I have just seen them
enter for the first time, and though I agree with Dr. Washburn that it is not desirable to promote the Prankie form until unless it can be as

~~improving~~ improving

I certainly cannot endorse

Col. Drake's recommendation namely - considering must be given and ~~not~~ to Dept. of the "world"

more so; as to what they have actually done,

and the Prankie's "fortune"

in the matter by in the fact that he was known to be an exceptionally good officer and was therefore

selected for the work

which has given him

the opportunity Col.

S. N. speaks of.

As to the climate, it is good in some ways, but fever and

shivering are almost as bad as heat, and the

the very unpleasant from

both of them - but would rather

any climate, because you possess patience, determination and resourcefulness. I think this demonstrated in this case will be found the
justified

Mr Taylor who has equally justified his selection, for his record in the prison and
young superintendent
work, a diligent
habit to research and
promote which might well like placing the
subordinate before the

I agree with your
remarks. Mr Mac
Kenzie may count
and that he has had

in this respect than so
in his place would
equally as well. I do not think that an accident of this nature
should entitle one officer to go over the heads of others his seniors. The climate in the Penjan
also is conducive to officer displaying
more energy in his
work than would be expected of those employed, say, in N II Penjan to, in the

All right. I don't mean the matter in Mr. Mackenzie's case. What struck me as curious was Mr. Pennington's assertion that the conditions of the service precluded protection for good work, or the thing to that effect.
