They assume different characters, and agree to meet at a general place of rendezvous, which is commonly some Serai, where they are known to the bhutteearas. Thus they make their headquarters for a time; and in the day time station themselves where they are most likely to attract notice, and begin to play as if strangers to each other assuming different garbs. The unwary traveller eyes them for a time, and is tempted to try his luck; at first they allow him to win and then fleece him of every thing. The leader gets a double share of the profits, and all the rest share equally. The leader is bund to support the party at first setting off, till a sufficient sum has been won to enable each man to support himself. He is also obliged in the first instance to have a sum with which to commence playing. If any of the party are taken up, it is the leader's duty to do his utmost for his release, and for all sums expended in the effort he is to receive two pice interest in each rupee. After a successful day's work, they generally drink and gamble amongst themselves. It was during one of these revellings, that a number were captured at Bloondshehur; seval escaped, and are now in custody. — The following in some of their cant, by the medium of which they communicate with each other. —
