing to me in comparative estimation) being deposited in their funds either in Europe or India, its real amount or effective current value must depend on the favourable or unfavourable turn in the actual crisis of public measures in India. With respect to the language and manner in which I have censured the conduct of natives employed in the efficient administration of the revenues of this country, your Lordship will, I hope, perceive or believe that I have no personal resentment against any of them. They are altogether unknown to me; and never thwarted or interfered in my pursuits. Whenever I have occasion to name them, it is only to condemn their measures in their official trusts, or to mark universal leading features in their acknowledged moral characters. But the criminality of the latter, is always relative to the religion, manners, and government of a nation in the eye of civil jurisprudence. By the test of these, they may not only stand acquitted of blame, but merit uncommon consideration for making so moderate a use of their power while virtually uncontrouled; by the criterion of British law and Christian notions of right and wrong, the fate of Nundcomar, though certainly amongst the worst of his tribe, might be dreaded by all.

I have the honour to be, with the greatest respect, my Lord,
Your Lordship's most obedient and most humble servant,
(Signed) JAMES GRANT,
Chief Serrishtedar.

Fort William, Feb 28th 1788.

GENERAL ABSTRACT of the whole Dewanny and Ceded Lands, with explanatory Remarks.

ZEMINDARRY OF RAJESHAHY.

AUSIL JUMMA TOOMARY, or standard original Crown Rent of the zemindarry of CHUCKLAHS, Circars and Pergunnahs, under the administration of JAFFIER KHAN, in the beginning of the reign of the mogul emperor Mahomed Shah, about the year 1722 of the christian era; and set forth, 1st, in the Teshkhees or corrected Toomary Jumma of Sojah Khan in 1135 of the Bengal style;—2^{dly}, in the Zymn or included particulars of the dewanny sunnud or charter granted in 1141 to Ramkaut the second zemindar of the district in the present line of Brahmins, being the adopted son of Ramjeon, the first who obtained a similar grant of this territorial official charge, and Husband, predecessor of the actual occupant Ranny Bowanny;—and 3^{dly}, in the Hackikut Jumma, or historical detail of the zemindarry crown rent in 1172, on the Company's acquisition of the dewanny:—the whole exhibiting a view of the former and actual state at the latter period of the greatest territorial jurisdiction throughout Bengal, or perhaps Hindustan, as comprehending 12,000 B. square miles, vested in a single officer of government under the denomination and commission of Zemindar, Landholder, or Farmer-general of the imperial rents, by annual hundebusty agreement, permanently established, as follows, for the ausil or original ground rent, on the foundation of the Rebba or fourth of the gross yearly produce of the soil, levied from the Ryots or inferior peasantry; exclusive of all Abwabs, or proportional increases on that antiquated demand of the sovereign; subsequently imposed by the soubahdars or subordinate provincial delegates of mogul government, in their own behalf, as they rose to independence; and which omitted to be incorporated with the ausil, after an extraordinary influx of bullion, occasioning a prodigious alteration in the standard value of money, the original medium of exchange, make the ancient Rebba a very inadequate compensation for the fourth of the real modern gross produce of cultivated land, and scarcely one half of the actual demand on the country generally, as hath been, or ought to be realized to the state.

ZEMINDARRY OF RAJESHAHY.

3^d.—HACKIKUT JUMMA, or historical detail of the Toomary Rent-roll, to the Company's acquisition of the Dewanny, according to the Chucklah-bundy of M. R. Khan, A.B. 1172.

CHUCKS, DIVISIONS, and PERG ^s .	Circars.	Jumma.	EXPLANATORY REMARKS.
Seven Chucks. of the Zemindarry brought forw ^d -		22,95,427	CHUCKLAH.—The whole soubah of Bengal was distributed, by Jaffier Khan, into 13 of these larger territorial subdivisions, which were compact, well and permanently ascertained in boundary, regularly assessed for the standard crown rent, and each under the separate administration of a foudjar amildar, or intendant of finance. The zemindarry of Rajeshahy, came within eight of these jurisdictions. It was the Mogul policy thus to break the influence of overgrown landholders, and subject their extensive local management to the controul of different superintendents, conveniently situated. The annual settlement might, at the same time, be concluded at once for the whole district at the sudder, without any subsequent confusion, from the variety of collectors, when accurately defined portions of the land and rental were assigned to each chucklah respectively. These grand subdivisions, moreover, have been always, and are still necessary; for the distinction of jageer and khalsa territory, as well as to regulate zemindarry grants by sunnud.

CIRCARS.—Were older subdivisions of the same nature, and destined for the same financial purposes, as the preceding; but were of much smaller extent, being 32 in number, and therefore more expensive in superintendence; which induced the more recent distribution of the soubah into chuck^s. Nevertheless, all grants of land, and portions of the public revenue, can only be distinctly ascertained, when classed under the head of circars, on account of similar names of places, very different from each other: for instance; in the division of Rajeshahy, Chuk. Moorshedabad, there are four division of Rajeshahy, Chuk. Moorshedabad, there are four Perg^s called Futtehjungpoor; which, though at a vast distance asunder, and making part of separate zemindaries, might be mistaken for one, without the indication of circars.

PERGUNNAHS, whole or broken, in proportional parts of sixteen, are the oldest, the least, the most universally known and established divisions of land, throughout Hindostan. Their use, is indispensable in every operation of finance; but more especially, in checking the usurpation and frauds of zemindarry agents. They are, for the most part, described in our provincial maps; though the irregular partition of many of them latterly, renders the survey useless; and hath multiplied abuses with the number of heads.

Eahtimam, or Zemindarry divisions, always fluctuating and indefinite in extent of territory and assessment; yet necessary to be known, as it will be afterwards observed, that abwabs, or additions of rent to the ausil, were levied accordingly.

JAGEER and Khals, and Divisions, were useful for the like, and many other civil or political purposes.

TOWFEER, here stated, were the improvements, or increase of the jageer lands, incorporated with the ausil jumma toomary, since the time of Sujah Khan, but prior to Cossim Aly's administration.

BUT

BUT exclusive of the Ausil Jumma Toomary, which was finally established for the Soubah in general, A. B. 1135, and for the zemindary of Rajeshahy in particular, with annexation of towfeer, thirty years subsequently, there were large additional assessments every where levied under different forms throughout the country; sometimes, for the use and with the sanction of imperial sovereignty, but in Bengal, for the most part, under the delegated formal authority of successive soubahdars; at first clandestinely, and in the end avowedly, to support the provincial independence on the ruins of a falling empire. Generally however, these further exactions were only, in proportion to the real or fictitious exigencies of government; and certainly fell greatly short of what might and ought constitutionally, to have been raised from the occupants of the khalsa or crown lands; in consequence of increasing agricultural improvements, with a diminution in the value of silver and gold (from the standard of original estimation of the annual produce of the soil, forming the basis of the ausil toomary rent-roll) so universally experienced throughout the commercial world, since the discoveries of America and passage round the Cape. The only regular mode of improving the territorial revenue was by hustabood, or ascertainment of the former and present effective rental; which was done, either gradually by the slow partial discoveries of the full measurement and assessment of the smaller divisions of pergunnahs, in the expedient political routine of annual settlements, or at once at distant periods, by the greater more expeditious operation of aumeeny investigations, throughout entire chucklahs or zemindary districts: but in both cases, the particulars of the increase legally required, registration among the other records of the public exchequer kept by the canongoes, putwarries, and some of the more temporary officers of dewanny administration; the amount thereby became notorious to the people at large, and could not be withheld from the royal treasury, without open violation of the sovereign rights, which yet the nawabs or refractory deputies from the court of Delhi were not prepared to maintain. Besides, the one method was too minute and tedious, while the other might be thought too expensive, of unimportant issue, and always liable to great abuse or corruption, under the fluctuating government and limited views of a single despot; usually himself extremely depraved, uncertain of the duration of his power, and who too impatient to wait the permanent advantages of a wise equitable system, was most commonly actuated by no other motive than the necessities or impulse of the moment, indicated through the capricious will of an arbitrary ruler. Further, when the hustabood of a whole zemindary was complete, not only the dues of the exchequer were then ascertained, but also those of mofussil or interior agency comprised under the head of Serinjamm; which included the muscoorat, nancar, &c. of the principal leaseholder himself, with other large indefinite profits derived from the management of his territorial charge, on pretence of incurred expenditure. Consequently, the two great objects of finance, the utmost gross demand and receipt from the country, with the amount of actual or fictitious disbursements, so necessary to ensure a just economical administration in either department, were thus attained; and the same operation, on the soundest principles of mussulman policy, enforced by the intolerant zeal of the Moguls as sectaries of the established sunnite faith, precluded the possibility of any of those illegal alienations to brahmins, or for the support of Hindoo superstition, which in latter times, since the Company's acquisition of the Dewanny, have been daringly avowed by the zemindars, on the presumption of the ignorance of their new masters; in opposition to common sense and public right, attended with a shameful defalcation of the sovereign dues by the absorption of some of the most productive territorial funds of the state. The improved rental of the lands thus brought to view, might be effected under two different forms acquiring distinct appellations, as applicable to the jageer or khalsa portions of the district investigated. A simple increase of rent, according to the quantity of ground held by pottah, or indefinite leases (made permanent by custom, while the ryot-occupant complied with the yearly demands of government by any general assessment, not exceeding in the whole a rebba, or the fourth of the actual gross produce of the soil) was the best, most constitutional mode of improving the revenue, and the surplus income so formed, beyond the of ausil jumma was consolidated with that original rental, in all the detail of pergunnah divisions; acquiring the technical denomination of Keffyet, or profit, in the language of the exchequer, when arising on the crown lands; and Towfeer, an Arabic word of similar import, when forthcoming from the appropriated territory in jageer. It was thus, the whole soubah of Behar was rated to the latest period of Mussulman administration, and that the districts of Dacca, Purneah, and Rungpoor, with the zemindaries of Dinagepoor, Bearbhoom, Burdwan, and Calcutta in Bengal, were made so productive to the state, under the light superficial operations of Cossim Ali, or nearly at the same time, the more solid extensive improvements of the Company, throughout the two latter ceded portions of the country. In Rajeshahy, however much the like mode of assessment might obtain internally for the private benefit of the farming landholder, the advantage of it, never was reaped by government, as will be hereafter shown; except in a very small degree, or imperfectly, by a partial hustabood of newly acquired and scattered pergunnahs, with the more recent profitable increase, skillfully effected through the enlargement and interchange of the proportion of assigned territory with an equal quantity of khalsa land, supposed to be rated at the old valuation. This district was of too great an extent to admit of a minute local investigation by bandmen and mofussil officers of the brahmin cast, so powerfully supported by an interested zemindar of the same tribe, the ordinary difficulties of such a scrutiny were considerably increased; and on every account, it may very reasonably be supposed, that the offer of a large yearly nuzzeranah to suspend from year to year, that best and necessary operation essential to the Mogul system of finance, if any thing in the nature of an additional income annually, might otherwise with greater facility be realized. Such undoubtedly were in part, the leading motives for the introduction here and more universally throughout Bengal, of the form of levying new assessments in the gross, on whole zemindary jurisdictions, under various names and pretences, by abwabs or a proportional increase on the total of the ausil, without entering into the usual detail of the tuckseem or pergunnah divisions, but leaving the distribution to be made entirely at the discretion generally of ignorant, depraved, oppressed Indian landholders. The nature, extent and ostensible purposes of these further exactions, have in the Comparative Analysis of the finances of the Soubah at large, been fully set forth; and therefore it seems only necessary in this place, barely to indicate the denomination and amount of such as were imposed throughout the entire district of Rajeshahy, from the period of Jaffier Khan's administration towards the beginning of the present century, to that of Suraj ul Dowlah's at the revolution of 1757; remembering that the khalsa portion of the jumma, on which alone abwabs were proportionably established to be permanently consolidated with the original assessment, amounted in 1135 A. B. to 16,96,087 rupees, and in 1165, about the era of the last-mentioned event, according to the Bengal style, did not fall short of 18,39,372 rupees.

From this amount, however, of original and proportionably increased assessment, at the rate of about thirty per cent. on the ausil, together established under the yearly forms of a bundobusty settlement, as the total malgoozary or current rents payable to government, is to be deducted the article of muscoorat; being the compromise allowed to the zemindar at the formation of the jumma toomary, in lieu of all charges of mofussil management, involving his own written and prescriptive rights of Nancar Russoom, &c. and which he found more to his advantage to hold unascertained, by compliance with the sovereign's exaction of abwabs, than risk a discovery of large surplus profits, by a regular hustabood investigation. The additional assessments were to be levied entirely free of any extraordinary expense, as being only an accumulation of the former demand of rent for the same lands or from the same people, and requiring no increased establishment in the collection. The following account, therefore, of incurred annual Charges for the whole zemindary of Rajeshahy, is to be considered, as solely applicable to the ausil jumma.

Leaves a net Revenue to Government in 1172, of

Yet, notwithstanding the augmentation which had thus taken place in the space of thirty years, on the khalsa lands, being about one-third of the original rent-roll, reckoned in round numbers eighteen lacks of rupees, the mode of assessment by abwabs, was thought by Cossim Ali, greatly inadequate to the actually improved state of the district, or receipts of the zemindar; was known to be productive of the most partial inequalities, in the distribution of these additional demands of government among different classes of the ryots, depending on cast, or local residence in the favoured pergunnahs chiefly fanned to Brahmins; added to other new authorized exactions, levied in some places under the name of Na-juey, on pretence of a failure elsewhere of the requisite funds to make good the annual malgoozary stipulated with the exchequer; and at the same time, that it fell infinitely short of the nawab's exigencies in a career of refractory ambition, might conceal extravagant mofussil charges of serinjammy, admitting of large resurreptions for defraying the more general expenses of the soubah. A hustabood was therefore resolved on, and very imperfectly executed in the Bengal fussy year 1168, for the whole zemindary of Rajeshahy, exclusive of Baherbund; which if considered at any time before a dependency, became only a part of the Ranny Bowanny's territorial jurisdiction formally, two or three years later. The principal aumeen employed in this service, apologizes in a note subjoined to his account, for the deficiency of his investigation, by observing, "that the more complete ascertainment of the resources of so large a district by measurement and hustabood, would require about two years; for which reason, he had contented himself with such sudder and mofussil papers, as could be collected expeditiously; and from the informations hence derived, had drawn out his statement of improved rents, with resurreptions of sebundy and other zemindary expenses, all which, he should endeavour to see realized to government." In fact, the larger divisions of Rajeshahy proper, and Bhetooriah, were only generally estimated probably from the loose fallacious accounts of the zemindar himself, or his servile dependents; while the more satisfactory detail is entirely confined to those pergunnahs of recent acquisition, or of known improvement by jageerdary operations of towfeer; as will be seen by the following Schedule, the more valuable in itself, as exhibiting perhaps the only authoritative, tho' imperfect hustabood existing of this district.

But this investigation, though productive of such an improvement of the revenue, was so far from satisfying the Nabob, that it served only to stimulate his endeavours to obtain more, on the certainty of further concealed resources within the division of Rajeshahy, which it appeared is so prodigiously under-rated on comparison with the other districts better known; Neldy and Santore, by a recent hustabood, and the whole of the ancient division of Bhetooriah, while held in jageer by Mur Jumla, subject to be repeated towfeer operations, finally made known to government. Accordingly, the following year, the Abwab Serf-sicca, universally established throughout the soubah, and long since secretly levied by the zemindars, was added to the former malgoozary of Rajeshahy in all its divisions. This formed an additional assessment of one and a half anna on each rupee, or about 10 per cent. proportioned to the ausil jumma. But the net amount of the hustabood was henceforth denominated Ausil; and on this basis, the new exaction of the state, was acquiesced in by the landholder, rather than incur the risk of a further more particular scrutiny into the value of the rich unexplored territory west of the Ganges, was rated at 2,92,418 R^s. At the same time, the Aumeen Perbhoram had brought to light, on a stricter inquiry into the real state of some of the scattered pergunnahs, a new profit on the hustabood as follows:

These several additions of rent throughout the zemindary in 1169, amounting in all to rupees 4,75,766 inclusive of the Keffyet, Hustabood, Ezafa or increase of Perbhoram, and Abwab Serf-sicca, when annexed to the former net jumma, made the sum total of the malgoozary, then due to government, S^r R^s 33,51,104. or with Baherbund, at the same time separately increased to 1,68,296, should be stated at rupees 35,19,400. after having allowed a deduction of rupees 2,01,827. being about ten per cent. on the ausil toomary of 1135. in lieu of any charge of mofussil management, under the head of serinjammy. To insure the more punctual payment of so large a rental, from a district too extensive for single superintendence, a very judicious distribution of jageer and khalsa lands had already taken place; the former, comprised in all the scattered or fully investigated pergunnahs of Neldy and Santore, &c. with their accumulations in a very considerable proportion of the towfeer serf and keffyet, an original jumma of about eight lacks; while the latter, including Rajishahy, and the greater part of division of Bhetooriah, stated nearly at the thirteen lacks of the same antiquated valuation, were to bear, as in fact they were found already to do, an increase equal to all the old abwabs, with a very moderate share of the other exactions, yielding together a profitable increase on the rent-roll of 1135, something short of fifteen lacks of rupees, or about 3-4ths of that original toomary jumma; the whole under the subdivided charge of four aumildars, or principal managers in behalf of the chequer and different jageerdars. In 1170 A. B. the ordinary gross bundobust, which with all the preceeding sources of annual revenue, was settled at rupees 37,60,994. which with extraordinary demand of nuzzeranah on renewal of the zemindary sannd, reckoned on a mo-dum 1,75,000. and usual present to the whole public income of the district at this period, con-prising, as it is supposed, the pergunnah of Baherbund, rupees 20,52,691. being perhaps the greatest rental paid ever by the landholder to the Mogul representatives for this largest, and in part, the richest zemindary jurisdiction of the soubah, though only estimated in all, to produce a sub-rent from the ryots of fifty-two lacks; however, this may be, the net settlement for the year due to the chequer, after deducting rupees 2,52,174. in lieu of all serinjammy charges, amounted to rupees 35,08,770.

35,08,770. of which about five lacks as increase on the jagher mehals were brought on the khalsa records, under the denomination of towfeer, at the expulsion of Cossim Ali, in addition to the similar improvement of 1165 A. B.

Whatever might have been, the real collections made throughout the country, on the basis of a jumna bundy, thus comparatively ample at the close of the years 1170 and 71, (comprehending a period of rebellion, of rapine, or feeble, unsettled, and divided government) it cannot be expected that under so daring and unprincipled a minister as Nundcomar, any thing like the sum received by himself or his agents in the mofussil, would be accounted for to the public treasury, superadded to the ordinary catalogue of foulest crimes, marking sudden preferment amongst the natives of Hindostan, the embezzlement of krores of rupees out of the dewanny revenue, which is the only proper source locally existing of national or individual wealth, must have been necessary to gain by bribery the suffrages of all the members of a double complex administration, and yet acquire for himself the princely fortune he died possessed of on the gallows. Nor was it to be supposed that his Mussulman successor in office, the accused defaulter of millions, while in the niabut of Dacca, when forced on his nominal master as deputy in the soubahdarry under foreign influence, could either be more virtuous in the attainment of his employment, or withstand the temptation of enriching himself and followers in the future execution of his great financial trust, by similar acts of infidelity and speculation. Accordingly in 1172, when this man was appointed in behalf of the Company to administer their newly acquired revenue, altogether in the receipt, and for the most part in disbursements, he availed himself of the necessary ignorance of recent comptrollers, wholly uninstructed in the language, and established system of the exchequer; concealed his perfect knowledge of the actual state of the country, the true and fictitious collections of his predecessor, particularly in the zemindarry of Rajeshahy; made the latter the standard of present exaction there, in fixing the net current malgoozary of the year, ausil and abwabs, 24,56,108 rupees, exclusive of Baherbund, which on this occasion, with a dispersed profitable district called Cantoanagar, were bestowed on the dewan of the English resident at Moorshedabad; and boldly affirmed, as to the jumna of the soubah generally, at the instant of making this fraudulent reduction of near ten lacks in thirty-four, (being so much of the rightful dues of government) suddenly without the shadow of an excuse, and no where else compensated for, that it was the largest ever made, in the same breath which he made the declaration that all prior accounts for comparison were lost during the troubles of Cossim Ali.

It will not then be a matter of any surprise that the new minister, finding himself thus subjected to no effective controul, should, the following year 1173, increase the reduced jumna bundy of Rajeshahy in the sum of two lacks of rupees unaccountably, without any specification of the improved territorial lands, or occasion of making such an augmentation, and on the like unknown arbitrary principles, (probably no less profitable to himself) as guided him in stating a diminution of the established rental five times more considerable, when from the experience of years, he learned that additional imposts on the zemindars were readily acquiesced in by themselves, on the implied condition of more than simple indemnification, in the mode of new indefinite exactions from the ryots or collusive alienations of malgoozary land, that the ignorance, corruption, or mistaken policy, often imputed to his rulers, either tolerated the abuse, lessened the power, or deadened the inclination to check it, and that the ample fruits of so destructive a system of finance, might be gathered for his own private emolument in the forms of an annual settlement, remission of balances, &c. set forth in loose unaudited accounts, ever abstracted to avoid detection; it may not even be wondered at, in 1178, when the report of such malversation in England at length effected his dismissal with disgrace, and transmitted the Dewanny revenue to British management, that the rental of Rajeshahy was found to have been raised clandestinely to near its former standard, according to the following authentic, though unsatisfactory statement, in the nature of a Hustabood of the whole district as then formed, exclusive of Baherbund; viz.

But

But if any doubts should arise of the actual existence of the like ascertained full and legal funds to answer the equitable demands of government, at a later period, measured on the scale of their utmost extent in Cossim Ali's administration, a reference may be made to the report of the aumeeny investigation in 1183. On the truth or accuracy of the original Persian materials forming the basis of this compilation, I knew not the least dependence myself, judging from the situation and characters generally of the natives employed, as well as from such extracts of their accounts as have fallen fortuitously into my hands; yet they will probably be deemed conclusive evidence of the fact, of ample existing sources to make good the former greatest dues of the exchequer, by the most powerful supporters of a contrary belief, founded alone on vague opinion or interested information, evidently fallacious. If the constitutional policy of the country, in not admitting the right of any alienations of territory, without the sovereign consent, be acknowledged part, as it incontrovertibly is, of the system of financial jurisprudence, established by our predecessors in Indian dominion two hundred years ago, and invariably adhered to since, until the unfortunate period of contention which gave birth to the scrutiny now referred to, productive of the following loose imperfect abstract statement, if in any respect authentic, of the actual rental of Rajeshahy in its greatest dimensions, exclusive of Baherbund;

TOTAL gross Rental of the Zemindarry by the Hustabood of 1183 - Rupees

The observations which naturally occur in reviewing the preceding Statement, are; 1st. In respect to the Ausil, that six lacks of rupees are deficient of the original rental of 1135, which being little short of the standard valuation of one-third of the whole district, supposes a loss in five years (that is from 1178, when a kind of hustabood was formed under the auspices of the revenue council at Moorshedabad, confirming for the most part, the more authoritative investigation of 1168, as already set forth) of the territorial income of four thousand square miles; an extent of country that could only have been rendered unproductive to the state two different ways, equally inadmissible, being for the same period, altogether exempted from the destructive calamities of the physical or moral world, having as it appears recovered from, if ever in any great degree subject to, the temporary effects of a partial recent famine. The one mode, by desertion of ryots, and consequent dereliction of an uncultivated waste called Plateka, of which the probability is positively denied; not only because the particulars have not and cannot be specified, in all the regular detail of pergunnah divisions, liable to the easy detection of a survey; but because the history of India cannot shew an instance of such an emigration from one zemindarry to another, productive of a consequence so ruinous; though the permitted chicanery of modern landholders, hath often shifted the profitable industry of the people from arable ground equally assessed, to rich pasture lands of no financial importance, all alike fraudulent, whether in direct speculation in receipts or disbursements of the public revenue; collusive diminution of annual rent, in the specified terms of pottah—leasehold to the peasantry; or the more criminal dangerous mode, if at all admitted, of transferring the undoubted necessary property of the prince, to support the profligate idleness of a swarm of Hindoo priests, and cherish the growth of a race of native rebellious subjects. Another channel indeed of real defalcation might be found, in the natural or factitious indolence of the inhabitants of Hindostan, which would inevitably reduce their operations in husbandry, to a bare subsistence of the labourers employed, if a judicious spur in taxation did not excite reasonable efforts of greater industry; but in truth, this good is so wantonly used by oppressive zemindars, under the ignorance or supineness of new established rulers in a tranquil dominion, that the causes of present financial decline must be sought for, through either of the exceptionable ways indicated.

