Steadily and slowly, Bankers have been expanding their area of operations, building up, in course of time, a net work of branches in the more important commercial and marketing centres throughout the country. These branches serve the needs of the hinterland and provide seasonal credit to agriculturists and traders against local produce. In these days, good roads were rare and hence, transportation was extremely difficult. As a result, produce had to remain stored up at or near the places of production till transport became available to carry it to the far off towns and cities which were the major consuming centres. During this period of intervention,
