I think this clause is necessary. The expenditure by district boards on public health seem absurdly low as compared with municipalities. Public health should also include medical relief of all kinds besides those mentioned in the notes by the Director of Public Health. Taking hospitals and dispensaries including infectious disease hospitals and the like, 40 per cent is not much. An average of three years expenditure may give a working data but the 40 per cent limit may be reached gradually. My suggestion for a marriage tax if approved will go to form a fund. Besides with setting apart specific amounts from Budget every year for rural water-supply, the expenditure of 40 per cent may be feasible.

T. S. S. R. [AJAN]—4-3-38.

Section 107.—I think to earmark 40 per cent of the revenue of local boards for public health purposes will be rather arbitrary and may tend to be disproportionate to their other commitments. If, under the proposed Elementary Education Bill, all local bodies are made compulsorily to contribute annually out of their income an amount equal to the annual average of their last three years expenditure on elementary education which may come to about 25 per cent of their revenue, the amount left over, viz., 35 per cent will be hardly adequate for their other services, such as, maintenance of roads, lighting charges, establishment charges, provision of cart-stands, etc., which are equally important from the point of view of local administration. In the case of the Madras Corporation it is stated that in 1936-37 the expenditure under public health came to about 26 per cent of its total income. In the absence of similar statistics in regard to the other local bodies, I think it will be difficult to prescribe an outright percentage for being earmarked for public health expenditure out of the revenue of local bodies.

I would therefore suggest that this section may be recast so as to state that an amount not exceeding 40 per cent of its annual income shall be earmarked by each local body for expenses connected with public health, and that the Public Health Board shall fix the amount that each such body should thus earmark, paying due regard to its other charges, in consultation with the Secretary and the Minister in charge of the Local Administration Department. I think a provision to this effect would enable a flexible rate to be adopted within the prescribed maximum so as to meet the case of each local body.