2dly. That the amount of abwabs, with the article of curtunny, exceeds the aggregate of all the former additional assessments on the ausil, in the sum of two lacks of rupees; at the same time, that we are to suppose the original territorial fund, serving as the basis for such profitable increase on the old standard crown rent, hath lost one-third of its valued extent, which indeed, if true, might make the actual burthen on the remaining lands, intolerably grievous to the people as well as a scandalous reproach to government, in suffering this openly oppressive exaction, wholly unauthorized, and a daring encroachment on the exclusive prerogative of sovereignty, in levying from the subject what can only be legitimate, under the form of public supply, to answer the exigencies of the state.

3dly. That

3dly. That with respect to the Baze Zemeen and Chakeran appropriations of the farming land-holders of Bengal, the commissioned officers of the dewanny, have really had the audacity to avow so much of their fraudulent alienations. Though it cannot be supposed, that in the great brahmin zemindarry jurisdiction of Rajeshahy they have ventured to state the full measure of their illegal grants; yet in the extent acknowledged, we find almost the exact equivalent, as it may probably be, the very identical substance of pretended defalcation in the amil jumma, however impossible it may be from Hindoo vices of forgery, chicanery, and perjury, refined by priestcraft, to prove the fact by circumstances of time, place, oral or documental testimony, and as such is undoubtedly a proper subject that ought without hesitation, to be wholly resumed. But in all events, the territory thus secretly disposed of in breach of official trust, highly prejudicial to the sovereign rights, involving an act not simply of negative prohibition, and in no one instance openly allowed under the most corrupt delegated administration of the Moguls, in any part of Hindostan; but diametrically contrary to the forms and spirit of the actual constitution, or ancient fundamental laws of India, universally known and invariably adhered to for two centuries past, as the dustoor ul amil customs or written political institutions in finance of that empire from which we derive all formal authority of dominion;—I repeat, this territory will, it is hoped, in conformity to what seems to be the constructive principle of the British Act of Parliament in 1784, be fully restored to those who alone had the rightful power of alienation, as it was almost as criminal in the present occupants to receive, as it was in the donors to bestow, collusive fraudulent benefices.

What are we then to think of the subsequent jumma-bundies of this district, reduced in 1190 to an intended gross mokurrery rental of twenty-three lacks of rupees, charged with a serinjumma incumbance of three and a half, exclusive of Baberbund? was it a deficiency in established territorial funds, to answer the usually larger demands of government? And how or when, could this deficiency be ascertained, without a record on the Company's voluminous proceedings of the genuine pergunnah divisions, detailed valuation and circumstances of a zemindarry, near thirteen thousand square miles in extent—to check the gainful fallacious system of fabricated accounts long since devised by native officers of revenue, and successfully imposed on their foreign rulers, under a presumptuous belief of that indolence, ignorance, or inability, which would naturally induce them to avoid the necessary minute of all enlightened operations in finance, content themselves with general abstracts of the collections made from large undefined portions of the country perhaps wholly unexplored by the superintending eye, and thus ensure concealment of the grossest peculation, by the ordinary arts of penetrating insidious Hindostanny cunning. A landlord indeed, unacquainted with the circumstances, of his estate, the extent and number of farms, nature of the soil, or capacity of the tenantry, to pay an established rent, (the particulars of which, in any authentic roll, never came under his inspection) might well call on a steward of noted chicanery, to state the causes of the prodigious decrease of annual income, arising gradually by imperceptible or permitted embezzlements, in a long course of least suspicious management, the fraudulent earnings of which, enjoyed in habits of yearly return with security, must necessarily give a colour of right as a perquisite of office, or otherwise equally in view of self interested and unintelligent superficial enquirers. The unfaithful servant would answer with a tale of woe, in describing generally the desertion of the peasants, under a rack-rental of the lands; inclemency of the seasons; the dire effects of inundations, draught, pestilence, or famine;—he would even refer to living witnesses, who had been accustomed to transfer their ideas of vassalage from the actual lord to the unworthy agent-representative, to attest the truth of his assertions; he would involve his accounts, in abstract statements wholly unexplained; and if a detail was positively required, in the knowledge of his superior's ignorance, he might venture to impose a fallacious cartload of particulars, to deter investigation, but most probably he would threaten to throw up the management of the embarrassed affairs of a needy master, thus rendered dependent for immediate support, on a faithless crafty zemindarry factor.

And what have been the means adopted to stop this rapid continued declension of the public revenue, or what are the modes practised and proposed, to ensure payment of the amount of present or future settlements? And have not all these, in every part of the British dominions, proved completely abortive on the fullest experience, not in realizing a fixed moderate rental in fact or form on a lease of years, but even in making good a constantly decreasing bundobust, attended with balances of equal magnitude as at any former period annually? Zemindars are undoubtedly in their own persons, or deputies chosen with the approbation of government, according to the established usage, the wealthiest, most responsible, and in every instance, the worthiest, as they are constitutionally the only eligible subjects throughout the Moghul empire, for managing the sovereign rents; except where an incorrigible propensity to fraud or refractoriness, seconded by dangerous local influence, may render absolute dismissal from office, and all territorial jurisdiction highly expedient. Their nancar, where ascertained, being about ten per cent. on the collections chiefly in land, is a security for defalcation, which no individual in Hindostan, possessing only moveable property, however great when this appropriated zemindarry allowance hath not been otherwise precisely determined, than by a small compensation for actually larger emoluments, as is generally the case in Bengal, there is an additional surety, against the losses of improvident or fraudulent management; nevertheless, in opposition to a system thus evidently advantageous, the commissioned permanent landholders have frequently been, as they still continue to be, in many places exonerated of their territorial trust and responsibility, while yet in receipt of their full official dues, often superadded to their former undisclosed perquisites, under the newly applied denomination of Moshairah. Temporary farmers fluctuating uncertain personal riches, perhaps wholly unacquainted with the internal state of the country;

country, strangers to or mistrusted by the ryots, and otherwise unqualified to superintend the finances, in any stage of administration; have been substituted in the room of the ejected zemindars; retained for themselves a double salary of agency; oppressed the people with new burthensome taxes; and if they did not abscond with anticipated receipts, were sure to fall in arrears, at the expiration of their lease, to add a vast accumulation of irrecoverable balance.

Again; hath the evil been in the least moderated, or is there any likelihood of its being so, under the easy prevalent system of selling zemindarry rights, when the official occupants, with their sole immediate dependants, are themselves the uncontrolled managers of the Company's revenue? These people have been universally stigmatized for mental incapacity; nor can the charge in general be denied, though there are doubtless many exceptions. It is the common lot, even of those in the highest departments of native government in Hindostan, to fall under the like imputation; and nothing can prevent the introduction of disorder, with intolerable abuse, in the districts unhappily, yet necessarily subjected to the direct feeble influenced administration of the present depraved race of Mahomedans or Hindoos, but the constant virtuous exercise of the sovereign power of the Mogul, where it still exists, by right of conquest or formal efficient representation in the approbation or choice of acting inferior ministers in the capacity of naibs or deputies, who, being alone responsible to the supreme rulers, checked with full intelligence of interior official duties, by a vigilant European superintendence, would execute their trust with fidelity, and moderation, on the only principles found effectual in such cases within the limits of eastern despotism, resolved into self-interest, and the dread of instantaneous punishment, with removal. But in zemindarry employments, often bestowed according to the customary rule of heritable succession (if no objections occur of a different nature) on helpless women, immured in the zenanas, under the sole domestic guidance of eunuchs, priests or physicians; and on minor children, natural or adopted, entrusted to the care of faithless guardians, the political maxim of Hindostan, authorizing the interference of the dewanny in filling up the vacant, can never with safety be deviated from; and when neglected, yet to be followed by a public sale of territorial jurisdiction;—what hath it the appearance of, unless it be a trick of state; to encourage the low profligate managers of a nominal landholder, in acts of irregularity and embezzlement, which, however profitable to themselves, must reduce their constituent to indigence, and the necessity of selling the whole or part of an allowed substance for the individual in office, to make up the sums plundered from the public treasury, by interested, irresponsible, though efficient secondary agents. If the pernicious consequences indeed of the system went no farther, perhaps a period of indemnification to the state might arrive, through the mere ascertainment of the value of districts thus disposed of: but the following circumstances, applicable to Rajeshahy in the present year 1193-4, will sufficiently evince the contrary.

This great unweildy territorial trust, hath long laboured under an unspeakable misfortune in the weak administration of a female Brahminee zemindar, called Ranny Bowanny, and of course of the disreputable worldly order, allowed independent rule within her jurisdiction abroad, though always priest-ridden at home, or a slave within the walls of her haram, to a set of the most cruel, unprincipled beings, who are like enemies to their mistress and government, with the difference that they are the sycophant dependants of the former, but altogether unknown to the latter; whose financial, with annexed judicial powers, they in fact administer uncontrolled; yet she neither received her office in heritable succession, nor as such, could she transmit it under the usual necessary confirmation of a dewanny sunnod, merely as wife to Ramkaunt, the former occupant, who died in 1153, and possessed of his riches to pay the largest customary muzzeranah. She finally, on the death of the next appointed landholder, Ragonaut, her son-in-law, in 1163, without issue, when Ramkishan, the actual presumptive heir, was very irregularly adopted, obtained in her own name a grant of the zemindarry. Superannuated and infirm, her death hath been for many years back expected; and by some supposed actually to have happened, though concealed. This state of things, naturally produced two opposite factions; the one, adherents to the probable successor, stimulated his endeavours to set aside the old woman, real or personified, and obtain the ostensible management, that they may be enabled to gratify in subordinate turn, their lust of power and plunder. The other, veterans in session, while labouring to maintain the tottering influence of the Ranny, are deeply interested in effecting the immediate sale of all her zemindarry rights, under the precarious tenure of their proper agency; and through favour of the actual system, the execution of their design is become an operation of the simplest kind. These miscreants, have only to alienate secretly, as much as possible of the Malgoozary lands to brethren Brahmins, and there can be no danger of detection, secured by fortification of the simplest kind. These enormous oppressive exactions, at least double the amount authorized or accounted for with the royal Exchequer; fall in arrears of revenue, withhold the total collections made, suffer under apparent circumstances of sale of a supposed ancient real estate; and thus under erroneous British ideas, of the sequestration of distressed poverty the mortifying hardship liquidate fictitious balances by the purchase-money, to the ruin of the landholder, the loss or discredit of the sovereign, with no other purpose than to provide, a public equivalent for private fraudulent defalcations.

In the first instance, the pergunnah of Otter Serroopper was destined to be sold. It contains 249 square miles in all its dimensions; is wholly detached, being insulated between the districts of Disnagpoor, Rungpoor and Edrackpoor; to the latter of which, independently of its having been formerly so attached, and also a very recent acquisition to Rajeshahy, it might, in point of true financial policy, be deemed an annexation no less eligible than the disbursement of it, must be considered with respect to the other over-grown zemindarry. Nevertheless, I believe it will be found to afford the earliest example on the records of Hindostan, of a territory so extensive, and only portion of a great landholder's jurisdiction, being thus offered to public sale. The value, according to the aasil jumma with towfeer in 1165, when the Ranny's caltiman entire, exclusive of six lacks abwab, should be rated twenty-four and a half lacks, is stated at rupees 35,950, or an hustabood, with improvements to 1178, rupees 60,480, making part of the total malgoozary of Rajeshahy, then increased to 35 lacks, at the latter valuation nearly of gross annual rent, payable to the Company, charged with a trifling deduction for seripjammy, though the pergunnah was bought by Deip-narrain, a Calcutta banyan, for the surplus price paid down of 91,500 rupees, as an equivalent for all zemindarry rights, which may be thus reckoned in fee at seven years purchase, where legal interest is twelve per cent. and the tenure somewhat precarious, worth 13,000 rupees per annum to the new possession. On the same political principles influencing the choice of Serrooppoor, to begin with in the sales intended by liquidation of an enormous balance, accumulated within these last ten years, which being all of equal validity, must be equally proper to be entirely realized; the separated distant pergunnahs of Pitladah and Pookeroah, might be supposed, would follow next in order; but Rajepoor on the Jellingtree making part, and in the very heart of the division of Rajeshahy proper, was preferred probably with the humane hope of terrifying the Brahmin ministers of the Ranny, to have recourse to their fraudulent treasury, in making good the equitable dues of the sovereign, rather than risk the loss of an old favoured possession, the principal seat of family worship. If such were the motives of selection, the crafty policy of the ruling factions, must have escaped observation. The pergunnah was, of course, suffered to be sold, having been subdivided into 20 different hoodas or portions, of indefinite value and extent, according to any authoritative standard estimate; doubtless from the apprehension of not finding bidders, for the whole united; which, on the aasil jumma of 1135, was rated rupees 29,137 on hustabood, proportioned to the net zemindarry revenue entire in 1170, with an increase of three fourths beyond the original assessment, should stand at rather more than 50,000 rupees, but was really put up at a fictitious tuckseem, if intended as toomarry rental, of 84,118, and actually fetched, on terms of a future hustabood income, to the Company (of R^y 1,21,898 annually, after deducting 7,742 for a seripjammy) R^y 1,67,939 purchase money of the zemindarry rights in fee, worth 24,000 per annum.

Now the greatest disadvantage attending this newly-adopted system of realizing the public revenue, is not the perplexing multiplied charge of European superintendence over the irregular frittered subdivisions of pergunnahs, which, when entire, are too numerous to be known by any recorded English list, even of those composing the district of Rajeshahy; neither is it the evident loss flowing from the destructive mode established in Bengal, of levying proportional assessments on the aasil, by variable indefinite zemindarry jurisdictions, giving the landholders, as in two foregoing instances, a latitude to claim deduction from the whole of their Malgoozary, even when reduced greatly below the standard of the original crown rent for such lands as may be sold, valued partially, or actual hustabood, at three times the amount of the aasil jumma; and which might finally enable the occupant now in question, to alienate half her territorial trust, clandestinely purloin a whole year's revenue, yet have funds thus enhanced, by repeated operations of government, through abwabs, towfeer, keffyet, or improved rental, in at least double the present income of the exchequer, to pay off all fraudulently incurred balances; but it is the inevitable certain want of purchasers for any considerable extent of zemindarry jurisdiction, that would prove the most ruinous consequences to the Company, in granting, under a delusive idea of their expedient demands of rent, the standard of their legal right, with the properest means of realizing it, a bundobusty lease beyond the usual constitutional term of a single year. Perhaps all the current wealth of Hindostan, to be employed in buying up such property, would not be sufficient to liquidate the balances already accumulated within these ten years, which, in Bengal alone, may be fairly estimated 80 lacks of rupees; but within the soubah itself, the peculation of 30 years serving to enrich the only monied class of people in the country, called Banyans, and willing to throw their cash into the market, would scarcely suffice, on an average, to make up the revenue arrears of a twelvemonth; yet these people once glutted, and not an individual can be said to remain with the inclination, that could take a whole or broken pergunnah in the Mofussil, on condition of paying any thing beyond the true ordinary Malgoozary of government.

In short, it appears demonstrable, that there hath been, since the acquisition of the Dewanny, an inexcusable, fraudulent, unaccountable defalcation in the net annual rent of the zemindarry of Rajeshahy, as due to the exchequer in round numbers of thirteen and a half lack of rupees, or fifteen lacks, inclusive of baberbund; and that there are still existing the most ample funds, immediately and constitutionally forthcoming, to insure the punctual payment of such an addition to the present effective rent roll. If any doubt should remain of this, the Comparative State of inclosed and neighbouring independent Districts, will best remove all grounds of scepticism.

ZEMINDARRY OF DINAGEPOOR.

HACKIKUT JUMMA KOOL, of the Zemindarry of the havilee of the circar of Pinjerah, now called Dinagepoor, and formerly, with the district of Edrackpoor, constituting the larger territorial jurisdiction of Aurungabad; exhibiting a view of the original and increased Assessments under the heads of Aasil Abwab, Keffyet, and Towfeer, levied on all the included lands, varying in extent or value at different periods, from the Bengal year 1135, at the commencement of Sujah Khan's administration, to 1170, on the expulsion of Cossim Aly Khan; comprising almost the whole period of

of the able interior management of Ramnaht, a foreigner from Upper Hindostan, of the cast of Elce or Koyt, and the first of the present race of official landholders vested by sunnud, in this great caltiman or dewanny trust; continued thenceforward, after a hustabood had been formed of the whole caltiman as collected from the ryots by the zemindar district, ascertaining the full dues of the exchequer as collected from the ryots by the zemindar annually, in behalf of the sovereign, until the establishment of the Company's government in 1172; and subsequently while under the chartered agency of Bydenaht, son successor of the afore-mentioned original zemindary occupant to the time of his death without issue, about the year 1185, when his only surviving brother Cantoonaht, heir of line according to the Hindoo ordinations, was set aside, and the management bestowed on the present infant landholder Radanaht, who was irregularly adopted during the last illness or since the demise of her husband, by the widow of the deceased, now acting as a guardian by naib of her own independent choice, unless the members of superior revenue administration have taken on themselves the responsibility of his conduct, in a tacit or avowed ap- probation of the titular Ranny's appointment. The whole gross and net rental to be here presented first in the abstract, afterwards rather imperfectly, in the necessary financial detail of Khalsa and Jageer, Chucklabundy, Circarat, and Pergunnatty divisions, may be computed to arise from a territory in all its actual geographical dimensions of 4,119 B. square miles, including, with the area of Dinagepoor, Proper Calligong and Bajahow, composed of Gorahtaut, as described by Rennell, in lieu of what is called a seven anna, or so many sixteenth shares; but in fact, nearer one-half of this mutilated Chucklah divided with the petty zemindar of Edrackpoor.

Abstract of the Jumma Kaumil or complete hustabood of the whole zemindarry, in 1168 A.B. consisting of whole and broken pergunnahs, 121, dependent on the khalsa or jageer departments, valued in the gross original with increased assessments, involving the largest collections ever authorized or made on the proper account of the state, annually, Sicca Rupees 29,10,885; from which, deducting serinjammy mofussil expenses, found to be 2,66,152, inclusive of the zemindar's full allowance of muscoorat, &c. there remained 26,44,733 net Rental;—as set forth in the following Analytic Scheme, agreeable to the sheristah or forms of the imperial exchequer of Bengal, shewing, in chronological arrangement, the component parts of that aggregate revenue; subdivided in the first instance into,

1st. Malgoozary, or old established assessment, under the authority of government, prior to the year 1168, including aasil abwab and towfeer on the khalsa and jageer lands of the whole district - - - R^y 12,49,816.

2d. Keffyet, or profitable improvement on the same territorial funds, as discovered on the hustabood of 1168, secretly collected by the zemindar, by improper extension or distribution of abwabs, or otherwise, in the form of increased rents; R^y 13,94,917, now resumed.

Malgoozary collected as the basis of total revenue, with the keffyet from the official landholder Ramnaht, in five divisions, under superintendence of so many different amildars; according to the following Particulars:

Total aasil jumma of Dinagepoor in 1168, and ever since comprised in the chucklahs of Gorahtaut and Akbernagur, as distributed into Khalsa - - 6,08,092 - - - 7,54,433
and Jageer - - 1,46,341 - - -

2d. Towfeer profitable increase on the jageer lands, from the earliest assignments, gradually increasing to the year 1165, and subsequently to 1168; in all Rupees 1,58,418, inclusive of Serf 26,340.

3d. Abwabs established on the aasil of the khalsa portion of territory, and consolidated therewith, prior to the year 1168, as follows:

Considerable as the keffyet or profitable increase stated at R^y 13,94,917, inclusive of R^y 92,285, under the denomination of serf may seem, when thus raised at once by a single operation, on the foundation of a malgoozary, as before set forth, of rather lesser amount; yet it by no means equals the advantage comparatively of a similar hustabood investigation, carried on much about the same time and afterwards throughout the Company's zemindarry of Calcutta, completed under the auspices of Mr. Verelst; and if it exceeds the profits in like manner, derived from a scrutiny into the actual mofussil collections of the landholder of Burdwan; it should be remembered, that in this district, under an erroneous though natural idea of constitutional right in the mind of an European, upwards of five lacks of beghas, bazee, zemeen or fraudulent alienations of ground, after having been discovered, were not intirely resumed as they ought, and must have been, according to the established customary laws of the country, within any mussulman jurisdiction; but were simply assessed for half half a rupee each begha, being only about one-fourth of the real produce, annually to government; that the whole muscoorat, nancar, &c. constituting the entire right of the zemindar, amounting to near 1,80,000, was still, in fact, continued to his family, by the favourable leasehold of what hath been called Dewry land; at the same time, that a full compensation had been made to himself, for the supposed resumption of it, under the head of Mohairah, and that Burdwan be a fifth larger than Dinagepoor in extent; yet the still greater proportion of rent paid by the former, after the utmost improvement of the latter, leaves a suspicion that the original valuation of the one, was beyond measure higher, probably because more fully explored, than the other; nevertheless, the kallyet here stated and included in the settlement of 1169, was deemed too great for public discovery or profit, when M. R. Khan took charge of the dewanny in 1171; for without any communication of particular reasons assigned, or possible grounds of remission, unless in the corrupt example of his predecessor Nundcomar, during the two preceding years administration, he at once arbitrarily reduced the amount to be in future collected as part of the annual jumma bundy, to R^s 5,76,344, making the whole net rental of the zemindary no more than R^s 18,26,140; and from this even, something appears to have been deducted, besides the dismemberment of Cantoanagar, stated only at R^s 7,329:—This total Revenue however, continued nearly at the same standard, to the year 1178, and is detailed with the ausil in all the pergunnah divisions on the district, in the following Table.

By the five years settlement, which took place in 1179, the Bundobust Jumma Kool of this zemindary was to be improved gradually at the expiration of the lease to R^s 19,43,242, including an increase of 1,03,512 on the preceding year's revenue, after deducting 21,923 R^s under the head of Sayer, Chicundah, &c. deemed unlawful or improper assessments: But this rental was so far from being realized, that in 1183 an annual remission for the whole period was allowed of, amounting ultimately to R^s 4,82,798, which diminished the gross stipulated malgoozary to 14,60,444 R^s, burthened with mofussils, serin-jammy, charges of zemindary, native cutchery and foudary, to the amount of 2,84,940; and consequently Foujedarry of Purneah.

BUT the Ausil of this Rental, exhibited no more than the standard valuation of the great northern pergunnahs of Soorjapoor, Seerjapoor, Sultanpoor, and Havillee of Purneah, according to their old confined boundaries on this side of Morung, with entire exclusion of Terā Kahedehs; still nearer the greater Thibetian Hills; and the third proportionate part of the whole Foujedarry in its present extent, dismembered from the circar of Mongeer in Soubah. Behar is not even mentioned in the original rent roll of Bengal, nor otherwise than loosely deducted from the Jumma Toomary of Behar, under the ancient pergunnah denomination of Derhempoor, at the vague estimation of 40,000 rupees; yet this last acquired great division of Purneah, beyond the former channel of the Cossah, including Goondwarrah, Bowannypoor, Bunagur, Naptpoor, and Dupphore, stood rated in the accounts of the district, still adjusted to fussillee year, beginning in the month of September, different from that of Bengal, which commenceth in April, at the established assessment of 3,55,773, though it is doubtful whether a proportion of the Foujedarry Abwab originally imposed by Seyf Khan, and consolidated with the other funds of the public exchequer in the administration of Sujah Khan, may not form part of the jumma here stated. However this may be, it was well known that the province entirely yielded, at least double its valued rent; thus enhanced to about ten lacks of rupees; and therefore in 1168, after quashing the rebellion of Shouket Jung, or Khadem Hussain Khan, who had usurped the Foujedarry, succession on the death of Soulet Jung, the former occupant, Cossim Aly completed a regular of 4,72,559, after deducting a serinjammy of 1,64,010; though the profitable increase more properly, should be stated at no more than 9,30,541, on foundation of the prior established rental;—forming in all, a gross provincial income of 21,09,415 rupees; according to the following Statement.

Foujedarry of Purneah.—JUMMA KAUMIL, or complete Assessment of the Province of Purneah in 1168, A.B. in its several Purgunnahs, generally under an equal number of Zemindars, whose names, being the actual occupants in 1190, are, together with the Ausil Jummas, particularly specified.

