Gódávari.	Muhammad Abdul Rahman.	Pushkaram festival.	From 16th to 27th August (both days inclusive).	About 100,000.	There was accommodation for the pilgrims in the shape of pandals. Seven pandals were erected near the new building of taluk cutcherry at Kovur, of which six were intended for the pilgrims and one for the police and the dispensary. There was also a cholera shed erected at a distance of 200 yards from the camp. The sheds were not sufficient for the pilgrims. The rest of the pilgrims were scattered over the village.	From the well of the taluk cutcherry and from the river Gódávari quality good. The upper portion reserved for drinking and cooking purposes extending to a furlong. A portion below this was used for bathing and washing purposes. These places were guarded by the police constables from contamination.	There were two sweepers of Kovur, and the additional five men arrived from Rajahmundry on 16th August 1896—total number seven. They were employed as sweepers and toties up to the evening of 27th in the village as well as in the camp. Shallow trench latrines were dug—one for males and the other for females. These latrines were not used by the pilgrims. They resorted to open places at a distance of one furlong from the camp. Police constables were also posted to prevent nuisance near the camp.	Nil.	Good.	Conservancy establishment is not sufficient. There must be not less than twelve sweepers in the camp and six sweepers in the village, and there should be two peons to take work from them.	The conservancy arrangements were inadequate; but it is to be presumed the taluk board did the best it could in the difficult circumstance of the heavy demand at Rajahmundry. It is satisfactory to find that arrangements for preserving the river from contamination were not neglected. (Signed) W. G.
