In reference to my application of December last, for permission for my wife and child to travel home via the Mediterranean and Marseilles I have the honour to inquire whether under the more favourable conditions now prevailing you could not see your way to grant them permission then refused.

I may remind you that I based my first application on the sudden illness, then thought to be paralysis, of my wife's mother. The disease was found from later information to be cancer, so placed and so advanced that an operation was declared to be impossible.

The true nature of the disease has, under medical advice, not been communicated to the patient. It is therefore impossible to send her to a nursing home, as she would at once suspect that something was seriously wrong. She has therefore had to be kept at home.

As the only persons who could render help are two daughters-in-law one of whom is an invalid herself and the other is working in a Food Control office which necessitates her leaving home every morning for the day, outside help has to be obtained. After considerable difficulty a suitable person was engaged. She has however now left and conditions are as before, with this difference that the second crisis is now overdue, may occur anytime and may find the patient who is over 70 alone in the house.

The position is an exceedingly trying one for my wife, who is the only daughter and is naturally anxious at a time like this to be near her mother. The inability to do anything, the strain of uncertainty as to what is happening, the knowledge that her mother is dependent on the attentions of one not interested and the necessarily casual attentions of a daughter-in-law, neither of whom may be at hand when the second crisis occurs, which when it does occur will necessitate the nature of the ailment being revealed and the removal of her mother to a nursing home, have all told upon my wife to the detriment of her bodily health.

My first application was made reluctantly. Now however that the submarine menace has been removed I am as anxious as she that she should be allowed to go. I have therefore the honour to request that in these circumstances you will be so good as to grant the necessary permission.

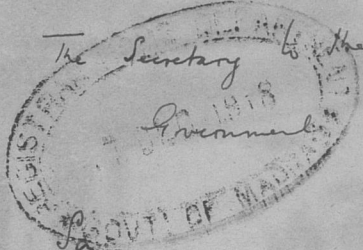

I have the honour to be,

Sir,

Your most obedient servant