The circumstances and changes in the administration of the finances of this province, merit the more particular attention, as they illustrate one of the grand principles of the original Mogul institutions, and may be useful in tracing some of the most enormous abuses of the present system to their primitive causes, through the indolence, ignorance, or depravity of natives intrusted with uncontrolled executive management. It was the great object of Akber's policy, as it hath been of every wise enlightened ruler of Hindostanny dominion, to secure the ease and natural rights of the ryots or peasantry (including in this class of useful subjects almost the whole Hindostani) against the oppressions of their superiors, whether acting as representatives of former petty chieftains of the same nation, superseded in power, and forced to obey the more enlarged equitable laws of the Mussulman conqueror, or in the chain of official employments, linking the two extremes of eastern despotism under the subordinate denominations of Soubahdarry, Foujedarry, Aumildarry, Zemindarry, Cowdraphy, Taloodarry, and Moccudemian intermediate agents paid by government. The fundamental maxim that limited the sovereign's demand of rent from husbandmen to the rebba, or fourth of the gross yearly produce of his farms, was liberal and humane; while the established or pre-scriptive rule which allotted the remaining three fourths to the latter, with perpetual occupancy of the lands in terms, and excellent though indefinite form, of a pottah leasehold, gave him in fact a property in the soil, and a share in the fruits of his own labour, rarely enjoyed in countries of European freedom, though there for the most part subjects; and here alone, the prince must be considered as vested with all proprietary immediate right of territory; but the native corrupt slothful dewanny superintendents of Bengal, seldom or ever positively ascertained the actual condition of the ryots, or how far their privileges have been secured against encroachment. Accordingly, in the very few, though comparatively great zemindarry districts, which have been subjected to proper hustabood investigations, no question was ever made of such unlawful exactions, as might have been imposed by inferior agents. The principal farming landholders clandestine profits, alone were the objects of enquiry, as forming part, when within the rebba of the legal dues of the exchequer, and the silence of the lower tenantry on the subject of any causes of complaint was interpreted, as a negative proof, that none existed. In the military provinces on the other hand, and particularly this of Purneah, Foujedarry of Rungpoor.

Here in 1172, as well as in every where else in Bengal, probably on the known fictitious ground of Nundcomar's collections the preceding year, a sudden prodigious reduction was made by the native ministry acting in behalf of the Company, in the amount of the established jumma of the province. It was stated in all, clear of mofussil charges, at 5,22,154 rupees. But it may have been reckoned 4 lacks more, or as much less, without any danger of detecting the falsehood, when there was no previous standard of comparison; and it has only been very lately, after entering on a minute detail of provincial accounts, the discovery was made, that the foujedarry keffyet of Cossim Ali had been unaccountably diminished on this occasion, from 7 lacks and a half to 1 and a half lack of rupees. On the same arbitrary principle of forming or drawing out a settlement of the revenues in 1173, an increase of 75,000 rupees appears in the bundobust. In 1178, the very year after the famine, and M. R. Khan's efficient administrator, the whole rental was found to be nearly at its proper improved standard, being then rupees 11,05,605, though with deductions of batta, between narrainy and sicca rupees, zemindarry, and other serinjammy charges, all which were probably provided for or compromised, exclusive of the jumma kool of 1170, the net malgoozary did not exceed 8,93,313 sicca rupees. Soon after, the tribute of Cooch Beyhar, became a part of the annual income of Rungpoor. Nevertheless, with this addition in 1184, the clear revenue fell to 7,18,622 sicca rupees; and yet at the same time, the aumeeny investigation shewed territorial funds for producing 12,78,959 rupees, exclusive of 3,71,695 plateka, and besides a bazee zemeen with chakeran, of 1,84,053 begas, all in the districts of Fakhercoondy alone. In 1188, the farm of Goalpareh, being in fact only resumption of the sayer or duties formerly levied within the jurisdiction of Rangamutty on the trade to and from Asham, was productive of 46,551 increase to the foujedarry collections. But finally, notwithstanding every aid in 1190, the effective provincial jumma dwindled away to little more than 5 lacks of rupees, after allowing one lack and a half for batta foujedarry and all mofussil expenses. On the whole, seven lacks of rupees must be reckoned the recoverable defalcation in the annual revenue of this province entire, unless ample, valid, and specific reasons applicable to the actual state of the country, in the minutest detail of local financial subdivisions, can be adduced to prove and justify, any real decline from the year 1170 to the present time.

NEABUT OF DACCA.

Neabut of Dacca.

THIS great province, the former seat of Soubahdarry government, under the denomination of Jehangeernagur, and known on the khalsa records by the pergunnahty name of Jelahpoor, hath generally since the removal of the capital of the viceroyalty of Bengal to its present site of Moorshedabad in 1717, A. D. during the administration of Jaffier Khan, been ruled by the naib or deputy of the soubah; sometimes also holding in his own person, the more important efficient trust of imperial dewan. Thus Shahamet Jung Nowarish Mahomed Khan, the nephew of Aliverdi, continued for many years, until his death prior to the accession of the tyrant Suraje ul Dowlah, to occupy both these posts, in violation of the Mogul constitution, and of course turned to his private advantage advantage the high incompatible powers of a double appointment (intended originally as mutual checks to each other, but then vested singly in himself) in the large authoritative improvement of the revenues of his proper local jurisdiction; without being made accountable to the state, for any thing beyond the antiquated crown rent called Ausil Jumma Toomary. It was in search of the treasure and provincial accounts, supposed to be in the possession of Kishendass, son of Raje Cullub, (who formed for himself the rich zemindarry of Rajenagur, and had amassed prodigious wealth in the abuse or management of the finances of the Neabut as minister to Shahamit Junge), that Suraje ul Dowlah was first tempted to commence hostilities on the memorable revolution of 1757. Cossim Ali Kishendass had taken refuge; ending at length in the violent grasp of tyranny, in ascertaining the soon afterwards peaceably obtained, what eluded the public treasury the keffyet or profits of former actual collections of the district, and realizing to the Company's acquisition of the Dewanny, fraudulently sunk under the double delegated administration of M. R. Khan. The superintendents; though these were again partly in 1764, and wholly on the Company's acquisition of the Dewanny, fraudulently sunk under the double delegated administration of M. R. Khan. The whole extent, valuation, and circumstances affords almost an exact parallel to the zemindarry of Rajeshahy; being in all its dimensions, including islands in the mouth of the Ganges and Birmah-pooter, 15,397 British square miles, producing an original Rental, now to be exhibited in detail, of about twenty-one lacks of rupees; and differing chiefly in its improved financial state, or as the grand emporium of cotton cloths with the finest muslins in the world, instead of the raw and manufactured silk principally found in the neighbouring mismanaged territory of Ranny Bowanny.

Neabut of Dacca.—AUSIL JUMMA TOOMARY of the Chuckly of JEHANGEERNAGUR; composing the greatest part of the Province of Dacca, as originally formed in 1135; with annexations or dismemberments henceforward to the Bengal year 1172, according to M. R. Khan's Chucklehbundy.

N. B. In the Accounts of the Nowareh zemindarries of Seryle and Zun Shahy, when annexed to Sylhet, there is a deduction from their jumma of R^s 66,168, as so much retained from the exchequer dues for themselves. On the other hand, in the particulars of the Nowareh assignments, exclusive of the original standard amount of the whole jagur, being R^s 7,78,954, there appear to have been received by, though not regularly passed in the Accounts of government, R^s 64,498, under the heads of Peshcush or Serf, paid by the Nowareh zemindars, and probably those of the two foregoing pergunnahs; in which case, the receipts nearly counterbalance the deduction that might otherwise have been usually allowed of.

Again it appears, that near one lack and a half of rupees had been added to the Jummabundy Kool of the Neabut, besides every other increase, to the year of the acquisition of the dewanny in 1172, in zemindarry detail, making the net Malgoozary of the province, no more than Rupees 37,26,584; as follows:

THE Neabut of Dacca ruled uncontrolled sometime, and so long after the year A. D. 1765, by M. R. Khan, exhibits the most striking instance, among all the provinces dependent on Bengal, of the enormous and fraudulent defalcation of established revenue, from the period of the Company's acquisition of the Dewanny. Thus it appears from the foregoing Statement, that the annual malgoosary of government exceed thirty-eight lacks of rupees; and if the Hustabood account of Itajebullub, formed under the administration of Shahamut Jung, said to be in the possession of and used in terror by M. R. Khan, to make good his private bundobusty agreements, could have been procured, or verified by documental proofs in detail, as stated traditionally in the total, at a gross rental of fifty-six lacks; the net assessment of the sovereign would appear extremely moderate, and must have been at all times, fully realized with ease; even after making an ample allowance for the necessary Sebundy troops, and real diminution in the sayer duties of the city of Jehangeernangur since the decline of its commerce, with reform of the marine and military establishments, serving before to enrich that provincial capital, besides the usual deduction of 20 per cent. for defraying of Serinjammy, is not otherwise expense of the collections, when such charge, under the description of Serinjammy, is not otherwise compromised for with the zemindars, at the lesser rate of the muscoorat, or condition of suspending enquiry into the actual receipts from the country. Notwithstanding, however, all these favourable circumstances, the jumma kool of the neabut was shamelessly paltry income of twenty and a half lacks of rupees, of which only 11½ lacks amsil toomary, 3½ lacks abwabs, and 5½ lacks more in lieu of the large resumed keffyet or profits of the Neabut Soubahdarry, acquired in the long administration of Shahamut Jung, by continued improvements of the imperial finances. But from the inadequate revenue thus stated as the stipulated dues of the exchequer, a new or fictitious charge of rupees 3,40,163 was introduced, on pretence of defraying the expense of provincial management; and must, with the old authorized allowance of muscoorat, besides sebundy, and 76,095 more as the deficiency of the Shahbunder, &c. be deducted from the total forthcoming, to shew the actual receipts of the lie treasury. Supposing the whole demand passed on account with the Company fully realized, and which will then stand only at the net effective jumma of 15,37,108 rupees, to acquiesce in the belief of either the expediency or reality of so rapid or prodigious a decline of the established rental, would be a reproach on the credulity of the most ignorant, even if the truth of the fact being otherwise were not so notoriously known, and susceptible of undeniable proof, where self-evident grounds of faith might be wanting;—but to admit the possible loss of near a moiety of the original territorial assessment of Dacca, it would be necessary to shew that one half, or more than seven thousand square miles of the dimensions of that great province, had been as instantaneously overwhelmed, or calamitously rendered unproductive, in the hour of concluding the first dewanny settlement of M. R. Kan in 1172, as the whole was found (in such event indeed miraculously) restored to nearly its premature state, at the close of his administration in 1178, being the year immediately following the various extent and valuation of some of the principal eastimandaries of a district intersected by the branches, and frequently torn from the confluence of two of the greatest rivers of the world, rushing impetuously, during the periodical rains, to the neighbouring sea, insomuch that here, where the income of the state, like the rest of Hindostan, depends on the rebba or fourth proprietary share in the produce of the lands, allowing twenty per cent. on that rental for all charges of zemindary management, and to enrich the official occupants as farmers general; it will be morally impossible ever to extend the period of territorial leases beyond the term of a single year, without probable ruin to the farming contractors, or large extravagant remissions on the part of government. Yet it invariably happens, that as much as is gained annually by direktion or collusion on one side, as may be lost on the other, by successive ravages of the current and opposing tides, while repeated overflows, with rich deposits of mould, washed down with the stream, bestow extraordinary fertility on the extensive inundated borders of the river. Such consequent alterations, then, require the vigilant attention of the superior officers of the exchequer, to prevent continual diminutions of the revenue through a cause so powerful, when aided by the fraudulent encroachments of landholders alone, subject perhaps to the ineffectual check of corrupt native comptrollers. Accordingly, under musliman administration, the important duty of local inspection, seems not to have been so much neglected as at present. Thus we find the petty zemindary of Bosergaumepoor, in the space of five and thirty years anterior to 1170, improved in its rental from 6,000 rupees to two lacks, chiefly through new acquisitions of soil, though doubtless, partly from amelioration of the uncultivated wastes of the sunderbunds; increased manufacture of salt, or growth of beetlenut; together with the other great operative cause of apparent general improvement throughout Bengal, in the decreasing value of silver;—and thus the pergunnah of Ruttundee Kalcapore, with some more, at the united mouths of the Ganges and Birmahpooter, were gradually formed, and progressively assessed, to compensate for loss of adjacent rated mehals destroyed by inundation; while, on the contrary, in later times, it is well known that churs or islands have appeared, and been made productive to private individuals, with large tracts of improveable territory in the sunderbunds, without being in any degree turned to the real public advantage of the protecting sovereign proprietor. To return from this digression, more generally to the hackicut jumma of the neabut of Dacca, it is to be observed, that in 1173 a fallacious increase of 50,000 rupees was here, in like manner as in the other provinces of the Soubah, added to the ostensible bundobust agreement of the preceding year; but with certainty of ample indemnification to the framers of the settlement, in the mode of liquidating supposed balances. In 1176, however, the malgoozary accounted for, appears effectually to have risen to Rs 23,02,222; and in 1178, the year after the famine, I had opportunity to know (being on the spot, and employed partly, though not then in the Company's service, in drawing out the settlement; which, in fact, was all that in the yearly period of immediate English administration, could have been done even by the deputed resident at the Durbar himself, with the best abilities and inclination to do ample justice to his employers, under the prevalent corrupt influence of former native managers) that it amounted to upwards of twenty-nine lacks; and I had also at the same time, the most convincing proofs, that besides this net revenue, afterwards in a manner wholly collected, clear of every charge except the unmerited pensions bestowed on the creatures of the dismissed dewanny Naib, large voluntary gifts, perhaps in all equivalent to the defalcation that had taken place in the public income since the year 1172, were received from the zemindarry, for the indulgence of paying no more than the lately reduced standard of rent by Hindoo mutseddies, being the efficient officers of the exchequer, solely possessed of power and knowledge to controul the finances, with full intelligence or beneficial economical effect, in 1184, thirty lacks may be stated as the actually realized malgoozary of Dacca, and yet by the aumeeny investigation, brought up nearly to the same period, the actual financial funds of the province were found to be dussamsha, or Arcot rupees 43,63,561, being only about eight per cent. worse than siccas; which indeed I am inclined to think not much short of the true amount, supposing it to be free of every other charge except the zemindarry ruseom of five per cent. on the gross collections, agreeable to the ordinary rule of hustabood deductions of expense, where servants allowances in land, have also been admitted of; more especially as the mofussil canongoes, who must have furnished the accounts, were officially independent of those of the sudder, and therefore in some degree, of the principal native mutseddy, under whose direction the enquiry was conducted; and as besides the jumma stated, Bazee Zemeen with Chakeran allotments to the extent of 8,01,572 beghas, to be valued at an equal number of rupees, are to be added in the calculation of gross annual rental.—But as the component parts of the established assessment, ascertained on this occasion, seems curious, I shall here insert them, under their general heads, as specified for the huzuree department; viz.

make up the total aumeeny rental in 1182 as before stated; and all this, supposed to be raised on a basis of included ausil toomary jumma only of eleven and a half lack of rupees, being little more than half of the amount real to be found of that original standard assessment in the whole Neabut or modern province of Dacca.

Finally, in 1190, even after an apparent increase of upwards of four and a half lacks of rupees in 1188, on the net jumabundy of the preceding year, and then deducting two and a half lacks for ordinary mofussil charges, inclusive of the neabut superabundant pensions, still the effective yearly malgoozary, fall considerably short of twenty-eight lacks, and certainly left a recoverable defalcation throughout the province entire, of at least ten lacks more in sicca rupees, of clear annual income.

The

The six foregoing extensive districts of the dewanny portion of Bengal, under the immediate single jurisdiction of so many zemindars, foudjars, or naibs of the Nizamut, as constituting by far the better part of the whole soubah in dimensions or valued rent, and as involving the greater share of the vast sum lost by native fraud, mismanagement, or ignorance, to the public exchequer, since the company's acquisition of the Dewanny to May 1784, A. D. though still no less expedient than easily to be regained by government, with even a prodigious relief to the people; these, it is repeated, merit to be distinguished and classed together, as the countries of greater defalcation; more particularly to be distinguished and classed together, as the countries of greater defalcation; and it is therefore I here present a Summary of what hath already been set forth more in detail, throughout the preceding pages.

ZEMINDARRY OF NUDEAH.

Zemindarry of Nuddeah.

THE historical detail of the district, with those which follow next in order, of the Dewanny portion of the lands of Bengal, may be comprized in a narrow compass, as the comparative defalcation of revenue since the commencement of the Company's administration, will appear inconsiderable, after reviewing the accounts of the six preceding larger territorial jurisdictions of the soubah. The sum total however of the deficiency, though distributed into a greater number of smaller financial divisions of country, is too important in itself, to be overlooked, and demands perhaps our more particular attention. That if sums to be almost wholly incurred subsequent to the period of M. R. Khan's first settlement in 1172, A. D. when as may be seen in a memorandum at the close of the former section, the remainder of the jumma to be accounted for, according to his bundobust, differs very little in amount (about 71,84,618.) from the supposed enormous exaction of Cossim Ally, continued, and in some instances even increased to the moment of concluding the famous original standard of reduced rental in behalf of the English government, termed Mujmuah Dewanny. Conformably then to the plan of exhibiting now a view of the districts of lesser defalcation, pendant on Bengal, it is to be observed, that the zemindarry here begun with, denominated, on the khalsa records, Aukeherah, by the late official leaseholder, from his own name and ordinary place of residency Kisenagur; or more commonly Nuddeah; as the well known ancient capital of a Hindoo, principality anterior to the Mogul conquest, and in modern times the seat of a brahmin seminary, (endowed clandestinely, though highly worthy of the sovereign's confirmation), is, in all its dimensions, exclusive of some lately acquired mhals by purchase, under the recently adopted system of territorial sales for the liquidation of balances 3,151 B. sq^r miles of arable fertile land advantageously situated on the eastern banks of the river Hooghly, near all the chief European establishments in this part of India, and benefiting largely from their united commerce or consumption of agricultural produce. It has the misfortune internally, and influences that of the exchequer in being the second in extent or consideration to Rajeshahy among these eahitimams under the weak interested management of a single brahmin landholder. He derives his descent, in Mahomeddan nomenclature of his ancestors, the great progenitor of mankind Adam! though by the domestic nomenclature of his ancestors, where vulgar dates of course are lost in the infinite spaces of Hindoo chronology, it is not probable that his pedigree is traced beyond the supposed period of some family emigrants, said to have been sent to colonize the country of Egypt. According to prevalent tradition or authentic archives, the khalsa, Bobanund, mujmuada or temporary recorder of the jumma of the circar of Hooghly, and from him, Ragoorah acquired by sunnud and enlarged the jurisdiction of Nuddeah, to its present magnitude, in the government of Jaffier Khan. The district gained some respectability under the long and crafty management of Kisenchund; but is now in danger of being reduced or dismembered, through the incapacity of his son Shiechbunder, the profligacy of his servants, and mode of realizing balances.

Carried forward - -

SUCH was, or should have been, the net rental of Nuddeah, in round numbers little short of eleven lacks of sicca rupees, to the moment of the Company's acquisition of the Dewanny; but in an instant, it was reduced by M. R. Khan to 8,74,004 R. No hustabood seems to have been then formed, of the modern actual value of the district. It was assessed generally on the ausil, by towfeer and abwabs. In this state, it might have been expected, if remissions had really been necessary, that the amount would have fallen, on the new additional enclosures. Yet the contrary happened; and the deductions were made from the standard toomary jumma, or the old well established profits accruing on the jageer lands. From this time forward, the ostensible formal bundobust seems to have been slowly decreasing until the year 1778, immediately after the famine, and on dismissal of the nabib dewan; when suddenly it was raised, no doubt on very sufficient grounds, beyond all former example, to a gross annual demand of 12,66,266. Burthened, however, on the supposition of having resumed all the serinjammy funds, and deprived the zemindar of his nancar or ordinary means of subsistence, with charges of collection in the motussil amounting to 3,64,197 rupees, in 1184, the net malgoozary, after allowing an expense of two lacks and a half, fell to R^s 7,36,957. At the same time, the native aumeeny investigations (and their authority should be relied on, till better can be produced) discovered sources of territorial revenue equivalent, with 2,42,842 plateka, to S^a R^s 15,85,798, besides bazee zemeen and chakeran 4,75,731 begas, to be rated at an equal number of rupees annual rent;—all derived from 2,099 farms, including 3,403 villages, of which the particulars are to be supposed, of course forthcoming. To conclude, in 1190, (continuing to deduct charges of interior management at the last-mentioned standard, admitted of) the clear revenue stipulated for, notwithstanding a formal increase of one lack of rupees, stated to have been brought on, at the institution of the committee in 1188, did not much, if at all, exceed eight lacks of rupees; so that, in right and moderation equitable policy, three lacks ought to be regarded as the recoverable defalcation of effective increase capable of realization on the latter jumma, payable to the exchequer, forming the comparison with the rent-roll originally established before the reduced settlement of M. R. Khan, in 1765. Considering, indeed, the vast known recourses of this fertile extensive district, (exclusive of fraudulent alienations of territory, with collusive reductions chiefly in favour of Brahmins, of the ancient rates of assessment specified in the pottahs of the ryots,) the improvement of which its finances are immediately susceptible, might fairly be stated at seven lacks. But before we proceed to new funds of revenues, let us trace those we already possess to their source, and make them entirely our own, where still existing in all the plenitude of ascertained income, as transferred to the Company on acquisition of the Dewanny. In all events, it will be necessary to recollect that besides the Perg^s herein set forth as composing the zemindarry of Nuddeah, some recent annexations have been made by purchase, though in this work, to be separately noticed.

FOUJEDARRY OF HEDJEELE.

THIS district, situated on the low western margin of the river Hooghly, where it unites with the sea in the bay of Balasore, though small in extent, being no more than 1,098 B. sq. miles in all its dimensions, is yet of great importance as an accessible frontier, rich in its produce of grain, but still more valuable, as productive of more than one-third of the necessary quantity of salt manufactured and consumed annually within the whole British dominions dependent on Fort William. It was first dismembered from the soubah of Orissa, and annexed to that of Bengal, in the reign of Shah Jehan. In the Aurilly or Vahyaty year 1812, current still in all parts of the former province, and beginning at the autumnal equinox corresponding with the commencement of the sixth month of the Bengal Fussille era 1111, on the death of the emperor Aleungeer, A.D. 1707, the jumma inclusive of the salt mahi of Hedjeele, rated then only at 43,565 R^s. But on the grand improvement of the original assessment under Jaffier Khan, as stated in the standard rent-roll of 1135 A.B. the same lands, comprehending the whole chuckiah of Hedjeele, with the pergunnah of Toomluck annexed to Hooghly, were valued, ausil 4,77,947 R^s distributed in 38 pergunnahs, united at that period, in the single zemindarry trust of Sookdio, and since subdivided into the five lesser portions, denominated Jellamootah, Derodumna, Mhesadul, Toomluck, and Sujamootah, holding of as many eshtimandary officers of government, agreeable to the following statement of the Crown Rent established from 1135 to 1172 A.B.

			Carried up	1,14,995

TO comprehend fully the nature and sources of the revenue of this district, it may be necessary to give some explanation of the distinctive appellations Mudhoor and Nemucky, according to which the malgoozary lands are generally divided. The former, fresh or arable ground, is preserved from inundation of the tides, and consequent destruction of its more useful vegetative quality by embankments, called Behrybundy, running parallel to, and at some distance from the rivers, and mode of collection inlets intersecting the whole territory. Its financial arrangements, rent-roll, and mode of collection by ausil and abwab assessments, are established precisely on the same principle, as prevail throughout the rest of the soubah, with this difference only, that the proportion of increase on the original jumma hath here been always comparatively small. The latter, or salt land, is that portion exposed to the overflowing of the tides, usually called churs; where mounds of earth strongly impregnated with saline particles are formed, then classed into kahlaries or working places. Each on a medium, estimated to yield 233 maunds of salt, requiring the labour of seven molungee manufacturers, who by an easy process of filtration, and boiling afterwards the brine with firewood, collected from the neighbouring jungles, of annual growth, are enabled to complete their operations from November to June, before the setting in of the periodical rains, and with the savings for six months wages fixed by government with the zemindars, at the rate of twenty-two rupees for every hundred maunds extraordinary weight of salt produced, retire to their respective homes for the remainder of the season, to cultivate their proper mudhoory lands, held free or on very favourable terms, under the denomination of chakeran, as a subsistence for the rest of the year, or together with the amount of probable balances incurred on former advances, to serve as a retaining fee and security for future services. Until the commencement of the present century, it does not appear that any benefits were derived in the khalsa or jageer departments from this territorial source, beyond the crown rent of the kahlaries, numbered at four thousand, and assessed on an average at about eleven rupees each; in all, yielding directly in money, incorporated with the other funds, the revenue before mentioned, of 43,565 rupees. But since the manufacture and sale, by forms, it hath been invariably productive of a large yearly profit on the former mode of settlement, of contract termed Mobai, in contradistinction to Nagdy, applicable to the nizamut appropriations, under the head of towfeer, and therefore eluding common observation, though involving a gain in fact, of more than three lacks of rupees, being the difference between prime cost rated at 22 R^s per M^a, advanced or improperly deducted from the mudhoory collections at serinjammy charges, perhaps never to be refunded, and the nominal selling price at Hooghly, estimated latterly at 60 R^s for every hundred maunds; yet for the most part bestowed on distant markets, and acquired a vast surplus transported the salt on their proper accounts to the English or natives, after the revolution of 1757, the greater advantage, through an authorized oppressive monopoly. After the revolution of 1757, the greater share of this lucrative commerce, was transferred from Moghul adventurers to the English or natives partaking of their influence. It may have been made one of the ostensible pleas of Cossim Ali's rebellion, without any real foundation in truth; for besides that his ambition evidently grasped at independence from the moment of his elevation, and that he himself, had no material interest in the bundobust of Hedjeele, it is to be observed that Meer Jaffier, who was largely concerned on account of his jageers, had still, even in the limitation of the selling price of salt to 60 R^s, a very handsome income from the whole, as will appear from the following statement.

