Length of the Secondary Training Course

The attention of the D.P.D. may, it is submitted, be invited to Mr. Grieve's letter no. R.C. 9434/20 of 1-21. on pages 18 to 20 of G.O. no. 74, of 15-1-1921, and he may be asked ^{to} to favour Govt. with his views on the question of the reduction of the period of training ~~for one year~~ ^{to one} in the case of students, who have undergone the course in a college for the P.A. or the Intermediate Examination of the Madras University but ^{have} failed to pass the examination.

U.O. No. 313 dated 23-6-21

Students who have gone through the Secondary School-Leaving Certificate course and are now undergoing training, spend about one half of their time in improving their general educational qualification and

and the other half, approximately, in obtaining professional training. Persons who have passed the Intermediate Examination of the University spend only one year in the Training School, practically the whole of this time being devoted to professional training.

If we refuse to allow persons who have failed in the Intermediate Examination to undergo only one year's training, we shall undoubtedly keep up the quality of those who enter the teaching profession as Secondary Grade teachers, and we shall probably ~~im~~ improve the general educational standard of those who had failed in the Intermediate Examination. One disadvantage of allowing failed Intermediates to take the training course in one year is that they will during training and after they have completed their training and go out as teachers, be continually endeavouring to pass the Intermediate Examination and their legitimate work will probably suffer thereby. If they are compelled to take a two years' course of training, they may have sufficient time to improve their general qualifications by passing the Intermediate Examination during their two years' course of training.

Persons who have studied for two years in a college, even although they have not passed the University Examination at the end of it, are clearly as a general rule, better fitted educationally as teachers than persons who have only read in a High School. We may ~~in this way~~, increase our applicants for admission to Secondary Training.

The arguments on both sides are fairly evenly balanced and, if Government is inclined to by prescribing for them only one year's training show some concession to persons who have undergone a full Intermediate course of study in a college, but who have failed in the Intermediate Examination of the University, I see no strong reason against allowing such persons to undergo only one year's training in a Training School for teachers, instead of two years, so long as the Intermediate course of study of the University remained unaltered.

When, however, the Intermediate courses of study for the University come to be revised, as I hope they soon will be, so as to include some manner of vocational work, e.g., work which will suitably lead up to the teaching profession, circumstances will have changed and the case of failed Intermediates will again have to come under review.

It will take some time before the courses of study for the Intermediate Examination come to be revised. Until such time, those students, who have attended a college for two years for the Intermediate or P.A. ~~or~~ classes but have failed in the examination may be allowed to undergo

One year's training would obviously do. Every student that applies for the Intermediate examination though a College passes through the College Selection examination.
There is thus a filtering and really unworthy candidates are kept back. The result of an an Examination paper at the end of the course is not always conclusive evidence of a candidate's capacity.
Now that we are ruling that private ~~candidate~~ student, not already employed, should not be paid stipend, it will have to be considered very carefully whether it is absolutely necessary to force the Intermediate failed Candidates to undergo two year course. The argument that failed candidates after training would when employed be diverting their ~~own~~ energies to passing the Examination to the detriment of their legitimate work of teaching, is a weak one. For a teacher there are ever so many directions for diversion of energy, chiefly private tuition, and resting for the examination. will not ordinarily be a more serious one, with weekly holidays and vacations. As pointed by the D.P.D. himself it will be an incentive for failed intermediate & get trained & take to teaching here.
