The rules require that Constables shall be discharged for no fault of their own – in the present case they resigned, with a view to getting gratuity. If they can produce certificates declaring that they would have been discharged for no fault, had they not applied for gratuity they might be granted gratuities – as it stands it is rather a hard case.

The question is whether Constables who resign the service at their own request can be admitted to pension or gratuity under G.O. 14th June 1864. No. 868, which says that Constables discharged for no fault of their own within five years after enlistment shall under certain conditions be admitted to pension.

From the word "discharged" it would I think be inferred that they must have been compelled to retire by incapacity for further service.

The two Constables referred to in para 2. resigned, however, with a view to getting gratuities under the G.O. above quoted.

No direct answer is given to the Memorandum sent to Inspector

General of Police requesting him to state whether these men would have been discharged if they had not resigned.

There are precedents for granting gratuities in similar cases - vide O.G. 5th January 1867 No. 1. Pension Dept. in wh. seven of the Constables in the list were stated to have resigned at their own request - and as the Circular from the Deputy Inspector General of Police of the 28th Oct. 1864 appears to be considered to have induced men to resign with a view to getting gratuities I should be glad if the objection I have raised can be overruled.