Total Ansil and Ezafa on the Mudhoory portion of Hedjelee to 1172 - - S ^a R ^s					5,33,364

From which, was usually deducted, though in right, always to be refunded in course of the year, the ordinary advances made for the manufacture of salt, forming the capital serinjummy or contract purchase money settled with the zemindars at the rate of 22 R^s per M^d, and amounting in all, to 1,83,000 rupees, but deducting a part paid in salt, being the surplus beyond eight lacks of M^d, or nearly 5,400 M^d, valued rightfully at prime cost, or formerly, at the selling estimated price, the sum really advanced in cash did not exceed 1,72,302 S^a Rupees.

The net total Jumma Mudhoory of 1169 was no more than 5,29,258 R^s, after deducting at the rate of 9/6. per C^t 29,464 R^s batty or serinjummy charges. The particulars of Abwabs and Muscoorat, here inserted, are chiefly taken from M. R. Khan's statement of them, in his bundobust of 1172.

The Berybundy charge, though included in the compromise of Muscoorat, involved probably the whole expense actually incurred yearly, being merely in remuneration to Duodumma, are both included under the former head.

ACCORDING to the preceding statement then, in the first Dewanny settlement of the Company, the bundobust of all the mudhoory and nemucky lands of the several divisions of Hedjelee, should have been rated at a net malgoozary of S^a R^s 8,40,980, or taking the jumma kool of Cossim Aly in 1169, at R^s 8,36,874. Nevertheless M. R. Khan, in 1172, states it only 5,75,149 R^s. He had, indeed, the example of his predecessor Nundcomar the year before, in reducing it to 6,65,320; but in this instance at least, he could assign a more justifiable reason for an apparent greater defalcation; and his statement in facts, seems accurately just. On the 1st of September 1172 A. B. rather before the commencement of the Velayty year of Orissa, observed in the district now under consideration, the society of Salt was instituted; and the whole nemucky portion of territory, with all its valuable production, was transferred exclusively to their agents. In this, however, the honourable Company were no losers. A duty of 35 R^s per M^d the first year, and of 50 per cent. the second, levied on the quantity of salt manufactured, amounted to an ample compensation for the customary towfeer of the soubahdar, now rightfully devolving by convention to the British government. At the same time, it is to be remarked, that the naib dewan's settlement, as it could only virtually have extended to the mudhoory lands, so it comprehends almost precisely the full genuine rental of that division, together with the ancient jumma nugdy of the nemucky portion; which equitably was to be accounted for, when the regular profits of the mobai were privately alienated, or not immediately forthcoming to the

THE original Jumma of this portion, when incorporated with the Ansil Toomary of the Mudhoory lands, under the description of Nugdy, or money rental, amounted to more than - - - - - 43,565

But when separately realized, in the mode of manufacturing salt by contract purchase, termed Mobai, and future sales, literally expressed in Persian on the public records Ferroosh Nemuck, as hath been invariably the custom since the administration of Jutier Khan; then, the revenue was to be calculated of course, according to the quantity of salt delivered, and the rate at which it was sold on account of the Nazim, to whose jageer the first profits usually appertained.

Thus, in 1169, and subsequently, the quantity of salt made and delivered throughout all the divisions of Hedjelee was M^d 8,53,428, and which, at the estimated selling price at Hooghly then authoritatively fixed at 60 R^s per M^d, as settled with the zemindars or merchants, produced in gross - - - R^s 5,12,056

Yet from this amount, in propriety, should also be deducted the ancient Jumma Nugdy or Kahlary rent, to shew the clear yearly advantage resulting from the more recent system of managing the salt lands; but as the whole of the public receipts depending on the rate of sale (in the time of Alverdi A. D. 1152, estimated as high as 150 R^s per M^d) came, into the same exchequer; and as there could be no political reason then, for any specification of the former rental thus absorbed; so now it is sufficient merely to state it, by way of memorandum.

No. 4.] The Affairs of The EAST INDIA COMPANY.

the sovereign. In like manner, it will be found invariably, that wherever the local residence of European interference or of their agency, with the revenues, and a narrow simple detail of zemindary management, afforded an easy opportunity to the Company's servants of acquiring a competent knowledge of the actual collections, the jumma-bund of 1172, so far from being reduced below the former proper standard, was rather increased, to the great oppression of the ryots, if not even imposing an unnecessary burden on the higher landholders, who were not possessed of the means to purchase indulgences. But when the deputy minister of the finances appears on the present occasion, by stating relapsed to the original system of speculation, as in the deceptive liquidation of balances, by stating and admitting remissions at the close of two succeeding years, under the head of "Deficiency in the salt manufacture of Hedjelee, on account of the exclusive trade of the lately instituted society, to the amount of 2,93,153 R^s annually," as if credit had been given in the bundobust for any part of the produce of the nemucky lands, or that the mudhoor was to be made answerable for the secret, in some measure fraudulent, emoluments of the zemindars, in making, within the territory set apart for kahla-doo, about four lacks of maunds above the quantity of salt usually delivered to government, and which hitherto enjoyed, because undiscovered, they were now, by a new arrangement, to be deprived of from this time forward. The mobai income seems to have been altogether embezzled or lost to the exchequer, until the year 1178 A. D. when the whole ordinary revenue of the foujedarry was brought back to near its original rightful standard, by a duty of 30 per cent. henceforth directed to be levied on the transport of salt from the churs to the markets for sale, carried thither at the risk of a profit of private merchants, who still, from the fewness of their numbers, did and must ever, in Bengal, form a corps of monopolists. That this impost fell short of the expected returns, on a basis of twenty-eight lacks of maunds, as the quantity annually consumed or sold, is no proof of an exaggerated calculation; on the contrary, its moderation was before, as it hath been since, sufficiently established on grounds of experimental certainty; and the deficiency may, in this instance, as in every other, be attributed, when not to European influence, to the neglect, chicanery, or corruption of native administration. In 1184, and subsequently, the entire rental of Hedjelee, on a medium of the three preceding years receipts, according to the accounts then made up, was stated at rupees 7,13,684, of which 4,11,995 nemucky, and 3,01,689 mudhoory. But the former portion of the jumma, included for charges of the manufacture in serinjummy, salt 22,021 R^s, and in cash advanced from the other division, to be replaced, though not so done, agreeable to ancient usage, rupees 1,07,233. Besides this, from the latter share of the average bundobust, were further actually deducted 1,31,174 R^s, for expense of a mofussil management, having only a neat malgoozary for the arable lands, of 1,70,515; and which, together with the mobai profits, thus improperly swelled by the amount of a borrowed capital, constituted a total clear income of no more than 5,60,488 R^s. At the same time, it is to be observed, that the native aumeens, still here affected in their accounts by the formally independent canonges of Orissa, found sources the year immediately before, for a territorial revenue, exclusive of plateka, and the whole of the salt product of 6,09,299 rupees, over and above a bauzee zameen or chakeran allotments, comprising 3,17,553 bighas of productive ground, without estimating the similar fraudulent alienations that would probably have been discovered in the pergunnah of Toomluck, if their inquiries, or our information, had extended to the ascertainment of the fact. Notwithstanding all this, however, in 1187, the jumma-bund kool of the foujedarry continuing to be rated at the medium standard of 1184, a separation of the mudhoory and nemucky funds took place, in the above stated proportions, and the amount of the latter finally withdrawn or deducted from the annual rent-roll of the soubah, was in future to make part, or be absorbed, together with the established duty of 30 per cent. being in all, equivalent to a selling price of only 90 rupees p^{er} M^ds. in the larger expected advantages to be derived from a reform in the institution of salt; at this time adopted; extending the system of mobai, to all the other districts of Bengal producing that necessary article of internal public exchequer, instead of sharing it, the whole of a reasonable profit on the first sales, into the needy private monopolists. A dispute arose in a very unequal proportion of the actual gain, with a few private monopolists. This important branch of between the comptroller appointed to the newly modelled administration of this important branch of the collections, and the committee of revenue also recently formed on Fort William, touching the finances generally of all the British dominions immediately dependent on the yearly amount of the propriety of admitting or liquidating in their respective yearly accounts, the defalcation that must otherwise necessarily appear, in consequence of the late dismemberments from the yearly amount of territorial income. On the part of the former, who, indeed, was more especially interested in the issue, as entitled to a commission alone on the net profit resulting from the innovation, it was suggested that kahlary or ground rent only (according to my information, to be valued as before stated, at 43,565 R^s) could be properly due or forthcoming to the exchequer from the salt lands; and that the remainder, claimed from the produce of the manufacture and mudhoory, was not admissible, as chiefly on the separation of the two departments nemucky and mudhoory, was not admissible, as chiefly arising from new and temporary sources, created by the establishment of a particular system, which perished when it was changed. On the other side, a compensation for the customary receipts of the khalsa in the usual form, was insisted on, as conformable to the following arguments: "that from the time the propriety of the demand was supported on the following arguments: 'that from the time the salt districts were under Mr. Lushington, to that period, the consolidated amount arising from land collections and salt produce, had constantly been inserted into the public accounts, as the amount jumma of those districts, and in Mr. Lushington's accounts was rated at 8,36,874. 2. 15. rupees; that in fixing the sum, Mr. Lushington had made an estimate of the salt produced in the Hedjelee districts, and rated the amount of it, at 60 rupees per M^ds.; that according to this valuation, the sum on account of salt was 5,12,014. 8. 2. and the mudhoor or land collections amounted to 3,24,859. 10. 13. making the sum total stated above, as the revenue of the districts; that the zemindars delivered hundred maunds in part payment of their revenue, and they were credited at the rate of 60 rupees for every hundred maunds they delivered, and their deficiencies were charged, at the same rate; and finally, that hence it appeared, the revenue arising from salt, was as much an article of the jumma, as that arising from the lands; for that the total of the two articles, was what formed the actual jumma of those districts." If I entertained any doubts of the authenticity of the accounts from which I have drawn the statements already exhibited on the subject of the Hedjelee revenue, I should here confidently avail myself of the corroborating testimony of Mr. Lushington, one of the ablest and best instructed servants of the Company employed in the management of their finances; for though he was erroneously supposed to be the regulator himself, of the estimated selling price of Hooghly at 60 rupees per Mds. this article, with the rest of his calculations, will be found exactly correspondent to the particulars of mine, assigned to Cossim Aly's administration in 1169, with the difference, that I have deducted, the serinjammy charges of manufacturing the salt rather from the gross produce of its own sale, than lessen the proper income of the mudhoory, by appropriating so much of it in the form of a borrowed fund, to procure what might be considered an extraneous or relative financial advantage. But it may be sufficient in this place to observe, that both parties adhering to their respective opinions, a double entry in their accounts (taking in the contested profits of the mobai and rowaneh duties of 30 per cent.) hath swelled the amount of, and operated as a deception in, the general yearly statement of the resources of government; and that the true considerations of right and policy involved in the question, seem to have been entirely overlooked. These, undoubtedly required a preservation of the old forms, through whatever channel the sum of the absorbed collections were henceforth made to appear; and it is a maxim in every well regulated system of finance, never to relinquish a claim in form, to an established prior impost, though lost in fact, in the magnitude of a greater future exaction on the same or like foundation; at least, until experienced advantage recommends the permanency of the latter. Hitherto, though the temporary benefits of the new mode cannot be controverted; yet their extent and continuance, are points of much speculative doubt, on grounds of apparent solid reasoning.

1st. I have myself elsewhere, in a calculation which I rather wish may be found under-rated, reduced the actual profits of the Company, on comparison of what they were before entitled to, or might have realized on salt, by virtue of existing regulations, to 16 lacks of rupees. If we assume the selling price in Aliverdy's administration, being at the rate of 150 rupees per Mds. as the standard of former income, the difference will be considerably less; but if we take into the account, the greater advantage bestowed through the favour of government on private merchants, and now only resumed in its proper behalf, the supposed gain of the modern plan would probably dwindle to nothing, and then the seeming possibility of levying, in the form of a simple duty, the full equivalent of a monopoly sale may, some time or other, induce the adoption of the former in preference to the latter mode, which though essentially the same, would, from a mere nominal distinction, convey a very different idea to prejudiced popular imagination.—2^{dly}. The prohibition of the trade in this article, from our settlements in the East, is a small relative disadvantage; but the concession in favour of the French must be deemed highly impolitic and dangerous, only to be warranted, on the plea of evident necessity. As well might merchants of Great Britain residing in France, claim exemption from the gabelle, as that French factors settled in Bengal, for carrying on their commerce to Europe, should pretend to interfere, in an internal financial regulation of the Soubahs; and when the servants of the English company, in fact masters of the country, by a false interested construction of the most extensive imperial firman privileges ever granted to foreigners, attempted to obtain such an unconstitutional indulgence, subversive of the law of nations, their conduct was justly reprobated by their superiors; nor did the French presume in 1765, even to animadvert on the exclusive right transferred to the society then established.—3^{dly}. The uncertainty on every occasion, of insuring an intelligent, faithful and vigilant administration on which the larger profits of the present universal mobai management must in a great measure depend; might be used as a strong argument against the probability of its duration. Natural difficulties opposing the constant local inspection of European agents, the depravity of natives necessarily employed in paying the molungees or superintending their operations in detail, and above all the non-existence of custom-house checks, to prevent the clandestine traffic of extra salt procured from the neighbouring province of Cuttack, or collusively purloined from the Bengal kahlaries in the jungles, thence transported to market under cover of Rowanick dustucks, granted by the comptroller of the manufacture from the places of original delivery, are amongst many of the supposed defects, inherent in the constitution of the actual system tending to its decline. But on the other hand, the more recent order for a public sale, will prove a most powerful corrective of almost every abuse, if a genuine standard of the prime cost quantity of yearly produce made and sold could once be ascertained, to direct the proceedings of the department intrusted with inspection and controul in the general administration of the finances; and this it may be presumed the medium result of the first five years (beginning from May 1781) offers for all the essential purposes of an audit. In that time, thirty-three lacks of maunds appear to have been annually manufactured at an expense with kahlary rent, but exclusive of European agency, of seventeen lacks of rupees, being at the rate of 51½ R^s p^r Mds. and excepting a surplus fund of three lacks, which should always be kept up to answer contingencies, were entirely disposed of, in an equal period for sixty-two and a half lacks of rupees, at the average rate of about 191 R^s for many hundred maunds. While this standard, with a liberal allowance for unforeseen casualties, is adhered to, perhaps there can be no ground for finding fault with, or entering into a minute investigation of executive management, and with more certainty the plan itself so beneficially conducted, will not be condemned when considered as originating under the pressing exigencies of an eastern despotic government and that in the whole scope of its operation, either in principle or virtual effect, it is comparatively less burthensome to the people, more equal in the distribution, of a lighter impost, simpler in its details, and in every respect, infinitely less exceptionable as a scheme of finance, than the simpler institution of the gabelle so long established in one of the greatest, most refined, and politic states of modern Europe.

To conclude:—Whatever ought to have been the rule, or may in future be adopted, for the amount, receipt, or liquidation of the revenue forthcoming from the nemucky portion of Hedjelee, the income of the mudhoory as arising from territorial sources totally distinct, and altogether separated from the salt lands since the commencement of the Vilayty year 1189, though then put under the same European superintendents, should have suffered no diminution; but rather an apparent increase by stoppage of the annual funds of rent before borrowed from the one, to make good the necessary advances in carrying on the manufacture, which alone rendered the other division of the district, in the least productive; yet this, is so far from being the case, that in 1190, A. D. the gross jumma to the share of arable ground entire is stated only at R^s 3,49,431, and being incumbered with molussil serinjammy charges of 1,67,280 R^s, yielded no more than 1,82,151 Rupees, net malgoozary, which compared with the original clear rental to 1172, leaving a recoverable defalcation of three and a half lacks of rupees annually, from the mudhoory territory, making part of the foujedarry of Hedjelee, as before described, in extent or value.

FOUJEDARRY OF RAJEMHAL.

THIS Province called also Akbernagar from its capital, and Cankjole on the Khalsa records, as being the principal pergunnah, in like manner situated on the western bank of the Ganges, was an important military government on the confines of Bengal towards Behar, commanding some of the mountainous passes into either country; particularly the famous barrier of Terriagully, the possession of which was deemed of so much consequence in times of the hostile independence of two neighbouring soubahs. It was likewise of valuable financial consideration; not indeed in proportion to the whole of its dimensions of 2,217 B. square miles, including a hilly tract productive of a bare subsistence to a scanty savage population; but on account of its plain fertile territory of 1,200 square miles contained in that extent, and lying chiefly east of the Ganges. In 1135 A. B. Cankjole was the only considerable zemindarry of the district, the Company's acquisition of the Dewanny, the number of official landholders has increased with new annexations of land, all within the chucklah of Akbernagar, except a small portion dependent on Moorshedabad; as will be shewn in the following TABLE, comprehending the Ausil and Ezafa Rent-roll of the whole Foujedarry, in its several subdivisions, as herein described, to the Bengal year 1172.

Note.—Some years after the Dewanny acquisition, the zemindarry of Hatindeh appears to have been separated from this province, in its room 9-16ths of Akberpoor, with a portion of Mungalpoor, and some lesser pergunnahs of unknown original value, were substituted.

Foujedarry of Rajemhal.

OF the foregoing net Bundobusty income that should have been forthcoming to the Company's exchequer in 1172, M. R. Khan gives only credit in his first settlement of that date, for rupees 2,75,351, on account of the whole district of Rajemhal; thereby sinking near a lack of rupees, not in the increased assessments which were continued, and even extended beyond the standard of Cossim Aly, but in actual reduction of the original sources of revenue, serving as the necessary lawful basis of all future additions. The following year, however, he brought back of this deficiency, rupees 39,135, under the denomination of a new further impost, and by annexing to the rental of Cankjole darry to the fallacious, if compared, amount in the whole of 3,86,920 rupees in 1184, when a settlement was formed throughout Bengal, on the supposed medium collections of the three or four preceding years; the gross assessment of this province (including Hatindeh with Kasimpoor more recently dismembered, and all the late annexations of Akberpoor, &c. valued ausil and ezafa at 40,040 rupees) was reduced to 2,11,882 rupees, burthened with a serinjammy expense of 29,987; at the same time, the aumeens found sources for a rental of 3,72,302, besides bazee zemeen and chakera lands of 80,172 begas; finally, in 1190, an encrease of 18,000 on the same territorial funds, established with the institution of the controlling committee of revenue at the presidency, made the total income appear to be rupees 2,29,882; but after deducting mofussil charges enhanced by a new incumbance of 60,000 rupees, under the denomination of disbursements, including a militia establishment, or pensioned list of mountaineers, the net malgoozary stated to be due to the exchequer, did not exceed rupees 1,39,195. From this sum, in order to draw a just comparison, is to be subtracted the extraneous sources recently acquired, by incorporating the pergunnahs of Akberpoor, &c. and then scarcely one lack of rupees would be forthcoming from Rajemhal as here described, in all its original dimensions; leaving a gross defalcation of 2,75,000 to be accounted for since acquisition of the Dewanny in 1172. But as it seems probable that the sayer of Akbernagar may have fallen off about 25,000 rupees from the ausil jumma of the foregoing statement; so I am inclined to add so much more to the amount already allowed of as mokhareje, and thereby diminish the recoverable deficiency of the foujedarry entire, to two and a half lacks of Sicca rupees.

FOUJEDARRY CHUCKLAH OF SYLHET.

Foujedarry Chucklah of Sylhet.

THIS province, in the eastern extremity of Bengal towards the frontier of some of the tributary dependencies of Asham and Aoa, and in about the latitude of 25 degrees north, little more than 300 miles distant from China, seems to have been formed into a military government, rather on account of its remote secluded situation to the east of the Bhirmapooter and Soornah from the central force of the soubah, than from any reasonable apprehensions that could have been entertained of foreign invasion; environed as it was found, on all its naturally inimical sides, by inaccessible hills or impenetrable jungles, which now, in a period of more than 200 years, we know have preserved its internal tranquillity from the hostile attacks of neighbouring states. Its actual dimensions, after the dismemberment of Seryll, Turruf, and Zein Shaby, in favour of Dacca, are computed by Renel to be 2,861 British square miles of low territory, chiefly productive in rice and cotton, being subject to the annual overflowing of the Soornah, in its whole extent from east to west; but of more importance from its natural growth of ship-timber, built into vessels of different sizes, formerly for the royal Nowarreh, now on account of the private traders of Dacca; for its great production, exclusively enjoyed, of limestone quarries; for an abundant breed of elephants, aghur wood, stick and manufacture of wild tessar silk, called muggadoolies. Nevertheless, the country may be considered as poor, comparatively with the rest of the soubah; for, like Orissa, it continues to pay its rents in cowries; and a shell, which every where else in Hindostan, is the lowest medium of exchange, is here the only substitute for money in revenue accounts, though the precious metals are by no means unknown or wanting, in private mercantile operations. As a farther indication, however, of poverty, it may be observed, that the district is divided into 146 small pergunnahs, distributed at least amongst an equal number of petty landholders; and it is therefore that the rental was appropriated to special reduced the several heads of territory to five classes, of which the rental was appropriated to special expenses or received into the treasury, in the usual form of khalsa and jageer.

THE net malgoozary of the province thus amounting, to the acquisition of the Dewanny, to Rupees 4,75,609, including the four first articles of expenditure, thenceforward discontinued on the part of the Company, being paid in cowries, would have been rated according to the exchange established until that period, for 10,70,120 kakaons, at two and one quarter for each rupee. But the standard of the currency was almost immediately changed with the government, under the more extensive mercantile operations of private European traders. Enterprising adventurers of influence, brought whole cargoes of the revenue money of Sylhet, from the Maldives and elsewhere. These shells, if not directly carried up the Megna river, to a place where found to be so valuable, would in a certain proportion have been transported thither, in a slow imperceptible course of circulation with the neighbouring districts of Bengal; which also make use of the same medium, in the lesser transactions of internal commerce. ZEMINDARRY OF MAHMOODSHAHY.

Mahmoodshahy.

THIS little territorial jurisdiction of 844 square miles in the chucklah of Bhoosnah, towards the northern angle of the Delta of the Ganges, and surrounded on all sides by the great southern division of Rajeshahy, affording the means of apt comparison with that district, hath been successively conferred by dewanny sunnuds, from the time of Jaffier Khan to Cossim Aly's, on Ramdeo Rankant of Rajeshahy, and Kishendeo, all of the Brahmin cast, as found in possession in the years 1135, 1149, and 1170. But in 1187, within the period of the Company's administration, a very unconstitutional though unequal partition of the zemindarry took place, by which Govindeo of adoption to the last official landholder's former wife, appears to have obtained something less than a fourth share, in prejudice to Mohinder and Sunkernarrain, the lineal descendants by a second marriage, and as such customarily, (when no personal exception is made) entitled to the whole, the rents of which, before the Dewanny, were burthened with a small yearly pension to a mussulman exile and his followers, of the family of the Mugg Rajah of Aracan.

Khan's net jumma in 1172, did not exceed 2,85,978; but, by an increase the following year, of 9,000 R ^s , the revenue was brought back to nearly its proper standard; thus involving an improved rental of much more than double the ausil toomary, and the surrounding territory of Ranny Bowanny, paid very little above the original assessment. In 1178, after the famine, Mahmoodshahy was rated in gross for R ^s 3,12,402. The medium settlement of 1184, gave only R ^s 2,72,011, and yet the aumeens found sources for 38,744, and including a plateka of no more than 38,744, and besides, as might be expected in a Brahminy zemindarry bazee zemeen, 1,61,605 begas, with chakeran to the extent of 29,973 begas more. THE unequally proportioned jurisdiction at present, of 5½ annas, to Nariender Narrain the elder, and 10½ annas to Moodenarrain, &c. the younger, sons of Anoopnarrain, of the Brahmin race, who held this petty territorial trust undivided from 1135, until his death about the year 1155, in its dimensions altogether, is no more than 499 square miles; but, like the surrounding lands of the divisions of Rajeshahy and Bhetooriah, with which it forms a proper subject of comparison, it is rich in the culture of the mulberry or manufactures of silk; and being no less advantageously situated for commerce on the eastern margin of the Ganges, near where the Jellingee derives its source from an outlet of the opposite bank, was at least equally improved in revenue since the original assessment, as appears from the following Table of its Rental in the time of Cossim Aly, though thenceforward this district hath always been rated infinitely higher, in proportion to its extent or standard valuation.

