This image shows a small, rectangular fragment of old, weathered paper. The paper has a warm, yellowish-tan hue and a visible fibrous texture. There are several faint, dark ink marks scattered across its surface, which appear to be remnants of handwriting or stamps from a previous document. These marks are mostly illegible due to fading and the age of the paper. A small portion of another page is visible at the top edge, showing some more distinct handwriting.
