anxious to retain them as a protection to the walls from carts or carriages, to which indulgence I do not see any objection. The remaining ten, which are half buried at different points in the avenue and grounds, do not appear to be of any use whatever.

Neither the one in Ammen Covil Street, or that in Soobroya Moodelly's garden, appears to be of any use, but the others are a protection to the gateways and walls beside which they are sunk.