M. R. Khan's bundobust in 1172, after deducting the customary muscoorat, amounted only to 2,36,630 R^s; but the next year there was an increase of 8,801, and immediately after the famine, the jumma rose still higher. This last, however, may have been comparatively rather a racked rent; for the aumeens in 1183, do not allow the sources of revenue then forthcoming, to be more than 3,02,529 R^s; besides, it is true, bazee zemeen and chakeran lands, to the extent of 63,474 begas. On the contrary, the medium settlement of 1184, was greatly under-rated, even if the continuance of the expense of moshaira had not then been in contemplation, as sums probable after abrogation of the temporary farming system, which gave it birth. Accordingly, the new committee in 1188, and subsequently to 1190, by an additional assessment of 22,500, raised the total yearly demand on the zemindarry to 2,24,272 rupees; though in consequence of the recent extraordinary serinjammy charges of collection, this yet inadequate jumma-bundy is reduced to a net malgoozary of no more than 2,00,934 rupees, leaving a defalcation certainly of forty thousand rupees, that may in future, and ought in moderation, to be restored annually to the public exchequer.

CANONGOE ZEMINDARRY OF ROKINPOOR.

Canongoe Zemindarry of Rokinpoor.

THIS Zemindarry, if not formed and granted at its continually underrated assessment, as a compensation for perfecting with effect and fidelity the high important duties of Canongoe, must be considered the illegitimate offspring of undue influence, exercised under the relaxation or ignorance of administration, through the union of unconstitutional powers, sometimes vested in the same persons, and ever abused by Hindoos when permitted thus to hold the incompatible trusts of an official landholder, dewan or native efficient minister of the finances, together with the prescriptive hereditary post of chancellor, recorder, or keeper of all the revenue and juridical records of the exchequer of the soubah. In like manner, as we have seen in modern times, dispersed pergunnahs here and there partially dismembered of tuppahs, villages or gardens; and these unascertained fragments of indefinite value or extent, scattered and minute, the better to elude investigation, afterwards collectively classed under a single head of territory, as might be instanced in the case of Rajenagur Bykantpore, Cantoanagur, and Radabulubpore; so perhaps the district now in question, was first acquired by Sien Narrain of the koyt east, the adoptive ancestor of the present minor occupant Sooraje Narrain, who lately succeeded in this established crafty line of filiation, the intermediate possessor Luchmunnam, in virtue of an English perwamah, declaratory in his favour of all former rights and privileges, sunnuds confirming to him, the customary zemindarry appendage of Rokinpoor, which, in all its dimensions, may be estimated at 600 sq. miles, rated and distributed in the following subdivisions, to the year 1172, A. D.

verable defalcation here, to be one lack and a half of sicca rupees. At the same time, if the duties of canongoe were faithfully and fully to be performed, perhaps two thirds of that sum ought to be remitted to the occupant, over and above his actually known perquisites from this office.

ZEMINDARRY OF EDRACKPOOR.

Mr. J. Grant's

of Bengal.Zemindarry of Edrackpoor.

THE zemindarry of Edrackpoor or Gorahgaut, anciently part of the great district of Aurnagabad, and successively conferred by sunnud, from the time of Sujah Khan, on Bishen-nahit, Shien-nahit, and Goor-nahit, the present occupant (and all of the Koyt east) is considerably less in extent, than the assigned dimensions of Rennel, because he includes in his calculation, the undistinguished portion, or moiety belonging to Dinagepoor, under the same local denominations. On the whole, this little territorial trust, altogether situated in the chucklah and circar at Gorahgaut, may be computed to contain 632 B. square miles, divided and rated as follows, to the year 1172. Cossim Aly's bundobust for 1169, was, 1,86,217 net; M. R. Khan's in 1172, was in gross, 1,93,323; from which, he deducts, first, jageers, in the name of Hussein Reza Khan, and for military charges, 6,460; secondly, the Muscoorat as before stated;—leaving a clear rental only of 1,85,171 rupees. In fact, 3,000 rupees, new towfeer, make the real difference between the two assessments. In 1199, after an increase of 15,000 R^s had been put on the medium settlement of 1184, the total revenue then forthcoming, amounted to 1,60,196, from which, (deducting about 18,000 for Mofussil Serinjammy charges, and making some allowance on account of the afore mentioned jageers, apparently continued or bestowed without authority) I deem myself sufficiently warranted in stating here a deficiency to be recovered, of forty-five thousand sicca rupees.

ZEMINDARRY AND TALOOK OF FUTTEHSING.

IN reviewing the Hakkikut Jumma or historical detail of the rent roll of the different zemindarries of Bengal, the one now under consideration affords, the first instance of real diminution by decline and dismemberment, in ausil valuation or extent, from the period of its original formation in the administration of Jaffier Khan, to the present time. The larger districts, in possession of affluent landholders, who could purchase favours through bribery, swallowed up, and were enlarged by annexations of territory taken from the lesser, of which the official occupants might not be in a condition to resist encroachments; as in like manner, we often find the former exempted from a proportional share of the more recent assessments called Abwab, while the latter, have been unreasonably oppressed with yearly exigencies of the state; or perhaps frequently, through the collusion of native officers of the khalsa, with the insidious view of distressing these petty zemindars into an apparent voluntary relinquishment of their possessory rights, held under the sanction of a sunnud from government. I wish it may not be found that this iniquitous practice hath been most prevalent in our own days, and given birth to many existing talooks of new creation, forming comparatively little more than a point of dimensions in 1172, being only 259 square miles, forming Burdwan, with Kistnagar, on the western border of the connexion between Rajeshahy, Beerbhoom, Burdwan, with Kistnagar, on the western border of the present occupant of the Brahmin race (both of them servants of their predecessors in office respectively) was comprised in the following pergunnah divisions on the chucklah of Moorsheadabad; viz.

ZEMINDARRY AND TALOOK OF FUTTEHSING.

Mr. J. Grant's
View of the Revenues of Bengal.Talook of Futtehsing.

VARIOUS causes, the separate effects of which I do not think necessary on the present occasion minutely to examine, may have influenced the extraordinary reduction of the original standard assessment, now for the first time occurring in the zemindarry detail of the subah of Bengal, in the compendious form of a Teshkhussy Jumma on the total of the ausil: 1st. It may involve part of the general small remission of Sujah Khan, under the same technical denomination on the ausil toomary of his predecessor. 2dly. It may in part, and possibly altogether, have been in consequence of the destructive war commenced with the Marhattahs in 1148, and waged for years in and about this little territory, to the certain diminution of its annual funds of revenue. 3dly. As near one half of the outlay in the mode of tuckavy for the purpose of melioration, usually made by the sovereign proprietor alone, enabled with the will to encourage or perform the greater agricultural improvements in Hindostan; so when the constant smaller expense and labour necessary to maintain works of permanent utility in husbandry were for a long time discontinued, these may have fallen more quickly into decay, than they could again be gradually restored, through the miserably feeble efforts of a needy despotic government. 4th. Herryersaud the former landholder, dying without issue, in the time of Alverdi Khan, Bydenaut his servant, procured a zemindarry sunnud for the whole possession, in the name of his own son Neelkaunt the present occupant. Parbutty wife of the deceased, claimed a subsistence; and it seems likely, that a temporary allowance was made to her, forming part of the Teshkhussy reduction; but it was reserved for an English administration, after a lapse of near 30 years, to espouse her farther pretensions; to decree in her favour a moiety of the chartered rights of Neelkaunt, which had been otherwise considerably lessened by new alienations to Khalsa Mutseddy Talookdars; and in her behalf even countenance the novel system of female adoption, in a country where hitherto the natives of that sex are held always either in legal or virtual slavery. However this may be, on the basis of the ausil jumma teshkhees of 1169, the revenue then recovered its ancient original standard in the establishment of Abwabs; viz.

Jumma Teshkheeskool of Futtehsing in 1169	1,37,294	M. R. Khan in 1172, reducing the ausil to rupees 1,11,225, concluded a net bundobust for that and nearly the afore stated Abwabs, amounting to 1,60,637. In 1183, notwithstanding large and repeated alienations of territory to make up the new talooks of Radabullubpore, &c. even the aumeens find sources of revenue, including a small platka of 1,62,633 rupees, besides 55,032 beghas of bazee zemeen and chakeran lands. Yet in 1190 the gross jumma was no more than rupees 1,02,036; from which, deducting 5,833 for mofussil serinjammy charges only, such a clear income will remain, as must leave at least a recoverable defalcation of eighty-five thousand rupees, inclusive of irregular talookdarry dismemberments.

ZEMINDARRY KISMATEAH OF MAHOMEDAMEENPORE:

Zemindarry
Kismateah of Mahomedameenpore.

THIS district, comprehending about 700 square miles, with all the European settlements in Bengal, on the western margin of the river Hooghly, from the Foujedarry capital of that name, or port custom-house called Bukhshbunder, down to the opposite shore of Calcutta, was dismembered from the Painam permanent holding of Arseh then the Eahtimam entire of Ramisser, a Koyt, father of Ragoodees, and grandfather of Govindes, who succeeded to one-third of the whole trust, first erected into a separate zemindarry, between the years 1135 and 1147 A. B. It was at the same time, partitioned among the former's two younger sons and two nephews, with a brahmin dependant of the family, family, each of whom gave his own name, (still retained on the Khalsa records,) to the subdivision or portion so acquired; but all were assessed for revenue to government under the single head of Mahomedameenpore, and in like manner paid alone, through the channel of the most considerable or responsible of the participants.

Total Ausil and Ezafa of the zemindarry - - - S^rR^s } 3,38,560

NOTE.—At the same time, the Sayer or variable duties collected at the Bukhshbunder, then included under the head of Mahomedameenpoor, but now separated, amounted to, ausil and abwab 1,42,883, making together, 4,81,443 sicca rupees.

Besides the charges of Muscoorat, 14,062 rupees were usually deducted on account of the Sebundy of the Foujedary; but which, belonging more properly to the Sayer, the amount is accordingly now transferred to that head. At any rate, an enormous defalcation appears in M. R. Khan's first settlement in 1172, as the total did not exceed 1,64,514 rupees, including little more than two shares of Mahomedameenpore, and alone the Khalsa Ausil Jumma of the whole. Innumerable recent subdivisions with designedly perplexed statements of this zemindarry, are the sure indications of wilful embezzlement. Yet in 1178, it seems probable, that the original proper standard of revenue, was some way or other accounted for. In 1183, the aumeens allow only 2,76,062 rupees of Mustabood resources; but at the same time, in a bazee zemeen of 1,16,545 beghas, besides 19,073 more of chakeran lands, they discover in part the fraudulent means by which the remaining funds have been sunk. The medium bundobust nevertheless, in 1184, was rupees 2,70,092. In 1190, it fell to 2,55,113 gross rental, charged undoubtedly with a mofussil serinjammy of at least 20,000 rupees. So that I think myself sufficiently warranted in stating here a recoverable deficiency of one lack of sicca rupees, including however, the whole or any part of the kismut of suntose, found dismembered and elsewhere credited.

1st.—ZEMINDARY PERGUNNAHAY MUTTAFURRUKAT.

THE petty scattered Districts included under this head, (all within the chucklah of Gorahgaot in and about that division of Rajeshahy called Betooriah,) comprehended when taken together 2,103 square miles, forming the modern colfectorship of Silberris, and subdivided into six whole or kismateah single pergunnah zemindaries, rated at different periods from 1171 to 1190 as follows:

1. Silberris, in Circar Bazoonhay, bordering on Edrackpoor, after deducting a small portion belonging to Rajeshahy and Seyd Dowlat Talookdar of Moorshedabad, elsewhere accounted for, is partitioned generally amongst 16 landholders, viz. Rizul dien and Bedia ul zeman $\frac{1}{2}$ share; Abuterab and Merryram $\frac{1}{2}$ almost equally divided between them; Gunga Luckynairain, Gopaul Kishore, Rooderam Kallhapusand, &c. the remainder	British square miles in the whole.	Ausil Jumma, exclusive of portions elsewhere accounted for.	Net Ausil and Abwab on the same territory, to 1172, before the Dewanny.	Net Ausil and Abwab in 1172, settled by M.R. Khan. In 1188 and subsequently to 1190, the gross jumma of the preceding territory was raised, though I do not know in what proportion distributed throughout the different pergunnahs, to 2,91,747, including extra charges of management 27,631, which being as unnecessary, leaves only a net malgoozary of 264,116; and subtracting further the talooks of Silberris and Barbeckpoor belonging to Moorshedabad, excluded from the settlement prior to the dewanny, but since collected, at the rate of 8,010 l^s, as part of the actual rental of this district. Bundobusts of 1175 and 1190, may be considered on a par.

2^d.—ZEMINDARY PERGUNNAHAY MUTTAFURRUKAT.

THE dispersed Pergunnahs of measured extent included under this head, and partitioned among several zemindars in whole or broken divisions, may be classed together, though separately rated from the year 1171 to 1190, so as to shew the difference or defalcation of the latter period, on a comparison with the former; agreeable to the following detail:

1. Chundly on the Mahanadee, near its junction on the eastern side of the Ganges, composed of the whole pergunnahs of the same name in the chucklah of Moorshedabad; of a portion of Pultapoor and Nizampoor, in that part of Gorahgaot, with a kismut of Sheerpoor hegrahpoor, in the chucklah of Akbernagar; all making part of the circar of Barbeckabad, and now portioned into two kismateah zemindaries, between Setrajact about $\frac{1}{2}$, and Bolanah $\frac{1}{4}$	British square miles in the whole.	Ausil Jumma of such portions of territory as are here specified, being the Toomary of 1133.	Net Ausil and Abwab as settled by M. R. Khan in 1172, after acquisitions of the Dewanny.	Net Ausil and Abwab of the same territory, prior to the Dewanny, or in 1171.	Net Ausil and Abwab of the same to 1190, during the Company's proper management.	Difference or defalcation between the two last statements, supposed to be recoverable in the case.
2. Jahirpore, half perg. adjoining to the former district easterly, in the circar of Barbeckabad and chucklah of Gorahgaot, subdivided equally between Ragoorinder and Narrainder Narrain, stood rated	180	40,875	68,827	67,275	55,705	11,570

2^d Zemindary Pergunnahay of Muttafurrukut.

I cannot well account for the increase which appears on the jumma of Tahirpore and Moseedah, on comparison of the bundobusts of 1190 and 1171, unless there hath been a recent hustabood valuation of both pergunnahs, or that they have been alienated from the original possessors; in either of which cases, such a result, barring any notorious frauds, might be deemed inevitable. With respect to the teshkheessy diminution from the ausil toomary of Chunekally, and even from the settlement of 1171, a considerable decrease may be fairly accounted for, in consequence of the seat of government; but ing state of the city of Moorshedabad, since the removal from thence of the seat of government; but in regard to Mahomed Akbar's eahtiman of Satsyka, before we can with propriety admit of any real deficiency in the original territorial funds of the talook, he should be compelled to shew, in a detail of villages or farms, time and occasion, the particulars of the losses sustained on a comparison of the two bundobusts of 1171 and 1190. On the whole, we may state the defalcation of the first and two last of the foregoing pergunnahs, at 30,000 rupees.

ZEMINDARY RAJE OF BISHENPOOR.

Zemindary Raj of Bishenpoor.

THIS district, celebrated by modern speculative historians, for the primitive inoffensive manners of its inhabitants, under an utopian system of internal administration, and distinguished in Bengal as a nest of thieves, until the period of its complete subjugation to the Moghul authority, comprehends 1,256 B. square miles, in the circar of Madan and chucklah of Birdwan; encircled by the zemindary of the latter names, excepting towards the west, where it is bounded by Midnapore with a part of Pachete, and situated altogether, in terms of the imperial and Nizamut grants, within that portion of the country first added to the Company in 1760, by Kossim Alykhan Rajeh Choitensing, of the Rajepoote cast, and in present possession of Bishenpoor, in virtue of an ordinary landholder's Sunnud, claims descent through more than fifty generations, in direct lineage, from a race of princes to be considered independent proprietors of the same territory, and whose bare names with the duration of their reigns respectively, in minute detail, including a space of more than one thousand years, were some time since, on the occasion of a disputed succession, given in and received as the proper genealogy of the family. It is true the authenticity of this pedigree list, was never attempted to be established. Such another might be prepared in half an hour, by the most illiterate Brahmin to be met with, in support of the similar pretensions, if set up by the meanest individual of the hindoo tribes, whose power to distribute the territorial rights of a foreign conquering sovereign, were this to be admitted, nay whatever may be the present dearth of ancient historical records in Hindostan anterior to the Mussulman conquest of the country, however few the Sanscrit documents already found, or perhaps existing of real antiquity, bearing either a date or the apparent stamp of time, much less the internal evidence of reason, probability, or the collateral testimony of other nations, furnished with all the requisite formalities of proof and illustration to enforce conviction on the mind. Yet I would not be answerable on any occasion that fabricated materials, sufficient to puzzle all our modern antiquarians, versed in the learned mystical language of the Hindoos, might not be quickly prepared, under liberal encouragement, aided with the suggestions of European intelligence, to favour all or singly every system of religion or chronology either at once or in succession, which may at this moment agitate the speculative philosophers of the western world. At least, I am sure, under the same temptations of native private benefit, in opposition to that the actual government, if the Company will renounce their pretensions to such prerogatives of sovereignty as they may have derived by conquest, or grant, from their predecessors the Moguls; overlook established legal institutions of civil administration, promulgated more than two centuries ago, and adhered to ever since, in form and fact, as the basis or essence of existing legislative authority throughout the Empire, involving the doctrine of heritable territorial property with the whole system of practical Indian finance; that a door will be opened for obtruding on us the crude visionary policy of hundreds of unexperienced British statesmen, through the false interested medium of refined native Hindostanee chicanery; that the corner stone of our power in this country, may be at once overturned, and our political existence hanging on the cobweb thread of corrupt Brahminical jurisprudence, be ready to moulder into dust, on the slightest shock of interior or external commotion. Yet I am by no means here inclined to call in question, the real or pretended antiquity of the Bishenpoor Rajah. The fact is of little consequence in itself, since the principle that I family hath been reduced to the state of an official zemindar, and it is only the principle of the oppose, as extremely dangerous, of admitting, without the clearest evidence of truth, claims of right independant or derogatory of the sovereign power, subversive of the ancient laws and usages of the Mogul Empire; and perhaps alone originating, in the ignorance or encroaching spirit of the native landholders, through the mistaken conceptions of their foreign rulers, in assimilating the financial institution of India to those understood in and applicable to Europe, as promulgated within these ten years, in the form of parliamentary reports, or authoritative individual opinions, which being translated and communicated to the people of this country, have been readily adopted as their own, and frequently with sincere though interested belief of legal validity. In truth, the possessor of this little district, had pretensions of heritable jurisdiction or territorial rights, with the exception of two or three other individuals in the same predicament, infinitely superior to any in Bengal, and known by the ordinary appellation of zemindar, under the conditional chartered privileges, derived from an imperial imperial sumnud or firman. It seems only unfortunate, though I do not deny the expediency of the measure, that the strong hand of British power hath almost exclusively been exerted in reducing to the common level those, who could pride themselves on some real pre-eminence of birth or independence, while such as had none to boast of, have been negligently suffered presumptuously to raise their heads above the standard of regal controul, and beyond law, right, equity, or policy.

Rajah Disjen Sing, however, is the first that occurs on existing records of the Khalsa, as zemindar of Bishenpoor in Bengal, and of Buggry with Raipoor in Orissa. His name appears enrolled in a jumma khurch account of the latter soubah, as early as the fassulle year 1112, or 1707 of the Christian era. Gopaul Sing, his second son, from 1135 to 1150, and subsequently, stands rated in the ausil toomary, or net original rentroll for the two perghunnahs of Bishenpoor and Sharpoor, comprizing the whole of his territory in Bengal, in the sum of sicca rupees 1,29,803, reduced at the last mentioned period in consideration of the Marhattah devastations, to a teshkheessy revenue of 1,11,803, and including at all times what was called a pesheush, or tribute of 17,806 rupees. Under Chorten Sing, the present occupant, grandson of Gopaul, in 1164, the assessment of this district was brought back to its former standard, by levying the abwab chout. In 1169, with the additional teshkheessy deduction, it rose to 1,61,044, of which M. R. Khan only gives credit in the public bundoobust, rendered for 1,43,544, including muscoorat particulars as follows; viz. nankar to the zemindar himself, 658; neemtuky canongoyan, 306; and paikan, 2,500: making altogether 3,464 rupees, as the compromised mofussil charges of management, to be subtracted from the annual gross collections. The following year, a farther arbitrary impost of 56,455 was added to the former jumma, subjected then to a muscoorat deduction of 7,498 R. In 1177, under the auspices of a British supervisor, the constitutional mode of settlement, by a regular hustabood, seems to have been adopted with considerable advantage in point of income, notwithstanding the ravages of the famine; and in 1178, the jumma kaumil, or highest complete valuation of the whole territory, capable of realization, appears to have been ascertained thus, progressively, and then fixed in gross at sicca rupees 4,51,750, arising from 79 hoodas or farms, classed under 10 new pergunnah divisions, named and rated as follows; viz.

The grand defects in this, and all the other similar hustabood improvements, carried on under the Company's administration, may be deduced from inattention to the superficial measurement of the lands assessed, neglect in fixing proper names, and defined boundaries, to the lesser interior subdivisions of territory, ignorance of the fundamental principle of Indian finance, which assigns in, per-tuety, to the ryot, three-fourths, by pecuniary estimation, of the gross produce of the soil cul-tivated by himself, reserving only the remaining fourth to the sovereign proprietor, chargeable with a serinjammy incumbrance of about 20 p. cent. to defray zemindarry, as well as every other expense on the fluctuating temporary basis of one, two or three years actual collections, knowing generally the embezzlements, and fraudulent practices of a swarm of native intermediate agents, between the prince and peasant, instead of following the spirit of more equitable Mogul legislation, forming a permanent standard rentroll on a medium of many annual hustabood settlements, or figured statements, shewing the utmost improved finances of the country, traced through all successive accumulations to their original source, as the only means of ascertaining the legally established whole, in various branches of the revenue, so necessary to regulate present and future demands of the state, and restrict economical public expenditure, to expedient or possible supplies; with such de-ficiencies, no improvement of territorial income in India can ever be durable. Accordingly in this district, in 1184, the gross rental had dwindled away, in successive diminutions, without any assigned specific reasons liable to detection in the detail of defined minute divisions of land, occasion and cir-cumstances of allowed remissions, to rupees 3,72,230, subject to a serinjammy deduction increased to 86,707 rupees; at the same time that the aumeens discovered funds for a total assessment of 5,18,731 rupees, besides 1,06,934 beghas of bazee zemeen, which, indeed, if alienated before the absolute reduction of Bishenpoor, to the form of a zemindarry, could not, in propriety, be resumed, but but with an exclusive chakeran allotment of 1,36,971 beghas more; at all times necessarily at the disposal of the protecting sovereign, as chiefly appropriated in the support of a provincial militia. In 1190, after an increase of 20,000 rupees, the gross bundobust of that year was brought up almost exactly to the net hustabood settlement of 1178; yet, though this improvement was further extended by retrenchment of 17,000, in the amount of current mofussil charges; still there appears a defalca-tion, to be recovered, or accounted for, throughout the district, on comparison of the jumma kaumil before stated, of 70,000 rupees. But comparatively, with the standard of exaction at the moment of the Company's acquisition of the Dewanny, instead of such deficiency, there is a koflyet, or profitable increase of 1,66,000 rupees.

ZEMINDARRY RAJE OF PACHETE.

