EDITORIAL NOTE

The Indian Journal of Economics is intended in the first place to supply a longfelt need by providing a medium for the publication of articles on Indian Economics by authors of academic standing or authoritative position. In the second place it is designed to facilitate the publication of the original investigations made by the staff and research students of the Economics Department of the Allahabad University; whilst a third object of issuing it is to perform a kind of public service which can be undertaken better by a university department than any other agency: namely the dissemination of information about the economic activities of other countries. National progress can be made swiftly and surely only by utilizing the experience of other nations; and if knowledge of the effects of economic measures undertaken abroad be made public in India development and reform are likely to proceed here more safely and rapidly.

The Journal will include in its scope the theory and method of economics; the descriptive economics of India and of other countries where conditions are similar; currency and banking, including the study of prices and trade fluctuations; finance—public and commercial; statistics—theoretical and descriptive; the economic history of India; proposals for legislative and social reforms of an economic character; and the financial and industrial activities of local governments.

The Journal has no policy, except to record what is believed to be the truth, and to enable authors cognizant of Indian affairs to make or criticize proposals for the amelioration of economic conditions by legislative or social reforms. A strong feature will be the reviews of books, as it is intended to review, or notice critically, every work on economics henceforth published in India, or relating to India, with the object of affording a trustworthy guide to students and the reading public.