THIS jungly Territory of 2,779 square miles, situated in circar Madarun Chucklah of Burdwan, (therefore within the portion of country ceded to the Company, and once a foreign frontier on the western confines of Bengal, towards the three Bellads or Ballagaut of Kokuaghs); differs very little in circumstances of financial history or internal management, from the adjoining district of Bishen-poor; though it partakes more of the sterility and barbarism of the neighbouring mountainous region in the south. Behah Rajah Kerret Narrain, of the Rajepoot tribe, from 1135 to the Bengal year 1150, was only subject to a pesheush of 18,203 rupees annually, for the pergunnah of Pachete and Kismut of Shuregurrah. Thenceforward 3,323 rupees additional were levied, as a compensation for the Abwab Chout Marhattah. In 1170, the serf sicca of Cossim Aly swelled the net bundobust to 23,544 rupees. M. R. Khan, in 1173, raised the jumma to 30,000; but only 5,969 rupees were avowedly collected in course of the same year. In 1178, a hustabood, or more properly what is esteemed in the technical language of the exchequer, zoor tullub, a compulsory exaction of 1,44,954, including a serinjammy of 17,302, was established, and the demand enforced by military authority. In the gross medium settlement of 1184, Rajah Ragoonah Narrain, the actual payment of Pachete, with the recent territorial annexation of Jildah, stands rated only for 69,027 rupees, exclusive of the rental of Sheregauty Ballagaut, comprehending the whole or part of the hilly districts of Ramgur Nagpore, &c. being the kokera of Behar, and therefore properly belonging to that soubah. Yet the aumeens had found and acknowledged, sources of revenue, to the amount in all of 1,54,423, with plateka; but do not state any bazee zemeen in the abstract result of their investigation, which hath fallen into my hands. Finally, in 1190, the total bundobust of the same territory, was 76,532; but being charged with a serinjammy incumbrance of about 57,000 rupees, yields little more to the sovereign, than the original pesheush, and leaves a recoverable defalcation exceeding one lack of rupees, if we take the zoor tullub of 1178 as the proper standard of exaction. This, however, might not be thought altogether equitable, whatever may be the dictates of expedient policy; nor can I myself see what a real advantage can be derived from such a forced, paltry contribution, as the circumstances of an zemindarry could at any time admit of, even though altogether applied in the maintenance of an internal civil or military establishment; ever locally requisite to ensure the collection of the sove-reign's demand; considering the total inability of the landholder to create any public disturbances, from situation, power or wealth; the unhealthiness of the appointed station of our troops at Jildah; and that the district cannot now be properly deemed a foreign frontier, being entirely surrounded by other dependencies of the British dominion, within the soubahs of Bengal, Behar, and Orissa.

ZEMINDARRY RAJE OF TIPPERAIL.

THIS District, named also Roshenabad, in the same latitude, under the tropic of Cancer, is the boundary of Bengal on the east, as Pachete is on the west, and though much larger in all its dimen-sions, being estimated to comprehend 6,618 B. square miles, chiefly in hills and woody territory. Yet it is scarcely more productive in proportional rent to the Exchequer, arising solely from 1,368 square miles of that extent in low lands, perhaps naturally poor, because always found thinly inha-bited. It was conquered early by the Mogul arms, the power of dominion, and whose posterity to this day, have been continued nearly in the same capacity, with a greater or lesser share of independence to the Rajah of Anacan, usurped or virtually held the power of dominion, it appears to have been regularly reduced to its present form of jurisdiction, including, with exception of the perg. of Davod-in respect to the higher ruling authority. In the reign of Shah Jehan, it appears to have been the whole circar of Odeypoor and part of Soonargam, in 24 Perg^a together, annexed to the Chucklah of Jehangeernagur, at the Ausil Toomary Jumma of 92,993, as already detailed in the accounts of the Neabut of Dacca, from the year 1125 to 1149; during the administration of Sujah Shau Rend, the son of Ram Manich, Rajah Zemindar of Tipperah, for a while appears to have been wholly shaken off the Mogul yoke virtually, being only liable to a nominal tribute of 25,000 rupees for the pergunnah of Noornagur, which at the same time, was entirely remitted to himself, in the form

form of a military jagher from the court of Delhi; but latterly the district, under the denomination of Roshenabad, was brought to farther subjection, by contributing an annual revenue of 5,000 to the imperial Exchequer. In 1164 the rent reserved to the Khalsa, from Mukind Manik, amounted to 33,305, inclusive of 8,900 for the Abwab Khasnovessy and Chout, besides the old personal jagher. These various sums, amounting to 78,305 rupees, considered as a new assessment, added to the entire original valuation of the zemindary, together with the Ausil and Ezafa of the restored pergunnah of Davodpoor, stated at 13,453, make the total of the Abwab Foujedarry, being 1,84,751 R^s, less, the Bundobust settlement of 1169 was for no more than 1,00,375, with which, in 1172, on the Company's territorial acquisition, should have been consolidated, the discontinued expenditure for catching elephants. But M. R. Khan, at the latter period, reduced the jumma to 1,05,000 R^s, imallowing a deduction of 58,054 R^s, the whole exaction, exclusive of former balances, is stated at 1,50,602 R^s. In 1176 the net malgoozary fell to 1,33,901, at which it continued ever since; payry princes of Bengal, until the institution of the Revenue Committee in 1188, when the gross demand, increasing on a russud lease, was raised to 1,68,001; then subject, however, to a charge of about 15,000 R^s for mofusil or zemindary management, besides the greater expense of European superintendence. On the whole, I believe no considerable if any improvements of the revenue of Tipperah, can be fairly assigned to the period of Dewanny British administration.

ZEMINDARRY KISMUTEAH OF JEHANGEERPOOR.

AMONGST all the proper zemindaries of the Dewanny portion of Bengal, rated under a single head of territory, or possessor on the Khalsa records, this is the only one, really improved in revenue within the period of the immediate administration of the Company; such advantage was of course derived in consequence of a real local hustabood investigation, carried virtually into effect; and not like the fictitious, hasty or guessed valuation of the native aumeens in 1183-4. The district in its present extent of 285 B. square miles, composed of 11 whole or broken pergunnahs, in the circars of Barbeckabad and Pinjerah, Chucklah of Goragaut and Akbernagur, (forming a center of union to the surrounding jurisdictions of Rajeshahy, Dinagepoor, Rokimpoor and Edrackpoor,) was possessed from 1135 to 1164, by Ramdes, &c. of the Brahmin cast; after whose death, it appears to have been divided, almost equally, in three portions, between as many sons of the family, named Govindeo, Shewpersaud and Brissue; but whether held under one or different sunnuds from government, I have not taken the trouble to enquire. All this time, and to the year 1772 the Jumma Kool, or Ausil and Abwab of the whole territory, stood as follows; viz.

No. 4.] The Affairs of The EAST INDIA COMPANY. 397
This was the net Malgoozary, first settled by M. R. Khan, in behalf of the Company, on acquisition of the Dewanny: Cossim Aly's Bundobust, two years before, amounted only to 1,25,171. In 1173, in prejudice to Govindeo and Shewpersaud, the whole zemindary was conferred on Brisser alone, at the advanced clear revenue of 1,40,224 rupees. In 1176, the district was assessed by a hustabood at 1,77,105, at which it was nearly continued to the present time, divided into four equal portions among Cassinaht and Bisshehaht, the two sons of Brisser, with Jagassary and Luckymuny, relicts to Gowrykaut, &c. remaining offspring of the same family, subject however, from the establishment of Mesah, to a charge of about 22,000 rupees; of which, as if it were to bring to yearly remembrance, the injustice of the original act of ejectment, the ousted landholders or their representatives, have ever been ever since in receipt of a part as their share of subsistence, until the more recent discontinuance of the whole allowance. After all, there appears a kyffyet or profit of twenty-five or thirty thousand rupees on the income of this zemindary, within the period of British administration. It may however be proper to remark, that the Aumeens, in 1183, state the annual resources of Jehangeerpoo to be 3,63,570 R^s in money rent, including 1,04,620 of Plateka, and besides 38,542 Beghas, Bazee Zemeen or Chakeran; but it seems probable that the extraneous funds arising from the adjoining pergunnahs of Barbeckpoor, Mosseeda, &c. have been comprehended under the same head of territory.

ZEMINDARRY KHURDEAH.

BESIDES all the foregoing districts, of greater or lesser defalcation, in twenty-three distinct heads of country, under single management, as rated on the Khalsa records, and of measured superficial dimensions, appearing on the provincial maps of the Soubah, there are a great many smaller zemindaries and townships dispersed throughout Bengal, of no defined geographical boundary, but separately assessed for rent to the Exchequer, (though included as part of the Company's territorial lands, already described as forming the whole,) called Dewanny portion of the Company's territorial acquisitions in India. The most considerable of these petty Mehals, are the Muscoory talooks of Moorshedabad and Hooghly; the Kismuteah pergunnahs of Assidnagur, Mhelund, Bherole, Dhawah, Dhanum, Cobbaya, Akberpoor, Akbukshahy, Futtehjungpoor, Myhetty, Hoogla, Serfrazpoor, Chutypoor, Gopinahpoor, Shakzaddipoor, Kashipoor, Kehegong, Duttia, Jehangeerpoo, Selimpoo, Kootubpoor, Mankore, Mokunpoor, Vizierabad, Jeypoor, Megnate, &c.; in all 78 broken pergunnahs, 31 tuppahs, and 87 villages; besides Cutwah, with 23 lesser tannahs or foujedarry stations; making up collectively in their Jumma, precisely the balance or difference betwixt the aggregate of the sums assigned, in various specific settlements, to the several heads of measured territory described, and the total Bondobust of the Dewanny portion of the lands of the Soubah entire, whether ascertained or otherwise in extent, as rateably fixed at the same periods of annual adjustment. Thus, the superficial contents of the indefinite scattered tract of country so valued, but first to be deducted from, as being inclusive of the known stated area of all the other zemindary divisions taken together, may be estimated at 1,302 B. square miles, in the number of kismut, pergunnahs, tuppahs, villages or tannahs, before mentioned, yielding a net standard crown rent, according to the Ausil Toomary of 1135, of rupees 6,52,077; which revenue was compromised by M. R. Khan in 1172, with the zemindars, at least as set forth in his public jumma bundy rendered to his constituents for a net income, original and encreased assessments, clear of every expense of management, amounting to 10,64,301 rupees; instead of the lesser standard of exaction, more properly and impartially distributed by Cossim Ally in 1170, continued with improvements to the period of acquiring the Dewanny two years subsequently, and rated in all, at 8,90,230 rupees; with which, comparing the remainder to be accounted for, of the reduced inadequate bundobust of 1190, after 19 years of the financial administration of the Company, being 10,66,714 R^s, there appears an encrease, instead of defalcation, in the total, however much of the latter with concomitant oppression, may be found throughout these petty mehals separately, by unequal taxation.

ABSTRACT MIAL, or Rental of all the preceding Territories, Jurisdictions, Khalsa and Jageer, composing the Dewanny portion of the Soubah of Bengal: Showing, the square measure, neat, financial divisions, original and increased net Assessments, of each district respectively, from the formation of the Toomary standard rent-roll of Jaffer Khan, which may be termed the doomsday valuation of the British province, in the year A.D. 1722, afterwards corrected by Sujah Khan, until the period of ultimate improvement or transfer of dominion to the Company in 1765; as exhibited in the Revenue columns of 1135 and 1171 A.D. farther indicating the progressive decline of Income thereforward to the 12th April 1784, begun by the fraudulently reduced Settlement in the Neabut of M. R. Khan, 1772, and here terminated by the Bundobust statement of 1190; with a deduction of the amount of recoverable defalcation, on comparison of the latter smallest standard of the Collections, with the highest Receipt of the public Exchequer, to the moment of territorial acquisition; comprizing the periodical result of a whole cycle of nineteen years of English administration, as follows; all in Sicca Rupees.

SAYER

SAYER OF THE DEWANNY TERRITORY.

THE Sayer, or variable revenue arising from moveable property, in contradistinction to the mahl or land rent, was originally comprized in the Analysis of the Soubah of Bengal, under three general heads of collection, viz. That of Chunakahly, including the panchoutrah or inland customs, levied in Moorshedabad and its environs; the Mint of the same metropolis, and the Bukhshebunder, or port duties of Hooghly, as the grand emporium of foreign commerce. Similar imposts had been established and continued in Rajemhal and Dacca, while each town successively was the provincial capital, and the shahbunder of the latter, in all its departments, still yields a considerable income. But in consequence of the removal of the seat of government from these places, all the indefinite receipts of the exchequer there accruing from the coinage, agricultural or manufactured produce carried to market for sale, having greatly diminished, were made little or no account of; and are therefore usually incorporated in the jumma of the surrounding districts, which yet retain the names of their respective principal cities. In like manner, the amount of the sayer here separately to be detailed, and depending chiefly on the incidental advantages of Moorshedabad, while continuing to be the residence of administration, as well as center of internal commerce, hath really diminished since these municipal benefits have been transferred to the presidency of Fort William; and that a large proportion of the whole trade of the country is now diverted from its original course inland, directly into the British Channel, with exemption of the ordinary export and import duties, fixed throughout the Mogul empire, at the rate of five per cent. on the merchandize of Hindoos; and two and a half per cent. on that of Mahomedans, or of the foreign privileged companies, in the beginning, and to European traffick, for the operations of which all their Indian factories were, with a farther charge of one the present moment, allowed to be established together in some places, with a reasonable compensation for extra per cent. under the denomination of Budrucka, or convoy, as a reasonable compensation for extra expense of protection on the highways, and security of English domination, though perhaps not so much in fact, as may appear in the first general head of indefinite collections; termed

1st. Sayer Chunakahly, arising from taxes on houses, shops, bazars; licences for vending spirituous liquors, &c.; duties on exports of raw silk and piece goods manufactured in or about the city of Moorshedabad, and passing by the panchoutrah stations on either branch of the Hooghly river, forming the island of Cossimbuzar; ground rents; customs or tolls of established gunges or granaries at bridges, ferries, passes, &c.; together with the exclusive farms of Beetlenut, and such like articles of internal consumption. All these objects, united in the troubles of the Marbattah war in 1148, and subsequently, during the troubles of the ausil, were reduced to 2,28,006. In 1164, the amount for which the exchequer was credited, did not exceed 1,52,784; but Shahamut Aliverdy's government, the net receipts on account of the panchoutrah, had always collected 1164, the amount for which the exchequer was credited, did not exceed 1,52,784; but Shahamut Jung, dewan of the Soubah and darogah superintendent of the public treasury by much more on his own behalf; and this surplus was afterwards realized to the public treasury by the original with encrease, amounted to 4,20,635; and 2ndly, in 1171, to the moment of the Company's accession to the Dewanny, when this branch of the sayer was at its utmost height, productive of an annual revenue of 5,40,000 rupees. M. R. Khan, however, formed his bundobust exactly on the lowest standard of the ausil in 1164; and sunk the whole of the discovered fluctuations of Shahamut Jung, excepting a keffiyet of 20,822 R; henceforward, with extraordinary fluctuations yearly the duties, &c. of chunakahly to 1,73,610 R; the same funds of variable income, to the end of 1190, after a cycle of 19 years of British administration, were stated, exclusive of khas talooks, and the estimated duty on the Company's investment, at 2,22,093, with charges of management. But as in the shifting of the channels of commerce from the inland markets to those of Europe directly by sea, goods may be now carried by the way of Hooghly, which before were exported and paid for at the city; so, it will be necessary to compare the aggregate of collections at both places, to ascertain the true defalcation.

2d. Sayer Bukhshebunder, export and import, customs, foreign merchandize, yielding in 1135 A.D. rupees 2,21,975 at the rate of $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. on the full value of the articles intended for sale; and with the amount of tolls, &c. of 9 gunges, or other subordinate stations, made up the sum of 2,42,014 R. (besides the mahl or ground rent of 30 kismut perg² assessed for 1,00,694, included in the same original rent-roll, called Muril Toomary) the receipts continued nearly at the same standard, to the period of the revolution in favour of the English in 1164, when they were stated at 2,39,548. Thenceforward progressively a deficiency, of course, will appear locally in proportion to the prevalence of British influence, the exemptions on the Company's trade, and gradual removal of the emporium of commerce, from its former site to the port of Calcutta. Accordingly, in 1169-71 the sayer of Hooghly was no more than 1,42,883 R. In M. R. Khan's bundobust of 1172, it fell to 1,25,000; and finally, in 1190 it is only rated, with charges, at rupees 62,644. But in the mean time, the presidency of Fort William became the theatre of the greater mercantile operations on which this branch of the finances depended, under the like name and form as heretofore established at Bukhshebunder; and there, for the last-mentioned year, we find a further revenue on the same account of, 3,32,496, making together in gross, 3,95,140 rupees. Now, to draw a just comparison, we must take the totals of this and the preceding head of sayer, in the aggregate. Then in 1171, the annual income arising from the exports and imports of the Soubah, may be fairly reckoned 6,82,883 rupees net; which, at the rate of $\frac{1}{4}$ per cent. supposes a commercial capital, exceeding three crores of R. netting exclusive charges of native management.

management, against the included extraneous duties on gunges: whereas, in 1190, the whole collection, clear of ordinary expense, was no more than 5,24,476; and, with estimated duty on the Company's investment passing the panchoutrah, being 54,444 R^s, and equal at least to the sum received in 1171 on the same account, did not exceed 5,78,920, leaving still a defalcation of 1,03,963 R^s, always to be deemed recoverable, until the contrary is proved on grounds of fact; reason, and the fullest experience, to be set forth by M. R. Khan, the great original defaulter of 3,66,391 in the sayer of chunakahly; or those who may come forward as advocates of the necessity of a diminution, for causes yet to be assigned, of the old soubahdary rental under this head, at the instant of the Company's acquisition of the Dewanny, and in continuation to the period now in question.

3d. Khas Talooks, &c.—Special farms of Nizamat, viz. Nabobgunje, Bundardeh, Azimgunje, Chowk-chaudery, Nikhas, Afak, and Mahepragur, &c. The former and principal of these gunjes or market towns, with dependencies, situated at the confluence of the Mahanada, on the eastern bank of the Ganges, was erected into a public granary, as a place of the greatest safety and convenience near the city of Moorshedabad, soon after the Marhattah invasion in 1148. It was at first annexed to the panchoutrah, then separated by Cossim Aly, when the duties found to have been levied there annually amounted to 1,33,536 R^s, being altogether a keffyet or profit. For as there does not appear any ausil jumma, so a compensation in the way of purchase money, must have been paid to the ryots, former occupants of the soil, which left the space of ground required for the gunges, lakheraje, or entirely free even of the standard crown rent. In like manner, all the khas talooks, &c. collectively, exclusive of Assidnagar, were rated in 1169-71, at 2,02,596 R^s. by M. R. Khan; in 1172, they were reduced to 1,40,544: then again, about 1180, the whole, or part of them at least, 22 mehals having been re-annexed to the panchoutrah, yielded to the treasury in 1190 no more than 39,142 R^s, to which may be added the separate jumma of a portion of Nabobgunje, Mekhas, &c. elsewhere accounted for, with a real decline of revenue, together, perhaps, exceeding one lack of rupees, and leaving a recoverable defalcation of only sixty thousand.

4th. Darulzerb.—Mint of Moorshedabad, to which that of Rajumhal and Dacca successively gave way, yielded, according to the Ausil Toomary of 1135, rupees 3,04,000, arising from a duty of 2 per cent. on the coinage of bullion; a yearly recoinage of the cash in circulation, conformably to the expedient productive policy of native administration. Henceforward to the year 1149, the teshkhees, or ascertained collections, fell to 2,13,790, and to 1,61,260 R^s, latterly. The establishment of the mint of Allenagar-Calcutta, better regulated, and in free mercantile credit with foreigners, lessened greatly the profits of that of Moorshedabad, proceeding from the coinage of bullion for the most part imported by sea from abroad, while the practice of levying serf or batta on the legally diminished value of rupees received on account of the revenue, after the first twelve months of their currency, (through the medium of Jaggut Seet, an Indian banker, as still continues to be the universal custom in all the other states of Hindostan) necessarily reduced the annual operations of recoinage, inasmuch as the advantages of exchange or shroffage, in a great measure regulated by this individual treasury bank, were considerably larger than could be derived after payment of the fixed public duty from a new coinage of the money already in use, in so short a period as one, two, or even three years circulation. Accordingly, in 1164, the receipts were estimated only at 66,975 R^s. In 1169, they dwindled away to 43,648. But the abwab serf sicca then established by Cossim Aly Khan, yielded an ample compensation for the deficiency of the mint. Here it is necessary to render justice to the merits of this last financial regulation. In the Analysis of the Bengal Revenue, relying on the imperfect materials exhibited by Mr. Francis, apparently fabricated by and for the purpose of native muttedies, I conceived that Meer Cossim had fixed his assessment of $1\frac{1}{2}$ anna per rupee rateably alone, on the Khalsa portion of the Ausil Jumma of the province, productive of 4,53,488, instead of 12,06,126, really levied from the beginning, on the amount of the bundobusty kool original, with increased demand; and which having found detailed in M. R. Khan's settlement of 1172-3, I concluded to be the same exaction in name and form, only enlarged under the administration of the latter. But whatever may have been the produce of the Serfissica, the profits of the mint were restored to their original standard, and something more. In the moment preceding the Dewanny acquisition of the Company, they are stated at 3,05,914, of which credit was subsequently given only for 30,005 R^s, continuing to be so rated, with little variation for some years afterwards, though privately productive of a much larger revenue, until abolition of the ancient usage of annual recoinage. On the whole, as no reasons have been adduced to show the propriety or benefits of the late regulation, in attempting to reduce the coin of Bengal to the sicca standard of the Calcutta mint, rated singularly high in Hindostan; yet, without inconvenience, while founded on the plan of yearly recoinage; but that, on the contrary, it has been attended with an immediate considerable loss in the entire defalcation of ordinary duties, as well as in raising the price of wages from the Arcot and Sonant rupee of inferior value to the highest species struck, called Sicca, being now the only coin in real effective currency; and must inevitably be productive of a greater additional loss, from the necessity of calling in for recoinage at periods not far distant from each other, the whole mass of circulating cash liable to be clipped, debased, and counterfeited, in a country full of such chicanery: so I cannot hesitate in stating the entire deficiency of the mint since the year 1171, being about three lacks of rupees, as a fund still to be forthcoming. The four general heads of Sayer before detailed, will then stand thus in the aggregate: Ausil Jumma 9,13,647 R^s. M. R. Khan's net bundobust 4,54,814; net revenue of 1171 R^s 8,09,762; net revenue of 1190 R^s 3,45,799; leaving a recoverable defalcation in all of 4,63,963 sicca rupees.

* Exclusive of Mhal comprized in the ausil of one lack, and estimated duties on the Company's investment at least two lacks more in 1190.

ZEMINDARRY OF BURDWAN.

Zemindarry of Burdwan.

THE zemindarry of Burdwan, 5,174 B. square miles in extent, is the most compact, best cultivated, and in proportion to its dimensions, by far the most productive in annual rent to the proprietary sovereign, which, under British administration, not only of all such districts within the Soubah of Bengal, but compared to any other of equal magnitude throughout the whole of Hindostan. The boasted Hindoo territory of Tanjore, though assessed by its native rajah for rather more than one half of the gross produce of the soil shared with the ryots in kind, by the ancient rule of butter, and perhaps exceeding the Mogul standard of the rebba or fourth, according to the jumma cundy rugdy, or money settlement on the permanent foundation of land measurement, instead of the fluctuating basis of a division of actual yearly crops, can only be reckoned in point of original proprietary income (including the tribute paid to the English and Mahomedan government in the Carnatic) in a secondary class; and as to the zemindarry of Benares, so often contrasted with the neighbouring province of Behar, to expose the declining state of the latter under the Company's management, it cannot at all be brought in competition with Burdwan; for even if allowed to yield near double the gross rental, its dimensions are twice and a half larger. This pre-eminence of the ceded British territory in financial circumstances, hath been attained progressively in course of half a century elapsed since the union of its component parts or pergunnah subdivisions, into its actual form of a single eahitimam or landholder's trust, held by the usual tenure of dewanny sunnud, but chiefly in a period of ten years, under its present rules, by repeated hustabood investigations, and bringing to the credit of the exchequer the keffyet or profitable increase discovered to have been privately realized from the country by the zemindar and other intermediate agents of government, in addition to the jumma ausil and abwab already authoritatively established. I will not contend that these improvements, like those of a similar nature effected by Cossim Aly Khan, in the districts of Purneah, Dinagepoor and Beerbhoom, were equally founded on a true theoretical knowledge of the Mogul system of finance, or in like manner, with constitutional formality, brought to light; but they were virtually the same in principle, derived from the known customary practice of the soubah; and in substance or duration, involving all the real advantages of an extension of the revenue, eventually prove infinitely superior to the boasted operations of our Mussulman predecessor in administration, as properly understood; or when otherwise under the grossly mistaken belief of uninformed modern statesmen, must appear no less deserving of being reprobated, as exceeding the supposed measure of right and expedient policy. In this instance, however, truth prevails; and the Company's management of Burdwan is approved of on all sides, and by the most enlightened of our English financiers, held up as an example worthy of general imitation. The circumstances which distinguish it were briefly as follow: In September 1760 the whole district, with all the other ceded lands, became subject to the British government; it was rated proportionably, in the moment of transfer, by original and increased assessments, at a standard considerably higher than that of any other zemindarry jurisdiction of the soubah; yet then or afterwards, no diminution of its rental, such as was suddenly effected by M. R. Khan in 1765, could even have been dreamt of. On the contrary, with the extension of local knowledge, the revenues were progressively improved, and always surpassed the share that should be proportionably forthcoming. When Bengal altogether was rated at or yielded the largest income to the exchequer, before the Company's acquisition of the Dewanny, Messrs. Johnstone, Hay and Bolts, were the first appointed English superintendents. They appear to have acquired a minute and intimate knowledge of the resources and capacity of the country confided to their charge, inasmuch as to ascertain the portions of the country cultivated, uncultivated, alienated, and most productive lands. In their researches, though aided by uncommon universal intelligence, they probably obtained the most satisfactory information through the custom, which then was tolerated, of admitting European farmers. They held a considerable part of the district in their own hands, and were accused of selecting for themselves the most profitable pergunnahs leased.

The zemindars of Hindostan have a two-fold tenure in their respective territorial trusts. The one, annexed in perpetuity to the office of landholder, or indefinitely, to the occupant personally by the Mogul empire, conferring on the dewanny sunnud, or charter of uniform tenure throughout the Muscoorat, Nankar, &c. being a individual in question, certain rights under the denomination of Muscoorat, Nankar, &c. being a subsistence in rent for land within the circle of his jurisdiction, as a permanent compensation for executing the public duties generally required of him, implying an attachment to the soil, to the interest of the ryots as their appointed chief or natural representative, and to those of his sovereign constituent, in maintaining the peace as well as promoting the prosperity at large of the country entrusted to his internal superintendence. The other, is of a more temporary nature, depending on the forms of an Annuldary Bundobusty sunnud Jumma bundy, or annual agreement for the established rents of government issuing from the territory, thus in fact transferred in leasehold, and fixed for the term specified at a contract price, supposed always to include on the basis of former settlements, the entire collections of every kind levied from the people, after deducting all necessary mofussil charges, comprehending a russoom, or commission of five per cent. on the actual receipt of the exchequer, in the reasonable allowance for the collectors and individual, with immediate servants management in the capacity of farmer general. Though the imperial constitution or original dewanny grant, did not make the latter tenure inherent in the person who officiated as zemindar; yet custom and true economical policy always required that it should virtually be so considered, if there were no special causes causes of personal exception; and then the occupant in the whole, became entitled to a deduction in his own favour, of about ten per cent. on the net revenue, which afforded a security to the state for possible defalcations far beyond the capacity of any other class of native subjects; nor can this maxim generally be deviated from, without probable oppression to the ryots, disturbance of the public peace, and certain loss to the proprietary sovereign, by incurring the unnecessary expense of a double agency, as the local knowledge of provincial delegates seldom or ever can be extended to restrict a landholder to his proper subsistence in nankar lands, making scarcely half of his complete allowance, when exercising all the usual functions of his office. In violation however of this financial rule, the rents of Burdwan were let at public sale in 1169 A. B. for three years to irresponsible temporary farmers, from whose engagements, if fulfilled, a keffyet or annual profit would have accrued to government of 13 lacks of rupees above the aggregate assessments of Ausil and Abwab, rated comparatively high with respect to the rest of the Soubah, in the instant of territorial cession to the Company, at the same time the zemindar's authority in making the collections, was necessarily suspended; but a scrupulous regard seems to have been paid to his chartered rights of Muscoorat, Nankar, &c. By separating the amount from the proper funds of the public exchequer, the needy adventurers who became contractors at the sale, of course failed in their agreements, and to crown the measure of imputed mismanagement, an impost of 9 annas per bega was levied on all the bazee zeemen found in the district, to make good the deficiencies of the stipulated malgoolary. These private Hindoo alienations, the object of taxation, were in their nature fraudulent, and could not be avowed without immediate resumption under the laws and constitution of a mussulman empire; yet being considered the natural offspring of superstition or piety, and originally very limited in extent, if not tolerated, when ascertained, were seldom very rigidly inquired into. When the expedient general demands of the state in the way of revenue, were fully complied with, in process of time, accumulated successive donations might diminish the funds of requisite public supply, and then the investigation became necessary; but the measure of seizing or taxing indiscriminately, lands really appropriated, however unauthorizedly, to charitable or religious uses, must ever be unpopular and odious; even now, that the experienced negligence or lenity of the British administration since the acquisition of the Dewanny hath encouraged the zemindars to multiply their encroachments on the rights of government nominally for the same sanctified purposes, but collectively for their proper worldly benefits; still an act of direct universal resumption would be considered as oppressive to the immediate sufferers, and appear extremely ungracious to the people at large. Mr. Johnston, who had the principal part in all these transactions, was subjected to all the opprobrium that could hence be attached to his public character by the suggestions of his powerful political enemies, of the aggrieved multitude, or candid enquiries, he was soon afterwards for the reasons proscribed by his ruling countrymen. Yet under these various causes of invective or incitements to criminate his conduct, no one ever thought of accusing him of injustice, in withholding the landholders bundobusty authority to collect the settled revenue from the ryots, and in transferring that lucrative employment to another description of farming contractors. In truth, the right of amildarry power is doing so, held ever incontestable until within these last 10 or 12 years, was then universally acquiesced in or completely established, and though the original sunnud under which the Company's chief agent at that time acted, expressly enjoined the continuance of the zemindar and tenants in their places; a suspension of the yearly office of farmer general, bestowed by custom on the former, was neither imagined in his own idea to be a matter of real grievance to himself, nor found fault with by the superiors of either party under individual inimical influence, strongly prejudiced, as incurring the guilt of being accessory to the smallest deviation from the written stipulations of Cossim Aly's territorial cession. Finally, Mr. Verelst in 1172 A. B. appointed supervisor of Burdwan, profiting by the errors and local informations of his predecessor, his own financial experience matured by further hustabood investigations on the spot, restored the ancient system of managing the revenue, an adherence to which, brought back the net effective standard of the three years settlement ending in 1171, fixt on the impolitic ground of extra farming, and ultimately involving a real instead of the nominal keffyet or improvements before mentioned, of 15 lacks.

To return to the general account of the district in 1102 A. B.—Under the same denomination it was of very confined dimensions, comprising no more than six or seven pergunnahs in the time of the first zemindary occupants, Kisheriram and Jagat roi of the Kehhy cast, whose names appear in history in the rebellion of Soubah Sing and Cita of Chiteva and Burdah, in the reign of Alemgeer. Tradition or uncertain family genealogy states parental consanguinity between the last-mentioned possessor of Burdwan and Keerutchund, the first of the present race on the Khalsa records, who by successive annexations in the usual mode of malzaminy operations, had in 1135 increased the jurisdiction to near its actual size, and obtained a common dewanny sunnud for the same. During the administrations of Jaffier and Suja Khan, his son Chitta sein, was in like manner vested in the office of landholder in 1146, and was succeeded in 1151 by his cousin Tilluck Chund, father of the present titular rajar Tyechund, who obtained the zemindary in virtue of a sunnud from the Company, soon after his official predecessor's death about the Bengal year 1177.

N. B. There is also some reason to believe, from different intimations in the correspondence with the Court of Directors, particularly in their letter to Bengal, dated February 19th 1766, that they had obtained anticipated information of the real collections of the district, including the further kaffyet of thirteen lacks, hereafter to be realized.

Zemindarry of Burdwan.

THE cession to the Company, of Burdwan, was in September 1760, or in the beginning of the Fussil Khereef 1167, when of the above stated malgoozary, sicca rupees 27,52,737 ought still to have been collected on account of the remaining seven months of the Bengal year. But of this sum, after defraying the expense of reducing the rebellious rajah to proper subjection, only 5,23,691 rupees were brought to public credit. In 1170, the second year of the triennial lease, and before attachment of the bazee zemeen, the gross rental was fixed at 44,81,035⁵ R^s, reduced on the Khalsa of the English residency, with salech or annual stipend to the zemindar, at the rate of 10 per cent. on the ausil, supposing his proper half allowance in nankar lands to have been included with the rest of the district farmed, and that the other moiety, under the denomination of Russoom, or commutation, on the collections, might have been bestowed as matter of favour or on mistaken grounds, notwithstanding suspension of the amildarry bundobust office, which alone conferred the right of claiming it on this jummaundy; however, the total amount received into the exchequer did not exceed 37,19,464 rupees, and from that sum was yet to be subtracted, the expense of the nuggian or money paid establishment of household troops reckoned at 2,64,000 rupees per annum, besides some other lesser articles, together with the petty disbursements of the Company stated at 35,834, in order to exhibit the net malgoozary then forthcoming from the whole territory, estimated in round numbers at 34 lacks of sicca rupees. In 1172, Mr. Verelst's financial operations commenced, and after various regulations, hustabood investigations and improvements, brought the revenue in five years to its highest standard, involving in the entire period of British administration, a kaffyet in all of thirteen lacks, or nine clear increase. Thus at the close of 1177, the total collections were sicca rupees 47,18,918, and the charges being 6,61,486, left a net income of 40,57,432. In 1178, the year after the famine, the gross settlement completely realized, was only 43,28,509 rupees, and including former balances recovered 45,16,804; the Serinjammy deductions at the same time amounted to 8,75,961. Henceforth, effectively the jumma of this district hath undergone very little variation to the present time; such changes as may appear were of a casual or temporary nature, and chiefly to be attributed to fluctuations in the rate of incurred or allowed expenditure, as set forth sometimes in the whole, sometimes partially, in the general statement of the annual bundobust. We may therefore, with safety, take this year's jummaundy as a common standard, including every article of assessment, whether ausil abwab or kaffyet, consolidated into a simple revenue levied from the several pergunnah divisions, whole or broken, of the country, according to the following authentic, though irregularly detailed Rent-roll.

Mr. J. Grant's
View of the Revenues
Burdwan.406 Appendix to Vth REPORT from The Select Committee on [No. 4.]

This revenue of 43,28,509 S^aR^a on account of 1178, was inclusive of the profits forthcoming from the Dewey Mbals appropriated to the Ranny's use, and estimated to amount to about 1,80,000 R^a additional; at the same time, the articles of incumbrance with which it was or could regularly be charged under the denomination of Serinjammy Mofussil, were, 1st. the Salienchor Moshairch of the zemindar, reckoned at 10 per cent. on the ausil; in round numbers 2,30,000 R^a.—2dly, the Muscoorat reduced to half a lack;—and 3dly, Poolbundy ordinary expenses 50,000 R^a more;—in all, making an object of 3,30,000 R^a proper to be deducted from the gross, to ascertain the net effective income of the state from the whole district; and if to the receipts of the year for the current settlement be added, as it ought (being a constant source of public supply) the annual collections made in liquidation of former balances, a sufficient fund will be established to make good casual deficiencies, as well as defray all the extraordinaries of British agency, on the most liberal scale, and yet leave a clear malgoozary to the sovereign of forty lacks of sicca rupees, which, I conceive, may be considered a moderate equitable standard for the exchequer dues from this zemindarry, under actual circumstances: more, would relatively be unfair, while almost all the other districts of Bengal are comparatively under-rated, however much the disparity is to be attributed to local knowledge in the one case, neglect or ignorance on the other. Again in 1190, the gross Jumma is stated at 43,58,026, from which deducting charges 6,22,271 R^a (including the unnecessary inadmissible establishment of the Nugdian troops, amounting to 1,03,360 R^a, with commission to a native sezawul and English superintendant 1,24,113, at the rate of 3 per cent on the collections), there remained net only 37,35,755, of which no more than 36,96,825 having been actually realized, reckoning the receipts of former balances, a recoverable defalcation of 3,03,175 results, from a comparison with the assumed standard of 1178, or rather more, from the real one of the preceding year.

But besides the expenses here brought to view, there are others necessarily incurred in the Mofussil that do not appear, though largely provided for either in chakeran lands or money, from the annual resources of the country. These are; first, an allowance to putwarries or accountants, of which there must be one for each village; and supposing the number of these to be 5,000, at sixty rupees per annum to every individual, the sum will be three lacks; 2dly, the wages of at least double the same number of pikes, or village peons, requisite to maintain the peace, secure the harvests, or enforce the collections at rupees each, make an object of four lacks more. Further, the rental of Bazeer Zemeen appropriations, must be taken into the general Jumma Khurch account of the district. The territory thus alienated, and ascertained by Mr. Johnstone, after an arduous scrutiny of 70 persons for eight months, in 1763-4 A. D. (since which, the quantity hath certainly not diminished) was 5,68,736 begas, making near a fifth part of all the arable productive ground in the zemindarry; which, estimated at 2 rupees per bega, being the valued medium rent of all the lands of Burdwan, yield an annual income to the possessors, of 11,37,472 rupees. These possessors are, undoubtedly, for the most part, the official landholder himself clandestinely, his minions, and the mutseddies of the Khalsa; whose acquiescence to such collusive benefices, under the sanctified appellations of religious or charitable gifts, at different times became necessary, as they were in their nature wholly fraudulent, and sure to be resumed, if made known to the Mussulman government. However this may be, the aggregate revenue of the whole jurisdiction in question, will then stand at about sixty-three lacks of sicca rupees. Well informed persons have extended their calculation, even to seventy lacks; but at the more moderate valuation before stated (taking the ascertained data of superficial measurement in round numbers 5,000 square B. miles, equal to ninety-five lacks of begas, of which 28½ lacks in the proportion of the Bazeer Zemeen, being a fifth of the whole above production of a rental of 57 lacks of rupees, at the rate of two R^a per bega) it may be a satisfaction to the Company in possessing the feeblest authority to determine, that in a cycle of their proper administration within the small canton of their ceded property, they have added three lacks of begas really cultivated land with nine lacks of rupees in revenue, to the extent and income ascertained, when they took charge; while in their imperial dewanny portion, instead of improvement, they have lost two-fifths of actual rental forthcoming, in the moment of acquisition.

Mr. J. Grant's
View of the Revenues of Bengal.Zemindarry of Calcutta.

ZEMINDARRY OF CALCUTTA.

THIS little compact district, called also the Twenty-four Pergunnah Zemindarry, containing about 882 B. sq miles, chiefly south of Fort William on the eastern margin of the river Hooghly, and altogether within the chucklah of the same name, was at first formed in the manner of a simple landholder's jurisdiction in favour of the United E. I. Company, in the month of Poes 1164 A. B. corresponding nearly with the 20th December 1757 A. D.—As the various charters on which originally were founded the limited rights of an office, and latterly those of the territory itself in proprietorship, thus held before, on the precarious tenure of official occupancy, have been translated from the Persian, are in the hands of many, and may be confidently referred to as authentic documents; as the essence, tenor, and operative virtue of these several deeds, may still occasion much political discussion, and do certainly throw a great deal of light on the history and Mogul legislation of Hindostan, particularly in exhibiting a view of the nature and still uncorrupted forms of almost every species of territorial grant in this country, being the foundation and surest rule to construe, generally, the spirit of the imperial laws and constitution of India, as far as any succeeding foreign sovereign is immediately concerned, in maintaining them in full force and efficacy; at least, until a better code can be substituted in their place, after the most genuine, complete intelligence of local circumstances;—so it may be proper here, in the way of reference, just to indicate the order, date, and substance of each charter respectively, conferring a different tenure in the same property, until the final acquisition of the proprietary or lordship of the soil, by a reverendatory grant of Lord Clive's Jageer, which in fact involved all the rights of Sani of the 4th year of 11th. Perwanneh or order from the Nazim Meer Jaffier, dated 5th Rub ul Sani of the 4th year of the reign of Algemeer. 2d. About 20th December 1757 A. D. or in Poes 1164 A. B. directed to the then official occupants of every denomination, and to the ryots of the 24 pergh^a, announcing formation of the new zemindarry in favour of the Company, and commanding obedience to the latter's authority as landholder. This writ was not formal, nor could it be of any real effect, if intended of itself virtually to confer the office and rights of zemindar on the Company; and therefore—

2d. A Dewanny Sunnud was obtained the following year, then Meer Mahomed Saddoc; purporting, in the words of a petition always inserted in the body of the grant, that the inhabitants were not satisfied to pay their rents, until they could be assured by the authority of a sunnud, that the person exercising the functions of zemindar, had been legally appointed to that official trust. This instrument in the original, I suppose to be complete in all its parts; and defining the territorial genuine model of the best Mogul forms in constituting the office, or defining the individual's official rights. The jurisdiction and rights of an Indian landholder. But certainly there must be a mistake or omission in the published translation, respecting the clause conferring the individual's official rights. The universal, almost indispensable words, used in every such charter are, "that after receiving credit for the Muscoorat Nankar, &c. the zemindar is to deliver into the treasury, at proper times, the due rents of the circar, according to custom;" and as there is no mention made in the printed English copy of Muscoorat Nankar, &c. which in fact, convey all the intended permanent rights annexed to the office of zemindar, so I conclude that those terms in the original have either escaped notice, or being technical, might not have been properly understood. In every other respect, the deed, as translated, appears perfectly regular, and agreeable to the financial constitution of India; particularizing the lands to be thus conditionally held, and invariably valued on assignment, at the old standard assessment of the ausil jumma toomary, being 222,958 rupees and a fraction.

Nothing then remained but to enforce the king's and nazim's writs, which the former zemindarry occupant were more especially required to do, in the forms of the new commission. The district for the most part, had been until then parcelled out amongst a number of the inferior classes of official landholders, chowdries, talookdars, and moccuddems. The officers had either already taken advantage of the corrupt negligence of the mussulman government, or what is more probable (on the change to an uninformed English administration) in helping themselves largely to a portion of the territory entrusted to their charge, under the collusive title of Bazeer Zemeen, and to secure to themselves something more than their assigned subsistence of Nankar in rent-free lands within their respective jurisdictions. This was the necessary evil consequence of compromising the zemindarry allowance thus admitted of, with all the other indispensable charges of mofussil collections, at the fixt inadequate rate of the Bengal muscoorat; and assessing the country partially by proportionable abwabs on the ausil, instead of simplifying the demand for the whole, by enlarging alone the basis of the latter. Besides this clandestine provision however, some of the ejected landholders on the present occasion, who had interest at court, procured for themselves other official possessions separated from some of the neighbouring zemindaries, as an equivalent for what they had been deprived of in virtue of the grant to the English. Among the principal of these, was Selah ul deen Mahomed Khan, who obtained under the denomination of Saidpoor, a fourth portion of the management of the lands of the 24 pergh^a to their formerly dismissed occupants, got back, with the collusive aid of some of the Khalsa Mutseddies, all his old, in addition to his greater than equivalent new acquisitions, while no compensation seems ever to have been thought of, for the large

24. A Firman was obtained directly from the emperor himself, confirming the grants of the Nazim, and dewan of the Soubah, and further converting them now into an Altumgha, or perpetual heritable jurisdiction over the same district, in like manner as the ceded territories of Burdwan and Chittagong, with the dewanny of the rest of Bengal, were under a similar form, transferred for ever to the Company. But notwithstanding their various chartered rights, successively of higher authority and more enlarged privilege, still, in the instance of the zemindarry, it was alone the khidmut or office, like that of the dewanny, which constituted the essential legal object of the grant; the substance, proprietary lordship, and uses of the soil, were wholly and absolutely excluded in form, and in fact merely a contingency, and for all that could originally have been known to the virtual receivers of the gift, might have been altogether reserved for the Mussulman government. This difficulty, however, was soon in a certain manner obviated (13th July 1759) by a new species of jageer sunnud to Lord Clive, for all the regalities, dues and rents of the circar, collected and payable by the Company, as official landholder, into the public treasury.

A regular jagher sunnud consists of two parts: 1st. The Munsub, or rank of the person enrolled on the omrahs, with a suitable number of horse attached to the dignity supposed to be kept in constant pay, for the eventual service of the state. 2d. The Zimm, particulars of an assignment in land, or stated allowance in money, for the support of the personal and military establishment of the jagherdar. When the particulars of such a grant include a whole district, of whatever extent, whether subject to the internal management of a zemindar, chowdry, talookdar or moccuddim, that is, to the native and that the full yearly crown rent, as ascertained on the Khalsa records, by the Ausil Jumma Toomary, which must ever be the standard estimate of transferred landed property, be specified more than in value then the donee is substituted exactly in the place of government, and acquires immediately, and during the legal continuance of his grant, all the jurisdiction, rights and financial prerogatives, belonging to the high sovereign proprietor of the soil; but when only a stated amount in money is assigned in (duams or rupees) issuing partially from certain territorial sources of revenue generally mentioned, not described in the exchequer detail of valued rent, then the jagherdar is restricted entirely to the emoluments of his pecuniary income, and can have no local influence whatever in consequence, within the limits of his grant. In both these cases, however, the sunnud or complete instrument, indicating the rule, and appropriating the fund of infeudation to be valid, according to the laws and imperial constitution of India, must always originate with, and have effect solely or exclusively under the sign manual of the Mogul emperor himself, as feudal monarch and high lord proprietor of the conquered estates of Hindostan. But Alemgeer, the prince actually on the throne of Delhi, when Lord Clive's jagher was first in contemplation, had lost all real authority in Bengal, though his nominal paramount sovereignty might have been still formally acknowledged by the ruling nazim, lately created under the conquering sway of the British arms; and however much inclined Meer Jaffer might have been, to reward substantially the singular man whose bravery, fortunes and disinterestedness, had unmeritedly raised himself to the musnud of three soubahs, he could not venture, without lessening the validity and importance of his newly acquired tenure in dominion (held alone by the sword) to give virtual operation to an imperial grant of land within the circle of his proper independent jurisdiction. To remove, therefore, this obstacle in some manner, and yield to the wishes or scruples of either party, a patent was obtained from the court of Delhi, for the munsub or titular first part of the jagher sunnud, it having finally received the royal signature, and passed the great with the lesser seals of the high officers of state, on the 25th Rub ul Sani, of the 4th year of the reign; and, as if it were in consequence of or to render beneficial this mark of royal favour, a perwannah was issued by Meer Jaffer, in July 1759, but to take place from June of the preceding year, intended to remedy the deficiency of the second part or territorial assignment, wanting in the Mogul firman, and addressed to the English company, as zemindars of Calcutta, directing them henceforth to pay their rents to Lord Clive, as jagherdar, in like manner as they were before bound to do, to the established government. In a constitutional sense, however, this grant was altogether informal; and in its nature, incongruous and void from the beginning; yet a viceroy de facto, still to be supported occasionally by the powerful instruments of his original appointment, might always be sure of commanding implicit obedience to his writs; and the intention in this case was manifest, both to relieve the landholder from the uncertain exactions of a Mussulman dewan, and secure to his lordship an adequate private reward for the eminent personal services he was considered to have rendered to the actual soubahdar; — For the zymn or inventory of assigned lands, being the substantial second part of the jagher, thus improperly executed by the Nazim, does not specify particulars, yet it includes and appropriates to the jagherdar precisely the entire Ausil Jumma Toomary, or crown rent, and with it necessarily all the sovereign proprietary uses of the soil of the the whole zemindarry district of the Company; leaving them however in the state of an easy dependence on their own servant, for the liquidation of such surplus collections as they might be enabled to make within their subordinate financial jurisdictions, after deduction of the muscoorat, &c. customary charges of management, and payment of the sum stipulated for the assignment to Lord Clive, estimated as usual only at the old standard assessment.

Clive, estimated as usual only at the old standard assessment. Nevertheless his lordship's pretensions in 1764 were contested in England; but if the question had then been referred to the Courts of this country for decision, in all human probability he would have carried, as all nations well broke into the yoke of despotism, more especially the people of Hindostan, will ever servilely obey, learn and yield to the inclinations of that individual representative authority, which is present, felt, or dreaded, without venturing to call in question its legitimacy or extents in preference to the mightiest power on earth, in itself invisible and only manifested in the person of a delegate, whose interest may thus possibly sometimes come in competition with those of his constituent. Yet, under such circumstances, who could insure permanent influence to maintain a precarious acquisition, depending more or less, on the ever hostile disposition of succeeding servants in office to the will of their master? and the jageery sunnud of Meer Jaffier, even if it had been formal or valid, was, as it ought to have been, expressed in terms of indefinite duration, always revokable at pleasure, and absolutely as a thing of course, totally extinguished, or virtually cancelled on the demise of, or dismission, from the soubahdarry employments then actually held by the donor or donee. It therefore became advisable on the accession of Nudjem ul Dowlah to the nizamat, notwithstanding the compromise to the same effect, which had taken place in England, to obtain renewal of the instrument of territorial assignment, and that, for a determinate period of ten years, in lieu of the vague uncertainty of the former writ in point of time. It was farther necessary to secure the sovereign proprietary possession of the lands in question to the Company, after extinction of the present feudal incumbent's claim of property; for still it is to be remembered, that under all their chartered rights they were hitherto at best only vested simply in the office of zemindar, made heretable by a deed of Altumgha. Accordingly, the 23d of June 1765, when Lord Clive returned to Bengal, both these objects were accomplished in the form of, a ten years prolongation of what is termed an un-

4th.—A new Soubahdarry Perwanneh, conferring a ten years prolongation of what is termed a conditional jageer to Lord Clive, with reversion afterwards to the Company in perpetuity under similar powers, and the same forms in every other respect, as had already been observed in bestowing an original grant. Moreover, on the 12th of August following, this last deed received the sanction of a royal mogul firmaun, which for the first time, stamped legal validity on the act of assignment in favour of his lordship, and henceforth transferred to the Company for ever, in the nature of a jageer, the absolute property (the turf, the manor or barony, as it might be called in England) at the old domesday valuation of yearly rent with the zemindarry office or stewardship, in this single instance made hereditary, of all the lands of the 24 pergunnahs.

For the ground of the port and present city of Calcutta, insulated within, or totally distinct from the zemindarry here so denominated, a grant of a very different nature from any of the foregoing was obtained in December 1758, by a constitutional formal instrument under the royal dewanny authority, descriptive of a lakheraje, or rent-free tenure of the lands and villages in question, from the month of Poos 1164; for public expedient purposes therein specified, and always necessary to be set forth in the form of a petition to the throne, to authorize the smallest diminution of the standard imperial crown rent, constituting the very essence of landed property, the original, or rather representative value of all the Mogul conquered estates of Hindostan, and the sole necessary basis of assessment, intrinsic worth, including that primitive, with every subsequent proportional, increase of assessment. As early as the reign of Furrukh Seer, in 1717, it was an object with the Company to acquire the territory, but only in the nature of a talookdarry or official copyhold tenure, generally subject (being of small ascertained value, and extent) to a certain fixed rental, calculated on a medium standard of the present collections. It appears they had already possessed themselves by purchase immediately from the zemindars then in occupancy, of the like subordinate stewardship alone privileged to be sold of a lesser district on similar terms, round their principal factory of Calcutta. Nothing could be more constitutional and just, after confirming the former talookdarry purchase, than the condition annexed to the emperor's compliance with this new requisition, that the Company should also in like manner compensate the actual possessors or holders of the territorial jurisdictions, with annexed official dues and privileges or natural benefits of occupancy; this to be acquired by one party and lost by the other, necessarily depending on some written instrument of possessory right, either a firmaun, sunnad, perwannah, pottah, the nuckill toomary jumma of the muscoorat, or literally and technically in English, a royal or dewanny charter, temporary provincial order of fixt rents, in definite lease to the husbandman, copy of the court-roll for the petty privileged farmer of fixt rents, Among the various descriptions of persons thus eventually concerned, as entitled to indemnification, the ryot or pottah holder is by far the poorest, most dependent, yet most useful subject of the state, of the sovereign's care, as being the poorest, most dependent, yet most useful subject of the state, and entitled to the largest share of the gross produce of the soil, extracted chiefly by his personal labour, always affording the only important permanent source of Indian revenue. His tenure of occupancy, is a simple written lease of indefinite duration, granted by the zemindar or other officer of government, in immediate financial management of the pergunnah; but by the established usage of the exchequer and custom of the country, a tenant thus admitted, without corruption or collusion, can never be fairly ousted from his tenement, for private ends, or the selfish accommodation of any individual whatsoever, while he continues to pay his proportion of the demands of the state, settled annually by by general bundobusty agreement with his proper native representative, the chief landholder of the district. A wise, beneficent, though despotic monarch, when such a system even might obstruct his own particular fancy—in erecting a palace or inclosing a piece of pleasurable ground, would be the first in setting the most liberal, splendid example of scrupulous universal justice towards his helpless peasantry; who, in every instance, dividing the yearly pecuniary product of the lands they cultivate into twenty equal parts, should or do receive fifteen shares for themselves, including the expense of culture; while the sovereign is entitled to no more than four of net rentals, after deducting the remaining twentieth for the customary allowance of zemindary agency, with every other charge of interior mofussil management. Under a constitution so mild, the prosperity of the husbandman of India is unparalleled in the financial history of Asiatic administration; and no where perhaps more remarkably so, (from a rigid adherence to this very principle of securing possession of the villagers, often for many successive generations, on the ground of their indefinite pottah leaseholds,) than within the jurisdiction of Calcutta and the 24 pergunnahs. In other districts, the zemindar, chowdry or talookdar, or some such officer of government, necessarily intervenes, and is made the channel of purchase or compensation, as well on his own behalf as that of his subordinate tenantry. Sometimes, no doubt, with the accomplished fraudulent effect even of reversing the rule of natural and civil right, by taking three-fourths of the money received to themselves, and giving only the equivalent of their own twentieth Muscoorat allowances to the poor ejected suffering ryots. But the Company, as zemindar, have never interfered in the innumerable daily purchases of land made within their first great official jurisdiction; every buyer rather impolitely is permitted to make his own terms with the needy occupant, who derives exclusively the entire benefit of the sale; and the idea is now carried so far, that the old pottah possessors of a part of the ground on which Fort William hath been erected, though doubtless they were, on removal, otherwise indemnified, lately had it in contemplation, or might have been instigated, under the sanction of the mogul law, to be interpreted in a British court of justice, to claim their indefinite leasehold property from the Company acting in the capacity merely of zemindar, when the land was originally taken and thus appropriated, but without reflecting on the public expediency of the thing, or the despotic proprietary rights afterwards acquired, which left the higher party sovereign arbitrators in their proper cause. But Jaffier Khan, who ruled Bengal when Furrukhous Firman was obtained, jealous perhaps of such a privilege of settlement bestowed on foreigners, could always prevent the execution of the king's writ; and it seems probable, that the influence, unwillingness of the talookdars or inferior tenants, then in occupancy, to dispose of their respective interests in the 38 petty villages, commanded to be transferred alone on these terms in talookdary tenure to the English, might have been held out as the ostensible cause of suspending the operation of the imperial mandate, until the succeeding revolution at Delhi, gave almost independent sway to the opposing provincial Nazim.

On reviewing all these various title deeds of official or absolute territorial property, acquired by the East India Company since the battle of Plassey; considering the letter and spirit of the several grants, bestowing successive rights in ascending gradation, repeated removals of one zemindar to make room for another, as a thing of course; a power frequently exercised, and never once controverted under the Mogul government, when done simply on grounds of implied expediency, through the formal constitutional authority of the royal dewan; but above all, considering the practical experience of thirty years, obliging in a manner the representatives of the Company to ascertain, at least in virtual effect, precisely all kinds of existing jurisdiction, right and privilege, some time or other enjoyed by their constituents, and annexed to every office, trust, occupancy or proprietary holding in land, to be found in the whole system of financial administration in India; it may be allowed, that the corps of British civil servants thus employed, ought to be better instructed in theory, as they must necessarily be in the practice, of all such topics under present discussion, than any similar description of native officers, now living within the three soubahs of Bengal, Behar, and Orissa; even supposing the latter to be as entirely disinterested in the issue of the questions agitated, as the reverse is notoriously and demonstratively the case. In truth, however, anciently the former were contented with mere practical knowledge; and it is only within the last twelve years, that any attempt hath been made to establish certain speculative opinions on the subject of financial rights. These opinions have never been publicly examined, compared, or digested with proper local intelligence. They coincided with principles of European legislation, and caught the prejudices of the people; but I believe they will be found almost in every material instance opposed to fact, and to rest on no solid foundation whatever, brought forward in proof as applicable to the actual circumstances of the country. Nevertheless, with a few exceptions, all the present revenue civil servants in office, have been educated, since the promulgation, and therefore in some degree under influence, of the new prevailing doctrine; which if yet easily in itself to be overturned, may on this account, seconded by native information, withstand the attack of many succeeding enquiries.

THE preceding Rental of 5,35,105 R^s as the established due of government before and after the zemindary sunnud to the Company, and until the grant of Lord Clive's jagher, stands in fact confirmed on the public records, more especially in the 4th Report to Parliament in the inquiry of 1773. The former official charter to have operation from the month of Poos 1164 A. B. or December 1757, henceforward gave the Company as zemindars, certain indefinitely permanent rights of territorial jurisdictions, as well as powers of agency to collect and pay into the treasury the lawful revenue of the exchequer, when not expressly deprived of or superseded in this annual revolving branch of their financial trust. Accordingly it appears, by a letter from Mr. Holwell, June 11th 1759, to the then Council of Calcutta, that the lands of the 24 perg^s, or at least the greater part of them, had actually been in possession before that date 16 months, ending, as ascertained by a subsequent letter, with the Bengal fussilly year 1165, or 11th, perhaps prolonged to the 30th April 1759. In that period, had been received altogether, a net rental, including the Ausil of S^r R^s 6,06,985; of which the credits for the first twelve months passed in the Company's books, after deducting a trifling charge of 5,527, are stated at 4,38,900 rupees, being nearly in the proportion of three-fourths of the whole. Precisely six months after the zemindary acquisition, the jagher or incumbent proprietary of the same district, was assigned to Lord Clive; and the Nabob Meer Jaffier, in the mean while, as acknowledged sovereign representative had a title to and received in April 1760, the total amount of that prior half year's collections, estimated at S^r R^s 2,12,332. But this sum was probably alone on account of the khalsa portion of territory transferred immediately in management to the Company in virtue of their sunnud, and of which the clear annual recorded income, as before set forth in the detail of the nusil abwab and keffyet of the bundobust of 1164, being 4,23,089, was nearly of course double the payment made to the soubah. The surrender of the smaller share of the 24 perg^s taken from the appropriated jagher portion of the country belonging to the Nazim himself, could not in delicacy or propriety have been required, before the conclusion of the year 1164, or 11th of April 1758; from which time, the assignment to Lord Clive, only three months rental, ausil and towfeer, became due to the nabob, in strictness not exceeding 28,000 S^r R^s, though with arrears or former balance, amounting really to 32,120 or current R^s 37,261. In a note to the statement laid before the House of Commons from the India House, it is remarked, that an annual payment of S^r R^s 2,22,958 for the king's rents, appeared to be obligatory on the Company, in terms of the nabob's sunnud, granting their newly formed zemindary; and it is supposed that the two above-mentioned sums paid to Meer Jaffier, making together 2,44,452 S^r R^s, might have been on account of these rents, preceding the grant of them to Lord Clive as a jagher. But this was impossible, because only half a year had elapsed, and consequently no more than a moiety of the specified crown rent could be due between the period of the Company's taking charge of the jagher assignment in question.

It may then very naturally be asked, what advantages the Company were to derive from their zemindary, thus bound to pay the whole of their collections, original, with increased assessment to government, yet restricted in their proper emoluments of muscoorat, &c. to a compromised allowance at the utmost of 20,000 rupees, for serinjammy charges, if the investiture of the sovereign proprietary rights in their own servant, had not thrown the power into their hands, to extend the constitutional limits of their grant? 1st. Mr. Holwell suggests an answer to the question, by ascertaining that frauds were committed by the former landholders, in levying from the ryots more than they accounted for to the exchequer, and by proposing an experimental proof in letting the lands for three years at public sale, but in well known entire pergunnah divisions, to responsible men; not, as hath been since tried, by indefinite farms of unknown extent and value, to ignorant or wholly irresponsible persons, who yet had to struggle against the personal interests, natural influence, and local experience of powerful zemindars, whose authority was only partially suspended. The result brought a new keffyet of upwards of two lacks into the treasury, in a net effective rental of 7,65,700 S^r R^s per annum to July 1762, and subsequently exclusive of the salt khaliaries. 2d. Mr. Verelst's report of 1767, found on the completest most authentic hustabood investigation ever executed in Bengal, precludes even the necessity of any other reply, than the bare statement of the fact of his having brought to light (soon afterwards to be realized) a further profitable increase of seven lacks, under the proper technical denomination of towfeer, involved in a gross rental, moderately estimated at 14,65,000 S^r R^s, or a clear malgoozary of fourteen lacks, deducting near 30 per cent. on the ausil for charges proceeding from former territorial, and yet existing funds, of 8,80,000 beghas of productive ground, exclusive of the mobai, &c. salt farms, sayer duties; the whole town or Dus of Calcutta, and besides fraudulent alienations of bazee zemeen, 2,02,481 beghas, more pretended by the preceding zemindars on relinquishments of their profession to have been given away in religious or charitable donations, though for the most part, clandestinely held by themselves as an emolument of office, under cover of their jumma bundy or compromised agreement of annual renewal with the sovereign for the supposed net entire revenue forthcoming from the district, and still is retained even after their dismissal, to the prejudice of the Company as succeeding official landholders. In short, after various apparently unnecessary fluctuations in the stated assessment of the 24 pergunnahs, it was reduced in 1190 or 1784 A. D. when the pecuniary equivalent of Lord Clive's jagher had finally ceased to be paid, to a gross jumma, always exclusive of the income from salt, of 1,44,000 S^r R^s or about ten lacks, clear of all Mofussil Serinjammy expenses. The causes of this great defalcation, in a period of 16 years, seem too notorious to require recital. They are set forth in part in the imperfect or garbled hustabood account of the Aumeens in 1183, where 1,32,000 beghas of Baze Zemeen, annually worth two lacks of rupees, appear to have been recently alienated, and by no means means in the least to be compensated for, by the discovery of 2,51,000 beghas of Khas Pateet pasture or unproductive jungle territory, unnoticed in Mr. Verelst's original more accurate survey, partly in an unaccountable reduction of one lack further, appearing on the same record in the ordinary rental of tenanted ryotty farms, six and a half lack of beghas in extent; when the real value of lands around of Calcutta hath rather been constantly increasing; and in short they are entirely manifested on the face of the Bundobust settlement, in which a new allowance of 10 per cent. upwards of a lack of rupees additional, is made to the re-admitted zemindars, including those of Saidpoor Hoogla, and in lieu of their former Muscoorat deductions, but altogether in prejudice of the Company's indubitable chartered rights, acquired through the official management and perpetual sovereign proprietorship of the 24 pergunnahs. A lost revenue of four lacks of rupees, may therefore here certainly be deemed recoverable.

As to the town of Calcutta, its rents have been rapidly on the increase; though latterly by unconstitutional means, in admitting, as it would seem unnecessarily, the interference of a British court of common law, to give efficacy by registration, to a simple financial operation of the Bengal exchequer, in levying a house tax of two or three lacks of rupees, to defray the expense of cleansing and ornamenting the place internally, besides a revenue before collected (exclusive of the customs or port duties of 1,10,000 S^r R^s) of which, about one-third under the head of Chowkydarry or Police tax, to retain an un-disciplined battalion of tannahdars and peons, constituting the only established guard or night-watch of the city; more precisely in 1190, the gross jumma was 1,22,418, and charges police were 45,875 S^r R^s.

TANNAHDARRY OF CHITTAGONG.

THIS maritime frontier garrison district, in the South-east extremity of Bengal, towards the dominions of Arrakan, called also Islamabad, from the period of complete subjection to the Mogul empire, in the reign of Alemgeer, about the year A.D. 1665, is, in all its dimensions, 2,987 square miles of unproductive, hilly, and plain arable ground, nearly in the proportion of two to one; and is divided into four moderately large, and 140 very small pergunnahs, partitioned among at least 1,400 petty landholders, in consequence of the whole district having originally been assigned, chiefly in Jagher Ahsham, or provision for the Mootaireh militia, or garrison troops, constantly maintained there, for protection against the incursions of the Moggs or Arrakaners, and receiving their pay in small allotments of land, which, in process of time, became so many distinct zemindaries, when the military establishment ceased to be of use, and its territorial appropriation resumed for the benefit of the exchequer. Mr. Verelst, in his evidence before the secret Committee of the House of Commons, 1773, states, that a crown rent of sicca rupees 68,422, called the ausil, had been levied in 1713, from the occupants of this tannahdarry district; that henceforth, to the year 1727, one-fourth of that jumma, and to 1734 as much more were added to the first assessment; and that by several subsequent augmentations to the end of 1759, near the period of cession to the Company, the ancient crown rent, risen to 3,31,529 S^r R^s, being at the rate of 4th 13th 10th for every rupee of original crown rent. But according to the ausil toomary jumma of Jaffier Khan, exhibited in the rent-roll of 1135 A.B. continued with Towfeer, and its improvements to Cossim Aly's grant to the English in 1167, corresponding with the local Moggy year 1122, or A. D. 1760, the total bundobust in the moment of acquisition, should be stated as follows; viz.

In 1178, the year after the famine, this original net bandobust rental of 3,23,135 R^s was encased that is to say, on further local knowledge of the country and its true revenue, had been found really only part of an actual clear malgoozary of 4,66,428, collected yearly from the ryots, after allowing a deduction of 12 per cent. on the receipts of the treasury for defraying all ordinary charges of mofussil management. The native Amins in 1183 state the total sources of public income to be 1,52,877; Abwabs, prior to 1179, rupees 4,08,559, and others imposed subsequently under the denomination of khurcha, or expence, 1,07,072 more; amounting altogether to a gross rental, exclusive of Plateka, of 6,68,529 Dasmasha rupees, about 6 per cent. worse than sicca; and besides a baze-zameen alienation of 2,73,202 beghas, probably of the richest cultivated ground in the whole district. Nevertheless, in 1190 the gross jumma had fallen to 4,88,751, and the net settlement to 4,03,722, leaving a recoverable defalcation on comparison with the realized bundobust of 1178 of 8 R^s 49,408 after deducting from the latter 13,298 R^s; the original included value of the salt farms, henceforth to be separately accounted for.

REMARKS EXPLANATORY OF THE PRECEDING ABSTRACT.
(1.) Ausil Jumma Toomary:—The gross assessment of Bengal, exclusive of the ground rent of the town of Calcutta, 5,712 R^s granted in lackorage or free tenure, is, agreeable to Jaffier Khan's standard

Of late years the amount collected under this head, has been very considerable, and is still increasing. In 1190 A.B. or 1783-4, it was 6,11,102 in the whole, or net 5,44,244 S^a R^s; but on a five years medium, ending the 30th April 1785, the gross receipts were 4,38,923; and in like manner the charges, exclusive of those incident to the institution of the board of customs, were, on an average 71,431, leaving a clear produce of 3,66,492 S^a R^s. Were the improving state of this branch of revenue to be attributed to the growing prosperity of internal industry or enlargement of profitable foreign and English trade, no reasonable objection could be made to the burthen of the impost thus exacted, at the present grand emporium of European commerce in India; but it is notorious that the increase chiefly arises from the recent vast addition to the number of British inhabitants residing within the dependencies of Fort William, and consequent greater consumption of articles of luxury imported from abroad, such as teas, &c. from China; wines, spirituous liquors, with a variety of manufactured goods directly or indirectly from France, Holland, Denmark, Italy, and the dominions of Portugal. Such a duty therefore is now levied in Calcutta, in addition to what is called the government customs, of 2½ per cent. universally; and the only constitutional general impost of the kind established throughout the country under the Mogul authority, must be considered, a heavy impolitic incumbrance on the natural proper trade of Bengal, which of course would center almost exclusively in the capital sea port town of the dependent provinces, if this exaction did not throw a larger share into the neighbouring European settlements. At any rate, the establishment of a double custom-house in the same place, and for similar collections, appears unec-nomical, and wholly unnecessary.

Bengal; as set forth in the preceding Sheets, under Thirty-two general Heads, at four different Periods; foundation and standard of Comparison for every subsequent Bundobust;—in 1172, on concluding the first Dewanny great unaccountable reduction in the Annual demand on the Country, which took place at the commencement of Administration;—With an Estimate of the Loss or recoverable Defalcation appearing by the last of these State-acquisitions of the Company:—Also an Abstract of the similar Funds of Annual Income, detailed in a former Work, with the like deduction of comparative deficiency incident to the latter. The whole exhibiting a Summary View of collections, allowing throughout for the same articles of necessary incurred Expenditure in the financial manage-clear residue of the khalsa shereefa, heretofore annually remitted in specie to Delhi, or appropriated in Jageer to the civil military and marine imperial establishments of the province, in the proportion of about a crore and five lacks to the former, and thirty-two lacks to the latter. —The Behar Toomary, formed in 1750, is a jumma kaumil, or complete Assessment; and the charges to be deducted are about 24 per cent. on the gross settlement, leaving a large residue of net income, then for the most part assigned in jageers.

(2.) M. R. Khan's gross Bundobust for Bengal, includes simply the Muscoorat allowance, and two new heavy articles of expenditure at Dacca and Curneah. From the net Toomary Rent-roll of Behar in 1765, was deducted, jageer grants for nine lacks, and nearly six lacks more on account of Baughelpoor, &c. dismembered.

(3.) Cossim Aly's gross Jummaundy of the Dewanny portion of Bengal in 1762, included, besides the compromised charges of Muscoorat, a serinjammy allowance for such districts as had been valued either partially or in toto, by Hustabood investigations; and to his net Settlement of 2,14,09,175 is added 2,95,000, for resumptions or improvements in Sylhet, Rungpoor and Rajemhal, to the year 1765. Behar is stated, as it ought to have been rated at the latter period; and the ceded lands, as valued by Hustabood operations carried on under the Company's proper administration.

(4.) Settlement of 1190 A.B. or 1783-4, for the three provinces of Bengal, Behar and Orissa, stands in the annual general Statement of the revenue in gross at - - - - - Rs 3,01,35,474

From this, is deducted abatements of rent made in course of the year 6,76,753
Also duties on Salt, which make part of the profits derived from the manufacture and sale of that article, altogether brought to credit in the estimate of resources, or in the public book under a separate head of account, and to which might be added the salt jumma of Hedjeelee, three and a half lacks more - - - - - 7,08,741

And subtracting from the remainder all charges of the collections, being - - - - - 21,29,092

The net Bundobust is reduced to the actual standard of the current year's agreement - - - - - Rs 2,16,20,888

The Sayer, or duties, making part of the preceding jumma, and exclusive of the estimated impost on salt, are rated in all at - - - - - 16,56,935

Ordinary and extra charges of the Board of Customs - - - - - 5,17,499

Drawbacks, &c. on goods re-exported - - - - - 11,39,436
- - - - - 1,58,276

Net Amount passed to credit in the above account, and distributed under the heads of Dewanny lands, town of Calcutta, and soubah of Behar - - - - - Rs 9,81,160

(5.) Estimate of Loss, or recoverable Defalcation, arising on comparison of the net Settlement of 1190, with that which actually existed 19 years before, until the Company's accession to the Dewanny, is calculated on balance of the accounts of included districts; among which, three or four, such as Bishenpoor, &c. were improved in rental.

N.B.—The Annual Balance incurred on the Ausil Jumma Toomary, when the country was not overrun by an enemy, did not, and could never fairly exceed, a few thousand rupees. The balance of M. R. Khan's first bundobust in Bengal, uncollected at the end of the year, was 15,40,851. That of Cossim Aly's in 1169 uncertain; supposed to be small, as he is accused of rigour, and that he added very little to the established assessment of the soubah. In 1164 it was 18,79,891; but in 1171 (the year immediately preceding the acquisition of the Dewanny, as stated and carried forward by M. R. Khan) it was not more than 4,10,345. The balance of 1190, throughout the 3 provinces, was 23,54,824, of which, about fourteen and a half lacks for Bengal, including the salt balance of Hedjeelee; or if deducted, the gross jumma ought in like manner to be diminished. On the whole, the balance incident to the three last settlements of the revenue, may be estimated at par about fifteen lacks for Bengal, always to be realized in course of the succeeding year.

SUPPLEMENT to the "Historical and Comparative Analysis of the Finances of Bengal, from the Mogul Conquest to the present time."—Containing,—A similar Disquisition on the Revenue of the dependent DOMINIONS OF SOUBAH BEHAR; CHUCKLAH OF MIDNAPORE in ORISSA and, the ZEMINDARRY OF BENARES, in SOUBAH ALLAHABAD.—Calcutta, June 30th, 1787. By James Grant, Esq.

SOUBAH BEHAR.

THIS Province is one of the most fertile, highly cultivated, and populous of Hindostan, in proportion to its extent of plain arable ground; which may be computed twenty-six thousand square British miles, divided naturally into two nearly equal portions of territory, north and south of the river Ganges, running here its intermediate course easterly 200 miles.
